6. The second part (§3) was that it is not impossible nor contrary to natural reason that this exemption could be efficaciously made by the Supreme Pontiff so that it is just and valid and secular princes are held to admit and preserve it. This part demands a proper disputation, which we will give in ch. 11 where we will show it directly by authority and by reason; now it only needs to be explained so that it is clear it has in it nothing repugnant. It can therefore be understood in two ways: that the Pontiff confers this liberty on clerics first by human or merely natural power, or second in some way by divine power, that is, by supernatural power divinely given. We confess that in the former way the Pontiff could not introduce this exemption, for the thing is at any rate proved by the reason given, that the Pontiff could not by human right or by natural or acquired power take away or diminish the power of kings since they are supreme in their order and are not subject to him according to natural power.

7. Someone will perhaps say that the title of prescription is human and natural, and that the Pontiff could by custom have prescribed against temporal kings this right of exempting clerics from their power. The reply will be that this title does not have place in the present matter, nor are Pontiffs founded upon it, as the king of England seems sometimes to have supposed and as he indicates in his words. But a reason can be given. Either a general one, that those things which belong to the intrinsic nature of supreme power cannot be prescribed against a supreme prince, as is the common opinion of the jurists with Bartolo, 1 'In omnibus', about diverse and temporal prescriptions, and Panormitanus, ch. 'Cum nobis' De Preascript., and others whom Covarrubias in his practices, ch. 4, and in the Rule 'Possessor' p. 2, sect. 2, n. 8. Or the reason can be a particular and proper one, that the exemption of clerics, setting aside the concession and will of the secular princes themselves, could not be justly begun on human reason or title alone, or on good faith, and hence it is necessary that the power not proceed from custom but rather, on the contrary, that legitimate custom rest on the power and begin from it.

8. It is necessary, therefore, that this power be supernatural and specially introduced by Christ; and it is evident in this way that there is no repugnance in Christ having given this power to his Vicar through a certain participation in his own dominion and power which is in himself by essence or excellence. For what reason is there that this could not happen? Or what deformity or malice against natural reason could be discovered in it? For, once the Pontiff has been conceded such power, he is by it constituted superior to kings as the minister of God of a superior order, and hence the exemption made by power of this sort will be indeed a certain mere right of nature and not however against it. Nor do I see that there could be a question on this matter, but only on this other, whether Christ has in fact given this power to the Pontiff, which question we will deal with in the place cited (sc. ch. 11); and there we will reply directly to the objections posed on this point, for these are especially aimed at it, to show that in fact this power has not been given to the Pontiff. We therefore say now briefly that those arguments only prove that the Pontiff could not confer this exemption on clerics by a direct power that he has in temporal matters over the kings of the earth, but do not prove that this exceeds his spiritual power insofar as by it he is, at least indirectly and in order to spiritual things, superior to temporal kings. This power has place in many cases even over heathen kings, as was shown in the previous book. But how this indirect power is sufficient for effecting exemption we will see in the place mentioned.

9. The third part posited above (§3) was about temporal kings, about whom we said that they could licitly renounce their right, and that, although they may be compelled by no superior virtue or power, they could abdicate from the temporal jurisdiction which they had over clerics and transfer it to the Roman Pontiff or to other ecclesiastical prelates. This part is supposed as certain by many civil and canon rights, and by their interpreters commonly, and by doctors of theology, as we will mention at large in the following chapters. Now the reason is plain: because a supreme king is also true lord and has the free power of using his jurisdiction in any way that is neither intrinsically evil nor prohibited to him; but the act of exempting clerics from lay jurisdiction is an act of lordship and of the same voluntary jurisdiction which was never prohibited to kings, nor is it intrinsically evil; therefore it could validly and licitly be done by any supreme king. The consequence is very good and legitimate. Also, the king of England will not deny the major, for it is favorable to kings, and indeed deservedly, for it is a thing clear and evident from the things said above about regal power. For although a king is not so made lord of the republic that he can use his power at will and convert everything to his own utility, yet he is a true lord insofar as he has a true and proper right of commanding, judging, governing, and disposing of things for the common utility of his kingdom; and the jurists thus call this the lordship of jurisdiction because in the supreme prince it has, per se and in its kind, independence from every other superior beneath God, and therefore it has the most ample and free faculty for every use that is not prohibited or not repugnant to right reason.

10. It remains, therefore, that we prove that the concession of the exemption we are dealing with is of this kind. For it is a certain use of supreme jurisdiction, for (as I said), exemption is a certain privilege, but the concession of a privilege is an act of voluntary jurisdiction, as we treated of at large in De Legibus 8. Rightly therefore is it said that this exemption is a use of a voluntary jurisdiction which must be supreme in its own order, so that a supreme prince could exempt even from himself the one privileged. By another argument too this act can be said to be a use of jurisdiction, because it is a certain donation of jurisdiction; for no one can give a jurisdiction unless he possess it. But peculiar to this way of conceding jurisdiction which happens through this exemption is that the prince, who concedes it to another, deprives himself of it, because he exempts the subject from his own power; something which is not found in other modes of delegating or granting jurisdiction, nor in an exemption from an inferior magistrate which the prince concedes. Hence if that exemption be considered as it is a conferring of jurisdiction it is rightly called an act of jurisdiction; but if it be looked on as an abdication of proper right it seems more to be an act of dominion and liberality; but under both reasons it falls in the best way to the supreme governor and lord. That this use, therefore, of his jurisdiction is not prohibited to a supreme prince by positive law is manifest, because he does not have a superior by whom that law could have been passed. For we suppose that that law is not a positive divine law, for nowhere has it been passed or can be pointed to. Also, next, that it is not a canon right we take to be as it were self evident. And for that reason we are speaking only directly of a superior when we deny that a king has a superior by whom that law could have been passed, because it would have to be a human and civil law which in temporal matters could be directly made by a supreme prince alone. Nor can it be feigned to have been passed by the king himself, because a supreme prince cannot per se and primarily oblige himself by his own law, but, in sum, it is by a certain consequence when a law imposed on the community possesses a similar nature of obliging the prince; but this law, if it were given, would be imposed not on the community but on the prince alone, and for that reason it could not be passed by the very same prince. Nor lastly can it be feigned that it was a law passed by the republic; for after a republic has transferred its own power to a king, it is inferior to him so that it cannot oblige him by positive laws.

11. It remains only to show that that use is not evil intrinsically and per se, or what is the same, that the privilege is not against justice or natural reason. But the thing seems indeed to be self evident, because it favors faith and religion, and harms no one, and it is not prejudicial, except to the prince himself who concedes the privilege, which he can do voluntarily and piously if he does it for the stated end and without harm to anyone. The thing is shown also in this way, because either that use is per se evil, because it is against the compact entered into with the republic when it first transferred its power to the king, or because it is against the natural law of justice by which the king is bound to have care for his subjects, or for all the inhabitants of his kingdom, in accord with the demands of his office which he has received from the republic; but each of these is thought up without foundation and can easily be excluded; therefore there is no true nature of intrinsic malice in such a privilege.

The first part of the minor is proved because that there was such a compact between the republic and the king is gratuitously feigned, I mean that the republic transferred its power to the king under the condition or limitation that he could not concede such a privilege of exemption to any citizens. For whence could such a condition be proved, or what sign of it could be pointed to? Besides the republic itself would not have its power so limited, because it received it not from any like compact but from God himself as congenital with its nature and under the condition only that it use it justly and according to right reason; therefore it transferred it in the same way to the king, and anything else that is feigned is arbitrary and impertinent. Especially so because if the human republic be considered in the state of the law of nature, in which it could rule itself by right reason, whether natural only or illumined by faith, it could also have instituted temporal kings for itself and priests particularly dedicated to the cult of God, and it could exempt the priests from the power of the kings and constitute them under another governor supreme in his own order; for in this type of institution there is no repugnance or deformity; therefore the king too, although he has simply received the whole of his power from the republic, could afterwards concede a similar privilege to priests; therefore it is superfluous to feign that that compact and condition or limitation has been imposed on itself by the republic, since it is not necessary for the convenient governing of the republic. Nay rather, if that condition be extended so as to have place also with respect to priests or Pontiffs instituted in a supernatural way by Christ, in this way it could not even have come into the mind of a human republic viewed in itself, and it would be against reason and public honor, and hence it would be of no moment or worth. Therefore the power of kings is on this head not tied down so as to prevent them being able rightly and validly to give this privilege to clerics, even if these did not have the privilege from elsewhere.

12. Thence lastly the second member [sc. of the minor] may easily be proved, namely that this privilege is not contrary to the natural law of justice whereby the king is bound to have care for all the citizens so that they may be agreeably governed. For by conceding this privilege the king does not give up this care but provides for it in a deeper and more agreeable way. Hence there are two ways in which a king can be thought to exempt from his jurisdiction someone subject to him. The first way is by removing from himself all power and jurisdiction with respect to him and not subjecting him to anyone else but leaving him a vagabond, so to say, and without law and government. And this manner of privilege we confess to be most disordered and intrinsically evil, because it is contrary to good morals and very pernicious of itself to the community of the republic. But the exemption of clerics we are now supposing is not of this sort. In another way a king can exempt a subject from his jurisdiction, by granting or leaving power over him to another; and this way is not evil but can have an agreeable reason, because it is not contrary to the good morals of the subjects since they are not left without a sufficient government; and government from elsewhere can be more fitting and more agreeable to the common good on account of the peculiar status of certain citizens. But the exemption of clerics is of such a kind, as we will prove below; therefore to concede it was not contrary to the good use of regal jurisdiction and power, and consequently neither is such a privilege repugnant to natural reason, nor does it exceed the power of a supreme prince.

13. Nor even do the arguments proposed in the third place above (§2) stand against this. For what is said first, that a prince cannot diminish his jurisdiction or power by communicating it to another, is not universally true when such a division or communication of jurisdiction is judged agreeable to the good of the republic, because that power is of itself changeable and is ordered to the common good of the republic; and, for this reason, that a change of this sort should occur in it is not repugnant to any right. Especially so because by this privilege the republic is not deprived of such jurisdiction in itself or over all its members, but the jurisdiction is transferred from one to another, which can happen for many reasons, as is evident. Nor must an equivalence with the jurisdiction of the Supreme Pontiff be here admitted, because the pontifical dignity has a higher institution by reason of which it is immutable, as I said above, and for that reason it cannot happen that any baptized person should be exempted from it, since he is subject to it by divine right; but it is otherwise in the case of regal power, which is simply and proximately from human institution. Now that which Navarrus and other jurists say, that a king cannot exempt anyone from his obedience, must be understood of merely private exemption, that is, one which leaves the subject without law and governor, but not of an exemption that transfers jurisdiction to another, as has been shown. And this very fact is confirmed by the example which Navarrus introduces about the republic itself, as is evident even from what he said.

14. To the final confirmation (§2), I reply that the remark of Paul of Venice, that ecclesiastical liberty is nothing other than a liberty or license for sinning, is impious and blasphemous; for the liberty which the Pontiffs have taught, and which the sacred canons defend, and for which many holy Pontiffs have fought for with their blood, and which emperors and Catholic kings along with the Church have piously and faithfully received and praised, is not a license for sinning freely and without impunity, but it is a certain veneration of ecclesiastical order and an agreeable distribution of jurisdictions, so that everything in the Church may be done in order and decently. Nor is the argument of Paul of any moment. First because an ecclesiastical judge or the Pontiff can impose the corporal punishment even of death, although on account of decency and lenity he does not do it of himself, as Innocent indicated in ch.1 De Maiorit. et Obed., and Baldus in the same place, and as Bernard Diaz notes in Pract. criminal. ch.61, and Covarrubias Variar., bk.2, ch.20, no.10, where he devotes De Homicid. ch.1, n.6, to this fact, when a Pontiff imposes the penalty of loss of trust on account of homicide committed by assassins, which loss of trust virtually includes the penalty of death, as he there declares. Hence the fact that an ecclesiastical judge does not of himself use the sword nor pronounces of himself a sentence of blood is not because he, or at least a Pontiff or one who has received singular power from him, cannot, but because it is not fitting. Yet, nevertheless, when the gravity of the offence demands, an ecclesiastical judge hands over a criminal cleric to the secular arm so that he may be punished by it in accord with the rigor of the laws; therefore, from this part, there is not given to clerics impunity in committing like offences. Next, outside the case of penalty of death, clerics can (as Panormitas notes in ch. 'Cum non ab homine,' De Iudic., no.26) can be inflicted with very grave penalties by the Church, for they are sometimes condemned to perpetual incarceration, and of such a strictness that it could be deemed to be rather perpetual death than life, as is understood from ch. 'Novimus' sect. 1, on the signification of words. Next, also a sufficiently grave punishment is perpetual and burdensome exile, condemnation to the galleys, grave beating, and others similar.

Last of all, although perhaps some perverse men take occasion of sinning from the greater benignity and lenity of an ecclesiastical court, the privilege of ecclesiastical exemption is not thereby damnable, because that fact is accidental and against the intention of the Church, and many greater and necessary advantages follow from it, as we will show below; also there is no good thing which perverse men may not sometimes use badly and it is not for that reason to be condemned. Just as in a secular court itself there is some distinction between laymen made, for those who are nobles are exempted by the privilege of nobility from the graver torments and from shameful punishments, which many of them abuse as a license for sinning, and the privilege itself is not disapproved for that reason, but those who use it badly are deemed worthy to be deprived of it; why, then, is not the same said analogously of ecclesiastical liberty since the clerical order is of its kind constituted at a higher level of dignity and nobility?

15. Finally therefore we conclude that the exemption of clerics could have not only been with justice conceded but also has in fact been with holiness conceded and that it is very ancient in the Church. This assertion we believe to be not only true and pious but also Catholic so that it cannot be denied without error in the faith. But because in the discourse of this book it must be treated and defended at large now too we will briefly thus prove it. For, in the first place, that this exemption is to be preserved in the Church has been taught by the Pontiffs and the Councils almost from the beginning of the Church up to the present day, as is clear from Alexander I, Epistle to all the Orthodox, who was on the see in the year 109 AD, and he testifies that it had been observed from the times of the apostles, which fact Pope Caius also afterwards taught, Letter to Bishop Felix 283 AD, and Marcellinus, Epistle 2 to all the Bishops of the East, in the year 196 AD, Pope Sylvester, in a certain Roman Council, which is placed as the first in order under him, canon 4, the year 314 AD, Gelasius in Gratian, ch. 'Christianis', and ch. 'Sylvester', 11, q.1, and Boniface V in a letter to the Bishops of France, as Gratian above reports in ch. 'Nullus', for it is not found in the original, and the chapter seems more to have been taken from Authentica 'Nullus', the body of the text on bishops and clerics. Gregory hands on the same, as Gratian reports in the same place from Epistles bk.9, indict. 4, epistle 32, to the Roman defender of Sicily, and epistle 74, to Boniface defender of Corsica, has the same, where he speaks thus, ch. 'Pervenit', 11, q.1: 'It has come to us that certain of the clerics, while you were posted there, were held by laymen. If this thing is so, you know that the guilt is considered to be yours, because this should not have happened, if you were a man. And for this reason you must, for the rest, take care that you do not permit it to happen; but if anyone has a cause against any cleric, let him go to his bishop etc.' I pass over the later Pontiffs because the thing is manifest about them, and it is apparent from the custom of promulgating every year the Bull Coenae Domini.

I add older and graver witnesses, whom Gratian omits. One is Leo I in epistle 36 to the Bishops and priests of Thrace, whose words are to be noted: "The powers of the age, even those whom the divine power has commanded to preside over territories under the name of emperor, have excelled with so much reverence with respect to the sacerdotal order that they have allowed to the holy Bishops the right of distinguishing occupations in accord with the divine constitutions. But although it be confirmed by the formulas of ancient right and more frequently by unimpaired laws, we find, however, that at the present time it has by many been trampled on. For, having omitted sacerdotal judgment, they have everywhere passed over to secular examination. For which reason it has seemed to us that a full separation avenge for the present this insult of sacred law and of our order and establish for the future that the formula is to be observed etc." The other is Telesphorus, ninth Pope in succession from Peter, who in his letter to all the faithful speaks thus: "The life of clerics should be distinct from the association of laymen; and just as laymen and secular men do not wish to accept them in their own accusations and infamies, so clerics ought not to accept them in their own instigations." – Showing by these words how great a distinction there then was between each forum.

Besides many sacred Councils, general and provincial, ancient and more recent, have handed down that clerics are not to be judged by laymen but by Bishops or by provincial Councils, as is clear from the Council of Chalcedon, act 15, ch.9, and from the 3rd Council of Carthage that met before in the year 397, ch.9, where, among other things, it is said that a cleric who seeks help from a secular court is thinking ill of the Church. Also, in ch.38, occasion is sought from the same Council for imploring the secular arm against a certain incorrigible Bishop, and Aurelius responds, with the consent of others, that this is not contrary to the form of discipline when a cleric, after having been admonished, has been stubborn and contemptuous of it. Also, in the 3rd Council of Toledo, ch.13, clerics are punished who abandon the ecclesiastical courts and go to secular ones. The same is held too at the Council of Agde in the time of Symmachus, chs.8 and 32, the 3rd Council of Orleans, ch.31, Malea, ch. 19, the 1st of Macon, chs.8 and 32, and more broadly at the 2nd of Macon, chs.9 and 10, where these words are to be noted: "The most reverend canons and the most sacred laws, in the very beginning almost of Christianity, have pronounced judgment about the Episcopal tribunal, but because the same has been disregarded, human temerity has proceeded against the priests of God, etc." These words are to be especially noted, both for the antiquity of the exemption and because in them is insinuated that it is declared and defended rather than instituted by the canons and laws; for the fact is indicated by this manner of speaking: "have pronounced judgment for the Episcopal tribunal."

The same is taken from the Council of Paris, ch.2, about the competent forum, and from the Lateran Council under Alexander III, ch. 'Si clericus', the same title in which many things are decreed about the distinction between each forum, and more in ch. 'Qualiter, et quando,' and ch. 'Clerici', and ch. 'Cum non ab homine,' De Iudiciis. Next in the 1st Council of Cologne, p.9, ch.20, it is said that 'this immunity is very ancient', and in the Lateran Council under Leo X, sess.9, in the Bull of reformation, all the apostolic sanctions in favor of ecclesiastical liberty are renewed. 'Since,' it says, 'no power over ecclesiastical persons has been bestowed on laymen by either divine or human right.' And lastly the Council of Trent, sess.25, ch.20, about the Reformation, speaks thus: 'The Holy Synod decrees and prescribes that all the sacred canons and all the general Councils and also the other ecclesiastical sanctions in favor of ecclesiastical persons and ecclesiastical liberty and issued against violators of it, which are all renewed also by the present decree, must be observed exactly by all.' In addition, civil laws agree with these canonical decrees, which we will afterwards refer to.

16. From these testimonies the conclusion is evidently drawn that there has been given to clerics in the Church of Christ a privilege of exemption from the secular power. For it is impossible that so many holy and wise Pontiffs, of whom many were also martyrs, and so many Councils could in this matter have been deceived. Hence also it is incredible that clerics have usurped this privilege against emperors and kings through tyranny and injury. Rather it ought to be held certain de fide that the institution and observance of this privilege has been and is honorable and holy. The fact is gathered in this way from the principles of faith and the testimonies cited. For it is de fide that the Church cannot err in the precepts of morals which are commanded to be observed by the universal authority of Pontiffs or general Councils, but this privilege of exemption for clerics has been approved and has been commanded to be observed by many laws canonical and universal, and they were very recently renewed and confirmed by the Council of Trent in the place cited; therefore it is certain de fide that both this Council and the above decrees have in this point not erred; therefore it is in the same way certain de fide both that this privilege is just and valid and that it has been agreeably instituted. But by what reasons it was conceded we will see in what follows by investigation of what the right is by which it has been introduced. For it is plain from the things said in this chapter that it could have been given in three ways, namely by divine, canon, and civil right, and therefore from which of them it has emanated remains to be inquired.

Chapter 4: Whether the Supreme Pontiff be exempt by every divine and human right from all jurisdiction of secular princes.

Summary: 1. Sense of the question. 2. The error of Protestants. The opinion of Palatius is not to be admitted. 3. First conclusion. 4. It is proved first from canon right. 5. When something may be said to be by divine right, natural or positive. The exemption of the Supreme Pontiff is by natural and positive divine right. 6. The preceding assertion is proved as to its first part. 7. A difficulty about the proposed proof. 8. Resolution of the aforesaid difficulty.

1. Although the privilege of exemption be common to the Supreme Pontiff in company with the rest of the clerics, since he himself is not only a cleric but also prince and head of all clerics and of the whole Church, yet because in him, on account of his singular eminence, the origin of such privilege is more known, and because knowledge of it can prepare the way for investigating the origin of the immunity of other ecclesiastics, we will for that reason organize our talk first about the Pope in particular. About him even heretics do not deny that he is de facto exempt from all secular power, because he himself possesses, joined to his pontifical office, a temporal kingdom in which he recognizes no superior; but because that kingdom is not immediately from God but he has attained it from the devotion of men or by some other similar title, therefore such exemption is not per se joined to the pontifical dignity, nor does it draw its origin from divine but from human right, or to be sure it follows from the nature of the thing on the supposition of such status of temporal prince, just as it does in other kings, who are exempt by force of their status because they do not have a superior. Hence, in order to respond to the question posed, the regal dignity must be cut away from the person of the Pontiff and he must be considered solely as Pontiff, in the way Peter was and his successors before Constantine.

2. In this way, then, do both Protestants and the king of England deny openly that the Roman Pontiff has this exemption: Either because they believe he is no more than some private bishop or at most a patriarch; but they hold the view about all bishops and archbishops that they are subject to their kings in temporal matters; Or certainly because the Pontiff is not exempt either by divine right, as appears in Peter and the other apostles, to whom Christ never conceded such a privilege, or by canon right, because the Pontiff could not assume this privilege by his own authority alone, but canon right rests for its support principally on pontifical authority. In civil right, however, nothing singular is said about the Roman Pontiff more than about the rest. Hence even among Catholics Palacio, in 4, dist.25, has dared to assert that the Pope is not exempt from the civil power by divine or canon right but only by civil right, or by privilege of the emperors. For he thinks the same about other ecclesiastics and attributes to the Pontiff nothing singular as regard this privilege. But this opinion, insofar as it takes this whole privilege back to the sole gift of the emperors, is pernicious even for the other clerics who are inferior to the Pope, and is not at all to be approved, as I will show below; about the Supreme Pontiff, however, it is altogether to be rejected and not at all to be tolerated.

3. One must say, therefore, that the Supreme Pontiff has by divine right exemption and immunity from every secular court and jurisdiction, even those of emperors and kings. This assertion is maintained in the first place by all Catholic doctors, who generally affirm that this exemption exists by divine right in the whole ecclesiastical state, and we will refer to them in ch.8. Besides them, however, those who either deny it about inferiors or are doubtful frankly confess it about the Supreme Pontiff on account of his singular dignity, Soto bk. 5 De Iustit., q.4, a1; Bañez thinks the same, 2.2, q.67, a.1, dub.3, and it is taken from Cajetan in the same place and in Opuscula, vol.1., tract.1, De Potestate Papae et Concillii ch.27, ad.2. It is expressly noted and proved by Torquemada, Summa bk.2, ch.93, and Bellarmine, De Sum. Pontif., bk.2, ch.26, who are followed by Molina, De Iustit. vol.1, disp.31, Valentia, 3 par., disp.5, q.11, punct.1, Henry, De Indulgent., bk.7, ch.24, and Driedo, De Libert. Christian., bk.1, ch.9 near the middle, and ch.15 near the end.

4. This assertion can in general be proved from canon right, insofar as therein it is simply asserted that the Pope does not have a superior on earth by whom he could be judged or coerced. Thus is it handed down from the Roman Council under Sylvester, can.20, 'No one,' it says, 'will judge the first see, since all sees desire to have justice moderated by the first see.' And lest anyone consider that that council is speaking of the court alone, or of the judicial power, there is immediately subjoined: 'Neither by Augustus, nor by any cleric, nor by kings, nor by the people will the judge be judged.' It is almost these words that Gratian refers to, 9. q.3, from Pope Innocent, 'No one will judge the first see etc.' Also the same words from Sylvester are reported by Pope Nicolas, Epist.1, elsewhere numbered 8, to the Emperor Michael, § Consonat autem. And in the following § he refers to the similar words of the Council convened in the case of Marcellinus, namely: 'The first see will not be judged by anyone;' and he confirms this opinion with many testimonies and arguments. Finally he himself concludes: 'It has been shown with sufficient evidence that the Pontiff cannot be at all bound or loosed by the secular power.' Hence, when a sedition in the time of Leo III was started at Rome against him, and Charlemagne had come to Rome to put the sedition down and, in the Basilica of St. Peter, with all the people and the clergy of all the Bishops who had convened there from the whole of Italy and France standing by, started to ask for their opinions and votes about the life and morals of the Pontiff, the response came from all with one voice, 'the Apostolic See, the head of all the churches, ought to be judged by no one (especially not by a layman),' and Charlemagne, having heard so weighty a response, dropped the question. Thus reports Platina in his life of Leo, and it is found in vol.3 of the Councils. The same opinion is also proved by the deacon Ennodius in his book for the defense of Symmachus, which was received and approved in the 5th Roman Synod under the same Symmachus. The same is reported from the words of the martyr Boniface by Gratian in ch. Si Papa, dist.40, and he took them from Cardinal Deusdedit in his history De Rebus Ecclesiastic., bk.1, ch.231, since it is reported at large in the Gregorian decree under the said chapter Si Papa. Lastly in the 8th General Synod of Constantinople can.21 the opinion is singularly enriched, because not only about the Pope but about the other patriarchs too it is said: 'None at all of the powers of the world can take away their honor or move them from their proper throne,' and there is added: 'especially indeed the most holy Pope of Old Rome.' And later: 'But neither may anyone else file or prepare documents or words against the most holy Pope of Old Rome as if on the occasion of certain divulged crimes.' It also later says that even a general synod cannot give sentence against the Supreme Pontiffs of Old Rome.

From this dogma, therefore, so ancient and constant, we collect that this privilege of the Supreme Pontiff is not human but divine, because he would not in fact dare to arrogate it to himself unless he could have done it by right; for it would not have been admitted with so much facility and agreement by the Church and by Christian princes without any force or coercion (which to be sure neither could the Pontiffs themselves have effected); nor could the Pontiff have sought it by right either unless he had power and authority for it which he had received, by reason of his dignity, from Christ. But if he has authority from Christ himself for deflecting all human jurisdiction, certainly he is exempt from it by divine right. Nor is it credible that he had received this right from the emperors; both because the dogma is known in the Church in advance of the Christian emperors, as we said of the time of Marcellinus, and because the emperor could not concede this privilege for all the kings and peoples not subject to him, although in the cited Roman synod that opinion is pronounced generally and with respect to all. Finally also because the Councils and Pontiffs do not found that dogma on any favor of the emperor but on the eminence of the dignity of the Roman See. And that is why they deem that such a privilege is perpetual and altogether firm and immutable, which it could not be if it had its origin from the emperor. In this matter I consider too the fact that neither is the emperor himself or a king exempt on earth in this way from all temporal jurisdiction that he can in no case be judged or coerced by men or by the whole community, because, as was said in Book 3, the power of any temporal monarch whatever flows from the republic with a certain limitation and condition included; but the exemption of the Pontiff is much greater and higher; therefore it could not be founded on the concession of emperors or kings; therefore such a privilege was given by God himself. Hence Ennodius says, ch. 'Aliorum', 9, q.3, above: 'The causes of other men God has wished men to put a final settlement to, but the causes of the see of that Superior he has reserved without question to his own decision.'

5. Now so as by some reason to declare more distinctly where and when Christ conferred this privilege immediately on the Pontiff, it is necessary to distinguish two ways in which this privilege may be understood to be divine, namely either by natural right or by positive right. But in the present matter one must understand that natural right is not considered in its pure condition in respect of human nature; for in this way it is known per se that this exemption is not by natural right; but by natural is meant in the present what is connatural to some grace or to a supernatural dignity conferred on man, that is, once such dignity is posited, what necessarily follows from it according to natural reason. But there will be said to be such a privilege by divine positive right if the point is established that it was per se and directly, or by his proper and particular will, conferred by Christ the Lord on his Vicar. We say, then, that it is true in both ways, which must be shown one by one.

6. In the first place, that this exemption is by divine natural right is signified by Pope Nicolas, ch. 'Patet', 9, q.3, in the letter cited: 'It is certainly clear that the judgment of the Apostolic See, than whose authority there is not a greater, is to be retracted by no one and that it is not licit for anyone to judge its judgment.' And later: 'No one has ever thrown his hands with daring against the apostolic summit, no one has stood up a rebel in this, except he who of himself wished to be judged.' As if he were to say that the Pontiff, by force of his apostolic summit and authority, than which there is not a greater, is exempt from human judgment. Ennodius too in the place next cited finds this exemption on the words of Christ: 'You are Peter' and 'Whatever you loose, etc.' As if he were to say that Christ had given this exemption there to Peter where he created him his Vicar and supreme Pastor of the Church, even if he had said nothing else express; because, surely, from the nature of the thing this privilege accompanies such dignity, and therefore it belongs to such dignity by natural divine right, although simply and in itself it be of supernatural divine right, because in its root (so to speak) it can be said also to be positive right. But the reason for this consequence or natural right must be that Peter was by that dignity set above everyone not only in spiritual things but also in temporal, as was seen above; therefore by that very fact he is exempt from the power and subjection of all.

7. Yet this inference is not so evident that it may not suffer some difficulty. For the Pontiff is not by force of his dignity directly superior to everyone in temporal things, but rather he has by force of divine right no directly temporal jurisdiction but a spiritual one alone, which is extended to temporal ones only indirectly; therefore there is no repugnance in his being subject directly to temporal jurisdiction and having indirect power over the temporal king; therefore, conversely, that exemption in temporal things does not follow intrinsically from the spiritual dignity. This latter consequence is evident and the antecedent was proved in the previous book. But the former consequence is shown because these two things, subjection and preferment, are of different natures, and so they are not opposed, nor is there repugnance in their coming together at the same time in the same person. The demonstration is that they are not referred to according to the same nature, nor in respect of the same thing, nor according to the same thing; for although the Pontiff, as Pontiff, be superior in his order, as a man he can be a subject in a lower order. Again, because the Pope can only use his indirect power in temporal matters when, for instance, a king abuses his power in order to a spiritual end, therefore this does not prevent him from being able to be justly subject to the emperor who is punishing him through his own direct power. Finally it is clear by other examples that there is no conflict in him who is superior to a second in one title being subject to him under another, as when, if someone has a son for king, he is superior to him by the natural title of father and nevertheless he will be subject to him as king.

8. Nevertheless the connection of such a privilege with such dignity is very much in agreement with reason, and it can be shown in various ways. First because just as the giver of form in natural things gives the things that are consequent to the form, so in moral things the giver of jurisdiction is deemed to give all that is necessary to the due use and administration of it. But in the present matter, so that the Pontiff be able to exercise his supreme power and indirect jurisdiction in temporal matters over all temporal princes, it is necessary, morally speaking, that he be directly subject to none of them in temporal causes that pertain to the person of the Pontiff himself by some title or in some way; therefore such exemption has been given to the Pontiff by the force of his dignity. For, since God disposes all things most wisely and sweetly, it is not probable that he has given exemption and power without the exemption that is necessary or agreeable to the due use of such power. But that such dignity demand such exemption can be shown both because it was least fitting that the supreme head of the Church, to whom all the kings of the earth ought to be subject, could be judged, coerced, and punished by the same; and because it would have been a perpetual seed of divisions and schisms; and also because the Pontiffs would not be able with due liberty and authority to use their jurisdiction and power over the kings and princes of the earth if they had been subject in another way to them and could be thrown into chains and be punished by them.

Second, this fact is declared further because the Pontiff by force of his dignity and supreme power could dispose of all temporal rights and even of the supreme secular power itself, insofar as it was necessary for the convenient government of spiritual things, as shown above; therefore the same Pontiff by force of the same spiritual jurisdiction has the authority to give commands to any king at all lest he dare to extend his hand or exercise his power against his person, and he can annul and hold as naught whatever a secular power may have attempted to the contrary, because without doubt this greatly pertains to the spiritual good of the Church and the reverence due to Christ and to the person carrying out his functions on earth; therefore it is plainly repugnant for the Pontiff to be subject to a temporal king as regards his coercive power, because coercive power requires such a power over another that he cannot be hindered or restrained from it by a superior power. The confirmation is that by this reason we will show in what follows that a Pontiff can exempt other clerics from secular jurisdiction without having waited for the agreement of temporal princes; therefore much more could he exempt himself; but this is the same as to be exempt by force of dignity and received power; for he who has it in his will and faculty not to be subject to the coercion of another is surely immune and exempt from it.

Third, there is the explanation that it is impossible for a temporal magistrate to have coercive power over a king directly superior to him on whom he depends in the use of his own power; therefore it is no less repugnant that a Pontiff be subjected in that way to the temporal power. The antecedent is fully accepted by the jurists cited above, and it is taken from ch. 'Cum inferior', de Maiorit. et obed., where it is said that an inferior cannot restrain a superior. And the reason is an open one, that it is repugnant for the same person at the same time to be with respect to another inferior and superior on the basis of the same involuntary and coercive jurisdiction. But the reason for this is that coercion cannot happen by the proper virtue of him who is coerced and, consequently, not by an inferior power which depends on a superior power existing in him who is to be coerced. But the proof of the consequence is that although the power of the Pontiff be not directly temporal, nor of the same order with the power of kings, nevertheless it eminently contains that power and all the efficaciousness of it with respect even to temporal matter which has a sufficient relation to a spiritual matter, such as we have shown judgment about the person itself of the Pope to be; therefore it is equally repugnant for the Pontiff to be subject to the tribunal of a temporal prince whom in this way he has subordinate and subject to himself. Therefore by the same divine right by which temporal princes are thus subjected to the Pope, by the same right, I say, the Pontiff himself is exempt from their jurisdiction. It remains for the other part to be proved, about divine positive right, which we will pursue in the next chapter.

Chapter 5: Consideration of the place in Matthew 'Give to them for me and for you' on behalf of the exemption of the Supreme Pontiff.

Summary: 1. In what sense the exemption of the Pontiff is by divine positive right. This assertion is proved. A certain inference of heretics is rejected. 2. First doubt about which sons Christ the Lord had spoken. First reason for the doubt. 3. Second reason. 4. To the first doubt. 5. To the second. 6. Christ the Lord, even as man, is natural Son of God. 7. Third doubt. Solution. First opinion: it is rejected. 8. The apostles thought that Peter was superior to themselves in some temporal dignity. 9. Opinion of others. The privilege of Peter passes to his successors. 10. In the words referred to Christ demonstrates the privilege of exempting others from tribute. 11. Objection. Response. Immunity from secular power is rightly gathered from the immunity from tribute.

1. We call divine positive right here a privilege conceded by Christ by a particular and direct will. I state the fact thus so that this part may not seem contrary to the preceding; for speaking strictly positive right is said to be what is not natural but added by the free will of God, and it seems to be a repugnance that this privilege is at the same time by divine right both natural and positive. For that reason, therefore, we say that here positive right is taken broadly for any right at all founded on the express and direct will of Christ, even if it could also be founded on another remote will, through the medium of natural discourse or reason. Hence this positive right can also be said to be declaring rather a right that was already connatural to the idea of the earlier dignity than conceding it again. With the term thus explained, then, the assertion proposed is proved from the words of Christ, Matt 17.24-27, when the exactors of the tribute, which at that time the Jews used to pay individually to Augustus, had asked Peter: ‘Doth not your master pay tribute?’ and he had responded by saying yes, Christ afterwards, so as to teach Peter and his Church in him, asks him: ‘Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers?’ Peter responds, ‘Of strangers’; hence Christ inferred, ‘then are the children free. Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money; that take, and give unto them for me and thee.’ From this fact the heretics not only do not conclude to the immunity of Peter from payment of tributes, but infer rather that Christ was also debtor to the tribute when he commanded him to pay it on his behalf. But they are manifestly in error, both because Christ wanted to conclude from his argument that he was immune from payment of tribute, since the sons of an earthly king are immune from tributes, and also because he afterwards expressly said, ‘lest we should offend them,’ as if he were to say, although we are not debtors to the tribute, pay it for me and for you so that they not be offended. The place was so understood by Jerome, Chrysostom, and everyone, and Augustine, serm. 6 De Verb. Apost. ch.7, says of Christ: ‘He did not owe it and he paid it’; and Ambrose in his notes on Exodus ch.31, says: ‘The Son of God did not owe it, Peter did not owe it; but lest they be offended, he says etc.’

2. However, before we conclude from this sentence of Christ to this privilege of the Apostolic See, we must inquire which sons Christ spoke about and what the force of his argumentation is and what the implication of his words. For either he spoke about proper and natural sons alone or more broadly about adoptive and improper sons as well; the latter cannot be asserted, otherwise all the just would be exempt from the tributes of princes because all are adoptive sons; also, because it is impossible to be certain about the eternal justice of individual men, all Christians will be exempt because all are in the status of sons, or they can have as much of it as exists by force of their profession, and they do have it as begun through faith and baptism; and on this account all the faithful are accustomed to be called saints in Scripture, especially by Paul. Nay further, all men could claim the same exemption from subjection to other men because all are sons of God by creation, for this title is enough to make them all able to call on God as Father.

3. But if Christ the Lord spoke of natural sons alone two doubts arise: one is how Christ may rightly infer that he himself was free, because he was not himself a natural son of Augustus Caesar so that by this title he might be immune from the tribute which was paid to Caesar. For the natural son of one king is not exempt from paying tribute to any king at all but only to his father; for if the son of one king were to live in foreign provinces beyond his father's sway, he could become a tribute payer to another king. But, saving proportion, it may very well be accommodated to Christ who, although as God he be natural son of the King and as such, therefore, free from tribute with respect to his Father, and a fortiori with respect to all human kings because all are subject to his Father's sway and are themselves, as a result, subject to him too; yet he is not, as man, natural son of God with that property, but he is a son by grace; therefore, when he speaks of himself as man, he could not justly infer from the title of his sonship that he was free and only paid tribute to avoid scandal. Also, just as many think that, though Christ, as God, is King and Lord of all men, yet he was not King as man nor had lordship over temporal kingdoms, therefore, by the same reason, his natural sonship was not an obstacle to his being, as man, a debtor to the tribute. The second and greater doubt is that Christ seems to associate Peter in this exemption along with himself, and by force of the same principle, that sons are free, makes him equally immune, seeing that he next inferred, 'lest we offend them...give unto them for me and thee'; for it was as if he were to say: we are both free but it is expedient not to scandalize them and therefore pay it for both of us. But this inference had no foundation in Peter, because he was in no way a natural son.

4. To the first question, Augustine, bk.1. Quaest. Evangelicar. q.23, indicates that when Christ inferred 'then are the children free', he spoke not only of natural sons but also of sons by adoption or by grace, for he says: 'What he said: 'then are the children free' is to be understood in every kingdom, that the sons of the kingdom are free, that is, not tribute payers; much more, therefore, ought they to be free in any earthly kingdom who are sons of that kingdom under which all kingdoms are.' But they are not sons of the Supreme King, that is of God, in the earthly kingdom save by grace; therefore Augustine extends Christ's inference also to sons by grace. Nevertheless, it must without doubt be said that Christ spoke of proper and natural sons, for the reasons made above give clear conviction of the fact. Because in addition too Christ did not ask Peter save about those sons about whom Peter himself could understand the words that were simply spoken, but Peter without doubt did not understand the question except about natural sons, because either he was not then able to understand it about sons by grace or at least he could not then ascend to that thought from that simple and common saying. Just as when he responded 'Of strangers' he did not think anything about the unjust or sinners but only about foreigners, who are not natural sons.

Hence Chrysostom there in Hom. 59 proves from those words that Christ is the natural Son of God, saying: 'You note how he distinguished sons from non-sons; for if he were not a son, he would not surely have used the example of kings. But is anyone a son, you will say, but not a proper son? He is not a son, then; but if not a son, then neither proper, nor his at all, but alien. In this way the example will have no force. For he is not disputing about sons simply but about proper sons and heirs of kings. And, distinguishing in this way, he put strangers opposite, by which term he called those who were not born from kings themselves; their own sons, however, they begat from themselves.' This very fact Hilary indicated too, canon 17 on Matthew, saying: 'Is there any doubt that the sons of kings are not liable to tribute, and that those who have the truth of the kingdom are free from servitude?' for by the truth of the kingdom he indicated true and natural royal origin. And later Chrysostom, using the argument almost, says: 'In order to show that he was not subject to the law, and in order to testify to the glory of the paternal dignity in himself, he posed the example of an earthly kingdom, that the sons of kings are not bound by census or tribute.' Christ's argument, therefore, is taken from natural sons. But Augustine either took it in a mystical sense for the sons of God by grace, and passed from that to their immunity from servitude to sin and paying tribute to the devil, as St. Thomas noted about Origen in the same place from Matthew. Or Augustine also certainly spoke of natural sons; for although the Son of God is the only natural son, he could have spoken in the plural so as to keep to the words of Christ, for it would be just the same even if there were several such sons of God, as Jansen noted, ch.69 Concordiae, and Salmeron, vol.6 De Miraculis Christi, tract.37.

5. But to the first doubt all the mentioned fathers, and the rest of the expositors, respond in the second place that Christ's argument is taken a fortiori from natural sons of temporal kings for the natural son of that king under whom are all earthly kingdoms, as Augustine said above. Hence we will respond to the objection made to the contrary, that it is indeed true that the son of an earthly king is only immune from tribute in his father's kingdom, not however with respect to another king, if he be subject to him for any reason, or is living under his sway. Nay in his father's kingdom too the son is not exempt from his father's jurisdiction but is, by his will, exempt from all his ministers and from the exaction of tribute and from all other jurisdiction which is exercised by his father's ministers. But we deny the consequence, or the likeness of the reasoning to Christ the son of the heavenly King. For each earthly king is limited and does not have other supreme kings subject to him; but God is King of all kings, and therefore his natural son is also above them all, and hence he is free and immune from every tribute and exempt from their jurisdiction, since they are only certain ministers of the supreme King, his father.

6. But to the reply that this proceeds of Christ as he is God and not as he is man, we will respond by denying the assumption; for Christ, even as man, is natural Son of God on account of the grace of union, by which his natural sonship itself is substantially conjoined to his humanity, and so too created grace is made to be connatural to that man. And hence also by the same reason Christ was endowed not only with being free as man from all power and tribute of the earthly king but also with being by a certain singular excellence King of kings and Lord of lords, as is said of him in Revelation ch.17. For the property and dominion of this kingdom, which he now has in heaven, he always had on earth by reason of union, although he did not receive the use of it in his mortal life. In this way are they to be understood who deny that Christ as man was King; or perhaps they are speaking of a proper temporal and perishable kingdom, which it is true that Christ did not receive nor did he have it by right of inheritance. But he had over all earthly kingdoms a kingdom and dominion of a higher nature and a power of excellence, and for that reason also he had an innate liberty from all tribute due a mortal king or emperor; and this immunity he has by reason of his natural sonship, and therefore he argued in the best way about himself, even as man.

7. The greater difficulty is in the second doubt, which demands why Christ joined Peter with himself in this liberty and made him as it were his equal, when he said to him: 'lest they be offended...give unto them for me and thee.' Some deny that this can be collected from the quoted words or that there is some mystery hid in those words, but they say that Christ spoke in the plural to Peter, [lit.: 'lest we give them scandal'], not because Peter was bound only by reason of avoiding scandal to pay tribute, but because he could easily have spoken of his own person in this way, using the plural for the singular, or because the scandal of Christ would redound on Peter and the other Apostles. And in this way they say Christ commanded Peter to pay the tribute, even for himself, with the coin found in the fish's mouth, because, since Peter was a debtor to the tribute, Christ wanted at the same time to come to his aid, and perhaps to his aid alone, because the other Apostles were not then present. This opinion heretics gladly seize upon; but to me it is not probable. For, in the first place, when these expositors say that the other Apostles were not present at that time, they speak without any foundation but make guesses. Next, the manner itself in which the exactors of tribute questioned Peter in the plural: 'Does your (pl.) master pay the tribute?' sufficiently indicates that not only Peter but the other Apostles too were then with Christ, hence the fathers commonly assume the fact, as I will immediately report.

8. I add further that it is not probable that Christ intended no mystery in that fact or did not show some particular regard toward Peter. For when Christ there taught that he was natural Son of God and for that reason was not liable to the payment of tribute but only commanded that it be paid on account of avoiding scandal, and when he specially joined Peter to himself in this prerogative and way of paying the tribute, he wished without doubt to signify that he would communicate to Peter some participation in his own privilege, by reason of which he too would not be a debtor to the tribute except on account of avoiding scandal. Also Chrysostom at that point adds that Christ joined Peter with himself in paying the tribute in reward for the faith by which he complied at once to a thing by nature so incredible; and he calls that reward the excellence of honor, which Christ showed to Peter, saying, 'Give unto them for me and thee.' Hence also the other Apostles understood that Christ had in that fact preferred Peter to themselves. For thus arose the occasion of their asking Christ: 'Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' as Matthew immediately reports at the beginning of ch. 18, and as Jerome there expounds, saying: 'After finding the coin, and the payment of tribute, what does the sudden question of the Apostles mean?' and he responds: 'Because they had seen that the same tribute had been paid for Peter and the Lord, they thought that, from the equality of the price, Peter, who had been put on a par with Christ in the paying of tribute, was preferred to all the Apostles.' In which fact, if they had rightly understood it, they were not deceived, but they erred think that that excellence of dignity was to exist in some temporal kingdom in a human way, and they asked out of envy. For that reason too Jerome adds: 'Jesus seeing their thoughts and understanding the causes of their error, wishes to cure their desire for glory with a striving for humility, saying: 'Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven' [Matt. 18.3].

The same doctrine is in Chrysostom too, homil. 59 on Matthew, saying that the disciples had suffered something human in their questioning, and to signify the fact the Evangelist added 'At the same time' [18.1], when, that is, he preferred Peter to all the rest. And he says later that the disciples were inflamed for many reasons, and he numbers the singular promise: 'I will give you the keys...' and 'Blessed art thou, Simon bar Jona,' and to these he added the present words: 'Give unto them for me and thee,' thinking that a singular excellence and prerogative was signified through them. Origen conveys the same, tract.5 on John, judging that remark 'At the same time' in the same way, and saying, 'I think, since they were judging this to be a very great honor conferred on Peter by Christ, as if he had indicated by it that Peter was better than the rest of the disciples, they desired to learn cautiously what they suspected, etc.' The same too is found in the name of Augustine, in the book of Quaestionum novi et veteris testamenti, q.75, where he says that Christ had commanded payment for Peter individually because he had decided to make him head of the other Apostles and Pastor of his flock, and he compares those words with these, 'I will ask for you.' Lyranus, Matt. 17 and 18, notes the fact too, and almost all Catholic doctors confess that a special prerogative of Peter is there signified, although all do not agree in the explanation of it.

9. Some therefore judge that Christ had there shown a particular love and care for Peter but not an exemption. But this is of little moment in a thing so marvelous, and observed with so much diligence by the evangelist, and emphasized by the fathers. Others, recognizing some deeper mystery, turning to mystical senses, as Augustine seems, in sermon 6 on the words of the Apostle, saying that, 'Peter represented the Church, for which Christ paid an undue death so as to free it from the debt of sin,' which Anselm and St. Thomas follow. But this is to be so received that the literal sense is not passed over. Therefore it cannot be denied that Christ specially commanded that tribute be paid for the person of Peter, just as also for himself, for this is peculiarly signified by the words: 'Give unto them for me and thee,' and the fact is noted by the fathers above cited, by making these words equivalent with those, 'I will give you the keys,' and 'I will ask for you'; for in all those passages the pronoun indicates the individual person of Peter. Therefore Christ signified in those words that Peter would be exempt from payment of tribute as he himself was. In this way too we believe that from this place can be collected at least that Christ conceded to Peter this privilege of exemption, because he was to be the Prince of the Church, and Vicar of Christ. Hence the consequence is made that this privilege was not personal but real in Peter, by reason of his dignity, and that it passes to his successors by force of divine right and of the particular institution or will of Christ. This opinion is sufficiently indicated by Jerome, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Eutymius, and others, insofar as they say that that privilege was conceded to Peter because he was the head of the Apostles, and insofar as they equate this place with others in which Christ, when speaking to Peter, is speaking with him and his successors.

10. But to the difficulty posed, how Christ extends that inference to Peter who was not natural Son of God, many respond that Christ tacitly assumed another principle, namely that under sons of kings are comprehended their domestics and intimates, for these too are wont to be exempt from tribute by reason of the sons to whom they adhere. But we will speak later about this reason; for if it is true, that privilege, as it is divine, is extended not only to the Pontiff but also to others. I say, therefore, that Christ signified that not only was he himself immune from payment of tribute, but also that he could communicate that privilege to Peter, as being most closely joined to him and very similar in the power which he was going to concede to him over the whole Church and over all the kings of the earth. Therefore when, after making that inference 'then are the children free', Christ added, 'Lest they be offended...give unto them for me and thee', it is not necessary that these later words be understood to be joined by force of the former inference, but by way of new declaration and extension from the special will of Christ. Or certainly it could be said, because the argument of Christ was from the lesser to the greater, as I declared above, that for that reason Christ was not content with inferring that he was himself immune from tributes, but also that he had joined Peter with him, so as to show that he, as natural Son of God, was immune in a far higher way than are the sons of the kings of the earth, because he is not only immune from them but is also superior to them all and was able so to communicate to Peter his own power or participation in it that he made him participate in the same exemption as well.

11. But someone will finally insist: although we concede that exemption from tributes can be gathered from this place, to gather exemption also from all subjection and coercive power of princes does not follow. For the son of an earthly king, though he be free from paying tribute to his father, is not free from the directive power of his father, because he is bound to keep his laws; nor is he free from his coercive power, for a king can punish his son in accord with the equity of justice. I reply by conceding that the inference is not, as they say, formal, because it does not hold in all matter, as the argument made proves. Yet still in Christ himself, just as from his natural sonship is inferred immunity from tribute, so is inferred immunity from all subjection and jurisdiction of temporal princes; because sonship, which is the reason for one exemption, is necessarily also the reason for the other, because it is a reason for domination and excellence over all kings. In a similar way, therefore, or by accommodation of proportion, we understand that this privilege was communicated to Peter, and therefore from immunity from tributes we gather exemption from all temporal subjection and jurisdiction, because it has been communicated to him by reason of his dignity and power over very kings.

Chapter 6: Satisfaction is made to objections against the solution of the preceding chapters.

Summary: 1. First objection. Solution. 2. Second objection. 3. Solution. 4 The Supreme Pontiffs have always been exempt. 5. Exposition of the words of St. Paul. 6. And of St. John Chrysostom. 7. To the reason given in the same objection. 8. Third objection from the deeds of the emperors. Response. Why a vote to elect the Pontiff does not impart to the emperor any jurisdiction over him. 9. Deposing the Pontiff cannot be done by the civil power. 10. Fourth objection from Matt. ch.18. Solution. Instance. 11. Solution. The Church has no coercive power over the Pontiff. 12. How fraternal correction may be exercised toward the Pontiff. 13. Objection. 14. Solution. The Church has no coercive power over the Pontiff. The objection is turned back on the king of England. 15. Various ways of protecting Pontiffs foreseen by Christ. A Pontiff waging unjust war can be resisted.

1. Since the exemption of the Supreme Pontiff is conjoined to his dignity and power over temporal kings, therefore almost the same objections are opposed to this exemption as to his power; and because we dealt with almost all of them in the previous book, therefore, while touching on them briefly, we will add one or two that are held to be more proper to this place. The first objection is taken from the Old Law, in which the Supreme Pontiff was not exempt from the jurisdiction of the king; rather he could be punished by him, as the deed of Solomon shows, 3 Kings ch.2, where Solomon dismissed Abiathar from his authority for the crime of treason, punishing him with his royal authority. But we replied to this objection above, that the assumption is not sufficiently proved from the deed, both because Solomon perhaps did it not as king but as prophet, and also because one deed does not show the right, since many things are done by kings through violence. Hence since the subjection of the Pontiff to the king in the Old Law is not proved from other places of Scripture, the upshot is that either the antecedent is false or that it is at least uncertain. Next we joined thereto that, whatever was the case in the Old Law, no argument can thence be taken about the Pontiff of the Law of Grace, who is of a far higher order. So there occurs now only to be added that a similar objection was made four hundred years ago by the emperor of Constantinople in a letter to Innocent III, whence is taken the chapter ‘Solitae’ De Maior et obedient., who argued not about Solomon but about David, that king David surpassed the Pontiff Abiathar. To whom Innocent responded in the same ways, saying: ‘Although David possessed the crown of kingship, he ruled not so much with royal as with prophetic authority. But whichever of these was the case in the Old Testament, it is different now in the New, whereby Christ is made a priest according to the order of Melchisedech.’ And he concludes: ‘Chiefly so as regards him who is successor of Peter and Vicar of Jesus Christ.’ See Torquemada, bk.2, Summ. Eccles., ch.96, ad.4.

2. Secondly it can be objected that those things which were constituted by Christ of divine right had their effect at once from the beginning of the Church; but the Roman Pontiffs, not only from the beginning of the Church but also during the whole time when the Roman emperors were heathen, were not exempt from their jurisdiction; therefore they did not from Christ have exemption of this sort. The minor proposition is proved from Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, 13.1, saying: ‘Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers.’ In that place Paul is speaking principally of political principality and of obedience due to the king, as the expositors there note, and Augustine, letter 54 to Macedonius, and Basil, Constitutionibus Monasticis, ch.23. And Paul himself later openly shows the fact when he says, 13.4, ‘he beareth not the sword in vain’, and when he adds, 13.6, ‘for this cause pay ye tribute also’. Therefore, as the same fathers advert, he specially made that warning against certain persons who had at that time begun to preach that Christians were not held to obedience to temporal princes; but he himself teaches the opposite about all Christians, and, so as to except no one, he says, ‘Let every soul etc.’, and Chrysostom there expounds, homil. 23, saying: ‘Showing that those things are commanded to everyone, both priests and monks and not only seculars, he declares at once in the introduction itself, when he says “Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers,” even if you be an apostle or an evangelist or a prophet, or whoever in short you may be, for that subjection does not even subvert piety.’ In the same way too does Theodoret speak in that place, and Theophylact and Oecumenius. So, according to the opinion of the Apostle there expounded, even Peter was then subject to the higher powers. For since Chrysostom said that even apostles were subject, and since he expanded the opinion, saying: ‘Or whoever in short you may be’, he certainly seems to have included Peter too. With much greater reason, therefore, were the Pontiffs, the successors of Peter, subject to the emperors as long, at any rate, as they were not Christians. The fact can also be confirmed by reason, because a heathen prince is not subject to the Pontiff; therefore he could be superior to him; therefore in fact he was superior, because he had universal power over all, and did not have a subjection by reason of which he might be deprived of power over Peter or his successors.

3. The reply will be by conceding that this privilege, insofar as it was conceded by Christ the Lord to Peter and his successors, had its proximate effect as soon as Christ conferred on Peter the pontifical dignity, because that privilege was either conjoined intrinsically to that dignity and as it were flows from it, or was given by special will of Christ, which will was efficacious and could not be impeded by any temporal power. It also included exemption from subjection in respect of the infidel princes no less than of the faithful, both because in Matt. ch.17 Christ spoke absolutely and the occasion of his speaking was taken from the tribute which was paid to the heathen emperor, and because the reason is no greater about a faithful than about an infidel prince. Nay, if the Pontiff Sylvester, for example, had been subject to Constantine before Constantine's conversion, he would remain subject after the conversion, because, as I said above, no infidel king ipso facto loses any jurisdiction because of his conversion to the faith. Finally, when the Councils and the fathers teach that the Pontiff does not have a superior on earth, they exclude everyone, whether he be faithful or infidel.

4. I say, therefore, that Peter and his successors were in the whole time of the heathen emperors exempt from their jurisdiction as far as the privilege was concerned, although they did not at that time have the use of the privilege, which was not repugnant to divine right. Just as they also at that time had dignity and power over all emperors given to them by Christ, without his having waited for the consent of temporal princes, but Peter or his successors did not, as regard the same princes, have the use and exercise of that power, because it was dependent, in accordance with the ordination of the same Christ, on voluntary acceptance of the faith; therefore the reason is the same about the privilege that is accessory to the dignity, for Christ conceded it on his own without dependence on the consent of princes or of other men, but the use of it was dependent partly on the will and partly on the power and deeds of men.

5. Nor do the words of St. Paul, however general they may seem, exclude a special privilege conceded by Christ, for the rule of right is that a general right is limited by a special one, even if the special one be more ancient; which rule can here satisfactorily be accommodated. Especially so because St. Paul is there only explaining an ancient and natural right, and he teaches that it is to be observed by Christians, and so he hands down (as Theophylact there says), that the Gospel does not teach defection or disobedience toward princes but control and obedience. Now this natural right is not violated but its matter is partly altered by the privilege of exemption conceded by Christ, which Paul did not there exclude, nor did he make mention of it, because it was not necessary. Although if the words of Paul are carefully considered, it can be understood from the form of them that he did not comprehend the Vicar of Christ under them, for he says: 'Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers.' These words are circumspect, and they comprehend both private men with respect to those who are immediately set over them, and the magistrates of lower orders with respect to superior powers. But, in truth, by comparison with the Vicar of Christ there is no higher power on earth, and therefore the opinion of Paul does not there have place.

6. As to Chrysostom, however, we will, with respect to what concerns the present question, reply in a similar way, that he spoke generally and did not there exclude the special privilege of Peter, nor did he handle the question whether the Vicar of Christ has on earth a higher power whom, by force of natural and divine right, he may be held to obey. But as for what concerns the other special examples, which he induces about apostles, priests, and monks, it must be dealt with directly below, whether they have exemption by divine or human right. Now we only say that whatever be the case even with the other apostles, there is a special reason about Peter as Vicar of Christ, both because of his special dignity, and because of the words of Christ exempting him specially from the debt of paying the tribute. Wherefore this right of exemption was equal in the Pontiffs with respect to heathen and Christian princes, because the privilege, as I said, did not depend on the subjects' faith, although without it the use could not exist.

7. Nor is the reason made to the contrary a barrier, because although an infidel prince, as to that status, is not directly subjected to Peter, nevertheless he is held by divine right to be subjected to him by receiving faith and baptism, through which every one is made part of the flock of Christ and consequently subject to Peter. In addition, even before baptism this sort of prince is indirectly subject to Peter who has the right to coerce infidel princes lest they impede the preaching of the gospel in their lands and lest they compel their subjects to deny or not receive the faith, or in some way be hostile to the Christian religion. By this reason, therefore, Pontiffs were made by Christ simply immune from the power of temporal princes, whether faithful or infidel; for infidelity does not make them to have a better condition nor does it increase their jurisdiction; as regard use, however, the Pontiffs could not, in the times of infidel princes, escape their judgments, just as also they could not vindicate themselves or their dignity from all injury; which ought not to be wondered at since even under faithful princes they have sometimes suffered similar things, God permitting it either to prove them or for greater confirmation of the faith.

8. From this is easily solved the third objection, which is often inculcated by the king of England and by other schismatics and supporters of schismatics; it is also taken from the deeds of certain emperors who often exercised a superior power over the Supreme Pontiffs, either by electing them, or placing them in their sees, and confirming them or punishing them or dismissing them from authority. They especially bring in for this purpose the deed of Otho I, who they say was a very pious emperor, who deposed John 12, or elsewhere John 13, from his see because of his perverse morals. But about this argument I said a great deal in the last chapter of the previous book, to which place we send the reader, for here we have only mentioned it lest we leave untouched a frequent objection on this point. Yet we can add that the first part of the objection does not in any way belong to the present cause. For what if we were to grant that emperors or kings could be electors of the Pontiff, surely they could not on that account be their legislators or judges? Or their superiors because of some jurisdiction over them? Surely Cardinals are electors of the Pontiffs and yet, after they have elected the Pontiff, they have no power or jurisdiction over him, nay rather they are completely subject to him. But the reason is that, when they cast votes, they nominate or elect someone equal to themselves; but he who is duly elected is at once invested by Christ himself and made superior to his electors, to whom he was before equal or perhaps inferior. Add the fact that the electors themselves have the power of election from the Apostolic See as if from a superior, and from the Vicar of Christ, whose concern it is to prescribe the manner of electing a successor to himself. The same must therefore proportionally be said of the emperor, even if he was allowed to elect the Pontiff or to confirm his election by his consent; because he is not by that fact made superior to the Pontiff but remains always inferior to a Pontiff already established, just as he was also subject to him from whom he received such a prerogative.

9. About the second part of the objection, however, I showed in the place cited that the histories in which that fact and others like it are reported are both uncertain and varying, or discrepant among themselves, and are not reported with sufficient fidelity. For from then it can not only not be gathered that an emperor had rightly deposed any Pontiff, but also not even that he had in fact attempted it by force of his proper jurisdiction or judgment or sentence, but either by the open force or tyranny by which other Christian princes threw violent hands on the Pontiff, or in sum by securing, through their industry and authority, that some synod be convened which would pass sentence of deposition against the Pontiff, whatever may be the case about the power of such a synod or whether it proceeded from error or malice; for that so in fact it happened with John XII I showed in the place cited. And to be sure, although the punishment of deposition is canonical, it has in it a peculiar deformity and repugnance, because it may be imposed by the secular power. Nor could anyone fall into that error except he who thought there was nothing supernatural or spiritual to the pontifical dignity but that it was only political or civil. Therefore if any emperor or faithful by rash daring and indiscrete zeal undertook to judge the Pontiff, he was, as I said, careful to depose him not by himself but by some gathering which seemed to have an appearance at least of spiritual power. But because that deposition is, in its kind, the highest spiritual punishment and reaches divine right, from which the pontifical dignity immediately and per se is, therefore it requires on the part of the Pontiff the greatest cause, such as only heresy is, which in some way takes away the foundation of such dignity; but on the part of the Church it requires the sentence, not of any synod whatever, but of a legitimate and universal one, and nevertheless there is need on the part of God that he himself take away the dignity which he himself of himself conferred.

10. A fourth objection is taken by heretics from the words of Christ, Matt. 18.15-17: 'If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault...' and lastly, '...tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican.' For they deem this sentence and law of Christ to proceed no less of the Pontiff than of the other faithful, because even the Pope is a man and can offend in their presence and with their scandal and injury; therefore he can and should be rebuked, either in secret or in the presence of witnesses; and if he refused to emend he could be denounced to the Church, which if he neglected to hear he could be excommunicated by it, and be held by others as a heathen man and a publican; therefore the Pontiff is subject to the coercive power of the Church. You will say, to follow hence to the sum of it, that the Pontiff is not altogether exempt from the spiritual power, but not that he is not exempt from the temporal power. But on the contrary, for from the first the second can be inferred, at least as far as it is by force of divine right; because, if the Pope is not exempt by divine right from the ecclesiastical forum, he does not have that supreme dignity in which we principally found the divine right of his exemption from the secular power. Again, because if the Pontiff can be excommunicated by the Church, he could, by the same reason, be more gravely punished according to the quality of the offence; therefore he could even be degraded and remitted to the secular arm; therefore he is not altogether exempt by divine right from secular jurisdiction, otherwise he could not again be subjected by the Church to the secular power.

11. I reply in the first place that these latter arguments are not effective, because, one, although it is imagined that the Pontiff is subject to some ecclesiastical tribunal, e.g. a General Council, nevertheless he could be exempt by divine right from seculars, either by a special privilege of Christ or because he always remains above secular princes, even if, per impossibile, he be subject, in the order of spiritual powers, to a Council. Two, because the same arguments can be made about bishops and inferior clerics, of whom we will speak afterwards. Again, I add that, even if those arguments be allowed, they rather show things inconvenient and absurd, which follow from the first antecedent, than they confirm it. We deny, therefore, that the Church can exercise coercive power over the Pontiff, whether by censure or in any other way, unless he first fall from the pontificate, either by voluntary renunciation accepted by the Church or by the guilt of heresy juridically declared by the Church. For as long as that person exists as true Pope, he has jurisdiction over the whole Church, even when taken together; and therefore of necessity he is by divine right spiritually exempt, that is, not subject to a higher spiritual power outside Christ, because there is none such found in the world, as was sufficiently treated of in the previous book.

12. Hence I respond to the objection that fraternal correction can have place toward the supreme Pontiff insofar as it is an office of charity and rests within it; for in this way sometimes a greater can be admonished by a lesser, as a Prelate by a subject, just as Paul conducted himself with Peter, as Augustine explained, epist. 19 to Jerome, and Gregory, hom. 18 on Ezechiel. But the progress of correction ceases when it passes over to force of coercion. Therefore the Pontiff can be rebuked or admonished with reverence, first alone if the crime be secret, then in the presence of others if the thing and necessity demand. But as to what is further said, 'Tell it unto the Church,' does not have place in him, because there by the name of 'Church' is understood not the body of the Church but the prelates of it, for not even can a sinner be denounced to the whole body of the Church, but to his pastor. Hence it is necessary that it be understood relatively or with due proportion, in the way that any sinner may be denounced to his pastor and prelate; for an outsider cannot effectively rebuke or compel someone not subject to him. Because therefore the Pontiff does not have a superior prelate, in him that denunciation has no place, but rather because he himself is supreme Pastor of the whole Church, his sin is sufficiently said to the Church when it is said to himself. But, with respect to the Pontiff, not badly could his confessor be understood by the name of 'Church', who can warn him and in his own manner rebuke and in a special way bind him in his own forum. But as for what follows, 'but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican,' it cannot properly have place in the Pontiff, because he cannot be excommunicated, since he does not have a coercive superior. Nor is this an inconvenience, because that precept is an affirmative one, and is binding with respect to each one according to his capacity.

13. But a fifth objection at once arises against this, for it follows that Christ has not sufficiently provided for his Church, nor conveniently established its regime. For as we say, he gave supreme power in the Church to one man, and set him 'over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant,' Jeremiah 1.10. Now such the Pope can be, so that he may use his power in destruction, for he is left to his own liberty, and he can be a sinner; therefore if there is in the Church no power to coerce him the Church is imperfectly established and has been insufficiently provided for. For what sort of body is it which could not by any violence purge a rotten member, or, if this be not enough, cut it off, lest it corrupt the whole body? Therefore since the Church is one mystical body and the Pope is one member of it, which can so much the more damage it the more powerful and principal it is, there is necessity, for the preservation of the Church, that there be in it some power which by right and deed can resist an unjust Pontiff, and compel him, or even cut him off, if it be necessary; but this power is no other than the royal and imperial power; therefore etc.

14. I reply that they have used this argument who reckoned that a General Council was above the Pontiff, and that it could depose him, not only in case of heresy, but also on account of other crimes extremely damaging to the Church. And indeed if the argument had so much efficacy that because of it some other power would have to be admitted in the Church that was coercive of Pontiffs who were abusing their power to the ruin of the Church, that power should rather be posited as a spiritual than a temporal one, placed rather in a General Council than in any particular person. And in this way the objection would not progress, for the last proposition assumed is denied, namely that a power of this sort could only be royal or imperial. Nevertheless, the true response is that there is in the Church no such power over the Pontiff, neither spiritual nor temporal power, as has been sufficiently proved above. But the objection can be turned back against the king of England with much greater reason; for he himself wishes so to be head in his rule that he have a superior neither in spiritual nor in temporal matters, and he is compelled to affirm the same of any supreme king, lest he should seem to be usurping so great a dignity for his own lust alone. Surely, therefore, it is much more inconvenient that in the Church of Christ, which ought to be one body, there be many heads supreme in such a way that any one of them may judge its subjects and itself be judged by no one, than that there be one such head having this singular privilege especially established under the direction of the Holy Spirit?

I say, therefore, that in this is rather shown the singular providence of Christ for his Church. For earthly kingdoms are divided among themselves and not subordinate, because in temporal and civil things they do not have unity; and although in each kingdom inconveniences can follow from the fact that the supreme king can be judged or punished by no one in temporal matters, those inconveniences are either tolerated because of conveniences that are greater (which is something that in human providence must often happen, and it pertains to rightness of prudence), or each republic has its own laws and just means whereby to meet these inconveniences. But in truth, with respect to the Church of Christ, it was not convenient that there be many heads simply supreme within it, nor several kings so supreme in temporal matters that they be subordinate to no superior head, at least in order to a spiritual end, and for that reason the best establishment demanded one supreme head. Also for greater unity and an easier and sweeter regime it was necessary that it be a single person, and for removing schisms it was also convenient that under no reason it be subject to its subjects. Hence finally it was necessary that that one head could by God alone be punished or deposed by coercion and superior power.

But if it happen that herefrom certain defects or inconveniences follow, the thing is not to be wondered at, because although this institution be divine, it deals with men and is exercised by them, and therefore necessarily it participates in some respect in human providence, which does not always escape every inconvenience but chooses the lesser. Hence that imperfection cannot be attributed to Christ, but to man; for Christ, as far as is in him, provides sufficient means for avoiding these inconveniences. The greater ones, indeed, which could stain the faith or the sanctity of the Church, he has altogether prevented and taken away, by giving to his Vicar a certain and infallible direction in defining things pertaining to faith and morals. Again, because heresy creeps as a cancer and takes away the foundation of the Church, he also established a right, by virtue of which a Pope may fall from his dignity if he be a heretic, giving also power to the Church so as to take cognizance of such a crime, and so as to be able to pronounce sentence declaring the fact and the divine deposition that follows therefrom. However, in the other things, which pertain to morals, it did not pertain to the sweet and wise providence of Christ either to deprive all Pontiffs of moral freedom or to confirm them in grace, and for that reason he has allowed sins in them too. Yet he did not wish that they could be coerced or punished by men, lest the due order of providence and government be inverted and greater evils and disturbances follow.

15. Nevertheless he did also provide various remedies whereby this evil might either be prevented or relieved insofar as it could be. First and principal is the internal help of the Holy Spirit, which we believe to be in a far greater and special way readied for the Pontiff, accompanied at the same time with a singular and more excellent angelic guardian. The second is the prayer both of the universal Church and of the individual faithful, which for the head himself ought always to be greater and more frequent, and it ought then to be more fervent when the head happens to fail. The third and best means is secret admonition or, if the sins have been scandalous, even public, saving due reverence and humility; and if necessity demand it, sometimes this admonition can be made by temporal kings and princes, whose authority can and should weigh much with Pontiffs if it have joined with it the aforesaid modesty and submission of spirit. See Cajetan in opusc. De Postestate Papae, ch.27.

A fourth remedy, not indeed unjust but more human and dangerous, and therefore not to be used without extreme necessity, is just defense; for if the Pontiff brings to bear manifest violence and unjust force, he can be resisted by way of defense within the limits of a guiltless protection; because to repel force with force is a natural remedy and denied to no one, and it does not require a superior power or jurisdiction in him who defends himself but only right and strength for self protection. For if he bring evil to bear on another, he does not punish him, but in that way justly escapes his own evil. Wherefore if the Pontiff bring corporal force to bear by aggression or unjust war, he can be resisted by the like action, for purposes of defense and not offense. But if the violence is spiritual, by commanding injustice or profaning or destroying sacred things, he can be resisted in a proportionate way, by ensuring that such things are not put into execution. These things, however, are rare and, if this license is to be taken, they must be very evident. Lastly (which is a thing very much to be noted) the Church has been governed in this way for 1,600 years, acknowledging in the Pontiff this power and exemption, and deferring to him this honor and reverence, and tolerating the unjust ones, who were few in comparison with the holy and good ones; and the Church has not suffered in this toleration as many inconveniences as it has sustained in the times of schism and rebellion of temporal powers against the Pontiffs: therefore gratuitously and without foundation do the heretics invent imperfection and defect in this institution, which rather experience itself, besides the other things which we have adduced, show to be worthy of God.

Chapter 7: Satisfaction is made to the sixth objection, and the question is treated whether the Pope can submit himself to human judgment.

Summary: 1. Sixth objection against ecclesiastical immunity. 2. First conclusion: the Pontiff cannot subject himself to human jurisdiction. Proof. Solution to the sixth objection. The Pontiff cannot renounce his exemption. 3. Second conclusion: the Pontiff cannot submit himself to a spiritual power as concerns coercive force. The assertion is proved. 4. The Pontiff does not have coercive power over himself. 5. In case of heresy the deposition of the Pontiff is done by God alone. 6. Last conclusion: the Pontiff can submit himself to another as to an arbiter. 7. Objection. Solution. 8. The Pontiff cannot be compelled to a penalty imposed by an arbiter. 9. Solution to the objection posed in the beginning. 10. Why the Pontiff subjects himself to the judgment of a Confessor and not of another. It is more probable that the Pontiff attributes jurisdiction to his Confessor. 11. Whether Christ subjected himself to Pilate.

1. The final objection remains, that the Roman Pontiff can at least by his own will renounce this privilege, not only by renouncing the Papacy (which is clear), but also when the dignity is retained, therefore it is a sign that this exemption is not of divine right; nor is the exemption conjoined necessarily by the nature of the thing to the dignity, for if such it were it could neither be changed nor removed by human will. The antecedent is proved from the use, for Leo IV did it by subjecting himself to the judgment of the emperor Michael and his legates, as is reported in ch. 'Nos si incompetenter' 2, q.7, and Symmachus submitted himself to the judgment of a temporal king, as is taken from the 3rd Roman Council under the same; and Pope Gregory, in ch. 'Si quis' 42, 2, q.7, speaks thus, as Gratian reports: 'If anyone wishes to argue with us on these things, or contends that we are acting outside authority, let him come to the Apostolic See, ... so that he may justly contend with me before the confession of St. Peter, as far as there one of us may receive his sentence,' where he commits himself to another's judgment. And Sixtus III, in ch. 'Mandasti' 2, quaest. 5, says, when he was unjustly accused, that he had purged himself in the presence of Valentinianus Augustus and the synod, and he adds: 'But not by making form and giving example to others who did not wish or did not willingly choose this.' The same is reported of Leo III in ch. 'Auditum', in the same case and question. See the Gregorian decree, and Paulus Aemilius, bk. 3, De Gestis Francorum. About Marcellinus too it is clear that he submitted to the judgment of a certain synod. Finally, in the sacrament of confession the Pontiff submits himself to the jurisdiction of a private confessor; why therefore could he not also submit himself in a civil or temporal cause? Some even bring in the example of Christ, who placed himself under the power of Pilate, giving him true power over himself, as his words in John 19.11 show: 'Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.' St. Thomas uses this example, 2.2, q.67, a.1, ad 2, to prove that a superior can be subjected to the judgment of an inferior, where he even simply says that Pope Leo subjected himself to the judgment of the emperor.

2. This point is treated at large by theologians on [The Sentences] 4. dd. 18 and 19, namely by Thomas, Paludanus, Bonaventure, Richard, Albert, and others, and by Cajetan, dicta q.67, art. 1, and by the Canonists in ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae', De Constitut., where it is treated at large by Panormus, n.7, and Felinus, 2, and Baldus, in 1. 'Est receptum', Code De Iurisdic. omn. iud. In brief, however, as it concerns the present matter, it must be said in the first place that the Pope cannot so submit himself to the emperor that he remain truly subject to his temporal or civil jurisdiction and able to be compelled by him or obliged by reason of such jurisdiction. The authors mentioned agree in this; and there is a proof that the emperor does not have civil jurisdiction over the Pontiff, for Christ took it away from him by exempting the Pontiff. Also, neither can the Pontiff give it to him, because the Pontiff, insofar as he is Pontiff (for that is how we are now speaking of him) does not have direct temporal jurisdiction even over others, much less over himself; therefore he cannot give it to the emperor over himself, because he does not give in this class what he does not have; therefore he cannot submit himself to the jurisdiction of a secular emperor. The proof of the consequence is that he could not submit himself except by giving him such jurisdiction, because the emperor himself does not already have it; therefore although the Pontiff wish to be judged by him, if he give him not jurisdiction, he is not submitted to his jurisdiction; nor could the emperor judge the Pontiff as if having jurisdiction over him. But I am speaking of temporal jurisdiction, because only subjection with respect to temporal jurisdiction is contrary to the exemption about which we are now treating. The fact can be confirmed too from the other principle, that no one can renounce a privilege conceded in favor of the community and the dignity; but such is the exemption of the Pope, for it is not given in regard of his person but for the honor of Christ himself, about which argument more below. The objection made proves this also, and it is thereby solved; for we deny that the Pontiff can renounce his exemption by subjecting himself to another, especially to a layman; for the Pontiff could not be subject to such jurisdiction, as I said, because he cannot give it to one who does not have it. Nor can he make to be extended to him the jurisdiction of temporal kings over which Christ has constituted him his Vicar. Thus therefore is the objection sufficiently satisfied.

3. But because the things adduced in the objection prove that the Pontiff can in some way voluntarily submit himself to another's judgment, there is need to declare how it is to be understood. I say further, then, that the Pontiff cannot submit himself in the external forum to ecclesiastical or spiritual jurisdiction committed to another as regard coercive force over him, whether directly in spiritual causes or indirectly in temporal ones, both all and singly, either in one cause or a second. So do many of the authors cited think, and Bellarmine best, bk.2, De Conciliis, ch.8, and Torquemada, bk.2, Summ., chs.104 & 105, Cajetan too thinks the same, tract.2, De Potest. Papae. The proof is clear, because there cannot exist in anyone outside the Pontiff an ecclesiastical distinction which does not depend or flow from the Pontiff himself; therefore never can the Pontiff be subject to him as to coercive force. We assume the antecedent, for although it be not certain that all Episcopal jurisdiction flows from the Pontiff, it is however more probable. Besides it is certain that all jurisdiction of this sort depends on the Pontiff and can be amplified or restrained by him as to causes, persons, and places; which is now enough for us. Nay, though we were to imagine that some ecclesiastical jurisdiction not dependent on the Pontiff has been given to someone by divine right, that is, which could not be taken away or limited by him, yet that would not suffice for judging the Pontiff, because, as we assume, he is by divine right exempt from every human superior; that jurisdiction, therefore, though it be by divine right, would not have been given over the Pontiff, nor over the whole Church, because this has been committed only to Peter, but at the most it would be in this or that episcopacy, and in some lower grade. Therefore it cannot be thought that the Pontiff is judged by anyone through spiritual power unless it be through a power flowing from himself.

4. Hence therefore the conclusion is evident that this jurisdiction cannot be proper and coercive. The first proof is that the Pontiff has not received such power over himself; for no one has coercive power against himself, because although he could punish himself, he does it willingly, and so is not compelled; therefore neither could he communicate such power to another. Second, because the causes of the Pontiff are reserved to divine judgment, as the canons say which most speak in order to the external and coercive forum; therefore the Pontiff could not commit those causes to another as to the same genus of coercive judgment, because an inferior cannot give jurisdiction in cases or causes reserved to a superior. Third, because the Pope cannot so commit some cause to an inferior that he not remain himself always superior in that cause, and consequently he could either recall the jurisdiction, if he wished, or judge of the sentence given by the inferior, because the whole of it is intrinsic to the pontifical dignity; and for that reason it so exists in the Pontiff by force of divine right that he could never remove it from himself, except by renouncing his whole pontificate. Therefore although the Pontiff may feign that he is giving jurisdiction over himself to another, that jurisdiction could not really be coercive, because it depends on the will of the Pontiff both in duration and in execution; but what is thus voluntary cannot be coerced. This reason proceeds equally in all cases and in single ones; for in none can the Pontiff remove from himself the supreme jurisdiction which he has.

5. The confirmation is that the Pontiff can in no case, even if he wished to subject himself to another, be compelled through censure, as is the common consensus of theologians on [The Sentences] 4, dd. 18 & 19, and as we said at large in the tractate De Censuris. But there is no other reason save that he always remains superior to him to whom he has committed jurisdiction, and therefore he cannot be insubordinate in respect of man, nor be bound by censure, nor afflicted with any violent punishment, nor deposed. For though in a case of heresy he could be deposed, he is not in truth then deposed by man but by God himself, after the declaration of a legitimate Council has preceded, as I said; and in this way no voluntary subjection of the person of the Pontiff, nor even involuntary coercion, there intercedes as long as he is Pontiff, but only knowledge and examination of the cause, which he himself in that case cannot justly impede, because it has been conceded by God as a just and necessary defense.

6. Therefore I conclude lastly, as regards what concerns external human judgment, that the Pontiff can only submit himself to the judgment of another as to an arbiter, not as to a proper judge who uses jurisdiction over the person itself of the Pontiff. Thus St. Thomas explained his opinion in the solution cited, ad 2, and the others mentioned follow him. The thing also follows from a sufficient enumeration of parts; for the Pontiff can in some way submit himself to the judgment of others, even in personal causes, about which we are principally treating, as the things prove that we adduced in the objection, but he cannot be subjected to the proper jurisdiction of another, as we showed; therefore at least he can submit himself to the judgment of another as an arbiter, because there is no other way for a voluntary subjection. But I say voluntary because although the Pontiff could be judged by someone by force or tyranny or usurped jurisdiction, and the Pontiff himself could even permit it, as Paul perhaps did, when he appealed to Caesar, nevertheless that submission is simply involuntary, and the judgment about him is violent and unjust; but in the voluntary subjection of which we are treating judgment can be made about him without any force or injury. But the reason has already been touched on, that now no juridical sentence is given that is founded on jurisdiction or superiority, but an arbiter's sentence founded on fact or some agreement. And so in that act the Pontiff does not conduct himself as Pontiff by giving commission of his jurisdiction, but as a man who voluntarily wishes to do what any private man can perform.

7. You will say that after the Pontiff has subjected himself to the judgment of another he is held in conscience, and sometimes in justice, to obey the sentence passed, if it is just; therefore it proceeds from superior power and coercive force, because every necessity is a sort of coercion. Cajetan agrees to this in the place cited, that there some superior power, at least in a certain respect, intercedes, and in the same way he says that coercive force is preserved there; and lastly he judges that the sentence is passed in virtue of jurisdiction committed by the Pontiff. But this last point is, as I said, not to be admitted, but in the rest there can be equivocation in the words, which we must beware of. And so I reply briefly that in an arbiter's sentence there is not required the power of a superior but the pure judgment of the arbiter, nor is coercive force necessary; and that is why St. Thomas said in the same place that in arbitration the use of punishment is a custom because the judge has no coercion. Which is so far true that he cannot even compel to the punishment itself. Hence although the Pope, when he submits himself to the judgment of another, can promise to stand under some punishment from the sentence, he cannot be compelled to the punishment, although in conscience he could sometimes be obligated to it.

8. As to the argument, therefore, I deny the consequence, because the necessity of obligation in conscience does not arise from coercive but from directive force, which can be admitted in such a sentence. However I draw attention to the fact that this is to be understood of ostensive rather than of effective virtue; because such a sentence with respect to the Pontiff does not have the force of a precept that could oblige the Pontiff in conscience, which we call directive force in the effective sense, but it has the force of a purely ostensive sentence pointing out the due of justice, which from an injury or an agreement or another similar title can fall on the Pontiff by force of natural law; and in this way the thing is clear. And for that reason I do not consider the distinction of Cajetan necessary when he says that the Pope can subject himself to the judgment of others in some causes and not in others; for it is more truly and more easily said that in all of them he can subject himself as regard directive force in the way explained, but in none of them as regard coercive force.

9. Therefore the response to the principal objection is that in the aforesaid mode of voluntary subjection no renunciation of the privilege of exemption intervenes, as is clear. But to the first example of Leo IV the response is that he did not exceed the aforesaid mode of sentence of an arbiter, as is clear from the text and from the histories. The same is to be said of Symmachus, in which fact however must be considered that when Theodoric wished to misuse the modesty of the Pontiff and to judge by way of superior, the Council cried out that the Pontiff could be judged by no one, at least in that way, even if he himself was consenting, just like the cry that was also made in the other Council about Marcellinus. In like manner too, the other facts of Sixtus and Leo III are clearer, because in them the Pontiffs did not submit to the judgment of others, but only perhaps for taking away scandal did they wish voluntarily to purge themselves, at least by showing their innocence either by public oath or by other proofs and reasons.

But as to the words of Gregory, which are reported by Gratian in the cited chapter 'Si quis', and they are the words of Gregory IV in epist. unic. to the Bishops of Europe which is reported at the end of the volume of decretal letters, they make nothing to the present cause; more exactly, however, their sense cannot be understood sufficiently unless both the end of the letter and the words preceding are considered. For the Pontiff wrote that letter in defense of Bishop Aldric who, having been accused perhaps by some people, had fled to the Apostolic See and had implored its help. And on this occasion the Pontiff there decrees that it is the privilege of the Apostolic See that all are permitted to appeal to it, and that 'nothing may be decreed about him who flees to the bosom of the Holy Roman Church and implores its aid before a commandment has been made by the authority of the same Church.' But after he has gravely established these very true principles, he subjoins: 'If anyone wishes to argue with us on these things, or contends that we are acting outside authority, let him come to the Apostolic See etc.' which we reported above. Hence it is clear that he is not treating of any personal cause or judgment of his person, but of the dogmas of the faith and of the authority of the Apostolic See, to whose judgment, not to another human judgment, he makes summons, as is plain, when he says: 'Let him come to the Apostolic See, whither all ecclesiastical matters that there is question about are commanded to flow.' But to demonstrate his confidence in the virtue of the doctrine, the same Pontiff adds: 'so that he may justly contend with me before the confession of St. Peter,' certainly not in decision of law but in inquiry of truth, and not by witnesses confirming some fact but by the authority of Pontiffs, Councils, and custom. He concludes: 'as far as there one of us may receive his sentence,' that is, that he may conquer who has better proved his sentence. He does not, however, so speak in doubt but, as I said, certain of his truth.

10. To the example about the forum of confession, we reply that the reason is in many respects dissimilar. First, because the Pontiff is not by any right exempt from the judgment of sacramental confession, since he is a man and a sinner and is obligated by the same precept of penance or confession. Second, because that judgment is higher and more divine than any external judgment; hence in it the principal judge is God alone and the confessor is only the instrument of God and immediately represents him. Third, some say that the confessor has jurisdiction in that forum immediately from God, but that the Pontiff only supplies the matter or chooses the confessor, which is probable, especially in that special case. But it is more probable to me that the Pope gives the confessor jurisdiction over himself as over a sinner but that the jurisdiction is dissimilar in this respect that it is not at all coercive but medicinal, the sign of which is that the confessor cannot at all compel the penitent to satisfactory penance, but the penitent must voluntarily accept it. Again, there is another dissimilarity, that the judgment of that forum, though insofar as it is immediately given by man and depends on him for its continuance because it can be revoked by him, yet in itself it is higher and more divine, because he judges even of things the most secret and that lie hid in the heart, and he pronounces final judgment about them all, from which judgment there can be no appeal either to the Pontiff or to any man.

11. To the example about Christ the Lord, some consider that Christ truly subjected himself to the jurisdiction of Pilate, giving him true power over himself as man; to this opinion inclines Toletus, on John 19, adnotat. 4, and he refers to Irenaeus, bk.4, ch.34. But I draw attention to the fact that it is one thing to speak about the power of Pilate and another about power with respect to Christ, which can also be the respect either of right or of fact. The power itself, therefore, which Pilate in fact used against Christ was from God, and can thus be understood as not only permissive but also as positive, because Christ said: 'Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above,' as Augustine tract.116 there thinks, and Bernard epist.42. But that power as referred to Christ was not given over him as over a subject, because that power viewed in and of itself did not fall on him as on a subject, as Christ's words in Matt. 17 sufficiently prove, which also on that point we dealt with in the preceding chapter. So it happened only by the violence of the Jews and the ignorance of Pilate that that power was exercised over Christ, and in this regard the power's being from God is to be understood only in a permissive sense, as is rightly taught by Chrysostom, hom.83, and Cyril, bk.12, ch.22, and certainly not otherwise by Irenaeus. Wherefore the subjection of Christ the Lord was on his part only of tolerance and permission, and not of any concession of power or jurisdiction, nor of renunciation of any privilege, and for that reason the example is of no service to the proposition.

Chapter 8: Whether all clerics existing under the Pontiff are exempt by divine right from the jurisdiction of temporal princes, and two contrary opinions are treated of.

Summary: 1. First opinion to the negative. 2. First basis. 3. Second basis. 4. First confirmation. 5. Second confirmation. A certain evasion is refuted. 6. Third confirmation. Evasion. It is attacked. 7. Second opinion to the affirmative. 8. Triple basis of this opinion. 9. Bases bestowing immunity by natural right. 10. Reason for this part. 11. First confirmation. Second confirmation. 12. Bases bestowing exemption by divine positive right. 13. Objection. Response. Corroboration from the tradition of the Church.

1. On this point there are two contrary and very common opinions, which I will briefly report with their bases in this chapter, but in the second I will introduce my own opinion, of whatever sort it be. The first opinion, then, absolutely denies that this immunity is of divine right. Many doctors hold it, among whom some affirm that it is of human right, and they indicate implicitly that it is exclusive. Others declare either generally or specifically that it is not of natural right. Thus St. Thomas is referred to on behalf of this opinion, on Romans 13, lectio 1, where he says that priests are immune from paying tributes by a concession of princes in accord with natural equity; but there is the same or even greater reason for exemption from the forum or jurisdiction of princes, as was touched on above and will be said in what follows. Henry too, Quodlib. 9, q.31, says that the immunity of clerics is from the statutes of the Pope and the emperors; where, although he does not expressly state the negative part, namely that it is not of divine right, he sufficiently indicates it when he attributes the origin of this immunity to human statutes. It is more expressly held by Almain, on [Sentences] 4. d.25, q.1, where he refers to Ockham and the common opinion of those in Paris.

The opinion is more widely held by modern theologians, Medina, Code 'De Restitut.' q.15, where he mainly deals with exemption from tributes but extends his discussion to everything. The same is held by Vitoria, in Relect. 1. 'De Potestate ecclesiast.' q.6, conclus.2, by Soto, on [Sentences] 4, d.25, q.2, a.2, by Ledesma, 2. part. quart. q.20, a.4, versic. 'Haesitabit', conclus.2 & 3, by Palacios, on [Sentences] 4, d.25, disput.3, near the end, by Salon, 2.2, q.67, a.1, contr.1, ch.4, and by Bañez, ibid., dub.2. Albert Pighi, bk.5, Ecclesiasticae Hierarch., ch.7, uses this reason to establish a difference among heathen and infidel princes, because clerics were under the jurisdiction of secular princes as long as they were heathen, or because they now still are in kingdoms where the kings are gentiles, and they are not subject to Christian princes. But the reason for the difference is that heathen princes have not ceased from their right nor are subject to the ecclesiastical laws in the way Christian princes are. This doctrine openly supposes that this exemption is only of human right, and it is followed by Jansen, ch.69 'Concord.', and is declared by Maldonado, Matt. 17, while expounding Jerome, but more expressly by Salmeron, vol.6, in Evangel. tract.87, towards the end. The same opinion is also held by Molina, 1. De Iust., disp.31, Henry, bk.7 De Indulg., ch.24. Among the canonists Innocent thinks the same, ch.2, De Maiorit. et obedi. For although he speaks under a distinction, yet he places this part second and more inclines toward it. The same is held by Covarrubias, book Practicarum Questionum, ch.31, where he refers to others.

2. The basis for this opinion can be explained in two ways, namely negatively and positively. The negative argument is that this divine right is satisfactorily proved neither by authority nor by reason. And this negative argument is effective on the supposition of the antecedent, because precepts of divine right are not to be accepted without sufficiently certain testimony or cogent reason. But the declaration that this does not hold is that either the right is positive, and no testimony gives sufficient proof for this; or that it is natural, and this requires convincing reason, which is not easy to find. The proof of the first part is that only one place of the Gospel is accustomed to be adduced to prove this divine positive right, namely the words of Christ, Matt. 17, 'then are the children free,' which do not seem effective, because we said above that they are understood of natural sons and that Christ, because of the singular participation in his own dignity which he bestowed on Peter, extended them to him. But it is insisted that it can, by another consideration, be extended to the whole clergy, because they are as it were the special family of Christ, and the exemption of the natural son is wont to be extended to family members.

But this introduction of the words of Christ does not seem to urge much, both because there is no necessity by the nature of the thing that when the natural son is exempted the family be exempted too but this depends on the will of the father or the prince; and this will Christ did not there declare toward the others in the way that he did toward Peter, nay by especially singling out Peter he seemed to exclude the others, or not to include them; and also because, although a family is very often exempted along with its patron, it is not so always, nay rarely in equal manner: in what way, then, can an equal exemption from the power of secular principles be concluded therefrom for all the clergy along with Peter, or even with Christ? Or if equality is not inferred, how much of it is collected? Especially because a certain difficulty touched on above is more pressing, that the talk there is only of exemption from tributes; but an exemption for the family from forum and jurisdiction is much more difficult, since it is not wont to be conceded even to sons themselves.

The proof for the second part about natural right is that this right ought to be founded on some supernatural property, because, as I explained above about the Pontiff, this right is not regulated by merely natural light but by light illumined through faith, some supernatural property or dignity being presupposed. But in the present case there seems to be no supernatural property on which such exemption may necessarily follow. The proof is that if there were one it would most of all be the clerical character; but this does not seem to be the case, first because a slave ordained against the will of his master is not immediately by force of that character freed from servitude, according to Decretals, ch.2 and the ch. second to last, about non-ordained slaves, nor do all who have the character enjoy this privilege but many are deprived of it, as we will see below. Then also because through the clerical character a man is not only dedicated in a peculiar way to the divine cult, or not only receives a peculiar power for serving therein, but also, from the nature of the thing, there is no repugnance in someone being in a peculiar way deputed to the divine service and at the same time being subject to a temporal prince in those things not repugnant to the divine service. Also again, because otherwise a handle would be given to those who say that all Christians are exempt from the jurisdiction of temporal princes by force of the baptismal character and are consecrated to the divine cult in a way very different from the rest of mankind. Besides also, because there are many clerics who do not have the character, as those who only have the tonsure, and yet, if the other necessary conditions are present, they have the same exemption as other clerics; therefore here is a sign that it does not arise from natural right. And the same argument is assumed from other ecclesiastical persons who enjoy this exemption even if they do not have the tonsure either, as do lay or convert religious, and women religious, and any others of this sort. Finally too because what is by divine right in this way is necessary in such a way that the contrary is intrinsically evil; but a cleric being judged by lay jurisdiction is not intrinsically evil; therefore its opposite, namely that a cleric be exempt from such jurisdiction, is not of divine natural right.

3. This last reason also seems to give persuasion to this opinion not only in a negative but also in a positive way (which is what I proposed second). For what is against divine right is never licit; but subjection contrary to this exemption is often licit; therefore here is a sign that this exemption is not of divine right.

4. A first confirmation is that clerics have not always in the Church been exempt from the forum of the secular court, as is gathered from Paul, Romans 13, with the exposition of Chrysostom and others; therefore it is not of divine right, otherwise it would have come into existence at the same time with the Church. And the argument can be explained in this way, that clerics from the beginning of the nascent Church were in a far different way exempt from the secular forum in spiritual causes than in temporal. For in the former they were in no way bound in conscience to obey laymen, nor could they have recourse to their tribunals to expedite such causes. But in the latter they were bound to obey them, and could have recourse to them, as far as the force of jurisdiction was concerned. Therefore here is a sign that the distinction of forum in spiritual things is of divine right in a far other way than the distinction of forum in temporal ones. Therefore here is a sign that this privilege is not, as regard temporal things, immediately and per se of divine right.

5. A second confirmation is that the Church sometimes hands over a cleric to the secular arm so that, once a declaration has preceded that deprives the cleric of the privilege of the forum, he may be punished by it even with death; and there are certain causes of right whereby clerics are deprived of such privilege; here then is a sign that the privilege is not of divine right. For things that are established by divine right cannot be changed or taken away. Nor will he do enough who says that the privilege is not then taken away nor divine right changed because the secular judge does not as principal cause (so to say) punish the cleric but as minister of the Church and by its power. This, I say, is not enough, both because the laws and the doctors everywhere say that the cleric is then deprived of his privilege of the forum, or (which is the same) that he does not enjoy ecclesiastical immunity; and also because when the judge uses the material sword for the punishment of death assuredly he does not give command by spiritual jurisdiction but by temporal, because spiritual jurisdiction does not extend to this sort of punishment, except permissively, so to say; wherefore it does not then conduct itself as a cause with an influence per se (so to explain the thing), but as removing a prohibition, at least by taking away the privilege for that case and abolishing the precept which prohibits a layman from judging a cleric; therefore here is a sign that it is not of divine right.

6. Finally, a similar confirmation can be taken from the fact that, if this exemption were of divine right, it would be equal in all clerics, because divine natural right does not make any distinction among them; but the case is not so, because in the first place married clerics do not enjoy this privilege the way others do, as is clear from Ius, ch. un. 'De Cleric. coniug.' on 6. Again, minor clerics, although they not be married, do not, unless they have an ecclesiastical benefice or bear the tonsure and the clerical habit, enjoy the privilege of the forum. Next, although a cleric cannot be brought before a lay judge, yet he can be brought there on appeal, at least in a civil case though not in a criminal, as Sylvester notes from Ius, verb. Iudex, n.4, See the Council of Trent, sess.23, ch.6, de reform. Again in a feudal cause exemption is not preserved nor in certain other causes, and especially in the case of law the exception is wont to be added, 'unless the consent of the prelate accedes,' ch.2, De Iudiciis; therefore there is no uniformity nor equality in this exemption. But if someone says that if divine right alone is attended to the exemption is uniform about all and for all but that the variety has been introduced by human right, this works to the contrary, for it seems to be a sufficient sign that the immunity itself is not absolutely of divine right, otherwise it could not so be varied by human right; just as we gathered that the jurisdiction of Bishops is not immediately of divine right because it can be limited, amplified, and varied by man.

7. Nevertheless there is a second opinion, which simply affirms that the exemption of clerics is of divine right, and which is sufficiently common, though the authors of it hardly explain whether they are speaking of divine positive or natural right; several of them, however, seem to speak of natural right, as far as can be collected from the reasons and the things they allege, although some touch on something also of divine positive right. So on behalf of this opinion, therefore, can be alleged in the first place the Gloss on ch. 'Si imperator', at the word 'Et discuti', 69 distinct., which openly says that the constitutions of the Church exempting clerics from the secular forum are declarations of divine right which conceded such exemption to them before all constitution of the Church. Yet that Gloss does not declare of what sort the divine right is, nor does it even speak expressly of exemption in temporal causes. And it can be understood of ecclesiastical causes, about which the text itself seems most to be speaking. Toward the same opinion inclines the Gloss on ch. 'Quaquam', at the word 'Divisio', De Censibus, on 6, where the text too is favorable, when it says that churches and priests are exempt from the yoke of temporal tributes not only by human but also by divine right. These two Glosses on those places are commonly received, as Covarrubias above cited reports, along with many other doctors. Again Innocent does not reject the opinion in ch. 2, de Maiorit. et obedient. It is held by the Rota, at the title 'De Consuet.' decis.3 & 10 in Antiquis, by Abbas in ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae', De Constit. num.6, where Felinus, also num.6, alleges several others and declares more expressly that it is contrary to natural reason for clerics to be judged by laymen. Rebuffe more broadly declares the same referring to others in Concordat. last title. And the same is held by Navarro, ch. 'Novit.' De Iudic., notab.6, num.30, at any rate as regard exemption in criminal causes, about which he thinks the same as about exemption in spiritual cases, although he thinks otherwise about civil ones. Among theologians it is held by Almain, De Potest. ecclesiast. ch.8, where he judges this opinion more probable and refers to a certain Carlierius in tractat. Contra Bohemos, who defends it. The same is held by Bellarmine in book one De Cleric. ch.28, proposit.5, and ch.29, and more at large in Disp. Speciali, vol.2 at the end, and finally in his book Recognit. around the same places, and around bk.2 De Pontif. ch.29. Julius Clarus holds the same, referring to others, bk.5, § fin. q.36, and Cenedus, collect.37, and Sylvester points it out, at the word 'Immunitas' 1, q.4, and Angelus at the same word, n.33.

8. As to the bases for this opinion, certain are general and they abstract from both divine positive and natural right; others mention natural right, but others positive right. First in order we put the canon rights which have this significance, and there are many laws accustomed to be alleged in this order, which I referred to above in ch.2; but I omit them because they speak of exemption in spiritual causes and therefore cannot strictly be extended to exemption in temporal ones. Many are also brought to bear which I adduced at the end of ch.3, and I similarly pass over these, because although they affirm exemption in temporal things they say nothing about its origin; but in what way they can be introduced I will declare below. From ancient decrees, then, I find only ch. 'Relatum', 11, q.1, from Pope Alexander, epist.1, which can be introduced for this side, insofar as it concludes against violators of the immunity of ecclesiastical persons in this way: "Those who have prevaricated thus have prevaricated against their God, and are not obeying his precepts." Secondly there is a text that makes for it from the Lateran Council under Innocent III, in ch. 'Nimis', on oaths, which has this: "Some laymen strive to usurp too much from divine right when they compel ecclesiastical men, to whom they have provided nothing temporal for possession, to oaths of fidelity to themselves."

Third there makes for it ch. 'Quaquam', De Censibus, on 6, insofar as it says: "Churches and ecclesiastical persons and their possessions are immune from the exactions of secular persons not only by human right but rather by divine right too." Although here the talk be of exemption from tributes an argument can be taken from it for the privilege of the forum, either by parity of reason, or because Paul, Romans 13.4, says: "For he beareth not the sword in vain, for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." And he adds later, v.6: "For for this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually on this very thing," signifying that those two things are conjoined, the right of ruling temporally and of exacting tribute, and consequently it can be inferred by the converse that if divine right has exempted clerics from tributes it has also exempted them from civil subjection. Fourth can be induced the chs. 'Continua' 11, q.1, and 'Futuram', 12, q.1, insofar as in them the words of the emperor Constantine are referred to, who said to the Bishops at the Council of Nicea: "You can be judged by no one, but you are reserved to God's judgment;" for he seems to have spoken in force of divine right since at that time no human right on this point had yet been sufficiently settled.

Fifth, from more recent General Councils there is a very fine witness from the Lateran Council under Leo X, in session nine, in the Bull for the reform of the curia, saying: "Since by both divine and human right no power has been attributed to laymen over ecclesiastical persons, etc." For if laymen do not have power over clerics by any right they assuredly do not have it, because they cannot have it without just title and without foundation in any right; therefore just as laymen lack this power to the extent it is by force of divine right, so clerics are exempt from it by force of the same right, because no one is subject to one who lacks power. Sixth, this is strongly confirmed by the Council of Trent, sess. 25, ch.20, 'De Reformatione', saying that: "The immunity of the Church and of ecclesiastical persons has been established by ordinance of God and by canonical sanctions." But that is said to be of divine right which is decreed by ordinance of God. Finally the words of the Council of Cologne make for the same thing, part 1, ch.20, saying that this "very ancient" immunity "was introduced equally by divine as by human right."

9. Second in order are to be put those bases which give persuasion that this right is divine natural right. And although, as I said, this right is not of purely natural order but is by way of connaturality to a supernatural priesthood, nevertheless from pure nature itself there is assumed a strong indication and as it were an a fortiori argument. For, among infidels, their own priests of whatever sort were, as if by guidance of the natural light, exempted from the burdens of the laity; much more therefore will this exemption be by divine natural right in the law of grace. This argument was almost used by the Pontiff in ch. 'Non minus', about the immunity of churches, adducing the example of Pharaoh, "who," he says, "did not have knowledge of the divine law and yet, with everyone else subjected to servitude, he left the priests and their possessions in their pristine liberty, and assigned them nourishment from what was public," Genesis 47.22. A similar thing was also done by Artaxerxes, who made the Levitical priests and other ministers of the house of God free of the taxes, tributes, and corn contributions, Ezra 7.24. Finally Pope Anacletus, epist.2, brings in for this purpose the verse of Zechariah 2.8: "he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye." With this agrees the verse of Psalms [104] 105.15: "Touch not mine anointed," that is, the priests. For in these words is declared a peculiar reverence which is due to priests by the dictate of natural right, because they are peculiarly dedicated to and joined with God, according to the verse of Numbers 3.12: "Therefore the Levites shall be mine," and at 18.6 they are said to be handed over "as a gift to the Lord;" for that reason too in Joshua 13.33 the Lord is said to be the possession of the tribe of Levi. As therefore natural reason dictates that priests are to be peculiarly revered, so too does it dictate that they are not to be subjected to secular judges.

10. But this kind of argument has assuredly a greater force in the status of clerics of the Law of grace, because they are consecrated to God in a more excellent way. Hence we can argue in this way: ecclesiastical persons are dedicated to God and rendered sacred by a special consecration; therefore by the right of nature a peculiar reverence pertaining to religion is owed to them; therefore also the exemption of such persons from the yoke of secular power is as if connatural, or due by the right of nature to the status of such persons, especially as regard their criminal and personal causes. Just as a golden or silver vessel which could, of itself, licitly serve a common use, by the very fact of being consecrated as a chalice remains, from the nature of the thing, immune from such use, nor can without sacrilege be transferred to that use, according to rule 51, De Regul. iur. on 6: 'Once it has been dedicated to God it is not to be transferred to human uses,' with similar rules; so must it be said, it seems therefore, of a person who is consecrated to God with respect to subjection to the secular tribunal. For the use of such subjection could not fail to lead to great irreverence for such persons and for the whole ecclesiastical state.

11. This reason is confirmed by the jurists, first, because a priest is, by force of his status, superior to a layman, distinct. 96, ch. 'Duo sunt'; but by the nature of the thing an inferior owes honor to a superior; therefore a layman too to a cleric. But the opposite to this honor due to clerics happens if they are called to a secular court, and from the nature of the thing it redounds to the cheapening and ignominy of ecclesiastical dignity and gives the common people occasion for despising the clergy; therefore, by the status of such persons, such exemption follows from the nature of the thing. This reason is very well declared and confirmed by the words of the 2nd Council of Macon, ch.9, where the Council, rebuking acts of violence of secular judges against clerics, adds this reason: 'For it is impious that a Bishop should be dragged from a church by the hands or command of him for whom he always prays to God and to whom, after having invoked the name of the Lord, he has often held out the Eucharist for the salvation of body and soul.' For one must note that, in order to prove it 'impious', he does not adduce a positive law but sacerdotal dignity and the reason founded on it. A second confirmation is that it is against reason that an inferior judge a superior, ch. 'Cum inferior,' and ch. 'Solitae,' De Maiorit. et obedient., and, for that reason, by no custom can it be introduced that an inferior acquire jurisdiction over a superior, as the doctors gather from the ch. 'Inferior', dist.21. Therefore it is contrary to natural reason that a lay inferior judge a priest superior to him. This is rightly confirmed by the words of Gregory VII, bk.8, epist.21, which Gratian reports, dist.96, ch.9: 'Who may doubt that the priests of Christ are deemed to be the fathers and masters of kings and princes and all the faithful? Is it not thought to be a mark of miserable insanity if a son try to subjugate to himself his father, a disciple try to subjugate his master, and subject, with unjust obligations, him to his power by whom he believes he can be bound and loosed not only on earth but also in heaven?' Finally Felinus and Rebuffe add that it is against reason for anyone to be taken to a tribunal that is suspected of hatred and enmities; but laymen are ordinarily hostile to clerics, ch. 'Laicos' 2, q.7, ch. 'Clericos' De Immunit. Ecclesiae on 6. Therefore etc.

12. In the last place there are bases introduced which give persuasion that this exemption is of divine positive right; there are three very powerful ones. The first is taken from the words of Christ already treated of, Matt. 17, 'then are the children free,' where the fact that under 'children' are comprehended clerics as the family members of Christ is indicated there by Jerome, saying: 'He both bore the cross for us and rendered tribute; we do not return tribute for his love and as sons of the king we are immune from taxation;’ for under that pronoun ‘we’ he seems to comprehend himself and other priests or clerics alone, because it is not likely that he is speaking of all Christians. The same exposition is also wont to be attributed to Augustine, bk.1 Quaestionum Evangelicar. q.23, as far as it is inferred from his stated words, ‘in any earthly kingdom whatever, all the sons of the supreme King, under whom are all earthly kingdoms, are free;’ for by sons of the supreme King he cannot mean all the just; and therefore it is likely that he understood Bishops, priests, and clerics, in that such are in command in the kingdom of God as sons of the king, as Cajetan expounded *Matt.*17. But, in truth, this was not the mind of those fathers, as I said above, nor does it have a basis in the words of Christ, and therefore those words are introduced in a different way, by a certain extension. For the sons of the king are free such that their family members are also exempted along with them, but clerics are in a peculiar way the family members of God and the Savior, as Pope Thelesphorus said in his epistle to all the faithful; therefore in those words Christ comprehended them along with himself, and under Peter, when we said to him: ‘Give unto them for me and thee’, because Peter was then bearing the vicariate for the whole ecclesiastical state, as Augustine indicated, sermon 6 on the words of the Apostle.

13. You will say that this extension is not contained in the words of Christ, nor was any precept or institution there delivered which could be of divine right. Also neither is the exemption of the family along with the natural son founded on any natural right, but in a certain congruity and human usage, and therefore the said divine institution cannot thence be sufficiently inferred. They reply that it is true that Christ did not say openly that the family was free along with the sons, nor even that it follows by a necessary and evident consequence, for that is why the aforesaid opinion is, as far as concerns this part, neither de fide nor altogether certain. Yet nevertheless it is very probable that the extension is of the mind of Christ; both because he argues a fortiori from the natural sons of men to himself, and so, if in others the privilege is extended to the family, it should in a more excellent way be extended to the family of Christ, because his privilege too ought to be greater by reason of his very great dignity, and his family is nobler and more excellent; also too because, although the joining of the family in the exemption does not seem necessary by strictness of right or of natural consequence, yet it is very consonant to reason; and it is per se credible that Christ assumed the privilege of exemption in the best way and in the way more consonant to reason.

A second proof is added from the tradition of the Church. For when tradition is constant and perpetual it is wont to display divine right, especially when no reason appears for attributing it to apostolic institution; but such seems to be the tradition of this exemption, for it is very ancient, so that there is no beginning known for it; for it was observed always according to opportunity of times, but especially after the times of the Christian emperors, as we will see at large in ch.12. But under heathen emperors it could not indeed be entrusted to execution as regards infidel magistrates, who did not obey the Church, which execution pertains to the fact but the right was not absent to the Church; a sign is that ecclesiastical prelates always made this right of immunity to be observed insofar as it could be among the faithful themselves. And the fact is shown by the ancient canons mentioned at the end of ch.3, which never refer this custom to any apostolic institution but venerate and study to observe it as divine. In these ways, then, both these opinions are founded as probable.

Chapter 9: The privilege of forum for clerics is founded on divine and human right, and the way this is to be understood.

Summary. 1. Conclusion. Human right is double. 2. First explanation of this conclusion. 3. Proof of this sort of exposition. 4. Second explanation of the same conclusion. 5. This declaration is further elucidated. 6. Divine right does not immediately provide individual clerics with exemption. First basis. 7. Second basis. 8. Third basis. 9. Third exposition of the conclusion. 10. The exemption of clerics is, as regards its manner, subject to the Pontiff. 11. How divine institution subsists along with dependence of the exemption on the Pontiff. 12. An exemption of this sort could be conceded by Christ in a twofold way. 13. Confirmation. 14. Clerics are exempt as regards both directive and coercive force. 15. This exemption is in all strictness by divine right. 16. The same is further confirmed from the priesthood of the Old Law. 17. Why Scripture numbers only twelve tribes. 18. The final declaration of the conclusion is to be preferred to the second. 19. The bases for the second declaration are taken away.

1. The certain and indubitable resolution of this matter is that clerics are exempt from the civil power by divine and human right equally: for this is taught almost in these very words by the canon rights above referred to, and by the sacred Councils, especially the Lateran one under Innocent III, the other under Leo X, that of Trent, and that of Cologne, which I cited above. Hence it is necessary that all the authors alleged in the preceding chapter for both opinions agree in this general resolution. The bases of both opinions also prove it, for in truth they prove that this privilege is in some way founded in both rights. But how this is to be understood, that is, what is to be attributed to the individual rights in this business, needs to be explained as best we can; and hence it will also be clear what the diversity is between the aforesaid opinions, or whether they can be reduced to concord. But since human right is twofold, namely civil and canon, and since we must directly speak about them in chapters 11 and 12, therefore in brief now I assume that this exemption does not depend per se on civil right, because of itself it precedes it, but yet it does depend on it, either as on what contains and approves it, or as on what bestows it, as far as its side is concerned or should there be need, or as on what prescribes to lay judges the observance of immunity for clerics. But it is certain by canon right and sufficiently proved that it prescribes observance of this immunity. But whether it prescribes this by conferring it, or only by declaring what God has conferred and wishes to be observed, depends on the manner in which such jurisdiction could be by divine right, and therefore it will at the same time be explained. But whether canon right alone would be sufficient per se to confer this privilege, even if it had not been given by God and civil right was not cooperative but resistant, we will see in chapter 11.

2. The first explanation of the resolution posed, then, could be that by human right be understood civil right, but by divine right be understood canon right, which is sometimes called divine right insofar as it has been passed by a power that is divine and supernaturally conferred, and because it chiefly makes disposition of things divine and pertaining to the good of the soul, and is frequently founded on the words and examples of Scripture. And thus is divine right expounded in the present matter by Hostiensis, ch. 'Nimis', De Iureiur., who interprets that chapter in this way, and he is followed by Salmeron, in the said tract.³⁷, who thus expounds ch. 'Quamquam', De

Censibus, in 6. And according to this exposition the second opinion in the preceding chapter is altogether rejected; for that is why the authors mentioned in the said canons understand by divine right canon right, so that they may defend the view that this exemption is in no way by divine right proper, that is, by a right which draws its origin immediately from God himself.

3. But Panormitanus departs from this opinion in d. ch. 'Nimis', at the end; and certainly rightly. For, first, it is very improper for a merely canon right to be called divine, and the use is rarely or never found in canon right itself. Also because, although in one or another place that interpretation could be permitted, especially if other circumstances are in its favor, yet when so many rights and Councils agree in asserting divine right, the interpretation is very violent and incredible. Add that the Council of Trent, perhaps to exclude equivocation or abuse over the word, expressly distinguished between canon and divine right, saying that the immunity of ecclesiastical persons 'has been established by ordinance of God and by canonical sanctions.' For what are 'canonical sanctions' save canon right? But those sanctions are also of divine ordinance, along with the mediation of the pastors of the Church; therefore they are distinguished from the divine ordinance which is immediately from God; but this is divine right proper; therefore that is what the Council is speaking of, and it is tacitly interpreting the other rights in the same way. The Lateran Council, too, under Leo X, when it says that neither by divine nor human right has power been given to laymen over clerics, must be speaking of divine right proper, otherwise it would not have sufficiently proved that laymen do not have such power, because someone could say that they have it by natural and divine right proper, as heretics contend. Let it be certain, then, that the proposed assertion or resolution is to be understood of divine right proper or immediate, and that, in particular, canon right is included under human right, although civil right is not excluded, because the Councils openly assert this, nor can they be otherwise suitably explained; and this is enough to require confessing simply that so it is, although in declaring the way that divine right concurs in conferring this privilege there can, among Catholics, be disagreement and difference without denial of the faith.

4. A second possible declaration of the assertion, therefore, is that the privilege of exemption has in part been established by divine right proximately and properly and in part by canon right. For it exists by divine right in two ways: first because it was given immediately to the Pontiff by Christ himself, second because power and divine precept was given to him to communicate that privilege to the whole clerical state. But this privilege is completed, as it were, and entrusted to execution by canon right in the particular and definite way of conferring it on the individual orders of clerics contained under the Pontiff, and thus this canon right determines, as it were, and entrusts to execution the general divine precept to exempt clerics from secular jurisdiction, which precept this opinion supposes and by which it differs most from the preceding opinion. Now such a precept can be understood to be of either divine positive or natural right. In the first way, it is either understood to be contained under the general precept given to Peter: 'Feed my sheep', individually, to be sure, according to their status and condition; or it is said to be divine because it is taken by imitation and likeness from the testimonies and examples of the Old Testament. Just as the precept of tithes is customarily said to have flowed from divine right, as in ch. 'Tua Nobis', 2, and ch. 'Decimas', 2, on tithes, see Bellarmine, bk.2, De Clericis chs.28, 29, 30. For that reason, just as the precept of tithes was, as to the quota, completed by canon right, so also was this privilege of exemption. But the precept can be considered to be of divine natural right most of all because, on the supposition of divine institution of the clerical order, it is deduced as evident by inference from natural principles, or as so necessary morally that, on this account, the supreme Prelate of the Church is obliged to confer the privilege on the inferior clergy and to establish it under a certain law and manner.

5. But so as to make the basis for this declaration or opinion understood, four assertions can be distinguished in it. The first is that canon right prescribes that clerics be exempt; and this part is very true, if we abstract for the moment from the mode of such precept, and thus the assertion above is proved, and it will be further confirmed in the next chapter. Second, this opinion supposes that there is in the Church a power for giving clerics this exemption, if the hypothesis be also granted that it was not made by divine right. And this too is easily conceded, about which we will speak in chapter 11. Third, this opinion affirms that this exemption has been prescribed by divine right, which we think to be altogether true not only of a precept improperly divine by imitation nor by mere moral deduction from the principles of divine right, which are completed by human constitution, but by a proper and strict precept laid down either immediately by Christ the Lord or at least through the medium of natural reason. The reason is that without this exemption the decency and dignity of the clerical state could not be maintained with due reverence and honor; therefore Christ certainly gave to him to whom he committed the care of that state the precept to have or to keep the clergy exempt from secular power, by prescribing it to him either explicitly or implicitly and by force of the office which he committed to him, wherefrom such an obligation is collected by morally evident inference.

6. Fourth, this opinion teaches that this privilege has not been given by God immediately to individual clerics or orders of clerics but to the Pontiff alone, so that by him it might be applied and distributed to the rest. On this point the opinion agrees with the first opinion reported in the preceding chapter, and so it rests on the same bases. Especially so, because use itself seems to declare the fact, for this exemption is not equal in all persons nor at all times nor for all cases and, further, it can vary; therefore here is a sign that it was not distributed immediately by divine right but was committed to the faithful dispensation of the Vicar of Christ. Again, because this suffices for the things that the canons teach about the exemption and that are, in sum, reduced to the words of the Council of Trent when it says that this exemption 'has been established by the ordinance of God and ecclesiastical sanctions.' For the first point, most appropriately, is made true by the said obligation and precept of divine right, and the second point by reason of the ecclesiastical execution.

7. It can also be shown from the similar question that is wont to be dealt with about the jurisdiction of Bishops, whether this is immediately of divine right or from the Pontiff. In that question the more probable solution is customarily that divine right does indeed immediately prescribe that the Church be governed by ordinary pastors and princes; and because they could not do this without jurisdiction, therefore it has been prescribed by the same divine right that sufficient jurisdiction be communicated to them, and that yet in the thing itself and in effect it is immediately communicated through the Pontiff. This way, then, is how this opinion makes affirmation about the bestowing of exemption on clerics. For there is no little likeness and proportion; for just as the exemption is, in its kind, of divine right, so the Episcopal office is of divine right; and, conversely, just as the jurisdiction of Bishops is not certain and determinate by divine right but can be amplified or restrained by the Pontiff, so also the exemption is not by divine right determinate for individual clerics, causes, places, or times, but can be varied, increased, and diminished by the Pontiffs. Therefore, just as the jurisdiction of Bishops, although it be of divine precept, yet is conferred immediately by the Pope that from the same it may receive definite mode and measure, so this privilege is left directly to the concession of the Pontiffs, that it may thereby receive definite mode and determination without which it could not in actuality be agreeably conferred, but left to them under obligation of their conferring it as faithful and prudent steward.

8. And this rule is general in other observances of the Church which do not have in particular a certain determination from divine right, although they do in general have a necessity from divine positive or natural right; for although such things can be said to be from divine right as regard general obligation, nevertheless, as regard proper and particular institution, they are accustomed to be immediately of human right. Thus may it be seen in censures, which have a basis in the divine right: "If he will not hear the Church, let him be to you as an heathen man and a publican;" and yet censures, as the Church puts them to use, are immediately from its institution. The same can be observed in many ecclesiastical rites and ceremonies; for divine right gives prescriptions in general, that sacraments and sacrifice for instance be done in a decent and decorous way; but because divine right does not immediately determine this, such institution is in effect ecclesiastical taking its origin from divine right; and many similar examples could be brought forward. But the general reason is that divine right does not immediately establish things that are liable to change and variation, and because a proper institution does not come about except in particular and with a certain mode and measure.

9. The third declaration of the proposed assertion is that the privilege of exemption for clerics is immediately and with all propriety of divine right, because it was not only promised and commanded by Christ, but also given and actually conceded; and yet it is also of canon right declaring divine right and preserving this privilege or moderating it as expedient. According to this declaration the former opinion, treated of in the previous chapter, is altogether refuted and the latter is fixed in a very proper and rigorous sense; and although few of the authors referred to for it declare it in this way, nevertheless many certainly seem to have thought thus, especially Carlerius whom Almainus refers to and follows. And the same was thought by Rebuffe and others who say that clerics have never by right been subjected to emperors, even heathen ones, from the beginning of the Church, which Torquemada also thinks, bk.2, Summae de Ecclesia, ch.96, ad.3. This opinion and declaration of the aforesaid opinion is very pious and very much in agreement with reason, and therefore we must defend it and diligently explain it.

10. In the first place, although we admit that this privilege was given immediately by Christ to clerics, nevertheless we do not deny that it was subordinated to Peter and his successors as to the mode to be observed in using it, both on the part of the persons to whom the privilege was to be applied, and on the part of the things, causes, or businesses, in which such exemption ought to be observed. For manifest conviction is given for this by some of the arguments made for the prior opinion, and by others which can be taken from the use of the Church. For we see that a cleric in a civil cause, if he bear the person of prosecutor against an accused layman, is not exempt in such prosecution from the lay tribunal, but is held to follow the forum of the accused. But why is this so except because the Church has determined that the exemption of clerics be kept within those limits, and because it could have made disposition otherwise if it had judged it otherwise expedient? Similarly everyone concedes that clerics are obliged, in respect of directive force, to keep certain laws which regard the common and convenient state of the citizens; and this has not arisen from anywhere than from the Church judging it expedient so, as I showed elsewhere. Therefore the privilege of exemption, which by divine right is indifferent and as it were general, is subject, as regard determination, limitation, or expansion, to ecclesiastical power. But neither can it be said that all these things are only done by the Church by way of declaration of divine or natural right, because without doubt many are done by prudent human choice, and therefore they change at diverse times, as that married clerics enjoy this privilege in these things and not in those, and that minor clerics do with these circumstances and not without them; and that in such a crime a cleric is handed over to the secular arm and not in another sometimes graver one. Therefore these things are done by the power not only of interpreting, but also of establishing new right, or limiting or extending an old right.

11. But so as to explain how these things cohere, since the Church does not have power over divine right, I suppose from the tractate De Legibus that this name 'right' sometimes signifies a proper law or precept, but at other times, and properly and frequently enough, it signifies a faculty of using, or (so to say) a quasi right of fact, in the way rights of servitude or right in a thing or for a thing and the like are distinguished. In these two ways, then, can divine right also be received in the present case. For the privilege itself of exemption, insofar as it is a certain liberty from subjection to another, is a certain moral faculty for not obeying such a power, or for freely acting without respect to it or impediment from it; this faculty, then, given by God himself, is said to be divine right, not as a precept but as a gift from God. Just as liberty from servitude, which is natural to man, is very well said to be, in this sense, by divine natural right. But once such privilege is posited, there also follows a divine prescriptive law that no force or coercion be brought to bear on him who has such privilege but that his immunity be preserved; and thus there intervenes also in such exemption a divine prescriptive right which is acted against by violating the exemption of clerics.

Now that which, by this double right, consists in the general faculty and is, as it were, a certain good which is properly called a privilege, I say that it, though divine, namely given by God, can be subject to loss or change for just causes; just as life itself and the members of the body and the natural right of liberty are given by God and are said to be by right of nature, and yet they can, for just cause, be taken away or lessened by human power, and this we understand to have been conceded by God, because thus it was expedient for the common good of the human republic. In this way, therefore, should it be understood that, though the privilege of exemption has been given to clerics by God himself, nevertheless, for just cause and by legitimate power, it can be lessened or taken away, for thus was it necessary for the common good of the Church. Hence as a result it happens that the other divine right prescribing observance of such privilege does not contain an absolute prohibition that such privilege cannot be lessened or taken away, but that it not be done without legitimate power and just cause, as we said of natural liberty.

12. But that power is only in the Pontiff, because it is a power that is spiritual, supernatural, dispensing the mysteries of God, a power of binding and loosing, and supreme in its order. But a legitimate cause, generally speaking, will exist whenever some limitation or privation of this exemption will be judged necessary or convenient for the convenient and decent order of the Church, or for the good morals of the Ecclesiastical state; and this judgment is also committed to the prudence of him to whom the keys have also been given. Thus therefore it is easily understood that notwithstanding the variety which we see in the legitimate use of this exemption it could be of divine right, because by that variety there is no going against some divine precept, nor is there dispensation made from it, but the precept itself includes such a limitation or condition accommodated to such privilege and to the condition of it, as has been explained. And in this way can easily be solved the arguments which the first opinion made in objection to this direct and positive divine right.

But this privilege as thus explained can be understood to have been given by Christ the Lord to the clerical state in two ways, namely either because he instituted his Church and the diverse orders and acts of it and its mode of government in such a way that it would obtain therefrom this privilege by natural and necessary consecration; or also because he conceded this exemption to clerics by a particular and express will. This second way is made sufficiently probable by the words of Christ, Matthew 17, insofar as we expounded them in the preceding chapter on behalf of the second opinion, with the addition too of ecclesiastical tradition, which is the best interpreter of the words and laws of Christ. And this part is further confirmed from the first one; for the reason that this privilege is deduced from the institution itself of the Church and of the clerical state also gives persuasion that Christ, in the words, “then are the children free,” wished to comprehend the whole clerical state. Therefore, that this privilege, at least in the first way, is by divine natural right, provided divine institution of the ecclesiastical status and of the whole Church is presupposed, is thus proved; because clerics, both as to their body and their soul, are specially subject to Peter by divine evangelical right; therefore by the same right they are exempt from the jurisdiction of secular princes.

13. The assumed proposition is made plain from the doctrine of St. Jerome, which is referred to in ch. ‘Duo sunt,’ 12, q.1, where he distinguishes two kinds of Christians, one that is delivered over to the divine office and is given to contemplation and prayer, as is the state of clerics and religious; the other kind is that of lay Christians, who, though they are appointed to divine service by general reason, attend principally to temporal things in accordance with their common mode of life. Since, therefore, all Christians are subject to Peter in spiritual things by divine right, as was shown in book 3, and since that subjection can be said to exist as regard the soul, because it is only in spiritual things and things pertaining to the cult of God; we say of clerics that they have been subjected to Peter by the same divine right not only as regard the soul but also as regard their bodies. The fact is proved from the said doctrine, because clerics are specially dedicated and handed over to God and to his cult not only as to the soul but also as to their bodies; therefore as a result they are also as regard both subject to Peter. The proof of the consequence is that by the very fact that clerics are dedicated to God according to body and soul they belong in each way to the particular right of God; and they are said to be handed over to the gift of the Lord with greater reason, and therefore with greater title said to be of God, than the Levites, about whom these things were above said. Therefore by that very fact they are, in accord with each reason, constituted under the proper jurisdiction conferred on Peter as Vicar of Christ; for Christ’s particular property, and whatever belongs to the particular right of it, he has committed to his Vicar as proper manager and steward.

There is also confirmation, for the goods of churches and sacred things are committed by divine right to ecclesiastical prelates, and especially to Peter, as regard their care and distribution, no doubt because they pertain in a particular way to the dominion of God and the patrimony of Christ; therefore by the same and greater reason the whole government of clerics, both in what regards the body and temporal life and in what regards the soul, has been specially committed to Peter by Christ. The antecedent is expressly handed down in the 4th Roman Synod under Symmachus. For it is said that laymen, even religious and men of power, cannot make any decree in any way at all about ecclesiastical faculties, “the care of disposing of which has been indubitably given by God to his priests.” But the consequence seems to be no less certain, both because the persons themselves pertain to Christ and to ecclesiastical things more than do ecclesiastical faculties; and also because the universal care of the divine cult is by divine right under the jurisdiction of Peter, because it is immediately ordered to a spiritual end; and by this reason all things which are dedicated to the cult of God are simply and absolutely under the jurisdiction and administration of the Church, among which things dedicated to God the persons of clerics hold first place; therefore simply and absolutely and according to every reason are they committed by divine right to the jurisdiction and disposition of Peter.

Having set this down, therefore, the first consequence, namely that if they are committed to Peter they have been as a result exempted from the jurisdiction of temporal princes, is per se evident from that evangelical dogma of Matthew 6.24: “No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other.” For a similar inability and moral repugnance is found in clerics being in the same respect, that is in respect of their body, subject to the Pontiff and to the king, because these could sometimes prescribe contrary things, and it would be necessary to obey one and despise the other; as, for example, a king could prescribe to a cleric to go to war or be busy with other temporal actions, but the Pontiff could prohibit these actions or prescribe other things that were repugnant to them. Again, since clerics should, as to the actions of the body, be devoted to divine ministries and be removed from secular businesses, it is necessary they have a rule and way of living and operating and of using temporal things or offices from the Pontiff; therefore they cannot at the same time be under the jurisdiction of temporal princes, even as regard things that pertain to the body; just as vessels sacred to God are by that very fact and by the nature of the thing exempt from profane uses, and just as a contract of marriage consecrated into a sacrament has by that very fact passed into the ecclesiastical forum and is exempt from the secular one.

14. Therefore it is hence very well inferred that clerics are absolutely exempt from the jurisdiction of temporal princes, because this jurisdiction deals especially with those subject by reason of their bodies and so with all those things that are ordered to the convenient preservation of bodily life, as was shown at large in book 3. Therefore, if clerics are exempt from the jurisdiction of princes also in respect of their bodies, they are certainly exempt from their temporal jurisdiction. Hence the conclusion is also drawn that clerics are not only exempt from the power of princes as to its directive force, at least in disposing and governing them in things that regard the actions of the present life, but also as to coercive force; both because one subjection is not separate from the other, nor can it rightly be considered without the other, and therefore as regard both they are by divine right subject to the Pontiff and as a result exempted from others; and also because this exemption is no less necessary than the other for the cult of God and the convenient use of things dedicated to the divine cult. Therefore deservedly did Pope Nicholas say in his letter to the emperor Michael: "How those, to whom it has been permitted only to rule over human things and not divine, presume to judge about those by whom divine things are administered, we are altogether ignorant." This too is strongly confirmed by the words of the Lateran Council under Leo X: "By a right as well divine as human no power over ecclesiastical persons has been bestowed on laymen." In these words I note first that the talk is about all power, and hence it comprehends not only spiritual power but also temporal, nay this power especially because about the other there was no controversy. Next the Council supposes that laymen cannot have any jurisdiction over ecclesiastical persons, unless it be conceded to them by some divine or human right. Hence it must either be supposing that laymen do not have it by natural right, or must certainly be including under divine right both positive and natural right, otherwise it would be proceeding incompletely and concluding nothing. Therefore the intention of the Council is that laymen do not by divine right have such jurisdiction over clerics, because neither has divine positive right attributed it to them, as is clear of itself, nor has natural right permitted it but has exempted clerics from the jurisdiction of laymen by the very fact that they are subject by a special title to the Pontiff. Finally, I advert to the fact that the other part too about natural right can be understood most of canon right, about which that opinion is manifest. But the Council did not seem to have any reasoning about civil right, because it supposes that there is no power in temporal princes for establishing such a valid right, since they do not have for this very thing power by divine right.

15. To these can be added other General Councils besides, and the provincial Councils adduced above, which constantly teach that this exemption is of divine right; but this can and must be properly understood in accord with the capacity of the matter. And it is not properly said to be of divine right, because its immediate establishment is from the Church even if it takes its origin from a precept or power given by divine right. Just as royal power is not, nor can properly be said to be, of divine right, even if it takes its origin from natural law and power. And for that reason neither are ecclesiastical ceremonies, outside the Sacraments, said to be of divine right; neither even is the jurisdiction of Bishops said to be so, according to the opinion of those who think that it is conferred immediately by the Pontiff. Since therefore the Councils say of this exemption so constantly and absolutely that it is of divine right, surely they are to be taken in the more proper sense. Similarly too the Council of Trent – it says that this exemption is by divine ordinance – is most correctly understood in the common manner of rights, that the exemption is ordered and instituted by God himself and declared and made firm by canonical sanctions. Add too that the very emperors seem to have been led, not by human right indeed or ecclesiastical, but by reason illumined by faith, to recognize rather than to concede this exemption.

So Charlemagne, in his capitulary, bk.6, ch.109, when he gave sanction thus: "Clerics are reserved not to secular courts but to Episcopal audience," explains the reason by saying: "For it is not holy that the ministers of divine duty be subject to the judgment of temporal powers." But 'holy' [fas] means, on the evidence of Isidore, bk.5, Etymol., ch.2, and ch.1, d.1, a divine law that both pertains to God and descends from some natural equity; such therefore did Charlemagne think the right of exemption of clerics to be. In agreement with this is what is said in the Council of Macon, 2, ch.9, that it is 'unholy' [nefas] to violate the immunity of Bishops, which is, in can.10, extended to other clerics. One must also attentively weigh what is said at the beginning of that ch.9: "the most reverend canons and the most sacred have given sentence about the Episcopal audience almost from the very beginning of Christianity." For the Council speaks very openly of an audience with respect to temporal and personal causes, as it at once explains, and it does not say that human laws have introduced it but gave opinion for it as declaratory of a quasi connatural right of Episcopal jurisdiction and ecclesiastical exemption. Emperor Theodosius too, as Ambrose, epist.32, elsewhere bk.2 epist.13, to Valentinian, reports, gave equal sanction that: "in a cause of faith or of any ecclesiastical order he should be judge who is neither unequal in duty nor dissimilar in right. That is," says Ambrose, "priests judge of priests," as if both were of the same divine right. Constantine also thought this in fact and in his oft repeated words, from Gregory, bk.4, epist.13, indict.13, elsewhere ch.75, from Ruffinus, and from other ecclesiastical histories.

16. There can to these be added conjectures taken from the right of the Old Law. For if priests and Levites were in that Law exempt from temporal power, no one will deny that the same is to be said in the New Law by force of divine right, at any rate natural divine right; both because this pertains to the greater perfection of the priesthood of the New Law; and also because if such an exemption was found in the people of Israel, certainly it was not by any human law, for no such law is either read in Scripture or can with a basis be thought of, especially since these sorts of laws were at that time very rare, because everything was minutely prescribed in the law of God itself. Therefore from the priestly state itself, and from the general words by which the tribe of Levi was assumed into it, there was collection made that the tribe had been given to God and wholly subjected and subordinated to the power of the Pontiff; therefore in the same way must be gathered a similar divine right in the New Law. Not because the ancient Law, insofar as it was ceremonial, is obligatory in the New Law, but because that ancient right followed the priesthood, not in force of the ceremonial law, but in force of the moral law. Therefore in a similar way, from the supposition of a better priesthood has followed the same moral divine right in the New Law. But that the right of exemption existed in the Old Law is made very likely from the way of speaking of Scripture, Numbers ch.3, "And they shall be my Levites," at least by peculiar title and gift, about which it is said in ch.8.10-11: "And thou shalt bring the Levites before the Lord: and the children of Israel shall put their hands upon the Levites: And Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord for an offering of the children of Israel, that they may exercise the service of the Lord." And later, 13-14: "And thou shalt offer the Levites for an offering unto the Lord. Thus shalt thou separate Levites from among the children of Israel: and the Levites shall be mine." And later, 16: "For they are wholly given unto me from among the children of Israel." And later, 18-19: "And I have taken the Levites...And I have given the Levites to Aaron and to his sons from among the children of Israel, to do the service..." Similar things are also repeated in ch.18, and to Aaron it is said, 3: "And the Levites shall keep thy charge."

From these, therefore, and from similar ways of speaking it is gathered with sufficient probability that the tribe of Levi, by force of its being separated and deputed to the ministry of the temple, was exempt from civil jurisdiction that, from the nature of the thing, was in the community of that people. First because, by giving up that part from itself and donating it to God, it deprived itself of some power and dominion, as it were, and transferred it to God; but this power could not be other than power of jurisdiction, because there was no other power of dominion in that community with respect to that part; and consequently God, by accepting the donation, reserved that right for himself by a special title, and committed it to the Pontiff of that people. Second because from the force of that separation the priests and Levites were rendered immune from merely secular burdens and duties that could either distract the Levites from the ministry of the temple or would be incongruent and unfitting to that state. The sign thereof is Numbers 1.47-48, when God commanded the people to be numbered: "But the Levites...were not numbered among them. For the Lord had spoken to Moses, saying, Only thou shalt not number the tribe of Levi." "Because" (says Josephus, bk.3, Antiquit. ch.11), "the Levites are holy and immune from military service." And immune, for the same reason, from other secular duties and tributes, as Abulensis also thought, q.25, on ch.1 Numbers, saying that the tribe of Levi, since it was instituted for the ministry of the tabernacle, could not be at leisure for the other burdens and necessities of the people. And for that reason the Levites did not receive part in the promised land, but in place of it they received the rights of the sanctuary, Numbers 18, Deuteronomy 18, Joshua 13. Hence Abulensis also adds in the same place that the Levites were not numbered with the rest of the multitude, because they did not make one people with them. "For," he said, "all ten tribes were one people and communicated with all, and divided all the land among themselves, and were at leisure for purely secular things; but the Levites came together with the people in nothing." Hence also the tribe of Levi was as if separate from the others, and the twelve tribes of the people were accustomed to be numbered apart from them. For thus in the cited ch.1 of Numbers, the twelve tribes are numbered with the exception of Levi, because, as Josephus notes above, Manasseh was put for Levi among the head of the tribes, and for Joseph was put Ephraim, whom Jacob secured in adoption from Joseph, Genesis 48.

17. One must consider that, although according to the said computation and adoption there were thirteen tribes, never in Scripture, because of the perfection of the number, are there numbered other than twelve. Now it has been observed that whenever the tribes are numbered in order to things spiritual, the tribe of Levi is numbered, and either the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh are reduced to the one tribe of Joseph, as Genesis 46, Exodus 28, Deuteronomy 27, or one is excluded, as in Revelation 7 the tribe of Dan, because of the Antichrist, is omitted. But when the tribes are reckoned in order to secular or temporal things, the tribe of Levi is omitted and Manasseh and Ephraim are distinguished into two, as Numbers 1, Deuteronomy 18, etc., because in order to temporal things the tribe of Levi was as if separate from the others. And in the same way, when under Jeroboam the twelve tribes were divided and two, namely Judah and Benjamin, remained under Roboam and the remaining ten passed over to Jeroboam, Levi is not numbered among them, as is taken openly from 2 Kings [Samuel] 11 and 2 Chronicles 11, because no doubt (as one may conjecture) it did not pertain to the temporal kingdom. From these, then, is collected with probability the exemption of the priestly tribe from the jurisdiction of kings in the Old Law. And no little confirmation comes from the authority and power of prescribing given to the Pontiff of that law, Deuteronomy 17; about which there was discussion in the previous book. With much greater reason, therefore, should such an exemption be believed to have been conceded to the clerical state by divine right in the New Law.

18. Finally, having rejected the first opinion reported in the preceding chapter, and the first declaration of the Catholic assertion posited in this chapter, which coincides with the said first opinion, and comparing this last declaration with the second, that this last is to be preferred can be declared by moral reason thus. For those two declarations or opinions agree that the privilege of ecclesiastical immunity is of divine and human right, for which the reason can be given that it was necessary for such privilege to be perpetual, fixed, and unchangeable, and therefore it ought to be of divine right; and at the same time it was necessary that it be in part changeable or variable, and therefore it ought also in some way to be put under human right. But the joining together of each right about such a privilege could be thought of or happen in two ways: first, that divine right would prescribe such privilege only remotely, but human right would establish it by choice of men. Second, conversely, that divine right conferred it proximately but committed it to man so that he could moderate and accommodate it in the particular case. But, of these two ways, the latter is more convenient; therefore it is to be believed that in this way was this privilege given by Christ to his Church.

The declaration of the minor is from two properties which can be considered in this privilege, namely stability and a certain variety; for the former will be much greater and more secure if this privilege has been established and conceded immediately by divine right itself. For thus by no human power, whether temporal or ecclesiastical, could that be altogether taken away which was necessary for the preservation of the ecclesiastical state and for the reverence due to the divine cult. Again, in this way no usurpation or presumed human prescription could prevail against this immunity, which was also very convenient and almost necessary for restraining the force and ambition of temporal kings. Lastly, in this way even the Pastors themselves of the Church will be more cautious in making changes in these privileges, and they will be able with greater title to resist the importunate prayers of secular princes lest, by in some way taking away faculties and licenses from this privilege, they might yield to them without very grave and urgent causes. But in the second part, in the use of this necessary privilege, namely so that it could sometimes vary and be changed in particular cases or persons, very sufficient provision was made by subordinating the privilege, as regard the need to make this change for a cause, to the power of the Pontiff; therefore this institution was the most convenient. Therefore, the third opinion, which declares this privilege in this way, is to be preferred to the second.

19. For this reason this privilege is not rightly put on a par with other ecclesiastical observances or ceremonies, whose institution in a particular case is of human right although the general precept of them be of divine right; for in many of them there is an unlikeness of reason. First, because their institution could not be done in general by divine right, abstracting that is from particular ceremonies, because institution is a certain act or effect which cannot deal with the kind but only with the particulars; but a precept could very well be given in general, by committing a particular institution or determination to the decision of another. For to do this immediately by divine right was not expedient or necessary, except as regard the substantial rights of the sacraments and the divine sacrifice. But an exemption could very well be conceded absolutely by divine right in general, or universally, so to say, because generality does not there consist in abstraction from particulars but in comprehension of all ecclesiastical persons and of all effects of immunity, or of total liberty from temporal jurisdiction; and so we say that it was in fact instituted by divine right, by giving clerics absolute exemption from all jurisdiction of laymen, which clerics would have even if the Church had made no disposition about it. Second, because the other ceremonies and rites of the Church are not so proximately of the dictate of natural right, nor do they follow immediately from some prior divine institution, as this exemption does, as has been sufficiently declared. Third, because the other particular rites were not so necessary to the good governance of the Church and to the splendor and decency of religion, as was this privilege. And for the same reason the example of the jurisdiction of Bishops is not similar. Because the fact that Bishops receive jurisdiction immediately from Christ is not found written or sufficiently insinuated in Scripture, nor does it have a necessary connection with another prior institution of Christ, nor was it so necessary or convenient for the good governance of the Church that the whole spiritual jurisdiction be given without any limitation to all and each; and it could not be conceded with variety and limitation immediately by Christ, and for that reason it was more convenient that he should submit its distribution to his Vicar. Apart from the fact that it was much more convenient for greater union and subordination of the members with the head that in this all the inferior Bishops should depend on the Vicar of Christ. But in the exemption the reason is far different in all these respects, as has been declared.

Chapter 10. How ecclesiastical exemption is, by divine right, fitting for individual clerics or ecclesiastical persons.

Summary. 1. The various grades of persons enjoying exemption. 2. A first opinion to the negative. Triple foundation of this opinion. 3. A second opinion to the affirmative. 4. The foundations of the contrary opinion are dissolved. 5. Whether bishops are exempt. 6. Of the exemption of priests. 7. Whether inferior clerics are by divine right exempt. 8. The opinion of Navarrus is preferred. His own objection and response. 9. Navarrus' solution is further declared. And confirmed. 10. Response of the author. 11. This exemption is enjoyed by any person in an ecclesiastical state established by the Church.

1. In order to make more luminous the truth confirmed in the previous chapter, it has seemed worthwhile to explicate it of the individual states and orders of ecclesiastical persons, and to assess the reasons for this privilege proper to each case; for greater and more compelling reasons could be found for some of them than for others, although they are for all of them sufficient. Various grades of ecclesiastical persons can, therefore, be distinguished under Peter, for about Peter and his successors we have already spoken. In the first and chief grade were the apostles other than Peter; in the second are bishops, who succeeded to the apostles not as apostles but as bishops. Under these are priests, of whom some are parish priests and pastors of souls, others are simple priests, whether altogether so or established in some dignity. Under priests are the inferior clerics of sacred things, and under these are others established in minor orders, married or not married. And lastly there are others persons who, although they do not have orders or the tonsure, are reckoned to be ecclesiastics by reason of their status, and who enjoy the canonical privilege. About all of them, then, we must speak one by one.

2. A first doubt is whether the apostles other than Peter had this privilege such that it was by right licit for them not to obey the emperors, if in fact they were able to, and whether, conversely, secular magistrates were, on account of usurped jurisdiction, unjustly judging them, unless by chance their ignorance of the privilege excused them. For the king of England, in his Preface p.139, persistently denies this exemption of the apostles, saying that “in the times of the primitive Church it had never been called into doubt.” Which opinion is, with saner mind indeed and not with so much exaggeration, defended also by some Catholics. They seem to be favored by Chrysostom and Theophylact on Romans 13 who say that even the apostles were not exempt from obedience and subjection to temporal magistrates, and who speak not only with respect to directive power but also with respect to coercive, as the Apostle too spoke. And among other modern authors this is expressly taught by Albert Pighi and Jansen in the places already cited. They base themselves generally on the fact that clerics were not exempt from the power of heathen princes when they lived within their realms, because those princes were not under the jurisdiction of the Church; and this reason holds also of the apostles. However, the reason does not prove, but supposes, that this privilege was not conceded by Christ to the apostles; for if Christ wanted to concede it there could be no obstacle in the fact that infidel princes were not directly subject to Peter or the Church, because they were subject to Christ himself, and therefore he could exempt from their jurisdiction those whom he wished, as he exempted Peter.

If therefore the apostles did not have this sort of privilege, it is not because infidel princes were outside the jurisdiction of the Church, but because this depended on the will of Christ, and about this no certainty is given by revelation, written or unwritten; but an extraordinary and supernatural privilege is not to be asserted nor believed without the testimony of the will of the prince. Second, because such a privilege would have been useless to the apostles, because they were never in fact going to use or to have such privilege. Third, the addition is wont to be made that Paul in Acts 25 appealed to Caesar as to his judge and legitimate superior in the criminal case in which he was involved. This place is strongly urged by the king of England, and in this way was it understood by Albert Pighi and was at one time approved by Bellarmine whom Lorinus has followed. And the proof can be that otherwise Paul would not have acted well in appealing to a judge who was not his own, and in tacitly renouncing his privilege to one whom no prelate can renounce it to. Lastly an argument can be taken from Matthew 17 where Christ paid the tribute only for himself and Peter, and thereby the other apostles understood (as I reported above from the Fathers) that some special privilege had been conferred on Peter; there is no reason then for us to say that it was common to the other apostles.

3. The contrary opinion is supposed by Torquemada in the place cited, and Bellarmine ultimately preferred it; both of them for this reason say that Paul did not appeal to Caesar in right but in fact, not as to his superior, for he was exempt from his jurisdiction, namely by divine right, but because he could not by any other reason escape the snares of his enemies; nor does that place strictly require more, as I will immediately say. Hence this opinion is altogether to be preferred and, besides the general foundations for the whole clerical state, confirmation can be given, first, by the things we have said about Peter; for although Peter in respect of the apostles was their superior, nevertheless they had, in respect of the Church and all temporal princes and the whole world, a certain equality with Peter and had immediately from Christ himself a direct or indirect jurisdiction over all the princes of the earth; therefore, by force of that excellence, they were exempt from the jurisdiction of temporal princes. For it is preposterous and improper for superior princes to be judged by inferior, and for pastors to be subject to the sheep. Hence too the words of Christ, “then are the children free,” can be extended to the apostles with greater reason certainly than to any other clerics whatever. Both because they were more properly and strictly of the family of Christ the Son of God, for they were more closely connected to him and composed with him one college, and their board and any other temporal goods they had were common to them all. And also because they participated in a singular way in the excellence and power which Christ had over men, and therefore they ought to imitate him also in exemption from human powers; and so they are, under the name of sons, as accessories to the principal. In these ways, then, Christ’s will seems sufficiently clear.

4. Nor does it matter that the apostles were never going to use that liberty, for it was connatural as it were, or certainly very fitting, to their dignity; and therefore they ought not to have been deprived of that nobility (so to say) or status, even if, because of the ignorance or malice of men, they were not to be permitted to enjoy it, as must also be said of Peter. And thus could it also have happened in the case of Paul, about which Cardinal Bellarmine very recently and very well proves, in ch.13 of his Apology, that the court presider was not a legitimate judge, because Paul’s cause, which was then being dealt with, was not a civil one but a matter of religion, namely about Paul’s preaching to the gentiles, Acts 22, about the resurrection of the dead, ch.23, and that he was a defender of the sect of the Nazarenes, ch.24, and “certain questions of their own superstition and of one Jesus,” as the presider said, 25.19. But in a cause of religion a layman and a heathen man could not be legitimate judge. Nor for that reason did he act wrongly by appealing to the a lay and infidel judge, because a court like the one in which he had already been placed under an inferior judge, who was also a layman and infidel, could not be avoided; and therefore he acted prudently by appealing to the legitimate superior of the same inferior judge and of his accusers, whose unjust disturbance he in this way atoned for. Especially because Paul could also have appealed to Caesar with the intention of imploring his help in the best way he was able. For thus does his deed seem to be interpreted by Athanasius in his Apologia ad Constantinum; but to implore the help of a secular prince against the violence and injury inflicted by an inferior lay judge is not illicit, nor repugnant to ecclesiastical liberty; nay it is very much in conformity with it, as Athanasius in the same place intended to signify, and as Augustine taught in epist.48, 50, & 204 against the Donatists. And this is signified by the words of Paul in Acts 28.19: “I was constrained to appeal unto Caesar,” namely to rescue him from the hands of the Jews, from whom he feared he could not be freed by the presider alone.

5. In second place we must speak about bishops, in whom can be considered the power of order, wherein they are equal to the apostles and superior to priests; hence under this title some greater reason for this privilege can be considered in them than in priests, but a greater reason is taken from their pastoral function. For, besides the power of order, there can and ought to be considered in bishops the dignity of pastor and the power of Episcopal jurisdiction, by reason of which they are spiritual princes of the Church, not indeed universal ones, like the apostles, but in their dioceses, because of which they are said to be the successors of the apostles. By this reason, then, it seems to be efficaciously proved that, after the apostles, bishops have from Christ the Lord this privilege of the secular forum. For to them can be proportionally applied the reasons made about the apostles. Because they are of the family of Christ in a higher way than the rest, and are specially called, along with the Pontiff, to partake in his care, and therefore are they called by him brothers; therefore rightly can they be judged to be comprehended by Christ among his sons, when he said: "then are the children free." And also because bishops are fathers of secular princes and their superiors simply, and therefore it is unworthy and improper that they should be judged by them.

Hence Pope Anacletus, speaking about bishops in epist.2 ch.2, says as follows: "Hence is it proved that the supreme priests, that is the bishops, are to be judged by God, and are not to be slandered by human beings or by men of corrupt life, but rather are to be borne by all the faithful, the Lord himself giving example when he ejected the buyers and sellers from the temple by himself and not by another," and the rest which he pursues. And the same is very well confirmed by the words of Gregory VII in bk.8 epist.21, which I already reported above: "Who doubts that the priests of Christ are held fathers and masters of kings and all faithful princes? Surely it is acknowledged to be a wretched insanity if a son should try to subjugate to himself his father, a disciple his master, and to subject by his power with unjust obligations him by whom he believes he can be bound and loosed not only on earth but also in heaven?" Where it is clear that he is chiefly speaking of bishops, to whom belongs the power of binding and loosing in the exterior forum or the ecclesiastical court.

Hence at once the same Pontiff reports from the other Gregory, bk.4 epist.31 ch.75, the history touched on above about Constantine, who in the Council of Nicea "presumed to give no opinion of a judge above the bishops, but calling them even Gods, judged that he ought to submit, not to his own judgment, but to make himself dependent on their decision." Further, Pope Melchiades, ch. 'Futuram' 2 q.1, said that Constantine "reserved bishops to the judgment of the throne of God." Adversaries collect therefrom that those words of Constantine were a sign of urbanity only, since otherwise bishops could not be judged by the Pope either. But Pope Melchiades explains this far otherwise and confirms it in his epistle to the bishops of Spain when he says: "the bishops, whom the Lord chose for himself as his eyes and whom he wished to be the pillars of the Church, to whom also he gave the power of binding and loosing, he reserved to his own judgment, and committed this privilege only to the key-bearer, blessed Peter, his vicar." In these words he seems to make all the bishops similar in this respect to the Pope, because God reserved them to his own judgment. Hence, as to this part, they were by divine ordination exempt from merely human or secular judgment. They differ, however, from the Pontiff because they have a judge on earth to whom God committed his vicariate; the Pontiff, by contrast, has no man his superior by whom he may be judged. All these things proceed a fortiori of the apostles as well, and seem to argue much for this side.

6. Third we must speak of priests, in whom is not found the special reason we considered in bishops, because they do not have a proper ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the external forum, and therefore they are not princes of the Church, nor are they superior to lay princes as to power of commanding and judging in the external forum. They do have, however, more dignity than them in status and grade, and they represent the person of Christ in his ministers in a more excellent way, especially in the oblation of the great sacrament and in the absolution of sins, when they bear the person of Christ, and they are deputed to those functions by force of their order and status. And so, in the words “then are the children free” priests are rightly to be regarded as included, because by a peculiar title and manner they are of the family of Christ, although not in as excellent a grade as bishops. But as regards what pertains to natural right, it seems to have in them too a greater appropriateness than in inferiors, by reason of the priestly character. First indeed because it gives power over the true body of Christ, for by it they participate very much in the priesthood of Christ and by it things very sacred are brought to be, and therefore they are by that very fact removed from secular jurisdiction and subjected to spiritual power. Next is added power over the mystical body of Christ, by reason of which they become spiritual fathers of the laity and judges in the place of God in spiritual causes that most regard God, and especially in the sacred forum. By reason of these powers, especially fitting to priests of the Law of Grace are the titles of kings and Gods, which Scripture is wont to adorn priests with, as even the canon rights above cited emphasize for considering how improper it is for priests to be judged by the laity. Which impropriety is present in them from the nature of the thing, and is founded on the excellence of the sacerdotal character; therefore it is very credible that they are exempt by force of it.

7. And hence finally is clear what must be said about inferior clerics. For some said that they were not by divine right exempt, even if those consecrated in major orders do have exemption by divine right, which is the opinion of Bernard Diaz de Lugo, in Pract. ch.65, and John Lupus, tract. De Libertate Christiana p.2 q.5. But this is not altogether agreeable, both because the fact that some order is reputed to be in a special way greater or sacred depends on divine right, accord to ch. ‘Miramur’ about not ordaining slaves; and also because the rights above mentioned speak generally and without distinction. Finally too because not only clerics constituted in minor orders but also ecclesiastical persons generally, who receive a character either by some order that is a true sacrament or by some other right or mode instituted by the Church, can have discussion of the fact proportionally applied to them. For all are included under the peculiar family of Christ, and all pertain to the order of sacred and ecclesiastical things, and more and less do not vary the species; just as some ecclesiastical goods are more proper than others, and some sacred things are more sacred than others, and yet all are equally committed to the Church and are by divine right exempt from secular power. Therefore the same will hold of persons.

8. Navarrus, therefore, is better, when in ch. ‘Novit.’ De Iudiciis notab.6 num.30, in his response to the sixth argument num.15, he says absolutely that by force of the clerical character there follows, from the nature of the thing, an exemption from lay jurisdiction for the person thus made sacred, not only insofar as he is sacred but also insofar as he is a man. An objection he raises, however, against himself is that it would follow that every Christian was by force of the baptismal character exempt from lay power, because by that character he is consecrated to God. But if the reply be that it is true that a Christian qua signed with the character is subject to spiritual and not secular power, namely in things that pertain to Christianity, yet qua man he is subject to secular power; the easy response will be that the same may be said of a cleric as affected by the clerical character. Hence Navarrus himself labors to assign a difference, and, having rejected the opinions of others, he at length responds by denying the inference and by setting up a distinction between each character, “because the baptismal character,” he says, “does not distinguish between Christians but rather gathers them into one body; but the clerical character distinguishes between the clergy and the Christian people.” However he does not further declare the thing, but says rather that he is omitting certain objections that he had made in another edition because their solution is easy.

9. Yet nevertheless the thing seems to need exposition, because the difficulty does not seem to be solved. For in the first place, every form constituting and uniting in some way all who have a like form distinguishes them from others who lack that form, and thus the baptismal character distinguishes from heathens or infidels not subject to the Church; hence it differs from the clerical character only in that the baptismal character only distinguishes from those who are altogether outside the Church while the clerical distinguishes among the faithful. But this does not seem enough for one of them to be exempt and not the other, because even the priestly character distinguishes not only among the faithful but also among clerics of a higher or lower order; therefore although the priestly character brings exemption along with it, it will not be the same in inferiors, or certainly not equally so. A like argument can be made in the case of inferiors, especially by distinguishing clerics in sacred orders from minor clerics. Or certainly, if the priestly character in the first grade, or even the first tonsure, which is what, through a certain special consecration, first distinguishes a cleric from a non-cleric, by that very fact introduces exemption of the person; then the baptismal character too, since it makes the first distinction of a Christian from a non-Christian, by consecrating the baptized person to Christ, brings with it a like privilege. The difficulty is also increased by the fact that the baptismal character would at least introduce exemption from the power of heathen princes, which, as was seen above, cannot be said. The consequence is clear; for the character of order, which distinguishes a cleric from a layman, exempts the person of the cleric from lay judgment; therefore, keeping the same proportion, the baptismal character, by distinguishing Christian from heathen, would exempt the same from the latter’s jurisdiction. There is a confirmation too, that no less impropriety and no less danger is found in one of the faithful being judged by an infidel than in a cleric being judged by a layman; and therefore Paul, 1 Corinthians 6 reprehends the faithful who were going to court before infidels and not before the saints, that is, the faithful; where St. Thomas adduces various reasons of impropriety and danger, which, saving proportion, can be applied equally to each case, as will easily be clear to one who reads and considers. Hence Pope Alexander takes thence the converse argument to prove the exemption of clerics, ch. ‘Relatum’ 11 q.1.

10. But notwithstanding these things, and supposing what we have said about the priestly character, we reply that the same must be said of every character of order. For asserting which not a little help is given by the opinion of Alexander I in the canon just mentioned, along with others that we reported above. Now the reason is that although those characters differ according to more and less, yet they agree in this, that they consecrate the person by dedicating him to the divine cult and to some sacred ministry, by beginning from something inferior and of itself ordered to something supreme, which is priestly and episcopal, and by this reason such a character at once establishes a person as sacred and exempts him from secular things. And in this respect a distinction can be established between the character of order and of baptism; for the character of baptism does not make a person sacred by deputing him to a sacred ministry, but only signs him to Christ, and specially obliges him to keeping his faith, and it is of itself common to all men, and it is by accident that it does not exist in some people. And therefore it does not per se distinguish between faithful and infidel in things which have regard to temporal life and political status; and for that reason it does not bring with it exemption from jurisdiction for the faithful in the same civil and human matters in the way that the character of order exempts the cleric from the power of the laity; because, by dedicating a person to sacred ministry, that character per se distinguishes both the clerical and the lay state; and this perhaps is the difference that Navarrus wished to indicate in the said ch. 'Novit.'

11. Hence also finally the same thing, it seems, must be said about other persons who in some other way instituted or determined by the Church are established in an ecclesiastical state. Which is what Navarrus thought above when conjoining the status of monk with that of the clergy; for the status of monk does not impress a character and does exist by institution and determination of the Church. And the same can be said of the first tonsure, which is the beginning of the clerical state without the impression of a character, and of any others that are similar. A confirmation can also be given from the ch. 'Duo Sunt,' 12 q.1, where two types of Christians are distinguished, and one is said to be "that which, having been delivered over to the divine office and given to contemplation and prayer, is fittingly removed from all the tumult of temporal things, such as are clerics and those devoted to God." From which words one may collect that the same reason for exemption exists in the whole class of persons, because the whole class is dedicated to God and to the divine cult, which is the foundation for exemption, although the mode of consecration be diverse; therefore all these persons are deemed to have the same right as regards exemption.

And in this way will divine positive right be able to be applied to the whole class of persons, because from the whole class of persons the full family of Christ is completed, according to the opinion of Pope Thelesphorus in his epistle, where he speaks of all ecclesiastical persons under the name of clerics, and calls them the family members of Christ. Divine natural right can also be applied to them all, insofar as it is founded on the general reason of consecration or dedication to the divine cult, as I said. Nor is it an obstacle that the mode of this consecration or dedication to the divine cult exists in many of these persons by institution of the Church, because nevertheless, once the institution has been made, a natural right can result. Just as, although the consecration of the chalice is by ecclesiastical right, the exemption of the consecrated chalice from all common and non-sacred use follows by natural right. Or as we said in the matter of simony, although the consecration or benediction of some thing be by ecclesiastical right, nevertheless the fact that it cannot be sold insofar as it is consecrated is by natural right; thus therefore can it be said to be in the present case.

Chapter 11. Whether, if divine right is set aside, the exemption of clerics could have been immediately introduced by canon right without the aid of civil right.

Summary. 1. Sense of the question. 2. Confirmation. 3. Sure and true sense of this question. 4. First proof. Evasion. 5. The evasion is refuted. 6. Second proof. 7. The argument is strengthened. 8. A question. It is resolved. Whether bishops in their dioceses are able by themselves to confer this exemption on clerics. Reason for doubt on the affirmative side. 9. Reason for doubt on the negative side. Confirmation. 10. The negative side is preferred. 11. Bishops can prohibit clerics from having recourse to secular courts. 12. Foundation of the contrary opinion. The indirect use of spiritual power is necessary even apart from the crimes of secular princes. 13. A servant initiated into sacred orders is exempted from servitude. 14. The Church is able, against the will of heathen princes, to exempt clerics from their jurisdiction. 15. Response to the confirmation. 16. A heathen prince ought not to be admitted to the faith under the condition of not observing the exemption of clerics. First reason. 17. Second reason.

1. This simply and absolutely posed question is not a necessary one, since we showed in the preceding chapter that this privilege was conceded immediately by divine right, and since above in chapter 3 proof was also given that it has been confirmed by canon right; yet nevertheless the question proposed must be treated ex hypothesi by us, both to complete the subject, lest we leave any question untouched and undiscussed, and also to protect the ecclesiastical power and make satisfaction to certain objections that militate against the above solution. For we ask whether, when the immediate concession of this privilege by divine right has been removed, the Supreme Pontiff could concede it by his supreme power without the consent of secular princes, or whether he is only able to prescribe and protect the observation of it on the supposition of their gift or consent. On this point not only do Marsilius of Padua and other heretics and schismatics, who follow his doctrine, deny that ecclesiastical power is sufficient for this without consent of the secular power, but also some Catholics seem to agree with them in this respect. For those suppose it who say that this immunity is primarily of civil right, as is the opinion of Medina, ch. 'De Restitut.' q. 15, who says that this privilege is by concession of the secular power, signifying that otherwise it could not have been introduced. The same is also openly thought by Palacios on Sentences bk. 4, dist. 25 disput. 3, near the end, and it had been handed on before by Hostiensis on Summa bk. 3 title 'De Immunitat. Ecclesiar.' § 'Sed nec alia' near the end, where he says: "Now the emperor could not have been compelled from the beginning to grant privileges, but once he had granted them he could not take them away;" and, as Rebuffe and Covarrubias, who are to be mentioned, reported, Peter of Ferrara expressly taught that opinion in his Practic. in the form of a little book, see 'Plenam.'

The foundation for this opinion could be that secular princes had from the beginning by the right of nature, or at least of nations, civil jurisdiction over the persons of clerics, and they were not immediately deprived of it by God himself, as they themselves think and as we allow for the sake of disputation. Therefore neither can they be deprived of it by the Pontiff; because just as they cannot be deprived of their dominion, so neither of a part of it, such as is this jurisdiction and, as it were, dominion over the persons of clerics; therefore neither can the Pontiff concede the privilege of exemption, because it could not subsist unless princes were deprived of jurisdiction. You will say that although the Pontiff may not directly deprive a secular prince of his dominion, he could sometimes do it indirectly by spiritual power, and in this way he could concede this privilege. But on the contrary, because this use of indirect power only has place as it were per accidens, either by way of defense of the subject faithful, when the prince is pernicious and an occasion for ruin, or by way of ecclesiastical punishment, when a criminal and incorrigible prince is deserving of such punishment – in which cases the Pontiff can even exempt the subject laity from subjection to such princes – here, however, we are speaking per se and when there is no intervening cause or guilt on the part of the prince. And this argument is particularly compelling in the case of infidel princes, because they are not subject to ecclesiastical power, whether directly or even indirectly; but it extends to faithful princes, because conversion does not make them to be of a worse condition nor deprive them of any part of their jurisdiction.

2. There can also be a confirmation for both. For faithful princes indeed, because we read that bishops either requested judgment from emperors as long as these did not give up their right, as is plainly shown by the oft mentioned act of Constantine and of the bishops at the Council of Nicea; or that they secured this privilege from the emperors, when they had desired to have it, as is collected from Novella 83 ‘Ut clerici apud proprios episcopos etc.’ title 11 collat.6, where Justinian says that he has written several laws whereby he wished ecclesiastics to be judged by bishops alone, and afterwards he subjoins: “We have been petitioned by Menna, an archbishop dear to God, to give this privilege to the most reverend clerics, etc.” And in many other laws, which we will refer to in the next chapter, the emperors signify that this privilege was given by them and depends on their will. Nay, the 3rd Council of Toledo ch.21 requested the privilege of exemption for the servants of the churches, of bishops and priests, from the king of Spain, as is contained in ch. ‘Ecclesiarum Servos’ 12 q.2.

But about infidel princes there can be argument, because before they are converted to the faith they can expressly demand the condition, and be converted on the agreement, that none of their subjects be exempted from their jurisdiction, whether he be cleric or lay. But if the kings of Japan, China, or others similar seek baptism under that condition and refuse to receive it otherwise, they are not to be denied it for that reason; because that condition is neither intrinsically evil nor repugnant to the intention to believe all things necessary for salvation and to obey them. Therefore the condition is to be accepted, or at any rate tolerated, because of so great a good as is the complete conversion of the kingdom; but once the condition has been accepted it should be kept, since it is not unjust; therefore it is a sign that temporal princes have the right that, although they be converted to the faith, they are not deprived of their subjects or of a part of them; and consequently, although they do not expressly lay down the condition, they implicitly include or suppose it, because no one is to be judged to renounce his right unless he is sufficiently express in making it plain.

3. Nevertheless the true and sure opinion, whether or not this privilege of exemption has been conferred on all clerics immediately by Christ himself, is that Pontiffs could have conferred it and prescribed its observance to secular princes, and compelled them to agree. Thus did Innocent teach, in ch.2 ‘De Maiorit. et Obedient.’ For, when he proposes the question as to who exempts clerics, he first says that “the Pope, with the consent of the emperor,” afterwards that “they are exempt by God,” and finally he says, Or say that “the Pope, even without the consent of the emperor could have exempted them from the jurisdiction of the emperor by his constitutions, because since clerics are spiritual things, and have wholly given their body and soul to the service and lot of Christ, they are consequently subject to the judgment and constitutions of the Pope.” And the same opinion is common to the canonists in ch. ‘Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae’ De Constitut. especially Panormitanus, Felinus, Decius, Rebuffe in Concordat. last title where he calls the opinion of Peter of Ferrara false and condemned; and the same is held by Alvarus Pelagius in bk.1 De Planct. Eccles. ch.44, at the end reporting and following to the letter the opinion of Innocent. The same is held by Driedo bk.1 De Libertate Christiana ch.9, and Covarrubias, bk. Practicar. ch.31 concl.3 & 4, Soto Sentences bk.4 dist.25 q.2 a.2 concl.6, Molina vol.1 tract.1 De Iustit. disput.31 § Tertia vero, and Henry bk.7 De Indul. ch.24.

4. The proof is first from the decrees whereby the observance of this immunity is prescribed under censure even to temporal princes themselves, as is clear from ch. 'Noverit' and ch. 'Gravem' De Sentent. Excommun., and last chapter 'De Rebus Eccles. non Alienand.' and ch. 'Quamquam,' De Censib. on 6, and in almost the whole chapter about ecclesiastical immunity in the Decretals, and in Sextus and from the Bull 'Coena Domini' repeated so many times by so many Pontiffs; for in it they defend this ecclesiastical liberty through various articles and with automatic infliction of very grave censures even against temporal princes and kings. But perhaps someone could say that all these decrees are rather new and presuppose a privilege of exemption previously conferred by the emperors, and so they also presuppose the consent of the temporal prince, which once given cannot be retracted; and therefore, on the supposition of that fact, all those precepts have place; yet nevertheless at the beginning the consent of princes was necessary, and without it the Church could not have enjoined the like precepts.

5. But this is surely incredible, both because the said Pontiffs do not found themselves on the principle that a privilege given to the Church by the emperor cannot be revoked by him; for although it be true, as we will see below, it is yet not as certain as it is certain that the decrees and censures obligate all princes, even supreme ones, to not violating ecclesiastical immunity. The Pontiffs therefore do not rest for support on that principle, but either on divine right or on the supreme power, which they have from Christ, for ruling the Church and in particular sacred and ecclesiastical things, as they have judged is expedient for the divine cult and for the supernatural end of men. Hence many also of the older Pontiffs forbade clerics to be judged by laymen or to bring cases before them, even during those times when the emperors were infidels, as is clear from ch. 'Relatum' 11 q.1, and from the others that we mentioned in chapters 3 and 4. But in particular this truth is confirmed by the Council of Trent sess.25 ch.20 'De Reformat.', because, without making any mention of civil right, it says that "the immunity of the Church and of ecclesiastical persons has been established by divine ordination and ecclesiastical sanctions." Wherein it openly supposes that this immunity has not drawn its origin from civil right or from the confessions of secular princes, otherwise it would have kept silent about the proper and immediate cause of this immunity and the doctrine would, in strictness, have been false or greatly diminished. But next it admonishes the emperor, kings, etc. that "the more they are adorned with temporal goods and with power over others, with the more holiness should they venerate the things that are of ecclesiastical right, as being the chief things of God and guarded by his protection, and should give due observance to the sacred constitutions of the Supreme Pontiffs and the Councils."

6. Now this truth is by reason and at the same time by the authority of Scripture founded on the power given to Peter for governing the Church and for binding and loosing in all things that might be necessary for the good of the Christian religion and for the convenient governance of the Church. For this exemption, speaking per se and as from the nature of the thing, is very necessary for the Christian religion, so that ecclesiastical things and the divine cult may be treated with due reverence; therefore, on account of this end, power was given to Peter and to the Pontiff for loosing or exempting clerics from the civil power, and for binding the civil power itself, so that it may keep this immunity for ecclesiastical persons. This consequence is evident from what was said above about the power of the Pontiff about temporal affairs in order to a spiritual end; for it was shown there that this power is divine and supernatural, and accordingly per se sufficient so as to work effectively in its own sphere, not on the expected consent of the subjects, even if they be temporal princes, but by obliging them to consent and, if necessary, compelling them. Now the antecedent continues to have been declared and proved from the two preceding chapters. For if this exemption is properly and completely of divine positive or natural right, it is clear that the Pontiff can and should compel Christian princes to observe that right. But if this immunity is at least very close to natural right, and very much in conformity with the divine right and consent of all nations, as all the doctors without dissent admit, it certainly cannot be denied that this exemption is by the nature of the thing so necessary to religion and the divine cult that the latter could not be conveniently administered without it.

7. This can also be further declared by the reason touched on above, which on this point was even indicated by Innocent above; because sacred things are by force of consecration so subject to ecclesiastical power that this power not only makes disposition about consecration itself but also about the material and its appropriate use when already consecrated; and such that it prohibits not only things that are intrinsically evil but also things that can tend frequently and morally to irreverence for sacred things; but ecclesiastical persons are things very sacred and they can, by subjection to secular jurisdiction, be much distracted from the divine cult and be treated irreverently and despised by secular men, if their crimes are introduced publicly among laymen before the common tribunals; therefore such exemption has regard per se to spiritual power on account of the spiritual end. Lastly for this cause the Church could make disposition about marriage, not only as it is a sacrament, but also as it is a certain contract, because it is already matter for a sacred thing; and thus the Church makes disposition too about the goods of churches, and about tithes, and about many other things that, in their matter, are temporal; therefore it has the same power over this matter of exemption, which is also in its own way sacred and no less necessary for the divine cult.

8. But someone may ask whether the Pontiff alone has this power not only with respect to the whole Church but also with respect to individual episcopates. For in the prior way it is clear that only the Pontiff has this universal power for the whole Church, whereby we do not exclude a General Council for the Pontifical authority ought to be in it and it should be confirmed thereby, so that it can pass laws binding the universal Church. Therefore it can only be asked whether this privilege was not given by Christ or by the Pontiff generally to the clerics in the whole Church, or whether individual bishops in their own dioceses can confer it on their clerics. Now a reason in favor of the affirmative side can be that on each bishop is incumbent the care for making disposition about everything in his church that has regard to its convenient governance; and for this end each bishop can do in his diocese whatever is not forbidden him or otherwise prescribed by a superior; but this is not found to be forbidden them; therefore, on the supposition that the exemption had not been introduced by the Pontiffs, each bishop could bestow it in his diocese.

9. But there is to the contrary that bishops cannot in their dioceses do whatever is not forbidden them but only what is conceded to them, because they do not have jurisdiction of divine right but from the Pontiff; but it is not read that this was conceded to them. Next, the greater causes are reserved to the Pontiff, as is said in ch. 'Maiores' De Baptism. But the exemption of clerics, whereby supreme temporal princes are in part deprived of their jurisdiction, is a very grave thing and needs great authority and power; therefore either it was done by Christ or was reserved to his Vicar. There is also a confirmation, that bishops cannot in their dioceses increase this exemption; therefore neither could they introduce it if it did not exist. Lastly, from this sort of exemption scandals and disturbances could arise between princes and prelates, unless it be done with great prudence and authority; therefore whatever establishment can be made about this privilege must be believed to pertain to the authority and power of the Pontiff.

10. This second part, then, is more likely, which the practice of the Church also confirms. For the Pontiffs have used the greatest care in making disposition of all things that pertain to this exemption, nor have they left this faculty to bishops. There is also a very good reason, that this privilege (as is said in ch. 'Si Diligenti' De Foro Compet.) was introduced not for the favor of this or that person, nor for the favor of this or that episcopate, but simply "for the favor of the whole ecclesiastical college;" therefore the power of conferring it exists in the universal head alone of the whole college, who is the Supreme Pontiff. But this must be understood of this privilege as it is purely canonical and conceded by spiritual power alone independently of the consent or donation of secular princes.

11. Now there are two ways that bishops could prescribe exemption in their bishoprics even if it had not been generally introduced. First on the part of clerics alone, by prescribing to the clerics subject to them that in all court cases that they themselves introduce, or where they are free to choose the judge, they should avoid a lay judge and appear before their own bishop. For this would be a just precept and would not in strictness derogate from the jurisdiction of laymen; therefore it would not exceed the ordinary power of bishops. For just as Paul, 1 Corinthians 6, reprehended the faithful, who were bringing court cases among themselves, because they were conducting them before infidels, and whether he reprehended it because it was evil or because it was little fitting and dangerous, there is no doubt that he could prohibit it; so too bishops could forbid clerics from litigating, as far as was in their power, before laymen, even if they were not otherwise exempt, because just as it is not fitting for one of the faithful to conduct a case before an infidel, so, with preservation of proportion, it is unfitting and dangerous for clerics to be judged by laymen, by the argument of ch. 'Relatum' 11 q.1. In another way any bishop at all could prescribe in his diocese the observance of some exemption by accepting some privilege conceded by the prince or the supreme lord of the territory, which is per se manifest because such a privilege would be to the Church a benefit which it is licit for a layman to give and for a bishop to accept, and, once it has been accepted, the bishop has the power of prescribing its observance, because in that case he is not now depriving a layman of his power but guarding and defending an ecclesiastical thing.

12. To the foundation for the contrary opinion the response here, ex hypothesi, is that, because Christ did not of himself confer this privilege on clerics, the Pontiffs could by spiritual power have conceded it and, as a result and as it were indirectly, take from secular princes the jurisdiction that they had over the persons of clerics, or should have had were they not clerics. But to the reply here made, that this indirect use of spiritual power only has place per accidens because of the crimes or the tyranny of the prince, let the assumption be denied; for spiritual power also extends to temporal affairs even if there intervenes on the part of the secular prince no guilt but a sufficient cause on the part of the matter, as is the connection, whether the sufficient conjunction of the material thing with the spiritual or such relation to a spiritual end, such that, by reason of it, it is expedient for it to be directed or ordered by the spiritual power. For then the Pontiff has about such things the rights of heavenly and earthly rule, as Pope Nicholas II said in ch. 1 dist. 22. And in this sense there is no repugnance in the use of this spiritual power being per se, although it is indirect; for it is called per se because it is not by way of punishment nor by occasion of some evil by chance arising, but because, on the supposition of the human condition and of such an institution of ecclesiastical status, exemption is morally necessary for the spiritual end; and nevertheless the use is called indirect, because it is not on account of a temporal but a spiritual end, as was declared above.

Now the reason is that this power was per se given for the ordinary and convenient governance of the ecclesiastical monarchy, and therefore it is per se capable of whatever is morally expedient for its end, even if there is need to dispose or change something in temporal affairs. Most of all so indeed, because power was not given to temporal kings for their own advantage but for the agreeable government of the republic. Therefore, if in the republic itself such a change is made by reason of which exempting some persons from the jurisdiction of princes is expedient for the greater good of the republic, there is no marvel that the prince of the Church, who has a higher care and providence for the same republic when it has been raised to a higher order and state, could, on account of the same end, supply exemption. Especially since this ecclesiastical republic, as it has been instituted by Christ, is supernatural and has respect principally to the divine cult, for which this immunity is chiefly ordered.

13. This fact can also be declared by an example. For if a servant receives sacred orders, he is sometimes freed from servitude, ch. 'Per Venerabilem' Qui Filii sint Exempti and ch. 'Si Servus' 54 dist. ch. 'Miramur' De Servis non Ordinandis. Which thing the Church could establish for the due use and fittingness of the sacrament of order and of ministry even by depriving the master of the power which he before had over the servant, whether payment is given or even not given, when the master consents to the ordination. There is no marvel then that, by reason of orders, clerics could be freed by ecclesiastical power from temporal jurisdiction; for lordship over a servant is greater in its kind than lordship over jurisdiction alone; and secular princes, especially the faithful, give their consent, whether expressly or tacitly, to such ordination; and the Church has the right not to give them ministry in spiritual things except as it were under this agreement and condition (which is most just) that they should enjoy the immunity that agrees with such a state; therefore rightly can the Pontiff by his sole authority confirm this immunity and oblige secular princes to the observance of it.

14. But because at the end of that argument it is said that it has the greatest force with respect to infidel princes, the addition must be made that even at the time of the infidel princes the Church was able, and is able even now, in kingdoms and provinces of infidel princes, wherein churches have been founded – able (I say) to concede, against the will of princes, this privilege to clerics. But the power must be distinguished from the fact, or the right from the use. For we are speaking about right and power, and we are resting on the same principle and on the reasons given. There is a declaration too, for above we said with St. Thomas that the Church can, on account of danger, exempt all the faithful from the power of infidels; therefore by greater reason it could exempt priests and clerics on account of reverence for the divine cult. For the power of the Pontiff, in order to its end, extends even over infidels, and therefore it has the right of instituting what pertains to the true cult of God and what is fitting and expedient for it, even against the will of infidel princes. Just as it could prescribe that secular courts not be set up in temples, even by secular magistrates, and has the right of coercing them, if it can, to the observance thereof. For as regards what pertains to the fact or the use, the Church cannot with fruit and effect use this power with infidel princes; because they do not recognize in the Pope a power in any way superior, nor can they be compelled by censures or by the spiritual sword; but to use the material sword of war is difficult or sometimes more hurtful, and therefore the Church could more easily dissemble itself at that time. But how it should behave now, or could behave, we shall inquire below.

15. To the first part of the confirmation, which was about the ancient use by prelates of the Church of requesting from the emperors either judgment in causes and controversies or the privilege of exemption for their clergy, the response can in the first place be made that it did perhaps have place at the beginning of the Church, because then the exemption of clerics had not been sufficiently introduced in use, or was not sufficiently known to an emperor recently converted to the faith, as Constantine was at the time of the Council of Nicea; and therefore then a bishop could willingly and not by compulsion have requested judgment from him. Or it can also be said that the bishops did not approach Constantine as a judge having jurisdiction over them, but either as a defender and protector, which is the office of an emperor, or certainly, which appears more likely, as an arbiter whom they voluntarily chose, because it was not then forbidden; but he himself, because of reverence for bishops, refused to accept that office. And for the same reason bishops could once have asked this privilege from the emperors, not because it did not by right belong to bishops themselves, but either because it was not permitted to them in fact, even by faithful magistrates, to whom then perhaps the right of clerics was not sufficiently known; or certainly it was from urbanity and to make the thing to be done more sweetly that they asked for the consent of the prince. And finally some emperors speak in this way in their laws, as if they were the authors of this privilege, because perhaps they so thought through ignorance, or to show that they were altogether renouncing their right and, as far as it was from them, giving it in such a way as if it depended on their sole will and power.

16. In the second part of the confirmation it is asked whether an infidel prince could be admitted to baptism who did not wish to permit the exemption of clerics in his kingdom, nay demanding under condition and agreement that he could not be deprived of such jurisdiction. On which point we say in the first place that even if we grant that the Pontiff can permit it in such a case, because it is not intrinsically evil, and accordingly such a prince can be disposed for faith and baptism, nevertheless it does not thence follow that this immunity depends per se and by right on the will of princes, but it only follows that the Pontiff can sometimes make dissemblance and not use his power for conceding or implementing such privilege in fact, on account of avoiding greater evils. But I add further that the condition is so unjust and contrary to divine right, whether immediately or at least indirectly, that it is not to be permitted, nor is baptism to be conceded to any prince under such an agreement. First because a Pope can never renounce the power that he has for conceding this privilege, or renounce the use of it, as often as he has judged it expedient for the universal Church or a particular church; but by that agreement he would seem to renounce this power, otherwise the condition would be frivolous and of none effect; therefore to allow it is never licit. Nay, although he may under that condition receive some prince into the Church, he would not afterwards be held to keep it, both because it would be against the good morals of the Church, and also because it was extorted by unjust force, as is the condition of paying usury in the case of loans.

17. Hence arises a second reason why this is not licit, namely that such a prince is indisposed to receive baptism, both because he sins gravely in imposing that force on the Church, and also because he seems to prefer his temporal status to baptism, since he does not wish to allow it unless such a condition has been conceded to him. And finally because, from the allowance of that condition in one kingdom, the Church could be troubled in other provinces already Catholic, and also, in the one that is newly converted, ecclesiastical immunity could never be conveniently introduced, and disturbances and scandals could always be feared. Wherefore, absolutely speaking, a condition of this sort seems unjust and in no way to be allowed, especially in an absolute way and without proposal of determination of time or other decent limit.

But if these things are true (as they really are) when the Church does not seem to have acquired right over a not yet baptized prince, assuredly for far greater reason such resistance is not to be permitted in a prince already faithful or baptized, who is subject to the Church and is bound to obey its just laws. Nor is it true that the condition is implicitly included in the voluntary reception of baptism; for since it is unjust and to be rejected if it is by chance expressed, how can it be implicitly included? The condition, therefore, that can be thought to be implicit is only that a temporal prince may not be deprived of his rights in all things that are not repugnant to faith and ecclesiastical obedience.

Chapter 12. Whether the privilege of forum for clerics is also founded on civil right.

Summary. 1. Sense of the question. 2. First conclusion. The exemption of clerics is also of divine right. By whom the aforesaid exemption was introduced. 3. Constantine conceded the exemption of clerics. 4. Constantius also conceded the same privileges to clerics. 5. The other emperors too confirmed the same exemption. Valentinianus deprived clerics of exemption. 6. Before Justinian the privilege of forum was conceded to clerics. 7. Justinian wished clerics to be judged by laymen in criminal matters. Whether the privilege of forum was restored by Charlemagne. 8. The privilege of forum in civil and criminal matters was very fully established by Frederick. In various civil laws too this privilege was introduced in Spain.

1. The sense of this title or question is to be taken from the doctrine of the preceding chapter; for we are not now asking whether the first origin or principle, or the necessary cause, of this privilege is civil law or will, or the donation of secular princes, but whether in fact it was introduced with their consent, or at least whether it is of civil right in the way it was possible or expedient for it to be, whatever that way ultimately is.

2. With this sense proposed, then, the assertion is certain, and has been received by common consent, that this privilege was also conceded by civil right, or by temporal princes, which is to be understood from the time that princes became Christians; for before then it is clear that infidel princes conceded no privilege to clerics; but as soon as the emperors began to be Christians they conceded immunity to clerics. Hence Constantine is first believed to have allowed this privilege (for no account is available about Philip because of his brief time). And some have said that at the time of the Pontiff Julius I Constantine gave assent to this privilege, as Almain reports on Sentences 4 d.25 q.1, whom he himself also follows; but it cannot be proved nor does it consist with the truth of the histories. For Constantine died at the beginning of the pontificate of Julius I; hence it is probable that those authors intended to speak about Constantius. But others consider that Constantine began this ecclesiastical privilege at the Council of Nicea, when he said to the bishops that they were to be judged by God alone; which is signified by Palatius on Sentences 4 d.25 disput.3. But in truth it is not collected from the words of Constantine that Constantine gave a new privilege but that he wished to compose and with a word put to rest the dissensions of the bishops by honoring them at the same time; or at least that he recognized in the bishops some immunity divinely conceded to their dignity.

3. Besides there is no doubt that Constantine conceded the privileges of immunity to clerics, for bk.1 Code 'De Episcop. et Cleric.' he exempted clerics and their property from new taxes and from being compelled to billet soldiers; which law is contained also in the Theodosian Code bk.16 l.8, but it is attributed to Constantine and these words are given to him which Justinian omits: "And if any of you wish to engage in business for the sake of maintenance, let him possess immunity." And in law 1 'De Lustral. Collat.' in the same Theodosian Code the same Constantine removes clerics from any tribute that was called 'lustral tribute', perhaps because it was required every 'lustrum' or every five years. See Gratian in ch. 'Generaliter' § Novarum, 16.9.1. Besides in law 1 'De Episcop. et Cleric.' in the same Theodosian Code the same Constantine confirms that "clerics may not be burdened, contrary to the privileges granted them, with nominations or undertakings," and he is speaking of nominations to secular public offices and of civil functions, from which he wished clerics to be immune, as he more clearly explains in law 2 of the same title; and he adds a reason saying: "lest, by the sacrilegious spite of certain people, they be called away from divine service." And a similar rescript of Constantine is reported in bk.10 Hist. ch.7 of Eusebius, whereby he wanted the clerics of the African province "to be immune and absolved altogether from all common and civil ministries of public affairs." See Nicephorus bk.7 ch.42 and Sozomen bk.1 ch.9. Now he adds a reason common to all clerics, "so that in no way by error or sacrilege and profane lapse, which is wont to occur in business of this sort, may they be drawn away from the cult due to the divine majesty." And the same Constantine supposes the same privilege and declares how it is to be kept in law 6 of the same title of the Theodosian Code.

But because in these laws no express mention is made of the privilege of forum, although it would seem to be connected with the others, law 7 is to be added from the same title and code wherein the same Constantine thus speaks: "Clerics who have been summoned to court by the injustice of heretics are to be absolved and are for the rest, in likeness with the East, not to be called into the courts, and are to possess the fullest immunity." Where one should notice that, although mention is made of heretics in the rescript, because the privilege was given on the occasion of the persecution of the Donatists, nevertheless the privilege itself was given absolutely, and the supposition is made that it was conceded before in the East and extension is being made to the Western Church. Nay, what is most to be noted, is that sometimes Constantine deferred so much to the judgment of the bishops that he allowed everyone, even laymen, to appeal in civil causes to the bishops, and he placed their sentences before those of the secular magistrates, as is clear from law 1 'De Episcopali Iudicio' in the Theodosian Code and from Sozomen bk.1 Histor. ch.9. See Baronius for the year of Christ 330 at the end.

4. Besides in the same Theodosian Code, title 'De Episcop. et Cleric.' are contained various laws of the emperor Constantine in which he concedes similar privileges to clerics; for in law 9 he exempts clerics from "curial duties and from all the worry of curial functions;" and in law 10 he conceded to them "immunity from the exaction of mean offices and from the expenses of business," which seems to have been exemption from paying tributes from the gains they were making by their own industry; for this he signifies in the reason that he adds when he says: "Since it is certain that the profits which they gather from stores and workshops will be to the advantage of the poor." And the addition is made: "Let the exaction of feudal services also in like manner cease," and later: "We order them also to remain immune from the census." And likewise in law 11 he exempts clerics from "curial functions." But he adds a restriction worthy of note when he says: "clerics who possess nothing at all and have no profit from an inheritance," because perhaps clerics were then professing that status.

However, in these laws the privilege of the forum is not sufficiently explicated, although sometimes it seems to be insinuated by the general words. But in law 12 the same emperor forbids "bishops to be accused in public courts, lest," he says, "the minds of officials have means free to accuse them;" and therefore he subjoins, "the causes of bishops are to be heard before bishops." Baronius also conjectures that Constantius conceded this privilege on the petition of Hilary, who, in his book to the same, whose beginning is 'Your beneficent nature', speaks thus: "May your clemency see to it and decree that judges do not hereafter make presumption and usurpation and suppose that the causes of clerics belong to their cognizance, etc." where I weigh the words 'presumption' and 'usurpation', by which he seemed to be demanding that a privilege not so much new as ancient not be violated. And thus Constantius confirmed an ancient privilege rather than conceded a new one; and in the same way in law 13 of the same title he confirms, together with Julian, the privileges conceded to the clerics of the city of Rome, and in law 14 in the same place he confirms the clerical exemptions from taxes conceded by Constantine.

5. Besides, this immunity was confirmed by later emperors, although sometimes they tried to restrict or change it. And indeed Valentinian I, as St. Ambrose reports bk.2 epist.13, elsewhere epist.32, "not only responded in word but also ratified by his laws that, in a cause of the faith or of any ecclesiastical order, he ought to judge it who is neither unequal in function nor dissimilar in right. For these are the words of the rescript," says Ambrose, "that is, he wished priests to judge priests. Moreover, if also elsewhere a bishop was accused, and a cause of morals was needing to be examined, he wished this cause as well to belong to the Episcopal court." But afterwards, because many were, for the sake of avoiding official cares and obtaining the Church's privileges, becoming clerics, the same Valentinian in 'De Episcop. et Cler.' decided that only he who had continued in the clerical state for ten years might acquire the immunities of clerics, as is gathered from law 19 ‘De Episcop. et Cler.’ in the Theodosian Code. Later, however, Gratian in the last law of ‘De Episcop. Iudic.’ established “that clerics are not to be dragged into secular courts.” And next Honorius restored absolutely to clerics the same privilege of the forum, as is clear from law 41 ‘De Episcop. et Cler.’ in the Theodosian Code, when he says about the causes of clerics: “Only bishops should hear causes of this sort, carried out on the evidence of many witnesses;” and in laws 29, 30, & 38 he confirms all the privileges conceded to clerics by his predecessors, among which without doubt the privilege of the forum is contained. It is also more expressly collected from laws 45, 46, & 47 of the same title. Whence, that the same privilege was preserved under Theodosius the Younger, can be collected from epist. 54 of Augustine, whose words we will report a little later. But afterwards Valentinian III altogether deprived clerics of the privilege of the forum, as is clear from the book of his Novellae title 12.

Again Baronius reports for the year 455 n. 25 that Marcian, the successor of Valentinian, restored ecclesiastical persons to their ancient liberty, having revoked the laws against it promulgated by his predecessors; he only alleges, however, the novella of the same emperor, which is the last in bk. 3 of the Novellae in the Theodosian Code, and in the law ‘Generalis’ in the Code ‘De Sacros. Eccles.’ But therein are only revoked the laws by which clerics were forbidden to take anything left in a will from widows, but about the privilege of the forum nothing is there read. But in a certain scholium to the novella of Valentinian it is noted that the revocation of the privilege was retracted by the Augustus Maiorianus, which fact is also noted by Baronius for the year of Christ 452 n. 22, where he says: “These things were indeed basely promulgated by Valentinian at Rome, but with what injustice and impiety was demonstrated by the ordinance passed against them by his successor Maiorianus.” But these authors do not report the ordinance of Maiorianus, nor is it contained among his novellas which are found, after the Theodosian Code, in bk. 4 of his Novellae. Nor do I find, from that time up to Justinian, anything more clearly established about the status of this privilege that I can affirm with certainty.

6. Now from what has been said the falsehood has been plainly exposed that certain supporters of schismatics have at this time been saying, that the distinction of forum between ecclesiastics and laity did not exist in the Church before Justinian. For it is shown from what was said that several emperors conceded or allowed this distinction of forum, as we have shown about Constantine, Honorius, and Valentinian I. Again, much older than Justinian, is that grave opinion of Ambrose at the Council of Aquileia, that “laymen should not judge priests but rather priests laymen;” which is also contained in the said epist. 13 to the Augustus Valentinian, and therein the distinction of forum is signified. It is also supposed by Augustine in epist. 53 to Macedonius, Proconsul and secular judge, who, when he asked Augustine why priests were interceding for defendants in the secular forum, received reply in turn from Augustine himself: “I know that you yourself along with your friends in the Church at Carthage have interceded for the clergy against whom the bishop was rightly angry, and certainly there was in the unbloody discipline there no fear of risk of blood.” In which words he openly supposes and declares the distinction of forum that was already then in use. Nay rather, the 2nd Council of Macon ch. 9 asserted that this distinction “was introduced almost at the beginning of Christianity by intervention not only of the canons but also of the laws.”

7. Justinian, therefore, was not the author of the distinction of the ecclesiastical forum from the secular, nor was he himself the first to concede the privilege of forum to clerics. Nay rather, although he seemed to concede or to renew the ancient privileges about this forum, yet he limited them to civil causes. For in criminal causes, when the crimes were not ecclesiastical but common, as theft, murder, etc., he wanted clerics to be judged and punished by laymen, as is clear from novella 83, otherwise Authentica ‘Ut clerici apud proprios episcopos, etc.’ and from Authentica ‘Cassa’ and Authentica ‘Clericus’, Code ‘De Episcop. et Cleric.’ But some think that the privilege of forum was again fully restored by Charlemagne in a certain law by which he renewed another law of Constantine and of Theodosius, which we reported above, whereby it was established that all causes even of laymen might be ended by the sentence of bishops, as Gratian reports in ch. ‘Omnes’ 11 q.1, and Baronius more extensively vol.9 for the year 801 near the middle. But, in the first place, that law did not speak about criminal causes but civil, for it would be very foreign to the Episcopal office to give sentence in the criminal causes of laymen. Next, by that law the privilege of forum was not conceded to clerics but rather the opportunity was given to laymen to enable them to treat and settle their own civil causes before bishops. Lastly, this very privilege was either not accepted or certainly did not last long but was abrogated in use, as is noted by the Gloss, Hugo, Torquemada, and other doctors in the said ch. ‘Omnes’ and ch. ‘Quicumque’ 11 q.1, and more broadly by the Gloss on ch. ‘Relatum’, same cause and question. Wherefore although it is clear from the histories that Charlemagne conferred many benefits and privileges on clerics and priests, yet whether he established something singular about the privilege of forum I do not find written down, nor about the other emperors who were after him up to Frederick II.

8. Now this Frederick under Honorius III conferred on clerics the fullest privilege of forum in both criminal and civil causes, as is clear from his constitution which is contained in the volume after the books of fiefs, and from the Authentica ‘Statuimus’ in the Code ‘De Episcop. et Cleric.’, from the Authentica ‘Cassa’ Code ‘De Sacrosanct. Eccles.’ Which laws were accepted by the Pope at the end of the said constitution in this words: “We Bishop Honorius, servant of the servants of God, give to these laws, published for the utility of all Christians by Frederick, emperor of the Romans our most dear son, praise, approval, and confirmation as eternally valid for the future.” And this right was thus received in the whole Christian world, from which it is sufficiently clear that this privilege was confirmed by common civil right. It was also imitated by the laws of particular kingdoms, especially of Spain, both in its more ancient laws, Partita Prima title 6 law 51 and following, and in its new compilation, bk.1 title 3 from the beginning, especially laws 11 and 12, and of Lusitania, bk.2 of Ordinances, over various laws; and we judge the same of the laws of other Catholic kingdoms.

Chapter 13. A difficulty that arises from the preceding chapter is met, and how the Church has used the privilege of forum at different times is explained.

Summary. 1. First doubt about the use of the privilege of forum. Reasons for doubting. 2. Second doubt: whether clerics were by imperial power exempt. Reason for doubting on the negative side. 3. Reason on the affirmative side. 4. For the resolution, two periods of time are distinguished. 5. First conclusion. 6. In the use of the privilege of forum the Church has always acted prudently. 7. Heathen princes never had true jurisdiction over clerics. 8. Clerics, from among the other faithful, always enjoyed the privilege of forum.

9. The opinion of the Fathers who understand the place of Paul about elders is not opposed to the resolution already delivered. 10. The Church could always have compelled the faithful to keep the exemption of clerics. 11. Second conclusion: Clerics under the Christian emperors began to enjoy exemption. Proof. 12. The reasons for doubting posited in the first doubt are solved. 13. Satisfaction is made to the reasons posited in the second doubt. 14. A certain evasion is precluded. 15. The deed of Charles V.

1. From what has been said in the preceding chapter a doubt arises about the use of this privilege of forum, for it seems to follow that either the Church did not use this privilege fully and constantly before the times of Frederick II, or that at many times it observed it against the opposition of the emperors; but the first seems to be a considerable inconvenience while the second is difficult to believe; what then is to be said of the antiquity and manner of the use? For the fact that the Pastors of the Church did not exercise this privilege against the will of the emperors, but dissembled and yielded to their will and power, can be concluded both because, in their decrees, they frequently allege the consent of emperors and kings or the agreement of civil rights; and also because we do not read that they fulminated their censures against any emperor who, before Frederick II, took away the privilege of forum either altogether or from a part of the clergy, as we reported about Valentinian and Justinian. Nay, the emperors themselves, who seem to have very much favored clerics in this privilege, sometimes assumed, even at the request of the very bishops and clerics, this jurisdiction in some causes, and the Pontiffs did not resist them but seemed rather, by seeing it and keeping silent, to give their consent.

2. And hence arises another difficulty which Barclay, ch.35 in Bellarmine, has touched on, because although many emperors conceded to clerics this exemption from their courts and magistrates, yet we do not read that they exempted them from their own proper and imperial power. For never did they make it clear, which however would seem necessary in so special a privilege. And they showed the opposite in their deeds, as I said. He himself also alleges the modern deed of Charles V who ordered Herman, Archbishop of Cologne, to be summoned to court before him, so as to clear himself of certain crimes objected against him. He might also allege the difficult words of Justinian in Authentica 'Nullus Episcopus' Code 'De Episco. et Cleric.' which read thus: "Let no bishop be brought or produced before a civil or military judge in any cause unless the prince commands." Where it is clear that exemption from inferiors, not from the prince himself, was conceded. And the same can be taken from Authentica 'Sed Hodie' under the same title, at the place: "Except when they are, by order of the prince, called to other provinces."

3. But there is to the contrary, first, that this is repugnant to the many Councils asserting that this immunity is very ancient and was observed from the beginning of Christianity. The fact is also proved by reason, because it seems incredible that the Church lacked for so long a time a use and observance of immunity absolutely necessary for the good of religion and the decency of the ecclesiastical state. Especially since it is proper and immediately of divine right, or at least so close to it that the right cannot be kept without it. Second, because it would hence follow that even now clerics do not enjoy complete exemption, because they will at least be subject to the jurisdiction of the emperor, of kings, and of all supreme princes, because neither did Frederick II agree to this exemption in any other way than his predecessors did, but “he renewed, restored, and ordered to be kept” what they themselves did; the other emperors and kings too after Frederick did not renounce more of their jurisdiction; but the consequent is an intolerable error, although Barclay insolently allows it.

4. On this point two periods of time must be briefly distinguished, one is from the beginning of the Church up to Constantine when temporal princes were heathen, the other is from Constantine up to Frederick II; but we omit the third time from Frederick up to our times, because about these four hundred years there is no doubt but that the Catholic Church fully and wholly kept this privilege without the contradiction of any Christian prince who was not held to be a heretic or schismatic. In addition, about the two first times, the other distinction given above must be passed over, about the right of using this privilege and about the fact of it or the effective use itself thereof; for often the one who has a privilege does not use it, although he might by right do so, because he is not able to do so in fact. But this inability in fact can exist either in individual private ecclesiastical persons, if they are compelled to attend secular courts, or in the Supreme Pontiff, if he cannot resist with effect or fruit the secular power that is inflicting this violence.

5. About the first time, then, we must say that this privilege could not have been fully observed or vindicated by the Church, not from defect of right, but from defect of capability in fact or from executive defect (so to say). This assertion was insinuated above and has, as to the first part about the right, been sufficiently proved, because this privilege was both immediately conceded by divine right and, had it not been, power was given to the Church, and obligation imposed on it, to introduce it. But a difference is to be noted between these two modes whereby this privilege could be by divine right, because in accord with them there can also be distinguished a double mode of having the right in respect of this privilege. For in the first way the right will exist in fact with respect to clerics all and singular; but in the second way it will exist only as a right to the fact. For if the privilege was conceded by Christ in the first way, all clerics at any time whatever were actually exempt from the jurisdiction of heathen princes, and this we call a right in fact, and consequently princes were also deprived of jurisdiction over clerics, because these two things are connected. From which it also follows that clerics at that time could in conscience have disobeyed the laws or pronouncements of heathen princes or judges, and, if they were coerced by them, could have repelled force with force, had they the power and strength; because if infidels did not have jurisdiction over them, clerics were suffering injury at their hands and were in conscience not bound to put up with it, save perhaps for avoiding scandal or some other like extrinsic reason.

But if however the privilege exists only in the second way, that is, it was conceded through the Pontiffs in force of their power and the precept of divine right, clerics thus had at that first time only a certain right to the privilege but did not during it have the right, because they were not actually exempt until the Church instituted it or actually conceded it. And consequently infidel princes were not at that time deprived of their own jurisdiction which they had over the persons of clerics, because we do not read that the Church at that time used the power or the right which it had to exempt clerics, or to deprive princes of jurisdiction over them. Hence further it happens that clerics were at that time obliged in conscience to obey the laws and the pronouncements of magistrates even of heathen ones, because they proceeded from true jurisdiction. And for the same reason they were bound to be subject to their coercive force, if they used it justly in any way.

6. Now between these two ways of explaining this right, although the first is more probable, yet in each is very well made plain that the custom which the Church kept in the use of such privilege was always in conformity with reason and the prudent government of the Church. For although the Pontiffs had at that time the power and the precept to exempt clerics altogether from the jurisdiction of secular princes, yet they were acting prudently in not using that power, because it was not expedient for the Church, for they would be attempting it without fruit, and with scandal and impediment to the faith; and for that reason they were not transgressing divine right, because the precept was an affirmative one, whose nature it is not to be obligatory for every time, and so it did not oblige at that time. And likewise although the privilege of forum were conceded immediately by Christ in the first way, the very probable and prudent explanation is that it was given with such a dependence on the Pastor and Governor of the Church that, without his consent and determination, it was not licit for individual private persons to use the privilege according to their own choice. For this dependence cannot be denied, as I already said, both because it is proved by use and experience itself, and also because it was very necessary for the peace and good governance of the Church. Hence it happens that one must absolutely say that clerics could not at that time in conscience resist the jurisdiction of secular princes, because the Church had declared or established nothing on the matter, and, besides, those princes were using their right as something judged to be in good faith, although they were otherwise infidels. And this way of explaining this right is conformable to Paul in Romans 13, and to the opinions of the Fathers, especially of Chrysostom and of the Greeks when they are expounding Paul.

7. From which one may conclude whether it should be said that clerics at that time were by right exempt, although they were not in fact, and (which is the same) were subject to the jurisdiction of princes in fact, not by right, and thereupon by usurped, not true, judgment; or whether they were rather in some way truly and rightly subject. For I think it should be said that clerics were, on their own part, by right exempt, because they enjoyed this privilege by divine right, as was said. And consequently secular heathen princes did not have proper jurisdiction over them; they could, however, have been excused from formal tyranny by ignorance. And nevertheless, for avoiding greater evils and lest a just war be by ignorance allowed to each side, the pastors of the Church then permitted ecclesiastical persons to obey temporal kings and magistrates; they also wanted them to be held as legitimate judges and superiors in temporal and honorable affairs; because it was a lesser evil to tolerate them, and as it were to commit to them office in their own stead, than either to disturb the ecclesiastical state or to leave clerics without legitimate judges in actual use. In this way, therefore, notwithstanding the immunity conceded to clerics by divine right, they could at that time be judged by laymen, not by a specially usurped right but by a true right, if the cause was otherwise a temporal one and was handled legitimately.

8. But there must further be added that clerics at that time did in some way have the use of this privilege within the Church itself in regard to the other faithful, the Church so disposing, as far as the state of the time permitted. The proof and the declaration are after this manner; that always the Church forbade the faithful to draw clerics before lay judges but before the ecclesiastical forum. Which law we find was passed, not only by many Councils that met after the times of Christian princes and that were mentioned at the end of chapter 3, but also by several of the older Pontiffs, especially by Alexander, Caius, and Marcellinus in their decretal epistles, which I cited in the same place. For although at that time infidel princes were exercising their jurisdiction, and therefore their magistrates could be true judges in the causes of clerics after the manner declared, and a cleric accused or cited before an infidel lay judge would be held to appear at the command of such a judge, nevertheless the Church could set up an Episcopal forum wherein the causes of clerics, as far as was possible on the part of the Church, would be dealt with. For it always had both the power for this purpose given by Christ and the opportunity to exercise it. And therefore from the time of the apostles it already had the use of it, and it is openly taken from the verse of 1 Timothy 5.19: "Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses;" which words suppose that already then an Episcopal tribunal for judging the causes of clerics had been set up.

9. One must also carefully consider that Paul does not speak of ecclesiastical causes but of complaints against clerics in criminal causes; for an accusation is proper in those; and since Paul speaks indefinitely and simply, his opinion is not restricted to ecclesiastical crimes; about any crime at all, therefore, could and should an elder then be accused in an ecclesiastical tribunal. Nor does it matter that Chrysostom, Theophylact, and the Greeks apply the word 'presbyter [elder]' not to the dignity of the priest but to the time of old age. This, I say, is not an obstacle; both because in that sense an ecclesiastical tribunal is proved from that place for the causes of the faithful, and with greater reason for the causes of clerics, for these could not be of a worse condition if the others were allowed, which fact we are not now examining because it is of little importance for the present cause. And also because the more probable exposition is that of Ambrose, if the commentaries are his, and of Jerome, with the same correction, of Anselm, of St. Thomas, and the Latins who interpret that place as about priests. For Paul was speaking about them in the words that immediately precede, when he says, v.17: "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine;" and immediately he subjoins, v.19: "Against an elder receive not an accusation, etc." There was also greater reason to set up an ecclesiastical tribunal for clerics than for other faithful older laymen, because clerics are under the care and governance of prelates by a more special reason than are the common people of the faithful, for the reason that they are more especially dedicated to ecclesiastical ministries, as was said. And in this way there was from the beginning of the Church some discrimination of the ecclesiastical forum from the civil, not only for ecclesiastical causes, but even for others, and for the crimes at least of clerics, as was also noted above.

10. With this distinction supposed, then, the Church could at that time very well forbid clerics to be accused or brought before the tribunals of laymen by other clerics or by the faithful. For although it could not forbid this to infidels, among whom the faithful were then living, because they were not subject to the Church, nor was it able to compel them, and thus they could start a suit or an accusation before their own judge, whom alone they recognized to be legitimate; nevertheless the Church could prescribe to the subject faithful that, if they wished to accuse a presbyter, they should do it in an ecclesiastical tribunal, because thus was it very fitting and necessary for preserving divine right and for the honor of the Christian religion and the decency of the ecclesiastical state, which at all times, as far as the condition and state of the time allowed, the prelates of the Church were bound to provide for.

But the prohibition was just at that time, because although secular princes were exercising their jurisdiction, their faithful subjects were not held in any way to start an accusation or a suit before them, but were able to settle their own controversies or suits in any honorable way; therefore could the Church licitly and prudently forestall and bid the faithful to proceed against a cleric in an ecclesiastical and not in a secular court, and consequently could even gravely punish with ecclesiastical censures transgressors of this precept. Most of all, indeed, because although by this precept causes of this sort were in some way removed from lay judges and their jurisdiction was in part impeded, or taken away, it was altogether licit by force of divine privilege; but also because it fell at least indirectly under the spiritual power of the Church, because of the good of religion and the supernatural end; and the use of such power it could then exercise without scandal to the faithful, or impediment or disturbance to the faith. Rightly, therefore, did the Church thus forbid in fact, as it could by right, clerics to be brought before secular tribunals. The fact is confirmed by Pope Alexander, because if Paul prescribed (1 Corinthians 6) the causes of Christians to be brought before churches and there concluded, the Pontiffs too could prescribe priests to be accused before bishops alone; which argument is also used by the 3rd Council of Carthage ch.9, and about it St. Thomas on the place from Paul can be looked at.

Thus therefore did the Church at that time, in the way it could, begin to rescue clerics from the court of seculars, and in the same way it began to guard their immunity, not indeed fully and in every part, because then it was not opportune, but, as I said, as much as it could on the part of the faithful. Hence rightly could that prohibition be called a certain privilege of forum for clerics, just as the prohibition under special censure against anyone daring to lay violent hands on a cleric is a great privilege for clerics, which is called a prohibition of the canon. For just as this prohibition of the canon was made for the sake of the ecclesiastical state, so also was the ancient prohibition put in place that clerics, as sacred and religious things, should be reserved also for a certain sacred court, as far as it could be done. This privilege was also increased at that time by another ecclesiastical law, whereby it was conceded to clerics that they could not be accused by laymen but only by clerics, or conversely laymen were prohibited from daring to accuse clerics; about which prohibition many decrees are reported by Gratian 2 q.7, of which the more ancient are those of Evaristus in epist.2, of Fabian epist.1 & 2, of Eusebius epist. 1 & 2. However this prohibition was afterwards made more plain or limited, as can be seen in the whole of that question. And these remarks are sufficient for the first period of time.

11. About the second period of time one must say that, almost from the beginning of the Christian emperors, clerics were exempt from the secular forum, both by a proper right that was also really obtained through a privilege actually conceded, and also in fact, except when they were prevented or coerced by injury or tyranny. This assertion can easily be proved from what was said in the preceding chapter. And the first part is indeed well known because this privilege was conferred immediately by Christ himself. Nay, although some application by the Pontiff was necessary, it could be proved in this way. For the Church or the Pontiffs always wanted, insofar as was in them, to preserve this immunity of clerics, because they were held to it by divine law, and because it was most fitting for the good of religion; but, in the time of the heathen princes, they could not try to accomplish it because of their lack of ability; therefore, by the very fact that Christian princes readily submitted themselves to this immunity, Pontiffs introduced the use of it and perfectly established it. But we showed that Constantine, when he became a Christian, either acknowledged and allowed this immunity, or, if there was need, donated it; therefore at once too the Pastors of the Church both accepted the donation and, if anything more was necessary on their own part, added it; therefore, from then on clerics began to have not only the right to immunity but also the privilege itself and the actually conceded use of it.

Hence the second part of the assertion is easily proved, because as the observance of this privilege was not only introduced in right but also in fact, only the consent and authority of Christian princes was wanted; but Constantine, as we said, at once provided his consent, and established by his authority that it should be entrusted to execution; therefore nothing could stand in the way to prevent this immunity from being entrusted to execution in fact and in use. The same is also to be believed of the others who, together with succeeding Constantine in the empire, succeeded him in faith and piety, with a few exceptions who, either through ignorance or ambition, attempted something contrary to this immunity. Which fact is sufficiently confirmed by the rest of the things that we adduced about the other emperors up to Frederick. And in the said title 'De Episcopis et Clericis' many laws of the emperors are found wherein civil magistrates are rebuked who did something against this immunity of clerics, and if any contrary customs were little by little introduced they were reprov'd and retracted; therefore here is a sign that, ordinarily and with just judges, the exemption was also preserved in fact. Hence the emperor Frederick, who confirmed it more clearly and generally, did not decree it as a new thing but as already made firm "by imperial and canonical sanctions," and therefore in the cited law he established that none should presume to bring a cleric into a secular court "against," he says, "the imperial and canonical sanctions;" therefore already before that fact it was presumptuous and unjust, and thereupon the contrary was legitimate and obligatory at that time.

And hence the last part of the assertion openly follows. For as to what concerns use, we cannot deny that, in the course of those times, many things were done and attempted against this immunity, not only by inferior magistrates, but also by the emperors themselves; but it is not licit thence to infer that those deeds were either valid or licit, for secular judges are hostile to clerics, as is said of laymen in ch. 'Laici', together with similar ones, 2 q.7. They also always study to increase their jurisdiction, either from their own human ambition or from desire to please temporal princes, or sometimes indeed from zeal for justice, but not according to knowledge. Whatever, therefore, was done at that time against the immunity by any Christian magistrate or prince was no less unjust and tyrannical than what in later times up to the present day has been or is being done. Because, after the privilege of exemption was conceded and established, whatever is done contrary to it is a work of usurped jurisdiction and power and thereupon unjust and tyrannical. And in this order must be put any retraction of previously conceded privilege whatever that has been done by secular power, even imperial power, because an emperor cannot take away what Christ has given either immediately of himself or through his Vicar. Nor does it matter that the privilege was not given without the consent of the emperor, because that consent was not the proper and per se cause of such privilege, nay was not even a condition simply necessary for its worth, but it was waited on for the use only by the kind and prudent providence of the Church; and therefore a retraction of that consent following afterwards cannot taken away or change the privilege. Nay, although this privilege were principally given by the emperors, it could not afterwards be revoked by them, as I will show more at length below.

Wherefore, notwithstanding the revocation made by Valentinian or anyone else, this part of the assertion always had place and truth, because all the things which were at that time done afterwards were unjust and tyrannical; because the privilege to which they were contrary always subsisted, and because, since its revocation was made by tyranny, whatever was done in virtue of it participated in the same iniquity. But I speak always of the deed itself considered in itself, not of the persons, who perhaps could sometimes be excused by ignorance. For certainly the emperors at that time do not seem to have known the proper origin and excellence of this privilege; for that is why they so speak of it as if it were a proper gift of the emperors themselves, dependent, that is, on their decision; and so some of them, by human ignorance and without heresy, could think that they were able to take away a privilege once given. But however it may be with their guilt or excuse, the deed itself considered in itself was unjust and of no worth or efficacy. And therefore the Fathers of the Council of Anjou, who gathered in Gaul after the revocation was made by Valentinian III, took no account of the law of Valentinian and, for the defense of immunity, established that it was not licit for clerics to resist the Episcopal court nor, without consulting the priests, to seek out the courts of seculars, as Baronius reports for the year 453 n.3, for that Council is not contained in the volumes of the Councils. Also the Council of Chalcedon, which was celebrated immediately after Valentinian III, similarly prescribes, ch.9, that the distinction of forum is to be kept by clerics. And although this Council seems to prescribe to priests alone that they are not to go before secular judges, nevertheless the 1st Council of Macon, celebrated a hundred and thirty years later, made disposition, ch.7, that even judges who presumed to judge clerics should be kept away from the doors of the Church. From which is sufficiently understood that the revocation was reckoned by the Fathers of the Church to be of no worth or moment. Which fact afterwards the emperors too understood better, and therefore they restored ecclesiastical immunity to its former state.

12. To the first difficulty, then, posited at the beginning the response is easy; for we say that the Church always used the ecclesiastical forum for its clerics, but could not always equally exempt them from the secular forum, because at the time of the infidel emperors, as I said, it did not exercise immunity with respect to them; because, although this could not be done without disadvantage, it was patiently to be endured, because it could not be avoided without greater disadvantage, or at least because it could not simply and effectively be delivered to execution. But after the times of the Christian emperors the Church always retained its privilege intact; but, at the beginning, it waited on the consent of the Christian emperor for the use of it, so that the thing might be done more sweetly and effectively in imitation of divine wisdom and prudence. And for the same cause the Pontiffs in their decrees allege the consent of the civil laws. And for the same cause, although some emperors turned their back on it in those ancient times and did something contrary to this immunity, they were not at once condemned or punished by the Pontiffs, because the right and foundation of the exemption was not yet sufficiently known and explained to them, nor perhaps were they then capable of it; and therefore they could not be forcefully coerced without greater loss, but the Fathers judged it more opportune sometimes to make some dissemblance and teach the truth and introduce the use of immunity little by little. But never did the bishops or Pontiffs require secular judgment from the emperors in ecclesiastical or clerical causes, unless perhaps they were heretics or schismatics; but Catholics only interposed the authority of the emperors for obtaining, without impediment, a legitimate and ecclesiastical judgment. Which fact is rightly explained in few words in the Council of Milevis, ch.19 'Placuit' 11 q.1: "It has been found pleasing that anyone who has sought from the emperor the cognizance of public judgments should be deprived of his proper honor. But if an Episcopal judgment is required by the emperor, nothing prevents it." And the same is declared in the 3rd Council of Carthage ch.38, and it is contained in ch. 'Petimus' 11 q.1; and something similar is contained in the same place in the following chapter, and it is taken from the chapter 'Christianis' 11 q.1, which is from Pope Gelasius writing to a certain count that he should protect certain clerics from the violence of a certain secular prince: "Let them be fortified," he says, "by the protection of your Sublimity." On which matter can also be seen epist.68 of Augustine.

13. To the second difficulty, which Barclay started, the response is that, although perhaps some emperors, through ignorance or error, so understood the privilege that they did not think clerics were exempted by it from their own supreme power, nevertheless they were deceived, because the Church has otherwise introduced or declared this exemption. For, in the said ch. 'Placuit' just cited, the Council of Milevis expressly said that the judgment of clerics cannot be asked for "even from the emperor," and in the said ch. 'Christianis' Pope Gelasius considers it to be against ecclesiastical immunity that a proceeding is made "by royal authority" against a cleric; and Pope Gregory, bk.4 epist.31, otherwise ch.75, writes to the emperor Maurice: "Let not lordship over clerics by earthly power be such that it does not devote due reverence to them." Where he tacitly rebukes him, since at that time he was studying to exercise tyrannical empire over priests, as Gregory himself complains of on the 4th Penitential Psalm (as I reported above), but he speaks moderately to him lest perhaps he be provoked to greater savagery. He did not, however, omit to propose to him the example of Constantine, who responded to the bishops where they were disagreeing among themselves: "Go and discuss among yourselves, because it is not proper for us to judge Gods." Besides in many other decrees it is said absolutely that laymen do not have any jurisdiction over clerics, as is expressly said in the Council of Constance sess.31 and the Lateran Council under Leo X sess.9 and in others that we referred to above; but it is manifest that under the name of laymen emperors too are included, for since they are not clerics they are assuredly laymen.

14. Next, even the emperors themselves, although they do not speak about themselves in particular, yet often speak generally and with so much evidence that they signify the same sense. For Constantine in the said law 7 of the Theodosian Code 'De Episcop. et Cleric.' determined that clerics in the West as in the East "should possess the fullest immunity;" and Theodosius in the last law of the same title confirms this privilege and says that the causes of clerics are reserved "to the audience of the bishop;" they are therefore exempt from every lay audience, even the imperial one. Nor can it be said that this is only understood of the first instance, but that by way of appeal it was always licit to call upon the emperor; for this is both gratuitously said and has a proof of its falsity; both because never in the Church was appeal made from the bishops to the emperor, but either to the metropolitans, or to the patriarchs, or ultimately to the Supreme Pontiff, as is expressly handed down in the Council of Chalcedon ch.9; but from the Supreme Pontiff it was never licit to appeal to another tribunal, whether ecclesiastical or lay, as Pope Gelasius said to the bishops of Dardania and to Faustus, and as is handed down by the Council of Sardica canons 4 & 7, and by many other decrees of the Pontiffs and Councils which we reported in the previous book to prove the supreme authority of the Pontiff. Therefore the causes of clerics, by the very fact that they are reserved to bishops, are to be concluded within the ecclesiastical forum, and so they are set up outside every lay forum, right up to the very tribunal of the emperor. And certainly the reason rendered by that last law makes this sufficiently firm: “For it is not right,” it says, “that the ministers of divine office should be subject to the decision of temporal powers;” for assuredly the imperial power is also a temporal power; therefore it too is comprehended under the indefinite term, which is equivalent to a universal. And lastly in the same way, by an indefinite and general locution, the same privilege was conceded by Frederick II and confirmed by Honorius III.

15. But as for the deeds of emperors that are alleged, or can be alleged, to the contrary, we reply in general that perhaps many of them were not exercises of an act or jurisdiction but of intercession or assistance, which the secular arm is wont to grant to the ecclesiastical, as we said above about Constantine and others. Or certainly they could sometimes be excused because they were not giving judgment by their own authority, but on petition of the prelates themselves and as a sort of arbiter between them, or rather they were composing quarrels; and then if any of these deeds could not be excused even by other reasons, one must reply that they went too far in usurping jurisdiction, as Gregory cited a little before said about Maurice, and as we have already said about Valentinian III, and as Baronius shows at large for the years 452 and 453. Now as to the very recent deed of Charles V, whom we know to have been a signal protector and observer of ecclesiastical liberty, we reply that Charles could have summoned the Archbishop Herman to him, not as Archbishop, but as a prince of the empire. Again that he could have issued the summons not as judge but as protector of the clergy and of the academy of Cologne. For Surius, who reports that deed for the year 1545 in his commentary, says at the same time: “In the month of June of this year Caesar received under his patronage the clergy and academy of Cologne.” In order therefore to protect the afflicted, he could summon the bishop so as to discern the truth and avoid harms to the Church, until the Pope should draw the cause to himself; which he did do a little later, in the following month of July, by citing Herman, whom afterwards the Pontiff even deposed, with the cooperation of Charles, as the same author reports at the beginning of the year 1547. Lastly as to the words of Justinian in those Authentics I find nothing said by the Glosses or by the jurists; but it does seem to me that he went to excess in fashioning laws about ecclesiastical matters, and did not hold the force and origin of ecclesiastical immunity with sufficiently clarity, and so he made many dispositions about it through error and without legitimate power, as was already touched on above, and as will occur time and time again in what follows.

Chapter 14. What sort of exemption there is for clerics in civil causes.

Summary. 1. Formal cause of the privilege of forum. The material of the privilege of forum is double. 2. First conclusion: clerics in civil causes are exempt from the secular court. 3. Proof also by reason. 4. Clerics enjoy the aforesaid exemption only when they are defendants. 5. Whether the Church could concede the privilege of forum without limitation. First reason for the negative side. 6. Triple confirmation. 7. Second conclusion: The Church could exempt also a cleric who is a plaintiff. 8. Proof. 9. The contrary reasons are solved. 10. To the doctrine of Bartolus. 11. Whether the rule put in the preceding paragraph allows an exception to the privilege of forum. First exception. It is rejected. 12. Second exception. 13. Third exception. 14. Fourth exception. 15. He who unjustly seizes the goods of the Church ought to be arraigned before an ecclesiastical judge. A certain objection is refuted. 16. Fifth exception. 17. By no custom can a defendant cleric be brought before a secular court. 18. Sixth exception. It is made plain. 19. Whether, because of the negligence of the ecclesiastical judge, a defendant cleric can be brought before a secular court. Reason for doubt. 20. The doubt is refuted. 21. Why the negligence of a secular judge can be supplied by an ecclesiastical judge but not conversely. The rights adduced to the contrary are expounded.

1. Hitherto we have only shown that the immunity of clerics is fitting to them, or that the privilege of forum was conceded to them, and we have at the same time explained the origin of this privilege; and by giving the reason for it we have made plain the efficient and final cause of the same privilege; it consequently follows, therefore, that we should explain what this privilege is; which cannot be done except by inquiring what is conferred by a privilege of this sort; for the whole reason and essence of any privilege whatever consists in the right or power which is given by it according to its general idea; but the species is taken from the matter in which or about which it revolves. And thus also it will happen that whatever could be desired about the cause as the material cause of this privilege will be explained at the same time. For about the formal cause, indeed, there is nothing for us to say, because the liberty or immunity is itself as it were the moral or internal form, wherein the privilege itself consists; but the external form is nothing other than the concession itself which is done by the words of Scripture or of the canons; which words have been rather often dealt with and weighed in what we have said hitherto and in the course of the whole book. On the matter, then, most depends knowledge of the immunity, but this matter can be distinguished into two members: in one are contained the things, the actions or passions, or the functions and other like things from which exemption is given; under the other are included the persons to whom this exemption is given. We must, then, speak about them individually, and thus we will explain not only the essence and causes but also at the same time the effects of this privilege.

2. The first, then, and so to say most ancient matter of this privilege is the civil forum or the secular tribunal, wherein temporal lawsuits pertaining to the external goods of fortune are handled. It is certain, therefore, that clerics are exempt from the secular forum in civil causes. The proof is first from canon right ch.2 De Foro Compet. where the discussion is in general terms; just as also 11 q.1 ch.1 & 3 with many others similarly gives prescription indefinitely, that clerics are not to be brought before secular courts, and in the chapter 'Nullus Clericus' a distributive addition is made: "All business of clerics in their bishop's, etc." and in ch. 'Nullus Episcopus' it is said specifically: "Nor for a civil cause;" and in ch. 'Placuit': "Whoever has sought from the emperor the cognizance of the public courts;" and in ch. 'Placuit' 2 at the place: "Or a civil cause has been brought," and many like things are read in that question. And in ch. 'Saeculares' De Foro Competent. in the sixth part it is said that secular judges are to be curbed by ecclesiastical censure who presume, when a cause has been heard and judged, to compel ecclesiastical persons to pay debts; which cause is without doubt a civil one.

3. The same is in addition certain and constant in the civil right of the ancient emperors, who speak indefinitely about the whole forum. And although the emperor Leo, with his colleagues, in the law 'Omnes' Code, De Episcopis et Clericis conceded in certain cases, and with certain conditions, that clerics could be arraigned in the secular forum, even in civil causes, this was afterwards revoked, first by Justinian, who spoke absolutely about civil causes in Authentica 'Ut Clerici apud Proprios Episcopos, etc.' collat.6, otherwise novella 83, then especially by Frederick, who in his constitution spoke specifically about both causes, civil and criminal. And it is noted by the Gloss on Authentica 'Statuimus', at the word 'Vel civili' Code, De Episcop. et Cleric. And thus this part is indubitable among Catholic doctors. But the reason or congruence is that in this matter there is for this exemption the same, or greater, necessity as is found in any other matter, both because civil suits are wont to be more frequent, and also because there was greater danger that about these temporal things secular judges would be less favorable to clerics, or would at least be remiss in giving them justice in court, as is said in ch. 'Cum sit Generale' De Foro Competenti.

4. To this rule, however, a clarification must be added, namely that clerics are exempt in civil causes when they are defendants or are challenged to a suit at law; for if they are plaintiffs they should follow the forum of the defendant, as was determined by Pope Pelagius, reported in ch. 'Experientia' and ch. 'Si Quisquam' 11, alleging the general rule of each right, that the plaintiff follows the forum of the defendant, ch. 'Neminem', along with many others, 3 q.6 last law, Code 'Ubi in Rem Actio', and in law 2 and law 4 'De Iurisdict. et ubi Quis Convenire Debeat' in the Theodosian Code. Hence this rule proceeds not only when a cleric challenges a cleric of a different episcopate, or of a distinct ecclesiastical forum, but also when a cleric makes demand of a layman, for then he cannot use the privilege of forum, because he ought to follow the forum of the defendant.

5. But so as to give a reason for this clarification, the question can be asked whether the Church has thus limited this privilege because it could not concede a greater one, or only because it did not want to. For it seems the first should be asserted; for if the Church could remove clerics from secular courts, even when they are plaintiffs in civil suits, it would assuredly have done so; for the same necessity then intervenes, that no lesser harms could result for clerics, whether they be plaintiffs or defendants, from communication with laymen in secular courts; and there will be the same danger of losing causes and of having hostile secular judges, according to the rule ch.2 'De Immunit. Ecclesiar.' at 6; therefore if the Church did not do it, it is because it could not.

6. There is also a confirmation, that the Pontiff cannot usurp the jurisdiction of laymen, according to the ch. 'Novit' De Iudiciis, and the others dealt with above; but if he might exempt a cleric even when plaintiff from the secular court, he would be usurping the jurisdiction of laymen; therefore he cannot do it. Proof of the minor. First, because lay judges would be deprived of the jurisdiction which pertains to them. Second and better because the defendant would be compelled to appear before a judge not his own, namely an ecclesiastical judge, and so the Church would usurp jurisdiction over a layman. Wherein there is to be noted a difference between a plaintiff and a defendant; for the plaintiff comes to court not compelled but voluntarily starting it; and therefore, when he acts against a cleric, it is no wonder that he is compelled to go to a judge who is not per se his own but the cleric's, because he who is compelled ought to have a better condition than he who compels; but, however, when a layman is defendant he is compelled to appear, and therefore he cannot be compelled to appear except before his own direct judge, otherwise jurisdiction over him would be usurped; therefore for the same reason the privilege could not be conceded to a plaintiff cleric of bringing a layman before his own forum or (which is the same) outside the layman's forum. There is confirmation too from Bartolus, on the said law 2 'De Iurisdic. Omnium Iudic.' where he asks whether it could be determined that the defendant follow the forum of the plaintiff; and he replies that a prince can make statutes of this sort for his subjects but that he cannot determine that a man not of his jurisdiction be held to follow the forum of the plaintiff, because no one can make determination about things which are not of his jurisdiction. Which decision of Bartolus and the reason for it seems to proceed equally in the present case, because a layman is not subject in temporal affairs to ecclesiastical jurisdiction. And it can be further confirmed, for if one of the faithful bring a civil suit against an infidel not subject to the Church, the Church cannot compel the infidel defendant to follow the forum of the faithful plaintiff; therefore the same will hold of the present case.

7. Nevertheless one should say that power is not lacking to the Church to exempt a cleric even as plaintiff from the secular forum, although by sweet providence and prudent government it has not done so, because of a certain natural equity to which it is agreeable that he who is accused and brought unwillingly to court should not be compelled to go outside his forum, lest he sustain a double disadvantage. For also because of this equity, "when the rights of the parties are obscure, the defendant is rather to be favored than the plaintiff," as the rule of right 11, at the sixth section, has it. The first part of the assertion can be taken from the Gloss on ch. 'Si Clericus' at the word 'De consuetudine' and in ch. 'Ex Transmissa' at the beginning, De Foro Competent., insofar as it says that the Pope not only can, but also frequently does, concede rescripts and privileges to clerics, so that they may in any cause whatever, even when prosecuting a layman, compel him to come to their own forum; which opinion is also followed by Panormitanus, and he refers to Archidiaconus and Speculator. But Hostiensis in his Summa title 'De Foro Compet.' § 'Quibus ex Causis' vers. 'Ex Praemissis' says that in the Roman curia a cleric obtains without distinction this favor against a layman.

8. From this common custom and opinion, then, the assertion is proved that the favorable privilege, which the Pope can concede to many clerics as individuals, he can also concede to all clerics, in favor of the whole community and clerical state, if he judge it expedient; but often he concedes it to many ecclesiastical persons, so that even when prosecuting they be exempt from the secular forum; therefore he could also concede it to the whole clerical state. The major is proved first because there is, as to what concerns the power, the same reason of the whole as of the part, if a proportionate cause subsist. Second, because the custom sufficiently shows that a privilege of this sort is not in its kind and form intrinsically evil, nor against natural justice; therefore neither could such iniquity be by probable reason shown with respect to the whole clergy. Which reason absolutely proves the assertion, and shows that the custom of conceding such privileges to certain persons is just and conformable to reason, which will be further proved by responding to the arguments. Add that, since it has been shown that this privilege of exemption was immediately conceded by divine right, it seems more difficult to explain how the Church could make this limitation than whether it could not make it; because the privilege, by standing on divine right, is altogether absolute and was conceded without limitation; therefore the Church could implement it and fully conserve its use. But because, as we have often said, this privilege was so given by Christ that it was committed to the disposition of the Pontiffs as to its regulation, extension, or particular alteration, therefore the Church could regulate it in the aforesaid way and in part cede its right for appropriate reasons, which will be more explained by solving the arguments, and the second part of the assertion will be proved.

9. To the first conjecture, then, we reply by denying the consequence, for not everything which can be done, or is licit, is expedient. Hence although it be true that there is no lack of appropriateness on the grounds of which the Church could concede this favor to the clergy, nevertheless the Pontiffs wanted to be in conformity with the civil laws in this rule, that the plaintiff follow the forum of the defendant, as is said in the said ch. 'Si Quisquam' 11 q.1, both because this is very consonant with natural equity, as I said, and also because prosecutions of this sort, and the bringing of suits for temporal things, ordinarily proceed from too much affection for wealth, which does not become ecclesiastical persons, and therefore, speaking as a rule, clerics ought to avoid these sorts of prosecutions, especially for their own temporal goods, unless compelled by evident and grave reason. Lest, therefore, the Church seem to be favoring these sorts of suits, it did not wish to exempt clerics when acting as plaintiffs but only as defendants, because they are only defending themselves, which is both just and honorable. The Church could also thus act lest the ecclesiastical courts be burdened with very many suits from laymen, and so as not either to offend laymen and seem to have too much affection for forensic jurisdiction. And so, when private exceptions or favors from this rule are made through special privileges, they are not conceded only because of general reasons of fittingness or advantage to the clerical status, but when other special reasons are adjoined according to the occurrent circumstances.

10. To the second confirmation, and the doctrine of Bartolus, the response is that it can be turned back in the contrary direction; for if a prince can establish among his subjects, or grant the privilege, that the defendant follow the forum of the plaintiff, the Pope too can give the same privilege to clerics in respect of the other faithful; because they are all subject to him. Nor is it an obstacle that faithful laymen are not directly subject to the Pope in temporal things; for it is enough that they be indirectly subject; for just as spiritual power suffices for making disposition of temporal things when a spiritual end and reason require it, which is to make disposition indirectly, so too the same power suffices for conceding the privilege among those who are directly subject in spiritual things and indirectly in temporal ones. For which cause, when the Pope concedes these sorts of special privileges, he does not usurp the jurisdiction of the secular court but commits it to another by his superior power. Neither too is the defendant compelled to appear before a judge not his own, but the cause is transferred from one judge to another by him who has legitimate power. What, then, we say of particular privileges should be said too in general, if the concession is from the absolute power of the Pontiff. Hence I amplify it with a final addition, that this pontifical power extends of itself also to conceding this privilege with respect to infidels, if it be necessary for the good of the faith and to avoid moral dangers, as was said above; the use, however, of this power cannot be thus effectively entrusted to execution in the case of infidels, because they cannot be spiritually compelled as the faithful can, and there is often not enough force to compel them corporeally.

11. Now it can be asked whether the aforesaid rule or its declaration suffers any exception. To which we reply briefly in the affirmative. But one must note that this exception can be assigned on the part of the persons to whom this privilege is conceded, or on the part of the causes or the matters that are dealt with. We omit now, therefore, the first mode of exception; for we must deal with the persons below, and we will there say which of them enjoy this privilege simply and which with a certain limitation. In the second kind, then, a first exception is assigned by some people about real causes, that is causes founded on a reality merely temporal, without any personal action of the cleric himself intervening whereon the suit or cause is founded; because in that case the person is not under obligation, nor is he brought to court, but the thing which is merely temporal is. Now the privilege of forum only exempts the persons of clerics so that they cannot be arraigned civilly. But this exception is not a true one and derogates much from the privilege of clerics, and therefore it is commonly rejected, as Abbas well noted on ch. 'Qualiter' De Iudic. n.8, and on ch. 'Ecclesia' De Constitut. n.22, and use itself sufficiently condemns it. The reason is that a general rule of right exempts clerics from being able to be arraigned civilly in a secular court; but this is an exception from the rule that is proved by no right; therefore it is not to be admitted, especially because it is little consonant with other rights, as can be seen in Panormitanus above, in Felinus, and others.

12. Another exception, then, true and common, is about fiefs or feudal goods; for in causes that pertain to these goods, although the cleric is defendant and is arraigned by a layman, he ought to be arraigned before the lord of the fief, even if the lord be a layman; the reason for which is none other than that so in right it is disposed in favor of fiefs, ch. 'Ex Transmissa' and ch. 'Verum' De Foro Competent. where see at large the expositors. Or certainly also the reason can be given that things that are given in fief are from the beginning conferred under a burden or condition, therefore the condition is to be kept.

13. Hence there is another general exception, which is sometimes handed down by the civil laws under these words, namely that a cleric is to be arraigned in a civil cause before an ecclesiastical judge "unless the goods, about which the suit is brought, are regal," for they are reckoned to have been given under this condition. And it is the same whenever goods are from the beginning given to clerics or the Church under the condition that they always remain under the same forum under which they were at the time existing. For such a condition is not per se evil and can be voluntarily attached, and therefore it is to be kept, according to the rule commonly accepted by jurists that when goods are given to the Church under some condition or burden or contract that is not illicit, it is to be kept, because to keep a contract belongs to the right of nature, which canon right does not contradict; nay it expressly confirms it and in its proper form, ch. 'Verum' De Conditionib. Appositis, where the fact is noted by Panormitanus and other doctors, Joannes Andreas and Hostiensis on ch. 'Verum' De Foro Compet., Felinus on ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae' De Constit. and Ancharrano cons.223. Besides these exceptions, others are wont to be added that Navarrus has touched on, ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis notabil.6, from Stephanus Aufrerius, decis.126 & 167, and from William Benedictus in Repetition. ch. 'Rainutius' De Testam., but I omit them because they are not certain and because this matter pertains not so much to theologians as to jurists. Hence other exceptions are pursued at length by Gergorius Lopez on law 57 tit.6 parit.1.

14. But about this declaration of the assertion other exceptions can be noted. One is if the goods, about which the suit is brought, belong to the Church or a cleric, for in that case the cleric can bring the layman before an ecclesiastical judge. So is it held by Panormitanus in ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae,' n.22, when he says it is a singular case in ch. 'Si Clericus Laicum' De Foro Compet., where he himself teaches the same, so interpreting the text. He also adds that it is so kept in the curia, as (he says) is reported and followed by Collector on ch. 'Qualiter' and on ch. 'Clerici' De Iudiciis. However Felinus inclines to the contrary opinion in the said ch. 'Si Clericus Laicum' n.4. His foundation is that this is not directly laid down in the said ch. 'Si Clericus' as is clear from its words: "If a cleric accuses a layman about his own goods or those of the Church, and the layman avers that the things themselves are not the Church's or the cleric's but his own property, he should by strict right be brought before a public judge." In which words disposition is only made that when the layman denies that the things are the Church's or the cleric's he cannot be brought before an ecclesiastical court. But it cannot hence be inferred that when he does not deny it he cannot be brought before an ecclesiastical court. Which argument is not efficacious when such a sense is against other general rules of right, as it is in the present case, because a defendant is not brought to the plaintiff's but to his own forum. And this opinion pleases me more.

15. A certain difference, however, can be noted between the goods of the Church and the goods of clerics. For if it is definitely clear that the goods of the Church have been seized, whether unjustly taken away or retained, then a layman can, by reason of the sacrilege, be arraigned before an ecclesiastical judge; but it will be otherwise if it is not clear that the goods are unjustly detained and the layman contends that he possesses them by some just title. And only this is proved in the said chapter and in ch. 'Similiter' 16 q.1, taken from the 6th Roman Council under Symmachus. But the goods of clerics are not sacred in the way that things of the Church are, and therefore they can, without sacrilege, be taken even unjustly; and therefore although a suit be brought about them for this cause, the lay defendant should be arraigned before a lay judge, unless some force committed against the cleric be alleged, which involves sacrilege, as Innocent thinks on ch. 'Cum Sit' De Foro Compet. Now it can be objected that, in the said synod under Symmachus, the things of bishops are made equal in this respect to the goods of the Church. But the reason of the Pontiff is to be considered: "Because the things of bishops are without doubt things of the Church." And thus I understand the text according to the custom of that time, when the lordship of the goods of a bishop was reckoned to rest with the Church, but now a distinction of lordship is sufficiently well known, and therefore the reason is different.

16. Another exception is that by custom an ecclesiastical plaintiff can sometimes bring a defendant to his own forum, and thus an exception is made in this matter concerning the rule, because the plaintiff follows the forum of the defendant except where something else has by custom been introduced. This exception is wont to be collected from the chapter 'Si Clericus' De Foro Competenti, where, after Alexander III has said that the plaintiff by strict right should follow the forum of the defendant, he adds: "Although in several places it is by custom held otherwise." Which words can be understood in two ways: first, that the aforesaid rule and strict right be kept, even if a contrary custom is alleged, because it is contrary to all right, as the Gloss there says. Second, that the rule and strict right be kept except when there is by custom derogation from it. And this latter is the legitimate sense, as Hostiensis, Joannes Andreas, Panormitanus, and other expositors there recognize, and they found it on the aforesaid exception. Which is openly indicated by the very words of the Pontiff, which are thus read in the Lateran Council itself under Alexander III p.8 ch.7: “Although in several places it is by custom done otherwise,” which does not reprove the fact but rather approves it tacitly. And the reason is that the custom is not evil, nor contrary to natural right, as is clear from what has just been said; therefore to this extent it can derogate from positive right; but it is also, from a different direction, favorable to religion, and therefore it is rightly approved and kept.

17. There is to be noted here a difference between this custom and another (if it be anywhere introduced), that a lay plaintiff bring a challenged cleric to his own forum; for although the first is valid this one is not valid, because the first favors ecclesiastical liberty and increases it, but the latter is contrary to immunity, and derogates much from divine right. And, therefore, the fact that it is in right condemned is also noted by the same interpreters on the same chapter, and we will say more at large below in its own place. However, the Gloss says in the said ch. ‘Si Clericus’ that this custom was introduced by occasion of the neglect of secular judges, because they were not giving justice to clerics, by the argument of ch. ‘Cum sit Generale, etc.’ ‘Licet’ and ch. ‘Ex Tenore’ De Foro Competent. But this pertains to the fact, for the custom could be introduced by the piety of laymen or even by a certain thoughtlessness. And, on whatever occasion it was introduced, the exception has place, because the text speaks simply and also the same reason holds. There can be a like exception too, that the plaintiff follow the forum of the defendant unless something else be legitimately conceded to him by a special privilege, which is sufficiently clear from what has been said, and nothing needs to be added except that the tenor of the privilege should be observed according to the common rules of privileges.

18. Another exception can in fact hence be added, namely that also when custom or privilege is removed, if a lay judge neglects to provide justice to a plaintiff cleric, the layman can be arraigned before an ecclesiastical judge. Thus the Gloss seems to think on ch. ‘Cum sit Generale’ at the word ‘Remissi’, and on ch. ‘Licet’ at the word ‘Vacante’ De Foro Competenti, which is there approved by the doctors, and they found it on those texts, although it be not sufficiently collected from them except in the cases expressly therein, namely in certain criminal causes, about which we must speak in the following chapter, or when the empire or a magistracy is unfilled, such that clerics fail to find a secular judge to whom to have recourse so that justice might be provided them. Yet nevertheless, by parity of reason, the exception is to be admitted. However, it seems it must be understood in this way, that, when a lay judge is negligent, a cleric can have recourse to an ecclesiastical judge who can compel the lay judge by censures to use his office justly, by the argument of ch. ‘Administratores’ 23 q.5, because the fault is grave and injurious to clerics, and therefore it pertains to an ecclesiastical judge to apply the remedy. Hence if a lay judge is stubborn, the ecclesiastical judge can rightly take the cause to himself, partly in punishment of the negligent and stubborn judge, partly in defense of the cleric. And thus too can the other exceptions be easily understood that are posited by the Gloss on the said ch. ‘Licet’, about which the expositors also thereon can be looked at.

19. Now it can be asked whether this exception about the negligence of a lay judge similarly has place when an ecclesiastical judge is negligent with respect to a lay plaintiff demanding his property from a cleric. For it seems it should be admitted, because Justinian in Authentica 'De Sanctissimis Episcopis' collation.9, otherwise novella 123 ch.21 § 'Siquis autem Pecuniaria', established that, in case of negligence by an ecclesiastical judge, it is licit for a lay plaintiff to summon the cleric before a secular judge. And in novella 83 or Authentica 'Ut Clerici apud proprios Episcopos, etc.' he extends it to other cases. It is also referred to in ch. 'Siquis cum Clerico' 11 q.1, and is favored by ch. 'Filiis' 16 q.7, where the Gloss, at the word 'Regis', has the same opinion. However no account is to be taken in this of the decisions of Justinian, who could not limit the exemption of clerics, because this matter is not of civil right but of canon right, as I will say more generally below.

20. One must say, therefore, that it is not licit for a cleric, because of the negligence of the ecclesiastical judge, to be arraigned before a secular one. Thus did Innocent III determine in ch. 'Qualiter, et Quando' De Iudiciis, where he prescribes to prelates that they act to provide full justice to laymen complaining about clerics, lest by this occasion clerics be brought by laymen before a secular court, "which (he says) we altogether forbid to be done." Which prohibition is so to be understood that it not only simply forbids clerics to be brought before secular courts, which was already prohibited before, but also prohibits it from being done for that cause or occasion or under that color. And thus was the text understood by the Gloss thereon, and very well by Panormitanus at number 7, and the same is held by the Gloss on ch. 'Placuit' 1, 11 q.1, at the word 'Petierit', and Archdiaconus on the said ch. 'Filiis'. Now the reason is that a secular judge has no jurisdiction over a defendant cleric, nor can the emperor or a king give it; nor does he, because of the negligence of an ecclesiastical judge, ipso facto acquire it by force of natural, divine, or canon right; therefore without jurisdiction he cannot take up such a cause. Next, a lay judge is inferior to an ecclesiastical one; but an inferior cannot supply the defect of a superior. Therefore etc.

21. And from here is easily collected the difference between the secular and ecclesiastical judges; for the secular is inferior, and therefore his negligence can be supplied by the ecclesiastical, that is, by virtue of canon right, which is above civil, and thus he decides by the power which the Pontiff has for correcting defects of secular judges. But an ecclesiastical judge is superior, and therefore a secular judge cannot per se and (so to say) by his own virtue supply his defect; nor by virtue of civil right either, which also has no power over a cleric, whether direct or indirect. Nor did canon right wish to give such power to him, nor to permit it, on account of the decency of the clerics and prelates of the Church. In that case, then, remedy is to be demanded from the superior prelate. But as to what is said in the said ch. 'Filiis', that if the prelate be negligent the king can be asked for help, either it is understood only of a special case, when the goods of the Church are being squandered by clerics, on which that text speaks; or it is understood that an approach can be made to the king, not as to a judge, but as to a protector and defender, so that he might with his authority admonish the prelate, and might in the meantime guard and protect the things of the Church by his own power, until the Supreme Pontiff can be consulted. In which way are to be understood and reconciled the many rights that are reported by Gratian, 11 q.1 ch. 'Si quis Clericus', ch. 'Placuit', ch. 'Christianis', and 23 q.3 ch. 'Ab Imperatoribus', and q.5 ch. 'Regum', and ch. 'Administratores'. About which we will add something below in the last chapter.

Chapter 15: What sort of exemption there is for clerics in criminal cases

Summary: 1. First assertion. Canon rights which concede exemption absolutely from the secular forum. 2. Diverse readings of the canon about this sort of exemption. 3. What Gratian decided about the crimes of clerics. 4. There were therein no laws of Justinian. 5. Whether this assertion suffers exception. Conclusion. 6. The assertion is confirmed by reason. 7. Whether the rule already laid down may be extended. 8. Response. Even in criminal matters the prosecutor should follow the forum of the accused. 9. Those who commit wrongs against churches or strike clerics can be brought before the ecclesiastical court. 10. Whether the privilege of the forum may be extended to crimes committed prior to it. Reason for doubt on behalf of the negative side. 11. Reason for the affirmative side. 12. True resolution. 13. The limitation imposed by certain people is rejected.

1. There is a general rule that ecclesiastical persons enjoy immunity or privilege of the forum in criminal causes "not only in ecclesiastical crimes but also in civil ones," to use the words of Justinian so distinguishing in the place immediately to be cited. This assertion is most certain and is received by all Catholic writers; and it cannot be denied except by denying some principle of faith. For it is so evidently handed down in canon right that no one who does not labor under great ignorance could deny the assertion, except he who has denied that there is in the Church a power for either guarding or conceding this sort of exemption; but this is repugnant to the principles of the faith, as we have shown. Now the ancient canon decrees on this matter are found in 11.q.1 Some of these indefinitely prohibit clerics from being transferred to the secular court, as ch.1, ch. 'Placuit', and the like, and they comprehend, as I said above, all causes both civil and criminal. Others prohibit laymen from accusing, detaining, arresting, or punishing a cleric, as ch.2, ch. 'Nullus clericus,' ch. 'Si quis clericus,' with others. But those words are proper to criminal causes. Others speak expressly and formally of criminal cause, ch. 'Nullus episcopus,' ch. 'Clericus nullus,' ch. 'Placuit', from the 2nd Council of Carthage ch.9, and ch. 'Clericum,' from the 3rd Council of Agde ch.3.

2. About this canon one must note that it is read differently in the Council itself than as cited by Gratian. For Gratian speaks of 'cleric' in the accusative case: "Let no one presume to indict a cleric before a secular judge, etc." But in the Council 'cleric' is said in the nominative case: "Let no cleric presume to indict anyone before a secular judge." A similar decree is read in the same way in epist. 2 of Pope Marcellinus, whence the Council seems to have taken it. But those readings give very diverse senses, as is clear. Hence it is probable that Gratian himself had made use of some badly written Council, because it cannot be presumed that Gratian changed the words of the Council on purpose, nor is it as probable that an error occurred in the Pontiff's letter and in the Council. But this is not an obstacle, both because other decrees are sufficient to confirm the truth, and also because other words are added in the same place which signify the same exemption. For Marcellinus, after he said: "Let not a cleric presume to bring anyone to a secular court," added: "Nor is it licit for a layman to accuse any cleric." Which, if understood absolutely the way it sounds, is certainly a greater privilege for clerics; but if it be referred to the secular court only, as is probable in accord with the words just preceding, what is contained there is exemption of a cleric from the secular court in a criminal cause. For that it is why he cannot be accused, because he cannot be judged. But if he ought not to be accused by a layman, much less should he be so by a cleric, which is there supposed as known.

Also the Council, after it has prohibited a cleric from indicting another, adds: "But if he is indicted (to wit a cleric, for it is continuing to talk about him), let him not respond, nor propose, nor dare to present," or "dare to propose" as Gratian rather reads, "a criminal proceeding in a secular court." In accord with either sense, both are contained in that canon, namely that a cleric not accuse a layman before a secular court, especially on a criminal charge, without consulting his bishop, and that he not respond if accused or indicted. And so, as far as the sense is concerned, the reading of Gratian reduces to the same with the order changed. For when it says, in the first place, "Let no one presume, etc." it declares the privilege of the cleric; but when it says at the end: "Nor let a cleric dare to propose a criminal proceeding in a secular court," it insinuates the other prohibition made to a cleric, against accusing a layman on a criminal charge without the license of his bishop. This was first handed down by Pope Fabian, epist.2, and it is contained in ch. 'Si quis sacerdotes,' 2, q.7; and a similar canon is contained in the Council of Orléans, 3, ch.31.

Later decrees also decree the same immunity in criminal matters, ch. 'Clerici,' and ch. 'Qualiter et quando,' De Iudiciis, and ch.2, and ch. 'Si diligenti,' with similar ones about the competent forum. And in the said ch. 'Clerici,' Alexander III says that in this respect civil right agrees with canon right, because it delivers laws in a general way, that a cleric should come in the case of any crime before an ecclesiastical judge. Which is true of modern civil right, for Frederick expressed it specially in his constitution and it is contained in Authentica 'Statuimus,' De Episcop. et cleric., and Honorius III accepted it, and it has been confirmed by all later rights of Catholic kingdoms.

3. But in the older civil right Justinian established the contrary, in the said novella, 83. There he distinguishes two crimes: certain ecclesiastical ones, as error in the faith, sacrilege, faults in administering orders or benefices; and about these he concedes that a cleric is to be summoned only before the ecclesiastical forum, which is not a concession (whatever he himself may seem to have thought), but a recognition, and a confession of divine right. Other crimes he calls civil faults, and about these he wanted judgment, even in the case of the persons of clerics, to belong to secular judges. But he adds a limitation in these words: "This fact is plain, that if the superior of the province thinks the one who has been summoned is guilty, and judges him worthy of punishment, he must first be despoiled of his sacerdotal dignity by the Bishop, and thus come to be under the hand of the laws." He seems to have understood this with respect to the execution of the punishment, for no faculty or diligence of the Bishop was required for beginning and prosecuting the case and for taking cognizance of it. And so thinks the Gloss thereon.

However the same Gloss adds that, for passing sentence of condemnation, the despoiling and depriving of the priesthood had to have preceded, although a secular judge could pronounce a sentence of acquittal without the cooperation of the Bishop. But I do not see how a Bishop could degrade anyone (for that is what despoiling of the priesthood is) before sentence has been given about the crime and about the punishment to be inflicted because of it. Hence the words themselves indicate this fact, at the place: "if he thinks the one who has been summoned is guilty, and judges him worthy of punishment.” Therefore this judgment had to precede, at least a legal and authentic judgment, because it is pronounced by sentence of condemnation. When therefore it is subjoined that “he must first be despoiled”, the implicit meaning must be: before the punishment is inflicted, not: before sentence is passed. So in fact is it declared in Authent. ‘Clericus’ Code De Episcop. et cleric., at the place: “Nor may he however be punished, even if he has been found guilty.” For that reason, then, it does not seem it can be understood generally of every sentence of condemnation, nor of every punishment; but of a punishment of blood, or a corporal punishment, so severe or offensive that privation of the priesthood is required beforehand; for not every punishment requires this, as is clear in the case of exile, life imprisonment, fines, and the like. Therefore, by the force of that law, clerics are wholly deprived of the privilege of the forum in crimes that are non-canonical in their whole business and cause, besides the execution of certain punishments which demand a degradation made by the Bishop. But later the same Justinian, in Authentica De Sanctissimis Episcopis ch.21, limited this and made these crimes of clerics to belong to a mixed forum; and when they were first summoned to the secular forum he established another order, which can there be seen. And before Justinian this had been established by Valens and his colleagues, in bk.23 De Episcop. et cleric. in the Theodosian code.

4. However, these laws were not only repealed by the constitution of Frederick (as the Gloss noted in the said Authentica ‘Statuimus’), but also by canon rights, nay they were invalid and of no effect from the beginning; because they were against divine right, and against canon rights, and against concessions of previous emperors, especially Constantine, bk.7, ch. De Episcop. et cleric., which were renewed with other similar ones by Theodosius and Valentinian, in bks. 46 & 47 of the same title. Where all the privileges in general are first renewed that were previously conceded to clerics by pious emperors, there is however later added: “Clerics too, whom the unhappy usurper (to wit, Julian the Apostate) gave edict to be led indiscriminately before secular judges, we reserve to Episcopal audience. For it is not holy that the ministers of the divine office be subjected to the decision of temporal powers.”

There remains in the canon right only one scruple, from the Council of Macon, 1 ch.7, where a general rule is first delivered in these words: “No cleric about any cause without discussion of his bishop is to suffer injury or be handed over to custody by a secular judge.” But afterwards an exception is added wherein there is a difficulty: “But if any judge of anything has perhaps presumed to do this to a cleric without criminal cause, that is, homicide, theft, or malfeasance, he is to be kept away from the doors of the church as long as it seems good to the Bishop of that place.” Here, when it says “without criminal cause,” it seems to establish an exception contrary to the rule we have set down. Hence it seems that that Council, which was celebrated a little after the times of Justinian, imitated the civil right of that time, or perhaps in Gaul this was then the custom. However I draw attention to the fact that the Council does not there except every criminal judgment, otherwise it would be an exception contrary to the rule, but it excepts certain sins, which it calls crimes by antonomasia, which are of the sort it there enumerates. And in this way the exception could have been tolerable at that time and only in that province in which then perhaps the Bishops could give similar faculty to laymen, as we will see below. But now this is neither licit for Bishops, as I will also show below, nor is a similar exception to be admitted, as I will soon say.

5. Therefore it can be doubted whether the rule posited does admit any exception. This question, as I said in the preceding chapter, can be understood either on the part of the persons or on the part of the matter of the crimes. I will speak below about the persons, but now I suppose that no persons are excepted apart from those who are deprived of this privilege either by canon law or by just ecclesiastical sentence or by delegation of the Pontiff made to a lay judge. But about the crimes I say that, by force of common right, none are excepted from the aforesaid rule. The proof is that it is thus expressed in right, in ch. ‘Cum non ab homine,’ De Iudiciis, at the place, ‘Sive in furto, sive in homicidio, sive in periurio, sive in alio crimine etc.’ Also in ch. ‘At si clerici,’ under the same title, it is first said absolutely that clerics not only cannot be condemned for a crime by a secular judge but also that when cases are tried before such a judge, even if in them a cleric has been convicted or has confessed, he is not to be harmed in any way. And from that text and from the following section it is clear that both the greater and the lesser crimes of clerics pertain to the ecclesiastical judge. Also in ch. ‘Clerici,’ it is said that the sacred canons generally imitate the laws stating that in the case of any crime a cleric should come before an ecclesiastical judge. Finally, no such exception is found in common right, nor can it be introduced even by a custom that might have the force of law, as is expressly said in the cited ch. ‘Clerici’; therefore such an exception cannot with foundation be affirmed.

6. There can also be added a sufficiently congruent reason; because if an exception be admitted, it would be either because of the gravity of the crime or because of its triviality; this latter no one will say because the lighter sins can more easily be taken cognizance of and punished by the proper ecclesiastical judge. But as for the graver crimes of clerics, it is more necessary that they not be dealt with by laymen; nay not even be taken cognizance of or known, were doing that possible; and besides they can by an ecclesiastical judge be sufficiently cured and vindicated. But if secular power were necessary for this, the judgment of such crimes should not for that reason be committed to seculars; for it is much more agreeable that they themselves not introduce themselves until they are summoned and, as requested by the ecclesiastical judge, are held to lend their aid, according to the ch. ‘Ut famae,’ De Sentent. Excommunication. Nevertheless I have said that this is to be understood to be of common right; for in certain kingdoms certain crimes of clerics are accustomed by privilege to be excepted which the civil magistrates could take cognizance of, as the crime of treason, the fabrication of false money, etc.; yet it is necessary that this privilege be pontifical, because no king or secular prince could give this privilege, as will be said below.

7. Second, the question can be asked whether this rule admits of any amplification. To which I briefly reply that it cannot be amplified on the part of the matter of the crimes, because it extends to all crimes, to which none can be added. But on the part of the court or the judge a double amplification can be noted. One is that neither directly nor by way of appeal can a lay judge take cognizance of the crime of a cleric, as John Lupus noted, tract. De Libert. Eccles., p.2, q.1, from ch. ‘Qualiter et quando’ De Iudiciis, in which I am expounding the phrase ‘we altogether prohibit’, for to say ‘altogether’ was the same as to say ‘in any way whatever’. Again it is amplified by the same author so that not even in case of negligence by an ecclesiastical judge can a secular take cognizance of any crime of a cleric, for this is proved a fortiori by the things said above at the end of the preceding chapter. But as to what the secular power can sometimes do about a clerical malefactor by way of defense or aid we will see below.

8. Third the question can be asked whether the declaration given in the preceding chapter about the prosecutor and the accused in civil matter has place in criminal matter. I reply that without doubt there is the same or greater reason about criminal causes as about civil. Thus do the authors brought forward in the preceding chapter teach. It can also be proved by the same rights, for besides what they say in general, it is said in ch. 'Si quisquam,' 11, q.1, that the canons imitate the laws in the said rule, because the prosecutor should follow the forum of the accused; but this rule is expressly handed down for criminal causes in 1 In criminali, Code, De Iurisdiction. omn. iudic., in 1. last code, 'ubi in rem actio'. The reason made above also proceeds of criminal causes no less than of civil. Nay, a greater reason intervenes in criminal matters; because it is less fitting and more dangerous for a cleric to initiate against a layman a criminal action than a civil one, because in a criminal action there is introduced a certain vengeance and danger of hatred, and thus it can more easily generate scandal. This is so true that for this reason the old canons prohibited clerics from accusing a layman without consultation with the Bishop.

9. Yet nevertheless in this matter there is added a certain exception in ch. 'Cum sit generale,' De Foro Compet., in these words: "It has been introduced for the favor of the Church that the rectors of venerable places can summon their malefactors, who are to be deemed sacrilegious, to whichever judge they please." I only draw attention there to the fact that it does not exempt all malefactors against clerics, otherwise the exception would destroy the rule; therefore it excepts malefactors against churches, such as are robbers and the like, as the Gloss there notes. However it is true that even those who strike clerics can be delivered to an ecclesiastical court, not by reason of the person accusing, if he be a cleric, as if he himself drew the accused to his own forum, but by reason of the sacrilege, which belongs to the ecclesiastical or at least the mixed forum. The rest about this declaration can be seen in the Gloss and the doctors there. And the things we said above about the other moderating factor founded on negligence by a lay judge are to be applied here, as is clear.

10. Finally one can inquire here whether this privilege or exemption may be extended to the past, that is to crimes committed before becoming a cleric, or at a time when some person was, for whatever cause, not enjoying the privilege of the forum, even if he was otherwise a cleric. A reason for doubt is that he who in his status as cleric commits an offense, although afterwards he leaves the clerical state (as can happen in the case of clerics not ordained for sacred offices, or of religious who are not professed, or who are professed but have changed status by dispensation), he, I say, always enjoys the privilege as far as the offense is concerned which was committed while he was in that state, as is taught by Covarrubias, § final., q.36, n.11, by Barbosa, in 1. 'Titia' ff. solut. matrimon., who refer to others. And the basis is that for the enjoyment of the privilege the status of the time in which the offense was committed is attended to, according to 1.1 ff., de poenis. Again, because when the offense was committed he was immune from secular jurisdiction; therefore he is not subject to it even if the state is left. Because there is no canon right which imposes such a punishment, or which declares that loss of privilege by dismissal of status is to be retroactive to the past time during which the state existed, or to an offense then committed; but it is not without right or evident reason that the privilege is to be limited and that nothing is to be asserted which is penal and odious.

Therefore, in a similar way, he who has left off the lay state and has afterward received orders or the ecclesiastical state, will not enjoy the privilege for those offenses which he committed earlier, when he was in the lay state. The proof of the consequence is both that it follows from the same principle, that for enjoying the privilege the time of the offense is to be attended to; therefore he who was not a cleric or, if he was, was not living in the clerical state, and he then committed an offense, although he be afterwards ordained or receive clerical insignia, he will be subject to a secular court as regard that offense. And also because the offense pertained from the beginning to the secular forum, and there is no right which draws it therefrom, or which makes the privilege apply retroactively to the effect; therefore, etc. And thus Covarrubias and Barbosa seem to think in the places mentioned.

11. But making to the contrary seems to be first that privileges, to the extent the propriety of the words allows, are to be amplified very greatly in favor of religion; but the rights conceding this privilege simply exempt the persons themselves signed with the character or dedicated to God in such a way, and they do not limit it to offenses committed after becoming a cleric or before; therefore the privilege is not to be limited but extended. Second, because although the offense preceded, it cannot fail to lead to the ignominy of the clergy that he, who is now a cleric, be punished or judged by a layman; therefore since the privilege regards more the decency of the clergy than the advantage of the person, it ought to have place even as regard a preceding offense. Just as he who before was a slave, if he be ordained, is exempted by right from servitude on account of the honor of the clergy, although not always in the same way, as is clear from the material about irregularity. Therefore in the present too, although someone be, by reason of his offense, liable to the secular forum, he will be liberated by ordination, at least from the forum, although not from the debt of some punishment. Third, he who flees to a material church after an offense enjoys immunity; what marvel, therefore, that he should enjoy it who flees to the spiritual level of the Church?

12. Panormitanus disputes at large on this point in ch. unic. de obligates ad rationcinia, and several others in that place and in the places which Felinus refers to copiously in the last chapter of the Constitution, n.14, near the end, and Avendanus among the moderns in tractat. De Mandat. reg. exequend., ch.22, and Covarrubias, in 'Pract.' ch.3, no.4. They refer to various opinions and use many distinctions which to refer to and discuss here would be prolix and foreign to our stated purpose, especially because they do not adduce canon rights which make any clear disposition in this matter. Speaking about it in general and using conjecture, I am pleased with the opinion saying that ordination obtained after an offense exempts the person of the cleric from secular jurisdiction, even for that offense. First, for the reasons given; next arguing from similars and a fortiori from 1. 'Hos accusare,' ff. De accusat., insofar as it says that the legate of a province is not be accused about that crime which he committed before becoming legate. Therefore by the same or greater reason a cleric who has abandoned the lay state is not to be accused of that crime in a secular court.

13. The jurists, however, are wont to apply a limitation, "unless he have assumed the clerical state in bad faith;" by bad faith they understand assuming the clerical state so as to flee the secular forum, whence they impose on the cleric himself the onus of proving that he did not have bad faith. But it certainly does not seem to belong to deceit or bad faith that someone assumes that state from the intention of exempting himself from that forum and protecting his person; just as it is not bad faith to flee to a church after an offense so as to save oneself; for that intention is not a bad one; hence if good faith is preserved by some, that does not seem to be an obstacle. Therefore I would understand by bad faith if someone fictitiously and by pretence had assumed that state for a time so as to avoid the forum. Wherefore, to this extent, I think that one must judge differently if someone is ordained for sacred offices or only for minor orders. For the first assumed a perpetual and unchangeable status, and therefore he cannot be presumed of that fiction, unless it is clearly apparent; and that is why I think that he remains immune, even if it be clear that he had done it on the occasion of the offense and so as to change forum, because that is not evil, nor does it bring grave disadvantage to the republic.

But he who only assumes minor orders could easily do it by bad faith, that is, not because he wanted truly to dedicate himself to the cult of God, but only for a time, so that he might more easily be freed and afterward change status; and then I think the prior limitation does proceed. And much more in a cleric already ordained in minor orders who was not wearing the habit or the tonsure at the time of the offense, and afterward assumes it and wishes to enjoy the privilege. For it can easily be feared that he is proceeding deceptively; then therefore he will not enjoy the privilege, unless he prove a contrary mind, which is very difficult. But the same doctors add another limitation, namely that “a cleric ordained in good faith can enjoy the privilege if the cause be intact;” for if it had already begun before a secular judge the reason would be different, according to ch. ‘Proposuisti,’ de foro compet. Again they add that in other cases, in which this cleric is judged by a secular judge about a prior crime, he cannot be corporally punished but in other ways. About which and other similar points we refer the reader to the aforesaid authors.

Chapter 16: Whether the privilege of the forum includes exemption from civil laws, and of what sort the privilege is.

Summary: 1. Laymen may in no way bind ecclesiastical persons by their laws. 2. Whether the privilege of the forum for clerics includes exemption from civil laws. 3. The force of civil law is double, directive and coercive, and what each is. 4. Several other effects of the civil laws are reduced to this directive and coercive force. 5. Distinction of civil laws on the part of the persons and on the part of the matter. 6. Civil laws passed for laymen alone do not oblige clerics. 7. Civil laws which make disposition in ecclesiastical matter introduce no obligation. 8. Objection. Confirmation of it. 9. Response. And to the confirmation. 10. Civil laws which make disposition about the goods of clerics or churches have no validity. Reason for the first part. 11. Reason for the second part. 12. First opinion. 13. Second opinion. 14. Opinion of the author. 15. Whether clerics are exempt from the directive force of civil laws. 16. Various opinions. 17. Civil laws, even non-noxious ones, do not oblige clerics as regard coercive force. 18. Objection. 19. Solution. 20. Whether civil laws are able to void the contracts of clerics.

1. We suppose that ecclesiastical immunity includes exemption from the obligation and bond of civil laws to the extent they have any force from human power and jurisdiction. This is most certain from canon right, although perhaps it may not be found expressly and particularly in civil right. Which fact, however, is no obstacle because canon right is sufficient, as I said above. Now this canon right is contained in ch.

'Ecclesiae Sanctae Mariae,' De Constitut. and dist.96, over many chapters; it is also said in these chapters that laymen have no power or jurisdiction over churches or ecclesiastical persons. The thing is also borne witness to by many Councils, as was proved in earlier chapters. But it is clear that no one can oblige by his law him over whom he has no jurisdiction; therefore neither can lay legislators bind clerics by their laws, because, as was said, they have no jurisdiction over them; but legislative jurisdiction is great; so since the Councils say no jurisdiction, they even deny this. And there is assistance from Authent. 'Cassa', Code De Episcop. et cleric. where all statutes of laymen contrary to ecclesiastical liberty are said to be null and void; for by the very fact that civil laws are made to bind clerics they are repugnant to ecclesiastical liberty. This therefore is certain in generality; but how it is to be understood, amplified, or limited remains to be explained.

2. But first I note that some people doubt whether the privilege of the forum too, just like ecclesiastical immunity, includes this exemption from the bond of the civil laws. I say, however, that this question is about the name alone. For, if the name of forum is strictly taken, it will seem only to comprehend exemption from judgments of the secular forum, as well in civil as in criminal causes, because 'forum' properly signifies the place where judgment is exercised, and consequently the judgment too itself, or the jurisdiction by which it is exercised. Hence, if the privilege of the forum is thus strictly taken, it does not comprehend the whole liberty of clerics. For the immunity or exemption of clerics, of which we are treating, comprehends more things, as I said at the beginning of this book, namely immunity from certain burdens, duties, tributes, and secular laws, all which are comprehended by ecclesiastical liberty. However, the privilege of the forum can be taken in the whole of this amplitude. For thus two privileges of clerics are accustomed to be distinguished, namely, of the canon and of the forum, of which the first alone signifies a special immunity from the violent imposition of hands, and for that reason all the remaining liberty of ecclesiastical persons has to be comprehended under the privilege of the forum, so as to make the enumeration adequate. And in this way Sylvester expressly speaks, at the word 'Ecclesia,' 1, q.5, verse 'Primum.' Nor without basis, for the privilege of the forum, as we said, does not only exempt a cleric from the temporal jurisdiction of inferior magistrates but also from the supreme jurisdiction of kings and emperors; because, therefore, all civil laws flow from that same jurisdiction, as well as all burdens which can be imposed by laws of this sort, hence it is that the privilege of the forum has been extended to signify exemption from all of them. Wherefore, now that we have explained exemption from courts, what is left so that we may clarify the privilege completely is that we expound exemption from the laws; for under this all the other immunities are included.

3. Now, in order to give this explanation, it is necessary to lay down that there is a multiple force to human, that is, civil law, about which we are specially speaking. There are, however, two chief heads to which the others are reduced, namely, directive force and coercive force. And lest there be equivocation in the words, as there is wont to be, we understand by directive force the power of giving commands that oblige not only by penalty but also in conscience. But coercive force is the force of compelling through penalty; for although this compulsion is ordinarily brought to execution through men, namely the judge and his ministers, yet it comes to be in its own way through law, and that doubly, namely either by merely imposing the debt or the guilt of a certain penalty on transgressors of the law, or also by inflicting the penalty itself, when it is such that it does not need human execution but can come to be through the law itself, if it is sufficiently expressed therein.

4. Beside these two powers of law, others can be numbered, as to value the price of things, which is best reduced to the directive power, because a reason of justice obliging on conscience results therefrom; again to invalidate contracts, or to prohibit them with that degree of rigor, or by instituting a forum without which they are not valid, which to some has seemed to be penal and for that reason to proceed from the coercive power. But this is not always so; for sometimes it is done for direction of morals alone and the good governance of the republic; and then it more pertains to the directive power. Again law has the force of imposing tribute, real or personal, and thither also has regard the imposition of any burden or secular office, especially a mean or base one or one that is more burden than honor. And, on this view, this virtue of law is reputed quasi coercive, although in truth it is not properly so, because per se these things are not imposed by way of penalty for guilt or transgression of law, but they are directly and per se imposed because they are necessary in the human republic. A declaration must therefore be given as to how clerics are exempted from all these by the privilege of the forum; but in this chapter we will speak only of laws as prescriptive or prohibitive, whether purely so or with a penalty added, and in the following chapters about other laws, especially the burdensome ones.

5. But first civil laws must again be distinguished, on the part of the persons and on the part of the matter. For commonly these laws are passed for all citizens generally, with abstraction from laymen and clerics; for both are citizens and make up the city. But sometimes they are passed for laymen alone; also they could sometimes be passed for clerics alone, I mean could in fact, but what we must say about the right we will see. Next, the matter of the law can sometimes be proper to clerics, which will rather be ecclesiastical than civil matter; sometimes it is proper to laymen, but often enough it is common to both. Again, sometimes the matter, or the disposition of the law, whether made in particular or in general, is burdensome to clerics, and less fitting to their state, but sometimes it is favorable, and sometimes indifferent. Because, although it be useful with respect to the community, nevertheless with respect to individual persons it can sometimes bring disadvantage with it, although more frequently it has the advantage of all in prospect; according therefore to this variety in laws, judgment about this exemption must also vary.

6. But we must collect from what has been said certain things which are clear and beyond controversy. The first is that civil laws passed for laymen alone do not oblige clerics. For this is true not only by reason of exemption but also because of the form of such a law; for no law obliges save the persons to whom it speaks or is directed. The second is that also the civil laws which make disposition in matter merely lay or secular, although they do not speak to lay persons in particular but are passed indefinitely, do not oblige clerics, just as civil laws giving order to secular courts do not oblige in the ecclesiastical forum; and so of other laws. The reason is clear, both because of exemption and also because the matter of the law restricts its obligation to those persons to whom such matter is proper, as is per se clear.

7. Third, it must be said that civil laws, if they make disposition in ecclesiastical matter, introduce no obligation, because of the exemption of such matter. This assertion is clear from things said above in chapter 2, where we showed that all ecclesiastical things and causes are exempt from the jurisdiction of laymen; therefore laws passed by laymen about matters of this sort are, by the right itself, null from defect of jurisdiction. About this matter I spoke fully in De Legibus bk.4, ch.2. Hence, fourth, it must be said that civil laws making disposition about the persons of clerics in particular, even if they seem to be making disposition in civil matter, do not oblige clerics by reason of the exemption of clerics. This assertion together with the preceding one is expressly handed down in ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae,' De Constitut., and ch. 'Quae in ecclesiarum,' the same title, and the last chapter De rebus eccles. non alien., and in ch. 'Bene quidem,' with the many that follow 96 dist. This matter has been broadly treated by authors in these places, especially Panormitanus, Felinus, Bartholus, on the law 'Cunctos populos,' Code De Summa Trinitate. Now the reason is given in the same place, that no power over churches and ecclesiastical persons has been attributed to laymen "on whom there rests a necessity to obey, not an authority to give commands." For hence it comes about that these sorts of laws do not oblige clerics, not because they are valid and do not extend to them, but rather because they are null from defect of jurisdiction over the persons to whom they are directed.

8. You will say that this proceeds at most when such civil laws afflict clerics with some loss or burden but that it appears to be otherwise if they are favorable to clerics; because the privilege, which is given in their favor, ought not to be so extended that it harm the one privileged; but that these laws should be null, even if they are favorable to clerics, falls to their harm; therefore it is not probable that the privilege of exemption has extended to this effect. And there is a confirmation, for a lay prince can confer a valid privilege on a cleric, as is taken from ch. 'Novit.,' De Iudiciis, and from many other canons and laws earlier mentioned, wherein emperors confer privileges on churches and prelates and the ministers of them; but a privilege is a certain favorable law; therefore etc.

9. Nevertheless it must be said in the fourth place that such laws, even if they seem favorable, cannot oblige; for they are also spoken about in the cited chapter 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae,' as Panormitanus there well expounds at the beginning and at the end. And the reason in the text there is convincing, because such a law is not in truth a law, even if it seem favorable, because it does not proceed from jurisdiction; therefore it cannot oblige. The reason is again the best, because by the very fact that the law prohibits or prescribes to clerics in particular it presumes that it is exercising a superior power over them; therefore it presumes a power which does not exist and is therefore null. Nay, by that very fact it cannot be deemed favorable, because it harms more by usurping jurisdiction than it benefits by conferring something of advantage. The response to the confirmation is that it is different in the case of a privilege; for the concession of a privilege is not an act of jurisdiction but can be said to be an act of liberality and of dominion over the thing or the right which is given by the privilege; and for that reason someone could give a privilege, not to a subject, but even to a superior, and thus too can a layman concede a privilege to a cleric. Nor does the privilege have the proper nature of a law with respect to the one privileged, because per se it does not impose an obligation on him, and in this way it is not given by prohibiting or commanding the one privileged but by conceding; however, it is accustomed to prescribe observance of the privilege to others, and thus does the privilege have the proper nature of a law, as I have declared at large on the matter De Legibus. And in this way civil laws conceding privileges to clerics do indeed favor clerics but do not bind them; but they oblige laymen to observe such privileges of clerics.

10. Fifth we can add by amplifying the above assertion, that even civil laws that make disposition in particular about the goods of churches or of clerics are not valid nor can they oblige churches or clerics. So teach the Gloss and the doctors, especially Abbas in the cited chapter 'Ecclesia,' nos. 20 and 21. And what concerns ecclesiastical goods is contained expressly in that text, and in the cited chapter 'Bene quidem,' whose decision Innocent III alleges in the previous chapter. For there the statute of a certain layman, Basil, because it was a statute in particular about the goods of the Church, even in their favor, was deemed to be void because it was not confirmed by apostolic authority. The same is taken from ch. 'Quae in ecclesiarum,' the same title, and the last chapter De Rebus Eccles. non alien., and from ch. 'Decernimus,' De Iudiciis, where all ecclesiastical business is said to be exempt from the secular forum. Now the reason is that ecclesiastical goods are accounted among things sacred and for that reason they are wholly exempt from the jurisdiction of laymen, not only by human but also by divine right, according to what is handed down in the decrees in the whole of dist. 96, and which were treated above in chapter 2.

But the said reason does not militate against the case of the proper goods or patrimony of clerics, because the proper goods of clerics are not sacred as are the goods of churches, and therefore it is not necessary that they enjoy the same or as great exemption as ecclesiastical goods or the goods of churches. But a reason can be given for the difference, because ecclesiastical goods seem to be under the immediate dominion of God, and for that reason no one can make disposition about them except either God himself or the dispensers by him established of his mysteries and goods. But the goods of clerics are immediately under the dominion of men, those men, which dominion belongs to them, not as clerics, but as citizens or as men, and therefore about such goods it seems possible for civil laws to make disposition.

11. But nevertheless even in these goods of clerics I think the opinion of Panormitanus to be true, although the rights which he alleges do not directly make this disposition, yet by argument from similars, or by parity of reason, they may be brought to bear. But reason convinces of it, because civil law cannot make any disposition in particular about the goods of clerics without obliging clerics to observance of such law, because the goods attach to the persons and a law making disposition concerning goods cannot be observed except by some person. But civil law cannot oblige in particular the persons of clerics; therefore neither can it make disposition in particular about their goods. Again, a law is not passed without jurisdiction; but no one has jurisdiction or power of making disposition about the goods of someone unless he have jurisdiction over his person. Since, therefore, a temporal king does not have jurisdiction over the person of a cleric, neither can he have it over the goods which attach to the person as an accessory attaches to its principal; therefore a law made by the civil power in particular about the goods of clerics is null as having been made without jurisdiction. Now the reason to the contrary only proves that it is not as certain that the goods of clerics are by divine law exempt from civil power as it is that ecclesiastical goods are, for they are not thus immediately and as if per se exempt. For sacred things and the goods of the Church are exempt because of a certain sanctity which they share in by immediate relation to God; but the goods of clerics are exempt because of a relation to such exempt persons; but this is no obstacle to their participating in that exemption.

12. Sixth must be added that civil laws, which speak to citizens generally, abstracting from clerics and laymen, and make disposition in temporal matter common to everyone that pertains to their mutual society and uniformity, do oblige clerics as to directive force. In this assertion agree all Catholics whom I referred to above, and I treated of it at large in De Legibus bk.3, ch.34. And the reason on the part of the final cause is that uniform observance of such laws is necessary for the peace of the republic and for preserving equity among the citizens; therefore too the directive obligation ought to be general to all. But on the part of the efficient cause, or of the power imposing such obligation, the same reason is not given by all. For many think that it comes forth from the force of the power and jurisdiction of the temporal prince; they say that as regard passing these laws he has retained jurisdiction over everyone, even clerics, because thus was it necessary for the convenient governing of the whole republic; and for that reason it is not required for clerics to be exempt as regard this part, since the use of such exemption would not be useful to the Christian republic and so it was not to be observed therein. Hence, as we said above, a cleric as prosecutor against a layman is liable to the secular court in a temporal cause, and therefore as regard this prosecution he is not exempt; in this way it is not agreeable for a cleric, who is communicating as a citizen with laymen in such common actions, to be exempt from the virtue and jurisdiction of civil law as regard its directive force. And this way of speaking has been avidly seized on by heretics and schismatics, and many Catholic doctors approve of it, whom I referred to in the place cited; and it is a not improbable one, setting aside the spirit and error of schismatics about the whole of the exemption of clerics.

13. However the opinion of others is that clerics are not obliged to observe these sort of laws from the force of the laws themselves, that is, from the force of jurisdiction, which civil legislators do not have over clerics, but from the force of reason, that is, because once such a just law has been posited about a thing pertaining to all, and it can be decently kept by priests and without special difficulty, natural reason dictates that it is to be kept by clerics too; either because they are parts of such community and a part is ugly that is not in concord with the whole in things where it can advantageously be so; or because due equity will not be kept between clerics and laymen if laymen keep these sort of laws and clerics do not. This latter reason has place most in laws that define the mean of justice, such as are those that value the worth and price of things; about which things no one for that reason doubts that they are, by force of natural justice, to be kept by clerics, whether they are obliged by the force of such laws or not. And the same reason holds of laws making disposition about certain human actions, quasi reciprocal ones and ones that include a certain mutual relation among the citizens themselves; because such laws cannot with security or equity be kept by laymen without being kept by clerics, as are laws prohibiting the carrying of such and such arms or at such and such a time or in such and such a place, or prohibiting the taking of such and such things or merchandise out of the kingdom, and the like. But the former reason could have place in laws that make disposition of other actions of citizens, wherein is not found this mutual respect of equity or security or conservation or abundance of things pertaining to all; but they only pertain to the agreeable manner of living of each according to political status, as are for example laws prohibiting games of chance and the like, to which there is regularly joined a reason of scandal if clerics do not keep them.

And this opinion, that laws of this sort do not oblige clerics by force of lay jurisdiction but by force of reason, is defended by Bellarmine in his Controversiae, especially in the last edition, and is rather often inculcated in his later opuscula, namely in his book Recognitionum, and in his book Against Barclay, and in his Apologies against the king of England. And for that reason the king himself rather often bites into this very article, as in his Preface, p.25, and in his catalog of lies under the title Nova Dogmata, as at the end of his Apology. However neither is this opinion new nor is it peculiar to Bellarmine but is ancient and belongs to many grave authors, as I showed in the cited book De Legibus, and for that reason undeservedly does the king either accuse it of novelty or make complaint specially about Bellarmine. Also he does not bring forward any reason or any testimony of any moment, but only charges Bellarmine either with hatred or with less well disposed affection for temporal kings; which thing is very frivolous, except perhaps among those who think a truth repugnant to their inordinate affections to be hatred.

14. But the opinion is very well founded elsewhere in divine right simply conceding this privilege. Add too the testimonies from the Councils and the canons saying that there has been attributed to laymen no power or jurisdiction over clerics, without which they cannot oblige them directly and by force of law. Again, for this reason, kings cannot oblige clerics by laws particularly imposed on them; therefore for the same reason they cannot oblige them through common laws by the force of their command, because a law with respect to its force does not exceed the power of him who passes it. And thus this opinion, as regard this negative part, is more probable and true; but as regard the other part, of explaining the obligation from the sole force of reason, it is indeed probable; however if it is understood nakedly and precisely, it will often be found insufficient for convincing that the obligation is a serious one. And for that reason I am wont gladly to add that the obligation is also supported by virtue of the canons that dispose that these sort of laws are to be kept by clerics, which I referred to in the cited place, together with the authors who declare the obligation of such laws in this way, and together with the reasons that confirm this way of speaking. This opinion is not repugnant to the opinion that says these laws oblige by force of reason, because the latter does not exclude acceptance of the canons, or the virtue of them, nor does it prohibit recourse to it when the sole force of reason has not shown a serious obligation on clerics to observe civil laws of this kind.

15. But you will ask, on the supposition of this opinion that clerics are not obliged to observance of these laws from the force of them, whether clerics are simply to be said to be exempt, or instead not to be exempt from the directive force of such laws. The reason for doubting is that if they are not obliged by the force of them, it cannot be except by reason of the exemption from the jurisdiction by which these laws are passed, as was explained; therefore they must simply be said to be exempt from such laws. Again, he who is not held to obey from obedience to the law is certainly exempt from it; but clerics, if they are not obligated to such laws from the force of them, are not required to keep them by force of obedience due to the authors of them; therefore they are exempt from such laws. But to the contrary is that clerics are absolutely required to observe such laws; therefore they are not absolutely exempt from them, because absolutely exemption means liberty and absence of obligation; how therefore, when he remains obligated, can he be said to be exempt?

16. For these reasons authors are wont to speak in various ways. For some, although they say that clerics are not obligated to these laws by the force of them, deny nevertheless that they are exempt from them. But others think, as a consequence, that it must be said that they are exempt also from the directive force of such laws, since indeed they are not obliged by the force of them but by force of reason and canon right. To me, however, the controversy seems to be only about the way of speaking, and I consider that it can properly be said they are not exempt from observance of such laws, or from the obligation of doing what they prescribe and of refraining from what they prohibit. And nevertheless it can also be said that they are exempt from the virtue or the proper bond of the same laws; for these two things are not repugnant, and each is proved by the reasons made for each side. And thus it can be said about clerics that they observe these laws as being free from the yoke of them because they are not free from the yoke of natural reason, and of canon right, which pertains to perfect exemption and is consistent with their state.

17. Lastly it must be said that also civil laws common to all citizens and not noxious to clerics, nor unbecoming to them, do not oblige clerics as to coercive force, and hence exemption from the force of this sort of such laws belongs very much to the full liberty of ecclesiastics. The assertion is certain, and all the Catholic doctors agree in it whom we alleged in the place above cited. It also follows manifestly from the preceding; for if it is true that these laws do not oblige clerics by their own virtue, even with directive obligation, much less could they compel them with coercive force. Now the declaration is simply in this way, that a law binds by its coercive force to the extent that it imposes a penalty; this can be effected in two ways, namely, either by the very fact of inflicting the penalty or by prescribing through a judge that it is to be inflicted. In the former way a civil law cannot of its very self punish a cleric, because he is exempt in criminal cases from the secular forum, as we proved above, and this is true not only of the forum of an inferior judge but also of the supreme king, as I also showed; therefore a civil or a royal law does not proceed from a power that is coercive over a cleric; therefore it cannot of its very self punish him, because its virtue is commensurate with the power from which it proceeds. And the confirmation is that a temporal prince cannot in his actual or personal judgment pronounce sentence (which they call sentence from the man) against a cleric; therefore neither can he say that sentence has been passed on a cleric through the law, or that he is including a cleric under such sentence, because he would be declaring right outside his forum.

Nor too can laws that impose penalty in the latter way exercise their force over clerics, because they do not exercise it save through the medium of a judge; the judge therefore will be either a layman or a cleric. If the judge is a layman, not only can he not execute such penalty on a cleric, but he cannot even condemn him, nor take cognizance of his cause, or of his sin, even if he has transgressed a civil law, because he is not a competent judge of him in any cause whether civil or criminal to which a cleric may be taken as an accused, as has been shown; therefore the civil law cannot exercise its coercive force on a cleric through a secular judge. But if the judge be an ecclesiastic he is not required to impose on a cleric the penalty of the civil law; both because it will often not be fitting or accommodated to the clerical state; and especially because an ecclesiastical judge is not required to judge or to impose penalties according to civil laws but according to canon right; but if there be therein no law designating the penalty to be inflicted for such an offense, the ecclesiastical judge may impose it at his discretion. And he could, indeed, if he judged it opportune and capable of being done without inconvenience, imitate the civil laws (for the canons themselves do not disdain doing this, as they themselves say); he is not, however, required to do so. For the civil law, by designating the penalty to be imposed through the judge, is instructing, by obligating, a secular judge, and not an ecclesiastical one, over whom it has no jurisdiction. And although the law, as imposing the penalty, speaks in a common way, abstracting from the secular or ecclesiastical judge, nevertheless it is, by that reason, not among those common laws that clerics are held to observe. For uniformity in punishments and in penalties in all members of the republic does not pertain to its good governance; and for that reason neither do the canons prescribe it, nor does natural reason dictate it, but rather it demands that transgressors be punished in different ways according to diversity of status. But to define penalties accommodated to clerics for any offense at all does not pertain to the civil laws but to the ecclesiastical, and, where there is deficiency, it is deservedly left to the discretion of the ecclesiastical judge, because he himself will judge better of the quality of the penalty to be imposed on a cleric than the civil power whether it is speaking through a sentence or through a law; therefore in no way does civil law comprehend a cleric under its coercive force.

18. You will say: therefore a cleric will not be able to be punished for transgression of the civil law, or at least an ecclesiastical judge will not be held to punish him for such offense; the consequence is utterly absurd, because the directive force would be utterly ineffective without any coercive force, and public offenses against the common good would remain unpunished. The proof of the former result is that a cleric is exempt from the coercive force of the civil law; therefore he is exempt not only from such kind of penalty but also from penalty simply, because otherwise that law would exercise some coercive force on the cleric, by binding him to the penalty, or by inflicting the debt of the penalty. And a fortiori the ecclesiastical judge will not be held to punish such offense, because either the culprit is by force of such law simply not subject to penalty, or certainly the judge himself is not held to judge according to such law, and so, just as he is not held to punish the culprit in such a way, so neither to punish him simply.

19. The response is by denying the result as to each part; for the transgressor of such law, although he be a cleric, by the very fact that he has transgressed the law which he was, by some title or other, held to keep, he has become debtor to the penalty, not by force of the civil law, but by force of natural right and the right of nations, whereby the sinner is made debtor to the penalty, not only before God, but also before men when the crime offends the republic. And so the reason to the contrary fails, because this liability to the penalty does not properly arise from the coercive force of the civil law as from its cause, but from the natural law; but civil law was only as if the remote occasion, because without the positing of that law, the action would not have been evil and consequently not worthy of penalty either. Similarly, I say to the second part that an ecclesiastical judge is held to judge a like offense in a cleric if he is brought before his court, not by force of the civil law, as the argument proves, but by force of the law of justice and of his office whereby he is held to vindicate and to correct the offenses of his subjects, whatever law they are committed against. Very much the more so, because the crime is more against canon or natural law than against the civil law, even though it requires first the existence of such a law.

20. Finally it can here be asked whether this exemption of clerics with respect to the civil laws extends to the force of voiding some human acts or contracts, which force these laws sometimes exercise; but this is to ask whether a civil law that voids contracts, which are wont to be made as well by clerics as by laymen, voids also those made by clerics, as for example whether a will made by a cleric with the solemnity required by the civil law is valid, etc. I reply briefly that one must make a distinction about voidance; for one is penal, as that which is imposed as penalty, or which results from some unfitness imposed, through the law, by the right itself as penalty for some crime; but another is voidance which happens per se for the common good, although the guilt of the doer not intervene. I say, therefore, that a civil law that voids, if it is properly penal, does not comprehend clerics as to its force or act of voiding. The proof is that the civil law does not bind a cleric as to coercive force, nor as to the penalty imposed by that fact, whatever it be, as was proved; but such voiding is made through the coercive force of the law and is imposed by way of some penalty; therefore it does not bind a cleric when it voids his act, just as too, if it imposes some unfitness on a similar act, it does not bring that upon a cleric, because all the reasons made about the other penalties proceed about these too.

But if the civil law directly per se voids an act because of the common good, it must be said that it does comprehend clerics as to its force of voiding, because then it does not pertain to coercive but to directive force. And this would be manifest if it were true that laws of this sort oblige clerics by force of law and jurisdiction, because then there is nothing which may exempt a cleric from the such effect of the law, since it would proceed from the same directive force of morals. However, even when holding that these laws only oblige clerics by force of reason, Vasquez asserted it, 1.2, disp.167, ch.4, because, he says, such voidance is necessary so that the peace or the good governance of the republic may be sure. But this is not lacking in difficulty, because this positive voidance or voidance introduced by man is not done without jurisdiction and power over the person or the will whose act is voided. And for that reason we can deservedly add that the civil laws have this effect because they are simply accepted through canon right as to their directive force, and so the voidance is founded on ecclesiastical jurisdiction rather than on civil. Hence also the aforesaid assertion is to be limited so that it does not proceed when canon right sustains the act in another way, either in favor of the cleric or, so to say, in favor of the act itself, for then canon right with respect to clerics prevails. So, for example, the will of a cleric is valid without civil solemnity because canon right is content with less in favor of a last will, ch. 'Cum esses,' De Testament., and it is the same in like cases.

Chapter 17. What sort of privilege there is for churches as to their own exemption and that of their goods from burdens and from secular power.

Summary. 1. Various acceptations of 'church'. 2. Which of these acceptations is of service to the present purpose. 3. Various immunities of churches. 4. The goods of churches are twofold: some are specially consecrated, some are not. 5. Things dedicated to the divine cult are exempt from human uses. 6. All goods of churches enjoy the privilege of forum. 7. Reason for this exemption. 8. Ecclesiastical goods are exempt also from the civil laws. 9. They are exempt too from secular courts.

1. It remains to speak of the other power of human law, which is to impose burdens or taxes on subjects; and since these are wont to be imposed sometimes on persons, sometimes on things themselves, therefore we must speak about them separately. But because not only clerics but also churches themselves enjoy this immunity, we will speak first about churches themselves and ecclesiastical goods, but afterwards about clerics and their goods. We distinguish, therefore, in the first place ecclesiastical goods from the goods of clerics; for the former, as I said above, are more sacred and religious, because they are per se ordered to the divine cult and to works of piety, but the goods of clerics are of themselves merely temporal, although they adhere as it were to ecclesiastical persons, and so we will speak about them afterwards.

Now about ecclesiastical goods one must further note that many things can be included under them, among which churches themselves hold the first place, from which the other sacred goods seem to be denominated as ecclesiastical. But it can be asked what we here understand by the name of 'churches' or of 'church'. For it can be understood as the temple itself which is dedicated and consecrated for the use of sacrifice, of sacraments, and for the faithful coming together therein for prayer and hearing the word of God; or by the name of church can be understood a particular college of clerics who are deputed to each church or temple for the service of it and of the divine cult, and for the care of the faithful, and for the guarding and administration of the other sacred things and goods. Or third, by the name of a particular church can be understood the whole congregation of the faithful who belong to the same church or temple insofar as they receive the sacraments in it, and are subject to its pastor in things that pertain to the soul, and possess, for that reason, a special spiritual union.

2. And though it be true that this term is in common use in all these significations, especially the first and third, yet this last is of no service to the present purpose. Because 'church' taken in that way does not have a special ecclesiastical exemption or liberty beyond that which has regard to spiritual governance, whereof we spoke in chapter 2. Nor does that congregation have other ecclesiastical goods besides those that have regard to the clergy and the temple. 'Church' taken in the second way too, which is more frequently called the clergy or the chapter, if it be considered as a certain fictive person, has the same reason for exemption as clerics have, and so it is included under them; but if it be looked at as to the goods deputed for sacred use and for the use of the temple, and that are committed to its care, it does not in this way have any other exemption than that which we are going to explain about ecclesiastical goods. It remains for us, therefore, to speak about 'church' as it is a sacred place, to whose service or decoration, and to the sacred ministries that exist in it, and to the remaining works of piety, other ecclesiastical goods are ordered.

3. Again, 'church' taken in this way can be considered either under the general idea of sacred thing, and thus it has the exemptions or immunities common to other sacred things with which it agrees in that general idea, about which we will at once speak. Or it can also be considered under the proper idea of the place or dwelling which is ordered to guarding or protecting the persons that are in it or flee to it, or to guarding the things that are placed in it. And under this idea churches and sacred places have, insofar as they are such, certain privileges that are proper and are especially adapted to them. Which privileges are, taken generally, a result of natural reason, but taken particularly some of them are determined or declared by canon laws. For on the supposition of the sacred institution and benediction or dedication of such a place, natural reason itself dictates that it be kept immune from any action that is indecent or that is done contrary to the reverence due such a place. But which actions tend to the injury or irreverence of a sacred place, if they not be defined by ecclesiastical law, will have to be left to prudent decision.

Now in large part ecclesiastical law has determined this, by conferring the privileges of certain immunities on churches. First by defining by what actions a church is polluted according to ecclesiastical institution, and forbidding them. Second by prohibiting churches from being treated as lay houses by the receiving or admitting into them of common furniture without great necessity, ch.2 'De Custodia Eucharistiae'. Third by providing churches with immunity and exemption from forensic actions that pertain to secular courts, or to the handling of the business of politics or war, or to commerce. Fourth by bestowing on a church a special power for guarding goods deposited in it or in some way placed there, so that they cannot be removed thence by injustice without special sacrilege. Lastly, to omit other things, a privilege has been given to temples of protecting culprits who flee to them, such that they cannot be taken by violence therefrom by the secular ministers of justice without injury and grave sacrilege. With which immunities I dealt at length in tract.2 De Relig. in the whole of bk.3 and especially with the last one from ch.8 to the end, and therefore we pass over them now. For we have only touched on them so that it may be clear how a church, insofar as it is a sacred place, is exempt from the burdens or actions and, so to say, passions that are profane and prohibited by the Church. But about exemption from taxes with respect to a church in this acceptation there is no need to say anything, because, although it is an immovable thing, it is not, so to say, a thing fruitful in temporal goods or fruits, and therefore it is not capable of tax, in addition to the fact that, insofar as a church is a sacred thing, it has, as I said, every exemption common to the other goods and sacred things, about which we must now speak.

4. Besides churches, then, the other ecclesiastical goods can be divided into two members: some are what are properly called sacred things because they are consecrated by a special blessing or are instruments of the divine cult; but others are what retain the general name and are properly called ecclesiastical goods, whether movable or not, which, insofar as they are destined to the cult of God, the upkeep of ministries, the support of the poor, and other expenses of temples, are reckoned among sacred things, on the witness of St. Thomas ST IIa IIae q.99 a.5, q.185 a.7. About the sacred things of the first order it is certain that they enjoy many immunities from common uses or ministries, and from all injury and unjust alienation. For this type of immunity is founded on natural reason, because holy things should be treated in a holy way; but things that are dedicated to God, partake of a certain sanctity; therefore reason itself dictates that they are not to be transferred to profane uses. And thus in the Old Law the vessels of the temple were in great veneration and were therefore specially consecrated, as St. Thomas says, ST Ia IIae q.103 a.4 ad 9; and for that reason they could not be applied to other profane or common uses. Hence in Daniel 5 Belshazzar, king of Babylon, who dared to profane the vessels of the temple in a certain feast of his, felt at once the divine vengeance, as there Jerome and Theodoret note, and Pope Stephen I, epist.1 to Hilary ch.3, and it is contained in ch. 'Vestimenta' De Consecrat. dist.1 Nay even among the gentiles in their own way this right of sacred things was preserved, as we collect from the law ‘Inter Stipulantem’ § ‘Sacra’ ff. De Verborum Obligat., but it is now especially confirmed by canon law, as is clear from ch. ‘Ligna’, with many that follow, De Consecrat. dist.1 and ch. ‘Quae Semel’ and following 19 q.3, and from the rule ‘Semel’ from Regulae Iuris on 6, and this has been declared even by a new civil right in law ‘Sancimus’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles.

5. For this immunity pertains to a certain veneration or complimentary cult of this sort for sacred things, and therefore it has been explained in the material De Adoratione. And for the same reason this immunity does not in this way agree to other ecclesiastical goods of the second order, because they are not proximate instruments of the divine cult. And therefore the former goods are wont to be said to be exempt from human exchange and use; but these latter can exist in human exchange and be applied to ordinary uses, provided it be done in due manner and with piety, as is taken from ch. ‘Sine Exceptione’ ch. ‘Aurum’ and ch. ‘Gloria’, with many others, 12 q.2. For, because these latter goods too are in some way sacred, they require this at least by force of their institution, that they be proximately consumed only in religious and pious uses, because they have been given to the Church for this end, as many canons hand down in the said 12 q.2. But if the goods be immovable or precious, they have a special privilege, that they cannot be alienated, except in the way and for the reason prescribed by canon right, ch. ‘Nulli’, along with other things of the Church that are not to be alienated.

6. In addition, all these ecclesiastical goods can be said to enjoy the privilege of forum, or, which is the same thing, to be exempt from all jurisdiction or secular power of princes or magistrates. First with respect to administration, for they ought to be guarded, conserved, transferred, or exchanged, distributed, or, when necessary, alienated by ministers of the Church, not by laymen, to whom no power over these goods has been attributed, according to the things said in chapters 2 and 15, and from what was said there it is clear that the immunity of these things in this respect descends from divine right, on the presupposition of the Church’s institution as well as of the power given to Peter and to his successors for administering, per se or through their ministers, all ecclesiastical things. Hence in the Lateran Council under Leo X, in the bull De Reformatione Curiae § ‘Et cum Fructuum’, it is said that it is prohibited by divine right for laymen to usurp the right of administering ecclesiastical goods.

7. The reason indeed is that these goods, if they be considered as sacred, are per se ordered to a spiritual and supernatural end, and therefore, by force of divine right, the administration of them pertains to the spiritual power. But if they be considered by reason of their matter, in this way, by the very fact they have been handed over to the Church, they have been put outside the dominion and power of laymen, and have been dedicated to the divine cult and constituted by a special reason under the dominion of God, as the Council of Trent signified, sess.25 ch.1 De Reformat., when it prohibited bishops from giving ecclesiastical things “which belong to God” to their blood relatives, which way of speaking is frequent in sacred ceremonies, as one may see in many decrees, 12 qq.1 & 2, 16 qq.1 & 7, and in ch. ‘Cum secundum Apostolum’ De Praebend., where these goods are called the patrimony of Christ; which is also contained in ch. ‘Cum ex Eo’ De Elect. on 6, and in ch. ‘Tua Nobis’ De Praebend. they are said to be, by the special title and manner of tithes, the goods of God. Therefore the administration of such things pertains to them whom God has disposed as dispensers of his goods; but these sorts of dispensers are chiefly the Roman Pontiff and, under him, the bishops in their dioceses, according to the power conceded to them, as the Pontiffs and various Councils have taught, which can be seen in Gratian dist.96, especially in ch.1 and the last one, and the said 12 qq.1 & 2, and 17 qq.1 & 7. And best Ambrose on ch. 'Convenior' 23 q.8, from epist.33 to his sister. And for that reason they are said to be sacrilegious who through the secular powers usurp these sorts of ecclesiastical goods, as being violators of sacred things.

8. Second these goods can be said to enjoy the privilege of forum because they are exempt from the civil laws, such that these can make no disposition about them in particular, as is sufficiently clear from what was said in the preceding chapter, and it is taken from ch. 'Ecclesia' and ch. 'Quae in Ecclesiarum' De Constitut. and the last chapter, De Rebus Ecclesiasticis non Alienandis. It is also very plainly handed down in the Roman Council under Symmachus, which Innocent III alleged in the said ch. 'Ecclesia', and it is referred to in ch. 'Bene quidem' dist.96, where a certain law about ecclesiastical goods passed by a certain Basil, a layman and prefect of the city of Rome, although it was favorable to the Church, was declared null from defect of power, lest it should remain as an example of presumption for certain laymen, although religious, or for the powerful in any city to make any decree in any way about ecclesiastical resources, the care of making disposition about which it teaches was unshakably committed by God to priests alone. The reason is, then, that such laws are null as being made without jurisdiction; for just as the civil magistrate or the prince does not have power for administering ecclesiastical goods, so he does not have jurisdiction for passing laws by which some disposition is made about the same goods. Both because the same reason is in play, namely that these goods, by the very fact that they are by a special title made to be divine and spiritual through a special relation to a supernatural end, are constituted outside the object and matter of temporal jurisdiction. And also because legal dispositions about any goods contain, so to say, eminently and virtually the principal disposition and administration of such goods; because laws of this sort are rules by which the administration of such goods ought to be directed; therefore those who cannot administer such goods can much less create laws about them. Wherefore this exemption from civil law is no less of divine right than exemption from the administration of laymen. This exemption, however, has been determined in many ways by ecclesiastical canons prescribing the manner of alienation, transfer, and other ways of dispensing or administering these goods, as one may see in the ancient decrees alleged especially in 12 q.1, and in the whole title De Rebus Eccles. non Alien., and in ch. 'Pastoralis' about the things that are done by prelates without the consent of the chapter. Hence by the same canon laws this exemption has been increased by various privileges conceded to churches about their goods, and about alienations, prescriptions, and the like, about which here is not the place to speak, but the learned canonists can be seen on ch. 'Nulli' De Rebus Ecclesiasticis non Alienandis, and the summarists, especially Sylvester at the word 'Alienatio' and the word 'Ecclesia' 2 & 3.

9. Third, for the same reason these goods enjoy exemption from the burden of the secular court. In which briefly is to be noted that these goods can be considered in two ways, first precisely as they are sacred things, and as such it is manifest that secular courts cannot deal with them; for if any doubt or lawsuit is brought about them as they are sacred, from the very nature of the things and by divine right it pertains to the ecclesiastical court, because the matter is sacred and spiritual, such as if what is at issue is whether a church be polluted or not, or a chalice has been rightly consecrated, and the like. In another way these goods can be considered by reason of the matter, according to which they are temporal goods, and there can be litigation about the ownership of them or about the right of using and enjoying them; and in this way it is also clear that these goods are exempt from the secular court, as is noted by the Gloss, by Panormitanus, and the doctors on ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae' De Constitut. throughout the text, and through ch. 'Si Clericus' with similar ones De Foro Comp. and ch. 'Decernimus' De Iudiciis along with the others that we adduced in chapter 13. For this part more or less coincides with what we said there about the exemption of clerics in civil causes. For if clerics are exempt as to their own goods from the secular court, much more as to ecclesiastical goods. Hence this must be understood with the clarification there added, namely that it proceeds when the church itself is defendant or is brought to court by a layman, or (which is the same thing) when a layman claims that such goods are his own or that he has some right over them. If however conversely a church or its pastor prosecutes a layman for these sorts of goods, which it claims are ecclesiastical, then the exemption from the secular court does not have place, because a defendant ought to be prosecuted in his own forum, unless perhaps sacrilege has intervened, by reason of which a defendant could immediately be brought to an ecclesiastical court, as was sufficiently explained in the aforesaid chapter.

Chapter 18. Whether exemption from secular taxes is proper to churches and their goods, insofar as they are the patrimony of Christ.

Summary. 1. Ecclesiastical goods are some moveable and some immoveable: what each is. 2. What secular taxes are. 3. A twofold secular tax. 4. First conclusion: all ecclesiastical goods are exempt from taxes. 5. Proof by reason. 6. Objection. 7. First response. 8. Ecclesiastical goods are immediately under the lordship of God. 9. Second response.

1. By the name of churches, as I explained in the preceding chapter, we understand material temporal things themselves or sacred places, but by ecclesiastical goods all sacred things, both those that have been given to God or to the churches themselves for the use of churches, and those that continue under the administration of the same church or its ministers. For we will speak afterwards about the goods proper to clerics. Now these goods can be distinguished into immovables and movables. Under immovables we include not only farms, estates, houses, and the like corporal goods that have a fixed base, but also rights to proceeds, as the censuses that annual returns correspond with, and services, and the like perpetual goods that are said to be incorporeal, following the custom of right in the Clementina 'Exivi' § 'Cum Annui Redditus' De Verbor. Signific., and the things noted by the doctors on ch. 'Nulli' De Reb. Eccles. non Alienand. and the Gloss on ch.2 De Reb. Eccles. non Alienand. at the word 'Iura'. But under movables we include all other things deputed to the uses of the Church, of whatever valuation or worth they may be. For although, in their order to perpetual preservation and prohibition of alienation, the precious things of the Church are wont to be included under immovables, because they are reckoned by the same right, as Panormitanus notes on ch. 'Tua' De His quae Fiunt a Praelatis, etc., yet they do not, in their order to taxes, have a special nature, and therefore they are reckoned among movables, as such things really are, according to law 'Lex, quae Mancipia' Code. De

Administrat. Tutorum. But things that are called self-moving things, although they cannot be properly said to be immovables, as is evident of itself, insofar as they are wont to be fruitful and can by a certain succession be perpetual, they are now reduced to them.

2. By secular taxes, indeed, we understand those that can or are wont rightly to be imposed by temporal kings or monarchs or other magistrates. For as to taxes that can be exacted by the Supreme Pontiff and can be called ecclesiastical, these are not under consideration in the present case; for they are not contrary to ecclesiastical exemption, for this is exemption from the civil power, not from the pontifical. Nay, because these goods are fully under the power of the Pontiff, they are exempt from the secular power, and therefore reference is made to exemption so that that subjection may be fully realized; and thus there is no doubt but that ecclesiastical goods can be subjected to some ecclesiastical taxes, at any rate by the Supreme Pontiff, who is the supreme steward of them. But of what sort and for what causes they may come to be, and whether they can be introduced by inferior prelates, does not belong to the present consideration, as I said, but is to be treated of in the matter of ecclesiastical prebends and benefices.

3. Next, secular taxes, although they are multiple, as I said in book 5 De Legibus, are in the present case to be distinguished under two heads, according to the division posited about movables and immovables; some taxes, then, are required of immovable things and are wont to be called real taxes, or rents, or incomes, although these terms are sometimes more general. But others are taxes that are sought of movable things, as an impost, which is also called income from being brought in. For a difference is to be noted between movables and immovables, that movables, because they are not fruit-bearing, are not of themselves able to be taxed save insofar as they are subject to commercial transaction or conveyance from one place to another, and that is why such tributes receive therefrom the names of incomes etc. But immovable things, insofar as they are fruit-bearing, are per se capable of some rent, and for that reason we use this name in respect of them.

4. I say, therefore, that ecclesiastical goods, as well movable as immovable, are exempt from the payment of taxes. The conclusion is certain and common to the places of the doctors to be cited below, and it is taken from ch. 'Non Minus', and ch. 'Adversus' De Immunitate Ecclesiar., and ch. 'Quanquam' De Censibus on 6, and Clementina 1 at the same title, and in Extravag. 'Quod Olim,' at the same. Again, this immunity is confirmed in civil right, especially in the Constitution of Frederick after the books of fiefs, and it is contained also in § 'Item Nulla' Code. De Espiscop. et Clericis. Lastly a very good argument is taken from ch.2 De Censibus insofar as it says that a tax is a sign of subjection; since, therefore, neither churches nor their goods are subject to the secular power, neither can they be subject to secular taxes. Which reason is general as to all ecclesiastical goods, and other rights speak also in the same way.

5. Now so as specially to make plain the foundation for this immunity in these goods, one must note that two respects can be considered in them so as to found this immunity thereon: one is that things of this sort are under the special dominion of God, as I said; the other is that such things are specially consecrated or blessed. The former respect is general to all these goods that are named ecclesiastical, and therefore we will speak about it in this chapter; but about the second, which is less universal, we will speak in the following chapter. I say therefore that this relation to God as to special lord suffices for founding the said exemption, not only in human, but also in divine and natural right.

For if the lord of the goods cannot be subject to taxes, neither can the goods themselves be burdened with taxes, as we will also say below about clerics, both because the goods adhere to the person and follow his condition as principal accessory; and also because the payment of such tribute cannot per se be demanded from anyone else but the lord of the goods, and thus it is necessary that the tax redound on him and that it be imposed on him virtually. Yet, however, the lord of these ecclesiastical goods cannot be subject to taxes, since he is Christ himself; therefore neither can ecclesiastical goods be. And here the words of Christ fit very well: “then are the children free,” for the natural son of a king, just as he is in his person exempt from tax, so too in his own proper goods; therefore much more are ecclesiastical goods, which are the property of Christ and as it were his proper patrimony, as the Councils speak of them, free from incomes and taxes.

6. You will say that the proper and as it were proximate lordship of these goods is not in fact immediately with God, or Christ only, but with certain men or congregation of men having the right of using and enjoying such goods and of disposing them for every use not prohibited by law. As, for example, the goods of any monastery are ecclesiastical, and yet the lordship of them is with the assembly of such monastery, and the goods of some mother church are under the lordship of the whole clergy of such church, as it is a certain particular and spiritual congregation coalescent from clerics. Therefore that title of divine lordship is not sufficient for founding this exemption from taxes; because a tax is more considered with respect to the proximate lord, for by him is it to be paid. Besides too [Psalm 24.1] “The earth is the Lord’s and everything in it;” for everything is more deeply and perfectly under divine lordship than under human; nevertheless because that divine lordship does not exclude human lordship, human goods are, under this latter respect, capable of being taxed; therefore the same will hold proportionally of ecclesiastical goods. For although they be said to be in a peculiar way God’s, because they are in a peculiar way ordained to his cult, yet insofar as they are temporal goods which men must use, they cannot not be under some human lordship.

7. We reply in two ways; first by denying the assumption; for the opinion of Navarrus is very probable who asserts that ecclesiastical goods are proximately and immediately under the lordship of God and of Christ the Lord, not metaphorically, but with all propriety, such that no man or congregation of men has proper lordship, but only stewardship with greater or lesser fullness of power. Which opinion Navarrus says is the common agreement of all Catholic doctors. And he proves it at length with decrees of the Pontiffs and Councils and with reasons, as one may see in his Apologia de Redditibus Ecclesiasticis q.1 advice 18 & 24, and in the more recent edition of his tractate De Redditibus q.1 advice 16, 21, & 40, and q.3 advice 31 n.7.

8. This opinion is also satisfactorily pious and probable, and it can be proved by this reason besides others, that if any man were lord of these goods, it would be the Supreme Pontiff above all, for with him is the supreme power of managing all ecclesiastical goods, as was seen above, and as is handed down everywhere in the canons dist.96, 12 q.2, and in the titles De Reb. Eccles. non Alienandis and De Immunit. Ecclesiar. But the Pontiff himself does not have proper lordship of ecclesiastical things, even of those that belong specially to the Roman church, as is taken from the 3rd Roman Council under Symmachus, ch. ‘Non Licet’ 12 q.2. For he cannot spend or alienate these goods at will but only as faithful and prudent steward; therefore neither does the whole Universal Church have such lordship over such goods, because they seem to have been given to it in its head; just as neither does any particular church have proper lordship of its own ecclesiastical goods, because each church depends on the Pontiff in the administration of its goods, and the Universal Church is inferior to him even in this; therefore they are all only stewards of these goods and not true lords. Nor is it inconvenient that some human and temporal goods are put outside the lordship of mortal men, because the faithful, with a higher mind than human, namely by operating by faith, could and wanted to give them to Christ, and he himself, although he accept them through his ministers, can be made and is made proper lord of them.

9. But because there are not lacking grave authors who say that lordship of these things rests with men, at any rate with the Church, whether universal or particular respectively, according to the intention of those who gave such goods to churches, as one may see in Torquemada ch. 'Videntes' 12 q.1 on a.2, and in Cajetan Ila Ilae q.43 a.8; therefore one must reply otherwise, by abstracting from opinions among which perhaps, as far this point is concerned, the question is more about the name than the thing. I say, therefore, let such goods be under some human lordship, this is no obstacle to their needing to be by divine right exempt from taxes. Both because, notwithstanding the lordship of the Church, it cannot be denied but that they pertain in a special way to the right of Christ the Lord, since they are given especially for his cult and honor, because of which they are called the patrimony of Christ, as we saw; and in canon 39 Apostolor., otherwise 40, these goods are called Dominical or Dominical things; this is enough, therefore, that they should neither be applied to other uses nor be made subject to taxation. And also because the very persons or communities to which the lordship of such things is attributed are not subject to the jurisdiction of secular princes; therefore neither ought such goods to be subjected to taxes by the same princes, according to the rule posited a little above. The assumption is clear, because the Church, under whose lordship these goods are said to be, does not have this lordship as it is a civil but as it is an ecclesiastical community and as it is the mystical body of Christ; but the Church, as it is such, is not subject to the secular prince, but to the Pontiff; therefore neither are ecclesiastical goods.

Chapter 19. Whether exemption from secular taxes is fitting to the Church and to sacred things because of their special sanctity or consecration.

Summary. 1. Temples or churches, because of their consecration, are exempt from taxes of this sort. 2. First conclusion: immunity is due to sacred places also because of consecration. 3. Ecclesiastical goods ordered to the maintenance of ministers are not by reason of any consecration exempt. 4. Whether sacred things, if they are sold by reason of their matter, are subject to taxes. 5. Whether sacred things are, by force of consecration alone, exempt from human dominion. 6. Things of this sort are not exempt from human dominion. 7. A true theft is committed by him who steals the consecrated thing of any private person. 8. Consecrated things, although they are not exempt from human dominion, yet remain exempt from taxes. The matter of a thing once consecrated cannot be again applied to profane uses.

1. Another foundation for this exemption can be the special consecration, or benediction, or the deputing of such things such that they are as it were the proximate instruments of the divine cult. Which reason is not as universal as the preceding one, although in the things in which it is found it provides a sufficient cause for this exemption from taxes. And, in the first place, churches themselves among immovable goods, or temples and the like places proximately dedicated to the divine cult, do participate in this special mode of sanctity. For the other immovable goods, as are estates of churches and the like, do not have a respect of this sort but only the respect by reason of which they pertain remotely to the divine cult, insofar as they are ordered to the maintenance of the ministers. And therefore St. Thomas ST IIa IIae q.99 a.1 places these goods in the last rank of the third species of sacred things, although he attributes to temples and sacred places the second species.

2. Ecclesiastical temples and sacred places, therefore, among immovable goods merit, so to say, this sort of exemption from tributes because of a special title of sanctity. Thus is it taken from ch. ‘Secundum Canonica’, and ch. ‘Sancitum est’ 23 q.8, and ch.1 De Censibus, in which rights the site or land of a church, where it has been built, nay and the churchyards placed next to the church, and the estates especially set in place for dowry of the church (which are wont to be called manors) are exempt from taxes; therefore much more the house itself or the edifices of temples or churches enjoy the same exemption. For the other things, which are adjacent to the church and are as it were parts of it, are exempt because of the sanctity of the churches themselves; therefore much more the churches themselves, according to the rule of the dialecticians: “That because of which something is such is itself more such.” Although there could also be another reason to be considered in the case of churches, that they are not productive of any temporal proceeds nor have a civil or secular use with a measurable price, but have only the sacred use for which they were built or specially dedicated, and therefore they are intrinsically incapable of temporal tax. And the same reason for exemption is found in the site of a church, and in the reception areas, and in the other parts of places adjacent to a church that have no other profit besides the use or service of the same church. The dowry, however, or the manor of a church although it can deliver temporal proceeds, yet, because all those profits are reckoned necessary for the maintenance of the church, therefore the dowry is exempt along with the church.

3. Now in the case of the other ecclesiastical goods as well immovable as movable, which are ordered only to the maintenance of the ministers or the expenses of a church, as are money, wheat, wine, and other things consumable in use, there is no place for the special reason of consecration, as is clear, but they are exempt in the aforesaid rights alone, whether by the general idea of divine dominion or because they are necessary in their totality and without diminution for the maintenance of a church. But this latter reason can seem less universal, because sometimes the profits of some church can be more abundant, such that they exceed the expenses – unless alms are computed among the expenses, as they in fact should be, and in this way that reason too will, morally speaking, be adequate and universal. But there are other movable goods of a church that are said to be in a special and higher way sacred things, which St. Thomas above numbers in the third species and in its second rank. For in the first rank he puts the sacraments, which are not relevant to the present case; but in the second rank he puts consecrated vessels, sacred images, and the relics of saints, under which he includes also sacred vestments; nay he also generally adds everything which pertains to the adornment of a church and of the ministers; and there is the same or greater reason about the chrism and sacred oil, which can be reduced to the sacraments; and again about sacramental Agnus Deis, blessed grains, and the like.

4. About this second class of sacred things, then, it can be doubted whether, with exclusion of the relation to the special dominion of God or of the Church, they are, by force merely of the consecration or as it were sanctification that they have, exempt from the taxes of which movable things are capable, as of imposts, if they are sold by reason of their matter, or of incomes, if they are transferred from one place to another. On which doubt I find nothing specially said by authors. For they deal only of ecclesiastical goods in general, and about them indefinitely both movable and immovable, and accordingly they define universally that they are exempt from taxes. But under ecclesiastical goods they include all the sacred things that we have enumerated, and consequently they are of opinion that they all enjoy the same exemption. Now this opinion can be founded on another principle, namely that the two respects posited above, that is of a thing existing under the special dominion of God and of a thing specially sacralized and proximately dedicated to the divine cult, are distinguished in such a way that the first respect might be separated from the second as more universal than it; nevertheless the second is never separated from the first because, by the very fact that some thing is in some way sacred, it ceases to be under human dominion and pertains proximately to divine dominion alone, and hence consequently the result is that it is exempt from human taxation, remotely indeed by reason of consecration but proximately by reason of the person of Christ, under whose dominion it is.

5. Now that foundation, namely the fact that the sacred thing by the very fact that, because it is such, it is put outside human dominion, is very common among jurists; for the Gloss thinks in this way about inanimate things in ch. 'Frequens' dist.54 at the word 'Reddi', and in ch. 'Comperimus' 14 q.6, and in ch. 'Episcopus in Dioecesis' 7 q.1 at the word 'Altaria'; which glosses are proved there by the doctors. It is true that those glosses do not expressly say that a consecrated inanimate thing cannot be under human dominion, but that it cannot be returned again to vulgar and common uses, and therefore, if the thing was, before consecration, under someone's dominion and it is consecrated against the owner's will, it is not to be restored to him. Which seems to be plainly taught by Gregory in the said ch. 'Comperimus', otherwise bk.7 epist.58 indict.1 More clearly Navarrus, in the said Apologia De Redditib. advice 24 n.5, says universally that sacred goods do not belong to any mere man or men, but to God alone and our Lord Jesus Christ. Which fact is proved from § 'Nullus' Institut. De Rerum Divis., when sacred things are said to belong to no one, where the reason is given in these words: "For that which is of divine right belongs among the goods of no one." But it is not said that it belongs to no one because it so lacks an owner that it might belong to the first occupier; so it is said to belong to no one because it is not under the dominion of any mere man but under the special dominion of God, as was noted by the Gloss in the said § 'Nullus', and in law 2 and following De Rerum Divis., which glosses there are commonly approved, as Navarrus reports. And on behalf of this opinion the jurists can be alleged who say that, if anyone steals a chalice from a private house, a prosecution for theft against him does not fall to the competence of the lord of the dwelling, except perhaps in the name of God, because a sacred thing belongs to no man but to God alone, as one can see in Sylvester at the word 'Sacrilegium' §2. Next, this opinion can be confirmed, because it is not licit for laymen to handle sacred vessels or vestments, ch. 'In Sancta', and ch. 'Vestimenta' De Consecrat. dist.1, with similar ones; therefore much less are they capable of dominion over such things.

6. But this foundation thus indistinctly taken does not seem true, at least in the strict sense in which Navarrus speaks. First, because there is no ecclesiastical right by which all private persons or human communities are made incapable of dominion of such things by the very fact of their being consecrated; nor are they incapable even from the nature of the thing, for they can have true title of dominion concerning the thing itself, or concerning the matter of the consecrated thing, for there is no reason why consecration alone should take away dominion. For many theologians say that man has dominion even of grace itself, which is much more supernatural than a consecrated vessel. Next, if the private person be an ecclesiastic, in particular a priest, there is no reason for him not to be properly owner of a chalice or of other things that serve sacred ministers, because he can, on the part of the matter, make them at his own expense, and he can, on the part of the consecration, freely and of his own right use them for legitimate use, which is enough for the idea of dominion. But if he is made a layman, he can also have title of dominion with respect to the matter. And although, after the consecration, he cannot of himself licitly use those things, on account of the incapacity of his person, yet he can use them through other convenient ministers, and he can likewise concede to others the faculty of using things of that sort, and no one can, without his will, lay claim to such things or their use without injustice; here is a sign, then, that a private man, even a layman, can have dominion of such things. Next, use too and experience prove this, for many private persons possess as their property consecrated things of this sort, as sacred vestments and chalices and the appurtenances of altars, which they often have in their private oratories, wherein, or even in their own chambers, they have sacred images, relics of saints, and other blessed things, about which they also make disposition as proper owners, by giving them, lending them, or even selling them, as far as, on the part of the matter, it can be done; all which things are, by the same use, proved to be licit not only to ecclesiastics but also to laymen, for these are done by pious and prudent men, and they are tolerated by prelates without rebuke or contradiction.

7. Wherefore what the aforesaid glosses say does not seem true, that things once consecrated are not to be restored to laymen, even if they were theirs before consecration and were consecrated against their will. For in the first place Gregory does not say this in the said ch. 'Comperimus', where he was speaking about certain synagogues of the Jews, which had been transformed and consecrated into churches against their will, about which Gregory says that, although they were consecrated without cause, they are nevertheless not to be returned to the Jews but the price of the dwellings is to be paid; and he gives the reason, "because what has once been consecrated cannot be restored to the Jews." Where he does not speak universally of the lay faithful but of the infidel Jews, who wanted to turn those dwellings to profane uses, which after consecration is not licit. Hence, from that opinion on behalf of the lay faithful it is licit at most to collect that sacred things are not to be restored to them, nay nor permitted to them, so as to be used by them for profane or common acts; but if they possess them only for sacred uses and wish to retain them, there is no reason not to hand them over to them, if they are in addition assumed to have a proper right over such things. And for a like reason the other assertion of the jurists does not seem true, namely that a true theft is not committed by him who steals, for example, a chalice or some other consecrated thing from a private person who possesses it as his property. For although the circumstance of sacrilege is added to the theft, the true malice of theft is not thereby taken away, for it is the unjust taking of a thing belonging to another against the will of the owner. Nor is that injustice against anyone else except against him who possesses that thing, though sacred, as his own; therefore theft is committed against him, and there is no reason that a prosecution for theft should be denied him. The proposed difficulty, therefore, does not seem to be satisfactorily dissolved in that way.

8. Yet, nevertheless, it seems more probable to me that things of this are, by force of their consecration, exempt from revenues and the like taxes, because the rights and the doctors speak indifferently of ecclesiastical goods, under which all sacred things are included. Again, because this is very much in conformity with divine and natural right, because to these things is owed, as to things sacred, complimentary and religious cult, as is said in the 7th synod; therefore it is against reason that they be profaned by exaction of taxes. In addition, because, although we cannot deny that sacred things of this sort are sometimes under the dominion of the private faithful, nevertheless it is also true that they pertain to God by a special right and title, insofar as they are so dedicated to his cult that they cannot now be returned to profane uses, especially while they retain the consecration and the form necessary thereto; nay, even if they lose it, the matter itself, because of its relation to a prior consecration, is removed from common uses, according to ch. 'Ligna', and ch. 'Altare' De Consecrat. dist. 1. From which it also results that, although they can be under the dominion of man, yet that dominion is very much restricted and limited to sacred use alone; therefore rightly should these sorts of things be exempt from tax, both because it would seem to be being required because of the relation they have to sacred use, since they do not now have any other moral use; and also because it seems exorbitant and unjust to demand a temporal tax from the owner of such a thing, since he now possesses it, not as temporal, but as sacred and in some way spiritual.

Chapter 20. Whether any good whatever, when it becomes ecclesiastical, is by that very fact exempt from all taxes and civil burdens attaching thereto.

Summary. 1. First opinion to the negative. 2. Triple foundation for this opinion. Double confirmation. 3 Second opinion to the affirmative. 4. Double manner of imposing burdens on immovable things. 5 Goods of the Church are not exempt from taxes already contracted by some agreement. 6. The conclusion is proved by reason. 7. Elaboration of the assertion. 8. Objection. 9. Solution. 10. Goods of the Church are exempt from taxes imposed by force of royal power. 11. By what right ecclesiastical goods are exempt. First opinion. It is rejected. 12. Second opinion, which attributes this exemption to divine and canon right. Foundations for the first part. 13. Whence it can be concluded that they are by divine right exempt. Objection. Response. Why tax but not rent is repugnant to exemption. 14. Foundations for the second part of the second opinion. 15. The said opinion is not proved by the rights adduced above. 16. Other rights from which the said exemption can be concluded. 17. Proof from civil right. 18. Second proof from the same civil right. 19. Frederick exempted goods properly so called of churches from tax. Exposition of Bartolus. 20. This exposition is rejected. 21. Exposition of Baldus. It is rejected. 22. The conclusion is shown by reason. 23. Confirmation. 24. Response to the civil rights adduced at the beginning. Again, response to the reason that a thing is transferred along with its burdens. 25. A question. Response. 26. To the last confirmation.

1. This question has above all place in the case of immovable things, whereon real burdens are wont to be imposed that attach to them morally and go along with them and are paid by reason of them, insofar as they are productive or have a calculably priced use distinct from the ownership of them. But on movable goods these burdens, or real taxes, are not wont to be imposed for the contrary reason, that they are not per se productive, and therefore taxes are only demanded of them by the medium of some action, such as business, transport, etc. Yet there is no repugnance for some burden to be, by way of some service, imposed on a movable thing; and therefore a general question is proposed, whether any good whatever ceases to be subject to civil or secular burdens by the very fact that it is ecclesiastical.

Now the reason for doubt is that some rent or tax can be imposed on these goods either after they have become ecclesiastical goods or before they have been given to the Church. About the former taxes it is most certain that these goods, after they have become ecclesiastical, cannot be made subject to tax; which point proceeds universally without exception, as the rights brought forward prove and as all Catholic writers without dissent admit. But about the latter taxes there is no little controversy; for a common opinion holds that ecclesiastical goods are not exempt from the real taxes that attached to them before they became ecclesiastical. Thus does Bartolus hold on the law 'De Iis' Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., and on law 'Placet' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., Innocent on ch. 'Non Minus' De Immunit. Eccles. n.4, the Gloss on ch. 'Secundum Canonicam' 23 q.8, which opinion is there followed by Archidiaconus; again the Gloss on ch. 'Tributum' at the word 'De Exterioribus', and on ch. 'Sancitum' at the word 'Annua', and on ch. 'Secundum' at the same cause and question, and on the first chapter of De Immunitat. Ecclesiarum on 6 at the word 'Bonorum', where Johannes Monachus and Johannes Andreas teach the same thing; and Panormitanus on the said ch.1 De Censibus nn.6 & 7, and on the last chapter of De Vita et Honestate Clericorum n.12, where he explains that this opinion is to be understood of the case when the burden is perpetual and invariable, because then it is understood to be attached to the possessions, but not otherwise. The same is contained in Cons. 26 vol.1 and Cons. 3 and 6 vol.2. This opinion is also followed by Sylvester at the word 'Immunitas' 1 q.5 the verse 'Tertium', although he admits that this is not kept in Italy, and Angelus at the same word 'Immunitas' n.36, where he distinctly explains that this point holds whether the burden has been imposed by public disposition or by private disposition. The same is also more fully handed on with the same explanation by Gregorius Lopez Partit. 1 title 6, law 51, Gloss 4, and title 15 law 1 Gloss 4 at the end, where he also alleges the laws of the kingdom of Castille for the same opinion.

2. This opinion is founded, first, on certain civil rights, especially on the last law of Code. De Exactionibus Tributorum bk.10, and Authentica 'Idem Praedium' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., which is also referred to by Gratian on § 'Idem Praedium' 10 q.2, insofar as it is there supposed that the estate of the Church can be under a burden to the exchequer, that is, of paying tax to the prince, as is also noted by the last Gloss on Authentica 'Sicut Alienatio' Code at the same place. This is more expressly founded on law 'Placet' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. and law 'De iis' Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., and by comparison on law 1 Code. De Indictionibus bk.10 where it is said that the like goods are transferred to the exchequer along with the burden, even if the exchequer is wont to be made by civil right equal to the Church in privileges. Second, the opinion is founded on canon rights, ch. 'Convenior' along with the others proximately mentioned from 23 q.8, and ch. 'Si Tributum', and ch. 'Magna' 11 q.1. Third a compelling reason is added, that a thing's having a burden attached to it is transferred along with its burden; therefore if the goods, before they belonged to the Church, had this burden attached, they are transferred to the Church along therewith when they are donated or are bought by it, and consequently the Church will be held to pay the burden or tax by reason of the thing that was received. The consequence seems clear, and the antecedent is, to begin with, commonplace in right ch. 'Ex Clericis' De Pigniorib., and in ch. 'Si quis Clericus' 16 q.1 with the like. It also seems to be efficaciously proved by reason, because no one can transfer to another more right than he has himself; therefore he who does not have dominion of a thing except with such a burden cannot transfer it to the Church except with the same burden; because just as it was not in his power to have or possess the thing without such burden, so he cannot make it to be possessed by another without the burden. There is also confirmation and clarification of this reasoning, that otherwise injustice would be done to the prince or to the other who has a right to that burden, because he would be deprived of his right without his consent, which is against natural justice. There is also a second confirmation, that otherwise gifts of immovable goods made to the Church would lead to the great prejudice of temporal princes, because they would be deprived of a great part of their revenues, which they are in particular need of for sustaining the burdens and honor of their office. Which argument is very often driven home in his book by the King of England, so that he may move Christian princes against ecclesiastical immunity.

3. Nevertheless there are not lacking authors who say absolutely that ecclesiastical goods not only cannot be burdened with new taxes but that they can also be exempted from paying the taxes wherewith the goods were burdened before they accrued to the Church itself, or (which is the same) that the goods themselves can be freed from such burdens by the very fact that they have been transferred to the Church. On behalf of this opinion Panormitanus cites the Gloss on the said law 'Placet' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. and on the said law 'De iis' Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., because it says that those laws were revoked by the constitution of Frederick, which is also asserted by Cynus on the said law 'Placet' at the end. However it is not hence satisfactorily gathered that those glosses were of this opinion, unless it be supposed that Frederick spoke, in his constitution, also about real burdens adhering to the goods themselves before they reached the Church, which however the said glosses do not make clear; but they favor it in this respect, that they speak indefinitely and without limitation. This opinion indeed Cardinal Albanus attempts extensively and with sufficient diligence and elegance to prove in his tractate De Immunit. Ecclesiast., whose opinion is very pious and seems to me to approach the truth. But because he speaks too indistinctly and absolutely and because his reasons persuade somewhat beyond what is true, therefore it seems that the resolution of this doubt needs, with the use of a distinction, to be put forward more clearly.

4. In two ways, therefore, can a real burden be imposed on an immovable thing. First by force of proper dominion in respect of such thing and by the intervention of some compact between him to whom the rent is to be paid and him who is lord of such thing, or conversely between him who was first lord of such thing and him to whom he transferred it with such burden, whether he transferred direct ownership to him or merely use ownership. An example of the first member is when someone buys an assessment over another's house or vineyard; for then the thing remains burdened by such rent, which the lord of the thing is bound, with a real obligation by force of such contract, to pay to the holder of the assessment or rent, nor can he sell the thing or alienate it without such burden. But examples of the second member are when the lord gives to another his goods in fief or lease, in Spanish prazo, and it can, as far as depends on the nature of the thing, be given as assessment by transferring total ownership of the thing to another, with the exception only of the obligation of paying such burden, or by conjoining with it some part of the price, insofar as the equality of justice demands. In another way the burden can be imposed on an estate, not by force of ownership of it, but by force of supreme royal jurisdiction over such estate or in such territory; for in this way a prince can impose taxes on lands subject to him, as on the person or the movable things. And about this second kind of real burdens there is a controversy peculiar to them, that these are taxes proper, and thus have we simply called them; but the others we will call by the very general name of rents or private burdens.

5. I say first, then, that temporal goods which, before they come to be of a church, have attached to them a real private burden or rent to be paid to another by force of a preceding ownership or compact, are, even if they become ecclesiastical goods, subject to the same burden, which the church is bound to pay, nor does the privilege of exemption free it from such burden. In this matter the common opinion seems to me not only true but also certain. Nor is Cardinal Albanus in disagreement, nay he expressly concedes it in his fourth reason for the common opinion, along with its solution. This assertion can also be got from ch. 'Verum' De Conditionibus Aposit., where it is said that when goods are given to a church with a condition interposed, the condition is to be kept; but if it is not kept, the gift cannot be at once revoked, unless perhaps there is added to it: "When the condition ceases the gift should be revoked;" therefore, although the condition be onerous, it should be kept; therefore, in a like way, when once it has been imposed and adheres as it were to the very thing, it is to be kept. The same is gathered plainly from the principle that a thing is transferred with its burden; again from the principle that a pious donation or a reason of religion does not overturn the order of justice, but it would be against justice to deprive another, against his will, of the right which he has over such thing for such rent, since he is true owner of that right, in the way that such incorporeal things (as the jurists call them) can fall under ownership.

6. From which principles this reason can be put together, that when a church acquires goods of this sort and in any way, whether by legacy, or by gift, or by purchase, etc., either the thing is freed from that burden by force of the will of him from whom it receives it, or by force of some positive law, or from the nature of the thing; but none of these can be said; therefore in no way is it freed. For we are supposing that the will of him to whom the rent is due does not concur; for if he himself wishes to remit it, no question arises; but this fact is accidental and extrinsic, while here we are treating of this precise reason that the goods are made ecclesiastical. Now the first member of the antecedent is per se evident; because no one can transfer to another more right than he himself has; and also because no one can dispose of the right of another when that other himself is unwilling, since each one is ruler and arbiter of his own possession, law 'In Re Mandata' ch. 'Mandati'. The second member is plain, because no such positive law can be pointed to, whether divine or human, for the laws that speak of this matter are dealing with taxes proper. For about them Christ was speaking when he asked Peter: “Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? etc.” And the laws and canons speak only of the same, as we will immediately see. Also, morally speaking, these cannot be extended further, because they would be repugnant to justice. For human laws too cannot thus absolutely deprive men of their own possessions and ownerships, except when an evident necessity or a great advantage to the common good compels, which in the present case cannot be said, as is clear of itself.

Finally, the proof of the third member, about natural right or “from the nature of the thing”, is that it is not contrary to reason or the fittingness of religion that the Church sustain and pay real burdens of this sort. For therefrom only follows that the Church is less enriched, which is not per se unfitting, nor does it introduce any other inconvenience, especially when such goods are either given freely to the Church or the Church acquires them at a just price. For if they pertain to the sacred place itself, or to its dowry, they then have a special reason on account of which something is in right especially established about them which must be kept, as we will say in the following chapter. Finally, keeping just contracts and paying the debts that arise proximately or remotely therefrom not only is not repugnant to the Church but is rather very fitting to it; because no one is found immune from contracts, nor from the obligation that arises from them, since God himself is bound by a compact, as Baldus, more as theologian than as jurist, said on law 1 and following about compacts, and that is why he alleges the Master of the Sentences. Hence, if the thing is carefully considered, the Church is not only not incapable of this burden or obligation, when it comes along with the goods before they belonged to the Church, but can also impose it on its own goods, unless alienation of the ecclesiastical goods is prohibited to it; and, therefore, when it has power to alienate, or when there are exceptions in the prohibition, it can also impose this burden on its own goods, as we see happening everyday; therefore here is a sign that this is not repugnant to ecclesiastical goods; therefore such burden does not, from the nature of the thing, cease when it comes along with the goods themselves.

7. From which I collect that this assertion is true, and that it proceeds when the burden was imposed not only by a private person but also by a prince, if it came from a like compact and particular ownership of such thing and not from the mere power of jurisdiction. Which fact I advert to for the reason that it could perhaps be of service for understanding the authors of the common opinion. Now the reason is clear, that as a private person can have proper dominion of some estate, and by force of that dominion can impose some burden on the estate, so also can a king, as is per se manifest; but once this is posited, the reasons made for the assertion proceed equally of a king as of any private person. Hence in the case of these taxes or pensions, which are paid to princes in a fixed measure or unvarying amount from certain estates or fields, one must carefully consider whether the estates were once under the proper dominion of the prince and whether he gave them in fief or lease or for such rent simply. For if one can be certain about this, assuredly the common opinion proceeds in their case, that such goods, although they have become ecclesiastical, are transferred to the Church along with their burden, as follows sufficiently clearly from what was said. But one can be certain about this sort of origin either through ancient writings or constant tradition. And a significant sign for such authors will be if such rent is never diminished or increased, even if other royal taxes proper vary in multiple ways, and that the goods are read or believed never to have been outside the royal, right, or under the dominion of another, without the burden of paying such rent to the king. Because this seems to be a sufficient indication of that origin, and because, since the contrary cannot be established, it is rightly presumed to be in favor of the king.

8. Against the assertion can indeed be objected what is read about Joseph in Genesis 47, that when he made the whole land of Egypt tributary to Pharaoh, he nevertheless exempted the priestly land. For the tribute came not from mere royal jurisdiction but from a compact. For, when the Egyptians wanted to buy wheat from the king and did not have money, they gave, in lieu of price, their possessions, which from the king, as the proper owner of them, they received under the tributary burden of paying to the same a fifth part of the fruits; therefore, since the priestly land was exempted from that tax, a sufficient indication is given that ecclesiastical goods ought to be free even from the rents that are imposed by compact.

9. I reply in the first place that the discussion there is not about a tax before imposed but about imposing it on possessions that were before given free to the priests; for thus is it said, v.22: "Only the land of the priests bought he not... which Pharaoh gave them;" the land, then, was not exempt from a tax previously imposed but from the imposition of one. Next (which is chief) the land of the priests was not then exempt from the tax by a special privilege, but because it was not subject to the compact on which the tax was founded. For the laymen, because they were oppressed by hunger and need, sold their possessions for wheat, and afterwards, by means of a tributary burden, bought them back; but about the priests it is subjoined, v.22: "for the priests had a portion assigned them of Pharaoh... wherefore they sold not their lands." Thus therefore their lands remained free of the tax, because no selling or buying back was made of them; and thus they did not need a special exemption by privilege, since the compact, which was the foundation for the tax, did not intervene in their case. Therefore the favor to the priests was only that necessary food was provided to them from the public storehouses; which thing is now kept in the Church by the payment of tithes, which can be given wholly, even if some rents are, by a previous compact, paid from some ecclesiastical goods.

10. I say secondly that ecclesiastical goods are exempt from taxes proper, which are imposed by force of royal jurisdiction, even if such goods, before they passed to the Church, were subject to the tax and the burden. This seems to have been the chief intention of Cardinal Albanus, and it seems also to be taken from the mind of Abbas in Cons. 26 vol.1, where he uses almost the same distinction we have used. And perhaps other authors are not in contradiction, for Innocent is plainly speaking of when the Church is obliged by compact, but he does not say that it can be obliged by the mere jurisdiction of the prince.

Lastly I find this opinion made clear in the same way in Gutierrez bk.1 Practicar. Quaest. q.3 num.15, where he expounds the words of a certain law of Spain, bk.1 Novae Recopilat. tit.3 law 11, which read thus: "Clerics who purchase tributary inheritances, in that the tax is attached to the inheritance, pay such tax," that is, clerics buying estates that have taxes imposed and as it were inherent in them, are to pay such taxes. But the said author says that the said law is to be understood "when the estates were by the express and special agreement of the parties already encumbered with the burden of taxes, but it is otherwise if they were only encumbered or subject to taxes by general law; because if such goods pass to a cleric they are not transferred along with the burden." Nor does it matter that he is not speaking about the goods of churches but of clerics, for this follows a fortiori, because, properly speaking, the exemption of churches is greater and more excellent. Hence a little later he speaks in general of the goods of the Church or of ecclesiastical goods, referring on behalf of this opinion to Alphonsus Guerrero in his Thesaurus Christianae Religionis ch.36, and to Otalora, Didacus Perez, and Quesada, modern Spanish jurists.

11. Now to prove the assertion we suppose that, when such goods are handed over to the Church, they are not freed from these taxes by the efficacy of the private person making the gift or otherwise contracting with the Church; for the reasons of the first opinion, and the others made in the first assertion, manifestly prove that no private owner of any goods can exempt them by his own authority and will from the taxes due to the prince. It is necessary, therefore, that this exemption be made through some superior will, or declared by some right, or demonstrated by the prince himself through express and personal consent. Hence, because it is difficult to find a right in which such will is shown, some said it was necessary that, when goods of this sort subject to taxes are transferred to the Church, the prince, whom the taxes regard, should actually and specially consent, and at least give his assent to the donation or the transfer; for then he virtually consents to the remission; otherwise, they say, either the donation will not hold or the goods will be transferred along with their burden. But this limitation destroys the assertion; for in that way the exemption will not be made by force of the privilege of churches but by a new remission of the prince, the contrary of which we intend in the assertion, and in that sense is the question under dispute; for no one ever doubted that a prince can remit taxes by his own will. Again, from the declaration it follows that the Church either cannot acquire this sort of goods without the consent of the prince; or, if it acquire them without his consent, it necessarily becomes subject to tax as to such goods; but the first is expressly repugnant to canon right in ch.1 De Immunit. Ecclesiar. on 6, while the second we are contending is false.

12. For this reason, therefore, Albanus above tries to show that these goods are exempt from taxes of this sort by force of divine, canon, and civil right. Now to prove that it is of divine right he only adduces the place of Genesis treated a little before, and the place of Ezra chapter 7 where king Artaxerxes exempts the priests and Levites from taxes. But in the former place, as I said and as Abulensis notes, king Pharaoh did not concede a special exemption to the lands of the priests but, because need did not compel the priests to sell their lands, the consequence was that these lands did not abide subject to tax. But in the latter place the discussion is not about real taxes attaching to immovable things but about personal or mixed taxes, which are wont to be imposed by reason of movable goods; nor is the discussion about ancient taxes already imposed on the things themselves, but about a new imposition, which is forbidden to be done to sacred persons, both in themselves and in their goods. For the words of the king were these, v.24: "And also we certify you, that touching any of the priests and Levites, singers, porters, Nethinims, or ministers of this house of God, it shall not be lawful to impose toil, tribute, or custom upon them." Nothing, therefore, can be gathered about taxes before imposed and as it were adhering to the lands themselves if they become the new acquisition of those persons or of the temple. Besides, from those places a divine right is not collected, as is per se clear, but at most a natural right is indicated, though whether it be such as to induce of itself a necessity for such exemption and to confer it, or only an honor or at most an obligation for a prince to concede it, cannot be sufficiently defined from those places, but the inquiry must be made with other reasons, as it was generally disputed above and as on this particular point will be immediately mentioned.

13. About which I only see that this divine right can probably be collected from the words of Christ: “then are the children free,” by adducing them as I insinuated above, that the natural son of a king is in such wise exempt from taxes that his goods too become immune; therefore this right is to be kept most for Christ and his goods, of which sort are ecclesiastical goods, as we showed. Now the natural son of a king not only enjoys the natural privilege, that on goods already his own new taxes are not imposed, but also that, if he newly acquire the goods that under others were subject to tax, they become, under his ownership, free and liberal, as he himself is; therefore much more Christ and his ecclesiastical goods enjoy this privilege with this fullness. But if someone object that that place adduced in this way can also be proof against the first conclusion, the reply is to deny the assumption; for even the natural son of a king is not free from every burden attaching to goods by an older compact, even with respect to inferiors, because neither is the king himself free from every obligation by compact. But the reason for the difference is touched on by Panormitanus in the said Cons. 26, and following him by Albanus near the end, with a reply to the fourth reason, that taxes proper are repugnant to the exemption of the person himself whose goods they are, for they are presented to him because of the exemption, as Paul signified in Romans 13; but the other kind of rent is not a profession or indication of subjection but of justice and of his obligation arising from the compact, which is not repugnant to any person however free and excellent or supreme.

14. Secondly, so that the aforesaid author may show that this right is also a canon right, he adduces ch. ‘Sancitum’ 25 q.8, which is the same as ch.1 De Censibus, and he says that the text is express, because therein it is decreed that taxes, which were before supplied from certain goods, are not to be paid when those goods are made to belong to the Church. And he confirms the same from ch. ‘Secundum Canonicam’ 23 q.8. But if someone reply that the discussion there is not about universal goods or estates of the Church, but about the manor, the houses, the vestibules, and the gardens placed next to a church, the objection against it is that to establish a distinction between these and other goods of the Church is foreign to all reason and truth; both because the same reason of immunity that is in a garden or a manor prevails in other estates that churches acquire, namely that all are dedicated to God or belong to God, which reason is the foundation of this immunity; and also because one and the same substance of the Church ought not to be reckoned under diverse rights, ch. ‘Cognovimus’, with the Gloss 12 q.2. So he concludes that those texts are incontrovertible.

15. Yet I think nevertheless that the assertion is not proved by them; rather, from the final words can be taken a difficult objection to the contrary, as we will see in the following chapter. Because the manor and the other places of a church, which are there specifically numbered, are not only exempt from royal taxes proper but are also exempt from any rent and private burden, even a pre-existing one and founded on any compact at all, as the Gloss there and the doctors commonly understand. And it is collected from the rights themselves, to the extent they except the ecclesiastical ground, which exception strengthens the rule to the contrary as regard all other taxes. Which is so true that neither the patron himself can reserve any rent to himself from those goods; and if a burden was before incumbent on the thing itself it ought necessarily to be remitted or redeemed, so that the Church might remain free in the said goods. But yet this is not so in the case of the other estates of the Church, as Panormitanus and others expressly note along with the Gloss on the said ch.1 De Censibus and on the said ch. ‘Secundum Canonicam’ 23 q.8; and it is clearly collected from the very ch. ‘Sancitum’ at the end. Therefore necessarily a difference must be made between the goods there specifically named and other ecclesiastical goods, since that special right cannot be extended to them all. Therefore there cannot thence be taken an effective argument for what we intend, otherwise it would give equal proof about every kind of tax or temporal rent, which is plainly false. Nor is it unfitting that some part of the goods of the Church enjoy by special privilege a greater exemption. But the reason for the privilege and the discrimination between these and other goods we will deliver in the following chapter.

16. Secondly, this right can be collected from other decrees wherein is prescribed simply that the goods of churches are not subject to temporal taxes or exactions from any lay powers whatever, as is clear from ch. ‘Non Minus’ and ch. ‘Adversus’ De Immunit. Ecclesiar., and in ch. ‘Quamquam’ De Censibus on 6. However, it can be replied that in these rights only the imposition of these taxes on churches or ecclesiastical goods is prohibited, but there is no forbidding that ancient taxes, which belonged to the goods themselves before they became ecclesiastical, persist in them and are paid by churches, not because a tax is imposed on them but because they received the goods along with that burden. Hence when in the same place exactions of taxes from churches because of such goods are forbidden, the correct understanding is about exactions that are made because of taxes imposed on churches for goods already their own, both because the exactions make reference to the taxes that the discussion there is about, and also because all exactions could not otherwise be absolutely and without distinction prohibited, because some of them could be taken justly from the Church and without injury to ecclesiastical immunity, as in the case of a demand for those that are owed by a just title and in an ecclesiastical court, if coercion be necessary. But although this interpretation is sufficiently conformable to the words and mind of those rights, nevertheless we believe, by identity of reason, that an efficacious argument is thence taken that the decision of those rights extends also to ancient taxes and to the exactions that are made because of them, which we will explain by adducing a little below the reasons for the assertion, for first we must ponder some other rights.

Thirdly, then, this canon right can be collected from ch.1 De Immunit. Eccles. on 6, where there is first a report of a complaint against and an abuse of secular powers that “strive and study to make churches pay collections to them, and tallies, and other things of this sort, on pretext of the goods they have acquired, or that they release acquisitions of this sort from their possession.” And afterwards such abuse is condemned and the declaration is made that “it is not licit for any who exercise temporal jurisdiction to impose any exactions on churches or to exact them from the same for houses, estates, or any possessions at all legitimately acquired hitherto by churches or to be acquired in the future.” In these words I weigh first that there is not only reproof of exactions from goods that were already in the possession of the Church when the tax was imposed, but also from goods that are later acquired, even if such goods, when they were secular before, were subject to taxes. For that the discussion is about this sort of goods is manifest. For that is why laymen wish to compel the Church either to pay the tax or to give up the goods, lest they themselves be deprived of the tax attached to the good; therefore that right is speaking about these tributary goods and it has nevertheless established that such goods, by the very fact they are transferred to the Church, are exempt from exactions of such taxes. Hence also I weigh that a prohibition is there distinctly and universally made against “imposing or demanding any collections or exactions at all,” namely in respect of ecclesiastical goods; therefore not only is there a prohibition to impose them but also to exact those that had already been imposed before the Church acquired the goods. And this text, adjoined to the preceding ones that were proximately mentioned, seems to me to give sufficiently probable proof from canon right of this opinion.

17. It remains to speak of civil right whence certain words of Justinian are wont to be adduced, whereby this assertion seems to be signified, and in the first place those words are adduced that Gratian reports in ch.2, 10, q.2: “Those things that pertain to the rights of the most blessed Church, or that will perhaps have hereafter come to it, it is fitting venerably to guard untouched, just like the sacrosanct and religious Church itself.” Which words were of the emperor Leo, and they are reported by Justinian in law ‘Iubemus’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccl. Now in them it is said generally that all goods that come to the Church are to be kept untouched like the Church itself; therefore it is not licit to exact taxes for them, just as not for the Church either. But as I was saying above in a similar case, if the argument were efficacious it would prove too much, namely that all goods of the Church ought to be so kept untouched that no rent or burden, even one coming from a preceding compact, could be exacted for them, because the Church itself, or its land or site, enjoys this immunity, which we showed to be false. Therefore the equivalence is to be taken, not universally, but according to the subject matter. Hence one must note that in the law alienations of ecclesiastical goods are specifically prohibited, and that in this sense they ought to be kept untouched, that is without diminution or sale or any like change, just as churches themselves are preserved. And thus does the Pontiff take that decision on ch. ‘Nulli’ De Rebus Eccles. non Alien. when he concludes thus: “Let all priests abstain from alienation of this sort, fearing the penalties that the Leonine constitution threatens.” Therefore that word ‘untouched’ is extended without foundation in the text to taxes and especially to those that adhere to goods before they become ecclesiastical. For if the Church receives goods under such a burden, although it afterwards pay it, it does not for that reason alienate anything, because such goods were from the beginning not integrally, so to say, transferred to the Church but with the diminution of such burden, and therefore when it afterwards pays them it does not alienate its property but pays a just debt.

Hence even Gratian adduced the words of that law, not for exemptions from taxes, but for alienations, and he adduces for the same purpose many others of the decrees of the Pontiffs, both there and also in ch. ‘Praedia’ 12 q.2, wherein some words are general and are by certain people not rightly applied to taxes, as are those in epist.2 of Pius: “It has been brought to the attention of the Apostolic See that some are applying to human uses estates handed over for divine uses, and are taking them away from the Lord God, to whom they were delivered, so as to serve their own uses; wherefore the insult of that usurpation is to be by all repudiated, lest estates dedicated to the uses of heavenly secrets be vexed by some people’s intrusions.” By which words some wish that all taxes from ecclesiastical estates be prohibited, because the payment of tax is a certain human use while all application of such goods to human use is there held to be prohibited. But although this might by a certain accommodation be applied to royal taxes proper, yet not universally to all temporal burdens or rents which the Church from its estates, even lay ones, can, according to the first assertion, pay by a just antecedent title. The discussion in that place, therefore, is only about a human use that is unjust and usurped contrary to the right of the Church, as those words make clear: “are taking them away from the Lord God, to whom they were delivered.” Yet the payment of a rent due by just title is not an unjust use, nor by it is taken away from God what had been given to him, for from the beginning it was given with such burden; therefore the right to such burden was not given, and thus is not taken away from God that which was delivered to him but that which was reserved in the gift itself. And therefore it can also be said that that use is not properly of ecclesiastical goods as they are such but as they have remained in some part subject to secular burdens. Wherefore unless it be proved from elsewhere that taxes do not persist in goods after they become ecclesiastical, it is not proved from those and the like words that the payment of such tax pertains to alienations or other prohibited uses of ecclesiastical goods.

18. Next the assertion can be confirmed from law ‘Iubemus’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., where Valentinian and Marcian confirm ecclesiastical privileges, and they subjoin: “Because it is a mark of our humanity to look out for the needy and to see to it that they do not lack victuals, the salaries too that have hitherto been ministered in diverse kinds from the public funds to the sacrosanct churches, we command now also to be provided undisturbed and undiminished by absolutely anyone, and to this most ready liberality we give lasting certainty.” From which words and by likeness of reasoning a not improbable argument can indeed be taken, but the words do not formally or dispositively prove the thing intended; because that law makes no disposition about exemption from taxes but only confirms the salaries, or subventions, or annual payments which the emperors had commanded to be made to the churches from the public goods. But it can hence rightly be collected that it was not the will of the emperors that imperial taxes should be exacted from the acquired goods of the Church, since rather the emperors themselves prescribe the giving to the churches of many of the other goods for the subvention of the poor. Hence also that reason about the subvention of the needy gives no less persuasion that the fruits of ecclesiastical estates should be kept undisturbed and undiminished by public taxes than that other subsidies should be which were for the same end being provided to the churches from the public goods.

19. This civil right, therefore, is reckoned to have been properly disposed and passed by the emperor Frederick in his constitution, wherein he established generally that “no community or public or private person may presume to impose collections or exactions...on churches or pious places.” Since this law speaks indefinitely, all exactions of taxes proper, which are called collections or by some other like name, are prohibited to be made from churches and their goods. However it is opposed by the exposition of Bartolus on law ‘De iis’ Code. De Episcop. et Clericis, where he says that the constitution of Frederick must be understood only of personal or mixed taxes, which are imposed on a person for things; for these alone are properly called collections, and therefore the constitution does not prohibit the estates of the Church from being subject to tax, so far as it is laid down in the same law ‘De iis’ and in law ‘Placet’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. And therefore he faults the glosses that there say that the laws ‘De iis’ and ‘Placet’ have been abrogated by Authentica ‘Item nulla’ Code. De Episcop. et Clericis. Which opinion was also approved by Panormitanus in the said ch.1 De Censibus.

20. But it is rightly faulted by Baldus on the said law ‘Placet’, and taken universally it seems improbable. For it follows therefrom that the estates of the Church are, by force of that Authentica, or of the constitution of Frederick, and consequently by force of civil right, not exempt from real taxes, even those freshly imposed after the estates have become ecclesiastical, if the taxes are imposed as ordinary and perpetually lasting; the consequent is altogether false and is rejected by everyone, as at the beginning of this chapter I supposed from what was said in the preceding one. The proof of the implication is that the aforesaid taxes were permitted by the said laws ‘Placet’ and ‘De iis’; therefore, if they have not been abrogated by Frederick, they still remain in force, and consequently by force of civil right the estates of the Church will be subject to tax, even as regard taxes imposed after the Church had acquired such goods. Wherefore it cannot be denied but that the Authentica ‘Item Nulla’ speaks also of real taxes, for it absolutely and universally prohibits any exactions to be imposed on churches; now under the name of exactions come all taxes, as well ordinary as extraordinary, and as well real as personal, especially because in the text itself there is an express distinction of “exactions being imposed on churches, and pious places, or ecclesiastical persons” and all of them are prohibited; therefore also the Church and pious places are exempted from the imposition of any tax.

21. A response may be made in another way that there indeed exactions are prohibited from being imposed on churches and pious places, but not the demanding of those that had been previously imposed on goods that were transferred to the Church along with that burden. And thus does Baldus limit the constitution along with a certain Jacob on the said Authentica ‘Item Nulla’ num.4; but he adds that the emperor does not permit Italian estates to be subject to tax, but that outside Italy, where there are estates subject to tax, they are transferred to the Church along with their burden. However this distinction and limitation is not to be admitted. First, because the benefit made by the prince is to be interpreted liberally, especially in a cause of religion according to the common law ‘Sunt Personae’ and the following ones De Religiosis et Sumptib. Funer. Second, because a universal privilege extends to things present and future according to ch. ‘Quia Circa’ De Privileg., and it is noted by Bartolus on the said law ‘Placet’ num.8. Therefore, by force of that constitution, all the goods were exempt from taxes that were ecclesiastical at the time when the privilege was conceded, even if before they were burdened with taxes; therefore much more is the same to be kept in the case of all goods afterwards acquired by the Church. Third, because the word ‘impose’ does not strictly seem there to signify a new imposition of tax, because the supreme prince alone can in this way impose tax, and yet there the prohibition is given to all communities and persons, not only public but also private; therefore the word ‘impose’ must there signify or comprehend an action that can be carried out by them all; therefore the prohibition is there of every petition or distribution or imposition of paying tax that may be made of the Church, whether from goods acquired or to be acquired. And in this way there is also a satisfactorily probable confirmation of this opinion from civil right.

22. But beyond these rights the aforesaid author adduces various reasons to confirm the same assertion, which can be seen in him; only one must beware that some are too general and concern all burdens or rents, as well public as private. Again I take note that many of them, if they are carefully considered, suppose rather than prove that the privilege of exemption extends to ancient taxes. Wherefore those reasons seem to me effective that are taken either from the general idea of tax or from equivalence between ancient and new taxes. Such is the reason that taxes proper are imposed by right of subjection, whence they are by the same right exacted and paid, according to the saying of Paul Romans 13.5-6: "Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake. For for this cause pay ye tribute also;" therefore when the subjection ceases the tax cannot justly be exacted, because with the cessation of the reason for the debt the debt ceases, provided the reason is adequate, as it is in the present case. But yet all goods whatever, by the very fact that they become ecclesiastical, cease to be subject to a lay prince, because they come to be outside his jurisdiction; the Church itself too, to which the goods pertain, is outside the jurisdiction of the same prince, and much more the Prince himself Christ, whose the goods are; therefore by the very fact that such goods become ecclesiastical, they become exempt from all taxes that are founded on jurisdiction alone. Just as, if a person subject to one king is exempted from the jurisdiction of the same king, by that very fact he is exempted from taxes to him; nay, not only the person but also his goods are exempted from these taxes, by which reason of person they are imposed; therefore likewise, when immovable goods are transferred to such state that neither they themselves, nor those who have the ownership or use of them, so to say, nor the proper and principal owner of them remain under the jurisdiction of the prince, they are exempted from taxes.

23. This reason is also confirmed from the other principle of right, that when some disposition reaches the case where it could have begun, the prior disposition ceases, namely when the same reason militates against the continuation as against the beginning. But so it is in the present, for the imposition or exaction of tax cannot begin in the case of ecclesiastical goods; therefore it cannot continue in the same goods after they have been made ecclesiastical. Therefore in the imposition by a prince of such tax this condition is understood to be included, so that it lasts as long as the thing will be unsuitable or incapable of such tax; for then, as the tax could not begin, so neither could it be preserved, because there is the same reason about both, as has been made clear, and it will be clearer from the response to the foundations of the first opinion.

24. To the civil rights, then, the response is that all laws which permitted ordinary taxes to be exacted from churches are revoked by the constitution of Frederick, whence to law 1 'De Indictionib.' the response is that the public exchequer must not be made equal in everything to the Church, for it is just that the Church enjoy greater privileges. Now the Authentica, which supposes that burdens of the exchequer can exist in the goods of the Church, could be true in burdens of the first kind, if perhaps the goods that have passed to the Church were first under obligation by a contract or quasi-contract to the exchequer, and in that case the decision can have place that Gratian reports in ch.2 § 'Item Praedium' 10 q.2. To the canon rights we will expressly reply in the two following chapters. To the reason that a thing is transferred along with its burden the reply is that it efficaciously proves the first assertion but is not compelling against the second. Now the reason for the difference is because the axiom proceeds when the thing is not transferred to a state wherein it becomes incapable of such burden; for if the change is that great, the necessary consequence is that the thing is exempted from such burden. For thus a servant, if he be legitimately ordained, is exempted from the burden of servitude, and a consecrated thing, although before it was subject to mean or profane functions, is by force of consecration exempt from them. So, in the present case, goods when they become ecclesiastical are constituted in a certain higher state, wherein they are incapable of taxes but not of other real burdens that arise from private contracts; and therefore by such change taxes proper cease, but not other rents, except in the special cases expressed in the right. Then too it is necessary that either he who had some right over such goods consent to such change in them, or that recompense be made to him according to what we will say in the following chapter.

25. But someone will ask why the same is not required with respect to a prince when goods tributary to him are transferred to the Church. For, since he suffers thence a loss or diminution in his goods, it seems he is unjustly done by if such change is made without his consent or without compensation. The response is that neither of these is necessary here. And the reason for the difference is that the prince did not before have proper dominion, or any particular right equivalent to dominion, by reason of which tax was owed to him, but he could only exact it by reason of jurisdiction, because the thing itself or its owner was under his superior administration. But no reason of justice compels the thing to be kept under the jurisdiction of the temporal prince, because its owner can freely dispose of it. Most of all, indeed, he can dedicate or give it to God, by which gift such goods become ecclesiastical, but the consent of the prince is not necessary for secular goods to become ecclesiastical. Which, as I said, and as is cautioned by canon right and by divine natural right, seems satisfactorily founded on the said reason.

Nor does it matter that the revenues of the prince could thence be diminished, because the diminution does not happen in his own proper goods, but in his common stipends; it is also per accidens, for it follows from subtraction of the material, done religiously and justly, and for this reason no recompense is due. Especially because it can also happen contrariwise, that if ecclesiastical goods are sold and become secular, they begin to be subject to tax, and thus the revenues of the prince are increased. All which things do not have place in private burdens that began from special right or ownership, as is sufficiently clear from what has been said. Add that the cessation of tax in that case does not happen by the private will or authority of the giver, but happens by the authority either of a divine right or of a human right founded on the divine. And so there too the prince's consent, given by right itself in virtue of the said civil law, is not lacking, who could not any more revoke it after the Church has received the benefit and privilege; although even without that it could be done by virtue of divine right, or also of canon right, as was above shown generally about this ecclesiastical exemption.

26. Hence the reply to the final confirmation is that the loss is not ordinarily of great moment, nor is account taken of it, because of the reasons given. But if it sometimes happen that so many goods have accrued to the Church that it redounds to the grave prejudice or great diminution of the royal revenues, the Supreme Pontiff is to be consulted, for it concerns him to apply a remedy in cases of this sort. For it is not licit for Christian princes "to take possession of ecclesiastical goods", as is expressly said in the said Authentica 'Item Nulla', nor can they make a disposition or decision about them either, as has been proved above.

Chapter 21. Certain objections are met, and explanation is given by the by of how ancient this exemption of ecclesiastical goods is.

Summary. 1. First objection from canon right. 2. Second objection from civil right. 3. Response to these objections. 4. First conclusion: how ancient the privilege of not paying taxes is from the goods of the Church. 5. The Supreme Pontiff can of his own power exempt the goods of the Church from taxes. Proof. 6. Second conclusion: the privilege of exemption for the goods of the Church has not always been observed. Proof. 7. Exemption of the goods of the Church was established before Frederick by the civil laws. 8. Triple response to Ambrose. 9. First response to ch. 'Tributum'. Second response. 10. It is attacked. True response. 11. To ch. 'Sancimus'. Goods that relate to the manor of the Church are exempt from all tax. 12. Response to the civil laws adduced to the contrary.

1. Against what has been defined in the previous chapter certain objections are possible that can urge that the doctrine is false, or at any rate too novel. And from canon right is firstly objected ch. 'Si Tributum' 11 q.1, taken from Ambrose's oration or 1st speech De Basilica non Tradend. towards the end, where he says: "If the emperor requires tax, we do not say no; the fields of the Church pay tax." Like things are also contained in ch. 'Convenior' 23 q.8, taken from the same oration, and from epist.33 to his sister, which is now 13 in book 2. Secondly is objected ch. 'Tributum' 23 q.8, where Pope Urban speaks thus: "Tax was found in the mouth of a fish when Peter fished, because from external things, which appear openly to all, the Church renders tax." And later: "From the external things of the Church, that which was anciently established is to be paid to the emperors, for the peace and quiet whereby they must guard and defend us." Thirdly is objected ch. 'Sancitum est' 23 q.8, where the Church along with its gardens, halls, and the houses attaching to it, and its manors are specifically said to be exempt, but there is afterwards added: "And if they have anything further, due service is devoted therefrom to the seniors;" by which words some tax is signified, as everyone understands and as they themselves show on their face. This then is the general rule, that the goods of the Church pay tax, except for those few that were put at the beginning, which exception establishes the rule for the rest. And although that chapter be from the Provincial Council of Worms ch.50, it was accepted for the Universal Church in ch.1 Extra De Censibus by Gregory IX, who lived only about four hundred years ago.

2. Second there is principally objected from civil right law 'Placet' Code. De Sacros. Eccles. which is from Honorius, and from Theodosius on law 40 De Episcop. et Cleric. in the Theodosian Code, where, although churches are exempt from mean duties and from extraordinary taxes, they are not however exempt from ordinary ones, as is clear from the words in Justinian: "Nothing beyond the canon payment," that is, beyond the imposition that is ordinary and established by certain rule. Nay, something can also be exacted "if the sudden burden of an adventitious necessity demands;" which law was inserted in his decree by Gratian on ch. 'Generaliter' § 'Placet' 16 q.1, signifying that canon right does not repudiate that law. Secondly, there is objected law 'De iis' Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., where the estates of clerics are said to be under compulsion "to payments to the exchequer", but under the estates of clerics seem to be understood also those of churches. Thirdly, there is objected the last law of Code. De Exactor. Tribut. bk.10, which contains the following: "If a divine house, or any other house of any dignity and fortune, possesses lands by any title and does not acknowledge the imposed duties of the republic in the way the previous owner was performing them, let their possessions be in every way claimed for the public;" where the Goss expounds public duties as, it says, “the taxes, allotments, burdens of things, and so what is transferable along with the things themselves.” For thus did the emperors give in rescript that “among revenues belong estates themselves,” law ‘Imperatoris’ and following De Publicanis et Vectigalibus, and that accordingly taxes of this sort are real burdens and are owed by churches according to that law, whatever the reason be whereby the estates came to them.

3. To these objections we can reply in one word, that those rights proceed according to ancient custom, but they have now been revoked and greater privileges have been conceded to churches. Which response may be ungrudgingly accepted for the civil laws, insofar as they are handed on by the Glosses on the said law ‘Placet’ and the said law ‘De iis’. But as for what regards canon right, it is incredible that taxes of this sort were ever approved by it, especially after the times of the Christian emperors; and therefore, before we respond to them one by one, we must explain how ancient, as to this point of taxes, the exemption of churches is; for I judge that the same opinion more or less is to be held about it as what I said in earlier chapters about exemption itself in general, because this is a certain part of ecclesiastical immunity and is no less necessary, nor less consonant with reason, than that is. Therefore the distinction given above is here also to be made by way of preface; namely that it is one thing to speak of the right but another of the fact.

4. First, then, I say that the privilege or right of not paying taxes from ecclesiastical goods was introduced from the beginning and grew up, as it were, along with the Church itself. This is readily apparent from what was said above in general about the origin of ecclesiastical immunity, and it must be made clear in the same way. For, in the first place, I reckon that this right arose intrinsically from the very institution of the Church as it was made by Christ; for by force of such institution the Church is capable of acquiring goods, both immovable and movable, that are destined for the cult of God alone and for works of piety. For the Church does not have this capacity or power from the emperors or from men, but has it intrinsically and from the nature of the thing, by the very fact that it is an assembly of mortal men having a special unity and bond from Christ’s institution; whether such capacity be considered in the Church from the fact that it is an assembly of men with the use of liberty, which is the foundation of dominion over external things; or whether it be considered in the way that the Church is one body whose principal head is Christ, who is much more capable of such dominion. Hence, from the beginning of the Church, the faithful began themselves to hand over to the Church their own goods, which by that very fact became common to the body itself of the Church through which they were distributed to individuals as to the use of them, as is manifest from the Acts of the Apostles. And although then the Church only had movable goods, it began a little after to acquire immovable ones, not by extrinsic privilege, but by intrinsic power and the prudent will and stewardship of the pastors of the Church, as we understand from Pope Urban in his letter ch.1, and it is contained in ch. ‘Videntes’ 12 q.1. Now Urban lived in the year 227, and yet he places on record that it had already been ordained by the Supreme Priests that the estates, which were being given to the Church, were not to be sold but to be kept under the power of the same Church, so that from their revenues it might the better assist all the needs of the faithful. Which custom was from the time of Constantine much indeed increased, not because Constantine gave the Church itself the power of acquiring such goods, but because by his faith he gave to all the opportunity for giving to the Church whatever they wished, and by his own example preceded and aroused them, as is taken from an edict about the primitive Church and the munificence of Constantine which is contained in vol.1 of the Councils, and in ch. 'Futuram' 12 q.1.

From which we further collect that, from the same institution of the Church, as it was made by Christ, intrinsically arose that these goods, which are given or accrue to the Church, accrue to Christ as principal lord, because they do not accrue to the Church except as it is a mystical body whose principal head is Christ. And therefore, although there is in the Church power to dispense these goods, it is only a ministerial power coming down from Christ, and it resides principally in the pastors of the Church, because they are the stewards of the mysteries and the goods of Christ on earth. And hence ultimately the right of exemption of such goods from human taxes seems necessarily consequent on the institution of such Church, because the head of this Church, which is principal lord of such goods, has not only a connatural exemption but also a connatural power and lordship over all the kings of the earth. Hence there is no doubt but that Christ could also immediately and of himself exempt such goods from taxes by the very fact that they are his own, and because this is very much in conformity with the divinity and excellence of his person.

5. One must add besides that, even if such goods had not been by divine right itself immediately exempt from taxes, the Pontiff could by his own power exempt them, as we said above about persons; for almost the same reason holds, with proportion preserved. Hence just as the Church always had this power, so also did it always have the right to enjoy this immunity as to ecclesiastical goods. Now the proof is first from the principle that Christ has the right; therefore he committed the prudent execution of it to the pastors of the Church and especially to his Vicar, just as he chiefly committed to them also the stewardship of his other goods. Second, for this reason the Vicar of Christ has the power and obligation of managing well the patrimony of Christ; but one of the chief acts of this management is to vindicate those goods from burdens and taxes, as piety and the reason of religion, with justice preserved, demands. Just as from the beginning of the Church, therefore, the management and stewardship of such goods existed in Christ's Vicar and in the bishops, as is extensively proved in Decrees 96 d. and 12 qq.1 & 3, so also the right of exemption of such goods existed perpetually in the Church. Third, the same reason holds for exemption from jurisdiction and from taxes; nay this second part follows from the first, as was proved; but the Church, by force of dispensing and managing such goods, always had the power and right to exempt these goods from secular jurisdiction, as was proved above; therefore it always had the same right about taxes as well. Lastly an explanation and a very good reason for this power is given, that ecclesiastical power, as it exists in the head and in the Vicar of Christ, is supreme in its order; and because that order is more divine than the rest, therefore it is also supreme simply with respect to all the powers of the earth. That power, indeed, although it be spiritual, needs the use of temporal goods for convenient government and the execution of its power; therefore too, so that it may deal with the temporal goods committed to it, it is a power simply supreme; therefore it suffices of itself for exempting these goods from the impositions that may be made by some other earthly power. Hence the Pontiff himself can burden such goods with taxes, independently of the other's consent, as supreme governor, provided he do it as faithful and prudent steward, according to Clementin. 1 'Ut Lite non Contestata' at the end, along with similar ones; but the Pontiff could not have so free and supreme a power if he could not exempt those goods from the encumbrances of other princes; otherwise such goods would rather often be too greatly burdened, if one power did not yield to the other. But if one of the two powers is to be acknowledged and preferred, it ought assuredly to be the spiritual power, as was often said and proved above.

6. Second we must speak about the fact or the execution of this exemption from real taxes imposed on immovable goods, and say that it was not always necessary in the Church, nor always possible, nor is it known for certain when it began; but that it is nevertheless likely that it was introduced and preserved from the beginning of the Christian emperors, as far as could be done by the pastors of the Church. The first part is manifest about that primitive time when the Church did not have these immovable goods, but sold the fields and estates offered to it by the faithful for the support of the common burdens, as is said in the said ch. 'Videntes'. For, at that time, there was not in the Church the matter or foundation for such taxes, and therefore we say that exemption of this sort was not necessary to it. The second part proceeds about the second period of time, from when the Church began to possess and retain such immovable goods (according to the same ch. 'Videntes') up to the times of the Christian princes or of Constantine. For at that time the emperors and kings, to whom these taxes were paid, were not sons or subjects of the Church; nor were they able, since they lacked faith, to understand what sort of right the Church had to the free use of such goods; and therefore the Church could not at that time either effectively or fruitfully, nay nor without scandal, use the right. The third part about uncertainty can, in the first place, be taken from the objections that have been made. And next because we do not find rights from which to collect clearly and with certitude the beginning of this execution or observance of exemption.

Now I say that this beginning as to the cessation of the first period of time is uncertain; for as to the assertion of the other period of time, wherein the exemption was established as going to endure always into the future, it can be assigned with sufficient certainty at least from the time of Frederick II and Honorius III, as is sufficiently clear from what has been said. But that the use of this exemption was established, at least by canon right, before that time is manifest from the Lateran Council under Alexander III, which took place almost a hundred years before, and from the other Lateran Council under Innocent III celebrated later, ch. 'Non Minus' and ch. 'Adversus' De Immunit. Eccles. And from the same decrees we collect that this right did not begin with them but was older, and was in those Councils confirmed under more severe censures and declarations. Hence although perhaps there may not be found an older decree expressly and in this kind establishing this exemption of ecclesiastical goods, we conjecture with probability from this very fact that by Pontifical right, not so much written as unwritten, by tradition, and by the precepts of the prelates this immunity was observed in the Church from when the Pontiffs began to have their unencumbered and free power to administer goods, that is, after the impediment of the heathen emperors was removed.

7. Hence it also seems to me likely that Constantine conceded at once this exemption to ecclesiastical goods, or rather consented to it (see the edict of Constantine cited above, and Eusebius Hist. bk.10 ch.5, and his oration De Laudibus Constantini). For all the histories hand down that he at once commanded all goods to be restored to the churches, and not only gave estates with the greatest liberality to the churches, but also fortified them with great privileges. And he was imitated by his pious and Catholic successors. Nay, Baronius notes for the year 387 n.13 that, after the gentile emperors, only the apostate and heretical emperors demanded tax from the goods of the Church, and first among them was Julian the Apostate. Although, therefore, there is not found in the Code of Justinian or the Theodosian Code a civil law that expressly concedes this privilege before the constitution of Frederick, one must nevertheless believe that long before, nay from the beginning of the Christian emperors, it had been conceded or admitted by them (see the Theodosian Code at the title De Episcop. et Cleric in many of the laws, especially the last ones). And although there was sometimes interruption, borne patiently but not consented to by the Church, yet it was done by tyranny, both because it was against divine and canon right, and also because such privilege, once conceded, could not be revoked; and therefore whenever emperors generally renew the privileges conceded to the churches by their predecessors, this too must be reckoned to be included in them.

8. In answer to Ambrose, then, on ch. 'Si Tributum' 11 q.1, the Gloss there seems simply to concede that the estates of the Church are subject to taxes, and to enjoy a privilege only in this respect, that, should the Church not pay, its goods could not be claimed in vindication. But if this be understood about that period of time, it is altogether false; if, however, it be understood about Ambrose's time, it is more tolerable but not true. The other Gloss, therefore, on ch. 'Secundum Canonicam' 23 q.8, understands that text of the real burdens with which the goods were transferred to the Church; and it thinks, from the opinion of Ambrose, that the Church is bound to pay them. But it seems to understand it about taxes proper, for about them Ambrose is certainly speaking, as is clear from the words: "If the emperor requires tax, etc." But in this sense the opinion would be false, and so we do not admit it. The true understanding, then, of Ambrose's words is what Cardinal Albanus above extensively treated of, and it is embraced in one word by Cardinal Baronius above who says that Ambrose said those words rather by permission than by approval, and asserting the fact, not acknowledging the right. For it is likely that, at that time which was the time of Valentinian the Younger and when he was a boy, Justina his mother, governing for him and an Arian, had exacted some tax from the churches; and Ambrose wisely judged that she was not to be then resisted, either to avoid scandals or because greater dangers were then threatening the Church which were more in need of being met, and they could not all be resisted at the same time. Hence Ambrose subjoins with the same tenor of words: "If the emperor wants fields, he has the power to claim them; none of us has intervened; the collection from the people can redound to the poor; let them not stir up jealousy about fields; let them take them if it please them." Moreover, explaining the sense in which he says this, he subjoins: "I do not give to the emperor, but I do not say no," as if he were to say, I permit but I do not approve. Much more easily, indeed, could tax be permitted than usurpation of estates; for this latter so contains injustice and sacrilege that it cannot be excused by ignorance, while the exaction of taxes does not so bear intrinsic malice on its face that it cannot be hidden by ignorance or excused by color of some apparent title. And therefore this could by Ambrose be more easily pretended, since he reckoned too that the tax was not then altogether unjust, for later in the same oration he subjoins: "We pay what is Caesar's to Caesar and what is God's to God; the tax is Caesar's, it is not refused; the Church is God's, to Caesar it should certainly not be assigned, because it cannot be Caesar's right." And such too is the response to ch. 'Convenior'.

9. To ch. 'Tributum' the same response is applied by Albanus above, namely that Urban spoke about the fact, not about the right, when he said that tax is paid by the Church voluntarily and to avoid scandal, not from obligation or debt. And to prove this he adduces the words: "For the peace and quiet, etc." But the interpretation seems forced, for the words of the Pontiff are: "That which was anciently established is to be paid to the emperors, for the peace and quiet whereby they must guard and defend us." Of which words the sense is not that tax is to be paid for the sake of avoiding scandal and keeping the peace, but is to be paid to the emperors on account of the duty and obligation they have of guarding us and keeping us in peace. Hence those words more indicate a right than a fact; for about the fact he said at the beginning: "The Church pays tax from its external things," but afterwards he gives the reason for which it is to be paid. In this way too did Torquemada and others there understand that text not only about the fact but also about the duty. Hence they reply otherwise by interpreting the text only of goods that came to the Church along with the burden of tax.

10. To me, however, this too does not seem satisfactory, because the text speaks of tax indifferently. For gratuitously is it limited to an improper tax or a private burden founded on some compact; for rather the words make clear that the discussion is about a tax that is paid to the emperor by reason of his public function, which the Church does not owe, whether it be old or new, because the same reason applies to them, as I said. I note, therefore, that the chapter is reported by Gratian from Pope Urban; but he does not designate which Urban it was, although moreover we do not have decrees in the volumes of the Councils or of the decretal epistles of Urban II, or of those later called by that name, nor is that decree found among the acts of Urban I in volume 1 of the Councils; we conjecture, nevertheless, that it belongs rather to Urban I than to the others, because the manner of speaking in that text is redolent more of the antiquity of Urban I than of the more recent times of the other Urbans. So I say this, that Urban spoke according to the manner of his time, when the emperors were heathens and the Church had not yet vindicated to itself the liberty from taxes of this sort, but that now the right has ceased.

11. In response to ch. 'Sancimus' and ch.1 De Censibus, the Glosses there understand the words of the older real burdens. Which response pleases me for that text, provided it be understood of private burdens, which we spoke about in the first conclusion in the preceding chapter. And to confirm this sense can be weighed the fact that there no mention is made of tax, nor of the prince, but the Council says that "to their greater" or rather, as the original has it, "to their seniors" do they "devote due service." Which words, whatever Gratian in the following section and the Glosses there say, are rather broad, for "due service" is rightly said of any burden whatever, but by "seniors" is understood by the Gloss and Joannes Andreas on the said ch.1 De Censibus the ancient lords from whom the possessions came to the Church along with their burden, and therefore they are to be paid by the Church from the same goods, when these do not pertain to the manor of the Church or to other places conjoined to it, from which, by the special disposition of that right, nothing except ecclesiastical tax is permitted to be paid. Which exception of "ecclesiastical tax" confirms the rule to the contrary in respect of other real burdens, of whatever kind they be. But if the Church has besides these goods something further, as is said in the text, it will be obliged by the real burdens which by virtue of some compact pertained to the ancient lords. Now the reason for a special exemption of the first goods can be that, either they are reckoned as it were accessory parts of the Church itself, which deserves the total immunity, and what is accessory follows the nature of the principal, or they are judged necessary for the support of the Church, as Abbas there notes, and therefore other burdens on them are not permitted. Hence if they had them before, by the very fact that the goods are united to the Church, the burdens cease, as was made plain in the preceding chapter.

12. Finally to the civil laws we reply in a single word with the Glosses above cited, that those laws were abrogated by the constitution of Frederick. Or perhaps it might better be said that those laws were always null, as in a similar case is signified by the Gloss on ch. 'Generaliter' 16 q.1, at the word 'Collationibus'. Now the reason is that such laws were contrary to the privileges earlier conceded to the churches, which could not be revoked; or that certainly they were making disposition in ecclesiastical matter, and to the prejudice of the Church, which civil laws cannot do, as has often been said. To which we add that among the ordinances of Lusitania [Portugal] bk.2 title 22, there is found a very good law that confirms the doctrine given.

Chapter 22. Of what sort ecclesiastical exemption is as regard the personal burdens of clerics.

Summary. 1. Censuses or assessments are another matter of exemption for clerics. 2. Clerics are exempt from assessments. 3. This exemption of clerics from taxes is by divine right. First proof. A tacit objection is met. 4. Second proof. 5. Clerics are exempt from mean functions. 6. Confirmation from canon right. 7. It is shown also by divine right. 8. Clerics cannot be deprived of the advantages common to all citizens. 9. Clerics are not made more fearful whenever some burden falls on them from the civil laws. 10. Laws that speak of common matter or in general do not derogate from the immunity of clerics. 11. When clerics are made more fearful by civil laws. 12. Through laws depriving them of things common by natural or civil right, clerics are rendered more fearful for themselves. 13. Laws removing from clerics things common to other citizens are repugnant to ecclesiastical liberty. Evasion. It is refuted. 14. Reason for the conclusion. 15. Double Confirmation.

1. We do not intend in this chapter to declare what persons enjoy this exemption or in what way, for this pertains to the other, as it were. remote part of the matter, about which we will begin to speak in chapter 23, but we suppose in general what in this matter is evident of itself, that clerics enjoy the privilege of exemption and that, because it was shown above, the matter of the exemption is the secular courts, as well criminal as civil, and the civil laws, as well coercive or penal as directive or imposing an obligation directly; therefore it remains to say whether taxes too are, with respect to the same persons, matter for this exemption. Now certain of these taxes are wont to be imposed on persons themselves without respect to goods, and they are said to be purely personal taxes and are wont to be called by the name of assessment, as in Matthew 17 according to the exposition of many, and in the law of the Code. De Capitatione Civium Censibus Eximenda bk.11, where the same tax is called assessment and poll tax, because it is put together by a poll of heads according to number, without respect to goods. But sometimes tax is imposed by reason of the goods, which is called real or mixed tax, as we will say in the following chapter when we treat of goods, for now we are dealing with purely personal burdens.

2. First, then, we must say that ecclesiastical persons enjoy personal immunity as to assessments and poll tax. This assertion is most certain among Catholics, for it is expressly contained in the many decrees of canon right adduced above to prove exemption in general, as ch. 'Adversus' and ch. 'Non Minus' De Immunitat. Ecclesiar., and ch. 'Quanquam' De Censib. on 6, and in others where special mention is made of persons. Thus also is it noted there by all the expositors, and the same is taught by the theologians on Sentences 2 dist.34. And this exemption is very old, not only by canon right but also by civil, as can be gathered from the Theodosian Code title De Episcop. et Cleric. law 8, which is attributed to Constantine by Gratian on ch. 'Generaliter' 16 q.1, and he reports it in these words: "According to the sanction which you were a little while ago held to have merited, your possessions and estates, etc.;" however in the Theodosian Code it is attributed to Constantine and reads thus: "No one will lay new obligations on you and your possessions, but you will enjoy freedom." It also reads in the same way in law 1 Code. De Episcop. et Clericis, where it is attributed to Constantine. The same privilege is confirmed by Gratian on law 26 at the same title, where he has these noteworthy words: "Who would allow them to be bound by assessment of poll tax who he understands to have necessarily been transferred to the obedience above mentioned (namely obedience to the Church)?" The same privilege is also further declared and confirmed by Frederick.

3. And indeed if any exemption of clerics is by divine natural right and in conformity with the Gospel, it is most of all this one, which is from taxes purely personal. The proof is that tax is not with just reason imposed on a person except by reason of his goods or by reason of his own actions insofar as by them he can make some profit wherefrom he may pay such tax. But when tax is imposed in the first way it is not purely personal but mixed, and so it does not pertain to the present question but to another one to be dealt with in the following chapter. In the second way, on the other hand, clerics are by right reason not capable of personal tax because by reason of their state they are altogether dedicated to the divine cult, and they should, by force of their state, order their actions, not to temporal gains, but to spiritual ministries; therefore by force of their state they are by natural right exempt from personal and temporal taxes. Nor does it matter that they can, on account of such ministries, receive some temporal stipend; for it is not received by way of temporal gain but by way of just and fitting support, which should not be subtracted or diminished by imposition of tax. For the reason indeed most of all that the stipend is as it were annexed and accessory to spiritual ministry, and therefore partakes of its nature and condition, and accordingly of the freedom and exemption from every secular power that spiritual ministries have.

4. Hence the other reason is evident too, that no one can impose personal tax except on a person subject to his jurisdiction; but the persons of clerics are not subject to the jurisdiction of temporal princes; therefore they cannot be burdened by them with personal taxes. And it is according to these principles that this exemption of clerics is collected from the words of Christ in Matthew 17: "then are the children free;" for there the discussion is about exemption from taxes and in particular personal taxes. For the tax which was paid to Caesar and was called the assessment or census, seems to be the same as the poll tax imposed by Caesar when he ordered "that all the world should be taxed," as is said in Luke 2.1. Now from this tax are the children above all free, and consequently their family members should be free too, who are busy both altogether with persons and with service to the children, and are nourished by their goods. Thus by a certain consequence, then, clerics are included under those words. To which sense can rightly be drawn the words of Jerome, at the place where he says: "We, for his honor, do not pay taxes, and as sons of the king are immune from tributes." But under the pronoun 'we' should be included not all Christians but only ecclesiastics.

And hence St. Thomas on Sentences 2 dist.44 q.2 a.2, treating of the same place, says: "Because Christ is speaking of himself and of his disciples, who were neither of servile condition nor had temporal possessions wherewith to be obliged to pay taxes to their lords." Hence he infers further that, by force of the same words of Christ, all are exempt "who profess the apostolic life, possessing nothing in this world and being immune from servile condition." Now he seems to name servile condition either temporal subjection to secular jurisdiction or the care and concern that attach to the acquisition of temporal goods. And the same doctrine is found in Bonaventure, a.3 q.1 ad 1, and in Richard [of St. Victor] a.3 q.1 ad 1, from the arguments placed second, and in Thomas de Argentina at the same place a.4, in a certain solution ad 3. Lyra too expounds in the same way the same words of Matthew 10, and the ordinary Gloss, taking up the words of Augustine bk.1 Quaestionum Evangelicar. q.23, says that free are the sons of the King under whom are all earthly kingdoms. But the exposition of the scholastics cited above is that by sons of the kingdom are to be understood not all Christians but those who have left everything for Christ. About what the sense was that was intended by Augustine I make no assertion, but I consider it probable that all these persons are by a certain consequence, at least as regard these personal taxes, included under the words of Christ.

5. I say, second, that clerics are exempt not only from monetary taxes but also from all that may consist in any mean or secular action or in any obligation to undergo such functions. This assertion is frequent in civil right, especially in the Theodosian Code, title De Episcop. et Clericis, for in law 1 Constantine prescribes that "clerics are not to be burdened with any nominations or undertakings demanded by public custom against the privilege granted to them." And on law 2 he says "they are to be altogether excused from every duty lest they be diverted from divine service." And on law 9 Constantius says: "Clerics ought to be exempt from curial offices and all care of civil functions;" and on law 10: "let the exaction of mean offices be thrust away from them." The same on law 11 and law 14. Valentinian on law 21, 22, & 24 and Arcadius and Honorius on law 36 say the same: "We command that they not be touched whom both clerical rank and (which is not less) a more holy life protects from acts of public labor."

Besides, in law 1 Code. De Episcop. et Clericis are to be noted the words: "No one will obligate you with new taxes, but you will enjoy exemption," where the Gloss adds "from mean duties." Again, another example of this exemption is there added when it is said: "Nor will you billet soldiers," which contains a special privilege as the Gloss there extensively notes, and in law 2 the same immunity is handed down in a general way, and more distinctly in law 'Placet' 17 at the same title: "It is decreed that clerics should have nothing common with public actions or those pertaining to the civic body, with which they are not connected." And on law 'Generaliter' at the same title they are expressly exempted from the guardianship and care of orphans, and it is added that such benefit is given to those who do not wander about or are lazy in divine ministries. "Since," it says, "we bestow this very benefit on them so that, with all else set aside, they may attach themselves to the ministries of almighty God." And the same privilege is contained in law ‘Placet’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. and it is taken by likeness from law ‘Sancimus’ at the same title, where these words are to be noted: “Why make we not a distinction between divine and human things, and why may not fitting prerogative be preserved by a heavenly favor?”

6. Now in canon right not only is this mode of exemption approved and accepted in the whole title De Immunit. Eccles. but it is also commanded to be observed in the whole title Ne Clerici vel Monachi Saecularibus Negotiis se Immisceant. And it can, by argument from special case, be taken from ch. ‘Pervenit’ De Immunit. Ecclesiar. where it is said that in times of necessity no cleric is to be excused from taking watch on the walls but can in general be compelled to it, “so that, when all take watch, the defense of the city may be better procured.” Rather is there then also requirement that it be done, the bishop giving approval, and that, if coercion be necessary, it be done by the same in accord with the things we will note in the next chapter. There are, then, two things to be distinguished in this kind of exemption: one is that clerics cannot be compelled or obligated to undergo these functions; the other is to prohibit, and to obligate with necessity, that they not exercise them. The first can be done not only by canon laws but also by civil ones, because they do not in this respect exercise jurisdiction over clerics, nor use coercive or directive force proper, but concede a privilege, which does not always concern jurisdiction but liberality, as I said above. Although, if the thing be carefully attended to, on the supposition of the privilege of forum, the aforesaid laws are speaking more to secular ministers than to clerics, and are more making plain what they are bound to do than conceding something de novo to clerics. For since clerics are exempt from the jurisdiction of laymen, the laws or the secular magistrates cannot compel clerics to undergo these burdens; or that they abstain from these or those functions. However canon law can and does do both; for it effectively exempts clerics from profane or secular functions by prohibiting and, if there be need, coercing laymen from compelling clerics to undergo them, and also by obliging clerics themselves to abstain from them, for it can give command to both of them, in order to a spiritual end, as has often been said.

7. From these things too can the fact easily be understood that the exemption of clerics in this respect or matter follows from divine natural right, in many cases indeed by necessary inference but by a very close one in others that are determined by ecclesiastical right. The brief explanation is that clerics, by force of their state, are committed to divine ministries, to which secular functions can by a double title be repugnant. First because no one can serve two masters, and therefore clerics cannot be involved in secular business, so that they not be distracted from divine service. Second because holy things are to be handled in a holy way and with honor and reverence, but clerics have by ordination and deputation to the divine cult acquired a special sanctification; and therefore, so that they may be dealt with in a holy and honorable way, they must be exempted from these secular or more common functions. Hence, just as we were saying above about sacred things, so now we must say about sacred persons, that it follows from the nature of the thing that they should have a singular prerogative in being separated from mean functions.

Now among these functions there are some that manifestly derogate from the sanctity of the persons, or they impede ecclesiastical functions, and with respect to these this exemption necessarily follows by force of natural right. Nay, often not only does exemption follow but also prohibition, as when the functions are overly profane, of which

Paul most speaks in 2 Timothy 2.4: “No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life.” But there are other functions wherein so great a deformity does not at once appear, as is, for example, the guardianship and care of orphans, exercising an honest and moderate and necessary art, and the like. And in this an exemption can be determined by canon right. Which sometimes happens by prohibition of such functions, but at other times only by concession, lest clerics be held to accept any functions of this sort. And this latter is also done by civil right, for thus is a cleric exempt from guardianship in Authentica ‘Presbyteros’, under law 41 Code. De Episc. et Cleric., and nevertheless they can accept it if they wish, as the Gloss there notes, and the other Gloss on ch. ‘Irreligioso’ d.87. Likewise too, although clerics are not compelled to testify before a secular judge, nevertheless they can do it in some causes; and so in other like things.

8. I say third that it pertains to this liberty or exemption of clerics that they are not to be deprived of the rights, conveniences, or other things common to all citizens. This assertion I take from the doctrine of Bartolus on Authentica ‘Cassa’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Ecclesi., where he says that civil laws whereby clerics are made more fearful are against ecclesiastical liberty, even if such laws are not addressing the clerics themselves. He hands on the same on law 1 § ‘Quae Honorandae’ ff. ‘Quarum Rerum Actio non Detur’, and the same doctrine is commonly followed by the canonists on ch. ‘Noverit’ De Sententia Excommunic., especially by Panormitanus and Felinus, and on the last chapter De Immunit. Ecclesiar. on 6, where Ancharranus in particular can be looked at, and on his repeat of ch.1 De Constitut., and the Cardinal on his repeat of ch. ‘Perpendimus’ De Sententia Excommunicat. § ‘Et Specialiter Quaero’. But what it is to make clerics more fearful is not clearly explained by the said authors, although however it can be understood in a too broad and a too narrow way.

9. The explanation will be too broad if one supposes that whenever laymen do or establish something from which some burden or inconvenience for clerics results, it is done against their exemption or immunity; which is sometimes insinuated by the canonists on ch. ‘Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae’ De Constitut. and on ch.1 ‘De Novi Operis Nunciat.’ But that is not indeterminately true; for when the burden or prejudice is general, and can turn out either way, sometimes as a burden and sometimes as an advantage, then, if the disposition is general for the whole city, it cannot be said that a burden has been imposed on clerics against their liberty, because nothing is then done against their privileges nor against natural justice. Again, because almost all human laws have this feature, that although they are useful to the community and to everyone as a rule, sometimes they turn out as a burden or prejudice for someone; nor are they for that reason to be judged unjust or harmful; both because they intend the common good and justly permit, on account of it, a private disadvantage; and also because, although on one occasion or at one time they seem to inflict a burden, on other occasions they are helpful and bring advantage, and thus the one is compensated by the other.

10. Such laws, therefore, if they make disposition in matter common to all citizens and speak in general terms, will not be against the liberty of clerics, nor can they truly be said to impose a burden; rather, they are to be observed by clerics in the way the canons dispose, or in the way we said above, that clerics are bound to observe just civil and political laws that are not repugnant to their status. And this explanation and opinion is common to the expositors on ch. 1 De Novi Oper. Nunciat., by which text this very thing is proved. The same is maintained by Felinus and others on ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae' De Constitut., and the same doctrine is supposed by many doctors whom Tiraquel reports on marriage laws gloss 8 q.17 n.169 and following, and on each retraction p.1 § 1 gloss 13 n.5. The same opinion is held by Cajetan at the word 'Excommunicatio' ch.3, and by Navarrus on Summa ch.27 n.130, insofar as they say that a civil law moderating funeral pomp with respect to human honor, as it can be matter for such law, is not contrary to the liberty of clerics, even if perhaps they experience therefrom some burden, in that their gain is in some part impeded, because this is accidental and can be compensated from elsewhere.

11. Too narrowly indeed will he understand that doctrine who judges that a cleric is only made more fearful when, by the deed of a secular prince, or from a law or disposition of his, laymen can assume the license of harming or afflicting clerics, because this is what those words 'to be made more fearful' seem in propriety and strictness to signify. For although it be true that this way of burdening clerics is contrary to their immunity, yet and to a large extent it can pertain to violation of the privilege rather of the canon than of the forum if clerics are made more fearful that violent hands may be laid on their persons, according to the doctrine of Baldus on Authentica 'Cassa' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. q.3 n.4; and to the extent this may concern the privilege of forum it is not adequate, because clerics can be burdened and made more fearful in many other ways, even if there is not inflicted on them the fear of some harm or wounding that can be done to them by laymen, as will at once appear.

Nay, neither is this effect satisfactorily explained in the way that Cajetan and Navarrus above seem to explain it when they say that the law then violates the immunity of the cleric when in some way it burdens him contrary to the special privilege conceded to him because he is a cleric or an ecclesiastical person, but not if it burdens him as he is a citizen or a man. They seem to be favored by Innocent on ch. 'Noverit' De Sentent. Excommunic. to the extent he says that those things are properly against ecclesiastical immunity that are contrary to privileges conceded to the Church. This opinion also seems to be held by Baldus on the said Authentica 'Cassa' q.2 n.3 and by Lapus 'Allegat.' 92 under the title An Constitutio sit contra Libertatem Ecclesiae. Because although it is true that a cleric is in this way burdened contrary to his immunity, yet it is not true that only this is signified by the words 'to be made more fearful', because clerics are not only burdened against their immunity when they are burdened contrary to the privileges that they have as clerics, but also when they are burdened particularly as citizens, that is, contrary to the rights which belong to them as citizens, that is which are common to all citizens, whether these are owed to clerics by the right of nations or by civil right or by positive right; and therefore, if in these they are burdened only because they are clerics, the commission of it is against ecclesiastical liberty, as will be clear from what follows.

12. I say, therefore, that the doctrine of Bartolus must be explained according to the third assertion proposed. For whenever by a statute or law, or a mandate, or the force of laymen, clerics are deprived of the things that are by natural right, by the right of nations, or by civil right common to citizens, they are, by the fact itself of being members of such community, burdened contrary to ecclesiastical liberty; and then can they be said to be made more fearful, because men are in that way turned aside from the clerical state when they see that clerics, by the fact that they are clerics, are treated thus by laymen. Or they can also be said to be made more timid because they are not allowed freely to use and enjoy the rights or the things that are common to the rest of the citizens, even though these are not repugnant to the clerical state. And this opinion thus explained is common to the authors whom I alleged for the conclusion. The same opinion is held by Joannes Andreas and others on bk.1 cons. 26, better on 83. The same opinion is held by Felinus on ch. 'Noverit' De Sentent. Excommunicat. on 6 n.2; where he adds that Innocent does not think otherwise than Bartolus thought, because things that are applicable by common right are stronger than those that are so by privilege.

I add too that Innocent spoke not only about the privilege of the Pope or of the emperor but also of God; for there he expressly numbers the privileges conceded to the Church by God, and he afterwards concludes that whatever is contrary to a privilege given to the Church by God, the Pope, or the emperor is contrary to immunity. But by the name of privilege is not understood only that which is in addition to universal law as an exception from it, but also everything that is fitting either to the Church or to clerics by force of divine right, whether positive or natural, once the supposition of such an institution of ecclesiastical monarchy or hierarchy has been made. For many of the Church's prerogatives, which are numbered among these privileges by Innocent, Panormitanus, and others, do not otherwise befit the Church than by divine positive or natural right, although they suppose some divine institution. And it was shown above that ecclesiastical exemption pertains of its kind to this divine right, and many of the things contained under this exception are immediately of this right, although some were perhaps added or increased by the Church or the emperors.

13. To this manner, then, we say that it pertains to the immunity of clerics that they are not to be made of worse condition by the power of laymen, even in those temporal advantages that are common to all citizens. A very good example is in the last chapter De Immunit. Ecclesiar. on 6, where ecclesiastical liberty is said to be acted against by temporal lords "who forbid their subjects to sell anything to ecclesiastical persons, or to buy anything from them, or to grind grain for them, or to bake bread, or do them any other service." For all these things are not contrary to the special privileges of clerics, even as they are clerics, but contrary to common civil society; and nevertheless they are judged to be contrary to ecclesiastical liberty, and are prohibited and punished as such. Cajetan however replies that there it is not said that those interdicts or statutes are against ecclesiastical liberty, but it is presumed that they are. However, about the sense of the phrase 'let them be presumed' we must speak below in chapter thirty two; now I briefly say that, of whatever sort the presumption be thought to be, in order that it may be true and have foundation, there is need for it to suppose that to deprive a cleric of the common right of civil society is a true and proper object of crime against ecclesiastical liberty, even if it not be done by the exercise of jurisdiction over a cleric but in some other way.

14. Now the reason is that although such rights common to citizens are not due to clerics because they are clerics, they are however due to them as citizens, even if the state they have is diverse from laymen; nay, because they are clerics, they are for that reason due them by a new and greater title, so that they not be deprived of these common rights, because they do not lose the rights common to citizens on account of the clerical state, and besides they are by reason of their state worthy of greater honor and reverence; therefore it pertains to the immunity due by natural right to clerics that they not be deprived of these rights. This reason is also very well furthered by the words of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius on law 19 Code. De Episcop. et Clericis: “On all who serve churches protection is to be conferred, because we desire that in our times reverence rather be added to than that a change be made from those things that were formerly supplied.” And therefore on law 31 they call him sacrilegious “who causes any injury to the priests and ministers of the Church;” and they make that crime equivalent to injury inflicted on a sacred place or cult.

15. There is a confirmation too, that by actions or dispositions of this sort by laymen the clerical state becomes very mean and is irreverently treated; and consequently clerics are made more fearful and others are turned away from taking up that state, since they see that what is by the right of nations common to other citizens is denied to themselves; therefore all those things are contrary to ecclesiastical immunity. Finally there is the confirmation that these sorts of burdens on clerics ordinarily proceed from some hatred of the clerical state itself, not indeed because of their orders or ministries (for these only heretics or other infidels abominate), but because of the exemptions or liberties that they enjoy in that state; and especially because they are exempted from common burdens, which thing is wont to redound to some burden for laymen, and therefore they sometimes desire to exclude clerics from their own common advantages; therefore by this very fact the privileges of clerics are injured, for these both become odious and are made by some recompense to be unproductive, because by occasion thereof clerics are deprived of equal or greater goods. And thus such burdens are said to be imposed on clerics as clerics; because although formally they do not consist in the privation of something due to a cleric as cleric, nevertheless they are done to the hatred of or with injury or contempt for the clergy, which is enough for them to contain the proper violation of immunity. And in this way sufficient answer is made to the foundation for the contrary opinion.

Chapter 23. Whether the ecclesiastical revenues of clerics are exempt from taxes.

Summary. 1. Twofold goods of clerics. 2. First conclusion. 3. Reason for the conclusion and confirmation. 4. The reason for the conclusion is weighed. 5. Whether ecclesiastical revenues transferred to clerics are subject to taxes. 6. What holds if clerics do not have ownership of these revenues. 7. True resolution. 8. What holds of the patrimonial goods, so to say, of clerics.

1. Although much has been said above about ecclesiastical goods, yet because it is not certain that the goods of clerics are counted in the same right as the goods of churches, therefore it is necessary to speak about them in particular. Now two kinds of such goods are distinguished by St. Thomas Quodlibet 6 a.12: some are what clerics earn from the goods of the Church, as from tithes or ecclesiastical estates, or from their benefices which are given for their office; others are what they have inherited from their parents or have acquired by their industry or art. The first are called by St. Thomas ecclesiastical, that is, in a broad way; but we, to avoid equivocation, will call them clerical; the others however are called patrimonial or secular. To these is added a third member by Navarrus Tractat. De Redditib. Ecclesiasticis q.1 monit.19, namely of those goods that are acquired through spiritual actions by clerics as the stipends thereof, not by the right or title of any benefice but solely by title of an actual and as it were mercantile work, such as are stipends for masses and the like. However the same Navarrus rightly adds that these are reduced to patrimonial goods, because they both earn them immediately from the temporal goods of laymen and not from the goods of their benefices, and they secure temporal lordship, without tacit or express condition, of such goods after they fulfill their ministry, and lastly because they acquire them by their own labor and industry or action; and it is very much extrinsic and accidental to the quality of such goods that the action is spiritual or altogether material. Now although thus it is in order to other effects or obligations of clerics, which we are not now treating of, nevertheless in order to exemption from taxes some greater reason in the case of these last goods can be taken note of, as we will see.

2. First, then, it is certain that goods of the first kind, or the ecclesiastical goods of clerics, are exempt from all taxes whether real or mixed. The conclusion is certain and common to all Catholics; for it is contained expressly in canon right in ch. 'Non Minus' at the place: 'De bonis ecclesiarum et clericorum et pauperum Christi usibus deputatis.' And more clearly in ch. 'Adversus' at the place: 'Qui ecclesias et ecclesiasticos viros taliis seu collectis etc.' where the talk is about taxes that are imposed by reason of goods, and not only are churches distinctly exempted but also ecclesiastical persons. And in ch. 'Clericis' De Immunit. Ecclesiar. on 6 such taxes are expressly and extensively prohibited, and although that chapter was by the single article of Clementina De Immunit. Ecclesiar. revoked as to the penalties, it was not as to the exemption itself, but was rather confirmed, and extensively in the Lateran Council under Leo X session 9 on the reformations of the curia § 'Et cum a iure', in addition to the more ancient ones that have been mentioned above; all of these things were renewed by the Council of Trent session 25 ch.20 De Reformat.

Next this privilege is expressly contained in civil right in the constitution of the emperor Frederick or in Authentica 'Item Nulla' Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., where he prohibits collections or exactions to be imposed on churches or ecclesiastical persons. And this privilege can be gathered from the more ancient laws, from law 10 De Episcop. et Clericis in the Theodosian Code, where Constantius and Constans say about clerics: "Let there be imposed on the expenses of traders no obligation," that is, let them not be compelled to pay the taxes that are imposed on traders; and they add the reason: "Since it is certain that the profits which they gather from stores and workshops will be to the advantage of the poor;" and on law 14 Justinian says: "Let all injury of undue compact and dishonesty of unjust exaction be thrust away from clerics;" and on law 1 De Lustrali Collat. in the same code clerics are excepted from a certain tax that was called the lustral, or five yearly, collection.

3. Now the reason for this part can be given either as general for all goods of clerics, and of this we will speak in the following chapter, or as special, because the goods that we are dealing with are numbered among things sacred by St. Thomas Sentences 2 q.99 a.3, and therefore are either by nature exempt from taxes, or they are at any rate understood to be exempt along with the rest of ecclesiastical goods. There is also a confirmation for this reason, that to seize or steal these sorts of goods of clerics is sacrilege; which some people have said not only about these goods but also about certain others, as I will report below; but about these goods it is much more likely for the reason stated, that these goods are reckoned sacred; therefore for the same reason they should be exempt from taxes.

4. But this reason does not seem to be valid. For these goods can be considered either before they are brought into connection with actual clerics and have become their property, or after they have already passed into their ownership. In the first way the said reason does rightly indeed prove that those goods are sacred and exempt from taxes; but it does not prove anything about the goods of clerics, because the former goods, when considered in that sort of status, do not belong to clerics but to the Church or to God. In another way the goods can be considered as they are acquired by clerics. And this consideration itself can be subdivided; for we can speak either about the acquisition itself of such goods, or about the goods themselves already fully acquired and without diminution by tax. And in the first of these two ways indeed it also rightly proves that such goods are not capable of secular taxes, that is, a cleric cannot have imposed on him the payment of tax from the revenues of his benefice or from any whatever ecclesiastical goods. Both because if such tax is imposed on the person, it is contrary to the exemption which such a person has from the power of a secular judge. But if it be imposed on the thing or its fruits, it is thus imposed on ecclesiastical goods, because the imposition precedes the accruing of such goods to a cleric, and in that case they are still ecclesiastical, and so the imposition is done against the immunity of such goods.

But if such tax be understood to be imposed on the very action of earning such revenues or stipends, it is also against immunity; because the action is spiritual and altogether outside the forum of secular power, and therefore it is not capable of tax. Again, because the earning is not by way of trade or a civil contract, but is by way of stipend annexed to a spiritual ministry, and therefore it follows the nature and forum of its principal and can only be reduced by spiritual power; and therefore by canon right it is established that benefices are to be conferred without diminution. As to this part, then, and as to the aforesaid status of such goods, that reason rightly proves that taxes from such goods cannot be imposed on clerics. And in this way the statute of the Council of Worms seems to be understood that is reported in ch. 'Sancitum' 23 q.8 and in ch. 1 'Extra' De Censibus, where it is said: "Presbyters established in churches are not to perform from the tithes and offerings of the faithful any service beside ecclesiastical."

5. However if such goods are understood as they have now become the property of clerics, that reason does not seem to prove that they are incapable of secular taxes. The proof is that those goods are not now in fact sacred, nor are they numbered in any species of such goods by St. Thomas, if he be carefully read; for in the final species he places goods that are deputed to the support of ministers, "whether they be movable goods or immovable." But it is one thing to be deputed and another to have been already made to be of ministers; for they possess the first status as long as they are common and under the power of the Church and the special dominion of God; but after they are divided and applied to the persons of clerics, they change their status and cease to be sacred, because they lose that special respect to God and annexation to a spiritual title. The sign whereof is that they can be turned to any use whatever, and can be given to laymen by the proper authority of the private cleric, whose they are, and for a temporal cause or reason. Next because those goods considered in themselves are temporal, and the dominion that the cleric acquires over them is temporal; and the fact that the acquisition was made by way of a spiritual action or right does not matter, because that respect passes and does not remain. Just as, when from the goods of the Church alms are given to the poor, that part, by the fact the alms are acquired by the poor, begins to be merely temporal, so therefore does it seem to be in the case of these goods of clerics. Therefore, in their order to taxes, the same reason will hold of them as of the other patrimonial goods of clerics.

6. I note, however, that this point depends on another celebrated controversy about ecclesiastical revenues, whether clerics, after they receive them by the title of their benefice, obtain true and proper dominion over them, such that they can, as far as concerns the obligation of justice, freely dispose of them; or whether they always remain stewards of the goods, so that they may in the first place be suitably nourished by them and should then distribute the rest in pious works. For those who think this latter, as Navarrus and others, can and should say as a result, that those goods are always sacred, because they always remain under the dominion of God and are at once on a par with ecclesiastical goods, because in fact they always remain ecclesiastical. Hence, according to this opinion, by the application of such goods to this or that clerical person their status is not changed as to the proper lordship of God or as to the general end to which ecclesiastical goods are directed, but only the proximate faculty of dispensing them is changed. For before the cleric acquires them by special title, the faculty of dispensing them rests with the pastors of the Church, or with the community, or with its ministers; but after the beneficiary acquires them, to him is committed the proper faculty of dispensing them by his own authority, always however as they are ecclesiastical and as he is a faithful and prudent steward. And consequently on this opinion too it is sufficiently probable that he who seizes such goods even from the power of the cleric is guilty of sacrilege, not by reason of the person from whom he steals, nor by reason of the place from which he steals, but by reason of the goods themselves, because they are sacred. And finally according to the same opinion, it is sufficiently aptly said that such goods of clerics are exempt from taxes, not only by reason of the person, but also by reason of themselves, because they are sacred and always directed to pious uses, and whatever is taken from them in tax diminishes not so much the cleric as the pious uses. And about these goods of clerics above all, and on the same foundation, the opinion of those can proceed who say that the goods of clerics are on a par with ecclesiastical goods in every exemption, particularly from taxes, as one may see in Gloss 2 on ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae' De Constitut., and Decius n.18 on the place, and in others whom Covarrubias reports bk.1 Variar. ch.4 nn.2 & 3.

7. On the other hand, however, if we suppose the contrary opinion, that beneficed clerics acquire proper dominion of the portion or part of the revenues of their benefices which is given to them as stipend, the same judgment must certainly as a result be pronounced about these goods with respect to exemption from taxes as about the other patrimonial goods of clerics. For this is sufficiently proved by the reasons given, on the supposition of that foundation, because by that acquisition of particular ownership the goods are transferred from a superior order to an inferior, just as when they are given to lay ministers of the Church as a stipend for their labor or their temporal ministry, or when they are given to clerics for actions that are common to the laity, as teaching, singing, etc. For the ownership, and consequently the status, of such goods is changed equally. But that it is done as stipend for a spiritual or for a corporal action is accidental, and does not change the condition of the goods which they have acquired in their lower status. Now this opinion about the dominion of clerics as to these goods is today the more received one, and is considered more probable, and it was without doubt the opinion of St. Thomas in the said Quodlibet 6 a.12 ad 3, and therefore we also suppose it in the present case, that as regard taxes and exemptions the reason about these goods is the same as about the patrimonial goods of clerics.

8. Hence it is a fortiori clear that the same must be said of goods that Navarrus calls as it were patrimonial. For these partly coincide with and partly diverge from the preceding. They coincide indeed as to manner of acquiring or earning them by a spiritual action or ministry, and therefore I judge that they coincide in this respect too, that the acquisition of such goods is of itself immune from taxes, and therefore also the goods, as they are the stipends of such ministries, are by their nature exempt from taxes. For the same reason given above prevails, namely that the action is spiritual, and therefore it is by divine right exempt from civil jurisdiction; therefore the stipend too, which is given by reason of it and is as it were accessory to it, ought in the same way to be exempt, so that it cannot be diminished by the imposition of secular tax. Again these earnings are by their nature subject to the spiritual power, to which it pertains to tax, regulate, or increase them; nay the Pontiff could also impose on them, if they were abundant, some tax for the poor or the expenses of the Church; therefore reason demands that they be exempt from the impositions of laymen, because they ought not to be burdened with a double burden. These goods differ, however, from the prior ecclesiastical revenues, because they do not flow from ecclesiastical goods proper, nor from the spiritual title of any ecclesiastical benefice, but from certain temporal goods by way of earned stipend when a human agreement intervenes, excluding the imperfection of giving one thing for another and considering only the reason of due support. But from this difference, which in the fact itself is rather familiar, there follows another, namely that about these latter earnings it is in all probable opinion certain that clerics acquire proper and temporal dominion over such goods, and they can dispose of them as they wish, provided justice is kept, as even Navarrus admits in the place cited above. And therefore it is also similarly certain as regard taxes that there is the same reason about these goods when already acquired in fact, so to say, as about patrimonial goods, about which it remains to speak.

Chapter 24. Whether the patrimonial and, in general, the temporal goods of clerics are included under the common laws of secular taxes.

Summary. 1. Triple reason for doubt. 2. All goods of clerics enjoy exemption. 3. Proof from civil right. 4. Proof also by reason. Objection. 5. Response. 6. First response to Ambrose. 7. Second response. 8. To the second and third objection from civil right.

1. Reason for doubt can be taken from ch. ‘Magnum’ 11 q.1, which is from Ambrose bk.4 on Luke at the words, 5.3: “and he sat down and taught the people out of the ship,” where, touching on the place in Matthew 17 in which Christ told Peter alone to cast a hook and take the piece of money found in the fish’s mouth and pay the tax, Ambrose says that therein is signified “a great and spiritual teaching by which Christian men are taught they should be subject to the higher powers, lest anyone think that the ordinance of the earthly king is to be dissolved.” And he seems to be dealing with clerics, for he subjoins: “For if the Son of God paid the assessment, who are mighty you to think it should not be paid?”

There is doubt, second, from the civil laws, which frequently lay down that these taxes are to be paid by clerics. For although there are some ancient laws exempting clerics from some of these taxes, as is clear in law 2 Code. De Episcop. et Cleric. and in others that we reported above from the Theodosian Code, nevertheless they are as it were particular exceptions, for the general rule of the civil laws seems to be that clerics are not exempt from paying the taxes of their temporal goods when these are imposed on the like goods generally, as is taken from law ‘De iis’ Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., and from law ‘Ad Instructionem’ and law ‘Neminem’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., and from the epistle of Valentinian in Theodoret bk.4 Hist. ch.7 who says: “Let not the bishops refuse to pay the taxes as the laws demand.”

Third, this seems to be in agreement with reason, because, although the persons of clerics are sacred and therefore also exempt, yet their goods are temporal and merely civil and are therefore subject to temporal princes; so princes can rightly exact tax from them. For it is not an obstacle either that the goods have respect to a person who is sacred and exempt as it were in respect of his proper lord, because that lordship is merely temporal and ordered of itself to a temporal end. And in this way the respect is not to such a person as sacred or exempt, but precisely as citizen. Nor is it even an obstacle that the prince has no jurisdiction over the person of a cleric, for he might be able to compel the cleric to pay tax because it is enough that he might be able to ask it as a debt, so that clerics are in conscience bound to pay it. But if they refuse and coercion is necessary, they can be summoned before their own judge to pay the debt. But if this not be enough, or it cannot conveniently be done, the prince, or his minister who collects the tax, can seize a temporal thing, not so much by title of jurisdiction as of defense, lest he be deprived of his right. And all these points receive confirmation especially from the fact we see that in many kingdoms it is thus done and is by custom received, while Catholic princes and the princes of the Church know of the fact and keep silent.

2. Nevertheless one must say that all goods of clerics are exempt from the burdens of civil taxes, whether these be adjudged real or mixed, save for cases excepted by canon right. Thus do the learned canonists think in ch. ‘Ecclesiae’ and ch. ‘Quae in Ecclesiam’ De Constitut. and in ch. ‘Si Clericus’ De Foro Compet., on which places Panormitanus, Decius, and Felinus can most be looked at, and in the last chapter De Vita et Honestate Clericorum and in ch. ‘Adversus’, and ch. ‘Non Minus’ De Immunit. Eccles. and on ch.1 De Immun. Ecclesiar. on 6, and Bartolus on law ‘Placet’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. n.25 and following, and Baldus on law 2 Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., and on those places other expounders of civil right, Paulus de Castro on law ‘Ad Instructiones’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. and Gregory Lopez on law ‘Si et’ 54 title 6 part 1, and the summarists generally on the word ‘Immunitas’, and Navarrus in Manual ch.17 n.200 and ch.27 n.87, and Medina Code. De Restit. q.15. The proof is first from canon right, for in all the chapters just cited clerics are exempted from these sorts of taxes. For on ch. ‘Non Minus’ there is express talk of “the goods of churches and of clerics”, while in ch. ‘Quanquam’ De Censibus on 6 it is more openly said: “More strictly, let not such things be exacted from churches and ecclesiastical persons.” And later: “Ecclesiastical persons and their possessions are by divine and human right immune from the exactions of secular persons.” A certain marginal Gloss there adds to the term ‘possessions’ the limitation of ‘non-patrimonial’, but it corrupts the text, for where the text does not distinguish we should not distinguish either, especially without a text or a compelling reason. Therefore that indefinite locution is equivalent to a universal one; for it is the same to say that the possessions of clerics are exempt as to say that no goods of clerics are subject to secular taxes, especially because the negation contained in the word ‘exemption’ falls on the exempted things and so it distributes the term.

And this is made more clear in the single Clementina at the same title, which bids to be observed “whatever against those who demand from churches and ecclesiastical persons any dues, collections, or exactions at all” has been established by prior Pontiffs or Councils, where the distribution “any...at all” excludes the said limitation. Nor does it matter that it is speaking not about things but about persons, because tax cannot be exacted for a thing without being exacted from the person to whom such thing belongs. In addition this fact is further made clear from the last Clementina, De Censibus, where taxes are forbidden to be extorted as well from ecclesiastical persons as for their proper possessions, etc. Things and persons are distinctly put there and also, when the addition is made ‘for their proper possessions’, sufficiently indication is given that the discussion is about all goods, including proper ones; for such are patrimonial possessions above all, for what clerics acquire from their benefices is either not proper in this way or at least it is not wont to be called such in canon right. And besides there is added there an exception, namely that the understanding be about things “which they do not export or make to be exported or transfer for purposes of business.” Which exception strengthens the rule to the contrary; for things that are got for purposes of business are included under patrimonial goods; therefore if these are excepted from the rule, all the remaining patrimonial goods are included under it. In this way too the same is confirmed from the last chapter De Vita et Honestate Clericorum, where the Pontiff permits taxes wont to be paid by traders to be exacted from clerics when clerics are themselves involved in the same trading activities. We will speak below about this exception, for now we are only concluding from it that, outside the case of business, no goods of clerics, per se speaking, are, according to canon right, liable to secular taxes.

3. Further, with this canon right the civil right in the constitution of Frederick above cited agrees, and it is contained in Authentica ‘Item Nulla’ Code. De Episcop. et Cleric., where there is a prohibition against imposing collections or exactions on ecclesiastical persons. Nor does it matter that it does not expressly speak about goods; both because, as I said, such an exaction from the goods of persons cannot be made without being made from the persons whose goods they are; and conversely tax of this sort cannot be exacted from persons otherwise than by requiring it of their goods and in accord with the quantity or proportion of them. For the discussion there is not about assessment alone or the poll tax, but about exactions, dues, services, duties in general, under which words it is certain that are included also taxes imposed on persons by reason of their goods. Hence by that constitution the law ‘De iis’ is abrogated, or any other law perhaps found in the books of the Code or in the Authentica of Justinian that derogates in this respect from the liberty of clerics. Or rather, the ancient laws of the pious emperors are renewed, wherein this exemption is so conceded to clerics that those taxes are forbidden to be exacted of them even from any honest and moderate business adapted to acquiring provisions, as is taken from laws 10, 14, & 36 De Episcop. et Cleric. in the Theodosian Code.

4. This assertion can be absolutely proved by reason, because this immunity, even as regard goods, is very much in conformity with natural reason and priestly dignity; for if the nobility is wont to be exempt in the human republic from taxes of this sort, why may not sacred persons dedicated to God be more exempt? Second, the same can be concluded from the other exemption of clerics from secular jurisdiction; for taxes are paid as it were in sign of subjection, and as stipend for the labor incumbent on administering supreme jurisdiction, as Paul indicated in Romans 13. Therefore just as clerics are altogether exempt from secular jurisdiction, so they are also as a result exempt from paying any taxes. You will say that, although they are exempt from the jurisdiction of princes, yet not from the advantage and utility of their government and solicitude; for by their providence they are preserved in peace, defended, and, at least according to the common idea of citizen, governed. And next they are simply vassals and ought to show due honor to the prince as to a lord; therefore it would also be just for them to help support the prince by some contribution.

5. I reply from the words of Paul 1 Corinthians 9.11: "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?" Thus we say, therefore, that just as the clerical state is aided by kings in temporal things, so kings are aided by clerics in spiritual things; for they intercede with God on their behalf and on behalf of the whole republic, and they pray specially for kings, as Paul advises 1 Timothy 2. Therefore they make sufficient compensation thereby for the benefit they receive from kings; for the reason above all that there is almost no increase of labor or expense to secular princes from the fact that political governance and the protection of kings redounds to the advantage of clerics. Add further the reason given above, that the Supreme Pontiff, to whom clerics are directly subject, can exact taxes from them when reasonable cause arises; and consequently he can also forbid them to pay tax to another, at least without his faculty, which, as I will say below, is morally necessary, so that clerics are kept immune from the importunities and injuries of laymen. Next there is not, because of this immunity of clerics even as regard their own goods, any lack to kings and princes of sufficient stipends and revenues whereby to be able to sustain the burdens of their office. But if sometimes they do need ecclesiastical support, it is not by their power but by his who is steward of the patrimony of Christ and has the special care of the ecclesiastical state, that they can require it, so that scandals and excesses may be avoided and all may be done in order.

6. A response, then, to the foundations to the contrary is easy from what has been said. And, to begin with, some reply to Ambrose that he is speaking of the fact, not of the right; for clerics, especially at that time when tax was being demanded of them, were paying it peacefully, not by debt of justice, but by affection of charity to avoid scandal, and so that they not seem to be refusing to be subject to princes from affection for temporal goods. And they collect this mind of Ambrose from the deed of Christ when he bade Peter pay tax, which Ambrose adduces as example; now it is clear from the words of Christ that he commanded Peter to pay tax, not from debt, but to avoid scandal. So as to make the example fit, then, it seems necessary that the opinion of Ambrose be understood in the same sense. The exposition is therefore probable, although the words of Ambrose "Christian men are taught they should be subject to the higher powers" and the like words seem to signify something further.

7. So there can be response in another way, that Ambrose did not speak of clerics but simply said "Christian men". Which word indicates that the great teaching which he there delivers was particularly given against the ancient error which asserts that Christians are exempt from the taxes of princes by the very fact they are Christians. For that error was refuted by Paul in Romans 13 where he propounds the opinion that Ambrose alleges, v.1: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers." But when Ambrose asks: "who are mighty you to think it should not be paid?" he need not be including clerics; for he immediately adds: "You who pursue secular gain, why do you not recognize secular obedience? Why do you, by a certain arrogance of spirit, hold yourself above the secular when you are, by wretched greed, subject to the secular?" He is speaking, then, of seculars or laymen. Next, although we grant that in the first question he is including clerics, the not unfitting sense may be that they ought not to refuse tax by their own authority and, as it were, their own presumption, but either in accord with the concessions of princes or in accord with the decrees of their own prelates.

8. To the civil laws we admit that some laws of Justinian do not favor this exemption, but it has already been replied that they have been revoked; and about the laws of the more ancient Christian emperors it is more true that they conceded to clerics full immunity from taxes. Although it cannot be denied that there was variability among the emperors themselves which the Church was then tolerating, because thus was it then expedient, to which fact perhaps Ambrose also made allusion, as we noted above. As to the reason, it has been there rightly responded that goods adhere to the person, and therefore the person cannot be fully and perfectly exempt unless the goods too are exempt. And therefore it matters not that the goods are temporal, nor that they have regard to the cleric not as he is a cleric but as he is a temporal owner or a citizen; because he is not only exempt as a cleric but also as a citizen, both his person simply and consequently too the things that are as it were accessory to him. But as to what concerns jurisdiction, it has already been shown that exemption from taxes is very much conjoined with and consequent upon exemption from jurisdiction, since the very imposition and exaction of tax is an act of jurisdiction. Nor can license be given in any way to laymen to seize by force or violently take away the goods of clerics, over whom they do not have jurisdiction, because this is against all natural right, and may only be permitted in case of extreme necessity, as I will say directly. Lastly to the objection made about the custom, we reply that it is not pertinent now for us to examine the manner and quality of the custom, which pertains to the fact, not to the right; and therefore we only say now that such a custom is unjust in its kind, and that it is rejected in right as contrary to ecclesiastical liberty, unless either it be expressly approved by the Pontiff or be founded on some exception of right in accord with what we will say in what follows.

Chapter 25. Whether clerics are held to pay the real burdens that attach to immovable things.

Summary. 1. Double exception from the rule of paying taxes. 2. Whether the goods of churches and clerics enjoy an equal exemption. Opinion to the negative and its foundation. 3. Conclusion: the goods of churches and clerics are equal in exemption from royal taxes. 4. Confirmation. 5. Solution to the contrary opinion. He who steals the goods of the Church commits sacrilege. One who seizes the goods of a cleric does not commit sacrilege unless he uses force against him.

1. Two exceptions to the rule posited in the preceding chapter can be thought of which need considering. The first is about the real taxes that attach to immovable things before they come into the power of clerics; for about later taxes, which supervene after such goods have come to belong to clerics, it is certain that they are included under the general rule; because all rights without distinction speak, and the reasons adduced above proceed, about immovables and movables equally; because the burdens too on immovable goods redound on the owner and are ultimately paid from the profits, which are movables. Next, when there are preceding burdens or taxes on the goods themselves, if they are from rents that arise from the personal and private ownership of him who first imposed the rent by the medium of some agreement, thus is it certain that the thing is transferred with its burden, and thereupon it must be paid by the cleric; for what we said in this respect about churches holds place in the case of clerics.

2. The doubt then is about properly royal taxes that have been imposed by force of his jurisdiction alone. The resolution of this doubt in fact seems to depend on another doubt, namely whether the goods of clerics are on a par with ecclesiastical goods in this exemption; for if they do not enjoy an equal privilege there is no reason that in this special case of a royal tax previously attached to the goods themselves an equivalence should be made, since the privilege of churches is very special. Now that there is not equal immunity for the goods of ecclesiastical persons and for those of churches, or for ecclesiastical goods, is taken from Gloss 2 on Clementina 1 'De in Integrum Restitut.', and from the Gloss on ch. 'Possessiones' 16 q.4, and from Abbas, Felinus, and others referred to by Covarrubias law 1 Variar. ch. 4 n.3, where he himself concludes that the patrimonial goods of clerics are not equal in exemption, save in cases where the fact is express in the law. And this seems in agreement with reason, because ecclesiastical goods are simply sacred and are destined only to sacred and pious uses, which does not hold of the property of clerics. Since therefore this case of which we are treating is not express in the law, it seems it should not be extended to the goods of clerics. Hence in the laws of Spain, book one of the new compilation title 2 laws 11 and 12, the warning is expressly made that clerics are bound to pay such tributes as attach to estates "after clerics have bought or otherwise acquired such estates." And so is it simply taught by Gregory Lopez Partit. 1 title 6 law 51 n.4, and by Valasco De Iure Emphyteut. q.17 n.10, who refers to several others, and they are followed by Molina tract.2 De Iustitia disp.456. The truth is that in this matter they speak indistinctly about the goods of churches and of clerics, hence all authors who think in this way about ecclesiastical goods will say the same a fortiori about the goods of clerics.

3. Nevertheless I consider the contrary opinion to be true (when speaking of taxes proper, as we distinguished above); it is expressly held by Cardinal Albanus in the tractate above cited, and by Gutierrez in Practicae Quaestiones bk.1 q.3 num.15 where he deals with the cited law 'Recopilationis', and he expounds it according to the opinion we delivered above, saying that it must be understood "when the goods are subjected to the burden of taxes expressly and by agreement of the parties, but it is otherwise if they are only subjected to taxes by general law" whereby the estates of private persons are obligated to the king for taxes; "for if," he says, "such goods have passed over to a cleric, they are not transferred with the burden." And he confirms it with the example of a second law of Spain bk.4 'Ordinamenti' law 12, which lays down that when a nobleman (in Spanish 'hidalgo') has bought from another goods liable to the payment of taxes, they are not transferred with the burden. This is how it happens, then, if a cleric buys similar goods or acquires them by hereditary right. For the reason is common to them all, because by change of person the quality attaching to the thing by reason of the person changes, argument 1 'Locatio' § 'Fiscus' and following De Publican. et Vectigal. and law 'Per Procuratorem' 89 and following De Acquirend. Haeredit. Hence, for this same reason, goods possessed before priesthood enjoy after priesthood the privilege of exemption. And on behalf of this opinion Gutierrez refers to several moderns, among whom can be seen Matienzo in book 5 Nova Recopilat. title 10 bk.11 Gloss 4, and Alfonsus Guerrero in Thesaurus Christianae Religionis ch.36 nn.9 & 33.

Now those authors insinuate that royal taxes proper, which are said to be real and attach to immovable things, do not attach to them considered as it were per se and absolutely, but by reason of the persons under whose dominion they are, and accordingly they are as it were only pledges or mortgages obligatory by virtue of law 1 Code 'In quibus causis hypotheca contrahatur,' which is very probable. And hence there is a very good confirmation (which we said above about churches and are now saying about clerics) that such goods are not transferred to them with such a burden of paying taxes, namely for the future. For if the prior owner did not pay the due taxes for some of the time he possessed such goods, the goods would pass with that burden, because they always retain their respect to the prior owner and by reason of him and because of his subjection it is always owed; which reason ceases in the case of paying taxes from the time when such goods were transferred to an exempt person.

4. This reason can also be confirmed from what was said above in the like doubt about ecclesiastical goods; for let it be that in other things, or in special prerogatives and privileges, these goods are not equal, nevertheless they are rightly on a par in exemption from taxes. Both because, just as churches are altogether exempt from secular jurisdiction, so also are the persons of clerics; and also because the rights, wherein this exemption from taxes is prescribed, speak equally of churches and ecclesiastical persons and of the goods of each. And in this way is the equivalence approved of by Gloss 2 on ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae' De Constitut. where Felinus nn.7 & 8 speaks at length; again the last Gloss De Vita et Honest. Clericor. which weighs up the text for this purpose. There Panormitanus n.11 seems to limit it, but in fact the limitation does not proceed of the matter of taxes but of other privileges, and it is not a limitation to the Gloss, because it does not speak generally but of three among them, just as does the text which he adduces. And the same opinion is held by the penultimate Gloss on ch. 'Ex literis' De Pignioribus, and very well by Gloss 1 on ch. 'Ecclesiarum' 12 q.2, and it is also taken from the text which is from the 3rd Council of Toledo ch.21 and from the other ancient Councils that the Gloss mentions. And it is better confirmed by ch.1 De Immunit. Ecclesiar. on 6 which (as I noted above) speaks distinctly about goods acquired and to be acquired, and I now note that it also speaks expressly of churches and ecclesiastical persons and of their goods. And in the same way speaks the last Clementina, De Censibus.

5. From which things the response is clear to the reason for doubting put at the beginning: for we deny that this privilege is in this respect special to churches, or that it is not sufficiently express in the law; for it is clear from the Glosses, and from the rights alleged to the contrary. Now the doctors there mentioned who deny this equivalence are, as I said, to be understood as to other privileges but not as to this privilege of exemption from taxes. Nor is there on this an obstacle from the reason there adduced, that ecclesiastical goods are more sacred than are the goods of clerics; for the expedience of this is in respect of other effects, as for example that there is greater guilt in turning ecclesiastical goods aside to profane uses than the goods proper to clerics, even those acquired in view of the Church. Again, that there is greater guilt in stealing the goods of the Church than those proper to clerics; for it is sacrilege according to the doctrine of St. Thomas q.99 aa.3 & 4, which everyone follows, and it is taken from many decrees, 12 q.2 and 16 q.1 ch. 'In Canonibus'; but theft from a cleric is not truly sacrilege unless force is applied to the person, according to ch. 'Quisquis' 17 q.4, and it was noted by Panormitanus on ch. 'Ceterum' De Iudiciis n.17, although Sylvester, on the word 'Sacrilege', thought otherwise. But in the case of taxes an equivalence is made in right because the exemption is not founded on the sanctity of the goods themselves but on the absolute exemption of the person. As to the law of Spain it has already been replied that it must be understood of special taxes founded on the agreement of the parties. And in the same way must be expounded the authors there alleged, or their opinion is not to be allowed. And according to this doctrine, it seems, must be understood the dispositions that in book 2 of the Ordinamenti of this kingdom title 33 are made about a certain tax which they call 'Iugadas'. For it arose without doubt from the direct lordship of the kings and by agreement with the subjects on whom they bestowed those goods, as is clear from the beginning of that title, and therefore it is not strictly contained in the general privilege of clerics or churches. Yet nevertheless the special privileges are to be kept that also in the same place are in this matter conceded to them.

Chapter 26. Whether clerics are held to contribute to the common expenditures of citizens.

Summary. 1. Reason for doubt on behalf of the affirmative side. 2. Resolution to the affirmative, and foundation for this resolution. 3. Second opinion and its foundation. 4. True solution. When necessity arises a bishop is bound to consent to contribution by clerics. Proof. Laymen can never compel clerics to contribute. 5. Whether in this contribution the form prescribed by canon right is to be kept. Opinion to the negative. 6. It is rejected. 7. A second way of defending this opinion. 8. It is refuted. 9. Response to the reason adduced for the foundation. 10. Objection. Solution. 11. Conclusion: in requiring contributions from the clergy the mode and form prescribed by canon right is to be kept. 12. What conditions the form prescribed by canon right requires: first condition. 13. Second. 14. Third. 15. Evasion. Limitation to be admitted in the third condition.

1. A second exception pertaining to movable goods can be about certain taxes that are not imposed as royal stipends but are parceled out as necessary expenses for the common utility of citizens among themselves. Of this sort are taxes that are imposed for repairing roads, bridges, or water supply, or city walls, and like things necessary for the common use of citizens, including clerics. Now the reason for doubt can be that civil rights do not permit clerics to be exempted from these contributions, as is clear from the law 'Ad Instructiones' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. where even venerable churches and houses of divinity are listed for payment of this tax, but there is only mention there of "the building of bridges and roads." But in the last law of Code. Quibus Muneribus etc. bk.11 the addition is made of "the construction of walls and the supply and common provision of grain and other species." Hence the right will be in place as regards all things of like nature. And this common right is imitated by the laws of Spain on law 20 title 32 part 3, and law 5 title 6 part 1, and finally on bk.1 of the Nova Recopilatio title 3 law 11, where first is put a general rule about taxes imposed for the common good, and then are put the examples stated above with the addition of others, and the same is laid down along with other examples in law 12.

Now it does not seem that canon right can in this respect set civil right aside, because this arrangement seems to be very much in conformity with justice and equity, nay with piety too. For impositions of this sort are in reality not taxes, which are indicative of subjection and have a foundation in proper jurisdiction, because they are not imposed for giving payment to kings as lords and princes but they are only distributions made among citizens for the proper uses of the citizens themselves. Now reason and justice require that everyone who needs and uses common things of this sort should agree in a just distribution as to the expenses that arise with respect to them; therefore, since clerics enjoy these common advantages, they should also share this sort of burden along with the rest of the citizens. For the same reason of obligation and debt arises in their case, and paying these taxes is no more against the dignity of the priestly state than buying with their own money the things they need for food and clothing. Nay, because the former goods have regard to the common good and suchlike contribution is in this respect consonant with piety, therefore in the said law ‘Ad Instructiones’ is it said: “we gladly describe venerable churches with so laudable a title because it is not reckoned among mean functions.” And in the said law 11 of the Nova Recopilatio of Spain it is said: “In these sorts of things, when the council is lacking in means of its own, the said clerics should make a contribution and give aid, insofar as it is for the common good of all and a work of piety,” as though saying that, when for these sorts of expenses the common goods of the whole people or their revenues are not sufficient, then reason of piety and common utility demands that clerics make contribution. And the limitation is very much to be noted, for it much confirms the equity of this contribution. Because where the common goods are not sufficient, supply must be made from the private and particular goods of individual citizens; why then should individual lay citizens be compelled to make another payment for clerics from their own goods, or provide them with things necessary, though common, from expenditures of their own? Which reason seems to show that neither the Pontiff nor the king himself can concede this exemption to clerics if the communities of laymen are themselves unwilling.

But canon rights seem to urge the contrary, especially ch. ‘Non Minus’ and ch. ‘Adversus’ De Immunit. Ecclesiar. For in the first it is laid down under anathema, universally and without limitation, that these burdens may not be imposed on churches and clerics: “Unless the bishop and the clergy have seen so great a necessity or utility that, without any compulsion to relieve common utilities or necessities where the supplies of the laity are insufficient, they judge that subsidies should be conferred by the churches.” But in the second chapter there is indicated, to begin with, that this contribution of clerics is even in that case not a matter of debt but of grace, for the addition is there made: “Let the aforesaid laity humbly and devoutly receive with thanksgiving.” And, what is more important, the following limitation is adjoined: “Because, however, of the imprudence of some, let the Roman Pontiff be first consulted, whose concern it is to provide for the common utilities.” There can also be added ch. ‘Quaquam’ De Censibus on 6 and chs. 1 & 3 De Immunit. Eccles. on 6, insofar as in them is it generally said that churches and ecclesiastical persons are exempt from all compulsion from seculars.

2. On this point the doctors seem to agree in this that when the common goods of cities are not sufficient for these sorts of expenditures and it is therefore necessary for the citizens to make a contribution, clerics too should come together and with due proportion and moderation make a contribution. For this is also permitted and approved by canon right, and it involves natural equity, as we have made plain. But there is a difficulty both in the kind of obligation and especially in the manner of the imposition and exaction. For about the kind of obligation it can be doubted whether clerics should in these sorts of cases only make contribution through a certain sense of honor and as it were by counsel, or whether they are bound by necessity and an obligation in conscience. For some think they are only bound in the first way, as is indicated by Panormitanus bk.1 consil.3 n.1 near the end where he says: "Also, when the common utility of clerics and laity is under threat, clerics are not bound to contribute anything unless they wish to of their own accord." For when he says "of their own accord" he indicates that the contribution is voluntary, not necessary. And for this purpose he adduces the words of ch. 'Non Minus' which we will at once relate. And this opinion can be proved by reason, because clerics are not obliged by force of the civil laws, or by the force of official regulations that are made by laymen under some color of precept, since they are not subject to them; nor is there found a canon law that imposes such obligation on them, nor finally does natural law alone oblige them, because this obligation depends on many circumstances that are not of natural right but result from compacts and conventions among the citizens themselves.

3. Nevertheless the contrary opinion on this matter is held by Gregory Lopez on law 54 title 6 partit.1 gloss 2, and it is followed by Gutierrez in Practic. Quaestionibus bk.1 ch.2 n.8, and Guerrero has the same opinion in Thesaurus Christianae Relig. ch.36 n.32. Their foundation is on the words of ch. 'Non Minus' at the place: "Unless the bishop and the clergy have seen so great a necessity or utility that...they judge that subsidies should be conferred by the churches;" for where a thing is given to judgment it is not held to be given to free will but to just judgment and decision, as Ulpian declares on law 'Fideicommissa' § 'Si fideicommissum,' vers. 'Quanquam' ff. De Legat. 3, where he says that by this condition "if you have judged" a thing is not given to complete will but to prudent choice and as it were to the good man; therefore in this sense the Pontiff said that the clergy, "if it judge" by prudent choice that the common utility or necessity is urgent, should make a contribution; therefore, on the supposition of such judgment, this debt belongs to moral necessity and not to will. In addition also this point seems to be efficaciously proved by the reasons given for the first point. And to the second of them, which we just gave to the contrary, the response will be easy, that this obligation arises from natural equity, whose matter is not changed on this point by positive right, because civil right rather confirms it, to which canon right is not opposed but gives the practical judgment, and in particular about such equity, to the pastors of the Church.

4. Wherefore on this point it must be said that clerics individually or taken one by one are not bound to a contribution of this sort until a prudent judgment has been made by the bishop along with the clergy, and it has been decreed that a common necessity or utility is in the case occurring to which the clergy ought to contribute. This is proved by what is said in ch. 'Non Minus' where it is laid down that the approval of the prelate should come first, as we will make clearer a little below; therefore in advance of it individual clerics are not bound to pay the contribution; nay, they cannot do so, as we will see below. Next it must be said that, if there is in very truth occurring a common necessity or utility along with due circumstances, the bishop is bound to approve a contribution, and he would be acting against reason and justice if he opposes it. This is in fact what Gregory Lopez and others chiefly intend. And the proof is that this is not given to his free will but to his prudent choice; therefore he is held by his office and justice to allow the tax if he judges in truth that a case of necessity exists, or if he ought so to judge, in such wise that he is not excused by invincible ignorance. But it must further be added that clerics cannot be compelled by laymen to pay tax, even if it has already been approved by the bishop, because laymen never have jurisdiction to compel clerics. They could therefore beg, ask, and request clerics to pay of their own accord, but not impose force. And perhaps it was in this sense that Panormitanus said clerics ought to pay of their own accord. And for this same reason I judge that in the said chapter ‘Adversus’ the words are added: “Let the aforesaid laity humbly and devoutly receive with thanksgiving.” Wherefore if clerics in that case refuse to pay, they are to be compelled by their prelate, as Gutierrez rightly said along with the others whom he mentions. But if the bishop refuses to compel the clergy when they sin in this respect, or if he acts unjustly by refusing to allow the contribution when he is bound to, it will be necessary to have recourse to a superior prelate, and thus the immunity of clerics will be preserved and the subsidy necessary for the common good will not be lacking.

5. It remains to treat of the other part of the doubt concerning the manner to be kept in this contribution, namely whether, in imposing a contribution on clerics for these sorts of works of common utility, or in demanding it of them, the form prescribed in the said decrees is to be kept, or whether lay princes, when taking no account of it, may put their laws into execution. For many jurists were not lacking who said that nothing in this respect has by canon right been abrogated from civil right, and hence that for exacting these taxes of clerics there is no need for recourse to the Supreme Pontiff, as is demanded in the said ch. ‘Adversus’, nor for the approval of the bishop or the clergy, as is prescribed in the same place and in the said ch. ‘Non Minus’, but that the edict of the king is enough when he puts forward a cause as common and necessary and a contribution as moderate and in just proportion parceled out. This opinion is stated by the Gloss and by Hostiensis on the said ch. ‘Non Minus’, and it is extensively defended by Lucas de Penna on law ‘Cum ad Felicissimam’ Code ‘Quibus Muneribus’ bk.10, who along with others is referred to for this opinion by Gutierrez above, and it is specially defended by Rebuffus in his commentary on the Constitutio Galliae vol.1 tract. De Sentent. Provis. a.3 gloss 6, where others are referred to. And, when he objects to himself that the emperor could not bind clerics by his law, he replies: “It is true, yet this opinion is in fact held in France.” Wherein he opines that there has through custom been a modification in this respect from canon right. But that this foundation is altogether false we will show below.

So that therefore the foundation for this opinion may in some way be acceptable, it must be established on this, that canon rights, when prescribing the form to be kept in requesting these sorts of taxes from clerics, are not extended to these taxes when they are imposed by royal authority. This can be made clear in two ways. First because ch. ‘Non Minus’ only speaks of consuls and governors of cities and of others that seem to have a like authority, and forbids them to impose taxes on clerics except with the approval of the bishop, etc. Hence in the following chapter ‘Adversus’, which is from the Lateran Council under Innocent III, the decision of the prior Lateran Council under Alexander III is referred to in these words: “Against consuls and governors of cities, or others, etc.” Therefore by force of such words supreme kings are not prevented from imposing these burdens on clerics. And this opinion is openly held by Lucas de Penna in the place cited, and is insinuated by Hostiensis in his Summa title ‘De Immunitate Ecclesiarum’ § ‘A quibus’ verse ‘Verum ad extraordinaria’; for although he says that the law ‘Ad Constitutiones’ and similar ones are to be corrected and modified by canon right, nevertheless he adds the limitation “unless the king prescribes.” It is true, however, that there is in the context an ambiguity whether he wished to say that these exactions are illicit with respect to clerics simply, or that they are illicit with respect to all subjects unless they are made by the authority of the prince; and this latter seems more to be his sense if the whole context is considered.

6. However of whatever sort the limitation is in ch. ‘Non Minus’ and the like, it is not to be admitted, because, to begin with, it is repugnant to the pontifical declaration in the bull ‘Coena Domini’ where the prohibition is expressly extended to anyone “of any preeminence and dignity, even imperial and royal:” and the addition is made: “Renovating the decrees on these matters delivered by the sacred canons both in the most recent Lateran Council and in other General Councils,” where it chiefly understands the ch. ‘Adversus’ and ch. ‘Non Minus’, by expounding (as I think) rather than by adding that the disposition made by the canons is extended to all temporal princes. Next, in those decrees, although perhaps because of occasion of the fact that is there referred to, consuls and governors are named, yet at the end general words are added that comprehend everyone who has power to impose taxes, as in ch. ‘Non Minus’: “And others too who seem to possess power.” And in ch. ‘Adversus’ at the place: “Consuls and governors of cities and others.” Where it did not say ‘others similar’ but simply ‘others’, clearly comprehending everyone who tries to impose these exactions on ecclesiastical men, and ch. ‘Clericis’ § ‘Nos igitur’ De Immunit. Ecclesiar. on 6 expressly names “emperors, kings, etc.” And there is for this part confirmation in the sole Clementina at the same title, although it is in general words, namely “against any layman whatever, etc.” And thus too does Clement V interpret and confirm the decisions of the Lateran Councils under Alexander and Innocent. Finally in ch. ‘Quamquam’ De Censibus there is expressly said: “Neither college nor university nor also any individual person, of whatever dignity they may be, etc.” It is therefore most certain that there can be no limitation to those decrees on the part of lay persons, whatever the power or dignity they excel with, and accordingly the opinion of the jurists based on this declaration cannot be approved.

7. In another way, then, may the opinion be defended, by saying that the rights are not speaking of those impositions that are made by way of just distribution among the citizens for things necessary or very useful for all, but they are speaking of taxes proper that are imposed for the support of princes or kings. A reason can be given too, that the prior exactions or contributions, as I was saying above, are not taxes proper imposed by the superior power and will of the prince, but are as it were certain due expenses, because they arise by the nature of the thing from work of that sort necessary for the community. Because neither are clerics justly able to resist or forbid the doing of such work, nor can they prevent the natural obligation that results to themselves, as to the other citizens, of paying what amount of the expenses, in accord with just proportion, falls on individuals; and therefore such obligation does not arise from secular jurisdiction, nor from civil law, but from natural reason, on the supposition of such a just and morally necessary deed for the community. Hence it turns out that such contribution is not repugnant to ecclesiastical liberty, and accordingly it is not contrary to the canon rights that prohibit any temporal exactions being made from clerics, because these only prohibit exactions contrary to ecclesiastical liberty, which are the sort that are founded on the jurisdiction of laymen and on positive civil law.

8. But although this foundation may have a certain appearance of probability, nevertheless it is not sound nor consonant with the decrees. First because, as Abbas noted on the said Council, the said chapter ‘Non Minus’ first says: “either ditches, or expeditions,” and then adds: “or anything else at all.” For ditches are wont to be made for the protection of the city and so they pertain to utilities common to clerics and laymen, and more or less the same is wont to hold of expeditions; therefore when the distributed phrase ‘anything else at all’ is added, everything similar is at least included. Hence in ch. ‘Adversus’ the aforesaid decision about expeditions, which are ordered to the relief of common utilities and necessities, is distinctly explained. Besides, in other rights exactions and collections are absolutely and without limitation forbidden, by which names these common contributions are wont to be signified, and the sole Clementina adds the distributed phrase “any exactions at all” and adjoins in addition: “also concerning subventions provided to laymen by prelates or other ecclesiastical persons;” but, by the name of subventions, these sorts of contributions are most wont to be signified. And in the said Authentica ‘Item Nulla’ postal services and other imperial services are indicated, which are also wont to be exacted for common utility; therefore that limitation is repugnant to the words of the rights themselves.

9. Next, the reason or conjecture adduced in that foundation is not enough for interpreting the rights against the words in them, because it does not prove that the limitation is necessary for making the decision of those canons just and reasonable. First indeed because ecclesiastical goods, by which clerics are maintained, are assigned to higher ends that redound to the good and advantage of laymen themselves; for subvention to the poor is a great advantage to laymen, temples too and all their expenditures serve the uses of laymen, and therefore it is not alien to reason for laymen to make from their own temporal goods alone contributions to civil public works, even if these redound to the common utility of clerics. Especially because goods assigned to sacred uses should not be turned to profane and common uses, and therefore rightly are they exempted from these temporal contributions also. This reason is pursued extensively by Panormitanus on the said Council.

10. You will say that these reasons proceed at most about goods of the Church, but not about the goods of clerics, because these can also be patrimonial; and even if they be from the revenues of the Church, they are now, after they have been made proper to clerics, not sacred but are comparable to patrimonial goods, as was said above. The response is that the reason proceeds in sufficiently appropriate manner of the goods of clerics; especially of those that come from ecclesiastical revenues, because by force of their exemption and dignity they require to be conferred without diminution and without temporal burden. Next, the reason is rightly extended to patrimonial goods, both because these are as it were incidentals and accessories, and it is expedient that they participate in the exemption of the person and of the other goods, lest occasion be given for laymen, under the color of them, to impose burdens on clerics; and also because clerics themselves serve the common utility of laymen, and therefore it is in some way due to clerics that they be able to enjoy the temporal utilities common to the rest of the citizens, even if they do not come to the temporal support of them. For soldiers and magistrates are by this reason wont to be exempted; therefore by right priests too are exempted, who belong to right or to the common good no less than civil magistrates, according to the opinion of Isidore bk. 5 Etymologiae ch.8 ch. 'Ius Publicum' distinct.1; and the same is contained in law 1 and following De Iustit. et Iure. Finally, although we may grant that in some cases it is just and reasonable for clerics to contribute to these works, it does not thence follow that the said canon rights are not speaking about these exactions or contributions, because they do not altogether forbid them but lay down the mode and form to be kept in them. But this is most consonant to reason, because the prelates of the Church are concerned with taking special care of clerics and with adjudicating whether such burdens are justly imposed on them, not only in general but also in special cases and events when excesses and violence are wont to be committed. Which reason the said rights have touched upon.

11. One must say, therefore, without any doubt that in requiring from the clergy these sorts of contributions, ordered by lay princes and magistrates, the mode and form is to be kept that is determined in canon right, especially in the said chapters 'Non Minus' and 'Adversus'. Thus does Panormitanus teach extensively in the said cons.3, and on the said ch. 'Non Minus' n.18, where he refers to other ancient doctors who agree in this truth, particularly the Gloss on ch. 'Generaliter' at the word 'Collationibus', which says the law 'Ad Instructiones' has been modified or limited by canon right. And Hostiensis is of the same opinion in his Summa title De Immunitat. § 'A Quibus' near the end, and the canonists generally on the said decrees, Paulus Castrensis, Iason, and others on the said law 'Ad Instructiones', and Gregory Lopez on the said title 6 partit.1 law 51, and better on law 54 nn.1 & 2, and that law is very favorable. For although it says that clerics ought to pay these contributions, yet at the same time it makes clear that this is by consent of the Church when it says: "the holy Church has held it to be good." And later it subjoins that laymen cannot compel clerics to this payment but can only make a simple request of them; and if clerics refuse to give they are to be compelled by the bishops; but of the bishops it says that they are held to prescribe it; which is to be understood according to the prior declaration, namely according to the approval of the Church and the mode prescribed thereby. And there is much in favor of this opinion, and, as regards the assertions of the doctors in particular, these can be seen in Gutierrez on the said question 3 bk.1 Particular. Quaest.

12. Now the form or mode to be kept in the case of these taxes, so that they may be exacted of clerics, consists in three conditions that are taken from the said chapters 'Non Minus' and 'Adversus'. The first is put in these words: "Where the resources of laymen are not sufficient." About these words there can be doubt as to what resources are to be understood, whether only the resources common to the republic or also the resources of the individual citizens. On this point I find nothing explicit in the Gloss or in the doctors thereon nor in the other canon rights, nor even in the laws of common civil right; nay, the law 'Ad Instructiones' altogether omits the condition; and only in the said law of Spain in the Nova Recopilatio is the condition made explicit, and it is limited to common goods by the words: "when the council is lacking in means of its own." Which law it seems possible to stand by, as long as something else is not established by canon right, both because it is sufficiently consonant with reason, as is clear from what has been said above, and also because another restriction would be too much; for scarcely can a moral case arise where the proper goods of the citizens, all and individually, are not sufficient for carrying out works of this sort, and to test or prov this will be rather difficult. In order, then, for the clergy to be able to consent, it is enough that it be morally certain that common goods are not enough and that individual citizens cannot without grave inconvenience carry out such work at their own expense alone.

13. A second condition is that the contribution not be made unless the bishop and the clergy, after the matter has been inspected and considered, judge that it should be granted. Thus is it held in ch. 'Non Minus', and more expressly in ch. 'Adversus' is it said: "the bishop together with the clerics." Hence it is clear that the bishop alone cannot approve or command the contribution, even according to the disposition in the chapter 'Non Minus', because the agreement of the clergy is required at the same time. But it can be asked what is understood by the name of clergy or clerics, for strictly there seems to be signified that a diocesan synod is necessary; for this seems to be understood by the name of clergy; also because what touches all should be ratified by all; therefore it is necessary that all agree, at least per capita and in a synod. But there is to the contrary the fact that this does not seem to be observed in use, and morally it is too difficult to be able to be kept in practice on all occasions that occur. Wherefore it is sufficiently probable that the consent of the bishop along with the chapter of his own cathedral church is enough; for that is what is wont to be understood in right by the name of clerics, according to chapter 1, along with others, about things that are done by prelates without the consent of the chapter. Custom can also be of much force in this matter; for where the bishop has from prescribed custom the proper advice of his officials, or of clerics appointed to this office, and he is wont to expedite along with them the more serious business of the diocese, this can seem sufficient for fulfilling the condition required in those rights.

14. The third condition in the said ch. 'Non Minus' is that the contribution be made without any exaction. But this pertains rather to the mode of requesting a tax already imposed than to the mode to be kept in imposing a tax. Now it is to be understood of coercive exaction, as has already been explained above, and about that condition can be seen Gigas De Pension. q.90 at the end, where he refers to others. There is also insinuated in the same title another condition, namely that the contribution be "for the relief of common utilities or necessities;" but this is not a new condition but the end and as it were the foundation of justice for such imposition, which we have made our principal supposition in this whole chapter. When these conditions are omitted, therefore, Innocent III added his own third condition in the said ch. 'Adversus' in these words: "Because, however, of the imprudence of some, let the Roman Pontiff be first consulted, whose concern it is to provide for the common utilities." On this condition are founded most of all, because of its difficulty and the delay which it necessarily brings with it, the authors of the contrary opinion, so that they think it is not to be extended to those actions that are frequently necessary and that possess as it were an innate natural equity and piety. Yet it is nevertheless evident that Innocent III spoke about the same exactions or taxes as Alexander III, and accordingly this condition is extended to all the taxes on which the prior conditions fall. And so, although it seem difficult, it must yet be kept, because thus was it written by him who had the power of imposing it, and it could be expedient for avoiding the disadvantages that often occur. I judge, however, that if the bishop and the clergy, without consulting the Supreme Pontiff, agree, although they are acting badly and may be punished, the fact nevertheless holds, because there is no word there that voids their agreement, and they do have in other respects by ordinary right the power to furnish that consent.

15. Some may however say that this condition is founded on presumption, as is indicated by the words: "Because of the imprudence of some," and therefore, when the justice and the reason for the contribution are evident and there is due consent according to prudence, the law as to this condition does not oblige. Because the presumption yields to truth and consequently the law that is founded on the presumption also ceases. I reply by denying the assumption, because the law does not in truth suppose the act of presumption on which it is founded, but only the moral danger and occasion of frequent evil and harm. But this is enough for the law to be passed in universal terms, and to oblige even in the particular case although therein the end or reason for the law ceases by way of negation. So the condition can only be limited in case of urgent necessity, when there is danger in delay, by the argument of ch. 'Pervenit.' De Immunit. Ecclesiar., and because necessity possesses no law. And this limitation is added by Panormitanus and Gregory Lopez above, and by Sylvester at the word 'Immunitas' n.20, Gutierrez above, who refers to others. Now this necessity can happen most of all in an exaction that is made for one act or for a brief time; for if it is going to last for a longer time, although it can, in a case of necessity, begin without the consultation of the Supreme Pontiff, he will have to be consulted if it is protracted for a longer time, because the law can in this respect be fulfilled despite the necessity, because there is for it in this way sufficient help.

Chapter 27. Whether all clerics, those ordained as well in sacred orders as in minor orders, and who continue in the clerical state, have full enjoyment of ecclesiastical liberty.

Summary. 1. Double order of ecclesiastical persons, one of clerics and one of regulars. 2. What the difference is between these ecclesiastical persons. 3. First conclusion. Proof first from canon right and second from civil right. 4. Proof also by reason. 5. Assertion of the limitation: 'who continue in the clerical state.' Sacred orders introduce by themselves alone the privilege of exemption, but not so minor orders. 6. A triple condition is required in minor clerics for enjoying this privilege. 7. Objection. 8. Whether remuneration along with minor orders suffices for this privilege. 9. For this same privilege the age of 14 years is not required. 10. A cleric in minor orders, when any of the conditions is lacking, by that very fact loses the privilege. 11. Whether a minor cleric, if he is not serving in any church nor is engaged in study, is exempt from taxes. Affirmative opinion. True opinion. 12. Consideration of a certain law of Spain. 13. Whether clerics, when they have once been deprived of this privilege by defect of conditions, may further enjoy it. First opinion. 14. Opinion of the author. 15. A cleric can sometimes because of crimes lose this privilege. 16. In what ways the punishment of being deprived of this privilege may be imposed on clerics. 17. The privileges of the canon and of the forum of clerics are distinguished in canon right.

1. We have explained the causes and effects of this exemption; it remains only to discuss the persons or subjects to whom this privilege is conceded. And, since from what has been said it is sufficiently clear in general that this privilege is conceded to ecclesiastical persons, two things under this general point remain to be explained. One is who the ecclesiastical persons are who share in this privilege. The other is whether this whole privilege is totally and as to all its matters to be communicated to them individually. First then a double order of ecclesiastical persons is to be distinguished according to the division given by Jerome in ch. 'Duo Sunt' 12 q.1. One is of clerics, the other is of those who there are called converted or devoted to God, who are indicated under the name of 'monks' in ch. 'Si Quis Suadente' 17 q.4, and are now commonly comprehended under the name of religious or regulars.

2. Now these two kinds of ecclesiastical persons differ in that the clerical state properly taken requires some sacramental ordination, or requires at least its first disposition and as it were its beginning through the first tonsure (for it is now taken in this amplitude according to ch. 'Cum non ab Homine' De Sentent. Excom. and ch. 'Cum non ab Homine' De Iudiciis). But the monastic state does not require orders but only a certain sacred state whereby a person is specially dedicated to God and with purpose he may be accepted as such by the Church. Next, in the clerical state there are diverse grades, for some are clerics in sacred orders, as are all those who, having been through ordination attached by reason of a vow, are made unfitted for marriage, according to ch. 'Miramur' De Servis non Ordinandis. But others are clerics in minor orders who do not pronounce a vow, and these are therefore to be further distinguished, for some are clerics who are continent and others are married. And thus there result four grades of ecclesiastical persons about whom we shall speak in turn; but in this chapter we will deal with all unmarried clerics together, because they are at one in the general rule; and, once this rule has been set down, the exceptions or differences that there are between them will easily be understood.

3. We must say, therefore, that all clerics, whether in sacred or in minor orders, including those established with the first tonsure and continuing in the clerical state, enjoy clerical privilege fully and completely, speaking per se that is, unless they have been deprived of it because of crimes. This assertion is beyond controversy among Catholics, for it is manifestly proved from canon right. Above all in ch.2 De Foro Competenti at the place: "Neither priest, nor deacon, nor any cleric or minors in the Church;" by which last member seem to be understood youths or juniors (as another reading has it) who have the first tonsure only, although others extend the term further, as we will see below. The same is proved in the said ch. 'Cum non ab Homine' De Iudiciis at the place: "Clerics or any order whatever." But other rights speak of clerics indefinitely; under which term all are included, especially in things favorable, unless a limitation is added, and an explanation specifically on this matter is given in ch. 'De Persona' 11 q.1, where many other rights speak of clerics in the same way; but they are dealing specifically with the privilege of forum in both criminal and civil matter. And in the same general way speak the canon rights about clerics as to exemption from taxes, as can be seen in all the titles of De Immunitate Ecclesiarum, as is clear from Authentica 'Cassa' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. and from Authentica 'Item Nulla' Code. De Episcopis et Clericis, where Frederick speaks indefinitely of "ecclesiastical persons", which name is the more general one. In the Theodosian Code too there are many laws, already often pointed out, wherein this privilege is conceded either absolutely to clerics or sometimes also to minors in particular. Hence it is a fortiori clear that it belongs to adults.

4. The reason for the assertion is no other than what is taken from the right. For if this privilege is considered as it exists by divine right, it has thus no limitation on the part of clerics, because all belong by a special title to the family of Christ and are consecrated and assigned to the divine cult; for although there is among clerics themselves a difference in major and minor consecration, or in greater or lesser sacred ministry, this is not enough for us to say that some have been more exempted by force of divine right than others, as was made clear above in chapter ten. But if this privilege is considered as it can by ecclesiastical right be determined or limited as to the persons, thus too there is no distinction found to have been made between clerics in sacred or clerics in minor orders, provided they continue in the clerical state, in the way to be explained below. Now the reason can be collected from ch. ‘Si Diligenti’ De Foro Competent., that this privilege, as it is not personal, that is, not conceded in view of the person, so it is not given in view of this or that order but in view of the clerical state, and therefore is it said there: “an indulgence given to the whole ecclesiastical college,” to which college all clerics belong whatever, as is said there. Nor is it to be doubted that clerics with the first tonsure alone are also included under this general term; and therefore authors are sometimes wont to speak about them in particular, either so as to take away all doubt or so that all higher clerics may a fortiori be understood to be included, as one may see in Joannes Lupus Tractate. De Libertate Ecclesiastica ch.2, and in Covarrubias in his Practic. chs. 31, 32, & 33 De Foro Competenti, and more clearly in the Council of Trent session 23 ch.6 De Reformat., which decree we will at once expound.

Now that this decree is to be understood about full and complete exemption, as I said in the second part of the assertion, is equally certain, and it is to be proved in more or less the same way; for canon and civil rights, both those that concede exemption of forum in criminal and civil cases and those that concede immunity from taxes, speak of ecclesiastical persons equally, or indefinitely, or in distributed terms. Hence everything that we have hitherto said about the generality of the exemption, as well in criminal and civil courts as in civil laws too and taxes, must be applied equally to all clerics of any order who continue in the clerical state, because the rights make no discrimination among them in this respect; hence neither should we make discrimination, except perhaps in some particular case express in the right of which we are now treating.

5. But I said “who continue in the clerical state” first to make clear that the conclusion is understood of unmarried clerics, for they alone enjoy complete exemption, as will be clear from what is to be said in the following chapter. Next, the clause was introduced to explain the decree of the Council of Trent, mentioned above, and the difference that is found therein between clerics of greater and lesser orders. Now this difference supposes another discrimination between the states of the clerics of each order. For although it is a thing common to all clerics that they receive an indelible character (which is to be accepted about the first tonsure with a certain proportion and imitation), nevertheless, as to continuance in the clerical state and office, sacred orders bring with them a greater stability and obligation. For clerics in sacred orders are bound to persevere in the clerical state, ch. ‘Decernimus’ dist.28; nor can they abandon it without apostasy, hence they can be compelled to retain the clerical habit and insignia, ch. ‘Tuae’ De Apostatis, with the addition of the commonly approved Gloss. Clerics in minor orders, however, as the same Gloss notes, can without apostasy put off the clerical state and live as laymen and be engaged in secular business, according to ch. ‘Ioannes’ De Clericis Conjugatis, and the sole chapter at the same title on 6. From this difference, then, it results that clerics in sacred orders are absolutely and without any other condition said to enjoy by force of their ordination the clerical privilege, because such ordination brings with it continuance in that state, and consequently it brings also the clerical privilege, speaking per se, which clause or limitation I will explain below. But the lower orders, because they do not per se oblige to continuance in that state, are not per se enough to enjoy the clerical privilege but require some other conditions which indicate that such a person is continuing in a state in which he is dedicated to divine cult and ecclesiastical ministry, which is the most powerful reason for which this privilege is conceded.

6. Hence, therefore, the Tridentine Synod session 23 ch.6 De Reformat. made a decree in this manner: “No one initiated in the first tonsure or placed in minor orders before his fourteenth year may obtain a benefice. Let him also not enjoy the privilege of forum unless he has an ecclesiastical benefice or, when wearing the clerical habit and tonsure, is in the service of some church by order of his bishop, or is busy in a seminary of clerics, or in a school or university of Episcopal license, being as it were on the way to receiving major orders.” From which decision it is clear that the mind of the Council was that clerics placed in minor orders may not enjoy clerical privilege unless they are actually dedicated to ecclesiastical ministries; which we have explained by the phrase of “continuing in the clerical state.” But the Council wanted something else to be added to the minor orders whereby that continuance or dedication to divine cult might be indicated. Now the Council distinguished two modes. One is if a minor cleric has an ecclesiastical benefice. The other is if he bears the clerical tonsure and habit and has been placed or appointed by the bishop to serve in some church or to be in some fashion on the way to ecclesiastical obedience. These two individual modes are per se sufficient; for they are put by the Council under the disjunction of an exclusive ‘or’. A minor cleric, therefore, who has a clerical benefice, enjoys by that very fact the privilege of forum, even if he does not hold to the other conditions required of clerics in minor orders who are without benefices, because the Council in that member of the disjunction requires only a benefice along with minor orders, because by force of the benefice he is judged to be actually dedicated to ecclesiastical ministry and is obliged to have a mind to continue in the clerical state, or at any rate a mind not to have the opposite, otherwise he can neither retain the benefice nor make the fruits of it his own.

7. You will say that therefore a cleric, although he not go about in the clerical habit or bear the tonsure and live in other respects as a layman, will enjoy the clerical privilege, which seems absurd, since he would be sinning gravely and would be giving sufficient appearance of having abandoned the clerical state. I concede and reply that he does not, by that very fact, lose the privilege, because he is not deprived of it by any right; nor does the Council require of such a cleric a further condition as being simply necessary for enjoying the privilege. However, such a cleric could be admonished and, if he is incorrigible, could be deprived of the privilege, according to ch. ‘In Audientia’ and ch. ‘Contingit’ 2 De Sentent. Excommunic. For the same thing happens in the case of clerics in sacred orders, as we will state below and as is noted by the Gloss on ch. ‘Tuae’ De Apostatis and by Innocent on ch.1 at the same title.

8. It may, however, be asked whether it is enough to have, along with such order, a regular income. I reply that, if such regular income is what could be had by a layman, it is clearly not sufficient, because such regular income neither is a mark of the clerical state nor binds one to a clerical state and function, nor is it in any way equivalent to an ecclesiastical benefice. But if the regular income is clerical, it may seem to be sufficient on account of the contrary reasons; for it is equivalent to an ecclesiastical benefice and so is wont to be included under that term, especially in matters of favorable advantage. We also have to hand an example in the same decree of the Council of Trent; for at the beginning it laid down that no one may obtain a benefice before the fourteenth year; but the congregation of cardinals there judged that under benefice regular income is included; therefore, by the same or greater reason, when it says later that a minor cleric, if he has a benefice, enjoys the privilege, the name of benefice should be extended to regular income as well.

Nevertheless I find another response of the same congregation wherein the opposite seems to be declared in these words: "He for whom a regular income has been reserved, if he does not go about in the habit and tonsure, does not enjoy the privilege of forum." And a reason is given, that the Council of Trent corrects common right and excepts three cases by the word 'unless'. For this decision cannot subsist unless we suppose that regular income falls there under the name of 'benefice'. For although it is true that the Council corrects common right in that it does not require the triple warning demanded by the last chapter De Vita et Honestat. Clericorum and by chapter 'Contingit' De Sentent. Excommunic., nevertheless, in the first member of the exceptions that it makes, it only requires a benefice along with some ordination; therefore, if regular income falls under the name of benefice, he who has it when it is reserved to someone as a cleric will enjoy the privilege even if he does not wear the habit and tonsure. Or, contrariwise, if he does not enjoy the privilege (as the response of the cardinals has it), the regular income alone does not suffice without other requisite things, and therefore it is not included under benefice.

9. Thus by holding this opinion one can reply that here the name of benefice is restricted, because this works in favor of religion so as to prevent him, to whom as to a cleric a regular income is reserved, from readily abandoning the habit and tonsure if he can enjoy the privilege without them. However, to confess the truth, this does not satisfy me, and therefore this latter decision appears difficult; nor do I sufficiently understand the reason for it, and so I doubt whether it has been faithfully described, and for that reason I leave judgment on this point to others. Finally I note about this prior member that, although the Council requires for a benefice the age of fourteen years, for enjoying the privilege it is not necessary, because in no member is it required by the Council. Only in the case of the first does it seem as a result to be required, or rather supposed, by reason of the benefice. If, however, it happens by dispensation that a cleric younger than fourteen years has a benefice, he will enjoy clerical privilege because he does in fact have the conditions required by the Council, and it matters not that he could have them by common right or by dispensation, because on this point the Council makes no distinction.

10. About the other member it is necessary only to note that in a minor cleric who does not have a benefice the Council demands the three conditions jointly. Therefore too, when any of them is lacking, such a cleric will by that very fact and without any preceding declaration or warning, not enjoy the privilege, as also the congregation of the cardinals expressly declared, citing Innocent on ch.1 De Apostatis and Geminianus on ch. 'Si Iudex' De Sentent. Excommunic. on 6. And the reason is that it is not a penal law but a law constitutive of the necessary form for such privilege, and therefore, when the form is lacking, the privilege is lost by that very fact. Besides, the aforesaid Council makes clear that the habit should be appropriate and extend down to the ankles. And, for the same reason, it will be necessary that the tonsure be in accord with the common custom of the country. Other things about these two conditions can be looked at in Covarrubias in Pract. ch.31 n.7 and in Julius Clarus bk.5 last § q.36 n.17, and, among the laws of Spain, law 1 title 4 book 1 of the Nova Recopilatio, where a certain declaration of Pius IV for these kingdoms is reported. Therefore whichever of these two conditions is lacking, the privilege will, according to the usual custom, be lost; but, for clerics to be judged lacking in them, it is not enough that they lack them once or twice but that they be going about without them by habit, as it were, and permanently, as the same congregation thought in the argument of ch. ‘In Audientia’ De Sentent. Excommunic. In a doubtful case, however, an ecclesiastical judge makes discernment whether a cleric has sufficiently abandoned the habit or tonsure, according to ch. ‘Si Iudex’ De Sentent. Excomm. on 6. See Covarrubias in Practic. ch.33 at the beginning, Julius Clarus last § q.36 n.21, Salzedus in Practic. ch.62 nn.14 & 19.

Also these two conditions of habit and tonsure seemed sufficient by common right even after threefold admonition; the Council, however, added a third, namely that such a cleric be by the mandate of the bishop in the service of or attached to some church, which is sufficiently per se clear and is without doubt necessary, not however absolutely but in case it is not supplied by another condition approved by the same Council. For the Council places the two members under disjunction, namely: “or is busy in a seminary of clerics, or in a school or university of Episcopal license,” about which one can doubt whether each one of them contains individual conditions per se sufficient for this privilege, or whether they are only as it were parts of the third condition placed in the second principal member and need only to be put together with it under disjunction. But without doubt this latter is the sense of the Council. Otherwise there would have to be four members established for that principal decision, and a cleric existing in minor orders in a house of studies of Episcopal license would enjoy the privilege even if he did not wear the clerical habit and tonsure and lacked a benefice; the consequent is against reason and against custom, which is the best interpreter of laws. Those principal members, then, are not four but two; but because in the second member there are put there conditions, the third of them is put disjunctively under the triple less principle member. Therefore in all clerics of minor orders there is required in the first place the habit and tonsure but, in place of the third condition about ministry in the Church, being in a seminary or in a house of studies of Episcopal license is sufficient.

11. Further, however, there can about this part be a question whether a minor cleric wearing the habit and tonsure, not in possession of a benefice or serving a church or otherwise observing this third condition, is immune from taxes, allowing that he does not enjoy the privilege of forum. For some affirm that the conditions set down by the Council are not necessary for enjoying immunity from taxes, because the Council only required them for the privilege of forum; but the two privileges are diverse and so it is not licit either to argue from one privilege to the other or to extend it against the other, since rather favors are to be made greater. Yet I judge the contrary opinion to be true. And, to begin with, it is certain that by custom it is accepted that those clerics who do not have a benefice, nor serve a church, nor wear the habit or tonsure are not excused from taxes, as is testified by Covarrubias in Practic. ch.31 at the end; which custom, if it were against ecclesiastical immunity, could not so prevail that the exaction of tax would be just, as will be said below; but this cannot be said of this custom, for there is no one who condemns this custom.

Next, it was shown above that no one can be subject to taxes unless he is subject to jurisdiction and forum, because the imposition of taxes is a certain act of jurisdiction; therefore, conversely, there is no reason that he who is not exempt from the jurisdiction of princes should be reckoned exempt from their taxes, unless the princes wish to exempt him; therefore minor clerics who, from defect of the said conditions, do not enjoy the privilege of forum, do not, as a result, enjoy immunity from taxes. And therefore I said above that the privilege of forum, as it is distinguished from the privilege of the canon, also includes all immunity from laws of taxation; it is also taken from ch. ‘Quanquam’ De Censibus on 6 along with similar ones. The Council therefore, when speaking absolutely about the privilege of forum, must be taken in this sense. There is a confirmation too: for if those clerics do not enjoy the privilege of forum, they are therefore subject to the civil laws not only as to directive but also as to coercive force; therefore they are subject also to laws of taxation, for the reason is the same. There is as well a considerable congruity, because if, for example, by the first tonsure alone, without any other profession of clerical state, men might become immune from taxes, many would have themselves tonsured merely so as to be exempt from taxes without any intention for the ecclesiastical state.

12. A greater difficulty for me, indeed, is in a certain law of Spain bk.1 of Nova Recopilatio title 4 law 2, which declares that clerics not in possession of an ecclesiastical benefice, although they may be observing the rest of what is required by the Council for enjoying clerical privilege, only enjoy the privilege as to criminal causes, but not as to taxes, contributions, and all the rest. For that law could not limit a decree of the Council; but the Council speaks absolutely that these clerics enjoy the privilege of forum, which is not of itself limited to criminal causes but embraces all that we have explained above. That law seems to suppose, therefore, that those minor clerics who lack a benefice enjoy, by force of common right, no exemption from taxes and civil causes. But if things were so, it might rightly be said that they do not enjoy it even by force of the Council, because the Council of Trent did not add a privilege to these clerics beyond common right, but only refrained from taking away what they had before. But in truth the supposition is not really founded on right, because nowhere is such a distinction made; nay the said ch. ‘Quanquam’ speaks absolutely and generally, and the other rights that were cited above about courts and the competent forum speak similarly. But perhaps the supposition is that in Spain this common right has, in this respect, been abrogated, as Covarrubias above indicates. But so as to admit this, it must be clear that such a custom and abrogation were approved by the Pontiff, otherwise I do not judge that that law can in conscience be observed with these clerics, who enjoy, according to the Council, the privilege of forum.

13. Finally it can be doubted about these clerics whether those who once lack the privilege from defect of the said conditions may begin to enjoy it whenever they start to keep the Council’s form; for there were not lacking those who denied this, because a privilege once taken away by a superior is not recovered by one’s own authority, but it must be again be conceded by the superior; but in fact the Council takes away the privilege and does not restore it; therefore it is not recovered by the mere will of the cleric when he returns to the clerical state. But others have added that this most of all has place when the cleric has been punished by a judge and deprived of the privilege, because he was going about without the clerical habit, for it is then that the reason given seems properly to have place. Or also because it is then that someone seems most to renounce the privilege and that the renunciation is at the same time accepted; but after someone renounces the privilege, he cannot by his own will return to it. And on behalf of this opinion Innocent on ch.1 De Apostatis is cited.

14. Nevertheless I judge the contrary to be certain, for whenever a cleric begins to wear the habit and tonsure and to serve in a church in one of the ways prescribed by the Council, he will begin to enjoy the privilege, even if before, because of some defect, he was not enjoying it. Thus did Abbas teach on a like point on ch. 'Ioannes' De Clericis Coniugatis n.4. Angelus, at the word 'Excommunicatio' 5 n.23, follows him and refers to Joannes Monachus, Archidiaconus, and Joannes de Lignano on this opinion. The same is found in Sylvester Excommunicat. 6 n.4, and in Antoninus part 3 title 24 ch.2; and the same is taken openly from a certain response of the congregation of cardinals. For when it was asked whether a cleric who possessed an ecclesiastical benefice which, with a mind to take a wife, he renounced along with the clerical state, but who afterwards, changing his wish, assumed the clerical habit and obtained another benefice – whether he would recover the clerical privilege, the congregation replied in the affirmative, because a cleric cannot renounce the privilege, according to ch. 'Si Diligenti' De Foro Compet. And the response is consonant with right, as is taken from a like case in the sole ch. De Cleric. Coniugat. On 6, and from those that Panormitanus and others note on ch. 'Clericus' 2 De Vit. et Honest. Clericor. But this decision has the same reason in the present case. For the Council of Trent put the two conditions under a disjunction, as we saw; but in the former case, although a cleric, giving up a benefice with a mind too of renouncing the clerical state, ceases to enjoy the privilege, if he again obtains a benefice he starts to enjoy the privilege; therefore in the latter case too, although a cleric without a benefice, if he gives up the habit, does not for that time enjoy the privilege, when afterwards he returns to the form of clerical state prescribed by the Council, he will enjoy it. The consequence is proved by parity of reasoning, and because from the former case the foundation of the contrary opinion is shown to be of no moment.

Hence I argue in this way, that such a cleric would not recover the privilege, either because he was altogether and radically (so to explain the thing) deprived of it, or because he voluntarily renounced it; but neither is true nor probable. The first is clear, because neither the Council nor other canonical decree puts such privation into effect. For the Council only says: "He will also not enjoy the privilege of forum unless etc." And under these words it puts each member; but those words do not contain perpetual privation but only the condition requisite for enjoying the privilege. Now this is the force and nature of a conditional, that it is disposed to either side if it is true, namely that when the condition is not in place the effect does not follow, and when it is in place the effect does follow, even if before, because of lack of the condition, it was not in place; for this is of no importance, because that the condition is more slowly or more quickly fulfilled is irrelevant. Especially because the delay is not per se sinful, nor is a cleric for that time deprived of the privilege as a punishment but by defect of form or status, wherein he is conducting himself as a layman, and so, just as a layman begins to enjoy it if he is ordained etc., so too does that cleric if he resume the habit and the other things requisite.

The other member about renunciation has already been proved. For as a rule it is not necessary for such a cleric to have the intention of renouncing but at most of not enjoying for that period of time. And next, although he may wish, he cannot renounce the privilege except by also renouncing the clerical state or the benefice etc. But by continuing in the due state, or by resuming it, he cannot not enjoy the privilege, even if he wish, because he cannot renounce a privilege introduced in favor of the clerical state. Hence it is irrelevant that such a cleric has by sentence been deprived of the exemption, both because the sentence does not introduce a new effect but declares the effect of the right, and also because, although it impose the privation by way of punishment, it is not absolute nor perpetual but has a condition or a limit included, namely “until he assume the habit etc.,” or “as long as he has not assumed it.” Hence it is a sort of suspension which, having been passed under those limits, ceases when the limit comes or when the condition ceases, as we have said elsewhere, and as is very well proved as to the present matter by the Clementina 1 De Vita et Honest. Clericor. at the place: “Quamdiu praemissis institerint,” where the Gloss notes the fact and confirms it with other rights.

15. And from these things can easily be made clear why we added at the end of the conclusion that it must be understood per se; because sometimes on account of crimes even clerics in sacred orders are deprived of the privilege of forum, and for no other cause are they wont to be deprived of it, nor perhaps can they be. Because they have it either by divine right or by ecclesiastical right so founded on divine right that it comes next to it; therefore, unless clerics themselves become unworthy of such privilege, they cannot be deprived of it. But they do not become unworthy of it except through crimes; therefore they cannot be deprived of it except as punishment for crimes, as long, that is, as they retain the clerical state. Which point I add because of clerics in minor orders; for those who are in sacred orders are by force of the character alone reckoned to be always in the clerical state, as long as they are not degraded by the Church, which does not happen except in punishment for some crimes. But in the case of minor clerics the character is not enough without other conditions required by the Church for that state, and therefore by defect of such conditions they lack the privilege without guilt or punishment; but while the conditions are in place, they are never deprived of it except as a punishment.

There is also a confirmation of this, that this privilege is not in favor of the person but of the whole clerical state; therefore no cleric can be deprived of it unless he becomes unworthy of it, because it would redound to the great disadvantage or detriment of the whole clerical state. But that it is taken away because of crimes redounds to the common good of the whole clerical state, and therefore it can be done in this way but not otherwise. And for the same cause, as I touched on above, even if this privilege were given to clerics immediately by Christ himself, they could be deprived of it as a punishment, just as men are deprived of liberty or life as a punishment, even if they have it by gift of the author of nature, because it is understood to have been given as it were under this condition or in subordination to the common good of the republic and of the power that bears the care of it; thus must it be understood proportionally of this privilege, namely that it has been given with subordination to the ecclesiastical power, which point has much more place if perhaps the privilege was given immediately by it.

16. But at once there arose the need to ask in what ways this privation of privilege may happen as a punishment. But this pertains more to the Tractate about ecclesiastical censures, where we touched on it in disp.30 sect.2. But, in brief, the resolution is that as a rule a cleric is not deprived of this privilege except by a real degradation according to ch.

'Novimus' De Verborum Significat. and ch.2 De Poenis on 6; and it is taught by the canonists on ch. 'At si Clerici' § De Adulteriis, De Iudiciis, and by others whom Covarrubias refers to and follows in Practic. ch.32, and Joannes Lupus tractate De Libert. Ecclesiast. part 2 ch.5 n.5. But sometimes this privation can happen merely by a sentence given by an ecclesiastical judge, even if a real degradation has not subsequently followed, which however never happens except on the supposition of incorrigibility in enormous offenses and when the form is kept that is prescribed in ch. 'Cum non ab Homine' De Iudiciis, on which can be seen the doctors there, especially Panormitanus n.24, Decius n.8, Felinus n.9, and Covarrubias above n.2. And the sufficient reason is that in the infliction of punishments, just as the power given by the right is enough, so must the form of concession be kept, nay and even tightened, because the matter is hateful. In a third way finally can this punishment be imposed immediately by canon law itself. But to understand when and how such punishment is imposed by the canon, the propriety of words must in the first place be strictly observed according to the general principles of penal law.

17. Next one must in this matter specially note that the privileges of the canon and of the forum of clerics are in canon right distinct, as Panormitanus noted ch.1 De Apostatis; and therefore one must carefully consider about what privilege it is speaking so that one not extend it from one privilege to the other. Hence, although in ch. 'Perpendimus', ch. 'In Audientia', ch. 'Ut Famae', ch. 'Contingit' 2 De Sentent. Excommunicat. clerics thrice warned and yet obdurate all the same in certain crimes are deprived by that very fact of the privilege of the canon, nevertheless those rights are not to be extended to the privilege of forum, as I noted in disputat.12 De Censur. sect.1; both because punishments are to be restricted, and also because, as is rightly said by Angelus at the word 'Excommunicatio' 5 n.23 and by Sylvester 'Excommunicatio' 6 n.4, the privilege of forum is with more difficulty taken away than that of the canon. For the privilege of the canon is purely human; for it only consists in a particular way of guarding and defending the inviolability of ecclesiastical persons by passing a very grave censure against those who strike them; and therefore the same canon right, by which the censure is passed, correctly wishes it not to have place in the aforesaid cases, where it judges that clerics living as laymen and pertinacious therein after so many warnings are made unworthy of such defense, although they are not at once deprived, or deserve to be deprived, of every other greater privilege and privilege flowing from divine right.

Hence, if one rightly considers the canons that speak about this privilege, there are few that in such wise impose this punishment by the fact itself without further sentence by an ecclesiastical judge that the person of the cleric stays by that fact subject to the secular power. For, as to clerics in sacred orders, there is scarcely found a definite right besides ch.1 De Homicid. on 6, about which there was discussion in the above cited place De Censuris, and one can look at Sylvester at the word 'Assasyni' qq.3 & 4, Iulius Clarus bk.5 last § n.30, and Covarrubias bk.2 Variar. ch.20 n.10. But other rights, which in certain cases deprive clerics by the fact itself of this privilege under certain conditions in ch. 'Ex Parte' 3 De Privileg. and in the sole chapter De Vita et Honest. Clericor on 6, and Clementina 1 at the same title – these rights (I say) and similar ones are wont to be expounded about minor clerics; but to examine this now and to treat of it directly is not our set purpose, nor is there leisure for it, but one can see the glosses and the doctors there and on ch.1 De Apostatis, and Panormitanus on ch. 'Perpendimus' De Sentent.

Excommunic., and Joannes Lupus in the said tractate De Libert. Ecclesiast. part 2 q.5.

Chapter 28. Whether married clerics enjoy the privilege of ecclesiastical exemption. Summary. 1. Four conditions are required for the exemption of married clerics. 2. Married clerics never completely enjoy clerical privilege. 3. What privilege a cleric enjoys who after sacred orders takes a wife. 4. What habit these married clerics should wear to enjoy exemption. 5. Whether clerics enjoy this privilege if they go about with weapons. 6. Bigamous clerics do not enjoy the privilege of exemption. Whether a cleric contracting with a virgin who has already been corrupted by him enjoys this exemption. Whether a cleric who has contracted with two women and has consummated with one of them enjoys exemption. 7. By what sort of bigamy a married cleric is deprived of exemption. 8. A married cleric at leisure in advanced studies at a University does not stay exempt. 9. Whether someone engaged in business enjoys this privilege. 10. Which sort of married clerics are altogether deprived of exemption.

1. This question can be dealt with either about the ancient or about the new right. The former sense is of very little use and so we pass over it. However, it is very likely that, before the Church established a distinction on this point between married clerics and the rest, the privilege conceded to clerics pertained to married clerics no less than to the rest, because we cannot exclude those whom the law does not exclude, and because a privilege of a prince is to be interpreted liberally. Rather in the laws of the emperors there are some contained in which this privilege was at least in part extended to wives and sons of clerics, as one can see in the title De Episcop. et Cleric. in the Codes of Justinian and Theodosius. Therefore, with the ancient period left behind, the question is treated according to the new right of the sole chapter De Cleric. Coniugat. on 6, which is confirmed and in some way restricted by the Council of Trent session 23 ch.6 De Reformat. But Boniface laid down in the said chapter that married clergy can enjoy, beside the privilege of the canon, only the privilege of forum as to criminal causes, whether these are dealt with criminally or civilly. But in order to enjoy this immunity he requires three conditions. First that they wear the tonsure, second that they go about in the clerical habit, third that they be contracted with one woman and she a virgin; but the Council of Trent added a fourth when it says: "Provided these clerics, having been assigned by a bishop to the service or ministry of some church, are serving and ministering in the same church."

2. From which right we collect on this point three propositions and, as it were, general rules. The first is that no married cleric enjoys the complete clerical privilege. The proof is that, even if they fulfill all the said conditions, they are not exempt from the secular court in merely civil causes, and consequently neither from the obligation of the civil laws, at least as to directive force, nor from taxes, or from other duties or public burdens, unless they are expressly and specifically exempted by the civil laws. The proof is that in the said chapter, after exemption in criminal matters has been conceded, the addition is made: "But as to the rest we do not wish that they enjoy the clerical privilege;" where it plainly excludes everything and the lone exception confirms the rule to the contrary. This rule is also commonly accepted by Joannes Andreas and other expositors on the said sole chapter, by Panormitanus and others on ch. 'Ioannes' De Clericis Coniugatis and on ch.2 De Foro Compet. and others who are referred to and followed by Covarruvias in Practicar. ch.31 n.7, by Gutierrez De Iuram. Confirmatorio p.1 ch.17 n.12, by Sylvester at the word 'Clericus' 1 q.6. But there have not been lacking some who taught the opposite, as the said authors report; but the matter is not deserving of dispute when the right is so clear and evident. Nor are their reasons of any moment, as can be seen in the said authors. Wherefore, law 2 title 4 bk.1 of Nova Recopilatio touched on above would be proceeding very well in accord with this decree if it were speaking only of married clerics.

3. I note only about this right that, by the restriction of the Pontiff, the discussion therein is only about clerics established in minor orders, for clerics in sacred orders cannot take wives. But in two ways can it happen that a cleric in major orders is married. First because, although he before had a wife, he was ordained in a legitimate way and separated from his wife. And in that case he is not reckoned by the Church as married but as a continent widower, because in a certain civil way and as to the use and society of marriage his wife is as it were dead; and so he can accordingly enjoy clerical privilege like other clerics in sacred orders, and perhaps for this reason no special mention or distinction in right is made about clerics of this sort. In another way a cleric established in major orders can take a wife through dispensation from the Pontiff, and in that case he is altogether removed and as it were deposed from the clerical state, and so he is reckoned as a layman and cannot enjoy clerical privilege, except perhaps as to the criminal forum when the conditions required of other married clerics concur, because we find nothing else laid down in right about him, unless it be by special dispensation conceded to him.

4. The second proposition or rule is that a married cleric, by observing the clerical state in the way required by the right, enjoys at least exemption from the secular court in criminal causes. Thus is it established and made clear in the said decrees, and that they could make herein this disposition is sufficiently clear from the above. Hence there only remain to be explained the conditions requisite for the aforesaid state. The first was the tonsure, about which nothing occurs to be added, because it ought to be worn by these clerics in the same way as by unmarried minors. The second was the clerical habit, about which the doctors note that there is no need that in the case of this condition equality or equivalence in every respect be observed among these married clerics as with the unmarried ones, because although there is required in both of them a habit more honorable in quality, figure, color, and length than in laymen, nevertheless in the case of these circumstances, particularly figure, length, and material of clothing, something else can be permitted in married clergy than in unmarried. It will be sufficient, then, that the habit be honorable and adapted enough, according to common custom, to discriminate cleric from layman. But it can thereby be understood that it is not enough for a cleric of this sort to wear clerical habit at those hours and times when he is actually serving in a church, but it is necessary that in his common mode of life he go about in clerical habit, because in this point he is equivalent to an unmarried cleric.

5. Hence too Julius Clarus infers in the said last § q.36 n.12 that it is necessary for a cleric of this sort not to carry arms, which he says, along with Bertrand cons.13 n.5, is the common opinion, because arms are forbidden to clerics. But some think that this prohibition is not extended to married clerics, whose state is not dishonored by arms. And therefore Azor vol.1 bk.3 last chapter last question thinks that carrying arms is not repugnant to this privilege if otherwise the clerical habit is retained. Yet, nevertheless, it is safer not to carry them in a way which is particularly in custom among laymen, so that they cannot be seen from the outside, because they do not well agree with the clerical habit. But in the case of these circumstances the custom is of most weight that is not disapproved by the prelates, as is noted generally by Covarruvias in Practicar. ch.31 n.7.

6. The third condition was that they be contracted with only one woman and she a virgin, for the Church has not wished to concede even this part of its privilege to a bigamist. But suppose a cleric contracts with her whom before marriage he had known a virgin and corrupted, for he does not then in fact contract with a virgin; so he does not enjoy this exemption. But I say nevertheless that he does enjoy it, because, as I said, the decree only intends to exclude bigamists; and by that marriage bigamy is not contracted, as I said in the matter of irregularity. The reason indeed is that his use of it is, as it were, drawn backwards in favor of marriage by a fiction of right. Hence, just as by a subsequent marriage a child conceived beforehand is rendered legitimate, so the preceding use is, as it were, reputed matrimonial, and consequently the marriage is reckoned to have been contracted with a virgin. Next one can ask what is to be said if a cleric has contracted with two virgins but has not consummated with both, because one of them either died or professed religion first. I reply that there is no obstacle, because such a cleric enjoys this immunity, because by that double marriage he did not contract bigamy, as I said in the cited place. Hence, when it is said in the said decree: "Clerics who have contracted with one woman and she a virgin," it must be understood of a marriage fully contracted and consummated; for before then it does not have its perfect meaning, and the law in this respect must be restricted to an act altogether complete. Such too is the opinion on each of these points of the Gloss there more commonly approved, although some have said the contrary.

7. Next there can be asked about this condition whether it is only through bigamy contracted by a doubly consummated marriage, or through marriage with a widow that a cleric becomes incapable of this privilege. And the reason for doubt is that the reason in the case of all bigamies is the same, and so it seems the law should be extended for identity of reason, although the words do not entirely agree, because, that is, the bigamy is contracted otherwise than is explained by the words of the text. Nevertheless I judge that one should stand by the words of the law, and therefore only a cleric who is a bigamist in one of those two ways is unsuitable for this privilege. So too he who has contracted with one woman and she a virgin who has later committed adultery and yet the husband has thereafter had knowledge of her, although he becomes as regard other effects and by interpretation a bigamist, nevertheless he does not lose the privilege because he has kept the condition required by right; for he has contracted with one woman and she a virgin, and the right demands nothing more as regard this condition. Nor is the extension by identity of reason to be admitted, both because we are concerned with a matter, such as is diminution and limitation of ecclesiastical immunity, that is odious and strictly drawn, and in this sort of matter such an extension is to be admitted rarely and with difficulty, unless the force of reason is so great that the contrary appears unjust and irrational; which cannot here be said. And also because neither is there here found identity of reason, for a much greater defect and impropriety is found in bigamy proper than in bigamy in a transferred sense. And finally because the Pontiff himself, in not speaking generally of bigamy but explaining its types and modes, gave sufficient indication that he wished only to exclude the types in question. Thus too did Julius Clarus think, in the said question 36 nn.9 & 10, referring to Aufrerius who says that so do all commonly think, and that so was it decided as a matter of fact.

8. The fourth condition added by the Council was made clear more or less above in the case of unmarried clerics; I only note two things. One is that the Council here definitely requires that such a cleric be assigned by the bishop to the ministry of a church, and it does not add the other two members that it set down in the case of unmarried clergy. And rightly of course; for one of them, namely to be educated in a seminary of clerics, cannot morally have place in the case of a married cleric, as is per se clear. But the other member about study in some university of studies of Episcopal license, although it could in some way be observed by a married cleric, yet not in the way required by the Council; for it adds “is busy...as it were on the way to receiving major orders;” this way cannot be considered in a married cleric, since by marriage he has been made unfitted for major orders. Therefore ministry of a church is precisely and definitely necessary. Wherein I note second that the Council not only said that he must be assigned to the service or ministry of a church but added “that he minister or serve in it,” by which words it clearly wished to signify that it is not enough that he have a title or office if he serves only through someone else, but it is necessary that he minister directly of himself. But about the mode of ministry the Council determines nothing in particular; and therefore anything at all will suffice, whether it is spiritual in some way, as is ministering at mass or in choir, or whether it is temporal, as is guarding or cleaning the things of the church and suchlike that pertain to the office of a sacristan or treasurer.

9. To these conditions some add a fifth, namely that a married cleric not be involved in business or trade. Julius Clarus posits this in the same q.36 n.12, and he refers to Alexander de Nevo cons.60 who says that so the doctors commonly think, along with Innocent on the last chapter De Vita et Honest. Cleric., on which text this opinion could be founded; also because business is prohibited to clerics. But this opinion is not to be approved. First because when in the said last chapter the form is set up, as it were, that one is to be kept for being able to enjoy this privilege, nothing beyond it can be required except it be added by some right, hence nothing else was required before the Council of Trent, but after it the fourth condition is required because the Council added it, but the fifth condition is added by no right; therefore it is not necessary. And thus does Covarruvias expressly hold in the said ch.31 n.8 citing Francus, Alexander, and Immola, and the same is held by the summarists Sylvester ‘Clericus’ 3 q.3 and Tabien at the same place q.1, Angelus ‘Clericus’ 9 n.3, and other moderns.

Nor is anything other collected from the last chapter De Vita et Honest. Cleric. For beside the fact that there the discussion is about unmarried clerics, as is clear from the whole context, there is only said there that clerics engaged in business are not immune from the taxes to which the goods of businessmen are wont to be subject. This decision was not necessary for married clerics because, as we have already said, they enjoy no immunity from taxes. Nor too is it true that all business is prohibited to these married clerics; for the contrary is supposed in ch. ‘Joannes’ De Clerics Coniugatis. In addition other clerics too, to whom business is prohibited, although they sin by engaging in it and do not enjoy immunity as to those goods, they do not at once lose the whole clerical privilege as to crime and all the rest until by an ecclesiastical court, if they become incorrigible, they are deprived. And in like way I would believe that although a married cleric, serving a church and carrying the insignia of a cleric, could engage in moderate and honorable business for supporting the burdens of marriage while enjoying his immunity in criminal matters, yet he cannot engage in business of such kind and so great that it does not fit the clerical habit and ministry, and he can be compelled by the prelate either to abstain from such business or to put off the insignia of a cleric, by the argument in the said ch. 'Joannes'. And so it will happen that he is deprived of the privilege whether as punishment imposed by man or by defect of other conditions, but not because a new condition is per se necessary.

10. The third and last rule that is collected from what has been said is that there are many married clerics who do not wholly enjoy the privilege of forum. The proof is that all those who lack one of the said conditions can, by the said rights and in the opinion of all, be hauled into the secular courts, even in criminal matters. Nor is sentence or clarification by man required, because, by defect of condition and form, the privation at once follows, as is clear a fortiori from what has been said about unmarried clerics; hence the rest that is there said can be applied here. There is only to be observed the difference between the condition of a single marriage with a virgin and the other conditions, for if that is once lacking the defect is perpetual; and thus it renders the person simply unfitted for such privilege, but in the other conditions there can be changes; and therefore although by defect of them the privilege is lost, they can again be assumed and the privilege can return provided that foundation of one marriage with a virgin is not lacking, because then the things proceed that have been said about the rest of the clerics, as is per se manifest.

Chapter 29. Whether other ecclesiastical persons who do not have orders enjoy completely the exemption of forum.

Summary. 1. Doubt. 2. Assertion: ecclesiastical persons without orders enjoy the privilege of exemption. The assertion is proved and the doubt solved. 3. The same assertion is proved from civil right. 4. Proof again by reason. 5. Which non-ordained persons are to be reckoned ecclesiastical. Profession with simple vows suffices for enjoying this privilege. Novices too among religious enjoy the same exemption. 6. Other ecclesiastical states that without a vow introduce this exemption. 7. Those who enjoy the privilege of the canon also enjoy the privilege of forum. 8. A professed religious wearing lay dress retains the exemption. He who abandons religion before profession loses the privilege. 9. Whether the servants of churches or of clerics enjoy this privilege. 10. Resolution to the negative. Question about members of a bishop's family.

1. A possible reason for doubt is that the canon rights which speak about the privilege of forum attribute it to clerics alone; but only those are said to be clerics who have received some ordination or at least the first tonsure. Not even monks are wont to be comprehended by the name of clerics, but are instead wont to be distinguished alongside them, as is taken from Jerome's epistles 2 & 3. There can be confirmation too from ch. 'Si Quis Suadente' 17 q.4, where the privilege of the canon is set up and, because the Pontiff wanted to concede it not only to clerics but also to monks, it distinctly said: "On a cleric or a monk;" therefore, contrariwise, the privilege of forum is conceded only to ordained clerics since about them alone do the canons speak. But if someone replies that thence rather is the contrary argument taken, because the received principle is that all those enjoy the privilege of forum who enjoy the privilege of the canon, from the common opinion of the doctors on ch.2 De Foro Competent., and from Sylvester at the word 'Ecclesia' 1 n.6; yet this is not enough, because, as we said above, the privilege of forum is greater than the privilege of the canon; therefore the argument from a lesser to a greater privilege is not valid as regard concession, just as we also said above that, as regard taking it away, the argument that if the privilege of the canon is taken away the privilege of forum is also taken away is not valid.

2. Nevertheless it must without any doubt be said that ecclesiastical persons enjoy this privilege completely even if many of them do not have orders, as are monks before they are ordained, and nuns who are incapable of orders. The assertion is received by all doctors and is first proved from canon right by destruction at the same time of the reason for doubt, which proceeds from a false principle. For although some rights speak about this immunity under the name of clerics, as ch. 'Non Minus' and ch. 'Adversus' De Immunit. Eccles., nevertheless others speak of it under the name of ecclesiastical persons, which is more general and in strictness includes monks. Thus is it clear from ch. 'Quaquam' De Censibus on 6, and from ch. 'Clericis' De Immun. Eccles. on 6, where is also distinctly added "for ecclesiastical persons, whether regular or secular." And in the more ancient decrees in ch. 'Experientiae' 11 q.1 it is made clear that this privilege of forum agrees with "every person of ecclesiastical office," which term also properly agrees with monks. Next in ch. 'De Persona' 11 q.1 again Gregory speaks expressly of bishops, clerics, and monks, alleging an Authentica of Justinian which in this respect he approves and receives. Add that St. Jerome, as cited in ch. 'Duo Sunt' 12 q.1, when distinguishing two kinds of Christians, includes under the first all persons given over to divine office, contemplation, and prayer, and he first numbers among them clerics and monks, whom he calls devoted and converted to God; but afterwards he attributes the name of clerics to all of them, because all are chosen by lot and specially called. In this way, then, must the name of clerics be taken in this privilege, even when the explanation happens to be given by that term alone.

3. Second, the assertion can be proved also from the civil laws. For, in the first place, in law 36 De Episcopis et Clericis in the Theodosian Code, when exemption from taxes is bestowed on clerics, there is added: "Who are protected by their clerical rank and, what is not less, by their more holy life." In addition, the Emperor Justinian in his Authentica 'De Sanctissimis Episcopis, etc.' collat.9 novel.123 ch.2 'Si quis contra' 21, when conceding the privilege of forum, expressly enumerates clerics and monks and also women dedicated to God, as is noted by Gregory bk.11 epist.54. Next Frederick in his constitution speaks simply of ecclesiastical persons, of churches, of pious places. Hence there is no doubt but that, besides clerics, he also includes monks, and thus, after he had said: "We establish that no one is to presume to bring a clerical person before a secular court in a criminal or civil question," he later subjoins: "We establish that if anyone has presumed to deny justice to clerics or ecclesiastical persons, etc." Where I weigh the disjunction so that, lest perhaps by saying only 'if anyone...to clerics' he generate ambiguity about the restriction of the word, he also added the phrase 'or ecclesiastical persons', thereupon making clear that the privilege given to ecclesiastical persons is not granted only to clerics properly speaking, but to all those specifically committed to divine service, who are signified by the name of ecclesiastical persons.

4. Also from the same rights and words it is clear that this whole privilege is in its totality conceded to non-ordained ecclesiastical persons as much as to unmarried clerics or to those persisting in the clerical state in its totality. The proof is that Frederick conceded this exemption to all of them under this same general name and with the same tenor of words. And it is in the same way confirmed and approved by Pope Honorius at the end of the same constitution. Ancient decrees too make no distinction in this respect between the two kinds of ecclesiastical persons, and about them they assert simply that they enjoy ecclesiastical immunity. Next, each is in agreement with reason and thereupon with divine right, from which this privilege flows. For the privilege is for this reason conceded to ordained clerics, that they are in a special way devoted to divine service, and therefore they belong specifically to the family of Christ and should be removed from secular cares and worries; but this reason militates no less in favor of monks and the like persons, even if they have not been made sacred by a proper ordination, because this particular mode of consecration is not why the privilege is to be exacted when the principal and as it were proximate reason and foundation for the privilege is acquired in another way. This foundation, as I said, is a particular dedication to divine service, as is noted by Innocent on ch.2 De Maiorit. et Obedientia. Also, just as among clerics themselves those who have received only the first tonsure are not in fact ordained with the sacramental order instituted by Christ, and yet because, by the ceremony instituted by the Church, they are dedicated and consecrated in a particular way to the divine cult, that fact is on its part sufficient for the privilege of exemption; therefore, by the same or greater reason, religious profession or any other manner approved by the Church whereby a person is especially consecrated to the divine cult is sufficient for exemption; but all persons who are simply called ecclesiastical are by some similar manner or ecclesiastical rite dedicated and consecrated to God; therefore they too pertain in a special way to the family of Christ and should be partakers of the same exemption. And hence St. Thomas in Sentences bk.2 dist.44 q.2 a.2 ad 1 and St. Bonaventure on that place and Richard and others say that in the words of Christ, "then are the children free," are included not only ordained clerics but also all who are following the apostolic life, having left all for Christ.

5. But now there occurs to ask which non-ordained persons are reckoned to come or to be included under this class of ecclesiastical persons. On which point it is certain to begin with that all professed male and female religious are included under this division, whether they are signified by the name of monks or regulars or religious; and on this all the doctors agree, because it is manifest in right. Hence rightly did Panormitanus say, on ch.2 De Foro Compet., that two things above all exempt a person from secular power, ordination and profession. But now must be added that by profession is to be understood not only that which happens by solemn vows but also that which happens by simple vows approved and accepted by the Church for constituting the true and proper religious state; for just as such persons are true religious, so do they enjoy primarily as well as per se the same ecclesiastical immunity. But, next, the same privilege is extended by a certain participation and extension to novices in religion, because, just as in the order of clerics those who have been initiated with the first tonsure and are wearing the clerical habit and serve in a church begin to be reckoned among persons dedicated to God, so too a novice in religion, insofar as he begins to be on the way to the state of religion and bears the insignia of it and serves it, is reckoned among religious persons as to enjoyment of the privilege.

6. Beyond these, however, there are other states or modes of ecclesiastical living which, although they are not constituted by the three vows of perfection but by one or other of them or by some mode of tradition or of offering or of congregation approved by the Church, are judged sufficient for enjoying this privilege, whether by special concession or because general custom has thus interpreted the decrees that concede this privilege to ecclesiastical persons. And under this division are contained those who in certain religions are called “converted laity” according to ch. ‘Non Dubium’ De Sentent. Excommuic. Again some hermits and others who are enumerated at length by Sylvester at the word ‘Ecclesiae’ 1 q.5, throughout the whole, and by Panormitanus in the said chapter De Foro Compet., and by Archidiaconus in ch. ‘Duo Sunt’ 12 q.1.

7. But in order to set up a general rule I judge that rule true which we touched on when arguing at the beginning, namely that all persons who enjoy the privilege of the canon also enjoy the privilege of forum. Which rule is to be understood per se and by force of common right, for one can as a punishment be deprived of one privilege though not of the other, and by a special right one privilege can be bestowed on some persons without the other; but, speaking per se, all persons who are judged to have an ecclesiastical state sufficient for one privilege also have it as sufficient for the other, because, if a person is defended by the Church by the special privilege of the canon, the reason is that he is supposed sufficiently sacred and dedicated to God and is in short ecclesiastical; therefore as a result they enjoy the common right of immunity as regards forum. Nay rather, although the privilege of forum be judged more and more to be from divine right, nevertheless it belongs by priority and more intimately, so to say, to ecclesiastical persons, by the very fact they are sacred and dedicated to God, than the privilege of the canon does; for the former is as it were per se conjoined with such state and is very agreeable to it, but the latter is only as it were per accidens for coercing the audacity and malice of men, because, as I said, it only consists in a special censure passed against those who strike clerics. And therefore the privilege of forum is also more ancient than that of the canon; and thereupon, so that all who enjoy the privilege of the canon may enjoy also the privilege of forum, it is more necessary than vice versa. In fact, however, both privileges are conceded to the same persons, and therefore sufficient here is what I said about these persons in vol.5 disp.22 sect.1 n.19 and following, when treating of the privilege of the canon.

8. Now we can note a certain distinction among these persons by analogy and proportion with the persons of clerics; for some of them have an altogether unchangeable ecclesiastical state, as are solemnly professed religious; but others have a changeable state or mode of life, because in certain cases they can return to the state of laymen. The first we compare to clerics in sacred orders, because they absolutely and by force of their profession enjoy this privilege always without other condition or limitation, as long as they are not deprived of it. Hence, although a professed religious put off the habit and walk about apostate as a layman, he always enjoys this privilege, because he is always a sacred and religious person to whom the privilege has simply been conceded. But if objection be made of ch.1 De Apostatis, we reply, to begin with, that the discussion there is not about religious but about clerics who “having abandoned the clerical habit, in apostasy conduct themselves as laymen.” Next, apostates there do not seem to be deprived simply of the privilege, for it is only said: “If, taken in crimes, they are arrested, we do not bid them by ecclesiastical censure to be set free,” where the Gloss notes that the command is only that secular judges not be compelled by censures not to exercise their jurisdiction over apostates, but the faculty to exercise it is not given to them; for these are two distinct things and, in matter of punishment, extension should not be made from one to the other. Hence Panormitanus on that place and on ch. 'Perpendimus' De Sentent. Excomm. said with sufficient probability that the privilege of forum is not in that case lost but only the privilege of the canon; which opinion is supported by Paul IV constitut.²⁹ 'Contra Apostatas', and Pius IV constitut.⁸ at the like title, which can be seen in the Roman Bullarium. Next, although the privation of the privilege is done there by the right itself, it would be a sort of punishment that is only after sufficient warning and incorrigibility incurred, as was noted by the same Gloss. Per se, therefore, and by force of common right, professed religious always enjoy this privilege. But other ecclesiastical persons placed below this rank have a state in some way changeable; and so although they enjoy the privilege as long as they persist in the state, as soon as they abandon the state they lose the privilege, not as punishment but because the foundation for the privilege is not now found in them, and for this reason we have put these sorts of persons together with minor clerics. Thus too a novice, as soon as he puts off the habit, does not enjoy the privilege; nay also a religious who has only pronounced simple vows, if he is let go absolved from the vows, at once loses the privilege. And the same holds a fortiori of all others.

9. Lastly indeed can there be doubted in this place whether under these ecclesiastical persons who enjoy this privilege are included all who serve the Church in any function whatever, even if they are not ordained. And the same doubt is wont to be raised about the family members of bishops, nay about those too who serve other clerics. On which point the Gloss on ch.2 De Foro Compet. at the word 'Minores' understands servants of the Church by that word, whom it says enjoy the same privilege. And it seems so to understand it even if they are not ordained; both because in that text 'Minores' or 'Iuniores' (as is said in ch.2 11 q.1) are distinguished from every cleric, for the words are: "Neither priest, nor deacon, nor any cleric or minor of the Church;" and also because that Gloss cites ch. 'Ecclesiarum' 12 q.2, wherein without doubt the discussion is about common servants, not only of churches, but also of bishops and of any cleric.

10. One must nevertheless say that no attendants or servants of the Church enjoy the privilege of forum, as far as it is by force of common right. Thus do Panormitanus and Felinus and others teach on the said ch.2 De Foro Compet., and Archidiaconus on the said ch. 'Ecclesiarum' and on ch. 'Clericum' q.1, and Julius Clarus in the said section of the last question 35 nn.18 & 19. There is sufficient proof too, because it is stipulated by no right. Again, it is evident after the Council of Trent, because even in minor clerics the Council requires the habit and the tonsure for this privilege; therefore much less could a layman serving the Church enjoy such privilege, since he is not able even to possess the tonsure. Hence the same is far more certain of servants or attendants of clerics. But about the family of a bishop the aforesaid authors say that it is received by custom that they be exempt from secular courts, and all of them allege for this purpose the last chapter De Offic. Archidiac., which is for me no certain proof. I judge therefore that one should abide by the custom, and, where the opposite has not been established by use, one must not depart from common opinion; for such a custom is very reasonable in favor of Episcopal jurisdiction and authority. And for the same reason the same custom and with greater fullness is to be kept as regard the family members of cardinals, as can be understood from Julius Clarus above and from other authors who have written about cardinals.

Nor is an obstacle to the contrary posed by the said ch.2 De Foro Compet. at the word ‘Minores’ or ‘Iuniores’. For, to begin with, Hostiensis understands by minors there monks and converts, which exposition cannot be accommodated to the reading that has ‘Iuniores’. But because it was permitted, not without cause, by Gregory IX, we can understand that the term ‘Minores’ was taken by him not to signify minors in age but minors in rank. And thus under that term are included all ecclesiastical persons who do not have any orders, because they are in hierarchical order of an inferior rank, according to the chapter ‘A Subdiacono’ 93 dist. along with others. Second, we can say that by minors are understood scholars, as the Gloss says and as Panormitanus expounds at large, or young men destined for attendance on or service to the Church, not however wholly layfolk but having at least the first tonsure. And thus by the name of cleric in that text will only be understood he who is marked by some true order, so that the disjunction “nor any cleric or minor” may have place. Nor is this use of that term new, for once only those up to doorkeepers were numbered among clerics, as is clear in ch.1 dist.77 and in the said ch. ‘A Subidacono’.

Nor is an obstacle posed either by the said ch. ‘Ecclesiarum servos’, because there the question is not about any hired servants or free servants whatever, but about permanent servants, as the Gloss and others there expound, and Panormitanus and Felinus on the said ch.2 De Foro Compet. But these sorts of servants are said there by the 3rd Council of Toledo to be immune from the burdens and offices, both public and private, of laymen, because they cannot be compelled against the will of their masters. Which point indeed, as far as concerns the private services of laymen, pertains to the nature of justice, for no private person can justly compel another’s servant to be servant to himself. But the second part about public burdens and offices is reduced to exemption from taxes, according to what has been declared above. For the possessions of churches, nay of clerics too, are exempt from taxes in law 1 Code. De Episcop. et Clericis. And the reason is that servants or possessions are counted among the goods of the master; and therefore, just as other goods of clerics are exempt from taxes, or just as the house, horses, or cattle of clerics are exempt from public burdens, so also are their servants. Hence this exemption is not conceded per se and directly to the persons of slaves, but redounds from the privilege conceded to clerics, because a burden imposed on a slave redounds to the master, and thus it would be contrary to his immunity.

Chapter 30. Whether the privilege of immunity for clerics can be revoked by any human being.

Summary. 1. Properties of the privilege of immunity. 2. Which property is treated of in this chapter. 3. Threefold way of losing the privilege. It can be lost neither by lapse of time nor by the death of him who concedes it. 4. First conclusion. Proof. 5. Whether this privilege can be revoked by kings. Reason for doubt. 6. The conclusion is proved also as to kings. 7. Evasion. It is refuted. 8. No privilege of the Church once conceded can be revoked by the secular power. 9. This privilege of immunity cannot even be limited by the civil power. 10. Objection. Solution. Privileges conceded by kings to ecclesiastical persons have no effect prior to their acceptance by prelates. 11. Four reasons for doubt against this sort of concession are solved. 12. Evasion. It is resolved. 13. Neither can the Supreme Pontiff simply revoke this privilege. 14. This assertion is demonstrated on the part of clerics. An evasion is rejected. 15. The Pontiff cannot abrogate all the rights that concede immunity. 16. Solution.

1. Hitherto we have explained all the causes and effects of this ecclesiastical immunity of which we are treating; now it would seem we must speak accordingly about its properties. If, however, someone considers diligently what has been said in the explanation of the causes and effects of this privilege, he will find almost all the properties made clear that can be seen in it. For, in the first place, from what has been said there is collected that this privilege is divine, that is, conceded by God himself, which is the great dignity of such a privilege, from which it has as a result the property that it is universally or simply unchangeable and that it cannot, without great and just cause, be taken away even in part, as we touched on in chapter 28 and as we will make more fully clear a little later. Next we have, from what has been said, that this privilege is not of private but of public right, not only because it has been passed for the public utility of the universal Church, but also because it has been inserted into both canon and civil right, and therefore it has in a more eminent way all the prerogatives that are wont to be had by rights inserted into the body of right, as I assume from the general doctrine De Privilegiis. Third, from what has been said can be had that this privilege is extremely favorable, because, in the first place, it favors religion, whose right is deserving of the greatest favor, as even the Jurist thinks on law ‘Sunt Personae’ and following De Religios. et Sumptib. Funer. And next it has been established not in favor of one place or province or race but for the increase and decency of the divine cult and the honor of the whole ecclesiastical state. Hence too it happens that all the rules, which have been passed about expanding favors in right, must be extended to this privilege. Finally, fourth, there can be concluded from what has been said that this privilege is not merely personal but real, because it has been conceded in consideration not of any person but of the pontifical dignity and of the whole clergy, as is said in ch. ‘Si Diligenti’ De Foro Compet., and as is manifest from what has been said about the final cause and reason for this privilege. Hence finally it happens that this privilege does not end with the person but is of itself perpetual, for this property is wont to accompany real privileges.

2. About these properties, then, the last excepted, nothing remains for us to say, but they are to be explained and extended according to the general principles and doctrines about privileges. There only remains to make clear about the perpetuity how great it is and whether it excludes every mode of loss, or removal, or reversal of such privilege. For that is said to be perpetual which is incorruptible, or if we speak more broadly, what is at any rate not corrupted nor has an end. If then this privilege is perpetual, it will not be able to be lost or taken away. But there is to the contrary the fact that there are many other rights that are said to be perpetual and can cease to exist. For a privilege is wont to be called perpetual as often as either it adheres to a thing of itself perpetual, as an estate, or, if it adheres to a person, it is not extinguished with his life but can be perpetually succeeded to; and yet such privileges can be taken away or lost through a superior power or some effective will or action to the contrary. There remains to be seen, therefore, whether there is a greater perpetuity to this privilege; which thing cannot more agreeably be done than by explaining whether any of the ways whereby privileges are wont to end has place in the case of this privilege of immunity.

3. We must, then, have before our eyes the ways in which privileges are destroyed, which we now reduce to three; these are revocation of the privilege, renunciation of the same, and usage contrary to it; and these ways we will briefly run through. For two other ways of corruption that are wont to occur in the case of other human privileges, namely either by the lapse of time or by the death of the one conceding them, cannot happen in this privilege. But as to the other way, which is wont to be called that of abuse, the explanation of how it may sometimes happen in the case of this privilege was explained above with the declaration of how the privation of clerical privilege may be sometimes by way of punishment. To this too is reduced the fact that it is sometimes even lost or diminished by change of clerical status in the ways made clear above; although this is not so much properly called abuse as change of subject, whereby sometimes an accidental property is wont to be corrupted. And thus might the privation also be reduced to cessation of the intrinsic cause on which this privilege depends; which is another way by which privileges are wont to be lost, and by this consideration alone can it have place in the case of this privilege. With these things laid down as preface, then,

4. I say first: This privilege is perpetual in such way that it is also irrevocable. The assertion is common and certain, and it is shown briefly in this way: because this privilege could most of all be revoked by God, or by a temporal king or emperor, or by the Supreme Pontiff, for in no one else can such power, with any appearance of foundation, be imagined. The assertion then is proved about each singly. And about God, first of all, there is no controversy; for if he wills he can change everything; but if willing is repugnant to his promise, he does not will, nor can he will in the composite sense, as they say, because he cannot be unfaithful nor can he deny himself. In this way in the present case, then, this privilege can be said to be, insofar as it has been conceded by God, simply irrevocable by him. Because if it was given by the positive divine right of the law of grace, just as the law of grace itself has been given simply and with an absolute promise of perpetuity, at least as long as the world shall endure, so too this right of ecclesiastical immunity has by the absolute will of God, and without any implied condition, been perpetually made firm, as long as the priesthood of the New Law shall, along with the world, endure; therefore in the same way this privilege is perpetual and irrevocable. For at the end of the world it will not be revoked but, with the cessation of its foundation and of its end or necessity, it will cease as a result. But if this privilege is from God only by reason of natural right, thus is it irrevocable more from intrinsic nature as long as the foundation and matter of the right remains the same, as is clear of itself, and as has been made clear at length in book two of De Legibus.

5. About the second point, namely about temporal kings, there is greater difficulty. First, because, under this reckoning, it is human and civil and thereupon changeable. Second, because each thing is dissolved by the same causes as those through which it comes to be; therefore, insofar as this privilege has been established by the will of the king, it can be retracted, because the will of an earthly king is changeable. For this is the reason on account of which other human privileges can be revoked. Third, because emperors have often revoked such privileges, as is taken from Gratian in ch. 'Omnes' § 'Haec si quis' 11 q.1, and from law 'Si Quis Curialis' Code. De Episcop. et Clericis, and from law 'Neminem', and from Authentica 'Quas Actiones' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., and from law 19 De Episcop. et Cleric. in the Theodosian Code. Also in the laws of particular kingdoms similar laws are found whereby the exemption of clerics is at least in part revoked. Fourth, because the kings who are now alive can say that they have not conceded such a privilege and that their own right could not be prejudged by their predecessors.

6. Nevertheless one must say that this privilege cannot be revoked by the will of temporal princes. Which assertion can be understood in two ways. First, that it absolutely and simply cannot be revoked, insofar even as it has been established by the will of God and of the Pontiffs; in the other way it can be understood also as to the respect in which it could have been donated by temporal princes of their own will. In the former sense the assertion as to God is known per se; and as to the Pontiffs it follows from the principles laid down above, and does not need any other proof. For the Pontiff can exempt clerics from the secular power even against the will of temporal princes, as has been shown above; therefore kings cannot revoke the privilege of forum or of exemption as conceded by the Pontiffs; because, just as such privilege does not depend on the wills of princes in coming to be, so neither in its duration or conservation. There is confirmation too, that an inferior cannot take away a right conceded by a superior; but the Pontiffs established this right of immunity insofar as they are superior to temporal kings, at any rate indirectly, by their spiritual power, as was made clear above; therefore it cannot be changed by temporal princes. Nor do the reasons for doubt proceed against this part, nor is there controversy about it among Catholic authors, except perhaps among those who deny that a Pontiff can by his own power and without the consent of princes concede an exemption. But that opinion is both held by few and is certainly improbable and, as to what most concerns the matter, the authors themselves who defend it teach nevertheless that an exemption once introduced with the consent of kings cannot by the same kings be revoked; but in this they speak according to the latter sense we have proposed of the assertion.

The assertion also, therefore, proceeds in the second sense above explained; which sense is made clear through this conditional proposition; for although this privilege have its own first origin from the free donation of princes, it may not be revoked by them. Or it can otherwise be explained if the Pontiff be understood now to have a threefold mode of jurisdiction over clerics in criminal and civil causes. One mode is that of temporal jurisdiction given directly by God over such persons. Another is that of indirect jurisdiction by force of spiritual power, and these modes he without doubt does not have from kings, and so they cannot be taken away by them either. The third mode is that of direct jurisdiction in such matter over such persons, which the Pontiffs would have had from the donation of the emperors; because, as we were saying above, the emperors did not, by exempting clerics from their direct temporal jurisdiction, leave them lawless or without direct superior in temporal matters, but handed over their direct jurisdiction to the Pontiffs. We say, therefore, that, once this too is posited, princes cannot any more remove that jurisdiction from the Pontiffs and take it up again for themselves, especially when the Pontiffs themselves do not agree. Which opinion thus expounded is a common one. Innocent on ch. 'Novit' De Iudiciis, and Panormitanus on that place n.23, and Felinus ch.1 De Constitutione. n.19 at the verse 'Alius Casus' and on ch.1 De Prob., and these two refer to many ancient others. The same is in Hostiensis on the said ch. 'Novit' n.2, and in his Summa at the title 'De Immunit. Ecclesiar.' § 'Sed Nec Illa', and Alvarus Pelagius bk.1 De Planctu Ecclesiarum. ch.44, and Driedo bk.1 De Libertate Christianorum. ch.9, Covarruvias in Pract. ch.31, Soto in Sentences bk.4 dist.25 q.2 a.2 conclus.6, Molina vol.1 De Iustitia Disputationum. 31. The same is also defended by Medina and Pelagius, even if they elsewhere judged that this exemption did not otherwise begin than from the donation of princes.

Now this truth is founded first on a certain accepted principle in the matter of privileges; that a privilege conceded to a superior or an equal cannot any more be revoked by the one who concedes it. And the reason is that such a privilege passes over into a pact, as the jurists say; but pacts are to be kept, even with subjects, not to mention with non-subjects, and much more so with superiors. Or, explaining the reason more in another way, although it comes back to the same, because such a concession is rather a donation than a privilege, as Driedo rightly said; for it is, as I explained a little before, a certain conferring of proper jurisdiction by taking it away from oneself and transferring it to another; but this is a sort of donation. Again because an inferior cannot give a privilege to a superior as if by exercising jurisdiction over him, since he does not have it; therefore he can only do it by agreement or donation. But such donation when completed and accepted cannot be revoked by the donor against the will of the recipient, because, after the donation, he who gave it is no longer lord of the thing but he is to whom it was given; but no one can take a thing from another against the will of the owner. There is confirmation too, and the declaration is that, if a prince could revoke such donation, either it would be by ownership or power of ownership or it would be by power of jurisdiction, for no other just title can be thought of. Not by ownership, for this was lost by the donation or the concession of such privilege; but a preceding ownership, that exists no longer, leaves no power or moral faculty behind. For we are supposing that the privilege was simply and absolutely conceded without any condition; for, if it included a condition, the prior owner, because of the non-completion of it, could sometimes revoke the donation, because he has then not altogether renounced his prior ownership; but here it is not so, but the exemption was made purely and absolutely; therefore it cannot be revoked on account of preceding ownership. Nor by the power of jurisdiction either, because a prince does not have it over his superior, since he does not have it over an equal who is not subject to him, as is clear from the terms themselves; therefore etc.

7. Now this principle, which is without doubt evident, is rightly applied to the present point; because this privilege, as it is understood to flow from secular princes, was not given to subjects but to a superior, namely to clerics, churches, the Pontiff. You will say that, on the contrary, it was given to subjects if we suppose that, before this concession, clerics were subject in temporal matters to lay princes. I reply that this privilege is understood partly to have been conceded to all inferior ecclesiastics, partly to the Supreme Pontiff himself; to the former by exempting them from their jurisdiction; to the latter by transferring to him supreme direct temporal jurisdiction over such persons. In accord, therefore, with the prior consideration I admit that the privilege was conceded to subjects. But by that very same concession they were made non-subjects, and consequently the privilege was made irrevocable by the conceder, because it exists no longer in subjects; and therefore neither by the power of jurisdiction can a layman deprive them of the received benefit, because neither does he have lordship over free men, nor jurisdiction over non-subjects, nor a just title of again usurping it. But in accord with the latter consideration this privilege was given to a non-subject, even antecedently, because the Pontiff is exempt by divine right, and accordingly he is not subject to the emperor; nay it was even given to a superior, because the Pontiff is superior to the emperor, even in temporal matters, at any rate indirectly, and to him as to Supreme Pastor was given even direct temporal jurisdiction over the clergy, so that he might more agreeably and freely, so to say, rule and judge them in temporal matters. And thus that general principle has place in every way with respect to the Pontiff.

8. I add next that not only in this privilege but also in all the others conceded to the Church, not only by emperors or kings, but also by any princes whatever, or lords, that principle, proposed under more universal terms, has place, because no privilege conceded to the Church by any temporal power, even one not supreme, and accepted by it can be revoked by the civil power, even a supreme one. The reason is founded on another divine right whereby all ecclesiastical goods are exempt from the jurisdiction and from all the power of secular princes, as was shown above. From which principle we thus collect that a privilege conceded to the Church, by the very fact that it begins to be in the possession and use of the Church, is to be reckoned among ecclesiastical goods, as is per se clear; but a secular prince, however supreme, has no power over ecclesiastical goods; therefore neither can he make any disposition about ecclesiastical privileges; therefore much less can he revoke them or take them away.

It is also made clear by comparison with other goods more sensible and corporeal; for if the emperor has given an estate, a castle, or a city to the Church, he cannot any more take it away, just as Constantine could not revoke the donation of the City of Rome and of other goods that he gave to the Roman Church, or make any disposition about those goods, because they were now made ecclesiastical; therefore in like manner he could not revoke or again usurp the jurisdiction which he once transferred to the Church. And this example is used by Hostiensis on this matter, and he declares the thing very well; for although jurisdiction, even temporal, is more incorporeal than, for example, an estate, nevertheless it is reckoned among human and temporal goods just as are also other actions or rights that are called incorporeal goods by jurists; therefore, after these are transferred to the ownership of the Church, they all become ecclesiastical goods and are accordingly by divine right clothed with the same immunity. Hence the same example and argument can be taken up from goods given to the Church by any inferior or private lord; for, after the donation has had its effect, neither the donor nor a temporal king can touch them, except insofar as is disposed by canon rights, or if something in the donation was excepted through some just pact; therefore the same holds of any privilege whatever in temporal matters given to the Church by civil power; for of whatever rank or order it be, it cannot be revoked by any civil power at all, though the power be superior or even supreme.

9. In addition, the posited rule may as to this respect be amplified; because not only can this privilege of forum not be completely revoked by the civil power, but also it cannot be in part diminished or limited or restricted by it; nay, neither can it, with authority of law, be narrowly explained by virtue of civil power alone. All this follows evidently from the reasons and discussions given, because no power in respect of ecclesiastical goods and rights has been bestowed on laymen; therefore likewise, in respect of ecclesiastical privilege or jurisdiction once transferred to the Church, secular power can do nothing; therefore neither can it diminish or restrict it or pass any law that is prejudicial to it. And likewise can be applied here the principle that no one, even if he be a supreme king, can diminish or make any disposition about the privileges or rights of another king, or of any non-subject person, from whomever and by whatever just title he had them and holds them; therefore by greater reason temporal princes cannot make any disposition about the privilege of forum that may be prejudicial to it. But such is the publishing of any law whatever, the concession of a privilege, the delegation or committing of jurisdiction, or the ordering of execution, whereby ecclesiastical liberty is diminished or restricted; and therefore all actions or dispositions of this sort are not only illicit but also null and void, because they are done without legitimate power. And therefore are they declared as such in the Authentica 'Cassa', Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., and ch. 'Noverit', and ch. 'Gravem' De Sent. Excommunicat., and in many others under the titles De Immunit. Ecclesiar., De Foro Comp., and De Iudiciis.

10. You will say that a temporal king could increase ecclesiastical liberty in his kingdom by conceding, for example, that clerics not only as defendants but also as plaintiffs might summon laymen to an ecclesiastical tribunal; or even by conceding that temporal causes among laymen can be transferred to an ecclesiastical tribunal if the defendants wish, as we read was conceded by Constantine in ch. 'Omnes' 11 q.1. Therefore he could also, when it seems expedient to him, restrict immunity in order that equity may be preserved. The response is, first, by denial of the consequence, for no equity demands this. Also because a temporal king can concede a favorable privilege to churches but cannot concede a law onerous and hurtful to churches or ecclesiastical persons that is binding on them; and also because anyone can increase a donation he has made but not diminish it, because the former is a matter of liberality and does not take away another's right but confers it, while the latter is repugnant to an acquired right and consequently is against justice. And thus, in the present case, to increase ecclesiastical immunity is of itself a work of liberality and is not repugnant to justice or religion, because it is not a disposition about rights that are already ecclesiastical but about one's own right to make it ecclesiastical, but this is of itself more a work of religion. To restrict or limit immunity, however, is not a matter of liberality and detracts from religion and involves injustice, because it is to put one's scythe to another's cornfield. Next, about the antecedent, we note that although temporal princes could by new privileges to clerics increase the exemption or jurisdiction of bishops in temporal affairs, nevertheless these privileges do not compel prelates of the Church to observe them, but their free consent is necessary for them to have effect, because in such matter they cannot have coercive or directive force, as was shown above. And besides, for such privileges to be accepted by clerics it is necessary that they not be contrary to canon laws, because against them no civil disposition can be valid.

11. Nor are the reasons for doubt that were put at the beginning of this point obstacles to the assertion. For we say to the first of them that although this privilege, as it flowed from the emperor, can be called a civil right, nevertheless, after it was approved by the Church, it is, as the canonists, say canonified, that is, made a canon right and its matter raised to the higher order of ecclesiastical things, and therefore it cannot be revoked without the consent of the Pontiff. Which thing is taught about every canonified civil law by the Glosses, by Innocent, Dominicus, and by others, in Felinus ch.1 De Constitut. n.19 and Panormitanus on ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis n.27. To the second the reply is that the principle that a thing can be dissolved by the causes which gave it birth has place only in things that depend on their cause in coming to be and in being preserved; but in the present case, although the exemption, as it is now being considered, depends on the will of the conceder in coming to be, yet after it has been given it is no longer dependent, because, as I said, it is carried up to a higher level of things. Add that that effect has been confirmed by a more powerful will, and therefore it cannot be

To the third we say, to begin with, that there is report of things done but no showing that they were by right done. And thus Felinus in ch. 'Ecclesia' De Constitut. replies to the said law 'Si Quis Curialis' that, although it revoked a certain privilege in fact, yet it could not do so by right. And the same can be replied to other laws, especially the ancient ones, because emperors in the beginning did not have a sufficient view of the force of ecclesiastical immunity. But it can be said, next, that perhaps there were some privileges that were never indeed accepted by the Pontiffs but were at most permitted, as perhaps was the privilege given by Constantine that laymen could appeal to ecclesiastical judges. And if there were any such privileges they could have been revoked by the contrary will or use, because they neither properly pertained to immunity nor were reckoned among ecclesiastical rights or goods, and so the reasons given fail in their case. Privileges accepted and approved by the Pontiff, however, cannot be revoked without the consent of the Pontiff, and therefore laws to the contrary either had no effect or could have had it only with the assent, tacit or express, of the Pontiff. Which fact seems to have been recognized by King Alphonsus of Spain in law 54 title 6 part 1, where he says that, although clerics were because of their clerical status exempt in many things, yet there were some wherein it pleased the Church (in Spanish: 'the Church found it for the best') that they not be exempt, as though to say that he could not take away or diminish an exemption but only make clear what in that class of things the Church had admitted.

To the fourth the response is that the kings who are now alive can be compared either with their predecessors, to whom they succeeded by hereditary right, or to the emperors, whose kingdoms they have in part occupied and by just title possess along with supreme civil power. About the first I say that each of them has succeeded in the kingdom in the way that their predecessors held it; if therefore this privilege was validly conceded by one of their predecessors, by that very fact that jurisdiction has been removed from that royal throne; and therefore a successor cannot inherit it with a fuller jurisdiction nor revoke a removal done before, because he acquires no power with respect to non-subjects. And more or less the same reason holds of the supreme kings who now exist in the lands that once belonged to the empire; for they too obtained those kingdoms in the state in which they before existed under the emperor, and thus they were not able to detract from the right of the Church.

12. But if someone say that this exemption, in the way it exists from the emperors, began in the times of Frederick II, at which time there were already many supreme Christian princes and kings who were not bound to accept the constitution of Frederick, the response is, in the first place (whatever may be true of the antiquity of the right and of the excellence of each king, which it is not now necessary for us to examine), that Frederick did not give but renewed ecclesiastical exemption, and brought it back to its pristine and due state in the way it had already been conceded by the ancient emperors, as was seen above. Next, it cannot be denied but that all the kingdoms of the Roman world accepted that law and observed it in use and in morals, nay even confirmed it by their own laws in their own kingdoms, which is enough for this right of the Church to have been acquired by a special title. A sufficient sign also of it is that, in order to be able to act against the exemption in certain cases, they obtained privileges from the Apostolic See, as in his response to Barclay and in turning his argument back against him

Bellarmino noted from Julius Clarus bk.5 § last q.36 n.26 at the end, and from Aufrelius in the Clementina 'Ut Clericorum' De Offic. Iudicis Ordinarii Limitation. 13. And similar privileges from the Republic of Venice are reported by Gigas in his tractate De Crimine Laesae Maiestatis under the rubric 'Quis de Illo Cognoscat' n.20. Therefore it is a sign that this right of exemption was accepted in the whole Christian world and is in the same world a sort of Right of Peoples, and therefore temporal kings cannot revoke it by their own authority. But about supreme kings, who have perhaps newly converted to the faith, it was said above that they can be compelled by the Church to admit this exemption, and the Church can make as it were a contract with them and not otherwise bestow ecclesiastical ministers on them unless they allow these ministers to be exempt from their temporal jurisdiction. Which condition, although it not be expressly proposed, is included in the very profession of obedience to the Roman Pontiff, and therefore by this title too such kings cannot revoke, or infringe on, this privilege.

13. Third, we must speak about the Supreme Pontiff, whether he can revoke this privilege, wherein can be proposed more or less the same reasons for doubt. But, those notwithstanding, I say briefly that the Supreme Pontiff too cannot simply and absolutely revoke this privilege. Thus commonly say the canonists on ch. 'Ecclesiae' De Constitut. where in particular speak Panormitanus, Decius, and Felinus, and on ch.2 De Maiorit. et Obedientia, Cardinal in Repetit. ch. 'Perpendimus' De Sentent. Excommunicat. opposit.7, Rebuffe in Concordat. last tractate, where he refers to others, and Iacobatius bk.1 De Concil. a.6. Now this assertion is proved by running briefly through the three rights from which this exemption could take its origin. And in the first place, since we have said that it is immediately of divine natural and positive right, it is clear that it could not be revoked by the Pontiff, and on this principle the said authors found themselves. The consequence, on this supposition, is evident, because the Pontiff cannot abrogate divine right; therefore he cannot revoke a privilege immediately conferred and instituted by divine right, because he would through this right abrogate something divine. And for this reason we said above that the Pontiff cannot deprive himself of this privilege, because it is by divine right attached to his dignity, and he cannot be divested of it without a lessening of the same dignity; so, for the same reason, he cannot revoke the universal privilege of the clergy insofar as it is by divine right.

However, even on the hypothesis that this privilege was not conferred immediately by Christ on all the other clerics below the Supreme Pontiff, the assertion would be true about the same privilege as it exists from men. And first about civil right, because the thing is easier. For the Pontiff cannot renounce this privilege in the way in which it could have been, and in fact was, conferred by emperors and kings, except by removing from his See all direct temporal jurisdiction conferred on him by secular princes and by returning it to them; but the Pontiff cannot do this; therefore on this head indeed the Pontiff cannot revoke this privilege. The major has been made sufficiently clear above. The proof of the minor is that the Pontiff is not absolute lord of the goods and rights of his See, even in the case of those that have been given to him by men, because they have been given principally to Christ and to the Pontiff only as his Vicar, and therefore they have been given not to the person but to the See; therefore he is only the faithful and prudent steward of them; therefore he cannot by his own choice donate them or alienate them or disperse them. And for this cause he cannot now return the City of Rome or the rest of the patrimony of Peter to the emperor, or give it freely to another.

But there is the same or greater reason about the aforesaid jurisdiction, after it has once been transferred to the power and lordship of the Church; for it is a thing of great value among temporal goods and more necessary to the Church for its adornment and good governance than a temporal kingdom or the like temporal goods; therefore much less can he relinquish that jurisdiction and power and deprive his See of it.

14. Next, on the part of clerics it is no less evidently shown; for by this privilege a right is also acquired by them, whereby they have obtained special freedom from the temporal yoke and have been made lords of that freedom; therefore the Pontiff cannot by his own choice deprive them of this acquired right or liberty, of which they are lords; therefore he cannot revoke that privilege as given by the emperors, because by such revocation clerics would be deprived of the said right and liberty and would again be subject to the secular power. You will say that by this argument is rightly proved that the Pontiff cannot without cause deprive clerics of that acquired right and that he can however with just cause. The response is that this exemption is so necessary to the clerical state that no cause can be thought of on account of which the whole ecclesiastical state could justly or validly be deprived of so great a benefit. Therefore, in order that some cleric in particular might sometimes be deprived of this liberty, a sufficient cause on his part can sometimes have intervened, as can be understood from what was said above, since clerics are sometimes deprived of this privilege in whole or in part as punishment for crimes or because they are not maintaining the status of clerics. But, with respect to the whole Church and the clerical state, no reason or cause can be sufficient for justly bringing about such a change or revocation, and therefore neither can it in such matter validly be done.

15. Finally from here too the same is easily proved about the same privilege, that it has been by canon right made firm, because the Pontiff could not now abrogate the whole of canon right that concedes or confirms this privilege. Because power has been given him not for destruction but for edification; but such an abrogation could bring no advantage to the Church but rather disturbance and many harms. Because by that very fact Christian princes would want to usurp power over clerics. For even while canon right stands they can scarcely be kept within their function; what therefore would happen if canon right in this respect were abrogated? You will say that, although a prince or a Pontiff would be acting badly in abrogating without cause or reason a law established by himself or his predecessors, nevertheless if he were to do it, the fact would hold, because the validity of such a law depends absolutely on the will of the legislator; therefore, likewise in the present case, that abrogation or revocation would be valid even if unjust.

16. I reply, to begin with, that such a revocation would not only be unjust for the general reason that it is against legal justice, but also for a special reason, namely, that, notwithstanding the said supposition, it would still be against divine right, at least the prescriptive right to the effect that such an exemption be in the Church as far as it can agreeably be done; and in this respect such a revocation would perhaps be not only unjust but also invalid, because contrary to divine right. Secondly, it is said that, when a law once in place has conferred a right and made a change in things themselves, it cannot without reason of the common good be so abrogated that subjects be deprived of things or rights already acquired; because therefore the clerical state has acquired the perpetual right of immunity by this canon law, it cannot, by a revocation made without cause and rashly, be validly deprived of that right. Lastly I say that, whatever may be true of the hypothetical question whether, if such a revocation were to be done, it would be valid, there is no need to fear that such a revocation might sometimes happen, because since it could not happen without great loss and disturbance to the universal Church, the Holy Spirit, by whose special providence the Church is ruled, would not permit the Pontiff to err so gravely in the use of his power. And by considering that power in this way, not as it is purely subject to human will but especially as it is ruled by the Holy Spirit, the Pontiff cannot make such a revocation, because it would be an intolerable moral error against the universal good of the Church, as I have made clear in vol.1 De Religione tract.1 bk.1 ch.13 q.10 on the precept of tithes.

Chapter 31. Whether the privilege of clerics can be lost or lessened by renunciation.

Summary. 1. This privilege cannot be lost by voluntary renunciation. The privilege of forum introduces a precept with respect to those who have the privilege. 2. Whether a cleric can renounce this privilege by license of the bishop. Reason for doubt. 3. True resolution and reason for this resolution. 4. Second and third reason. 5. The rights objected to the contrary are solved. The response of the Gloss. Another Gloss. True response. 6. Another on ch.2 De Foro Competenti. A bishop cannot commit to a layman who lacks any mark of orders jurisdiction over a cleric. 7. A cleric can renounce this privilege by license of the Pontiff. 8. Reason for doubt. 9. A General Council even along with the Pontiff cannot renounce this privilege.

1. The solution is that this ecclesiastical immunity cannot be lost through a renunciation made by the proper will and authority of those to whom it has been conceded, because it cannot be validly and with effect renounced by anyone. This assertion, to the extent it can by a particular reason pertain to the Supreme Pontiff, has been treated of in chapter seven of this book. But as to the others it can be understood either of individual persons or of the whole clergy or clerical state. Individual persons, then, are treated of expressly by Innocent III in ch. ‘Si Diligenti’ De Foro Competenti. and he gives the reason in these words: “Since this is not a personal benefit which may be renounced but has rather been publicly bestowed on the whole ecclesiastical college and it cannot be set aside by a pact between private persons...” Hence he concludes that such a renunciation, even when confirmed with an oath, is not valid, nor is such an oath binding, because it is contrary to good morals. For such a renunciation is unjust and sacrilegious, because it is injurious to the clerical state. And this right was handed down before Innocent, as he himself notes, in the 3rd Council of Carthage ch.9, ch. ‘Placuit’ 2, 11 q.1, where a special punishment is inflicted on clerics who renounce this privilege as well in a criminal as in a civil cause. The same has also been established about the privilege of the canon in ch. ‘Contingit’ 1 De Sentent. Excommunic. From which rights is collected a notable difference between this privilege and others that are conceded in favor of private persons; for the latter, which are called rights, do not have the force of law and precept with respect to those to whom they are conceded, but are rather permissions, as it were, or dispensations or favors, which they may use if they wish. But this privilege, because it contains public right, has the force of precept, not only with respect to others, but also with respect to those who have the privilege; because it not only bestows a favor on them but also bids them use it or forbids them from renouncing it; but it commands others not to violate it, even if clerics give consent.

Hence, as to each of its parts, this canon right has revoked or also emended the civil right of Justinian on law ‘Si Quis in Conscribendo’ Code. De Episc. et Cleric., wherein was established that “if a cleric has promised not to use his privilege of forum, it is not possible to go against his promise;” and likewise on law ‘Si Quis’ Code. De Pactis, where is prescribed to lay judges that they make the law to be observed. And a reason is given in each place, “because it is a rule of ancient right that all have license to renounce things that have been introduced on their behalf.” However, that law was always null and, in passing it, the emperor went too far in a serious way (perhaps through ignorance); both because he made disposition in matter not his own and about persons not subject to him, and because too he relies on a false foundation, because either he did not understand the force and nature of this privilege, which was principally established not for private personal advantage but for the common good of religion, or if he did understand this he applied badly the general rule of the ancient right, for that rule is to be understood about rights that were introduced for the private advantage of each, as was rightly understood by the Pontiff, to whom and not to the emperor it pertains to make clear of what sort clerical privilege is and how it is by clerics to be kept.

2. But it can not unjustly be asked whether any cleric might renounce this privilege by license from the bishop. And the reason for doubt is that many of the ancient rights that prohibit clerics from appearing in a secular court add this limitation “without the license or without the permission of the bishop,” as is clear from epist.2 of Pope Marcellinus, and from the Council of Agde ch.32, from the 3rd of Orléans canon 31, and it is contained in ch. ‘Clericum’ 1.2 & 3.11 q.1, from the Council of Venetico under Leo I ch.9, from that of Epaon canon 11. Next, the same is taken from ch.2 De Foro Competenti where it is said: “Let no judge...without the permission of the Pontiff presume of himself to censure or condemn a cleric;” therefore all these rights indicate that by license of the bishop a cleric can renounce his right and also that a layman can judge him.

3. Nevertheless one must say that, as to the proper renunciation of forum, a bishop cannot concede such a license. Thus does the Gloss teach on ch. ‘Qualiter et Quando’ De Iudiciis at the word ‘Prohibemus’. Again, the Gloss on ch. ‘Significasti’ De Foro Compet. at the word ‘Clerici’ at the end, and it is collected from the text there: “Clerics cannot consent to a judge not their own (unless perhaps he be an ecclesiastical person and the will of the diocesan bishop concurs).” So two conditions are there required by Gregory IX for such consent or renunciation; therefore if the first condition is lacking and the judge is a layman, the license of the bishop is not sufficient. And thus too think Panormitanus and other expositors on these places; again the Gloss and the doctors on ch.2 De Foro Compet. The reason indeed is, first, that not only an inferior cleric but also any particular bishop is a private person with respect to the whole ecclesiastical state, and a very bishop himself cannot renounce his right with respect to his own person and commit himself to a secular court; therefore neither can he give his clerics license to do it; for the reason is the same, for in each case it is done against a privilege conceded in favor of the whole state.

4. Second, a further declaration is that this right, as I said, is not only a privilege that confers something but also one that prohibits or prescribes, and it is a general and very grave right of a superior; therefore an inferior, such as is any private bishop, cannot make dispensation in it. Third, in the case of the privilege of the canon a bishop cannot concede license to a cleric to permit himself to be beaten by another, nor can he so act that a layman who, even with his license, does the beating not incur excommunication, as the Gloss rightly said on the said ch. ‘Significasti’, and as is collected from the article ‘Universitatis’ De Sententia Excommunic.; therefore neither can he give license to a cleric to renounce the privilege of forum, nor can he permit a secular judge to use such renunciation. Now I said that this is understood as to proper renunciation of forum so as to take note that in the paying of taxes some mode of exception can be admitted. Although, if the thing be attentively considered, it is not properly an exception; both because, according to the new right ch. ‘Adversus’ De Immunit. Ecclesiar., even in the paying of taxes the license of the bishop is not enough but the Pope must be consulted; and also because, although in a case of present necessity an exception would seem to need by equity to be admitted, nevertheless, when the mode and nature of the contribution is considered, it is not properly an exception because the contribution is not done nor is permitted as if it were due by way of tax, that is, as a sign of subjection, or by force of civil law, but because the prelates of the Church themselves judge from charity, or legal justice, or in some other way from force of reason, that it is expedient for clerics to pay it, as was made clear above. Hence it is not renunciation but as it were prudent interpretation of natural right.

5. But to the ancient rights alleged to the contrary the Glosses respond in a variety of ways. For one Gloss on the said chapter ‘Significasti’ says that in those texts the word ‘most of all’ must be supplied, so that the sense is that it is always illicit for a cleric to renounce this privilege, but most of all, that is with greater guilt, without license from the bishop, because it does him a special injury. But, as the jurists say, an interpretation is wretched that is done by adding to the law words not contained in it. Especially because sometimes those canons speak in such way that only by violence or by destroying the sense does that word seem capable of being added, as are the words in the Council of Epaon: “Let not clerics presume without the arrangement of the bishop to enter into a public court, etc.,” certainly, from the force of these words, he who does it by the arrangement of the bishop does not violate that law, and the words of the Council of Venetico are clearer: “Clerics except by permission of the bishop, etc.,” for there the word ‘most of all’ cannot be made to fit. Therefore another Gloss on the said ch.2 De Foro Compet. replies in one word: “Here the argument from the contrary sense is open,” that is, those canons specifically prohibit such renunciation to be done without license from the bishop, but yet they do not for that reason concede that it can be done with it; for this is the argument from the contrary sense, which argument is not efficacious when it is repugnant to other rights. The response is in fact probable though hard enough and, as it were, violent if the words of so many canons are simply weighed. The other solutions are also similar that Panormitanus multiplies on the said chapter n.12. So truer and simpler seems to me the response of the Gloss on the said ch. ‘Clericus’ 1 which says: “Today neither can it with the consent of the bishop be done,” by which words it indicates that it was once licit according to ancient right but that now it is not licit. And the same opinion is held by the Gloss on the said ch. ‘Qualiter, et Quando’ De Iudiciis, which says that this is not licit “although the ancient rights seem to allow the contrary.”

6. But that response does not seem able to be fitted to ch.2 De Foro Comp. which is more recent; and therefore I consider that the canon is not speaking to clerics by prohibiting them from renouncing the forum, but it is speaking to secular judges by prohibiting them under censure from that very deed, “let them not presume to censure or condemn a cleric.” And rightly with respect to them is added the phrase ‘without permission of the bishop’, because sometimes they can with permission of the bishop censure clerics, because the word ‘censure’ does not strictly mean to judge, or to exercise jurisdiction, but to carry out a certain coercion or punishment, by seizing, imprisoning, or torturing them; but these and the like things secular judges can sometimes do by order of the bishop, according to ch. ‘Ut Famae’ De Sentent. Excommun., because, as is there said, a secular judge does not then carry it out by his own but by the bishop’s authority, and because often prelates lack the power and authority of such ministers. Another reason can also be added, that if a bishop commits an act of jurisdiction over a cleric to a secular judge it seems that he delegates to him his own jurisdiction, and a secular judge can presume that the bishop can make such a delegation. Now this latter reason can be tolerated if the secular judge is otherwise a cleric, at least in minor orders, and the cause is committed to him to be dealt with by canon and ecclesiastical right in a way fitted to clerics, otherwise it cannot have place, because a bishop cannot commit jurisdiction over a cleric to a pure layman, nor even permit a cleric to be judged in the manner of laymen and by the civil laws, according to ch.2 De Iudiciis. And therefore only in respect of the Supreme Pontiff could this understanding of that text as to this part of it have place. Nor is the exposition to be despised that restricts the text to the Supreme Pontiff; for it does not say ‘without the permission of the bishop’ but ‘without the permission of the Pontiff’, which word is wont by antonomasia to be taken for the Supreme Pontiff, especially when ‘Pontiff’ is written in capital letters, as it is there contained in collect.1 of Antonius Augustus ch.3 of that title.

7. Hence it is manifest that any cleric can by license of the Supreme Pontiff renounce this privilege, as on that text is handed down by Panormitanus there n.11, who brings in that text in the same sense, and by the Gloss on the said chapter ‘Clericum’, the second, 11 q.3 at the word ‘Saecularem’. And therefrom it takes the argument that the Pope can delegate a spiritual cause to a layman according to ch. ‘Illud’ 10 q.3, and about the purgation of a bishop in a criminal cause; the same is taken from ch. ‘Mennam’ 2 q.5. And the reason is that the Supreme Pontiff has the power to make dispensation from any canon right, even a prescriptive one, and to determine or in part change a privilege conceded by divine right, because it does not, with respect to the Pontiff, include the precept that it never be changed. Again, because the Pontiff can commit his jurisdiction to a layman, especially in temporal causes, even if they pertain to the persons of clerics. However the Pontiff rarely does this, because it does not per se become the clerical state. Hence also it is clear that there must be a cause and a sufficiently serious one for the Pope rightly and legitimately to concede this faculty; for as to every dispensation from common right, so that it may be done rightly, a cause is necessary; therefore much more in this right which is a very serious one and has regard to the clerical state universally itself, and pertains to divine right, or is very close to it.

But one must note that in two ways can this faculty be conceded by the Pontiff. First per se and directly to the cleric himself with regard to his person and in his favor, and then is the faculty for renouncing the privilege properly given, and so power is not given to the secular judge to coerce a cleric but license to judge his cause, if he himself wishes to submit himself thereto. And in this respect a lesser derogation of the privilege is made, and thereupon too a lesser cause suffices on this head for a licit concession of this faculty; but, in another respect, making it honorable can be more difficult, especially in criminal causes, because it can be ordained only for private and personal advantage, and therefore a sufficient cause can with difficulty be had, and therefore rarely, as I think, is such faculty conceded. In another way this concession is made directly to a secular judge or prince by giving him power and jurisdiction with regard to the other and in his favor. And then there is indeed a greater derogation from the privilege, because then the judge can compel and judge not only a willing but also an unwilling cleric, and therefore a more serious cause is required. And therefore more frequently does it happen either on the occurrence of singular occasions or in certain privileges concerning more serious crimes, as lèse majesté; because such concessions are ordered for the common good and peace of the republic, and for the defense and fitting favor of certain princes; which causes do more frequently occur. But this latter mode of concession does not pertain to renunciation of the privilege, since in that case the will of the one with the privilege does not concur, but it pertains to taking away the privilege in some case or cause, which taking away, as I said in an earlier chapter, can be done by the Pontiff in punishment or hatred of some guilt, and it is not, according to ordinary power, otherwise done, because scarcely can another necessary or sufficient cause occur.

8. Finally one can ask with respect to this assertion whether some ecclesiastical community, or at any rate the whole ecclesiastical state, can renounce this privilege. And the reason for doubt can be that then the reason in the text of the said ch. ‘Si Diligenti’ ceases, and the general rule, that each can renounce a right conceded to him, proceeds. For this rule proceeds generally and without limitation in the case of any true or fictive person to whom the privilege has per se and first and, as it were, adequately been conceded, as I assume from the material of De Legibus. But this privilege has been conceded to the clerical state, as is said in the said ch. ‘Si Diligenti’; therefore the whole body of the clergy can, after the manner of one person, renounce this privilege. But, in the first place, this reason does not proceed of any private ecclesiastical community at all, whether it be the community of one church, or of one diocese, or of one metropolis, or of one province or kingdom; because none of these communities is, so to say, the adequate subject of this privilege, but is compared to the whole body of the clergy as a part, and accordingly as a particular person in its own order. Therefore about any community of this sort it is certain that it cannot renounce this privilege, because in its case proceeds the reason of ch. ‘Si Diligenti’, and consequently the decision as well.

But about the whole body of the clerical state the difficulty posited does proceed, and it seems it must be reduced to this question, whether a General Council could renounce this privilege, because in a moral sense there seems to be no other way capable of being thought of whereby the whole clergy of the Church could gather together or convene in agreeing to this sort of renunciation. About a General Council, then, I say briefly two things. One is that a General Council without the Pontiff, that is, without his faculties and approbation, cannot renounce this privilege. This is certain for many causes. First because a General Council can do nothing without the approbation of the Pontiff, by whose authority it must be brought together and kept in session. But if it happen that when the Apostolic See is vacant a Council gather together (which ought not to happen except when, by reason of schism, the election of a true and certain Pontiff cannot otherwise be done), such a Council cannot change anything in the status of the Universal Church; and therefore much less could it renounce this privilege, and therefore not only could such renunciation be easily revoked by a future Pontiff but also it would from the beginning be invalid as having being done without power.

Second because such renunciation is contrary to the right of the Pontiff in a double way. For both is it against canon right passed or approved by Pontiffs, which no Council without the Pope can repeal, and besides it is against the jurisdiction of the Pope, for he would by such renunciation be deprived of that singular and supreme direct jurisdiction which he has over the whole clergy even in temporal matters. The third and best consideration, which solves the reason for doubt, is that this privilege was conceded to the clerical state by Christ himself, not by reason absolutely of such community, but insofar as it is the special family of Christ, the natural Son of God, as was seen above. And it is true in every way, whether this exemption be said to be immediately of divine right or by mediation of canon right; for each right, nay civil right too, has taken consideration of this fact in the whole ecclesiastical college so as to concede this privilege to it, and in this way has this right been introduced more in honor of the God Christ than for the advantage of men themselves. For that is why the emperor said in the law ‘Sancimus’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles.: “Why make we not a distinction between divine things and human things? And wherefore may a privilege in agreement with celestial favor not be preserved?” And in law ‘Generaliter’ Code. De Episcop. et Clericis: “For this reason we indulge them with this benefit so that, all other things left behind, they may hold fast to the ministries of the almighty God.” Because, then, the whole ecclesiastical college or a General Council cannot detract from the rights of Christ himself, nor take away those that have been introduced for the cult and honor of God, therefore it cannot renounce this privilege, just as also among men the family of a prince or a cardinal or a bishop cannot without his consent renounce a privilege conceded to the family itself for the special honor or decency of the Lord.

9. And hence we add further that even a Council along with the Pontiff, that is, with his consent and approbation, cannot renounce this privilege. This is sufficiently proved for me by the reason just made, that a privilege of Christ’s family, insofar as it is such, cannot be renounced by anyone without the consent of Christ himself. Nor will he be saying enough who says that, with the Pope consenting, Christ through his Vicar consents, because it is not likely that the power of the Pope is extended to giving this sort of consent in the place of Christ, because power was not given to him for destruction but for edification; but such a renunciation would be altogether for destruction. Hence here is a confirmation; for we were saying above that the Pope cannot revoke this privilege, because he cannot have a just cause or reason, and because it would be against the divine precept, at least in general, and therefore it would always be for destruction; therefore neither can he along with a Council make such a renunciation valid, nor interpret Christ as consenting to it; for the reason is the same and as to effect returns to the same point, and because the consent of the clergy itself can do very little in this respect, since the clergy is chiefly intended for the honor of Christ and the cult of God. Lastly too because what the Pope can do in the Church along with a General Council he can also do himself alone, because he is not of lesser power; therefore if he cannot by himself remove this privilege out of the way by means of abrogation, neither too can he along with a Council remove it by means of renunciation. But this is to be understood of complete or total renunciation; for in some particular cause or matter, with the consent of the Pontiff, it could be done, because a sufficient reason and cause could sometimes intervene for the purpose. Therefore, insomuch as we also said that this privilege can be restricted or lessened in some particular through the power of the Pontiff alone, therefore it could more easily be done by way of renunciation when the part itself which seems to be hurting yields its right; nay for this reason it is likely that then a lesser cause suffices.

Chapter 32. Whether the privilege of clerics can be lost or lessened by custom.

Summary. 1. The assertion is proved first of disuse. 2. It is proved second of custom proper. 3. First reason. 4. Second reason. Whether custom can prevail against canon right. Reason for doubt, and a confirmation. 5. Two ways are put forward by which some law can be abrogated by custom. 6. Unraveling of the doubt. 7. This immunity cannot be abrogated even partially by custom. 8. Objection. 9. Response. 10. Reason for the negative side. 11. Opinion of the author. 12. Response to the reason for the opposite opinion. 13. Objection. Response. It is rejected. 14. Custom cannot give prescription against immunity. Twofold reason. 15. Third reason.

1. I reply that the exemption of clerics can be lost or lessened by no custom. In order to get at the difficulty of this assertion, a distinction must be drawn between a custom proper against the privilege and disuse of the privilege; for each is wont to be included under custom broadly taken. Now, in the present case, it is certain that this privilege is not lost or lessened by a pure disuse that does not include the contrary use. The proof is that a privilege is not lost through disuse except by force of tacit renunciation or by reason of another prescription against the privilege; but neither of these ways has place here. The former is proved from what has been said, because in this privilege express renunciation has no place; therefore much less tacit renunciation; therefore disuse cannot work by force of tacit renunciation against this privilege. The proof of the second part is that if the disuse, to which the privilege seems to be prejudicial, is merely negative without any use contrary to the right of the second part, no prescription can be introduced, as I proved in the tractate De Legibus bk.8 ch.34, because it is contrary to the reason and definition of prescription; therefore neither in this way can disuse suffice in this case without a contrary use. Most of all, indeed, for the reason, which we are steadily proving in general, that no human prescription can prevail against this privilege.

The assertion, then, must be understood of a custom proper contrary to this privilege. And thus is it commonly received by the canonists on ch. 'Clerici' De Iudiciis, where Abbas n.5, Decius n.14, Riga on ch. 'Decernimus' De Iudiciis n.15, Probus on ch.2 De Probat. Where he extends the assertion to immemorial custom. The Rota also hands it down at title 'De Consuetudine' in Antiquit. decis.3 & 10, elsewhere 123 & 840. The same in Bartolus on law 'De Quibus' and following De Legibus n.5, Rochus Curtius on the last chapter De Consuet., and Gregory Lopez on law 2 title 2 part 1 n.6, Navarrus on ch. 'Cum Contingat' De Rescript. Remed first point, and Stephanus Aufrerus in tractate De Potest. Civil. on the ecclesiastical rules 1 & 2. But he adds there many limitations or exceptions which I omit, because I think that no exception proper is to be admitted, as will be clear from the discourse of this and of the final chapter.

2. Now the assertion is proved from the said ch. 'Clerici' De Iudiciis where it is said, although the canons hand it down generally: "So that in the case of any crime a cleric ought to be summoned before an ecclesiastical judge, no prejudice to the canons on this part ought to be generated by custom.” Where although the discussion seems to be only of the privilege of forum in criminal matters, nevertheless it is by everyone understood of the whole of ecclesiastical immunity; both because the reason in the text proceeds equally of any matter of this exemption, as Panormitanus and Decius have noted; and also because other canons speak of ecclesiastical liberty absolutely, as ch. ‘Cum Terra’ De Elect. where a certain custom is condemned “because it was redounding to the disturbance and ruin of ecclesiastical liberty.” The same can also be taken from ch. ‘Ad Nostram’ and ch. ‘Cum Inter’ De Consuetud., and it is noted by the last Gloss on the said ch. ‘Clerici’. Finally the assertion is proved plainly from the Authentica ‘Cassa’ Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., where any custom against ecclesiastical liberty is denounced as void and of no effect; which Authentica is taken from the constitution of Frederick, which Honorius III confirmed as “going to be for ever valid.” Hence the same Honorius in ch. ‘Noverit’ De Sentent. Excommunicat. excommunicates everyone who has acted to preserve customs introduced contrary to ecclesiastical liberty.

3. Now a reason for this assertion can in the first place be given from the foundation that this exemption is of divine right, against which no human custom can prevail. Because either that divine right is natural, and thus the custom contrary to it is unjust as being contrary to reason, and therefore it cannot introduce or take away right, according to the last chapter De Consuetud. But if that right is divine positive right, human wills or their actions, however much they are increased by time or number, cannot prevail against the will of Christ, or against what it itself has set up to remain. But although this reason be true, one must not insist on it alone, both so that the proof may on various heads be made certain and indubitable, and also because the cited canons point to another reason, which in the said ch. ‘Ad Nostram’ is explained in these words: “Paying attention to the fact that a custom which stands in the way of established canons ought to be of no moment, etc.” And the same is insinuated in the said ch. ‘Clerici’, when at its beginning is prefaced, “to be generally handed down in the canons etc.”

4. A second principal reason, then, is that such a custom is very much contrary to canon right, and therefore it cannot prevail against it, because an inferior cannot abrogate the right of a superior. But at once arises a difficulty, because custom is able to derogate from human right, as is a constant in the material of De Legibus; but the canons only establish a human right; therefore the fact that this custom is against the canons is not enough for it not to be able to prevail against the canons and to take away a right introduced by them. For if in other matters prohibited by canon right custom can do that, why not in this one? There is a confirmation too, that custom is sufficient for obtaining jurisdiction and so also for losing it, or even for introducing subjection, because these cohere with each other; therefore in this way could this custom also in the present case take away or lessen the exemption of clerics.

5. To explain the force of this reason, then, one must assume from the material De Legibus that there are two ways in which a derogation can be made from a human law or privilege through a contrary custom, namely either by way of abrogation or retraction of the law, or by way of prescription against the law or against the right conceded by it. Between these two ways various differences are wont to be established; but there are two that are of service for the present purpose. One is that derogation by way of revocation of the law can begin and happen little by little through acts that are bad and done in bad faith against the law; but prescription requires good faith, as has been noted, especially according to canon right. A second difference is that the derogation of a law, when it happens through custom in the first way, rests on the will of the legislator, which he changes either tacitly or expressly by consenting to the custom, and revokes his own law; but when derogation happens by way of prescription, it is not based on the special will of the legislator, whether express or tacit, but on some other positive right whereby such prescription has been conceded, as is declared extensively in bk.8 De Legibus.

6. First, then, the assertion is proved in various ways of the first kind of derogation. First, from this second difference or condition that is required for a custom to derogate from the law. For in the case of the present matter the consent of the Pontiff is necessary; but the Pontiff himself cannot without cause by his own will derogate from this privilege, as was shown above; therefore much less could custom do it by taking its force and efficacy from the will of the Pontiff, because such will cannot be presumed nor, if it were given, would it be enough. At least this reason does indeed have force as to the abrogation of the whole privilege, even if it not be done for the whole Church but in some province or diocese wherein such custom may be supposed; because in truth even a like abrogation of the whole of immunity in some place of the Church would be very injurious to the whole clerical state and scandalous to the Church, and it could not be for edification but for destruction; and therefore it is very likely that it cannot be done by the Pontiff even in this way, and we more certainly believe that God would not permit the Pontiff to do it.

But we add that although a case be imagined wherein, to avoid greater evils, the Pontiff could in some province permit this, nevertheless it can never happen by custom alone, because such custom is of itself very irrational and derogates much from divine right, and one can never presume that the tacit will of the Pontiff attends it; because in a matter so difficult and that can scarcely or not even scarcely be made honorable, the consent of the Pontiff cannot be presumed except with preceding knowledge of the cause and great deliberation; and therefore express consent will always be necessary, and then the abrogation for such a place will happen by that reason, not by reason of custom. However, this reason is not so compelling in the case of a derogation of immunity that is partial or is in some part of the matter, as in some act of jurisdiction, or in some tax etc., because this derogation can sometimes be done by privilege of the Pontiff, which is private law; but whatever can be done by human law can be introduced by custom and, where express will can be honorable and effective, even tacit will can be so.

7. Yet all the same the posited assertion proceeds also of derogation proper in a particular matter; for in this sense the rights and doctors are without doubt speaking, and therefore other reasons must be given on this point. One is that canon right, because of the gravity of the matter and for the greater security of immunity, not only prohibits any act at all that is contrary to it but also annuls every custom contrary to ecclesiastical liberty, as is clear from the cited decrees and from many others under the titles about the immunity of churches. But whenever a law not only prohibits an act but also annuls custom, it cannot be by custom detracted from, because the law itself precedes it, so to say, and removes from custom the force to detract from itself, otherwise the clause would be useless; which is something not to be said when very often, in laws both civil and canon, addition is made not only about past but also about future custom. For this reason the principle seems to be commonly received in the material De Legibus.

8. But a common reply can be made, that the very law which abrogates a future contrary custom is a human one; therefore it can be abrogated by a contrary custom, just as it can be taken away by a later written law; for the will of a prince is changeable, and therefore just as it can change by an express will so also by a later tacit one. Nor will the clause for that reason be superfluous, because it will at least be operative to make custom unable to prevail against such a law without the certain knowledge and sufferance of the prince; yet it will nevertheless prevail when that intervenes, because that knowledge and sufferance of the prince indicates a change of his will. Therefore in the present matter too custom will be able to prevail against the canons, that clause notwithstanding.

9. We reply to begin with that, on the admission of that general doctrine, the objection only proceeds of the possible; but of the fact the application is not right, because it is most certain that there never intervenes in this matter a tacit consent of the Apostolic See, by whose authority such a custom is prohibited by common right. The proof of the assumption is that the Apostolic See by its opinions or express edicts always resists these customs against ecclesiastical liberty, and in the Bull Coenae each year it revokes them or rather declares them of no effect; therefore the tacit consent of the Pontiff cannot be presumed. For although perhaps he is sometimes not ignorant that many things happen by custom against ecclesiastical liberty in some places that he does not punish but in some way tolerates, it is not for the reason that he consents but because he cannot more effectively resist them without danger of greater evil, and therefore he does not consent but permits.

Besides there is added another reason, that canon right not only prohibits customs against ecclesiastical liberty but also condemns them; which is a greater thing. For a law can prohibit a custom, not because the custom is in itself irrational, but because for other reasons it is expedient not to permit it, and then the custom can be said to be irrational because prohibited, and not prohibited because irrational; but sometimes the law prohibits a custom because it supposes it to be irrational; which it is reckoned to do whenever in prohibiting a custom it makes clear that it is irrational by adding that “it is a corruption” or that it is “against the bond of discipline” or that it is “an abuse” or something similar, as is clear from the whole title De Consuetudine. So canon right prohibits in this latter way customs against ecclesiastical liberty, as all take from ch. 1 De Consuetudine where Gregory says: “Customs that are discerned to be a burden for churches it becomes us to dismiss from our consideration,” that is, not to permit, or to dissolve and render of no effect, namely as irrational; for this is signified by the word ‘becomes’, because to tolerate them would be unbecoming. And in ch. ‘Ad Nostram’ at the same title such custom is said to be “little rational and opposed to established canons,” and that it accordingly has no solidity. Again, all laws contrary to ecclesiastical immunity are condemned as irrational, as is clear from the many decrees in De Immunit. Ecclesiar.; but the reason is the same about custom, for custom is on a par with law. At least indeed, according to doctrine, a received custom condemned by law can never prevail against law. Because, as custom derogates from law, it should be rational, according to the last chapter De Consuet., but every custom that law, especially canon law, condemns as irrational is to be held as really irrational, because the declaration of a law is authentic; therefore etc.

10. But in this reason, which in this matter is chief, there occurs a difficulty, because although with respect to a custom abrogating the whole exemption it would be very effective, because such a custom carries immediately on its face an absurdity and impropriety on account of which we said that such abrogation cannot be done even by written law, nevertheless it does not seem to proceed universally of every particular custom in one matter or cause, for this is not always irrational. The proof is that such derogation can often be justly and prudently done by written law; therefore it is a sign that the derogation itself is not irrational; therefore neither will a custom introducing it be irrational, because the custom possesses from the matter itself and from individual acts that it is rational or irrational. Hence such a custom will not be opposed by a positive right that declares or condemns as irrational a custom contrary to ecclesiastical liberty, because that right does not make the custom to be irrational but supposes it to be such, and therefore does it condemn it, as we said; therefore the right only falls on a custom that is in truth destitute of all reason. Hence it can happen that some custom, which at one time is irrational, can at another time, when things have changed, be by a sufficient reason made honorable. And likewise a custom that, with respect to the Church is as a rule irrational, can in some province have a special and sufficient reason; so for such time or such place such custom will not be reckoned condemned by a law speaking absolutely and generally; therefore the same can happen in this matter of exemption. And thus do many authors seem to think who approve and defend some customs contrary to immunity, especially Covarruvias in Practicis q.31, and Julius Clarus bk.5 last § q.36 n.3, Joannes Garcia De Nobilit. in gloss 9 n.44 and following, and many others who incline very strongly to this side, in order to protect certain particular customs of diverse kingdoms.

11. Nevertheless I think it must be said that every custom, whether general or particular, contrary to ecclesiastical liberty is irrational and in right condemned, and thereupon cannot in any respect derogate from the privilege of immunity. This opinion is commonly received by the theologians and jurists on the mentioned places, and it is plainly collected from the cited decrees. For they do not speak of a custom abrogating the whole immunity of clerics, or in the whole matter of it, or in all crimes, or in all civil causes, or any other like large part of the exemption; because never for many years have such customs been introduced or aimed at in Catholic kingdoms, nor were the authors of the canons ignorant of this fact. They are speaking, then, of particular cases, as will be clear to someone who attentively reads the texts themselves. And especially can be noted the complete reading of ch. ‘Clerici’, for it thus contains: “Clerics, in criminal causes most of all, can in no case be condemned by anyone other than by an ecclesiastical judge, even if the royal custom has it that thieves be judged by secular judges.” Where it is clear that the particular custom could not partially derogate from the universal privilege; but the reason is the same about other similar instances, because even in that particular custom some reason of decency could be considered. And this is very much confirmed by the various prohibitions that in the Bull Coenae are every year made against almost all the acts by which particular customs of this sort can be introduced, and the rights are renewed that condemn such acts and customs. Now the reason for this truth and for the said rights we will give by replying to the posited difficulty.

12. To the objection, then, the reply might in the first place be according to the opinion of some that a custom once condemned by a law cannot further prevail or be reputed rational because of some change of matter, or because of a new circumstance that has arisen by succession of time or in a diverse place. However this opinion taken generally is too rigorous and not necessary. But nevertheless in the present matter it is very probable, both because scarcely can a change be so great that it be fitting for the Church that there be such a lessening of or derogation from the exemption, and also because, although perhaps it be expedient in some place, it does not thence immediately follow that the custom there is rational; for since this privilege has been conceded to the whole college of clerics, it can come about that it is not expedient and that, in accord with right reason, a part be held, for the good of the whole, to suffer some disadvantage. And in addition because this matter is odious to laymen and so there is a moral danger that changes of this sort, or new reasons for making such custom honorable, may be thought up or exaggerated without sufficient cause. Nay, as experience teaches, in all the customs that jurists try to defend there is no real discovery of new reasons besides those that are either intrinsic to such matter or could easily be considered by the Pontiffs, which notwithstanding, they have, for graver reasons relating to the good of religion and pertinent to the avoidance of greater disadvantages for the clergy, judged such customs irrational; therefore never can any such custom be reckoned rational in a particular case.

This can also be further made plain by distinguishing between a derogation from, or lessening of, the exemption and the manner of introducing it by custom. For it can happen that some lessening of the exemption is expedient, and nevertheless the mode of introducing it by custom alone is not expedient, because of the moral dangers that we were just talking about. Just as sometimes it is expedient for clerics to contribute to certain common expenses of the citizens and yet, for avoiding excesses, Pontiffs have established that it not be done without consulting them; hence if it happen otherwise, it is not rationally done, even if the contribution itself seem to be rational. Thus therefore, although the lessening of exemption in some case or place will be rational, the custom will nevertheless be irrational, because the mode of introducing the derogation from the privilege is exposed to dangers and is, so to say, reckless, and it is as such deservedly condemned. Hence is easily solved a certain objection made above from an equivalence between law or privilege and custom; for it can happen that a superior could, by common right through a privilege or special law, make a derogation in some matter by common right and a derogation that could not agreeably be done by custom alone, namely because, in order for a derogation to be agreeably done, greater consideration and deliberation is necessary than is wont to exist in mere custom. And therefore in the Bull Coenae there is required in this matter the express and special consent of the Pontiff, because this is regularly given with greater deliberation or knowledge of the cause than is tacit consent.

A final reason for this part can be added, that every custom that is wont to be introduced against immunity is a custom of laymen, namely of princes or judges exercising acts of jurisdiction over clerics. But the custom of laymen, although it could derogate from civil right, cannot however do so from canon right, nor can it even inflict any damage on clerics; therefore neither can it derogate from this privilege. The minor is certain, because a custom cannot do more than a law, other things being equal; but the civil law cannot derogate from canon right, nor can it impose a burden on clerics or be prejudicial to them; therefore neither can a custom of laymen do these things. The proof of the consequence is that the custom of laymen is purely civil and rests on civil and temporal authority alone. Hence it is a common doctrine of the jurists that a custom of laymen cannot oblige clerics, and one may see it in Innocent in Rubric. De Consuetudin. n.6, and Panormitanus ch. 'Quod Clerici' De Foro Competent. n.2, in Felinus on ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae' De Constitut. n.100, Hostiensis in his Summa at the title De Consuetud. § ‘Et de Virtute’ at the verse ‘Sed Pone’, and in others referred to by Azor vol.1 bk.5 ch.18 q.12, who allege various rights that speak more about civil law or statute but are introduced by equivalence, as ch.1 dist.10 and the said ch. ‘Ecclesia’ De Constit.

They add besides that this proceeds especially when such a custom of laymen derogates from the liberty of the Church. Which fact is also noted by Bartolus on law 1 Code. De Summa Trinit., and law 2 Code. De Legibus, and law ‘De Quibus’ and following De Legibus, and it can, by argument from a special case, be proved from the last chapter De Vita et Honest. Cleric. where, in the special case in which clerics abuse the privilege of exemption and involve themselves in secular business for profit, the Pontiff permits them “to be of their resources subject to the statutes and customs of their fatherland, since in fact,” he says, “they are throwing away the clerical privilege;” therefore a custom cannot, outside this sort of case, be a burden on clerics. Nay I note that even in that case a Pontifical declaration and prohibition was necessary. I consider too as regard this effect that custom and civil law or statute are made equivalent.

13. You will say that it can sometimes happen that the custom may not only be that of laymen but also of clerics, as when they observe, not by coercion but voluntarily, a custom of laymen, by going to their courts or paying taxes or cooperating in other like things, for then the custom will be mixed or common to laymen and clerics, which has force also over ecclesiastics. To this Covarruvias on the said ch.31 concedes that the custom in that case, as far as it is from this chapter, can, if it is otherwise rational, make derogation from ecclesiastical liberty. But I judge, in the first place, that morally such a custom can scarcely be found, because although one or another cleric may sometimes voluntarily consent to these sorts of violence by laymen, it happens very rarely and can never be said to happen by way of custom. I add indeed that even if such a custom be imagined, the opinion of Covarruvias is in this respect false. First, because the consent of clerics can there do nothing; for it is a sort of private renunciation of the privilege which, as we said, is null and of no effect, and therefore it cannot have power to introduce a custom, as is rightly noted by Felinus above along with Paul de Castro cons.59. Second, because such a consent of clerics could never be attended by the express or tacit will of the Pontiff, without which the will of clerics, for however long a time it is in operation, cannot derogate from pontifical right; therefore neither can that mixed custom have this effect. The antecedent as to each part was made clear above. The consequence, however, is evident, because that which is added on the part of the clerics to that mixed custom cannot add to it any strength or efficacy. Wherefore when a mixed custom is said to be able to operate in the case of ecclesiastical persons or things, it must be understood of a custom that is not prejudicial to the sacred canons, or, if it is prejudicial, the Pontiff consents to it, at least tacitly; but in the present matter express consent would be necessary, as I said above. Both because the Pontiffs themselves have so wished and declared, and also because in this matter tacit consent cannot be presumed, because it is both very odious to Pontiffs and such tacit consent could scarcely be prudently and licitly given without greater knowledge of the cause, but whenever consent would not be prudent and honorable it is not in a prince presumed.

14. But because this consent is not necessary in the abrogation of a law when it happens by way of prescription, therefore the other member which we proposed above remains to be proved, namely that even by way of prescription a custom cannot work prejudicially against ecclesiastical liberty. Now the proof is first that a prescription will be made by no custom unless good faith intervenes, as I now assume; but here good faith cannot intervene; therefore neither can there be a prescription. The proof of the minor is that such a custom is irrational and condemned by canon law; which fact is so evident that secular princes or judges cannot under pretext of probable ignorance be excused; therefore the acts of such a custom are always illicit and accordingly done in bad faith; therefore they cannot introduce a prescription. Second, because no exemption can be lessened in part unless some jurisdiction over a cleric accrues to a lay judge, and consequently unless there is a lessening of jurisdiction in someone else; so, conversely, exemption cannot be diminished on the part of a cleric without jurisdiction being increased on the part of a secular magistrate. But laymen cannot by mere prescription acquire jurisdiction over clerics; therefore neither can clerics lose anything of their privilege on account of prescription by laymen. The proof of the major is first from the common opinion of jurists, who say that laymen cannot give prescriptions in spiritual things, or what concerns spiritual things insofar as these are connected with them, as that a layman cannot prescribe the right of conferring a benefice or the like things that are noted by Panormitanus on ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis n.22, and Decius on that place n.12, and Joannes Andreas on ch.2 De Praebend. on 6, and others on ch.2 De Poenitent. et Remiss. on 6. Which text is wont for this purpose to be introduced insofar as it says that the faculty of choosing a confessor cannot be acquired by prescription; for the reason seems to be the same about other spiritual things and, in the present case, about jurisdiction over a cleric, which, although it seem in itself to be temporal, concerns, insofar as it falls on a cleric, spiritual things.

Now the reason that can be given is either the same as was touched on, that acts precedent to such prescription can never be done in good faith, or it is that prescription requires a person capable of the thing that he ought to prescribe, but a layman is not capable of administering spiritual things or persons, and therefore he cannot by prescription acquire a right over them; which reason is touched on by Panormitanus above. But the right should not be understood of capacity absolutely but according to ordinary right; for a layman is not altogether and absolutely incapable of any ecclesiastical administration or power over a cleric. But by common right and ordinary power a layman is reckoned incapable, because he has of himself no proportionality and all the rights exclude him, and therefore mere prescription does not suffice without the express will and concession of the Supreme Pontiff. And in these cases rightly do the jurists say that many things can be conceded by privilege that cannot be prescribed by custom, by the argument of ch. 'Quanto' De Consuetudine.

15. Hence too a third reason can be added, that any prescription requires the support of a right, whereby in some way a prince concedes either dominion over the thing to be prescribed or jurisdiction over it, if it is in need of being prescribed, because the change or acquisition that happens in a prescription cannot be done without the authority or will of some superior. But in the present case there is no right that provides support for such prescription; for civil right can do nothing here and canon right altogether resists it and the will of the Pontiff is in every way opposed to it; therefore prescription has no place in the present matter. From what has been said, therefore, it is sufficiently clear that no custom, even if it be immemorial, can in any way prevail against ecclesiastical immunity. For thus do the authors cited interpret the conclusion, and the reasons and rights adduced confirm it in the same sense, and the difficulties that can occur against it are, by proof of the assertion, dispensed with. There are only objected certain special customs of some kingdoms which, although they be against ecclesiastical immunity, are observed without scruple by lay magistrates. But to them we might respond in one word, that those customs pertain not to right but to deeds of men, which cannot make us deny the truth, nor are we bound to give reason or excuse for them, but this concerns those who observe those customs; however perhaps in the last chapter we will add a few things about them.

Chapter 33. In what ways ecclesiastical immunity can be violated.

Summary. 1. The violation of ecclesiastical immunity is per se evil, and accordingly is a grave sin; it is against justice; it includes the guilt of sacrilege. 2. Twofold way of violating immunity. 3. When striking a cleric is contrary to the privilege of forum. 4. Ways common to the laws as well as to men's deeds of violating this privilege. 5. When ecclesiastical liberty is indirectly violated. 6. First opinion. 7. The contrary opinion is chosen by the author. 8. Satisfaction is made to the foundations for the opposite opinion.

1. Hitherto we have tried, according to our powers, to explain all the things that seemed useful for explaining and guarding ecclesiastical immunity and the exemption of clerics; now only two things remain to be treated of. The one which we have proposed is what ways this immunity is wont to be violated; the other is in what ways this crime is wont to be excused. About the first we suppose that this sort of violation is of itself evil and is of its kind a grave sin, because it is either immediately against divine right or at any rate against canon right prohibiting this violation under very grave censures and penalties. And it is also, once that right is in place, against justice, because it is both a usurpation of a jurisdiction not possessed and a sort of coercion or exaction under title of legitimate power without any jurisdiction or power having been produced. Next it also includes the guilt of sacrilege, because the injury concerns sacred persons or matter, and because the prohibition has been made in view of religion and of the divine cult. About this guilt, therefore, nothing remains to be said as to its species and seriousness; for on the supposition of the things that have been said hitherto about the right of this immunity, the seriousness and species of the guilt are plain, provided it is clearly about the violation of immunity. But because this violation can be done in various ways, and in some of them the transgression or the reason of the violation can be obscure, therefore we must say a few things about this variety that can exist in the ways of violating liberty. And because sometimes an action which seems to be against ecclesiastical liberty is wont to have some true or pretended excuse, therefore we will consider some things about these excuses in the following chapter. Now the consequence would appear to be that we should explain the penalties and censures that are incurred by this transgression; but because we spoke sufficiently about them in our book De Censuris, we will abstain from treating of them in the present work.

2. First, then, we can distinguish two ways in which the immunity of clerics is wont to be violated, namely either by laws or by actions; for many rights mark out these two ways and punish them with diverse penalties. The first is when princes or magistrates make civil laws or statutes contrary to ecclesiastical liberty. Which also can happen in two ways. First because a law is specifically directed at ecclesiastical persons or things or, although the law be made generally, it is extended to them in particular. For such a law is by that very fact repugnant to ecclesiastical liberty, even if what it disposes is not contrary to the advantages of the Church; nay even if such disposition of law would be otherwise rational and agreeable to the Church, provided it were passed with due power. Thus is it taken from ch.2 De Iudiciis and ch. 'Ecclesia Sanctae Mariae' and ch. 'Quae in Ecclesiarum' De Const. and ch. 'Bene Quidem' along with others dist.96, and it is the common resolution, as was touched on above, and is rather extensive in the material De Legibus. And the reason is that a lay prince, when passing such a law, is through it showing himself to be a superior and a legislator in ecclesiastical things; therefore by that very fact he is through such deed acting contrary to exemption. And because this contrariety consists not so much in the object of the law as in the very act of prescribing it, therefore can this way be called contrary in its form to ecclesiastical liberty. For that reason too this way of injuring has no place when a layman concedes a privilege to clerics, because such privilege does not include a precept with respect to the privilege, nor is it per se an act of jurisdiction, as we said above.

But other laws there are which can be called contrary to ecclesiastical liberty in their object, because they prescribe something to be done which is contrary to the ecclesiastical state or its exemption, whether the precept be directed to laymen with respect to clerics as, for example, by commanding them to exact tax from clerics or something similar; or whether the laws are directed to clerics themselves, by bidding them to pay a tax or to appear before a lay judge, and then the law can be said to have each repugnance, both of form and of object. And these sorts of laws, which are in their object contrary to ecclesiastical liberty, are chiefly prohibited and punished in right, especially in ch. 'Noverit' De Sentent. Excommunicat. and in Authentica 'Cassa et Irrita' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles., although that and similar rights, because their words are general, can rightly be extended to all laws that are contrary to liberty in any way at all.

3. But about the other member of violation against immunity, through men's deeds, there only occurs to be noted that under it are not now included beatings or manual violence against a cleric; for although those actions are contrary to immunity taken generally, they are not against the privilege of forum, of which we are now treating, but against the privilege of the canon. Which however must be understood of those actions insofar as they consist in mere violence or private injury; for if they are done under the title of jurisdiction and public power, they will be against the privilege of forum and will have both kinds of malice, as when a secular judge or his minister detain a cleric by force and put him in chains or in prison. And the judgment is the same, saving proportion, about actions against the immunity of churches insofar as they are places of refuge, or insofar as they are sacred places, which ought not by injury or unfitting actions to be violated; for if such actions are done, not under title of jurisdiction, but by private injury or malice, although in an extended sense they are contrary to immunity, nevertheless they are sacrileges of another nature, as we said at the beginning of this matter. Therefore all deeds whereby ecclesiastical liberty is properly harmed are reduced to two heads, namely to legal proceedings and court actions, both civil and criminal, that are exercised in respect of clerics as defendants, and to exactions of taxes or coercive acts that are done to the same persons by imposing on them certain public burdens. And in this way these two types of actions are with special penalties and censures wont to be punished in right, at the titles De Immunitate Ecclesiarum, but especially in the Bull Coenae clauses 15, 18, & 18.

4. Second must be distinguished two other ways of violating ecclesiastical liberty that can happen both in laws and in deeds, but they are especially wont to be observed in the passing of civil laws contrary to ecclesiastical liberty. The first mode is when something directly and manifestly is done or disposed against the exemption of clerics, and in this way nothing needs to be added because it can both be easily cognized and is especially condemned in right. For it is committed as it were by express contradiction or opposition to the law that bids such exemption to be preserved. As when a civil law gives direct prescription to clerics or commands them to be included in taxes, or if a lay judge commands a cleric to be cited to appear before him, and thus in other cases. The other way is by indirect violation, which is both more difficult to cognize and its malice is more obscure. It does, however, have a foundation in the right at the last chapter De Immunit. Ecclesiar. on 6, where it is said that those secular magistrates incur excommunication who command their lay subjects not to sell to clerics or to buy from them, or not to grind corn for them or furnish them any similar services; and the reason is given “that such things are presumed in derogation of ecclesiastical liberty.” Through which words is made clear that it is an indirect violation of ecclesiastical liberty, because although such statutes or precepts were not as to their words directly ordered against clerics, yet as to their intent and effect they were fraudulently, as the Gloss there says, making a transition from person to person, speaking to a layman and oppressing a cleric. A like decision is in ch. ‘Quanto’ De Privileg. where it is said about certain people who, although they could not excommunicate monks, were excommunicating those who communicated with monks: “Keeping not the force and power of privileges but the words, they in some way excommunicate monks when they prohibit others from communicating with them.” And thus are similar things there said to be a fraud against privileges, where the discussion is not only about the privilege proper of ecclesiastical immunity, but more broadly about any privilege at all, but the definition has place a fortiori in the present case.

5. Therefore this fraudulent and hidden injury against ecclesiastical liberty we call indirect, and it can be described as that which is done by words or actions that, although they deal directly with lay persons, are nevertheless ordered toward oppressing clerics; or it can more universally be said that a violation is done indirectly when it does not appear in the words but is done in the thing itself. Just as someone is said to violate a law indirectly who while embracing the words of the law strives against the will of the law, as is said in the last rule De Regulis Iuris on 6, and in law ‘Contra Legem’ and following De Legibus, and in law ‘Non Dubium’ Code. De Legibus, because the force and power of a law is placed more in the will of he who command than in the words. Now this fraud or indirect oppression can be done in many ways that do not seem able to be comprehended in a definite number, because they can easily be multiplied by human sagacity and malice, and therefore a prudent court, taking the circumstances into account, must discern whether they are morally equivalent to direct oppressions. And as to the forum of conscience, this can depend much on the intention of the one who is acting or giving the command; for if he do it so that what he is directly forbidden to do with respect to the person of a cleric he achieves, even against the will of the cleric, by that circuitous route, the sign of an indirect violation is considerable.

6. But in order to explain further this indirect violation and its malice, one can ask whether this is a true and really subsistent violation of ecclesiastical liberty participating in a malice of the same reason and kind; or whether indeed it is merely presumed, because it appears such from the external circumstances although, if a wicked mind or intent be lacking, it is not such in fact. For this latter part seems to be taught by Cajetan in his Summa at the word 'Excommunicatio' ch.31; for he says that then a civil law is against ecclesiastical liberty when it aims per se and by intent against it, because will and intent distinguish evil deeds, and what is accidental does not fall under art. Now to explain when a civil law is such he adjoins that it is not difficult for those who know that "to be per se is the same as to be of its own nature and intent;" which he makes clear with examples when he says: "Like slander against reputation, insult against honor, homicide against human life, making statutes such that tithes or alms are not given to clerics, that they cannot be judge in ecclesiastical causes, that they pay taxes from what is, apart from business, their own, and the like, are against ecclesiastical liberty." All which examples, if one rightly considers them, pertain to direct opposition and violation against ecclesiastical liberty, and thus Cajetan indicates that only that law is per se and of its own nature against ecclesiastical liberty which makes a disposition directly against it. Hence at the same word ch.37 he says that actions prohibited in the same last chapter De Immun. Ecclesiar. on 6 are not properly against ecclesiastical liberty, but against human society; because, however, they are done in hatred of the Church, they are presumed to be done against ecclesiastical liberty.

This opinion is also followed by Navarrus in his Summa ch.27 nn.119 & 120. Their basis is, first, that the said last chapter uses the word 'presume' when it says: "Since such things are presumed in derogation of ecclesiastical liberty." Second, that since the action itself or the words of the law do not directly injure liberty, the transgression and derogation depend on the intent of the doer; for if he do it with a mind to oppress clerics, it will be a violation of liberty; but if he do it for his own advantage, permitting others to be oppressed, it will not be against liberty, although sometimes it could be against charity or against human society. Since therefore one cannot be certain about intent, neither too can a violation of ecclesiastical liberty be judged with certainty but at most presumed, insofar as such intent could be presumed from the external circumstances. Hence according to this opinion, if it happen that the truth is not subject to presumption, there will in conscience be no violation of liberty.

7. Nevertheless I judge the opposite opinion true which is openly held by the Gloss, there commonly approved, on that last chapter and on the said ch. 'Quanto', where Panormitanus speaks well. It is also taken from the common opinion of Bartolus in Authentica 'Cassa' Code. De Sacrosanct. Eccles. and of others who say that every disposition of civil law whereby clerics are made more fearful is against ecclesiastical liberty, not merely by presumption, but truly and properly, as we have explained above. Now the proof is first from the said ch. 'Quanto' De Privileg. where it is not said that the like opinions or dispositions of laws are presumed but are frauds against privilege, and that the words of privilege are by them preserved but not the force and power; therefore, if it is not preserved, the force and power of privilege is violated; but this is a true and not a presumed violation. Hence I argue, second, from the general principle of the law 'Non Dubium', where the Pontiff bases himself on that text. "There is no doubt that he engages against the law who, having embraced the words of the law, strives against the will of the law," where is not said that he is presumed to engage against the law but that it is certain he engages against it, as is also said in the last rule of right, on 6; but to engage against the law is to sin or act against the law, as is clear from the propriety of the Latin word and from the glosses, and from the common exposition of the cited jurists, especially from Bartolus on the said law 'Non Dubium'. Nay the Gloss adds on ch 'Si Postquam' De Elect. on 6 at the word 'Mente', that he who engages against the law by fraud or under the cover of the words is punished with the same penalty as he who openly and directly acts against the law; therefore, in the same way, he truly and properly violates the law or privilege of immunity who indirectly violates it because he acts to defraud the privilege, as is said in the said ch. 'Quanto.' Third, there is the proper reason that in morals an indirect will is reduced to a direct one and shares in the same kind of malice, as is the first principle in moral matter; for direct and indirect voluntariness are reduced to the same, as that not to prevent harm when you can and should is the same as directly harming; and so in other cases. Thus therefore it matters little in the present case that the violation is indirect if in fact it has the same effect. There is a confirmation too, that otherwise the privilege would either be useless, or at least greatly diminished, if that were licit in an oblique way (so to say) which directly and simply is prohibited by the privilege.

8. To the foundation for the contrary opinion about the word 'are presumed', which is used by the said last chapter, one can reply first that sometimes that is called presumption which is done under some fraud or pretense, even if it is truly done and not merely presumed to be done. But second and better is said that the word 'presume' there does not signify a judgment or suspicion that is made about such deed from conjectures about it, but signifies a way of acting with sure knowledge and deliberation, or with a certain arrogance and rashness of mind. For the use of this word in this meaning is very common in canon right, and so is it taken in that text; nay twice is it there taken in the same signification, first in narrating the fact, at the place: "Or they presume to take away other services," and again in giving the reason for the right or for an already declared excommunication, at the place: "Since such things are presumed in derogation of ecclesiastical liberty," that is, not presumed by the right but by those who presume to do or prescribe such things, just as was said before. Hence that text thus expounded confirms rather what we said; for such things are punished as done truly and from presumption against the liberty of the Church. There can also be added that, although it not be of itself a true violation of ecclesiastical liberty, it was, by the force of the text prohibiting it, a true violation of liberty. But although this be ex hypothesi truly said, I do not simply judge that the like actions are against ecclesiastical liberty because they are there prohibited on account of their danger and presumption, but rather, on the contrary, I judge that they are there prohibited under special censure because in truth they are of themselves violations of ecclesiastical liberty; for this reason is given there, and it is assumed to have subsisted in fact before that law.

To the second I reply that just as Cajetan in the cited place rightly said about direct violation that it does not depend on the intent of the actor but of the act, so too must it be said of indirect violation. For if a civil legislator pass a law that is in truth against ecclesiastical liberty, at least indirectly, although he not intend the harm of clerics but his own or his citizen's advantage, he sins against ecclesiastical liberty because, as I said, in moral matter the reason about the direct and indirect is the same. But if a civil legislator imposed directly such a burden, he would act against ecclesiastical liberty; therefore it is the same though he indirectly do it. Wherefore it cannot be said to be merely a permitting, because a civil magistrate is simply bound to avoid such oppression of clerics. Otherwise if, in the case of the said last chapter, laymen were to prohibit those actions not with the intention of oppressing clerics but for their own advantage, they would not act against liberty nor incur the censure, which is absurd.

But to understand better this indirect violation of immunity one must note that it does not differ from direct in its matter; nay that it is necessary that it deal with the same matter, namely matter prohibited by immunity; so that the difference is only in the manner, for in one violation the action or the law aims right at the person of the cleric, but in the other, namely the indirect, only circuitously. But if however one takes careful consideration, it always reaches the person, at least obliquely, as when a law prohibits a layman from selling necessities to a cleric, etc. Nay, although as to the obligation of the law the cleric is not directly imposed upon, as to the effect it so redounds on him that either it directly effects such an effect, if it is burdensome, or it unduly impedes him, if it is due and favorable. Just as someone who impedes another not to communicate with me directly deprives me of communication with him, or at least unjustly impedes it; and just as someone who prohibits or detains a notary not to be present at the making of a cleric's will impedes a cleric sufficiently directly that he cannot make a will; and many like things in the Glosses and the laws can be seen treated of that are comprehended under the general rule: "Whom the law speaks to does not matter, but toward whom the intent of the law is directed," law 'Cum Pater,' § 'Donationis' and following De Legat. 2.

Chapter 34. In what ways actions against ecclesiastical liberty are wont to be excused, and what judgment should be made about them.

Summary. 1. Six ways in which the violation of immunity is excused. 2. Ignorance the first excuse for violation. Twofold ignorance: of right and of fact. 3. Whence comes ignorance of right. 4. A second excuse for violation, necessity. 5. What should be thought about this excuse. 6. Conclusion: a cleric cannot be judged by a layman if he cannot be prosecuted by someone his superior. 7. Third excuse for violation, custom. 8. Custom does not excuse an act done against immunity. 9. How those who take forbidden weapons from clerics are excused. 10. In what way is excused the custom of apprehending clerics discovered in committing transgression. 11. Another way of defending this custom. 12. Whether immemorial custom is a sufficient sign of a privilege conceded by the Pontiff. 13. A custom founded on privilege can be revoked by the Pontiff. 14. Fourth excuse for violation, mutual agreement. 15. Agreement between ecclesiastics and seculars may not derogate from immunity in any way without the Pontiff's authority. 16. An agreement confirmed by the Pontiff is valid and sufficient. 17. Objection. It is solved. 18. The agreement of an inferior prelate with a layman, when done without concession of jurisdiction, is valid. 19. Fifth excuse for violation, privilege. 20. Whether any unrevoked privileges against immunity stand. Reason for doubt. 21. Opinion for the negative. 22. The last excuse for violation is just defense. 23. A twofold condition is absolutely required for this excuse. 24. This defense is almost always exercised through use of jurisdiction by laymen. Two evasions are refuted. 25. A defense of the spiritual power which includes usurpation is not to be admitted. 26. Whether this defense is licit by canon right. First opinion. 27. It does not have foundation in canon right. Satisfaction is made to the rights adduced for the opposite. 28. Canon right does not approve this mode of defense. 29. The evasion of others. 30. Sum of the whole of the fourth book.

1. Since lay magistrates and judges are frequently wont to invade ecclesiastical immunity, they have thought out various reasons whereby they may be able to make their actions honorable and to excuse them from the crime of sacrilege and injustice, which I have thought necessary to put forward and examine at the end of this book. Now I find six such excuses, which are ignorance, necessity, custom, pact or agreement, privilege, and just defense; which must be discussed one by one.

IGNORANCE

2. About the first excuse of ignorance it is necessary to say little because properly speaking it is not among the things that we are now inquiring into. For in two ways can excuse be thought of in these sorts of actions which seem to injure ecclesiastical liberty. First, so that it be such excuse as renders the action in itself licit and valid, and that it be as it were a sort of exception to the general privilege of exemption; in another way an excuse can be such as to suffice to excuse a person from guilt, although the action itself, considered in itself, is evil insofar as it is contrary to privilege. Here, then, we are particularly inquiring into the first kind of excuse, and in this way ignorance is ruled out, because although sometimes perhaps it could free the doer from guilt, nevertheless it does not give jurisdiction and thus it does not render the act in itself either licit or valid. Now in the way that ignorance can prevent guilt, the excuse is general to all offenses and almost nothing special is left to be said about it in the present case. For a twofold ignorance can here intervene, one of fact, the other of right. The first can happen in two ways, first from ignorance of the person whom the act concerns, as when a layman seizes or judges a cleric thinking him to be a layman. And this kind of ignorance can sometimes excuse from guilt, because it can be invincible; but whether it be so in a particular case will have to rest on the confession of the party or the penitent, and judgment will have to be made from the circumstances that are proposed by him. But in a case of doubt whether such and such person is to be considered ecclesiastical or not, whether he is to enjoy clerical privilege or whether cognizance of such and such case pertains to a lay or to an ecclesiastical judge, is treated of by the jurists, to whom this matter pertains. However the true resolution is that it pertains to an ecclesiastical judge, because the matter of that court is ecclesiastical, as is defined in ch. 'Si Iudex' De Sentent. Excomm. on 6, where almost everything that should be done in a like case of doubt is laid down; and one can look at the things that Covarruvias extensively treats of in bk. Practicar. Quaestion. ch.33.

Another mode of ignorance can be about the matter itself that the action or the court concerns, because it is not judged to be ecclesiastical or spiritual, or is not believed to pertain to exemption. This ignorance, however, can sometimes be generated by mere lack of knowledge about the very matter that is being treated of, and then it is properly ignorance of fact and the same judgment must be made of it as of ignorance of the person, for the reason is the same. But sometimes the ignorance or doubt arises from the variety of opinions about the right itself, how there is often controversy among the doctors whether this or that action is against ecclesiastical liberty, or whether the taking cognizance of the guilt of perjury committed by a cleric giving testimony in a secular court belongs to the same secular forum or to an ecclesiastical one, and the like, doubt about which is reduced to ignorance of right.

3. About ignorance of right, then, one must note that sometimes it arises only from a defect in the person, as when it is clear that in the thing itself there is something included under the right of exemption but he who is acting contrary to it does not know that right, and so he violates exemption ignorantly. But sometimes the ignorance or uncertainty arises from the thing itself, because, that is, the right itself is in such wise hidden that even among experts and after diligent inquiry the right is doubtful and has been made a matter of opinion. When ignorance, then, is of right in the first way it can scarcely be accounted invincible, at rate in princes themselves and lay judges; both because from the force of their office they are required to know the right, or to abstain from these actions; and also because the supposition is that such right is sufficiently public and manifest; and therefore scarcely can it be believed that this sort of persons are ignorant of it invincibly but either from a very lazy negligence or, which perhaps happens more often, from affected ignorance, so that they may exercise the jurisdiction that they very much aspire to. Now I say ‘scarcely’ on account of the forum of conscience, for in the external and ecclesiastical forum such an excuse, as I think, will never be reckoned sufficient, although in the forum of conscience it can sometimes, according to the conscience of the actor and the occurrent circumstances, be admitted. I said also that this has chiefly place in princes themselves, or their counselors and judges, who can and should know the right, because inferior ministers can easily be excused by ignorance, according to the common rule ch. ‘Qui Culpatur’ 23 q.1. However, when the ignorance or doubt about right comes from the difficulty of the thing itself and from the variety of opinions, then, if there is nothing certain, the general rules about choice of opinion are to be observed; and in this matter it is very much to be observed that ecclesiastical immunity is more to be amplified in favor of religion, and consequently in favor of exemption, than restricted. And judgment must according to these things be made about the individual cases that are collected by Azor in vol.1 bk.5 chs.13 & 14.

NECESSITY

4. The second excuse, on the ground of necessity, is very ordinary in this matter and is founded on the principle that necessity knows no law. For it can happen that it be necessary for the common good of the republic to do something contrary to the immunity of the clergy; therefore in that case the right of immunity will not oblige. There is also a confirmation, because this right, at any rate as applied and determined to such matter and action, is not divine but human; but every human right, even if it be a canon right, can in a particular case through equity cease to hold because of a necessity that occurs, because of which it can happen that to keep human right in such case is contrary to natural right; therefore also in the present case. The best example is in ch. ‘Pervenit’ De Immunit. Ecclesiar. where it is said that in a time of great necessity clerics are not excused from taking watch on the city walls. And it is similar in the matter of taxes, when for the support of the common necessity laymen are not sufficient unless the clerics contribute. In the matter, too, of judicial forum a common example is wont to be when an ecclesiastical judge is deficient in his office and laymen and clerics are suffering great loss; for then because of necessity a lay judge can expedite causes even if clerics are defendants in them, as many interpreters of canon right have affirmed along with the Gloss on ch. ‘Filiis, vel Nepotibus’ 16 q.7, as it is wont to be treated of there and on ch. ‘Qualiter et Quando’ De Iudiciis. And this necessity can be particularly urgent if a legitimate ecclesiastical judge is altogether not to be found, as can often happen in the lands of heretics and schismatics.

5. Nevertheless, however, I judge that this excuse, morally speaking, is not necessary, at least within the Catholic Church. The proof of this assertion is first by a sort of induction, as it were, by running through the presented cases to which all others that can be thought up are reduced. For the necessity is either in the matter of taxes or in the matter or causes of the judicial forum. In the former matter it was shown above that clerics can never on account of necessity be compelled by laymen to pay taxes. For if sometimes they are bound to contribute or to undertake some work of common burden, it is not by force of the law imposing the taxes but by some obligation of charity or of common justice and according to the disposition of the canons. Hence in these sorts of cases clerics cannot be compelled to satisfy this obligation by secular judges but by their prelates, and in accord with canon right. But if the prelates themselves refuse to satisfy their function, one must, in order to compel them, have recourse to the Pontiff. But if there is peril in delay, because an extreme or grave necessity of the common good requires the help of clerics immediately, then it can be licit, not by way of jurisdiction, but by way of defense, which right reason has declared to be necessary for the aid of the common good and to prevent an imminent loss. And thus is the excuse in that case reduced to another, which is placed under the name of just defense, and it will be dealt with below and will be declared not to contain an excuse or exception proper in the general privilege, but to be another species of action not pertaining to privilege.

There is more or less the same reason about cases that occur in judicial matter; for in the first case it was shown in chapter 13 that a lay judge cannot, because of the negligence of an ecclesiastical judge, introduce himself into the causes of clerics, because it is manifestly repugnant to canon right. Nor does sufficient necessity arise from that negligence, for if an ecclesiastical judge was negligent, he has a superior by whom he can and should be corrected. But if the proximate superior is also negligent, one will have to have recourse to someone of the same order who is further away, and thus right up to the Roman Pontiff, in whom as in the supreme head one must come to a stop; for if he himself is negligent he must not be compelled by the king but requested, or warned with due submission, as was said at the beginning of the preceding book. Just as in a republic that is merely temporal and heathen, or as now in England, if the judges of the kingdom in one province are negligent in administering justice, the magistrates of another province cannot take over the courts in their territories so as to supply their negligence; and much less can inferior judges of the same province declare right about their own superiors or usurp their tribunals in the name of necessity, because it would be the height of confusion and an occasion for injury. Therefore it is necessary in that case to approach some superior magistrate or senate or, if it is not enough, to proceed to the king. But if the king himself is negligent, kings would surely not want inferiors subject to them to emend or usurp their courts. Why then do they wish secular judges to usurp to themselves ecclesiastical causes under the pretext of the negligence of ecclesiastical judges? Or why is negligence or iniquity in ecclesiastical judges more feared than in secular ones? Rather indeed, because the contrary is more to presumed and because in a Christian and Catholic republic ecclesiastical prelates are superior to lay judges or magistrates, therefore can prelates, according to the canons, supply the negligence of laymen, but not conversely, as was made clear in the same chapter 13.

6. But hence can we universally collect that a secular judge can never usurp jurisdiction over a cleric under pretext of necessity, as long as some ecclesiastical prelate, whether nearby or far off, can be approached. The reason is general because only necessity gives jurisdiction; but without jurisdiction a court cannot be taken over; therefore neither under pretext of necessity can anything be done against the privilege of forum of clerics. The consequence is plain, because exemption does not cease on the part of the cleric in any case unless the jurisdiction of a layman in the same case is increased. But the antecedent as to the first part is evident of itself, and the proof of the second part is that jurisdiction requires the superior power and will from which it proceeds; for although a man may need rebuke or punishment and a superior is lacking who could coerce him, not for that reason can any private person usurp jurisdiction over him, but at most are those things then licit which were necessary for just and moderate defense, otherwise there could not be peace and justice in human society. Therefore mere necessity as such never gives jurisdiction, and therefore neither does it suffice to excuse violation of immunity. But how it may suffice for just defense we will see below.

There remains only the case put forward in last place, when a cleric is living among pagans or heretics where there are no prelates or judges exercising true ecclesiastical jurisdiction. And in that case one must say, to begin with, that if that state is lasting and very general in some province, there must be consultation with the Pontiff, if it can be done, so as to provide a remedy, because he himself is supreme judge and another who is nearer is there lacking. But if either the case is particular and extraordinary or no place for consulting the Pontiff or for executing his mandates is given, then the case is reduced to terms of natural right or of the right of nations, and therefore it will be licit to use any honorable remedy at all in accord with right reason. Or it can also be said that then a cleric can be summoned before a lay judge by right of defense, because that is then a more pleasing way of defending oneself or of preserving one's right or of recovering or also of consulting the common good.

CUSTOM

7. The third excuse was custom, about which we said many things above, notwithstanding which, the doctors frequently try by this name alone to excuse diverse actions repugnant to exemption that are in use in various places, such as are to punish a cleric for the crime of lèse majesté; about which custom Julius Clarus gives witness, and he says that it can excuse through the ch. 'Perpendimus' De Sentent. Excommunicat. alleged above. Hence it seems that that custom is reduced to just defense because, since that crime aims at the death of the prince, it seems that by the right of defense a prince can through his ministers or judges kill the traitor. Another custom is wont to be referred to about a cleric who, when giving evidence before a secular judge, is convicted of perjury, so that he can be punished by the same lay judge when he himself is beforehand in knowledge of such crime; which custom is referred to as kept in Gaul by Covarruvias in Practica ch.18. n.8.

Another custom is said to exist in Gaul, namely that clerics are summoned in actions of real estate before a secular judge, which is defended by Joannes Garcia De Nobilit. gloss 9 n.49, along with Fabrus and others whom he refers to. And similar there is the custom that lay judges take cognizance of certain grave offenses against clerics.

Again, that clerics carrying forbidden arms, or at a forbidden time, may be deprived of them by a civil magistrate, has been received and is defended by custom, as one may see in Covarruvias in the said book Practicar. ch.33 near the end and bk.2 Var. last chapter at the end, in Julius Clarus above n.26, Salcedo in Practicar. ch.55. In Spain too clerical ministers of the king, who are of his council, are wont to be visited, inquired into, and punished for offenses and failings. And in many doubts and controversies between ecclesiastical and lay judges, or in causes in which subjects or vassals complain of being oppressed by prelates or ecclesiastical judges, the royal tribunals give indictments. Now these and many like things that the authors refer to are defended by custom alone, as one may see in Covarruvias above from ch.31 to ch.35, and Navarrus in ch 'Novit' De Iudiciis Notab. 3 n.31, and Azor vol.1 bk.5 chs.13 & 14.

8. Nevertheless one must say that this excuse of custom can never be sufficient, if the act is really against ecclesiastical liberty and the custom has been introduced by similar acts. This evidently follows from what was said in chapter 32, and it is thus commonly handed down by all the authors above mentioned. For custom can never derogate from or diminish the privilege of immunity, nor can it give jurisdiction to a layman over a cleric; therefore every act of jurisdiction that a layman exercises over a cleric by mere title of custom is an act done without jurisdiction; therefore it is a violation against ecclesiastical immunity; therefore mere custom never suffices to excuse guilt, or a violation of ecclesiastical liberty. Which reason, on the supposition of the said principle, is a moral demonstration, but the principle, as I think, has been sufficiently demonstrated. Hence all the canon rights, which say that this custom is a corruption and reject it as damnable, openly confirm this assertion as well. For a corruption and a damnable custom is nothing other than a frequency of sinning; but a subsequent sin is not excused because of the frequency of preceding sins, but is somehow increased by them. Wherefore the customs that are alleged are either to be excused by other titles distinct from custom or are simply to be rejected; for, on account of the deeds of men, divine or canon rights are not to be denied or corrupted with false interpretations. And thus the Rota, in decision 804, which is 10 De Consuetud., condemns among the ancients a certain custom which also flourished before the schism in England, namely that a king or his minister were judges of clerics in civil actions, even personal ones, and in criminal actions when the action was being handled in civil court. And the same is certainly also to be said about the Gallican custom that clerics are judged by laymen in actions about real estate, unless it is excused in some other way. And the same must be said about the like things, as is pursued extensively by Azor in the place cited.

Now there are two titles by which similar customs are wont to be excused. One is that the deeds or actions by which they are introduced and afterwards defended are not acts against ecclesiastical liberty, because they are not acts of lay jurisdiction over a cleric, but are acts of just defense either of the republic or of innocents; which defense is not against ecclesiastical liberty. According to which doctrine the action is not really excused because of custom, but rather the custom is excused because of the manner and title of the action, but the custom itself, after it has been introduced and is believed to have been kept by prudent and reverent men, at most indicates, and is an argument, that the actions were not those of usurped jurisdiction, and that accordingly they have become accustomed to be done by way of defense. And in this way this excuse is reduced to the last to be treated of below; and therefore now, on the supposition of that general doctrine, we only take note that it must be truly and appropriately applied to such matter or action, otherwise, if the matter is not capable of the defense that no violence is being done there, nor any moral danger thereof, it will be a fictive excuse and one only in name not really or in fact; it is necessary, therefore, that a cause and necessity of defense be supposed, and that in the defense itself due moderation be preserved, as will be explained below.

9. And by this title can in some way be excused that custom of taking away forbidden arms from clerics. For certainly if it is to be done by the use of jurisdiction, or some suit of punishment, I do not see how it could be excused, whatever Covarruvias and others may think. Which is in part the opinion of Navarrus Consil. 27, otherwise 44 De Excommunicat. n.5, insofar as he excuses this sort of deed by the fact that it is ordered toward preventing some offense, and he adds that sometimes it is done by way of agreement and convention between a cleric and the ministers of justice; for clerics are wont to hand over arms lest they be delated or denounced to their superiors and prelates. But if this is how it is, the violation of ecclesiastical liberty ceases, whatever may be true of the injustice or foulness of the agreement. But when arms are taken away only by way of defense, so as to take away occasion for strife or the danger of civil disturbance, then they are not taken away as a punishment; and therefore it does not seem licit, by force of such deed, altogether to despoil a cleric of arms by depriving him of ownership of them, because there appears no just title by which it could be done; therefore they ought only to be taken away on that occasion so as afterwards to be returned, unless the clerics voluntarily consent to giving them up, as has been said.

10. In this way too is a custom wont to be made honorable whereby ministers of secular justice are wont to detain and arrest clerics found in transgression, or whom they with probability presume are going to transgress, so as to present them to their prelates; for in no way can they do it by title of jurisdiction, as is clear from ch. 'Cum non ab Homine' De Iudiciis, and ch. 'Si Vero' De Sentent. Excommun., and ch. 'Si Clericus' De Foro Comp., and ch 'Si Clericus' De Sentent. Excommun. on 6. Hence by no custom can it be introduced so as in that way to make such a deed licit. But it is wont to be justified by way of defense, because it is very expedient to the republic that offenses be prevented, and this office seems especially committed to ministers of secular justice. And such is the teaching of Panormitanus on ch. 'Ut Famae' De Sentent. Excommunic. n.6, and on ch. 'Cum non ab Homine' De Iudiciis, where also Decius no.10 and Felinus there and on ch. 'Si Vero' De Sentent. Excom. n.2, and Navarrus in the said Cons. and in Sum. ch.27 n.83 and Julius Clarus, at the said last § q.28 n.6. The tacit will of prelates is also thought there to intervene, which custom can also interpret, and it can there suffice, because a commission of jurisdiction does not there intervene, but only a certain use of a deed whereby a prelate uses a minister of justice for arresting his delinquent subject, which can very well be done by the secular arm. Next, in this way under this species of defense other customs are excused, as excluding a cleric from the court of the king, or even from the kingdom, or other like ones, which it is not our purpose now to examine but the doctors mentioned can be looked at, especially Azor above and Enriquez bk14 De Irregul. ch.12 n.6 at letter P and following.

11. Another mode of defending this custom is by founding it on pontifical privilege. For there is no doubt but that the Pontiff can concede to some king or kingdom a special privilege derogating in part from the privilege of exemption, about which we will speak below. Therefore on the supposition of this privilege, the acts which are done from it are honorable, and so also the custom of them is honorable. But in that case the custom does not derogate from immunity but supposes it has been derogated from, and therefore it is not the custom that excuses but the privilege, about which I will immediately speak. Hence I do not approve what Navarrus says in the said Cons. 27 De Sentent. Excommunic. n.1, that the immemorial custom of Gaul, that a secular judge can punish a cleric, has the force of privilege, citing Aufredus in Clementina 1 De Offic. Ordinar. rule 1 deceit 10. For he insinuates that such custom can introduce a privilege, which in this matter I do not judge to be true, because if the custom is foul and condemned, even if it is immemorial, it cannot introduce a privilege, and therefore since in this matter the custom is condemned, as we said, even though it is immemorial, it cannot by its own force introduce a privilege, as is rightly said by Probus on ch.2 De Probat. and as think the other authors above cited. Therefore, in order for the custom to be honorable, the privilege must precede.

12. But one can ask whether immemorial custom is a sufficient sign or witness that it began from a legitimate privilege; for it seems very probable that thus must it be presumed, because an immemorial custom is presumed honorable, as many jurists have handed down, because since it cannot be proved evil it is presumed good. Nevertheless I think that a mere and naked custom, even an immemorial one, does not suffice in this matter to prove a privilege. Both because that rule does not proceed of a custom condemned by law, as Rochus Curtius and others have handed on when treating of custom; and also because this privilege is very hateful and difficult and is rarely conceded, and therefore, unless it be legitimately proved, it is not presumed; therefore mere use, however ancient, since it consists in a fact, does not sufficiently prove a right or privilege. But I am speaking about a naked and pure privilege, because if there be conjoined with it a constant reputation and a tradition equally ancient or immemorial that a privilege has preceded, and such tradition is completely proved, it seems sufficient for such a custom to be reckoned as a privilege.

13. But in such a case one must add that, notwithstanding the tradition and proof, such a custom can be revoked by the Pontiff. Both because the custom does not receive strength from prescription but from privilege, but a privilege given by a superior can always be revoked, especially for a just cause. And also because, although some prescription be admitted there, it cannot stand in the way of the Pontiff being able to revoke a jurisdiction received through the privilege and as it were prescribed by that custom, because the jurisdiction is always as it were delegated by the Pontiff, and consequently it depends on his will. Again, because no one can prescribe against the Pope in things that pertain to his supreme power. For as Innocent rightly said on ch.2 'De Postulatione Praelator' n.2: "because the Pope can do everything in his spiritual power and has the fullness of power, no one can ask for a possession that may be prejudicial to him, since he has it from the Lord alone." And the same is taught by the Gloss on ch. 'Cum Nobis' De Praescript. where Panormitanus nn.1 & 12 very much commends it, and on ch. 'Si Diligenti' at the same title n.11. But the Pontiff by force of his spiritual power, which he has received from Christ, can either preserve the exemption of clerics or restore it if it has been in any part diminished, and therefore he can always revoke any custom contrary to it at all, however it was introduced, because that power, which was conceded by the Lord, can be diminished by no custom, nor can the Pontiff himself remove it from himself.

MUTUAL AGREEMENT

14. The fourth excuse was mutual agreement or pact. For lay judges are wont to defend some of their actions against immunity by title of some ancient agreement transacted between kings and prelates or clergy, whereby it was conceded to secular judges to be able in such causes or occasions to exercise their jurisdiction about ecclesiastical matter. And I see this title often mentioned in this kingdom [of England], and we know that in the kingdom of Gaul similar concordats were made at the time of Leo X and Francis I, which are outlined by Rebuffe; and in the kingdom of Spain and in others we know that they are desired for avoiding the disturbances that are wont to arise between secular and ecclesiastical judges.

15. Now about this excuse one must note in the first place that whenever this sort of agreement is made between bishops, even gathered together in a provincial or national council, and kings or senates, it can do nothing against the privilege of immunity unless it has been made or confirmed by the authority of the Pontiff. Thus did Rebuffe note in Concordat. title 'De Approbat. Conventor.' at the word 'firmitatem'. But the reason is manifest from what was said above, that the consent of bishops is not sufficient for dispensing or conceding a privilege whereby the exemption of clerics is lessened; because an inferior cannot dispense nor concede a privilege in the right of a superior, especially when it is so serious and so difficult and rarely has dispensation, as we showed above about this privilege; therefore the consent of prelates can only operate by way of a renunciation whereby they cede their right in some respect; but yet such a renunciation made by their own authority is not valid, as was also above proved; therefore neither can that agreement be valid which has even with an inferior cleric been made by the sole authority of prelates.

Nor does it matter that it does not seem to be a simple renunciation but is as it were an exchange made by way of transaction. Both because by that transaction is never supplied in the exemption itself a diminution that happens in some part of its matter, nor is some new right conceded to the ecclesiastical state, but it is ordinarily wont to be made by ecclesiastics to escape vexation or avoid greater evil, so that seculars, being content with that part, may not usurp a greater. Which certainly ought not to be done against the common good; but if it is done, whether with guilt out of human fear or without guilt because of need to avoid greater evil, it will rather be a sort of toleration or permission than an agreement, even if perhaps it be called by this name; and therefore it does not render secular judges safe in conscience until the consent of the Pontiff, legitimately informed, accedes to it. And also because, although we imagine that some right or advantage is bestowed on the clergy by secular princes, so that they might cede their right in some part of the exemption, even in this way a private prelate or a particular clergy cannot in anything renounce the exemption, as if by alienating a part of it by way of exchange; and because this too is against the common good of the clerical state, in whose favor exemption was introduced; and also because it is a certain alienation of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which is rightly counted among ecclesiastical goods, and therefore it is rightly included under the prohibition of alienating ecclesiastical goods.

16. But when the consent of the Supreme Pontiff accedes, there is no doubt but that such an agreement is valid and that consequently it introduces a sufficient excuse.

But one must consider that this approval of the Pope has the force of a certain privilege, as was noted in a similar case by Rebuffe in Concordatis title 'De Approbatione Conventor.' at the word 'privilegiis'; and it is per se manifest that, even if it be done by way of contract, it is a special favor, permanent and stable, along with a certain derogation from common right. Wherefore this excuse is reduced to the following one about privilege; hence, just as we shall say there that a privilege can be revoked by the Pontiff, so must it be said about any similar agreement confirmed by the same. For although, after the confirmation, prelates cannot withdraw from the agreement by their own authority, at any rate against the will of the secular princes, nevertheless the Pontiff can always revoke the agreement, because, as I said, that confirmation was as it were the concession of a certain privilege, which I will show below can always be revoked.

17. But against this can Rebuffe be alleged in Concordatis title 'De Collationibus', who in the preface proposes a question, in § 'Insuper': "I ask whether the second party is able to derogate from these concordats." And he replies that it cannot, and he is speaking about concordats between a king and the Pope. And although he multiplies many arguments, one however is the foundation, namely that the agreement passes over into a contract, but a contract obliges the parties, even if they be supreme princes. But, to begin with, the case that we are concerned with seems to be diverse, because when an agreement is made between bishops or the clergy of a kingdom and the king, they alone are the contracting parties, but the Pontiff, by confirming the pact, only conducts himself as a supreme steward, conceding a favor and grace to each contracting party as to those subject to himself and inferior, and therefore he can revoke it. But because one can instance that the Pope in that case is conjoined with the clergy as its head in completing the consent, and that therefore he too can be considered as a contracting party, for that reason we add that the solution of Rebuffe needs some clarification or limitation. For on the part of the king it is simply true that he cannot withdraw from concordats with the Pope, both because of the said reason of the contract, and also because if some privilege or favor on the part of the king there intercedes, it is conceded by a subject to his superior, and therefore it is irrevocable.

However, on the part of the Pontiff there is need for a distinction, because by no contract can the Pontiff remove from himself the supreme spiritual power which he has as steward of the things that pertain to the fitting governance of the Church; and therefore although he cannot without cause withdraw from concordats, if however, when things have later changed or are better seen, he has understood that the concordat is harmful and not fitting to the Church, he can, by revoking it, withdraw from it, compensating the other party for the loss if that party have perhaps suffered any by reason of the preceding pact. For thus can a temporal king revoke a privilege conceded to his subject, even if it has passed over into the force of a pact, provided it is expedient for the common good of the kingdom, and he restores or recompenses to the subject what the latter had from his side brought along to the preceding pact, as is more fully handed on in the matter De Privilegiis. Which general doctrine, by a special reason, has place in this matter of exemption, both because, as I was saying, whatever is remitted in it on the part of the Church is ordinarily conceded freely without compensation; and especially because in this exemption the good of the clerical state is more to be attended to than any convention made with a temporal prince; because it must always have the condition tacitly included, "provided it not cede to the prejudice or annoyance or contempt of the clerical state, or at any time follow from the agreement.” Therefore, when a like cause intervenes, it can be revoked, but without that it cannot be, at least licitly; if however it is done, I think that the fact holds because of the supreme spiritual power of the Pope, which cannot be diminished in him, as I will immediately say about privilege.

18. Now it is necessary to note that all these things have been said when by the agreement some jurisdiction over clerics is conceded to laymen contrary to clerical privilege. For if jurisdiction is not conceded but only some execution or ministry of fact, there is nothing repugnant in an agreement being made between a prelate and a secular judge that the latter can, as an instrument or minister of the bishop, carry out certain acts with respect to clerics which are judged fitting to impede sins or public disturbances, and which can be done without impropriety to the clerical state, as are to seize arms from clerics carrying them about at night, or to arrest a cleric found in a grave transgression, and the like. This is supposed by all the authors above mentioned when they approve customs of this sort, which are by this pact, at least implicitly, made very honorable. It is also taken from the rights that declare that there is a power in bishops to use in this way the aid of the secular arm, ch. ‘Si Vero’ De Sentent. Excom., with the others above mentioned. For it is not necessary that bishops always do it by special mandate. For why will they not be able also to do it by some general commission or agreement, insofar as the necessity of their diocese will demand according to their prudent judgment? But it must be understood that this sort of license or agreement always ought to depend on the judgment of the prelates of the Church; for they cannot bestow any right in this respect on secular judges but can only use them as instruments, but an instrument always depends on the motion of the principal agent. And therefore it is always sound for prelates to prohibit secular judges from carrying out such actions, notwithstanding any license or pretended agreement whatever, even one confirmed by custom; for thus is it expedient for the good governance of the clerical state, and the opposite would derogate much from the exemption of clerics.

Lastly can be reduced to this head some acts of jurisdiction that secular princes sometimes carry out in respect of ecclesiastics, not as they are ecclesiastics, but as they are feudatory or civil ministers of such princes. Thus did we say above that feudal causes ought to be dealt with before the lord of the fief, even if they are moved about ecclesiastical goods and against clerics. Thus too did Cardinal Bellarmine against Barclay ch.35 defend the deed of the Emperor Charles V, who summoned Herman, the bishop of Cologne, to his tribunal. Which deed Barclay was bringing in as objection; but the Cardinal replies that it was indeed true, but he summoned him as a prince of the empire. Thus too are kings wont to visit their ministers and advisers, even if they are clerics, and to punish them with temporal pecuniary penalties or with deposition from secular office and other like things not unfitting to clerics. Which custom is defended by Aufrelius in Clementina ‘Pastoralis’ De Officio Ordinarii rule 1 de c. 27 & 28, and by Chasseneus in Consuetudines Burgundiae at the word ‘iustitiae’. But it seems to be principally founded on this, that clerics are not then being considered except in a merely civil respect, and above all because under that condition and pact they are accepted into those royal ministries and offices, which pact seems to be neither against ecclesiastical exemption nor against the propriety of the ecclesiastical state or good morals, and thus is it in common use received and approved.

PRIVILEGE

19. The fifth excuse was privilege, about which there is in the right, so to say, no difficulty, but in the fact a very great one. For two things that pertain to right are certain; one is that this privilege can be conceded at least by the Supreme Pontiff, as was proved above and is sufficiently clear from use. The second is that this privilege can be revoked by the Pontiff; and that accordingly, in order for a privilege to favor legitimate excuse, it is not enough that it be once conceded and obtained, but it is necessary that it continue unrevoked. And this too is clear from the use of the Pontiffs; for frequently they revoke these sorts of privileges with the words: "Notwithstanding privileges of any kind," as is clear from ch. 'Clericis' last § De Immunitat. Ecclesiar. on 6, where it is noted by the Gloss, and from ch. 'Quia Saepe' De Election. on 6, along with similar ones, and each year such a revocation is made in the Bull Coenae Domini. The reason indeed is that a conceded privilege can be revoked at short notice by the same superior or his successor, as was proved in bk.8 De Legibus along with common opinion. But this privilege is of that sort, even if it be conceded to an emperor or kings, because it is given by the Pope who is superior to them, and therefore he can always revoke it.

In which fact one must consider that the Pope, when he concedes this privilege, for example, to the emperor, not only remits something from the privilege which he had perhaps received from the emperor himself, or commits to him some part of the direct temporal jurisdiction which the emperor himself had previously given to the Church, but also takes away in part the privilege conceded to himself by Christ, and derogates from canon right and makes a dispensation in it by his spiritual power. Because, therefore, this power always remains intact in the Pontiff (because he cannot by any privilege remove supreme jurisdiction from himself, as with Aretinus, Baldus, and others is rightly noted by Felinus on ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis n.8); therefore the Pope can always revoke his own privilege, by prohibiting to a secular prince the use of temporal power in respect of a cleric, or by returning divine and canon right to its intact state, removing the dispensation. Nay the direct temporal jurisdiction, which he had by his own privilege committed to a secular prince, he can take away from him and recall to himself or retain in himself alone. Because it is very likely that he did not remove it from himself but, as it were, delegated and committed it always dependently on his own will, because more is not necessary for the end of a privilege, nor can more be collected from his words. Now this privilege, because it lessens immunity, is odious and therefore it is to be restricted, so that it be understood to have been conceded in a way that it may least prejudice immunity, and therefore it is always revocable, both through the spiritual power by which the Pontiff can exempt clerics, and through the supreme civil power that the Pontiff now has over the persons and goods of clerics, which he never removes from himself even if he concede such privileges.

20. The difficulty, however, is whether in fact any privileges of this sort are intact, or whether rather all that were of any kind conceded have now been revoked, and so such excuse, although it could be just as a possibility, has no place in fact. The reason for doubt is taken from the Bull Coenae Domini (for in other ancient rights or bulls no general revocation is found), for in clause 19, after the prohibited actions against immunity, there are added in the Bull of Gregory XIII these words: "Even by pretext of any privileges whatever conceded by the Apostolic See for any causes whatever, and under any tenor or forms whatever, in general or in particular, to any kings whatever,...which we do not wish to be of favor to them in anything, by declaring all of these privileges from now on invalid.” By which words all privileges are plainly revoked, and the revocation is increased with so many added phrases that it seems to embrace all privileges, and all modes or kinds of them, and every matter, and every form, and any persons whatever. And although in later bulls up to the most recent one those words have been changed, nevertheless they seem to report the same sense; for after the prohibition there is added under censure this sole limitation: “Without the special, specific, and express license of this holy Apostolic See.” Which exception extends the prohibition to all other cases, notwithstanding any other privileges whatever, for a present and particular license in a specific case is not properly a privilege, but rather a certain dispensation, which differs from a privilege, as I said in the book De Privilegiis. Hence Navarrus in Summa ch.27 n.72, reporting the words of each bull, frankly confesses that all privileges have there been revoked; but he is in doubt whether there could be exception for privileges that are remunerative, or that have been established by immemorial custom, and he is followed by Salzedo in his scholia on the Practica Criminalis of Bernard Diaz ch.55 § ‘Apud Gallos’, about which exception I will immediately speak.

21. Nevertheless many others, not only ancient but also modern, use this excuse of privilege to defend the customs of certain kingdoms. As is affirmed of Spain by Bañez 2.2 q.67 a.1 dub.2 concl.6, and by Menochius De Retinend. Possess. remed.3 n.354, and of Gaul by Aufrerius in Clementina 1 De Offic. Ordinarii limitat.13, and by Julius Clarus bk.5 last § q.6 n.16, and of the Republic of Venice by Gigas, in his tractate on the crime of lèse majesté, about that crime in particular. But it is difficult to bring forward a solid foundation for this opinion, or to explain the words of revocation in a probable way so that the aforesaid effect not follow in all privileges about that matter. But perhaps those authors judged such privileges to be remunerative or established by immemorial custom, which even Navarrus excepts. But in truth by those words (especially as they are contained in the Bull of Gregory XIII) exception is wrongly made of privileges that are in ancient use, even immemorial use, because, as I said above, custom in this matter does not add firmness to a privilege, since in force of custom it introduces no right, and therefore immemorial privilege has nothing special and proper by reason of which it not be included under the general revocation and appellation of privileges. But what is said also of remunerative privilege is not sufficient, both because it is said without proof that all such privileges are remunerative, and also because they can be revoked, as I said above, and they seem to be sufficiently included under the words: “conceded...for any causes whatever, and under any tenor or forms whatever.”

Wherefore it seems very probable to me that by the force of those words privileges in regard to criminal causes have been revoked; for only about them is there discussion in that clause, and therefore in other matter pertaining to the immunity of clerics the excuse of privilege could have a place, when there will be sufficient evidence about it. But in criminal causes, and especially in capital ones (for thus does Gregory XIII expressly speak in his bull), the privileges seem, as I said, to have been revoked. But because Sixtus V and later Pontiffs did not expressly lay down that revocation, and because it is likely that not without cause did they change the words, therefore I do not dare to condemn the use of such privileges but I remit this to the Apostolic See. For Cardinal Bellarmine too, in ch.35 against Barclay, when the latter says that there are in

Gaul certain grave offenses that are called privileges, he himself replies that they are called privileged for this reason, that they were by privilege of the Apostolic See granted to the kings of the French so that they might take cognizance of these offenses. By which words it seem that he does not reject the excuse, just as it is not rejected by Julius Clarus and Aufrerius and those whom he alleges.

JUST DEFENSE

22. The sixth and last excuse is just defense of the kingdom or of the innocent, or defense proper, and this is very much in use in royal tribunals; because, considered per se and in general, it has a certain considerable appearance of that natural equity whereby “it is licit to repel force with force.” For defense is of its kind licit for everyone if it be necessary and is done in due manner; hence even against the Pope it is licit for kings or the Church, as was noted in the third book with Cajetan in his opusculum De Potest. Papae ch.27. And the same is noted in this matter of exemption by Vittoria Reject.1 ‘De Potest. Ecclesiae’ n.8 or prop.8, by Covarruvias and many other modern writers, particularly Spanish and French, among whom can be seen Didacus Perez on law 5 tit.1 bk.2 Ordinamenti, and Didacus Castillo on law 49 Taur. n.3, and Matthew De Afflict. In Decisionib. Neapolitan. decisions 2, 24, 85, & 363. And from among the ancients Decius on law ‘Vim’ and following De Iustit. et Iur. n.25, and Platea on law ‘Prohibitum’ Code. De Iure Fisci bk.10. Now the foundation is that the principle, “it is licit to repel force with force,” is of primeval natural right, on the evidence of Isidore in bk.5 Etymologiar. ch.4, and it is referred to in ch. ‘Ius Naturae’ dist.1, and is confirmed by St. Thomas ST IIa IIae q.96 a.4. And thus is it used by other canon rights in ch. ‘Significasti’ 2 ‘De Homicid.’, in ch. ‘Si Vero’ 1 De Sent. Ecomm.; so it is also licit for laymen to use that defense against clerics.

Now in this matter this use seems to be especially necessary; because unless this defense is sometimes used, innocent people may rather often be very gravely oppressed by their immediate judges or ecclesiastical prelates; because either they cannot at all, or not without great cost, have recourse to superior prelates, and in particular to the far distant Roman Curia. Covarruvias also adds that a sign of this necessity is that almost all Catholic kingdoms use this defense, because they see that without it they cannot defend their own innocent people, although however this does pertain to their preservation and consequently to their office. For just as each man has the right of repelling force with force, not only when it is done against his own body but also if it be done against any member, so the republic too has power to repulse force against any of its members. But the republic has transferred its power and care to the king; and therefore this defense is especially commended to kings, on the witness of Jerome on Jeremiah 22, and of Isidore bk.3 Sententiar. Ch.53, and they are contained in ch. ‘Regum’ and ch. ‘Principes’ 23 q.5, and of Augustine epist.50, and it is contained in ch. ‘Maximianus’ 23 q.3. The same is also handed on by the 1st Council of Paris under Louis p.2 chs.2 & 3. But a king uses that power through royal tribunals and other ministers. Therefore this excuse is just, because the action is both done by legitimate power and it is not against exemption, because it is not an act of jurisdiction or of a superior, but of a defender; now no one is exempt from defense.

But although this defense has, as I said, this appearance of natural equity, nevertheless to apply it in practice and to excuse most of what is done by secular judges is certainly very difficult. Now, to explain the point of difficulty, I suppose that the discussion is about a defense which is done, not by title or power of jurisdiction in respect of the aggressor, but which is done by one's own authority or strength or power, on the supposition of a just title of dominion or administration over the thing that is being defended lest it be by violence taken away. Because since a secular judge does not have jurisdiction over a cleric, he cannot, on account of defense, use jurisdiction over him; therefore only in the fact can he defend himself or others against a cleric. Wherein can be noted a difference between an ecclesiastical prelate and a civil magistrate; for if a magistrate brings force to bear on a prelate, the prelate can defend himself through the power of spiritual jurisdiction, wherein he is always the superior in giving command, in prohibiting, and in excommunicating; nay, this mode of defense is to him more proper, because he does not per se use the material sword, although he can sometimes though laymen have the help of it, as far as is necessary or opportune. But a lay judge cannot defend himself from force directed by a cleric by exercising jurisdiction over him, because he does not have it; the defense then must be one of fact, such as can be done by a private person if he is attacked, even as far as killing the aggressor if it be necessary.

23. Next, for this excuse to be in place, there is need for those two common conditions required for licit use of the principle: "it is licit to repel force with force." One is that actual force be being brought to bear by the other party, for this very thing is, to begin with, supposed in those words. Hence in the present case it is necessary that the force be clear and manifest, because the quarrel is between a subject and a superior about whom the subject is wont to complain that he is inflicting force on him, and so it is necessary that it be clear and manifest; for if the thing is doubtful, the presumption must always be in favor of the superior; and therefore in that case no lay power can use force against an ecclesiastical judge or prelate to defend its own subject, because it would inflict unjust force on the prelate, depriving him of his right which he has in a case of doubt. Nor will it be enough that the secular power is being led by probable judgment or suspicion, unless it know certainly that there is no contrary probable opinion in accord with which an ecclesiastical prelate could in practice be justly giving command or bringing some compulsion to bear on his subject; because if he is in truth so proceeding, he is in practice not using force, for the thing is only speculatively doubtful. The other condition is that the defense be with a moderated protection, as the rights and all the doctors declare, as I have elsewhere declared more extensively. Therefore it concerns this condition that defense by a lay power be necessary; for if he who is complaining about his prelate, or about some other ecclesiastical person before a law power, could without grave disadvantage or danger of equal or greater harm demand defense from a superior ecclesiastical prelate, assuredly he is not guiltlessly defending himself from a cleric through a layman, nor is the layman himself justly introducing himself, nor is he guiltlessly using his defensive power, because he is without reason and just title usurping the right and office of another. And thus do the canons not permit aid to be asked of the secular power against the insolent behavior of clerics, except where a remedy cannot be applied by superior clerics or is being neglected by them. So does Pope Gelasius clearly teach in ch. 'Quo Ausu', and the Council of Antioch in ch. 'Si Quis Episcopus' 23 q.3, and the 9th Council of Toledo in ch. 'Filiis' 16 q.7. But, with necessity presupposed, there also pertains to this condition that the actions themselves, by which the defense is done, not exceed the manner that is due and moderated by prudent judgment.

24, From these principles, then, there arises, as I was saying, not a small difficulty in the just application of this excuse to the cases that occur in this matter. First, indeed, because this power, which laymen usurp over ecclesiastical persons or causes, is almost always by use of jurisdiction, because they say it is by exercising the actions of jurisdiction that they are defending him who is suffering the violence. For this defense is more frequently done by transferring the causes of clerics or ecclesiastical causes to the royal tribunals, and there examination and judgment are made whether the ecclesiastical judge is using violence or not. But secular judges do this by summoning the cause to themselves, and by prescribing that the acts of the cause along with the process formed in the ecclesiastical tribunal be brought to themselves, and by afterwards judicially examining the cause and ultimately by pronouncing sentence about an appeal unjustly denied, or a censure badly imposed, or some other similar force unjustly inflicted; but all these are acts of jurisdiction. The authors who defend this custom reply that then the secular judge is not proceeding judicially but extra-judicially. But they certainly seem to be playing with words. For what is it to proceed judicially except, having summoned the cause, to examine it publicly and pass sentence about it with authority? But this the secular judge is doing in the article in which he says he is providing defense. Others reply that it is not unfitting that he use jurisdiction only in the article which he assumes for judgment, provided he not judge about the principal cause that is the basis of the controversy. But this too contributes nothing to the excuse; for it is enough that that article too pertain to ecclesiastical matter, and that an ecclesiastical person is in that article brought to a secular court as defendant. Therefore in all cases of this sort the first condition necessary for defense is not being kept.

Hence the other is lacking too, because certain and manifest violence is not there first. And hence it happens that, under the name of defense, actions are without sufficient cause or occasion being usurped that truly do not pertain to defense, so to say, of fact, but to juridical defense, which a legitimate judge can provide by using his jurisdiction. Hence further is brought about that the defense cannot be said to be with a moderated protection, nor can it be founded on that natural principle alone "it is licit to repel force with force;" both because it is not done by a licit action but by usurped jurisdiction, as has been shown; and also because it is done before it is certainly clear that force is being inflicted on an innocent person. Which is manifest from the fact itself, because the secular judge applies his effort to this very thing and interposes himself to examine juridically whether force is happening or not; therefore it does not suppose certain and evident violence; therefore there is supposed no such state of cause or injury wherein force could justly be repelled by force through sole defense of fact. Which reason has place whenever juridical cognizance is taken of the justice or injustice of some deed of an ecclesiastical judge or of some cleric or other. There is also a declaration from the contrary; for if a layman complains of his own secular judge, that he is using force against him by denying an appeal or something similar, the secular judge will not patiently put up with an ecclesiastical judge introducing himself and interposing his own authority by demanding under precept or censure the acts of the cause so as to examine and judge whether the secular judge is using force or not. Nor will secular judges call it defense in the ecclesiastical court but usurpation of their jurisdiction; therefore by the same right secular judges themselves ought in respect of ecclesiastics to be censured, or indeed more censured. Because an ecclesiastical judge has a greater power above a lay judge than vice versa, as has often been said, because an ecclesiastical prelate can judge of the sins of all his sheep according to ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis and ch. 'Ex Tenore' De Foro Compet. and ch. 'Si Quis de Potentibus' 24 q.3. And likewise a greater duty of defending the innocent is incumbent on ecclesiastical prelates than on secular magistrates, as is noted by the Gloss on ch. 'Regum' 23 q.5, and it can be taken from many decrees, 87 dist.

23. Wherefore it seems difficult to admit this mode of defense, or to approve it as just by force of the natural law alone whereby it is licit to repel force with force, whenever there is not supposed an evident and manifest violence needing by that very fact, not by examining or vindicating right, to be prevented. For these two in this matter are very much to be distinguished lest jurisdiction be usurped in place of defense. These too will also easily be able to be distinguished by this example; for if the king of Gaul see manifest force and injury done to an innocent person by the subject of another king, for example of England, who is engaging in aggression against his innocent subject to kill him, he can by that fact resist and defend the innocent person by repelling force with force. But if the force is not manifest and evident, nor is being done by a violent external action, but the subject of the other king is complaining that it is being done to him in court, and there is need of a judicial examination to take cognizance of the violence, the king of Gaul certainly cannot, under the show of defense and by force of the principle "it is licit to repel force with force" demand the acts of the cause so that he may be able to take cognizance of the quarrel and judge it; as is per se manifest both from the use and common right of nations, and also because, if the contrary were permitted, it would be a seed bed of many disturbances and disagreements. It is sign, therefore, that this latter is not defense, nor is it licit by force of natural right to him who does not have jurisdiction.

26. Hence, therefore, some authors, seeing perhaps that it is not a legitimate excuse for all the like causes or actions, have added that secular judges are excused when they do the like things because this is conceded to them by canon right, and therefore they are not proceeding without due jurisdiction. Hence in the Bull Coenae, when judges doing similar actions are condemned, it is added: "Except in cases conceded in right." So thinks Covarruvias in Pract. ch.35 n.4 § 'Caeterum in hac Regia,' where he refers to other authors. The same does Navarrus in ch. 'Cum Contingat' De Rescrip. Remed. 1 § 'Secundo Infertur,' Rebuffe in his Commentaria ad Constitution. Gallic. vol.3 tit. 'De Appellationibus tamquam de Abusu' n.14 and in Concordat. last title 'De Protectione Concordator,' Azebedo in bk.1 Nova Recopilat. Legum Hispaniae tit.6, 1, 2. But that canon right has bestowed this power on secular princes or their magistrates is collected by the said authors from ch. 'Filiis et Nepotibus' 16 q.7, because therein is said: "If the metropolitan do such things, let him not delay to make them known to the ears of the king." And in like manner they allege ch. 'Principes' and ch. 'Regum', ch. 'Administratores' 23 q.5, and ch. 'Christianis', and ch. 'Petimus' 11 q.1. Again ch. 'Quidam Monachi', and ch. 'Probinum' 16 q.1, and ch. 'Non Licuit' dist.17, and ch. 'Maximinianus' 23 q.3, and ch. 'Boni Principis' 96 dist.

27. Now about this opinion there seem to me two things needing to be said, one is that the opinion has no foundation in canon right. For all the rights that are adduced are of ancient right, and therefore although something of the like was conceded in them, it has been revoked by the newer rights of decretals and bulls of the Pontiffs. For thus to ch.

‘Filiis et Nepotibus’ does Panormitanus reply on ch. ‘Qualiter et Quando’ De Iudiciis, where the Gloss too thinks the same, and the same is contained in Stephanus Aufrerius in tractate De Potest. Saecularium in Ecclesiastic. and in Azor vol.1 bk.5 ch.4 q.2 at the end. However I do not think it necessary to recur to the revocation of the ancient canons, because in none of those that are alleged is there discussion about a power of jurisdiction over ecclesiastical things or persons that is being bestowed on laymen. And especially in ch. ‘Filiis’ it is only said that the patron of a church, if he see the goods of the Church being defrauded by inferior clerics, he is to warn the bishop; if by the bishop himself he is to warn the metropolitan; if by the metropolitan, “let him not delay to make them known to the ears of the king,” which should not be understood as that the king is to use jurisdiction over the metropolitan, but that he is to warn him by his own authority, or if it is not enough, he is, after having implored the Pontiff, to restrain him by the latter’s authority; meanwhile, however, in fact and by power he is to prevent the Church from suffering any injury or loss in its goods. Which sense is also in conformity with the intention of the 9th Council of Toledo, from which that chapter comes, as is indicated by the words: “Or let them curb with honorable assembly of admonition,” which although they be said about the patrons themselves, nevertheless they can be accommodated to the king insofar as they indicate that the mind of the Council was that each person there named is to apply a remedy according to the mode fitted to his status and condition. For if the Council had wished to bestow on the king a new jurisdiction over the metropolitan, it should certainly have done it with clearer words. Again, otherwise the king could in that case summon the metropolitan to court, put him in prison and punish him, which is incredible. Nay, I judge that it could not be done by the authority of a provincial Council alone without the approval of the Pontiff. Next the Council, although it did not make anything else clear, is to be understood to have spoken according to the rules of right; but the rule of right, even the more ancient right, for that Council is that he who has sought judgment from the emperor, “is to be deprived of his proper honor; but if he has required an Episcopal court from the emperor, let nothing stand in its way.” From the Council of Milevis ch.19, ch. ‘Placuit’ 11 first question. And this sense also did not displease Panormitanus, and it is insinuated too in a marginal note that is contained in the Gregorian Code, and it is taken from Archidiaconus.

According also to this sense the other alleged rights are very easily and altogether truly understood; for in none of them is the discussion about jurisdiction, nor about an act that requires it, but about defense, protection, or aid, which even secular princes owe to the Church, and ecclesiastical prelates can exact it of them. Thus Isidore on the said ch. ‘Principes’ said that they themselves will give account to God for the Church which they are receiving from Christ “to protect;” Jerome indeed in the said ch. ‘Regum’ says two things about kings, namely, that their office is to do judgment and justice and free those oppressed by force from the hand of calumniators, and to provide help to the poor, who are more easily oppressed by the powerful, where he says nothing in particular about clerics. Hence the first part is to be understood as in his own forum and with respect to his subjects, but under the second clerics can in a legitimate sense be included. Now Pope John in the said ch. ‘Administratores’ only admonishes secular magistrates to obey ecclesiastical prelates who admonish them to watch over the “guarding” of churches, the “protection” of orphans and widows, and the restraint of the rapacious. But Pope Gelasius in ch. ‘Christianis’ says rather that “the heavenly soldier,” that is, the cleric, “ought not to follow a forum save his own,” on the occasion of certain clerics who were being oppressed by royal power and being reduced to servitude. And therefore at once in the following chapter he delegates the cause to two ecclesiastical persons, but commends to a certain Count, “that if their adversaries despise to come to the delegates’ court, let them be surrounded by the protection of your sublimity lest either deceit or the violence of necessity, the enemy of law, impose anything on them.” Where the secular arm is implored for resisting another layman, not for judging a cleric.

And this very thing is confirmed by the 3rd Council of Carthage in the said ch. ‘Petimus’, and it extends it to seeking aid from the secular arm for resisting an intruded prelate and tyrant, which it moderates with these words and declares: “With the form of discipline preserved, he will not be reckoned attacked if, cited modestly by your charity, he refuse to withdraw, since he was, at the doing of his own stubbornness, cited even by judicial authority,” that is, secular authority. Likewise the Council of Chalcedon in the said ch. ‘Quidam Monachi’ says that monks are to be compelled by the secular arm (that is when implored by an ecclesiastic) to leave the curia. And the same is done by Pope Gelasius in the said ch. ‘Probinum’, and in the said ch. ‘Non Licuit,’ and likewise Augustine, in the said ch. ‘Maximianus’, only says that it is laudable in a bishop to seek help from the emperor against the enemies of the Church. Lastly Pope Marcellus in the said ch. ‘Boni Principis’, which does pertain to the matter, only says that “it is the part of a good prince to honor and guard the priest of God;” but to guard is not to judge, and much less to honor is, nay rather it is against the honor of priests that they be judged by laymen. It is evident, therefore that in those rights nothing of jurisdiction is attributed to laymen over ecclesiastics.

28. Hence I further conclude that the aforesaid excuse is not likely, namely that these things are done by laymen with license or jurisdiction conceded to them by common right. The proof is that the ancient rights do not concede it, as I have proved, for no others are referred to; but the newer rights not only do not concede it but altogether prohibit it, as ch. ‘Qualiter et Quando’ De Iudiciis with similar ones; but most convincing about this are the words of the Lateran Council under Leo X sess.9 on the reformation of the Curia: “Since by right both divine and human no power over ecclesiastical person has been attributed to laymen, we renew all the constitutions, etc.” Hence the Council of Trent sess.25 ch.3 says it is “impious for any secular magistrate to prohibit an ecclesiastical judge from excommunicating someone, or to command that he revoke an excommunication already passed etc.” And it gives this reason: “Since this cognizance pertains not to seculars but to ecclesiastics.” But of this sort are all the actions of which we are treating, over which the Council plainly hands down that secular judges have no jurisdiction.

Next there is the manifest reason that secular judges wish through the same actions to remove this force (as they themselves say) even in matters spiritual, but in those matters spiritual jurisdiction is necessary, which by no divine or natural right agrees with laymen, and by canon right such jurisdiction was always from the beginning denied to laymen, as was proved above, and as is clear from the decrees dist.96. And although the Pope could of his absolute power delegate it to them, he does not ordinarily do it; therefore it is not likely that by common right has been given to seculars the whole ecclesiastical jurisdiction that is necessary for making honorable all the actions that they themselves usurp. Nay thence also is concluded that no jurisdiction at all is communicated, both because there is the same reason for the whole as for the individual parts, and also because, if one rightly considers, the cause that those judges summon to themselves, and about which they wish to take cognizance, is always ecclesiastical, namely a sentence passed by an ecclesiastical judge, or something similar.

29. Wherefore other authors, who think with the preceding ones that jurisdiction flowing from an ecclesiastical prelate is necessary for such actions to be justly done, have recourse to apostolic privilege, and they affirm that in Catholic kingdoms, wherein these actions are in practice tolerated, a privilege has been by the Pontiffs conceded for just reason, especially for repressing the vicars of bishops from acts of insolence (as Bañez, immediately to be cited, says), and so that the poor and the less powerful, who more often suffer this violence, can more easily or without great expense have some remedy. And thus about the kingdom of Gaul does Menochius testify about Retinend. Possess. remed. 3 n.354, and it is often pointed to by Rebuffe in the places mentioned, and the same is affirmed about the kingdom of Spain by Dominicus Bañez 2.2 q.67 a.1 dub.2 conclus.6 And in this kingdom, we know, many like things are done and under pretext of similar privilege defended, whether by reason of some agreement approved by the Pontiff or of one conceded by him, until by the Apostolic See something else is ordained, which is the same. And in truth I do not find any other way whereby similar actions could be excused from the violation of exemption. But because this excuse depends on fact – that is, whether such privileges have been in truth conceded to these kingdoms or to their princes, and, whether they continue in force, they were truly perpetual, about which circumstances there is for me no certainty – therefore neither can I approve nor condemn deeds of this sort, but I remit the thing to the Apostolic See. And I only assert that in order for civil princes or magistrates to be able in all conscience to exercise this kind of jurisdiction, it is necessary that they have about the privilege, which is the foundation of it, sufficient and sufficiently probable notice, and that the privilege not have been revoked by the Pontiffs; but with this notice supposed, I judge that the rest of what pertains to this matter can be defined sufficiently from the principles laid down.

Sum of the whole of the preceding book.

30. Although in this work I have assumed rather the cause and defense of the Catholic faith than the function of instructing morals, nevertheless in this fourth book I have thought it necessary to fulfill, according to my strength, each office. Both so that our labor can be more of use to Catholics, to whom we are most of all debtors; and also so that not only by refuting the errors of heretics and by solving arguments, but also by explaining the honor of morals and the equity that is discerned in the distinction and separation of each of the ecclesiastical and civil forums, we might more fully to the King of England and to his protestants, and to other enemies of ecclesiastical liberty, as far as is in us, make satisfaction. Since therefore in the tract about the exemption of clerics or about ecclesiastical immunity I espied two controversies, one having regard to the faith, the other to morals, I have taken care so to treat each that I might both give reason for that faithful doctrine which is in us, and might teach how it is in use and practice to be kept. For which cause I studied first to make the exemption itself sure from the principles and foundations of the faith, that is, from the written word of God and from that not written but made firm by the ancient tradition of the Fathers and of the Church; next I have demonstrated that this ecclesiastical immunity has been not only by pontifical and imperial right introduced but is also very much in conformity with divine right itself, both old and new, nay even with natural right. Because, in truth, neither can in the divine cult due reverence and fittingness subsist, nor in ecclesiastical morals honor, nor in the ecclesiastical hierarchy adornment, order, or beauty, without this right and privilege of immunity. Which so as to make more evidently certain, I have more brightly declared the reason and mode whereby such exemption may in use and morals be kept.

All which things, if the most serene King of England attentively and sincerely, and laying aside too great affection for domination and command, wish to consider, I hope he will not bear so grudgingly, as he indicates in his Preface, that so great a part of men and of estates has been removed from the power and jurisdiction of kings; because neither is royal majesty thence obscured but made more illustrious, nor is its power diminished but increased. For nothing so makes a Christian and Catholic king illustrious, and renders him bright and celebrated, as intact piety toward God and the cult of religion; for, as was very well said by Cyril when writing to Theodosius: “Glorious piety toward God is the immovable foundation for royal honors,” hence he subjoins: “Princes cultivators of piety conquer without labor and prevail over adversaries.” And therefore (as Nicephorus reports) the same Theodosius gave to his sons, Arcadius and Honorius, when dying no other mandate than to preserve true piety intact, whereby he hoped they would have peace and obtain victory from God. Now his sons, showing faith and obedience to their parent, on the evidence of the same Nicephorus, “Whatever their predecessors, the pious emperors, had established for the churches, they themselves both confirmed and firmly kept, and other things beyond added pleasing to God.” The religious princes, of course, understood that the prerogatives and immunities conceded to divine things were not given to men but to God, on whom the felicity and preservation of all kingdoms depend, and accordingly that “then is the empire defended by the right arm of Christ, when the state of the Church is preserved unshaken,” as Pope Leo said. From which St. Thomas inferred, bk.2 De Regim. Princip. near the end, that a king and prince is bound to devote themselves with all his effort and care to the divine cult; not only because he is a man, but also because he is a lord and a king and bears the vicariate of God, on whom he most of all depends. Hence he adds later: “all kings who have been solicitous for divine reverence have completed their course with happiness: but those who did the contrary have obtained an unhappy end.” Let it therefore be far from a Christian king that ecclesiastical liberty, introduced for the divine cult, and sanctioned by both divine and human law, and established by the lasting custom of the Catholic Church, and approved by the authority of the ancient Fathers and of later faithful writers, he should strive, by the suasion of a few Innovators or by study and desire for expanding temporal domination, to overturn. For that brings him not glory but ignominy, and will not increase an earthly kingdom but take away the eternal one. That this thing not befall King James, we with our whole heart desire and earnestly beg from him in whose hand is the heart of the king, and who is able to turn it to the better part, and so to enlighten it with the rays of truth that it should no more depart from him.

BOOK FIVE

CONTENTS

BOOK 5: ON ANTICHRIST, WHOSE NAME AND PERSON, THROUGH CALUMNY AND INJURY, ARE FALSELY ATTRIBUTED TO THE PONTIFF BY PROTESTANTS.

Preface

Chapter 1: On the name of Antichrist and its diverse signification.

Summary: 1. Etymology of the name. 2. False etymology of this name by heretics. Antichrist signifies an adversary of Christ; proof from Scripture. 3. Proof again from the Fathers. 4. Twofold signification of the name of Antichrist.

Chapter 2: Whether Antichrist is properly said to be some individual man, or some seat or empire.

Summary: 1. Opinion of heretics. 2. Catholic truth holds that Antichrist will be an individual man. Proof from the Scriptures. 3. Consideration of the individual words of the Apostle Paul adduced for the proof. 4. Proof from the Fathers. Antichrist will not be a demon. 5. Another reason from Theodoret. 6. Consideration of the words of St. John. 7. Consideration of the other words of the same Apostle. Proof also from the Greek article. 8. Confirmation from Daniel. 9. In Daniel the last king was not Mahomet or another tyrant. 10. Confirmation again of the truth from the authority of the Fathers.

Chapter 3: Satisfaction is made to two objections by Protestants taken from Daniel and Paul against the doctrine of the previous chapter.

Summary: 1. Improper interpretation of Beza on Daniel. 2. Response. 3. What Daniel understood by the name of the beasts. 4. By the name of the beasts are indicated the first kings. 5. The ten horns represent the same number of kings. 6. Another interpretation of Beza on St. Paul. 7. The heretics pretend a double meaning to the name of Antichrist. Antichrist is in type multiple, in person singular. Heresiarchs are called Antichrists. 8. The interpretation of Beza is attacked from the same words of Paul. 9. Opinion of the King of England.

Chapter 4: Satisfaction is made to another objection, taken from Revelation ch.17, against the solution of the second chapter.

Summary: 1. Objection of the King of England from Revelation. 2 Response. 3. By the name of whore is understood pagan Rome or the world. 4. The beast on whom the whore was borne was not Antichrist but his figure. The emperors too, the persecutors of Christians, are signified in the scarlet beast. 5. Nero was in figure the beast and the mystery of iniquity. 6. By the seven kings some understand the persecutors of the good in the seven ages of the world. 7. Others understand by the beast Antichrist and his precursors. The seven heads do not signify an indeterminate number. The persecutions of the Church are nine according to some, more according to others. 8. Nero the first persecutor of the Christians. Other persecutors after Nero. 9. Reason for doubt to the contrary. Response. 10. The persecution of Julian the heaviest. 11. The King of England by the seven heads understands the seven forms of the governance of Rome. 12. This is shown to be fashioned without foundation. 13. The same must be said about the decemvirs. 14. The governance of the Pontiffs is not signified by John through the king who is said to be the seventh. The contrary is repugnant to the words of Revelation. 15. From the time of Boniface nothing of the ancient faith was changed.

Chapter 5: On the time of the persecution and death of Antichrist.

Summary: 1. About Antichrist four things are foretold: his rise, his kingdom, his persecution, his death. Various opinions of Protestants about the time of the advent of Antichrist. The King of England puts the advent round the year six hundred. 2. The persecution of Antichrist is proved from Matthew to happen not much before the Day of Judgment. Objection and its response. Antichrist is rightly said to be abomination, and his persecution tribulation. 3 The tribulation of Antichrist will cease after his death. In what the tribulation consists. 4. The persecution of Antichrist is to cease with his death. 5. The persecution of Antichrist will last three years and a half. 6. Proof from Daniel. 7. Proof again from Daniel and from Revelation. 8. A difficulty; it is solved. 9. Double opinion about the end of the persecution of Antichrist. 10. Third opinion of the King of England asserting that it cannot be known for certain. 11. Our assertion is proved once the authority of the Fathers is set down. 12. Opinion of more recent persons. It is disproved. 13. Opinion of others. 14. The place of Ezekiel poses no problem. 15. Though they signified a definite time, they make nothing against the true opinion. 16. The days from the death of Antichrist to the Judgment cannot be many.

Chapter 6: Satisfaction is made to the first objection of the King of England against the doctrine of the previous chapter.

Summary: 1. The King of England contends that the kingdom of Antichrist will be of longer duration. 2. However he lacks foundation. 3 The seven beasts and the seven head are kings in league with Antichrist. 4. Other expositions of the same place. 5. Some Catholic writers understand by the name of the beast the Roman Empire. 6. This exposition is favored in part by King James. 7. The wound inflicted on the beast in one of its seven heads cannot be taken for the first siege by the Goths under Alaric. 8. The exposition of King James does not stand with other words in the same chapter. 9. Rome received no wound in its head from the siege of the Vandals. 10. King Odoacer seized but did not ravage Rome. 11. Totila gravely afflicted Rome but did not inflict any lethal wound on it. 12. The assertion of the King of England is refuted by an argument ad hominem. 13. Badly are certain words by the King added to the text of John.

Chapter 7: Satisfaction is made to the second objection of the King of England taken from Revelation ch.18.

Summary: 1. The second objection of the king from Revelation. 2. Babylon is one true, one mystical. 3. Babylon is said to be the whole world. 4. This Babylon, which is not composed of stones but of corrupt men will be destroyed when the impious have perished. 5. An objection is solved. 6. By the name of Babylon Rome too is signified. But pagan Rome not religious Rome. 7. It is probable that Rome is to be destroyed before the Day of Judgment. 8. The time of this overthrow is very uncertain. 9. Attack on the first part [of the king's objection]. 10. On the second part. 11. On the third part. 12. It is uncertain whether the destruction is to be done by Antichrist or by one of his ministers. 13. It is probable that the ravaging of Rome is to be completed by Antichrist. 14. From ch.18 of Revelation is not collected that the persecution of Antichrist will last beyond three years and a half.

Chapter 8: Satisfaction is made to the third objection of the King of England taken from various words of the New Testament.

Summary: 1. The King of England first contends that a definite time has been put for an indefinite. 2. Second, that the time assigned by John signifies half a spiritual week. 3. Third, he argues from the uncertainty of the Day of Judgment. 4. He amasses many testimonies from Scripture. 5. The king's arguments are dissolved. 6. In Scripture a perfect number is often put for an indefinite one. By an imperfect number a definite duration is signified. 7. The place from the Revelation of John is incapable of accepting a metaphorical sense. The first foundation of the king is overthrown. 8. A perfect number is very often in Scripture put for a determinate time. 9. The second foundation of the king is destroyed. Daniel speaks one way about weeks but another way about the three years. The enumeration of months and of days cannot be accommodated to a week. 10. The doubt of Lyranus is rejected. A day in that place of John cannot be taken for a year. 11. A day in that prophecy is taken in the same sense. Confirmation from Ezekiel. 12. The third foundation of the king does not impugn the true opinion. It is not de fide that the judgment will be immediately after the forty five days. 13. The Day of Judgment can be known through conjectures taken from Scripture. 14. There will be very few who will be enlightened by conjectures. 15. Uncertainty about the Day of Judgment can be considered in a threefold way. 16. An objection of the king is dissolved. 17. The death of Antichrist will not be known to all men. Many of those who will have seen the death of Antichrist will not understand the Scriptures. 18. The Day of Judgment will be known in the last time to the faithful, not to infidels. 19. The parable of the ten virgins is explained of the particular judgment. The announcement of judgment will be more sudden than its arrival. 20. The same parable can be understood of the universal judgment. 21. A place in ch.1 of Acts is explained. 22. An objection is solved. The words of Christ are not to be restricted to the apostles alone. Augustine contends that the time before the manifestation of Antichrist is uncertain. 23. The place from 1 Peter 5 is explained. We must be vigilant because of the traps of the demon and the uncertainty of death. 24. Other places of Scripture are also explained. When death comes as a thief, then also comes judgment. 25. Death itself does not altogether come as a thief. 26. Death comes as a thief to the unprepared. 27. Although there be from the death of Antichrist a definite time, the Day of Judgment can rightly be said to be unknown.

Chapter 9: By confronting another difficulty, the time and beginning of the reign of Antichrist is made more fully clear.

Summary: 1. Antichrist has not yet come. 2. A difficulty about the beginning of the reign of Antichrist. 3. First response: the reign of Antichrist will last only three years and a half. 4. Disproof of this response. 5. The time of the reign of Antichrist is not determinately known. The time of the kingdom will be longer than of the persecution. 6. Proof from Daniel and Revelation. 7. Again from Daniel. 8. The time of the persecution is certain, of the monarchy uncertain. 9. The time of the reign of Antichrist does not exceed the life of a man. 10. An instance from heretics. 11. Response. Scripture speaks of Antichrist as of only one man. Heretics falsely think that the throne of Antichrist has already begun. 12. The future reign of Antichrist will be shorter than his life. Antichrist will obtain the kingdom by fraud, not by inheritance. 13. Antichrist, as he is first on his throne, thus will he be the last. 14. The signs of the coming of Antichrist have not yet been fulfilled. The Roman Empire must at that time be overthrown. The manner of its overthrow is uncertain. 15. Confirmation from the Fathers.

Chapter 10: Satisfaction is made to two other arguments, and some opinions of Catholics about the time of Antichrist are by the by refuted.

Summary: 1. Protestants oppose two other arguments about the time of Antichrist. 2. Some said that Antichrist already existed in the time of the Apostles, and will come again. 3. It was the opinion of some that Nero will come again. 4. This opinion has no foundation in Paul. 5. That Nero is still living as a mortal is a fable. 6. Paul speaks of Antichrist and of Nero as distinct. 7. Certain think that some of the heresiarchs were Antichrist. The same is by some affirmed of Mahomet. 8. Mahomet was not the true Antichrist. 9. Nor is Antichrist on his throne successively. 10. Response to the places adduced already at the beginning. 11. The place of John ch. 4 is explained. 12. Heretics object that the deeds of Antichrist could not be finished in a short time. What Paul signified by the name of 'falling away'. 13. This sort of falling away can signify, first, the overthrow of the Roman Empire. 14. Second, Antichrist himself is called a falling away. 15. Falling away does not necessarily signify a general apostasy. Apostates do not pollute the Church because they are outside it. 16. Third, by the name of falling away is understood apostasy. 17. This apostasy will not be general. Many will then recover the faith. 18. This apostasy will be completed in a short time. 19. Instance; it is solved. Whether this apostasy will take over the whole world is uncertain. 20. The demon will be the most potent minister of this apostasy.

Chapter 11: That at the time of Antichrist two true men are to be sent to bear witness against him is shown from Revelation ch. 11 against two false expositions of Protestants.

Summary: 1. The two witnesses from Revelation ch. 11 are said by the King of England to be the two Testaments. 2. Some favor this exposition. 3. Those two witnesses will be true men. 4. Proof from the Scriptures. 5. Other words of John are harshly and falsely accommodated to the two Testaments. 6. The Latin language is not unknown in the way the king imagines. 7. It is shown from the time determined by John that they are not the two Testaments. 8. The metaphors fabricated by heretics are turned back against them. 9. Interpretation of another metaphor of Protestants. 10. Heresiarchs have not been killed by that imaginary Antichrist. Heretics are more to be said to rise from themselves than to rise again. 11. The falsity of that metaphor is shown from the time and place. The prophets of heretics pervert kingdoms, not convert them. 12. The Catholic truth is made firm. 13. That great city, in whose streets will lie after death the bodies of the two prophets, signifies the world, but more properly and truly it signifies Jerusalem. The spirit of life cannot be understood of the glory of the souls but of the resurrection of the two witnesses. 14. Although those two witnesses not be Enoch and Elijah, yet are they true men. 15. The same place of Revelation shows that Antichrist has not yet come. Nor have the two prophets or others like them yet been.

Chapter 12: That Elijah and Enoch are the witnesses to be sent against Antichrist is shown.

Summary: 1. King James contends that the witnesses to be sent against Antichrist will not be Enoch and Elijah. 2. Enoch and Elijah still exist in mortal life. 3. Proof from the Scriptures. No mortal man attains immortal life unless he first die. 4. Elijah and Enoch have not yet attained glory. 5. Evasion. Response. 6. No one before Christ achieved glory. 7. Evasion. Response. Enoch and Elijah are by the Apostle taught not to be enjoying immortal glory. 8. The Fathers uphold the same opinion. King James accuses Bellarmine wrongly. 9. The opinion of St. Irenaeus is considered. 10. Of Tertullian. 11. Of St. Jerome. 12. Of St. Augustine. 13. Of St. Ambrose.

Chapter 13: That John understood by the two witnesses Elijah and Enoch is shown by conjecture and the authority of the Fathers.

Summary: 1. Enoch and Elijah, because they are not dead, are signified to be going to come to face Antichrist. 2. This conjecture is proved from the tradition of the Fathers. 3. Response of the king. 4. The words of the king are weighed one by one. 5. The king supposes without foundation that this prophecy of John has been fulfilled. 6. Satisfaction is made to the foundation of the king. 7. It is a thing more curious than useful to want to know where Enoch and Elijah are. 8. It is more probable that they are leading a life in the terrestrial paradise. 9. Again, it is more probable that the terrestrial paradise has not been overthrown.

Chapter 14: Whether from other places of Scripture it can be shown that Elijah and Enoch will be the precursors of the second coming of Christ and the witnesses against Antichrist.

Summary: 1. By many other testimonies of Scripture it is proved that the two witnesses will be Enoch and Elijah. 2. It is shown first of Elijah. 3. King James interprets Malachi of the first coming of Christ and of John the Baptist. 4. Malachi speaks in proper sense of the second coming of Christ. 5. In literal sense, indeed, he speaks of Elijah as precursor of the second coming of Christ. 6. The same is more clearly proved from Ecclesiasticus ch.48. This place Protestants destroy with insults because they cannot do it with reason. Other words from the same ch.48 are by the writer of Ecclesiasticus foretold about the same Elijah. 7. The exposition of the king is refuted. 8. Christ speaks of a double Elijah, one true, one mystical. 9. Christ did not reject the common opinion about the coming of Elijah. 10. The Baptist did not restore all things, since he converted few. Elijah by his first coming will convert few, by this second many. 11. John is metaphorically called Elijah by likeness to the true Elijah. 12. The Catholic opinion is confirmed by the authority of the Fathers. 13. The sayings of the Greek Fathers are put forward. 14. Bellarmine is defended. 15. The king's opinion about Enoch. 16. Some appropriate reasons are adduced why another associate should be joined with Elijah. 17. Which associate is to be joined with Elijah. 18. It is very probable that Enoch will be the associate of Elijah. 19. The words of Ecclesiasticus are very much in favor. Elijah will be sent chiefly to convert the Jews and Enoch chiefly the Gentiles.

Chapter 15: The seat of Antichrist in place and rank is very far distant from the See of the Pontiff.

Summary: 1. King James tries to prove that Rome is the seat of Antichrist. 2. He is speaking of Rome itself, not of the pontifical throne. 3. Although Rome were the future seat of Antichrist, it was not thence rightly concluded that he will sit on the See of Peter. 4. The King of England's proofs. 5. Whether by the name of temple Paul understood the Church. 6. By temple can be understood the congregation of the faithful. Also can be understood churches, excluding the temple in Jerusalem; finally, any place dedicated to the divine cult. 7. Augustine thinks Antichrist himself is the said temple of God. 8. To the King of England is given the option of choosing whichever he likes of the said expositions. 9. From the king's own exposition the conclusion is no more drawn that Antichrist will sit in the Roman temple than in any other. Response to the instance. 10. The bosom of the Church is very ample, and does not include Rome only. The Pontiff does not advertise himself as God, but shows himself Vicar of Christ. 11. A second proof of the king from Revelation. 12. The woman should not be confounded with the beast. 13. If that woman is Rome, she is certainly pagan Rome, not Christian. The beast on which she rides signifies not Antichrist but the series of Gentile tyrants. 14. Confirmation from consideration of the words of ch.17 of Revelation. 15. From this place cannot be collected that Antichrist will fix his seat at Rome; rather is collected that Rome must be overthrown by him. 16. The same is proved by a dilemma. 17. Conclusion.

Chapter 16: Where the seat of Antichrist will be.

Summary: 1. It is more certain that the seat of Antichrist will not be at Rome than elsewhere. 2. It is commonly believed that the seat of Antichrist will be at Jerusalem. 3. This opinion is favored by the testimony in 2 Thessalonians 2 of St. Paul. 3. It is however more probable that the Apostle is speaking of the temple in Jerusalem than of the Church. 4. Confirmation from Matthew. 5. In confirmation of the common opinion is added another testimony from Revelation. Enoch and Elijah are to be killed in Jerusalem. 6. King James contends that by the name of the great city Rome is signified. He confirms it with a threefold reason. 7. He contends also that it can be said Christ was killed at Rome. 8. Response to the first proof of the king. How the term 'spiritually' is to be understood in the testimony of John. It is applied to Sodom and Egypt. 9. The king's second proof is confronted. 10. Again, the third proof. 11. The blood of the martyrs who were killed by Roman authority or approval is said to be found in Rome. 12. Although Christ was killed by Roman authority, he is violently to the words of John said to have been killed at Rome. The blood of the martyrs who were not killed at Rome is at Rome. 13. Jerome is expounded. In Revelation the holy city is diverse from the great city. Jerome declared his mind elsewhere more clearly.

Chapter 17: From the description of the person of Antichrist that Paul delivers in 2 Thessalonians 2, it is shown that, rather than being the Pope, he will be the greatest adversary of the Pontiff.

Summary: 1. King James contends that the Supreme Pontiff is Antichrist. From the place of Paul above cited the fabrication of the king is plainly refuted. 2. Antichrist will be a man of sin, or covered over with all sins. Scriptures uses the genitive case in the place of adjectives for emphasis and antonomasia. 3. The notes of Antichrist do not in any way fit the Supreme Pontiffs. Boniface III is vindicated from calumny. 4. Phocas did not confer the primacy on the Roman See, but at most made the fact clear. 5. Henry VIII should really be called a man of sin. 6. The king suppresses some of the words of Paul in the text above adduced. Some assert that by the name of God Paul understands idols. 7. And that Paul himself even understands the true as well as false God. 8. The supreme pride of Antichrist is his wish to surpass God, not men. A temporal king who usurps spiritual primacy is more truly called Antichrist. 9. Antichrist will raise himself above God. 10. An argument ad hominem. The Pontiff does not make himself God but worships God. 11. He who justly guards his right does not properly extol himself. If Boniface III is to be called Antichrist, as the king contends, his predecessors too should be so called. 12. Protestants falsely accuse the Pontiffs of mocking Catholics with deceptive signs. No Roman Pontiff has used delusions to demand the empire of Antichrist. 13. Not Boniface III, not Deusdedit, nor other Pontiffs. 14. Protestants glory of the word of God. But vainly.

Chapter 18: The things that the king introduces from Revelation chs.6 & 9 are refuted.

Summary: 1. Him who sits on the pale horse in Revelation ch.6 the king interprets to be Antichrist. 2. Response to the king's conjectures. 3. The place of Revelation can also be accommodated to Antichrist. However it is in no way damaging to the Roman Pontiff. 4. In another place of Revelation ch.9 the king strives to show that the Pontiff is the star falling from heaven. 5. Many calumnies are objected falsely against the Pontiffs. Idolatry, cult of demons, homicide, sorcery, fornication, theft. 6. Other testimonies accumulated by the king against the Roman Pontiff. 7. The fancies of Protestants rest not on truth but on calumnies. 8. By the star falling from heaven in Revelation ch.9 some understand the good angel. That fall in location is not a moral fall. There is confirmation in Revelation ch.20 from something else similar. 9. Some say that the star is Lucifer. They interpret of the same the rest of that vision. 10. Some accommodate the falling star to evil men. 11. Others transfer the vision to some signal enemy of the Church. 12. None of the ancients understood Antichrist by this star. 13. The star falling from heaven cannot be said of Antichrist. 14. On the assumption Antichrist is the falling star, it does not square with any of the Pontiffs. Objection of the king. It is refuted. 15. The smoke ascending out of the mouth of the pit cannot be accommodated to Boniface. 16. After Boniface no crafty locusts, but many very holy men, flourished in the Church. 17. Protestants foolishly sound the trumpet against Catholics. 18. The disciples of Antichrist will not, as the king wishes, be idolaters. 19. St. John is speaking of the sins, not the disciples, of Antichrist. 20. Response to the first of the calumnies of Protestants. Defense of Gabriel Vasquez from the crime imputed to him. Response to the second and third calumnies. 21. To the fourth. 22. To the fifth. 23. To the sixth. In the lavishing of indulgences no improper gain is got. 24. Response to what the king asserts last against the Roman Pontiff. 25. Ch.9 of Revelation has regard more to the wicked than to the state of the Church. If indeed the talk in John is of Antichrist, it thence follows that he has not yet come.

Chapter 19: The same is shown from ch.13, and everything that the king there picks up is refuted.

Summary: 1. Outline of Revelation ch.13 as to the first part of it. 2. The four properties of the beast that John narrates he saw are shaped by the King of England to fit the Roman Pontiff. 3. Response to the first point. Antichrist will not only be full of corruptions but rather everywhere the fullest and most corrupt; and his empire will first and chiefly be temporal, then he will arrogate divinity to himself. The leopard comparison is because of speed. 4. Response to the second and third point. The properties of the leopard and the feet of the bear fit Antichrist, not the Roman Pontiffs. The cult shown to the Pontiff is veneration, not divine worship. 5. The king badly compares empires with pagan and Christian Rome. 6. Outline of the second part of ch.13 of Revelation. 7. The next beast that John narrates he saw signifies Antichrist and his emissaries. 8. John also speaks of some primary helper of Antichrist. By the second beast is signified the singular prophet of Antichrist, to whom is assigned a double note: hypocrisy and counterfeit power. 9. This false prophet will perform cures, so that Antichrist may be worshipped as God. He will work false wonders. He will in appearance bring fire down from heaven. He will give voice to the statue of Antichrist, and make it to be worshipped. 10. The mark of the beast will be a sign whereby the supporters of Antichrist will be openly acknowledged. The name of Antichrist will recall the number 666 according to the Greek letters. That name is still unknown. 11. The aforesaid exposition is strengthened by the consent of the Fathers. Edibles for sale will by the mark of Antichrist be polluted. 12. So that there may be no place for the cross, the mark of Antichrist will be imprinted by the false prophet on people's foreheads. 13. The metaphorical expositions of the king are by the letter proved to be wrong. He does not want antiquity and solidity to be attributed to the Roman Church. 14. The beast properly signifies an individual man. But mystically it refers to the apostate congregation of heretics. 15. The Roman Church does not have the horns of a lamb, that is, hypocrisy. Nor does it teach or has ever taught errors like the dragon. 16. The darts of the heretics are turned back against themselves. Henry VIII and his like are the true images of the beast. The Anglican Church is of the same form. 17. The signs that King James says are made for strengthening the authority of the Pontiffs. Signs always were and always will be in the Catholic Church. 18. Miracles were done formerly by many saints. 19. Miracles are not done primarily for the authority of the Pontiff, but for the glory of Christ and the confirmation of the faith. They indirectly establish pontifical authority. 20. Excommunications discharged by the Pontiffs King James makes up to be the fire from heaven. 21. The fire in John does not signify excommunication. Excommunication is not a new thunderbolt, but was wielded before the times of Boniface. 22. Instance. Solution. 23. When the Pontiff is venerated, the image of the beast is not worshipped. In John it is one thing to make an image, another to worship it. 24. The words of Revelation are weighed. Excommunication has the force of compulsion, not seduction. 25. The mark of the beast is fabricated by the king to be obedience to the Pontiff. It can be better said of the Anglican oath of fidelity. John is speaking of a permanent sign, not of mere profession. 26. No one without the mark of Antichrist will be admitted into human contracts. 27. King James' opinion about the number of the name of Antichrist. 29. The number is not of the time of the coming of Antichrist. The year in which Boniface assumed the See does not allow of that number. Evasion. It is a thing unaccustomed to count years from Pompey. A second evasion. It is parried. 30. Boniface vindicated from a usurper the name already given to the Pontiff Leo. 31. The king contends that the word 'Latin' contains the number of Antichrist. Heretics are on this interpretation antichrists, since they are also themselves Latins.

Chapter 20: The things the king notes about chapters 14, 15, & 16 are shattered.

Summary: 1. The King of England tries to prove that Antichrist must be killed in Rome. Antiquity is opposed to his invention. The king would more truly say that Rome is to be destroyed by Antichrist. 2. In Revelation, as in other prophecies, the order of things is sometimes not kept to. The plagues of Revelation will be true, not allegorical. King James on this place of Revelation pours out curses and abuse against the Pontiff. 3. The darkness in the plague of the fifth vial is sensible, not intelligible. 4. Protestants unskillfully confound the vial poured out into the Euphrates. 5. The kings, about whom the discussion is in ch.16, will not fight against Antichrist but for him. Proof from the words of John. 6. Heretics are like those kings and are against God and his Christ by conspiracy alone. 7. King James compares the alumni of the Society of Jesus to little frogs. Such office is glorious for the Society. 8. The interpretation is not coherent. The unclean spirits are posited by the king now as the enemies of Antichrist, now as his friends. 9. The workers of the Society of Jesus sow peace not discord.

Chapter 21: From the vision of Revelation chs.17 and following the new error about Antichrist is refuted rather than confirmed.

Summary: 1. King James teaches that the harlot woman is Antichrist and accordingly the Pontiff. He proves this with calumnies. 2. That woman signifies a city, not a man. Some understand it of the city of the impious, others of the Roman City. 3. Other calumnies are shown to be false. 4. Christian Rome is in no way drunken with the blood of the martyrs. 5. The king confounds the notes of the woman and of the beast. 6. He asserts too that Christian Rome has committed fornication with kings. He is refuted by his own words. 7. If Rome is to be restored to its prior state near the end of the world, the words of Revelation do not square therewith. 8. The Roman Church can never be antichristian. 9. That the Pontiffs give indulgence to lusts is sheer calumny. 10. The Church never approves invalid marriages. Legitimate dispensation does not make marriages illegitimate but honorable. 11. The king carps at the adorning of the Blessed Virgin and of temples. The adorning of temples is not new in the Church. 12. Images in the Church are decently clothed. There is greater religion in the adorning of the Blessed Virgin, especially at Rome. 13. The king tears with insults at the liberality of Catholics towards religious. 14. Concession of power for slaughtering kings with impunity is falsely attributed to the Pontiff. The Pontiffs have lavished indulgences on those who are fighting against pagans. 15. Various concessions are reported from Anglican history. 16. The falsity of the things said is proved from the form of the concessions. 17. The question whether it is licit to kill a tyrant with impunity does not here have place. 18. After other insults, the king carps at the pride of the Roman Church. Old Rome believed herself a queen because of the empire. Not pride but faithful charity exalts the Church. 19. Notes of the true Church. 20. Prosperity bends both ways. Tribulations are more frequent in the Church. 21. God provides moderately, even with miracles, for the prosperity of his Church. 22. King James weighs the Pontiff and the Turk in the same scales. However, there is no agreement between light and darkness. 23. The greatness of the Pontiff was from the time of Christ already established. It became, at the time of Constantine, known to the world. The Turks got the possession of things a long time later. Nothing of greatness was added to the pontificate when Mahomet was on the march.

Chapter 22: From the description of Antichrist in the prophet Daniel, the fable handed on about Roman antichristianism is refuted.

Summary: 1. The prophecies of Daniel are very little brought forward by King James. 2. In Daniel empires are shadowed forth by animals. Description of Antichrist. 3. By the ten horns of the fourth beast an equal number of kings in the Roman Empire are represented. 4. Whether this number is definite, or put for an indefinite one. 5. The Fathers think the number is definite. 6. The King of England explains the number. In this matter anyone is permitted to have an opinion. Ten and seven often indicate an indefinite number. 7. It is more certain that ten is put for a definite number. 8. The foundations of the King of England are overturned. 9. The number seven is here more distinctly handled. Antichrist is an instrument of the demon. 10. Two places in Revelation about the number seven are expounded. 11. The ten horns of the beast the King of England interprets of all the Christian kings from Boniface III. 12. About the little horn King James is altogether silent. What others have thought about it. 13. The opinions of the King of England are overturned by the words of the prophecy themselves. 14. The little horn will rise up after the Roman Empire has been divided. 15. Boniface III did not, as Daniel prophesied, erect a new empire. 16. King James inflicts a signal injury, not only on foreign kings, but also on English ones. 17. False interpretation given by the king to the words of Revelation. In the text of John, to be conquered is not to be converted but to be overthrown. 18. The ten kings are never going to wage war against Antichrist. To give in one's heart is to permit. Rome will not be the seat of Antichrist. 19. Description of Antichrist. He will arise from ignoble and indigent parents. 20. He will obtain the kingdom by cunning, not by heredity. He will get hold of power tyrannically. 21. He will misuse the sharpness of his mind for pride and ill speaking. 22. He will trample on religion, and will try to turn things sacred upside down. He will arrive near the Day of Judgment, not before. 23. The same notes of Antichrist are inculcated in other places by Daniel. What Daniel said of Antiochus rightly falls on Antichrist. 24. Antichrist will place himself in the temple as God. 25. Also belonging to him are the things foretold by Daniel of Seleucus and Epiphanes. 26. The individual words about them and about Antichrist are considered. Some seem to belong to Antichrist alone. The persecution of Antiochus against the Jews is an advance display of the persecution of Antichrist against the faithful. 27. Contempt of God in Antichrist. Antichrist will not worship the gods of the nations, but he will perhaps in secret worship the demon. 28. Other prophecies of Daniel in chs. 11 & 12 about Antichrist. 29. From what has been said, it is clear that antichristianism in the Pontiffs is sheer imposture. The falsehood is from the comparison made more apparent. The expositions of Protestants are not only willful but also violent.

Sum of the things treated of in this book with an appeal to the King of England

Summary. 30. Sum of the whole book in more or less each chapter. 31. Heretics a type of Antichrist. 32.

Appeal to the King of England.

BOOK 5: ON ANTICHRIST, WHOSE NAME AND PERSON, THROUGH CALUMNY AND INJURY, ARE FALSELY ATTRIBUTED TO THE PONTIFF BY PROTESTANTS.

Preface:

Since the most learned and Catholic writers of our time (to pass over the more ancient ones) have accurately disputed the whole matter of Antichrist, and since we, in our meager way, have already prosecuted it elsewhere, this book can seem to someone too little necessary, especially because it is not so connected with the previous ones that the order of doctrine should seem to require it. However, the King of England, to whom we proposed at the beginning of this book to make response, compels us even unwillingly to undertake again this labor. For he in his Preface, after profession of his faith, suddenly digresses to discussion of Antichrist, and demands a particular response to the things that he proffers for his opinion, saying: "This is most of all in my desires, that if it please anyone to refute this my conjecture about Antichrist, let him respond in order to the individual parts of my disputation;" and therefore we think it necessary both to digress with him and to grant a particular response to his individual conjectures. For we have also not judged it should be omitted for the reason that the king professes to support himself on conjectures alone; because in a thing so absurd and plainly incredible and exceedingly odious to the Church and pernicious, conjectures are not even to be permitted but altogether rooted out. For which cause I have not been afraid to weave together again a disputation of Antichrist, nay also, if it be necessary, to repeat again the same things, provided that, insofar as in me is, I make satisfaction to all both the wise and the unwise, for to both, on the witness of the Apostle in Romans 1.14, are we debtors. Lest however we be irksome to the reader, we will not touch on all things that are wont about Antichrist to be dealt with, but those only that can be of service to the cause and to the particular response that the king demands. And the individual members that the king distinguishes we will also individually examine, not however in the same order, but we will always put forward first things which either are more evident, and in the Scriptures clearer, or knowledge of which we judge can contribute something to what is less known or depends on things prior.

Chapter 1: On the name of Antichrist and its diverse signification.

Summary: 1. Etymology of the name. 2. False etymology of this name by heretics. Antichrist signifies an adversary of Christ; proof from Scripture. 3. Proof again from the Fathers. 4. Twofold signification of the name of Antichrist.

1. Before we speak about the matter itself we have thought to put first a few things about the name of Antichrist, so that we might uncover all the artifices of the Protestants, or rather their outrages, against the Vicar of Christ. That the name Antichrist, then, is Greek, or taken from the Greeks, there is no one who does not know. Now it is composed from 'anti' and 'Christos' in which compound it is certain that the name of Christ, which is proper to Jesus our Savior, is being used. For although this name, as derived from 'anointing', is more general and is wont to signify any man who has, by some sacred anointing, been assumed in dignity, according to the verse, Psalms 104

[105].15: "Touch not mine anointed [Christs]," nevertheless it signifies by antonomasia, especially after his advent, the Messiah or Christ the Lord, as he had also in the Old Law been before signified, as John 4 indicated, v.25: "I know that Messias cometh, which is called Christ," and as is expounded by Augustine Tractat. 15 and 33 on John, and very well by Cyril Cateches. 4 'Mystag.', Eusebius bk.1 Histor. ch.3, and bk.4 De Demonstrat. ch.10, and Lactantius bk.4 ch.7, and others whom I referred to extensively vol.3 part.3 disput.18 sect.2

2. The heretics, however, contend that the word 'anti' in that compound signifies, not opposition, but vicariate or substitution in place of another, and thus that he is Antichrist who calls himself the Vicar of Christ. But they are assuredly being led by a spirit to deceive the simple, at least by the inept adaption of the name. And therefore, passing over that question of the double signification of the term 'anti' considered in itself and in the general usage of the Greeks, we must only consider it as far as it is taken in that compound name according to the use of Scripture, the Church, and the Fathers. In this way, therefore, it is certain that it signifies contrariety and opposition, and that the name Antichrist designates a signal enemy of Christ. For the Church has taken this term from Scripture, wherein it has no other signification. For nowhere is this word itself found in Scripture except in the epistles 1 and 2 John, and there it clearly signifies an enemy of Christ. For after John had said, 2.18: "Ye have heard that Antichrist shall come," he subjoins later, v.22: "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is Antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son." From which words it is clearly certain that Antichrist is opposed to Christ in denying that Jesus is Christ, namely him especially promised, composed of a twofold nature in one divine person, and especially anointed by the very divinity itself and the Holy Spirit, and accordingly by antonomasia Christ. Hence in chapter 4 he repeats, v.3: "Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God; and this is that spirit of Antichrist." But not to confess Christ is nothing other than to deny that Jesus is anointed with divinity, namely by the singular union of humanity to the Word; and this is the height of opposition to Christ, as the same Apostle again explained in epistle 2 when he says, v.7: "For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and Antichrist." Therefore in Scripture that term has no other use. But in other places of Scripture, wherein Antichrist is not named but described, a supreme adversary of Christ is depicted. For in Daniel 9 and Matthew 24, by the "abomination of desolation" it is believed that Antichrist is foretold, and of him is it said that he will usurp the seat and name of Christ and will stir up a very great persecution against Christ in his Church. And about the same are understood the words of Christ John 5.43: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." Of the same also speaks Paul 2 Thessalonians 2, where he loads him down with these names, v.3-4: "that man of sin...the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." And finally, so that Paul might show the supreme opposition of Antichrist to Christ, he adjoins, v.8: "And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." In Daniel, again, and in Revelation Antichrist is described as a signal adversary of Christ, as we shall see below.

3. And in this way did the holy Fathers think about Antichrist and his name when expounding these places. Chrysostom Homil. 4 on John, Cyril bk. 3 on John 6, and on that place Theophylact, Euthymius, and Bede, and Irenaeus extensively bk. 5 Contra Haeres. ch. 25, Ambrose on Psalms 43 and bk. 1 De Spirit. Sanct. ch. 14, Nazianzen Oration. 47 which is entitled 'Significatio in Ezech.' and in the iambic inscription 'Definitionis minus Exactae' at the end, Ruffinus in Exposit. Symbol., Hilary bk. De Unit. Pat. et Fil. somewhat from the beginning, if it is his book. Better and more certain is the book Contra Auxent. at the beginning: "The property of the name of Antichrist," he says, "is to be contrary to Christ." And Jerome epist. 151 to Algas. q. 11: "For he himself is the perdition of all things who opposes Christ and is therefore called Antichrist." And for this reason bk. 2 Contra Jovinian. at the beginning he says: "As day and night cannot be mixed, so neither justice and iniquity, sin and good works, Christ and Antichrist." Augustine tract. 3 on the epistle 1 John says: "In Latin 'Antichrist' is 'contrary to Christ';" and later he blames those who were interpreting the name of Antichrist, that is ante-Christ, and he says: "It is not said thus, it is not written thus, but Antichrist, that is contrary to Christ." And very well speaks Damasius bk. 4 ch. 27: "Not to us but to the Jews will he come, not for Christ but against Christ, for which cause too is he called Antichrist." And in vol. 9 of the works of Augustine, the author of the tractate De Antichristo thus begins: "Those who wish to know about Antichrist will note first wherefore he is thus called, namely for this reason, that he will be contrary to Christ in all things, and will do things contrary to Christ." And although that tractate not be deemed Augustine's, it possesses authority and is believed to be of Rabanus. And Hugo Eterianus bk. De Regres. Animar. ch. 23 says: "A man will he be, not an angel, who is adversary to Christ and his members, hence he is to be called Antichrist." And we will refer to many others in the following chapter.

Since heretics, therefore, cannot deny this etymology or signification, what does it profit them to have changed the etymology of the word, to have attributed to it out of their own brain a new signification, even to call the Antichrist by the name Vicar of Christ? For if they study in this to strive about the name alone, they are to be contemned and sent back to the grammar schools. But if under the appearance and shadow of a name they strive to give persuasion that he under this proper verbal signification is true Antichrist and as if adversary of Christ, because he calls himself Vicar of Christ and precisely Antichrist in the other signification they have thought up, such that they understand to be Antichrist, not any enemy of Christ, but him who, under the name of his Vicar, is opposed to him, we reply, to begin with, that he who names himself Vicar of Christ by no robbery or usurpation, but because he has been established by Christ, is no enemy of Christ and in this respect cannot be Antichrist. Next we say that that sign of Antichrist is not found in the Scriptures, nor is it handed down in them or by the Fathers, namely that Antichrist will oppose Christ under the form of his Vicar, but by openly usurping the very name and dignity of Christ. And therefore, omitting this vain thought and novelty, we must run through the signs of Christ founded on Scripture.

4. But I cannot omit from noting first that, from this etymology of the name and from the said testimonies, a double acceptance of this term must be distinguished. One we can call proper, the other common or transferred. For because the name of Antichrist signifies a man opposed to Christ, it is taken by antonomasia as the proper name of a certain individual man, the greatest adversary of Christ and the Church; but it is also in a general way said of other enemies of Christ. Thus double acceptance of the name is used by John in the said first epistle when he says, 2.18: "As ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists." And later insinuating the reason for this latter signification he says, v.22: "...but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is Antichrist..." And he repeats more or less the same in ch.4 and in the second epistle. And thus, from this place, this double acceptation of this name has been noted there by the Fathers, and on Matthew 24 and 2 Thessalonians 2, where Jerome, Chrysostom, Oecumenius, and others. And Cyprian epist.76 at the beginning very well says that John "calls all those who went out from the Church and who were acting against the Church Antichrists." And later: "Hence it appears that the adversaries of the Lord are all Antichrists;" and more or less the like things are contained in epist.7. Augustine too bk.2 Contra Adversarium Legis et Prophetarum last chapter says about him: "God is true, in whose temple that false man (that is, Antichrist) will sit, to whom will he too belong (that is, the adversary of the law), who under the name of Christ, which is the name of God, that is, wishing to be seen a Christian, always exalts himself against Christ and shows himself Antichrist, not that one who is greater than the rest, but one of those of whom John the Evangelist says that now are there many Antichrists. For he meant them, the heretics, who had already begun to exist in the times of the apostles." The same in bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.19. Hence Jerome too Naum. 2, treating of the verse 1 Peter 5.8: "Your adversary the devil as a lion, etc." subjoins: "the whelp of the lion Antichrist, and all perverse doctrines, etc." And later: "Ye have heard, says John, that there are many antichrists, for there are as many antichrists as there are false dogmas." And on Matthew 7 at the end he calls all those antichrists "who think against Christ." All which things confirm what we have said, that Antichrist is called thus from supreme opposition to Christ, and hence is the name derivatively used to denote the other more signal adversaries of Christ. Just as we too in common usage say that a man very cruel is a Nero, and that a like tyrant is a Diocletian, and that a great philosopher is an Aristotle, and thus in other cases. About this transferred signification, then, there is no doubt; but there remains a controversy with heretics about the second signification, which we will pursue in the next chapter.

Chapter 2: Whether Antichrist is properly said to be some individual man, or some seat or empire.

Summary: 1. Opinion of heretics. 2. Catholic truth holds that Antichrist will be an individual man. Proof from the Scriptures. 3. Consideration of the individual words of the Apostle Paul adduced for the proof. 4. Proof from the Fathers. Antichrist will not be a demon. 5. Another reason from Theodoret. 6. Consideration of the words of St. John. 7. Consideration of the other words of the same Apostle. Proof also from the Greek article. 8. Confirmation from Daniel. 9. In Daniel the last king was not Mahomet or another tyrant. 10. Confirmation again of the truth from the authority of the Fathers.

1. Heretics contend that he is not an individual man but a series or kind of persons succeeding to some seat or empire; which error they have thought up so as to prove that the Pope is Antichrist. Wycliffe art.30 and John Hus art.19, condemned in the Council of Constance sessions 8 & 15, insinuated this error. Luther more clearly on ch.49 Genesis, where he by this reason rejects the common opinion asserting that Antichrist will be of the tribe of Dan, which he says was an invention of the devil. And a certain Rodolphus

Gualterius in his homilies on Antichrist ridicules those who assert that Antichrist will be a definite individual man. Thus too Beza on 2 Thessalonians 2 says that Paul, although he speaks of Antichrist as of a certain man, nevertheless understands the whole body of ecclesiastical tyranny, but in such way that he is indicating a particular tyranny, namely the Roman. Hence he concludes that they were all manifestly hallucinating who understood Paul to have spoken of some one man, unless they grant that there is someone who survives from Paul's age up to the Day of Judgment. Lastly Calvin too in the same place, and bk.4 De Iustit. ch.7, makes the same supposition when he says that the Pope is Antichrist. And this opinion has pleased King James, who admits he is led only by conjectures; but of what sort they are we will later see.

2. The Catholic truth and by faith certain is that Antichrist properly or antonomastically taken will be some individual man, a signal and particular adversary of Christ. Thus teach wise and Catholic men who have in this age disputed against heretics and have treated this point with great care and erudition. It is also proved in brief from Sacred Scripture and the Fathers. And I consider, to begin with, the place in 2 Thessalonians 2 where, although Antichrist is not by this name expressed, nevertheless that Paul is speaking about him is taught by all saints and Catholics, nor do heretics deny it; nay they introduce the same place for the contrary, as we will see later. In that place, then, Paul is instructing the Thessalonians not to be perturbed by thinking that the day of the Lord, that is of the Last Judgment, is already near at hand, because the advent and persecution of Antichrist must come first. Hence he says, v.3-4: "Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped, so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." And later, v.8: "And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume, etc."

3. Assuredly, if the individual words are carefully weighed, they cannot be properly and sincerely understood except about an individual and definite person. For who is wont to call some throne or seat of a kingdom "man of sin" or "son of perdition"? For the like words do not in strictness signify a collection or succession but a determinate person, and they are not by violence or without cause to be removed from their proper signification. Especially because that man is clothed and described by Paul and the Prophets with so many circumstances, manners, and conditions that they must necessarily fit only one person. As when Paul says in 2 Thessalonians 2.9: "Whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders," and the like, because it is not plausible that in all the successors or kings of some kingdom all those properties and qualities of morals will exist. Add that Paul did not say 'man' absolutely but along with the Greek article, 'that man of sin', as also Ambrose reads in the Latin and as Vatablus translates; but the Greek article has the force of pointing to an individual person, as I will show below from the Fathers. Nay, it is deserving of note that Paul repeats the article four times, saying: "that man of sin, the son of perdition, he who opposeth etc." and later: "And then shall that Wicked be revealed, etc."

4. Moreover, thus have the Fathers understood this place. St. John Chrysostom orat.3 & 4 on that place, who makes clear the individuality of the person of Antichrist through comparison with Christ. For just as Christ had been foretold as an individual man, and definite indications were given about him, that is, through the signs and portents that he was going to do, so Antichrist is opposed to him, and his advent is foretold as of a certain particular man, and he is indicated through the signs and false portents that he will work. Therefore in this way Antichrist will be a determinate person, just as Christ was. Thus too Theophylact, when expounding those words, asks: "But who is he? Is he Satan? In no way, but some man who receives all the working of Satan." And the same more or less is contained in Theodoret who gives more consideration to the antithesis between Christ and Antichrist, saying that the demon imitates the counsels of God. "For just as God, having taken up human nature, secured our salvation, so the demon, when he chooses a man who might take up all his working, will try through him to deceive all men, calling himself Christ and God and man." Where we note only the equivalence in this, that each is a definite and particular person, for in the manner there is diversity. For not in the way that Christ is the word in assumed humanity will Antichrist be the person of the demon by hypostasis in assumed nature, as some have falsely imagined, whom we have attacked elsewhere; therefore comparison is only made in this respect, that as Christ was an individual man, so also will Antichrist be. Hence too Theodoret himself wisely changed the manner of his speech, for of Christ he said: "just as God, having taken up human nature, etc." but of the demon he says: "so the demon, when he chooses a man who might take up all his working", thinking that there will not only be a specific nature but also a particular person among others chosen by the demon as fit for all his own corrupt working.

5. Nest, in the same words of Theodoret another reason can be weighed. For the chief and greatest intent of Antichrist will be opposition to Christ, because he will try to prove that he is Christ and true Messiah and to show himself "that he is God," as Paul says in the same place. But this cannot be thought about any throne, or in the succession of those sitting on it. For as Christ was not foretold save as a particular man, so no one will imagine himself Christ except in his particular person. And although many have imagined themselves Christ, yet none save in his own person and for his person; and among them he who excels in signs, portents, lies, and power will by antonomasia be Antichrist. Hence Ambrose in the same place says that Antichrist will be "first and supreme of the corrupt men who have wanted themselves to be worshipped as God." Rightly too does Tertullian say, bk.5 Contra Marc. ch.16: "He who is man of sin, son of perdition, must first be revealed before the advent of the Lord, etc. Antichrist, indeed, according to us, as the ancient and the new prophets teach."

6. Moreover, thence do Ambrose, Chrysostom, and all the Fathers join with the cited words of Paul the other words of Christ in John 5.43: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." In which words it is manifestly certain that Christ is speaking of some determinate person whom the Jews will receive as Messiah. And in this way do the said Fathers and all those mentioned in the previous chapter interpret of Antichrist those words of Christ. And Augustine tract.29 on John, when expounding the words of ch.7.18: "He that speaketh of himself seeketh his own glory," says that such will be Antichrist, "the Lord, obviously announcing that he will seek his own glory, not the glory of the Father, says to the Jews, 'I am come, etc.'"; and Ambrose on Psalms 43 says that Christ signified by those words that "the Jews will believe in Antichrist, who did not wish to believe him." And the same is contained in bk.1 De Spirit. Sanct. ch.14. For although there were going to be many false Christs and false prophets, as he himself foretold in Matthew 24, whom other Jews were going to receive as Messiah, as we read in Acts 5 was in part fulfilled, and afterwards in Eusebius bk.8 Historiar. ch.6; nevertheless the Jews will receive no one as Messiah in the way they will Antichrist, and therefore him singularly we understand Christ to have designated by his words. And thus too Cyril of Jerusalem Cateches. 12 said: "The children of the Jews rejected him when he came, but await him who will come in evil; the true Christ they have denied, but will themselves in their error receive the false one. About which thing also our Savior truly said, 'I am come, etc.'" But that the false Christ will be a certain individual man and Antichrist is made clear by the same Cyril extensively in Catech. 15.

7. Besides, this is plainly confirmed by the way of speaking in 1 John 2.18: "As ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists." For in these words he distinguishes a certain Antichrist individually named and foretold from the many called so by a certain participation in him and transference. Therefore he plainly supposes that the former is a particular person. Especially because those many antichrists, whom John said that there already were, were not many kingdoms or tyrannical empires, but either the many who were already rising up from the Jews against Christ, or the many heretics, as Ebion, Cerinthus, Simon Magus, or also the Roman Emperors who were persecutors of Christians, like Nero, Domitian, as the Fathers everywhere expound; therefore too that individual Antichrist is one certain and definite person. Add that in the said words, and a littler later, and in ch.4 and epist.2, wherever the name 'Antichrist' is put in the singular, it is put with the Greek article 'ho', that is, 'the'; which article has the force of designating a definite person and with a certain individuality, according to the general rule of the Fathers which is handed on by Eiphanius bk.1 Contra Haeres. sect.9, and bk.2 'haeres.' 56, and by Chrysostom Enarrat. on ch.7 Isaiah where he ponders that the Prophet did not say, v.14: "Behold a virgin will conceive," but added the article to designate an individual and excellent virgin; and Cyril bk.1 on John ch.4 near the end ponders that John added the article when he said: "In the beginning was the word;" and Origen vol.7 on John [the Baptist] about the words: "Are you the prophet?"

8. For confirmation also of this truth many arguments can be taken from places in Daniel and Revelation wherein that Antichrist is predicted is both taught by the Fathers and not denied by heretics. Therefore Daniel ch.7, after he has explained that the fourth beast is a fourth kingdom, namely that of the Romans, afterwards to be divided among ten kings, he subjoins, v.24: "and another shall rise after them," by whom all the Fathers understand Antichrist, as Jerome testifies on that place, and he is followed by Augustine bk.20 De Civit. Dei ch.23, and by St. Gregory bk.32 Moral. ch.12, where the particle 'another' sufficiently points to an individual person, whose actions the Prophet at once describes in a way sufficiently consonant with Paul. And certainly it cannot at least be denied that on the throne and in the empire of him who will fight against ten kings, and who will destroy three and subject the other seven to himself, there will be some first king who will rise up against the others; he must, then, be a certain and determinate person; now he will be Antichrist. Both because on him in particular converge all the things that are thereon added, v.25: "He shall speak great words against the most High, and shall wear out the saints of the most High, etc." And most because the time of that king will be so short that there will be to him no successor, but in him and with him the throne is to be extinguished, as we will show below from the same place of Daniel, and from chs.11 & 12, and from Revelation ch.11 and following, and from the words of Paul, 2 Thessalonians 2.8: “whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth,” and from other places.

9. This argument also proves that the last king signified by the little horn was not Mahomet as some have wished, nor any like tyrant. Hence too this truth is confirmed from the circumstances of time, place, origin, wars, and from others similar with which the Antichrist to come is described in the places of Scripture mentioned, which we will treat of later; for an individual person cannot be more evidently designated than by circumstances of this sort, or (to speak with the dialecticians) through a collection of properties that cannot come together save in a single and particular individual; but thus is Antichrist described in Scripture; therefore it cannot be denied but that he will be a particular person.

10. Next, of the Antichrist individually foretold by Daniel, by Paul, and by the evangelist John, all the most ancient Fathers who wrote about him everywhere suppose that he will be an individual man, whose race, morals, and other proper circumstances they describe. As is clear from the things that are handed on by Irenaeus bk.5 Contra Haeres. from ch.25, by Hippolytus orat. De Consummat. Mundi, Ephrem tract. De Antichrist. in vol.1, Cyril of Jerusalem Cateches. 15, Ambrose bk.10 on ch.21 of Luke, where he numbers three Antichrists, the Devil, Arius and all similar heretics, and the individual and famous Antichrist who will persecute the Church at the end of the world. Thus too is Antichrist depicted by Lactantius bk.7 Divin. Inst. chs.16, 17, & 18, and he concludes: “Now this is he who is called Antichrist, but he will lie that he is himself Christ and he will do battle against the true Christ,” and he repeats like things in Epitom. Institution. ch.11. And in the same way does Hugo Eterianus speak bk. De Regress. Animar. ch.23, Prosper in Dimidio Temporis from ch.6 up to 16, but in particular Jerome on Daniel 7 when he says: “We think Antichrist to be some individual among men, in whom Satan will wholly dwell.” He supposes the same in epist.151 to Algas. q.1, where he expounds extensively the place of Paul to the Thessalonians. The same is contained in Theodoret on the same places of Daniel and Paul. And likewise Chrysostom orat. 3 on 2 Thessalonians says that Antichrist will not be Satan himself, “but some man taking up all his working.” Where Theophylact has the same words when he says: “He will not be Satan but some man.” Cyprian too bk.3 Ad Quirin. ch.118 expounds of Antichrist the verse of Isaiah 14.16: “the man that made the earth to tremble,” assuredly supposing that he will be a particular man.

Augustine bk.20 De Civit. Dei ch.19 says: “There is no doubt that he spoke thus about Antichrist and about the Day of Judgment. For thus does he call the day of the Lord and says that it will not come except he will first have come whom he calls a fugitive, that is, from the Lord God. But if it is rightly said of all the impious, how much more of him.” And later treating of the place in John he says: “Just as before the end many heretics have come forth from the middle of the Church, whom he says are many Antichrists, so all then will from there leave who will not belong to Christ but to the last Antichrist.” And ch.23 expounding Daniel in this way too he says: “Antichrist’s future most savage kingdom against the Church, although it is to be sustained for a small period of time, until by the final judgment of God the saints will receive an eternal kingdom; he who reads these things without drowsiness is not allowed to doubt.” In addition the same is taught by Gregory bk.14 Moralia ch.11 where he says that Antichrist will be the head of the all the wicked, and that the things said in Job ch.9, are in such wise understood of each of the wicked “that they should also be referred specially to the head itself of the wicked.” And in bk.13 ch.12: “The ancient enemy,” he says, “will enter into that man of perdition who is specially titled Antichrist.” And lastly Damascene bk.4 De Fide Orthodoxa ch.27 says: “Everyone who does not confess Christ is Antichrist. But yet he is said in a peculiar and chief way to be Antichrist who will come before the destruction of the world.”

Chapter 3: Satisfaction is made to two objections by Protestants taken from Daniel and Paul against the doctrine of the previous chapter.

Summary: 1. Improper interpretation of Beza on Daniel. 2. Response. 3. What Daniel understood by the name of the beasts. 4. By the name of the beasts are indicated the first kings. 5. The ten horns represent the same number of kings. 6. Another interpretation of Beza on St. Paul. 7. The heretics pretend a double meaning to the name of Antichrist. Antichrist is in type multiple, in person singular. Heresiarchs are called Antichrists. 8. The interpretation of Beza is attacked from the same words of Paul. 9. Opinion of the King of England.

1. Since, if Antichrist is going to be one individual person, the fantasy of the heretics, that Antichrist is to sit on the throne of the Apostolic See, vanishes, they attempt to attack the truth demonstrated from the Scriptures with the same Scriptures. And first Beza objects the place of Daniel 7 where by the four beasts four kingdoms are signified; but each one of those kingdoms lasted for much time and had several kings, who were signified by the individual beasts; and in the same way in the same place the ten horns of the fourth beast are said to be ten kings, who need not be individual persons but a series of several persons on the seat of one kingdom; therefore one must, for the same reason, say about the kingdom of Antichrist that it is signified by the little horn, not however that it is one man, but that it is one throne, on which many will by succession sit; of whom the collectivity is called by Paul ‘man of sin’, because it will be as it were one body of tyrants succeeding each other.

2. I reply, to begin with, that there is a dissimilarity in reasoning about the signification of words and reasoning about the representation of things appearing in figures or images, as of beasts or animals. For words have their own signification, as it were permanent and common, from which they are not to be dragged away except where necessity or sufficient authority compels, and most of all is an improper or metaphorical sense to be avoided when, from other words and circumstances, joined together in the very context and discussion, the propriety of the discussion can be made clear. But apparent things or images do not have per se a stable signification but only the one for which they are then assumed or imposed when they appear; which signification is metaphorical or as it were analogical, and depends on the will or intention of God revealing, and therefore it is very obscure and cannot be understood unless it be made clear in words by the same Prophet, or the meaning be gathered from other places of Scripture, or at least afterwards it finally be recognized from what happens. Paul, then, did not speak about Antichrist in visions of images but in words, and by such words does he point him that he is plainly speaking about him as about one individual person, and his morals and circumstances he so describes that they are wont to come together only in one, and not in all, of those who succeed on some throne.

3. But Daniel in truth narrates the future things revealed to him, not in words, but in the images of beasts. Hence he indeed uses words that immediately signify beasts, and in order to point out that they are not true but imaginary, he does not say absolutely, the first was a lion, but like a lion, the second like a bear, the third like a leopard; but the beasts themselves were signifying what, by a certain analogy, they were imposed and shown for representing, and did not have another improper or transferred signification. And therefore they could easily represent kingdoms and not certain persons, or conversely, according to the choice of the revealer. Hence therefore it happens that by the beasts are sometimes signified kingdoms, sometimes certain persons. For in Daniel 7 by the lion having wings of an eagle is signified the kingdom of the Chaldaeans, by the bear the kingdom of the Persians and Medes, by the leopard the kingdom of the Greeks, and by the fourth beast the kingdom of the Romans. But in chapter 8, however, by the ram is signified King Darius, by the goat Alexander, as is expounded by Daniel himself. Therefore from representation by a vision of beasts no argument can be made for the signification of the words, for it varies, or it is imposed at the choice of the revealer; but the words are of themselves fixed and certain, unless it be clear from elsewhere that they are being transferred to a metaphorical sense.

4. Besides I add that though by beasts be signified kingdoms in Daniel ch.7, nevertheless by them singly is principally signified the first founders and extenders of each kingdom, in whom are found principally the properties that are represented by such images and visions. And thus the winged lion chiefly represented Nebuchadnezzar, the founder of the kingdom of the Chaldaeans, a very fierce man and given to lust, as Jerome notes, who says also that the bear, because of its hardness and fierceness represented Cyrus, the greater founder of the empire of the Persians. But the winged leopard represented Alexander, the head of the empire of the Greeks, who subdued the world with great force and speed. Thus therefore by the fourth beast is signified rather Julius Caesar or Augustus Caesar, although it seem more probable that a particular man was not signified, because that empire was at the beginning not a monarchy but an aristocracy.

5. Now by the ten horns of that beast are said expressly to be signified ten kings, namely, those who are going to subdue ten kingdoms, into which they will divide the Roman empire. Thus therefore by the little horn is represented a king indeed, the beginner of a new empire, who is none other than Antichrist, as Jerome, Theodoret, and all the Fathers have understood. But there is a difference, because about the other empires, of the ten kings, it is not said how much their thrones were or are going to endure; and therefore both the founders themselves and their successors could be represented by those very images of beasts for the ten horns; but about the empire of Antichrist it is signified sufficiently, both there and in the other places to be dealt with below, that it will last a short time, and therefore by that little horn the empire of Antichrist is so signified that it is also represented by one only and individual person.

6. Second the Protestants object the place of Paul 2 Thessalonians 2, and they say (as I reported above from Beza) that unless there be given one man who remains surviving from Paul's times up to the Day of Judgment, Antichrist cannot be some definite individual man; for Paul in the cited place when he taught the Thessalonians, v.2, that "the day of the Lord" (namely for judging) is not yet at hand, because, v.3, "except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed," that day will not come, he subjoins, vv.6-8: "Now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work [or: he doth already work the mystery of iniquity]; only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth." Paul, then, teaches two things, namely that Antichrist had already then begun to work his iniquity and apostasy from Christ that is to be consummated by Antichrist at the end of the world, and that he himself must be killed and then the day of the Lord will come. But these things cannot be understood of the same person, because one and the same man cannot work iniquity in the time of Paul and continue persecuting the Church up to the end of the age, and then be revealed and killed by Christ.

7. Because of this testimony some have said that Nero was Antichrist, whose opinion we will treat of below in chapter 4, because they did not deny that Antichrist was a particular person. That opinion set aside then, Protestants either do not know or pretend not to know the double signification of the name of Antichrist set down in the second chapter, for the objection made proceeds from ignorance thereof. For just as John said: "Antichrist shall come, and even now are there many antichrists," because there is one who is individually foretold and many who, by participating in his iniquity, prefigure him as it were, so also Paul said that Antichrist had already in his time begun to work iniquity, although it is to be consummated at the end of the world. The heretics err, therefore, in not distinguishing between Antichrist commonly and properly said, or (which is the same) between Antichrist in type and in person. For Antichrist in type is not one person, but a body or succession of many tyrants persecuting the name of Christ. But the proper Antichrist in person, and who has been by antonomasia foretold, is a unique and singular person. But Paul spoke about both in the place cited. For when he says: "the mystery of iniquity doth already work," he is speaking of Antichrist in type. Whom at that time many Fathers understood to have been Nero, especially Chrysostom on that place, and Theophylact. And the same Chrysostom serm. De Eleemosyna and collat. and homil. De Praemiss Sanctor. and Ambrose there and Jerome epist. 151 to Algas. q.9. Tertullian touched on it in bk. De Resurrect. Carn. ch.24, and Augustine bk.20 De Civitat. ch.19, where indeed he says the interpretation is uncertain because of the ambiguity of the place, but he does not condemn it. He adds however another, which is followed by Theodorus and Sedulius on Paul, namely, that any heresiarch and enemy of Christ is included under him who works "the mystery of iniquity." But this matters little for the present; for all agree in this that he who was then working the mystery of iniquity was not Antichrist but a type, an image, a precursor, or a signal member of Antichrist. To signify which Paul did not say simply 'he works iniquity' but 'works the mystery of iniquity', either calling Nero the mystery of iniquity, if the word 'mystery' is the subject of the proposition and is put in the nominative case and he is called mystery because he was a figure of Antichrist; or certainly calling the persecution itself by Nero the mystery of iniquity in the accusative case, because Nero by persecuting Christians was working the mystery of iniquity, that is, tyranny, which was the image of the future persecution of Antichrist.

8. Hence so far is it from being proved by that place that Antichrist proper is not one definite person that rather the opposite is proved by it. For Paul evidently distinguishes the mystery of iniquity, or him who was then working the mystery of iniquity, from "that Wicked..., whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth." Nay, he thence teaches the Thessalonians that the Day of Judgment is not yet at hand, because “that man of sin” had not yet been revealed, that is, the true and proper Antichrist. About whom he also subjoins: “Now ye know what withholdeth, etc.” namely, lest that Antichrist come. But Paul does not plainly declare what it was that was detaining the advent of Antichrist, but he signifies that the Thessalonians already knew it, because when he was with them he had instructed them (as he at once subjoins) that Antichrist would not come until the Roman Empire were taken out of the way, or were to come to that state wherein it could by Antichrist be altogether destroyed, as the Fathers expound. Therefore Paul always supposed that Antichrist proper is someone else distinct from him who was then working the mystery of iniquity, and about him he always speaks as of an individual man, as I considered in the preceding chapter.

9. Hence too the King of England in his Preface p.67 admits that from that place is rather proved that “the time at which the Antichrist will come, and there will be a universal falling away, was not going to arrive except a long time after when Paul wrote that epistle.” For this very thing is what Paul handed on to the Thessalonians, and he studies to prove from that principle that not only had Antichrist not yet come but neither was he to come soon, otherwise he would not rightly have concluded that the day of the Lord was not yet at hand. Nevertheless, the same king yet does not deny that Antichrist is a particular person, although he tries to prove it, not from that place, but from another, as we will see in the next chapter.

Chapter 4: Satisfaction is made to another objection, taken from Revelation ch.17, against the solution of the second chapter.

Summary: 1. Objection of the King of England from Revelation. 2 Response. 3. By the name of whore is understood pagan Rome or the world. 4. The beast on whom the whore was borne was not Antichrist but his figure. The emperors too, the persecutors of Christians, are signified in the scarlet beast. 5. Nero was in figure the beast and the mystery of iniquity. 6. By the seven kings some understand the persecutors of the good in the seven ages of the world. 7. Others understand by the beast Antichrist and his precursors. The seven heads do not signify an indeterminate number. The persecutions of the Church are nine according to some, more according to others. 8. Nero the first persecutor of the Christians. Other persecutors after Nero. 9. Reason for doubt to the contrary. Response. 10. The persecution of Julian the heaviest. 11. The King of England by the seven heads understands the seven forms of the governance of Rome. 12. This is shown to be fashioned without foundation. 13. The same must be said about the decemvirs. 14. The governance of the Pontiffs is not signified by John through the king who is said to be the seventh. The contrary is repugnant to the words of Revelation. 15. From the time of Boniface nothing of the ancient faith was changed.

1. Third, the King of England objects in his Preface p.98 where he thus speaks: “That by the whore of Babylon, who rides on the beast, is designated the seat of some empire and a continued series of certain men in succession presiding over it, and not some one man, is clear from the form whereby Antichrist himself is described in diverse places in the book,” that is, in Revelation; and he introduces ch.17 of the same book wherein John reports that there was shown to him, v.3 “a woman sitting upon a scarlet coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns.” About which woman he concludes at the end of the chapter, v.18: “And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.” From which the king concludes that “the woman cannot signify the definite person of one man, but several men continually succeeding to each other, whose seat is that great city.”

2. I reply that though we grant the king that the city signified by the woman is Rome, as he himself intends, and that the seven kings signified by the seven horns are the seven forms of governance of that city, and that the eighth will be Antichrist, as the same king on his own judgment outlines; although, I say, we freely grant all these things, I do not see whence he might infer, with foundation in the text, that Antichrist is not one definite person. For although the woman signifies a city, wherein there is, represented by the beast, some empire with succession of several kings or several forms of governance, nevertheless the beast, which is also said to signify Antichrist, could signify one tyrant and one man. Neither can from the text anything be inferred that even apparently signifies something else. For if perhaps the argument from similars be made, that if the woman signifies a city and the beast an empire with succession of people presiding over it, the beast too, in order to represent Antichrist, will in a similar way signify a series of tyrants, etc., assuredly the consequence is of no moment. For these imaginary representations, or enigmatic figures are not always shown or proposed to signify the same thing, or in the same way, as is evident of itself.

3. I add that, in the exposition of the king, whereon he founds his objection, there are indeed things, in which he agrees with some Catholics, that are probable but unsure; but there are other things proper to the king that can hardly or in no way subsist. For, in the first place, although it be probable that the whore represented Rome, as Jerome expounds epist. 151 to Algas q. 11, and Tertullian bk. 3 Contra Marcion and Contra Iudaeos, who do not understand Christian Rome but pagan Rome, yet it is also very probable that she represented, not some particular city, but the city of the devil or of the world, in the way Augustine distinguished it, that is, the whole troop of the impious, from the city of God. In the way too that Jerome said, on Psalms 54, that there were two cities in the world, Babylon and Jerusalem. “By Babylon,” he says, “the evil are understood.” And these are wont by Scripture to be called the world. For thereto all the things agree that are said about the woman; for with her all the kings of the earth committed fornication, and by her were all made drunk who inhabited the earth, that is, men, as it were, earthly and animal. And the rest in like manner. But with this interpretation of the woman laid down, it is not necessary that the beast on which she is seen to sit is Antichrist, but Satan, as many writers have taught; for the devil sustains, as it were, the whole body of the impious, and therefore is she said to sit on him; and the rest that is there said is easily accommodated to the devil. Since therefore the devil or Satan is not a collection of persons succeeding to each other in some kingdom, but a certain individual person, it is not necessary that the beast, as the king wishes, represented a continued series of persons, but the one prince of demons, who, to attack Christ and his Church, uses, through succession of times, his own satellites, as well the bad angels as wicked men and many tyrants.

4. Besides, although we grant that “the whore of Babylon” (as the king says) is Rome, and the beast on which Rome sits is Antichrist, it is not necessary that the beast is the sole or the true and proper Antichrist, but rather one should say that the beast was first Antichrist in figure or mystery, but eventually, in the proper and true Antichrist, is to fail. And accordingly, although we grant that the Antichrist represented by the beast demands not one man only but a succession of many, nevertheless we say that the succession is fulfilled in the emperors who by their own malice and tyranny prefigured Antichrist; but when the succession will be completed in the true Antichrist, he is to be only one individual person. But how conformable this response is to the Evangelist will easily be understood by him who has carefully considered how appositely the Roman emperors who exercised tyranny over Christians are signified by the “scarlet coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy;” for that these epithets are not attributed to the woman but to the beast is both taught by all interpreters and is manifest from the Greek text. For it is called “scarlet” because, v.4, it “was arrayed in purple and scarlet,” as is said later; but by purple is empire wont to be signified, because it was as it were the proper mark of that dignity, and, in order to explain it further, the beast is said to be “decked with gold and precious stones and pearls.” It can also be said to be ‘scarlet’ because of the blood of the martyrs, about which it is said later, v.6: “And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs.” For although the beast shed blood, and therefore can be called scarlet, yet the woman, that is, the city, was drinking it, by the fact she was drunken, persecuting the Christians with hatred and by worshipping idols, because of which she is in the same place called, v.5: “mother of harlots and abominations of the earth.”

5. But that the beast in its representation not only includes Antichrist in person but also in figure, is sufficiently indicated by the word ‘mystery’ that is interposed by John, and it is very well explained by the words of Paul 2 Thessalonians 2.7: “the mystery of iniquity doth already work,” namely Nero, who in the persecution of Christians began to foreshadow Antichrist, as all the Fathers expound. The same is also very well declared by the other words there subjoined, and thus are they understood, Revelation 17.8: “The beast that thou sawest was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit.” “Was” namely in mystery and figure, because before John began to describe it Nero was already working the mystery of iniquity, whom many emperors afterwards imitated. “Is not,” however, in person, but “shall ascend out of the bottomless pit and go into perdition,” as had been foretold of the person of Antichrist in chs.11 & 13. Next, thus too can the other words subjoined later be not incongruously understood, vv.8, 11, and “the beast that was” (namely in figure), “and is not,” that is, has not yet come, “even he is the eighth,” because he is a distinct person from the seven emperors who, by their tyranny, more signally represented him, and therefore he is “of the seven,” because he will usurp their empire and will increase and consummate their cruelty; yet he “goeth into perdition,” because he will reign a short time and will be at once condemned. So from this interpretation, which is very probable, is rather collected that, just as the seven emperors, who worked the mystery of iniquity of Antichrist, were definite and individual persons, so too Antichrist proper, who will come after them, will be a definite and individual person. Nay, although the first seven heads can be so understood or expounded that in them singly are understood not only unique persons but some succession of persons, nevertheless the eighth, who “was and is not,” will be a unique individual person, because he will last a very short time, and will at once without succession go “into perdition”, as is signified in the same place.

6. Wherefore, to solve the objection, it matters little to expound who the seven kings are, who the Angel said in interpretation were signified by the seven heads of the beast. For in whatever way those kings be understood, Antichrist, who will be after them, will be a unique and individual person, which I briefly declare according to the two more received expositions. One is that of the many who, for explaining those seven kings, distinguish seven ages of the world: the first from Adam up to the Deluge, the second from the Deluge up to Abraham, the third from Abraham up to David, the fourth from David up to the Babylonian Captivity and the end thereof, the fifth from the end or the return of the people from captivity up to Christ, the sixth from Christ up to Antichrist, and the seventh they attribute to the times of Antichrist. Hence in the first six ages they say that by individual kings are understood all the cruel kings and tyrants who in individual ages persecuted the saints. Of which kings “five are fallen,” as John says, v.10, “and one is,” that is, the sixth, “and the other is not yet come,” namely Antichrist. About whom the same John adds: “and when he cometh, he must continue a short space,” so as to signify that although the first kings continued, not in one person, but in a succession of many, because their ages were lasting, yet the last age will be very brief, and therefore the king who will rule in it will be one only and individual person. However, according to this exposition, the beast, which is immediately said to be the eighth, is not understood to be Antichrist, but the devil, of whom it is said that he “was” in the former ages, because he was loosed, but now in the sixth age it is said that he “is not,” because he has been bound by Christ, and afterwards it is said that “he shall ascend out of the bottomless pit,” because he will be loosed in the time of Antichrist, and in him will he come and with him will he reign.

7. The other exposition supposes that by the beast is understood not the demon but Antichrist, or rather the Roman Empire, not absolutely and in all its fullness, but as working the mystery of iniquity, that is, of the persecution of Christians in the precursors of Antichrist up to the true Antichrist, who will pour out all iniquity. And thus is the beast well and in conformity with Paul understood to have begun in Nero. But it is said that he has seven heads because of the emperors his successors; under whom some think are included all who in that empire persecuted Christians, whether they were few or many, a definite number being taken as indefinite, or as universal. But this is difficult of belief, since John distinctly numbers five who have gone before, one who is, and another who will be; for this very distinct computation is not done in an indefinite number. And therefore others properly understand the words of the seven emperors only who were from Nero up to Nerva. For John lived and prophesied at that time; and therefore he mentioned only the mystery of iniquity that in the time when he was writing had partly preceded, partly was being worked, partly was to endure next, but from there he made a transition to Antichrist. Which also seems difficult. For why are others not there numbered, especially Trajan, who at more or less the same time, and while John was living, very bitterly vexed the Christians? Hence it can be added that by the seven kings can be understood some more signal of the persecutors of Christ who were among the pagan Roman emperors and were types of Antichrist. For although the persecutions of the Church are numbered in various ways, nevertheless they can, by a consideration not to be despised, be reduced to the number that can be accommodated to the vision. For Severus Sulpicius bk.1 Sacr. Hist. numbers only nine persecutions of the Church, beginning them from Nero. But others from the same beginning number ten, on the evidence of Augustine bk.18 De Civit. Dei ch.52. Thence Sulpicius posits one that is omitted in Augustine’s narration, and conversely; wherefore we might easily reduce them to seven or eight. But Augustine does not think one should begin from Nero, nor stop at Diocletian, as others do, and therefore he thinks they are in some greater number, and that indefinite and to be multiplied with the variety of times.

8. But whatever be true of the thing itself seen pure and in itself, in its order to the place of John that we are now treating of, not without cause is Nero said to be the first persecutor of Christ, because John is not speaking of all the enemies of Christ but of Antichrist and his precursors; and perhaps he was not speaking absolutely and simply about all of them, but about those on whom the Roman empire or the Roman city was seated. Now among these Nero was the first who after Christ launched, by public edict, a war against Christ, because of which Paul said of him individually: “the mystery of iniquity doth already work;” about which mystery John too seems to be speaking, as I said, and therefore rightly is he reckoned the beginning and as it were the foundation of mystical antichristianism in the Roman empire. But after him John numbers another seven, in whom it is probable that he numbers and understands those who were the heads of new persecutions of Christians. For as Optatus said bk.3 Contra Parmenianum: “A new persecution of Christians in the Roman empire is thought then to have been made when by a public edict of the Emperors Christians were for some new reason vexed;” and therefore not all who continued a persecution begun by one are numbered distinctly among persecutors and mystical antichrists, but those only who either renewed persecution in new ways and with new edicts or who restored one that had already ceased. Thus after Nero are numbered among persecutors Domitian, and after him Trajan, although others intervened between them, and thus can the others be counted, as Marcus Aurelius, Decius, Diocletian, Julian the Apostate, or someone else similar.

9. But in the way of this exposition stand above all the words of John, where he says about the seven kings: “five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come;” for John signifies by these words that when he was writing five of the seven had gone by and the sixth was actually ruling; but if so it is, there could not be counted in that number the emperors who were after John, as Decius, Diocletian, and others. However someone could say that John spoke in prophetic manner of the future, partly as past or present, partly as future, in diverse respects in their order to the Christian empire. Such that John says that the five chief enemies of Christ who persecuted the Church before the Christian emperors, that is, before Constantine, are fallen, of which sort can probably be reckoned the first five who ruled next after Nero, namely Galba, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, and Nerva, passing over Otho and Vitellius about whom, because of the brevity of time, no account is taken, and not counting Nero, because it is not necessary that he be included in that number. But the sixth, who is added as present, can be understood not badly to be Licinius, who right at the beginning of the Christian empire at the time of Constantine persecuted the Christians very gravely, on the evidence of Eusebius in Vita Constantini bk.1 ch.4, and bk.2 ch.1, and in Histor. bk.10 ch.9.

10. But the other, who is said will come after, can be understood not undeservedly to be Julian the Apostate, with whom rightly agrees that which John subjoins: “he must continue a short space,” and he was the last Roman emperor who persecuted Christ himself and the Christian name. For although many other heretical emperors assailed the Catholic Church, as Constans, and Valens, and Constantine Copronymus, and the like, they did not, however, launch open war against Christ but, under the Christian name, pursued true Christians. But of the other persecutors of the Church (although there have in various kings and sects been very many) account is not here taken, because, as I said, John is only speaking of the Roman empire. However, we admit that all these things are uncertain, because they rest, not on a sure exposition of the words, but only on conjecture and human accommodation; yet we only propose them so as to show that, in however probable a way that place is expounded, there is not therefrom collected that the eighth king, by whom Antichrist is designated, is some body of tyrants, or a series of kings succeeding to each other, but a definite and individual future man, as Nero was, or Diocletian, and the other emperors there designated.

11. But the King of England, indeed, not content with these expositions, has found a new one, or has learnt it from his Protestants, invented for this purpose alone, that they might accommodate the revelation of John to the Apostolic See. For he says that the seven kings are not definite persons, nor Roman emperors, but various forms of governance that in the City of Rome will from its beginning up to its destruction exist, which he says are seven, that they are understood by the seven heads of the beast, or by the seven kings, whom, he declares, the Evangelist declared by the seven heads. "For at Rome," he says, "there were first kings, then, when the kings had been driven out, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, tribunes of the soldiers. The sixth, at the time when John wrote Revelation, was of the imperial Caesars; the seventh, which had not yet come and was to last for a little time, is the ecclesiastical one of the bishops, which followed the translation of the empire from Rome to Constantinople. Although their governance," he says, "was in some way subordinated to the emperors." And later he adds that the eighth is Antichrist, which he declares in many words, saying that it is the governance of the same Roman bishops which followed after 276 years in the same see, namely from the time of Boniface III, as he later expressly says. All which things he brings forth, without any proof, by the mere authority of his word.

12. Before I proffer a judgment about this interpretation, I have judged I should preface an observation of Tertullian, in bk. De Preascription. ch.17 when he says: "An adulterating sense roars as much against truth as does also a corrupting pen. Diverse presumptions necessarily refuse to acknowledge the things that they are conquered by, and rest for support on things which they have falsely put together and which began from ambiguity." That this, then, has in this whole cause about Antichrist befallen the Protestants is manifest indeed from this very interpretation that we are treating of. For, to begin with, we require in the whole of it some authority or proof worthy of belief; for if all these things are justified as dictated by a prophetic spirit, such prophetic spirit must be shown to us in some sufficient sign or way; but if it is only human conjecture, or rather invented by accommodation, they are contemned as easily as they are said. Not only because human conjecture is for the most part mistaken, but also because it has no foundation in the text, nor in the words. Nay, the king twists them to a foreign and uncommon signification. Such as is that by the five kings who went before, or are fallen, may be understood kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and tribunes of the Roman City; and therefore did no one before the Innovators understand those kings so. Next, wrongly are those five members numbered as five kinds of governance of that city distinct among themselves and succeeding to each other. For the consuls persisted always from the time they began, and they held ordinary governance up to the emperors. For never before Julius Caesar was there in that republic ordinary governance by a dictator, but he was only sometimes by occasion created for a brief time. And therefore consuls and dictators cannot be said to have multiplied the kings or ordinary forms of governance in that city.

For the consuls always persisted, even if, when a grave occasion arose, a dictator was created, who ceased after six months, or when the occasion ceased. Hence it was only a sort of extraordinary support, not a change of governance.

13. The same or greater reason also militates against the decemvirs, because the decemvirs were created, not for change of governance of the republic, but only for the sake of passing laws, and they sometimes received the power of ruling the republic. But they ceased within three years, and part of that time they obtained not so much by authority of the republic as by force. But this is not enough for judging it a special change of kingdom or of governance, otherwise a change of kingdom would have to be numbered during the interregnum, when a hundred were governing but one presided over the rest, whose command lasted only five days, and in this way in turn they took lots during the circuit of the year. For this nature of governing was no less distant from the kingdom than the decemvirate from the consulate, nor did the interregnum last for less time than the decemvirate. Finally, the same reason is more or less urgent in the case of the tribunes of the soldiers. Because there was, on account of adding the tribunes of the soldiers, no change at all in the governance or in the consuls, but the tribunes of the soldiers were added on from the people, being distinct more or less in name alone from the consuls. That distinction, therefore, and enumeration is not only willful but also strictly false and made up against the truth of history. For all histories distinguish only three times in Roman governance up to Constantine, of kings, of consuls, and of emperors; for the other dignities were only as it were concomitants to the times of the consuls, and were assistants on diverse occasions and in diverse ministries.

14. Besides it is incredible and intolerable that the seventh king be said to be the governance of the holy Pontiffs from Sylvester up to Boniface III. For at that time Rome was a whore committing fornication by the worship of idols, nor did she have in her hand a people full of abomination but of the doctrine of the faith and holiness. For although perhaps many worshippers of idols were found in her, the city itself believed Christ and adored the true God, and as such was seated on the shoulders of the Pontiffs. And therefore the governance of the Pontiffs, which was at that time, cannot be said to be one of the seven heads. Especially since John says that the scarlet beast was full of the names of blasphemy, on whom was seated a great whore. It is impious, therefore, to think that the beast, as the foundation or support of fornications, was represented in that head in any respect, or that it was, as to one head, the governance of the holy Pontiffs, or (which is the same) that this kingdom of the Pontiffs was one of the seven heads of the beast. Besides, it would be said of that seventh king wrongly that "he must continue a short space" if he has lasted for two hundred and seventy years; for although by comparison with the years following that governance was little lasting, absolutely and in itself it cannot be said to be short. And especially because in comparison with the preceding years it was more lasting than the governance of the first Roman kings, who were only seven and according to received opinion lasted at most two hundred and forty years, and from the beginning of the consuls up to the beginning of the empire of Augustus only four hundred and seventy eight years passed by, according to the more common calculation. Hence if that number of years be divided into three kingdoms, as the king wishes, each one of them lasted a far shorter time than did the kingdom of the holy Pontiffs, which the king makes the seventh; why then was it more said about it than about all the preceding that it must continue a short space? Nor do I omit to notice that altogether false is what the king interposes by the by and as if treating something else, that the governance of those Pontiffs was subordinate to the emperors, for the contrary was shown earlier.

15. What is supposed last, that the governance of the Pontiffs or the Roman bishops from the time of Boniface III was so diverse from the governance of the later Pontiffs that it was from Christian made antichristian, is an heretical dogma and an impious and mere imposture of the Protestants against all history, nay against experience up to the present day. For the same faith which existed in previous bishops persisted in Boniface III and his successors; and the primacy which then Boniface wished and professed to have, he did not usurp through rapine but inherited, so to say, from his predecessors; for they exercised and guarded the same primacy, as was demonstrated earlier, nor can there be shown in any other respect a substantial distinction of ecclesiastical governance. That distinction, therefore, of kinds of governance in the Roman See is vain, and consequently the whole exposition of the king, and the whole calumny of antichristianism imposed on the Roman bishops vanishes. And finally it is evidently proved that from the said place of John cannot be collected that Antichrist is a series of several men in the same kingdom, but rather the contrary is indicated, namely that he is going to be some individual man, although it may from other places of Scripture be more evidently proved.

Chapter 5: On the time of the persecution and death of Antichrist.

Summary: 1. About Antichrist four things are foretold: his rise, his kingdom, his persecution, his death. Various opinions of Protestants about the time of the advent of Antichrist. The King of England puts the advent round the year six hundred. 2. The persecution of Antichrist is proved from Matthew to happen not much before the Day of Judgment. Objection and its response. Antichrist is rightly said to be abomination, and his persecution tribulation. 3 The tribulation of Antichrist will cease after his death. In what the tribulation consists. 4. The persecution of Antichrist is to cease with his death. 5. The persecution of Antichrist will last three years and a half. 6. Proof from Daniel. 7. Proof again from Daniel and from Revelation. 8. A difficulty; it is solved. 9. Double opinion about the end of the persecution of Antichrist. 10. Third opinion of the King of England asserting that it cannot be known for certain. 11. Our assertion is proved once the authority of the Fathers is set down. 12. Opinion of more recent persons. It is disproved. 13. Opinion of others. 14. The place of Ezekiel poses no problem. 15. Though they signified a definite time, they make nothing against the true opinion. 16. The days from the death of Antichrist to the Judgment cannot be many.

1. Although from the mere propriety of the name of Antichrist, and from the certitude and individuality of his person, it is very evident that what is foretold of Antichrist is very ineptly applied to the throne of the Roman See, nevertheless, because the King of England strives to show the contrary, at least by conjectures, we think it worth the effort, by running through the three chapters to which he reduces the revelations made about Antichrist, namely the time of his advent, his seat, and the description of his person, to weigh them individually and to show in the case of all of them that not only is there thence taken no probable opinion for what is intended, but rather that the opposite is proved from them one by one. But we begin with the circumstance of time, because it is more known and more evident.

Now about Antichrist four things are foretold us, namely that he will come into the world, that he will rule in it, that he will persecute the Church, and finally that he must be killed by Christ. All these things are plain; for of his advent it is said in Daniel 7.8: “and behold, there came up among them another little horn.” About his kingdom it is added, v.24: “And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings.” But of his persecution it is said in the same place, v.25: “And he shall speak great words against the most High, and shall wear out the saints of the most High.” Finally about his end it is added, v.26: “But judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end.” Also more clearly in Paul 2 Thessalonians 2.8: “And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.” According, then, to all these four things, as many points can be asked about the time of his advent: first, at what time he will arise in this world; second, when he will begin to reign and for how long he will reign before he begins to fight an open war against the Church; third, when he will begin to persecute Christians, or for how much time he will continue in this persecution; fourth, when he will be killed, that is, how long before the Day of Judgment. And although in the order of time his rise and reign will be first, to us, however, can be more known the time of his persecution and death, because they are more clearly revealed in Scripture, and therefore we will speak first about them in the present chapter, but about the other two times in the following ones.

Protestants, then, speak variously about the persecution and end of Antichrist; for of his beginning some say that it was from the beginning of the Church, as was seen in the two preceding chapters. Others report the beginning in the 400th year of Christ, others in the 660th year, or thereabouts; others around the 1200th, as is extensively treated of by Bellarmine bk.3 De Romano Pontifice ch.3. But the King of England seems to choose the opinion that puts the beginning of Antichrist around the 600th year. For he says in his Preface p.98 that the kingdom of Antichrist began 276 years after the transference Constantine made of the empire from Rome to Constantinople, which, as is probably believed, was done in the 330th year of Christ; from which, with the addition of 276, are made 606, at the time at which Boniface III was on the See, from when the King affirms Antichrist began. Nor does he seem to distinguish between the persecution and the kingdom, because he asserts that both began under the same Boniface. Nay, he thinks that the kingdom of Antichrist began in no other way than by beginning persecution, by forging new dogmas, and by usurping the power of Christ himself in the earth. But about the time of duration of the same persecution he thinks that it is not definite, but is the whole future time from the beginning of the same persecution up to the end of the world, or near the end. For of the time of the death of Antichrist himself, or the end of his persecution and of his reign, the king has also defined nothing, but says he does not know how long before the Day of Judgment it will be, as will be clear from the foundations he has which we will consider in the next chapter.

2. Now we lay down, to begin with, that, as perhaps neither the King nor other Protestants will deny, the persecution of Antichrist is to finish near the Day of Judgment, or (which is the same) the judgment will be not much after the completed and finished persecution of Antichrist, but proximately or as it were immediately after it. Thus does Christ the Lord seem plainly to foretell in Matthew 24.29-30: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven and with power and great glory." Which words evidently describe the second coming of Christ for judgment, nor was there ever, nor can there be, controversy about this. But the tribulation of those days, about which mention is made in the same words, is plainly the future tribulation under Antichrist, about which the Lord had said a little before, v.21: "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." You will say that many Fathers and expositors understand these words of the tribulation of the Jews in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and Vespasian. For this was foretold by Daniel ch.9, where he foretells the future abomination of desolation in the temple, of which Christ in the same place makes mention, when he says, vv.15-16: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand), then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains." I reply that although it is probable that Christ wished to include this tribulation too, yet it cannot be denied but that he is speaking at the same time and chiefly of the future tribulation under Antichrist. Both because this is consonant with the preceding and subsequent words; for the disciples asked simultaneously about the time of the destruction of the temple and of the end of the age and of the advent of the Lord for judgment, because perhaps they thought they would be simultaneous; and so Christ replies with words that can be applied to each tribulation, and afterwards finally he starts to speak openly of the judgment. And also because strictly only the tribulation of Antichrist will be great, so that none similar was before or will be thereafter. And therefore Christ spoke most about it, and the same can rightly be called 'the desolation of abomination,' that is, of Antichrist. For as Irenaeus, bk.5 ch.25, rightly expounded, Antichrist himself is deservedly called the 'abomination of desolation.' 'Abomination' indeed because he will be a man supremely abominable, and surnamed 'of desolation' because he will bring about incredible desolation for the saints and Christians. Therefore from the words of Christ is sufficiently collected that immediately after the end and consummation of the tribulation done by Antichrist against the Church of Christ, the signs of the Day of Judgment will begin, and a little later Christ will come for judgment. Which thing will from the following be more confirmed.

3. We add second, therefore, that the tribulation is to end with the death and through the death of the same Antichrist, not before; for although Christ did not there express this, it is evidently declared in other places of Scripture; for Paul 2 Thessalonians 2.8-10: "And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming; even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness." From which words is plainly collected that Antichrist does not leave off his persecution until by Christ himself and by his order and command he is killed. For that tribulation will most consist in coercion by torments, in inducement by temporal promises, and in seduction by portents and false prodigies; but from these that Wicked will not desist until he is killed by Christ and his power is destroyed; therefore, on the evidence of Paul, the tribulation finishes through Antichrist's death, and not before. And this same thing is signified by Daniel 7 when he says that by that tribulation, v.25: "the saints...are to be given into his (Antichrist's) hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." And immediately he adds, v.26: "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume it and to destroy it unto the end." In which place it is manifest he is speaking literally about Antichrist, and all the Fathers and Catholic expositors teach it with unanimous consent. Hence the same Daniel in ch.8 speaking of Antiochus says, v.25: "he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand;" which words are also said of Antichrist in the person of Antiochus, on the authorship of St. Gregory bk.30 Moralia ch.12.

4. Next in Revelation 19 about Antichrist and a certain false prophet of his who, v.20: "wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast," it is said that "these both were cast alive into a lake burning with brimstone," and it is added about their associates, v.21: "and the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse," namely Christ, whom John had narrated that he saw first. It is clear then that the end of the future tribulation under Antichrist is also the future end of his kingdom and of his life. For although there be disagreement among Catholics whether he is to be killed in this world because of the words of Paul, or to be delivered into hell alive, as John signifies, or is to be swallowed up alive by the earth in a chasm of it so that, shut up there, he should die and be buried and his soul descend into hell, so that in this way the places may more easily be reconciled; this question is of no importance for the present matter, for in whatever way he is to finish the present life in this world among mortals, it is sufficient for us that he will not lose his kingdom or cease from persecution until he ceases to live in this world.

5. Third, one must say that the persecution is going to last for a brief time, namely for three years and a half, and thus it is to begin as many years before the death of Antichrist. So do all the Fathers teach. Irenaeus bk.5 ch.30. Hippolytus De Consummat. Mundi, Lactantius bk.7 ch.17 says: "It will be given to Antichrist to make the world desolate for forty two months. The same in Cyril Cateches. 14, Chrysostom homil.19 on Matthew, 'On the Imperfect One,' Ephrem tract. De Antichristo, Jerome on Daniel 7 & 12, who says: "the saints are to be granted into the power of Antichrist for three years and a half." Again Augustine bk.20 De Civitate Dei chs.18 & 23, who says: "That the very fierce reign of Antichrist against the Church will last a small space he even who reads this dozing cannot doubt." And at once he declares the same time. The same is contained in Prosper in Dimidio Tempor. ch.17 and Rabanus in tractate De Antichristo, which passes under the name of Augustine. And the same is the common opinion of the interpreters on Daniel 7 & 12, where see especially Theodoret on Revelation ch.8 and following, Victorinus, Primasius, Bede, Anselm, Rupert, Aretus, and those more recent.

6. This opinion is also founded first on the words of Daniel 7.25: "the saints...are to be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." In which words by the name of 'time' is signified a year, as is noted by Jerome, Theodoret, and all on that place, and Augustine bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.23, as is clear from Daniel 4.16: "Let seven times pass over him." And again, v.25: "and seven times shall pass over thee." And the same is repeated later. That usage of Scripture, therefore, exists most in that prophet, whom John in Revelation imitated. Again it is necessary that 'time' there signify some definite measure of time, because otherwise it could not be counted; but it cannot signify an hour, a day, a week, or a month, because the time would be too little; nor does it signify some multitude of years, because the duration would, against other places of Scripture, be too great. Lastly, time is observed chiefly in the motion of the sun, whose complete revolution takes up a year, and therefore rightly is it by the name of time or of one time signified; for when another turning of the sun begins, a new time as it were begins, but in no multitude of years can a reasoning in metaphor so definite occur that it should be signified by the name of time in the singular. Hence too is it understood that when it is said 'for a time' it is set down exactly as if it were said 'for one year', especially when at once 'and times' is added. But this plural is to be understood of two and not of more, both because that suffices for the force of the word, whose extent is to be limited, lest it could grow immense and increase without limit; which is repugnant to the intention of the prophet and to the addition of half a time that is immediately made, and plainly indicates that the time is taken strictly; and also because, as Jerome and Augustine above note, in the Hebrew the number there is dual, which is not in use among the Latins, and so the plural is put for the dual. Therefore the word 'times' there signifies two years; therefore they are three years and a half.

7. Add that (as Augustine above notes) this time is explained by the same prophet by a number of days; for thus he says in 12.11: "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand and two hundred and ninety days," which make three years and a half, and there are twelve days left over, which do not matter, because it is not necessary that the half year be precise, for in common speech a year is said to be half even if some days beyond six months remain. Besides, in Revelation 12 it is similarly said, vv.13-14: "And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child. And to the woman (that is, to the Church) were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent." Which place is understood by all of the time of the persecution of Antichrist with the same signification of those words. Hence a little earlier in the same chapter the same time is declared by days, when it is said, v.6: "And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days." And likewise in ch.11 by days and months the same time is explained, when it is said, v.2: "and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months," and about the preaching of Elijah and Enoch it is added, v.3: "And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth." Which do not make a complete three years and a half, for eighteen days are lacking.

8. Hence arises a difficulty, because it was said above that this time of months or years is not precise as to days, because it exceeds by some several days, but here days are lacking; yet it can happen that in the same number of months there be an excess or defect of days. But one must say that it is being thus narrated in order to the same effect, or to the same matter, but it could be otherwise in order to diverse things. Wherefore whenever there is enumeration by days, the number of days is without doubt precise, because it is required by the truth of the narration, although it not be necessary that the days at the extremes be complete, but it is enough that they have begun. Likewise too a narration by months requires a precise number as to months; however the last month can be incomplete, and therefore in the number of days there is not required so great precision. But if to a certain number of months a half is added, then it is necessary that the other months be complete, because the addition of half a month requires this for the truth of the number of the months, and nevertheless, as to the number of days, there is not required so great an equality, for a half month is said to be an incomplete month, whether it be precisely half, or more or fewer days than fifteen.

It is the same, therefore, when so many years are numbered, three for example, and a half is added; for the first years are required to be complete, but in the half there can be variety, because it is not always required to be either complete or precise as to the number of days and the completeness of the months. So, in the present case, the persecution of Antichrist will without doubt be three years and a half. And because in the other enumeration by days some days are added above the precise time of three years and a half, therefore those years must necessarily be understood as to the precise number of days, even if it is not necessary, as I said, that the last day is complete. But it is not necessary that the preaching of Elijah and Enoch lasts the whole time and all the days of the persecution of Antichrist; for they could be sent some days after the persecution has begun, or, which is more likely, be killed some days before the death of Antichrist, and consequently before the end of his persecution; and therefore, although Elijah and Enoch are said to be going to preach for three years and a half, or for forty two months, nevertheless these can be incomplete as to number of days, although in the persecution they are not only complete but even in excess by some days. And in like manner the Church is in that persecution said to flee into the wilderness, and there to remain for the same time of years and months, because the saints at that time will flee into the mountains, and hide themselves in solitude and will there remain. However it can happen that they do not at once from the beginning take themselves to solitude, but after some days from the beginning of the persecution, and therefore as to the number of days that very time of years or months will be reckoned less.

9. Fourth, one must say that the end of the persecution of Antichrist and his death will only by forty four days precede the Day of Judgment, or the Day of Judgment will be after a month and a half from the death of Antichrist. Against this assertion there opinions can be reported. The first is the ancient one of the Chiliasts, who said that after Antichrist's defeat Christ will reign with the saints in this lower world in complete peace and earthly glory for a thousand years. But this opinion I pass over, because it has already been rejected by the Church as manifest heresy, and because it is of no importance to the present cause, and has in other places been expressly dealt with by theologians, on Sentences 4 d.43, and by the expositors on Revelation ch.20, where can be seen Ribera and Perera bk.8 on Daniel at the end. With this opinion omitted, then, the second is that of those who say that the delay will be for a time of seven years. Because Ezekiel chs.38 & 39, describing the persecution of Antichrist under the names of Gog and Magog (as is the more probable exposition), says that when Gog has been conquered, that is Antichrist, and Magog destroyed, that is his army, there will be so great slaughter of enemies and so great peace among the people of God, that after the earth has been cleansed and purged for seven months in burying the dead, the inhabitants thereof will for seven years not need fuel from the woodland for lighting fires because the spoils from the arms of their enemies will suffice for that purpose.

10. But the third opinion denies that it can be known with certainty how great an interval of time will intervene between the death of Antichrist and the Day of Judgment. Which opinion is with so great exaggeration handed on by the King of England in his Preface p.74 that he says “the opinion which the Pontiffs follow, by understanding the time of three years and a half and so many days properly and strictly, is repugnant to the whole New Testament.” Namely because therein the Day of Judgment is announced not to be know by anyone and to come suddenly. And besides, what prophecies there are about this matter are so obscure, because of the various and often metaphorical signification of the words, that nothing certain can be collected from them. Hence he concludes, in the place cited, that a day is taken for a year and a definite number for an indefinite, or for a lasting duration.

11. Nevertheless the assertion set down is the common one of the Fathers. It is taught by Jerome on Daniel 14, by Theodoret orat. 10 on Daniel, by Bede on Revelation 8, by Anselm on 2 Thessalonians 2, and rather frequently by the moderns, Bellarmine bk.3 De Rom. Pontif. ch.17, Ribera and Perera above. The proof is from the cited place of Daniel 12, where, after it has been said that the persecution of Antichrist will last 1290 days, it is at once added, v.12: “Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days.” In which number forty five days are added to the first number, which is understood to have been done for no other reason than that for so many days and no more after the end of the persecution is the judgment to be deferred. For because in those days even he can sin and be damned who remained firm in the temptation of Antichrist, he cannot be proclaimed blessed within that number of days; but he who will have come to the end of those days constant in the same living faith is pronounced blessed, because the journey will now be finished, after which there cannot be sin. And thus have the alleged authors understood that place.

12. But certain others more recent say that from that place is indeed collected that there will be forty five days before the judgment after the killing of Antichrist, but that the judgment will not be immediately thereafter, because that is not there said. However, if the force be carefully considered of that beatification: “Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days,” as we consider it, both points are very probably collected therefrom. Because, unless after the 1335 days the end of the world and the judgment were immediately going to be, there would be no reason for those to be absolutely blessed who persevere up to that number of days, because they would still be living in danger. And for the same reason could they be called blessed who had persevered up to 1290 days, because they have already overcome the tribulation of Antichrist; and conversely could they be said to be more blessed who persevered up to 4000 days. Not therefore without mystery is that precise number of days posited, but because in it the wars and dangers of the saints on earth are to be finished. And this argument, as I will immediately say, has great force when a future time is so accurately counted in days, and in numbers great and small, complete and incomplete; for there is then denoted a great precision of narration, and that some mystery in that point is to be fulfilled, but here nothing else can be thought of except that it will be the future end of the world or (which is the same) the Day of Judgment.

13. Some say that the signification could be that not all the enemies of Christ and all the ministers of Antichrist are to be killed together with him, and therefore the persecution is not in every respect to be ended within the limit of those 1900 [error for 1290] days, but for another forty five days are the enemies of the saints to be killed; and therefore are they from that point to be called blessed because, with their enemies extinct, they could in greater tranquility serve Christ, even if the judgment is not going to be so quick. But this is a willful conjecture and not very probable. Both because the time of the persecution is sufficiently precisely counted in Daniel 7 & 12; and also because it is not likely that, when Antichrist has been miraculously destroyed, and his false prophet, there will be fear of enemies among the saints of the Church, or that there will be some minister of Antichrist who may dare to persecute them. Besides also because in Ezekiel ch.39 under the names of Gog and Magog victory against Antichrist and all his supporters, Gog and Magog, is described in such way that he himself and all his ministers are to be killed together; for thus is it said, v.4: "Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou, and all thy bands, and the people that is with thee." And later, vv.5-6: "Thou shalt fall upon the open field... And I will send a fire on Magog, and among them that dwell carelessly in the isles." This narration, then, does not admit of those delays, nor will they be necessary, since he is to be killed not by a human arm but divine virtue and by prodigies, not only Antichrist but all his army, and all his supporters. Therefore, by reason of victory and quiet from the persecution of Antichrist, all can be said to be blessed who have persevered up to the 1390th [error for 1290th] day; therefore by a higher and truer reason are they called blessed who have been constant up to the 1335th day, namely since they have come to the end of all dangers, and "they will stand in their lot at the end of the days," just as is at once said in the same place by Daniel 12.13. This exposition, then, is simpler, and more consonant with the words themselves.

14. Nor is there an obstacle in the words of Ezekiel 39 about the seven months for burying the dead, and the seven years for consuming in fire the arms of enemies, because they are not set down for predicting the future but for exaggerating the present slaughter. Therefore the sense is not assertive of future actions but is potential, that is, there will be so many corpses that for burying them seven months are necessary, and so many spoils of arms for maintaining a fire that they could suffice for seven years. Where also the seven months and seven years are not a certain but an indefinite time, that is, they could signify a long and a longer interval, as Bellarmine noted. And the same sense is seen by Ribera n.71 and he confirms it with other testimonies; but I know not why a little later it displeased him.

15. I note too that, if one understands that place according to the outer form and propriety of the letter, there is at most inferred that there will be seven years from the death of Antichrist up to the judgment, as in the same place n.23 Ribera hands down. Which indeed is no obstacle to our intention, because that time is sufficiently short for concluding that Antichrist has not yet come. However, with that sense supposed, there is no foundation left for the exclusion of it, namely that only for seven years is the judgment to be put off, at any rate from the force of that prophecy. Because Ezekiel only says that fire is to be maintained for seven years from the spoils of arms, but he does not say afterwards that this lower world will not exist for the human use of fire and fuel, just as it is. Nor is this latter to be collected from the former, but that only after the seven years, the arms now having been consumed, will it be necessary to collect fuel, or to cut trees from the woodland; therefore nothing certain is thence collected, although the brevity of the time be from elsewhere kept in confusion, as I will at once say.

16. Hence I add finally that, although the obscurity of prophecies and the variety of expositions be enough for this opinion about the forty five days not to be certain before a definition by the Church, nevertheless this does not prevent it being thought more probable or even simply true. In which too I note that, although it not be de fide certain that so many days or so much time precisely taken is to be interposed between the end of Antichrist and the Day of Judgment, nevertheless it is very certain that that time is sufficiently brief and cannot be put off for many years. For Christ the Lord said in Matthew 24.29: “Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened;” but it could not with propriety be said that a thing happens immediately after such a time which happens many years after the end of that time; nay, it is made very credible by those words that the signs which precede the Day of Judgment and follow the death of Antichrist will begin before those forty five days are finished, because this is indicated by the word ‘immediately’ put in place by Christ; and it is per se necessary that the Day of Judgment could be at the end of them and after the aforesaid signs, or a little later.

Chapter 6: Satisfaction is made to the first objection of the King of England against the doctrine of the previous chapter.

Summary: 1. The King of England contends that the kingdom of Antichrist will be of longer duration. 2. However he lacks foundation. 3 The seven beasts and the seven head are kings in league with Antichrist. 4. Other expositions of the same place. 5. Some Catholic writers understand by the name of the beast the Roman Empire. 6. This exposition is favored in part by King James. 7. The wound inflicted on the beast in one of its seven heads cannot be taken for the first siege by the Goths under Alaric. 8. The exposition of King James does not stand with other words in the same chapter. 9. Rome received no wound in its head from the siege of the Vandals. 10. King Odoacer seized but did not ravage Rome. 11. Totila gravely afflicted Rome but did not inflict any lethal wound on it. 12. The assertion of the King of England is refuted by an argument ad hominem. 13. Badly are certain words by the King added to the text of John.

1. Three arguments in particular I collect from the Preface of the King whereby he strives to prove that Antichrist will last for a longer time; but he himself does not distinguish between the persecution and the reign of Antichrist, because he either makes it of equal duration or at any rate judges that both will last a long time; and therefore we too in this chapter will speak about them as one, for we will later distinguish them more accurately.

2. The first argument then he takes from Revelation ch.13 joined to ch.17. For in the former John says, v.1, that he saw the beast rising from the sea having seven heads. And about the same he subjoins later, v.3: “And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed.” The King thinks, therefore, that the beast is Rome and the lethal wound that it received is the ravaging and as it were destruction done to it by the Goths and Vandals, and this wound he says: “will be cured in the head, or in King Antichrist, who will then arise and take possession of the kingdom for a long time.” Which he seems no otherwise to confirm than from consonance with the other ch.17. Therein too John narrates that he saw a beast having seven heads, which heads he declares to be kings, to which he afterwards adds an eighth, who, v.11, “is also of the seven,” and who “was, and is not.” And he (as the King expounds) “is Antichrist, who will begin to reign at Rome, after that Christian Rome, by the working of iniquity, has been plainly corrupted, and has lost the integrity of religion.” Hence, because he himself reckons that this has already been completed, and that “the lethal wound inflicted on Rome by the Goths has long ago been cured, and still the same throne continues at Rome,” he himself infers that Antichrist and his reign will last a much longer time than for three years and a half.

In all this way of arguing I find no force of reason or authority, because it is asserted capriciously and assumed without proof, because it serves his own opinion, yet nevertheless we are putting it forward lest we seem to omit anything, and so that we may, when we have for the occasion explained this vision of John, further confirm Catholic truth. About the vision of ch.13, then, we reply briefly that it is very probable that the beast represented Antichrist. For all the things immediately said about the beast are the proper works and signs of Antichrist, and because there is at once introduced another beast which proclaims the first and foreshadows his name, which all understand of the name of Antichrist. And thus did the ancient Fathers expound this place. Irenaeus bk.5 chs.28 & 30, Hippolytus orat. De Consummat. Mundi, Methodius in a like oration, Ephrem in tract. De Antichristo, Gregory bk.33 Moralia ch.26, Ambrose, Rupert, Andreas, Aretinus, Anselm, and other expositors of Revelation.

3. Now although there is diverse exposition of his seven heads, yet the simpler and more received is that they signify seven of the ten kings who will exist at the time of Antichrist and that are signified by the ten horns in Daniel and in John. For because three of them will be killed and destroyed by Antichrist, but the other seven will be subjected and allied to him and will reign at the same time with him, submitting to him their fasces, therefore is Antichrist said to have seven heads. Hence the addition that “one of the heads was as it were wounded to death” need not be understood of the proper person of Antichrist; for this is not said there, but that he will in one of his heads be gravely wounded and will be cured. Therefore, not the beast, but one of his heads will receive the blow, but the beast himself will cure the blow, in external appearance to be sure, in some marvelous way, such that, v.3, “all the world wondered after the beast, etc.” Therefore the sense is that one of those seven kings who serve Antichrist will be lethally wounded, perhaps in some war, or by receiving properly and literally a lethal wound in his own body, and he is afterwards to be suddenly cured by Antichrist in so marvelous a way by the art of the demon that all will be seized with admiration and will worship Antichrist. Or at least the understanding is more metaphorical about a wound in the state and the kingdom, because one of those kings will be conquered by enemies such that he seem to be altogether destroyed and deprived of his kingdom, and suddenly he will by Antichrist with supreme power be cured, that is, will be restored to his original state and kingdom, the enemies overcome, so that all should say, v.4: “Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?” Or perhaps both will happen and are signified together.

4. Hence, according to this exposition, when later in the same chapter Antichrist is called, v.12: “the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed,” the wound must be understood not to be in him but in one of his heads. And, in the same way, what is said later, v.14: “which had the wound by the sword, and did live,” must be understood that he had it in one of his allies, who will be as it were his members. Unless perhaps Antichrist will himself have seven kingdoms and in one of them he will receive that blow, which he will suddenly restore and cure. But in whichever of these it be understood, a long duration in the kingdom of Antichrist is not thence collected, both because all this could be done in one month, and also because it could happen in the course of his reign before the persecution of Antichrist begins, according to what must be said in chapter 9. And according to this exposition it is clear that wrongly is the vision of ch.17 conjoined with this one of ch.13, both because perhaps the beasts seen in each may signify diverse things, as is clear from what was said above; and also because, although they signify the same Antichrist, yet they do not signify the same kings; for in ch.17 seven kings are signified who existed in succession, for there it is expressly said, v.10, that five have preceded, and one is, and another is going to be. But in ch.13 seven kings seem to be signified who will exist together with Antichrist, and so they are not rightly joined together with each other. Then, finally, because, although from ch.17 there be collected a duration necessary for the succession, it is not, however, in Antichrist proper and his kingdom, but in a succession of tyrants who will precede him and foreshadow him and be as it were his precursors, as I have made clear in chapter 5.

5. But I add that there are not lacking Catholic writers who interpret the beast in ch.13 to be the Roman Empire, and the seven kings to be perhaps the same seven who in ch.17 are also represented by the seven heads of the beast. Which is certainly not an improbable opinion, since in the said ch.17 it is very probably that the beast is the Roman Empire, as I said in chapter 4, and it is likely that the same beast is signified in both places; but I think this must be understood of the pagan and tyrannical Roman Empire represented in those seven heads. Nor is the common opinion for that reason excluded, that the beast is Antichrist; for the understanding is not that he is so adequately, so to say, but because he will be the chief head of that beast. For he will seize the Roman Empire (its name destroyed), and will increase and complete the tyranny of his predecessors. With this exposition in place, the head receiving the mortal blow will be Antichrist himself, who will suddenly cure himself to the admiration of all, whether the blow was only a true lethal wound, properly cured before death was completed, or whether the blow was death itself, not genuine but feigned, and the cure was also a feigned resurrection, as Primasius on that place wishes, and Bede, Anselm, and some others, and it is the opinion of Gregory bk.11 epist.3 when he says that the coming Antichrist will pretend to die and rise again. For this too is likely, so that he may pose as Christ, and it is not alien to the words. From which sense too the King of England has nothing whereby to show that the duration of Antichrist's empire will be lasting, because the thing done could happen in a short time; nor does St. John say in that chapter that the beast will reign for much time after he has been cured from the blow.

6. To this exposition, indeed, King James seems in large part to accede, as to what concerns the signification of the beast. For as he judged that the beast in ch.17 is the governance or the empire of the Roman city, so he seems to think that the beast of ch.13 signifies the same empire or governance. Hence, as a result, he says that the beast wounded in one of its heads is Rome, "which received a lethal wound from the Goths and was afterward cured," and again, "therein Antichrist reigns for much time." About which interpretation, or adaptation, insofar as he expounds the beast to be the City or its empire or governance, we have no controversy; for although it is less probable, it does not contain error against the faith, and therefore we permit it. But what the king then adds, that the wound inflicted on the beast in one of its heads is what Rome received from the Goths and Vandals, is confusedly said, because Rome was rather often wounded by those enemies; and no explanation is given of when it received that wound, and by whom it was through Antichrist cured, or in the time of Antichrist. Which if we run through each point briefly, it will be manifest that, in whatever way the king understands it, it cannot be applied to the exposition.

7. For the first Roman siege of the Goths was made by Alaric, in the year of the Lord 410, and at that time indeed we do not deny that, by a fitting metaphor, the City of Rome could be said to have received a mortal wound. Yet nevertheless it is wrongly said that John spoke about that, because the wound was not inflicted on the beast in one of its heads, as John said, but in the very body of the beast, namely in the city itself; for the head, which the beast then had (as the king himself wishes) was the Roman See or the Roman Pontiff. But the Roman See suffered no evil from Alaric. For, in the first place, Innocent, who was presiding at Rome, when Alaric almost destroyed it, had left to compose peace between Alaric and the emperor, and had stopped at Ravenna, “God thus providing that he should not see the destruction of the City,” as Orosius says bk.7 ch.39, and it is touched on by Sozomen bk.9 ch.7, and by Nicephorus bk.13 ch.35; where he subjoins that he had permitted his soldiers to plunder the houses and pillage the wealth, but he ordered them to spare the one temple in which is the tomb of the Apostle Peter. “Which thing,” he says, “was the cause that all Rome did not utterly perish. For since very many had flocked together there from fear, they, having been saved because of reverence for the Apostle, restored the City with buildings anew.” Therefore, neither the See of Peter, nor the person of the Pontiff who was then sitting, received a wound, but the city itself, which because of the multitude of vices, and especially because of the remains of idolatry, is believed to have received that scourge, as the same authors and many others hand down. Therefore not rightly are the words of John applied to that destruction when he says, v.3: “I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death.”

8. Hence much less can the other part of that prophecy be adapted to this interpretation, for John says, v.3: “and the deadly wound (which one head of the beast had received) was healed; and all the world wondered after the beast,” namely after Antichrist, about whom is subjoined, v.4: “And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast, and they worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast?” Namely because in some extraordinary and marvelous way he cured the deadly wound, as all expound. With which interpretation the King does not disagree when he adds: “And thus that lethal wound, which it had received from the Goths and Vandals will be cured in that head, or in King Antichrist, who will thence arise.” But this cannot subsist if what the histories deliver is compared with that the king himself elsewhere supposes. For the wound inflicted on Rome by the Goths under the leadership of Alaric was at once cured, not in an extraordinary way or by the virtue of the demon, but by the special providence of God, men cooperating in a common and ordinary way. For Augustine says in his tract or sermon De Excidio Urbis that God by a special providence did not wish then to destroy Rome but to castigate it; and therefore he kept many citizens safe, by whom the city was afterwards restored. Which is further made plain by Nicephorus in the place and the words above cited when he says: “since very many had flocked together to the temple of St. Peter because of reverence for the Apostle, they restored the City with buildings anew.” Which restoration could have been brought almost to perfection in a few years.

9. But forty five years later Genseric, king of the Goths, besieged the city and began to burn and demolish it, and so he inflicted a new wound on Rome when it was already cured of the first one. But not only did that wound not touch the head of the City, but an act by intervention of the same head was so done that the City itself was not so much cured of a lethal wound as by divine providence preserved. Hence Pope St. Leo in his sermon De Octav. Apostol. says: “Who has reformed this city for salvation? Who has plucked it from captivity? Who has defended it from slaughter? The games in the Circus or the care of the Saints? Namely by whose prayers the sentence of divine punishment was turned aside so that we who deserved wrath were saved for pardon.” And later: “We, not assigning our liberty, as the impious think, to the effect of the stars, but to that of the ineffable mercy of the Almighty God, who has deigned to soften the hearts of the raging barbarians...” Now that God did this by the intercession of the same St. Leo is reported by Paul the Deacon bk.15 when he says: “By his meeting with Pope Leo, Genseric was softened, and he preserved the city immune from fire, slaughter, and punishments.” But he adds that, carrying off all their wealth, he led away many Christians to Africa. But that cannot be said to be a lethal wound, and it could easily be repaired, as is evident of itself.

10. But further, almost twenty years later, when the City had already been restored, Odoacer, king of the Eduli, besieged it again and seized it in the year 476, as Evagrius reports in bk.2 Histor. ch.16, and Nicephorus bk.16 ch.11, and Cassiodorus in Chron.; who, however, say that he did not burn or destroy the City but only seized it. Nay, Cassiodorus says of him, “although, with all his adversaries extinct, he had free dominion over Italy, he enjoyed very great felicity with temperance and modesty.” Therefore no lethal wound was then inflicted on the Roman City, or on the empire proper that was then reigning there, that is the pontificate. For Simplicius, who was then presiding, was neither deprived nor diminished either in his dignity or in his city, but the city, in the same state as it was before, continued in Simplicius and in his successors, Felix III and Gelasius, during the whole time that Odoacer lived.

11. Next, in the year of our Lord 547 and 550 Totila, king of the Goths, vexed Rome and seized it, and in part plundered and destroyed it, but did not inflict a lethal wound on it; and that wound, whatever it was, was at once repaired or cured. For in his first invasion, by the intervention of Pelagius, then deacon and afterwards the first Pope of the same name, and of the general Belisarius, he dealt kindly both with the Romans and with the city itself; and although he overthrew part of the walls, they were by the same Belisarius a little later rebuilt. But in the second invasion, although Totila at the beginning tried to demolish and destroy the City, yet ultimately he both called back its inhabitants and fortified it with new buildings. Therefore much less did Rome at that time receive a lethal wound, or had need to wait for Antichrist to cure it of its wound.

12. Add that, after all these wounds or persecutions, the beast, or the Roman City continued for fifty six years healthy and whole in peace under the same pontifical empire and in the same faith (even by the opinion of the King and Protestants), before the Antichrist, whom they themselves fabricate, began. For the king says that the Roman Church began to be antichristian in the year 660, but the last Roman irruption happened earlier in the year 550, as I said; therefore when that time came, the beast no longer had a wound which might under Antichrist be cured. And much less can be accommodated what John adds, “all the world wondered after the beast,” namely posterior to the cure of the lethal wound. Also, neither from that time, nor because of that fact, did the power of the Roman City or of the Roman Pontiff seem greater to the world such that all should, for that reason, worship the beast saying: “Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?” Nor, lastly, from the fact that the Roman ruins, in whichever of the said sieges they were made, were afterwards restored, or from the way in which that wound was cured, can be collected what John says, that the dragon “gave power to the beast.” For no one has ever thought that the restoration was done by virtue of the demon, but by divine virtue and providence, which wanted to chastise his people, not to ruin them, as Augustine rightly said in the said tract. De Excidio Urbis and in bk.1 De Civit. Dei ch.1, hence no one but a madman or a pagan could be stirred up then to worship the dragon, but rather to praise and glorify God; therefore none of the things that John foretold in that place can, according to that vainly thought up exposition, be accommodated.

13. From which finally is manifest that the final words which the king adds to his interpretation when he says: “The mortal wound will be cured in the head, or in King Antichrist, who will then arise and take possession of the kingdom for a long time.” These final words, I say (which alone pertain to the present cause) are added without foundation by the king to that vision or prophecy of John. For John teaches nothing there about the lasting duration of the reign of Antichrist; nay about the beast that received a wound in one of its heads, and was healed, he says, v.5: “and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months,” to do, I say, all the things that are there declared, vv.6-7, namely to speak “blasphemy against God” and against “them that dwell in heaven” and “to make war with the saints, etc.” wherein the persecution and impiety of Antichrist is described. Therefore that lasting duration of Antichrist is not only without foundation in the text, but is also thought up in opposition to its words.

Chapter 7: Satisfaction is made to the second objection of the King of England taken from Revelation ch.18.

Summary: 1. The second objection of the king from Revelation. 2. Babylon is one true, one mystical. 3. Babylon is said to be the whole world. 4. This Babylon, which is not composed of stones but of corrupt men will be destroyed when the impious have perished. 5. An objection is solved. 6. By the name of Babylon Rome too is signified. But pagan Rome not religious Rome. 7. It is probable that Rome is to be destroyed before the Day of Judgment. 8. The time of this overthrow is very uncertain. 9. Attack on the first part [of the king's objection]. 10. On the second part. 11. On the third part. 12. It is uncertain whether the destruction is to be done by Antichrist or by one of his ministers. 13. It is probable that the ravaging of Rome is to be completed by Antichrist. 14. From ch.18 of Revelation is not collected that the persecution of Antichrist will last beyond three years and a half.

1. Secondly and chiefly the King of England collects this long duration of the reign of Antichrist from another place of Revelation, ch.18, where is first described the mighty fall and destruction of the great city of Babylon, which the king supposes to be the Roman City, and next is predicted a very great wailing of kings and merchants of the earth over her, and fear from wonderment at her desolation. Hence the King of England thus concludes: “From that very heavy wailing it is most plainly clear that the reign of Antichrist will last longer than the space of three years and a half, or the age of one man.” Now this he proves because “the kings who have committed fornication with her and lived in delights, must have had a longer time for contracting that great bond of affinity.

But the merchants of the earth boast thus at length of her wealth and felicity while she stood, as if she had been the emporium of their riches, which they could not pile up in so short a time, and not even within a century.” From these two conjectures the king concludes that it is necessary for the reign of Antichrist to have a future not of three years, nor only of the life of one man, nay not of one century either, but of many; but how from those conjectures this follows he does not declare, since they do not seem to have any connection with each other, as will be by me briefly explained.

2. But it is first necessary to expound what that Babylon is of which John both in this ch.18 and in earlier ones is speaking. For a twofold Babylon is by men distinguished, one is material and proper situated in Chaldea, which was the beginning of the kingdom of the Chaldeans, the other is mystical. And although Andreas, ch.53, thinks that John can be understood about both, all the rest, however, suppose it for certain that John is not speaking of Babylon proper, which even he himself indicates sufficiently, ch.17, when he says that there was written on the forehead of the city, v.5: “Mystery, Babylon the great,” and he attributes to it many things that do not rightly fit the true Babylon. John therefore is speaking of the mystical Babylon; but what she is I am inquiring. Wherein I only find Areta, who in ch.53 has interpreted the Babylon of which John speaks in ch.17 at the end as Constantinople, but without foundation in Scripture or in reason.

3. There are then two probable expositions, one is that this Babylon is the whole world as to the congregation of the corrupt, which Augustine called the city of the devil in his books of De Civitate Dei, especially in bk.18 at the beginning. Hence in Enarrat. 2 on Psalms 26 he speaks thus: “There is a certain city which is called Babylon. That city is the society of all the impious from the East unto the West, the earthly kingdom possesses her, etc.” And Enarrat. on Psalms 61 he says: “All who have taste for earthly things, all who prefer earthly happiness to God, all who seek their own things, not those which be of Christ, belong to that city, which is mystically called Babylon, and has the devil for king.” And he repeats the same Enarrat. on Psalms 86 [87] about the verse, v.4: “I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me.” “Babylon,” he says, “is called a city in accord with the secular age, one wicked city Babylon, all the wicked belong to Babylon, etc.” About this Babylon, then, is that place of Revelation expounded by grave and ancient expositors, Bede, Victorius, Tyconus, homil.16 on Revelation, Anselm, Primas. And Ambrose and Augustine as well in the commentaries which are under their name conveyed among their works, in addition to other modern expositors on that place. And the same is taught by Aretas, chs.41, 42, 53, 55, although in other places he seems to interpret otherwise. Nor does Andreas dissent although he adapts the words to other Babylons as well. Prosper is express and very good in Dimidio Temporis ch.7, where he thus expounds that verse of Psalms 137.8: “O daughter of Babylon, etc.”

For this exposition reference can also be made to Peter Damian epist.3 to Blanca ch.12, insofar as he says that every wicked soul is included in the name of Babylon. And he expounds about the punishments of hell the words, Revelation 18.7: “How much hath she glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her.” And the same is also contained in Pacianus Paraenes. de Poenitentia at the end. St. Augustine too, on Psalms 149, similarly expounds the words of Revelation 18.6: “double unto her double according to her works; in the cup which she hath filled fill to her double;” and he understands them to be said of the world which is signified by the name of Babylon, although the aforesaid words are not literal references, but: “Thus,” he says, “is it written, give to her double for what she has done.” And from these very words or places is this exposition made probable; and in addition from these, v.2: “and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit.” For these are very properly said of the city of the impious, and can scarcely fit any particular city. Again those words, v.4: “Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins,” which are thus expounded by Cyprian bk. De Lapsis. Just as those words too, v.19: “Alas, alas, that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships...” Again those, vv.23-24: “for by her sorceries were all nations deceived. And in her was found the blood of the prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain on the earth.” For these do not seem able to be adapted save to a city occupying the whole world; but this is the city of the impious; well therefore is it by Babylon understood. And the same is confirmed by Aretas in his ch.41, from the adjective whereby that city is often called ‘great’; for he thinks it cannot be put for distinction of a small city (for thus it would have too little emphasis and would signify nothing great), but for denoting the absolute magnitude, that is, the universality of that city; for it has occupied all places and all times, which seems also to be signified by Jerome epist.17 to Marcel., when explaining, not this chapter of Revelation, but ch.13.

Nor is it difficult to accommodate to this signification of Babylon all the other things that in ch.17 are said about it; for Babylon taken in this signification is not other than the world taken as to its bad part, in the way that is frequent in Sacred Scripture, as 1 John 5.19, 4: “the whole world lieth in wickedness...; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith;” and Christ in John 15.18: “If the world hate you, know that it hated me before it hated you.” Hence the world is numbered among the three chief enemies of the salvation of souls, and it is believed to be meant by 1 John 2.16: “the pride of life,” about which he immediately subjoins: “...is of the world.” For this reason, then, will it rightly be said of this Babylon of the world that she “sitteth upon many waters...peoples, and nations, and tongues,” as the same John later declares (Revelation 17.1, 15). She is also called, v.1, “the great whore,” because in truth, 18.3: “all nations have drunk of the wine of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies,” and the like, whereby the vanity and malice of the world is very well described. And finally is it rightly said of her that she is, 17.6, “drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus,” because all the impious have persecuted the saints, and the martyrs have in all the provinces of the world shed their blood for Jesus Christ.

4. Now just as this Babylon is not made of stones but is put together from corrupt men, as Tyconius says homil.16, so its destruction does not consist in the demolition or burning of walls and buildings, but in the final perdition of all the impious. And so this Babylon will not be destroyed by Antichrist nor before the Day of Judgment, but on the Day of Judgment itself and by Christ and the angel ministers of his justice. Hence it is said in Revelation 18.8: “Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire; for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her.”

5. You will say: how therefore will “the kings of the earth...and the merchants...weep over her...standing afar off for the fear of her torment,” 18.9-11, 15, since they themselves are members of her and cannot avoid her torments? I reply that, nay, for this reason will they rightly cry over, because “they lament for her”, as is said in the same place; and because they will be in great horror of the torments they will stand afar off, namely not in body, but in affection, such that they desire as much as in them is to flee, but they cannot. Next, according to this exposition, what the King of England assumes is indeed true, that the kings and merchants of the earth did not have friendship and bond with that city save over a long time; but it does not thence follow that Antichrist will rule a long time, but that the city of evil will endure for many centuries, before it is judged and punished by God.

6. The second exposition is that by the name there of Babylon Rome is signified, such that it is there foretold that the destruction and stupefying vengeance of God on the city will be before the end of the world. For the fact that Rome is sometimes signified by the name of Babylon is clearly handed on by Augustine bk.18 De Civitate Dei ch.2 when he says: “the true Babylon was the first Rome, and the true Rome was the second Babylon.” And Jerome De Scriptor. Eccles. in Marco says that Peter, when he says, I Peter 5.13: “The church that is at Babylon elected together with you saluteth you,” figuratively signified Rome; and he has the same on Isaiah 47 at the beginning, explaining in this way too the places of Revelation. And in epist.17 to Marcella he expounds of Rome this place of Revelation 17 & 18. The same on Isaiah 24 thinks that Rome is the spiritual Babylon of which John speaks. Orosius bk.7 Contra Paganos ch.2 has the same. And Tertullian bk.3 Contra Marcionem ch.13, where Pamelius notes that this is to be understood of pagan or wordly Rome, not of the holy Church there gathered. For Peter sufficiently clearly distinguished them when he said: “The church that is at Babylon elected together with you saluteth you.” Next, the fact that Babylon is taken in this signification in Revelation is a sufficiently common interpretation among ancient and modern expositors of Revelation, both in this ch.18 and in others, as Victorinus, Andreas, Aretas, Riberus, Viegas, also Bellarmine bk.3 De Summo Pontif. ch.13, Sander bk.8 De Visib. Monarch. ch.8, and many others. The exposition is also probable, because John in ch.17, if the propriety of the words is held to, is speaking of a special city, and in ch.18 he is speaking, not only of a people, but also of a material city, as consisting of houses and other buildings, and situated in a particular part of the earth, which can be distant from or near to other places of the earth, as is indicated by the words: “standing afar off for the fear of her torment,” and by the words, 18.17-18: “And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stood afar off, and cried when they saw the smoke or her burning.” But if that Babylon is some particular city, certainly it cannot be but Rome, as is sufficiently clear from what has been said, and as is manifest from earlier chapters of the same Revelation.

7. On the acceptance of this exposition, then, there can at most be collected from it that the Roman City is to be destroyed before the end of the world, and to be utterly overthrown, even as to its material buildings, and given over to fire. Which thing many Catholics, not only without shame, but even with constancy teach and defend; they are referred to and their opinions extensively described by Thomas Malvenda bk.4 De Antichristo chs.4 & 5. And although he himself fears to descend to their opinion, and therefore tries to interpret Revelation in other ways (which it is not necessary now to examine or approve or disapprove), nevertheless it cannot be denied that the opinion is very probable and is very consonant both with the places of Revelation and with the ancient Fathers, especially Jerome, whose words are thus on Isaiah 24: “The city of vanity will be ground down, or every city or spiritual Babylon which sits purpled on the seven mountains, whose punishments we read in the Revelation of John.” Nor does he disagree with that opinion in bk.2 Contra Jovinian, although he indicates that the prophecy is not absolute but a threat, when he says: “I speak to you who have destroyed by confession of Christ the blasphemy written on the forehead...the curse with which the Savior threatened you in Revelation you can escape by penance, holding the example of the Ninivites.” Add Lactantius bk.7 ch.25, who, on the testimony of the Sibyl, confirms that “the City, the head of the world” will burn and must fall; “and then,” she says, “who will doubt that the end has already come for human affairs, for the whole earth?” And certainly, on the supposition of the future devastation especially of the Christian globe at the end of the world before the judgment, partly by the ten kings who will precede Antichrist, partly by Antichrist himself, who will persecute Christ and his Church with greater power and bitterness and hate, it is per se very probable that one or several of them will rush upon the City and will utterly overthrow it, so that the Roman name, nay, and the Christian if they can, they should, with Rome destroyed, entirely extinguish.

8. But the manner, order, and time of this overthrow, although we assume that it will be, are far more uncertain than the overthrow itself; for about the overthrow itself we have a foundation in Scripture, according to its probable sense, but about the rest of the circumstances almost nothing. Hence the manner in which the learned man Thomas Malvenda describes the final Roman destruction according to the opinion of those who understand the prophecies of Revelation to be about the Roman City, is not even asserted by all who approve that sense; nor does it seem to me necessary, or supported on compelling foundation. For he says that Rome, near the end of the world, will return to more and greater crimes and outrages than it before committed when it was pagan; for it will deny the faith, and cast the Pontiff from itself, and will massacre the religious orders, and return to idolatry. For it will again recover its ancient temporal power with greater fullness and majesty of empire than it had before, and it will have the ten most powerful kings subject to it, by whose labor it will persecute the saints more bitterly and afflict them with crueller martyrdoms than they suffered under the pagan emperors. But afterwards within a brief time, he says, those kings will defect from Rome and rise up against her and utterly destroy her, God permitting it, in vengeance for her crimes both in the past and in the time of those present. For this seems to be indicated by the Evangelist John when in the same ch.18 he said, v.5: “For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities.” For it is to be believed that God will not permit so severe a punishment of Rome unless she herself first adds new sins to old, and so excites the wrath of God against her. And to this manner are accommodated the other things that John foretells in this and the preceding chapter. And finally after the destruction of Rome done by the ten kings, he says that Antichrist will come according to the other prophecies treated of above.

9. All these things indeed, although they are not impossible, nor repugnant with any prophecy or promise made to Rome that I know of, do not seem to me necessary nor sufficiently founded. For, supposing the exposition about Babylon that we are pursuing, we only have from this place of John that it is to be overthrown and altogether destroyed, so that “it shall be found no more at all,” as John says, v.21, that is, it will no more be restored or inhabited, and therefore “no voice...of pipers, and no craftsman, nor the sound of the millstone, nor the light of a candle, nor the voice of the bridegroom and the bride, will any more be heard or found in her,” as is said there, vv.22-23. The desolation, then, will be eternal, and therefore it seems certain and tested that that oracle, when understood of Rome, has been fulfilled in none of the preceding destructions of the Roman City, as the reader will easily conclude if he carefully compares what we have said about those destructions in the preceding chapter with the words noted from the present prophecy. Nay, thence is it made very probable that such Roman destruction, if it is going to be, will not be except at the end of the world, although this is not in the said ch.18 asserted, nor is it elsewhere prophesied, and therefore it is less certain. Yet hence, in another way, is there proof that it is likely that so marvelous a destruction of the city and so monstrous a persecution of the Apostolic See will not happen except in the times of Antichrist or very near them, and therein will be fulfilled what Daniel foretold, that the daily sacrifice will cease, and the like.

10. But that before the destruction Rome is to return to her pristine power and temporal empire, I do not see whence it can be proved; because not everything that is said of Rome in this chapter must be found in it in that last time in which it will be destroyed, but in the whole course of time from when it was built up to the end. "Because," as is there said v.5, "her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities," namely all of them that were done in her at any time. Wherefore too I do not see whence it will be sufficiently proved that Rome will return to idolatry or to the like crimes which proceed from ignorance of the true God; both because, in order for sins to be said to reach unto heaven, it is enough that to the previous outrages of the impious there should be added new and very grave sins of Christians, by which God will be moved more to anger than by the offenses of the rest of mankind ignorant of the true God. And it could happen that in that time sins and outrages will be multiplied in that city with greater luxury and corruption than in the past times of Christianity. And also because, although that destruction will be in punishment of the corrupt multitude, it is credible that it will also be for the proving of the good, and for the purgation and merit of the predestined, as Christ signifies about the persecution of Antichrist and as the Fathers teach. It will not therefore be necessary for Rome to return to idolatry for God to permit her destruction.

11. Next, as to what is added, that the ten kings will be subject to the temporal empire of the City and will afterwards rise up against her, I do not see on what foundation it is asserted. For what John says here, vv.3, 9, that "the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and will lament for her," indicates at most that they will be friends of the Roman City, or perhaps that they first imitated her crimes but afterwards, by natural affection, grieved for her loss. I also add that it does not seem necessary for those kings, who will first commit fornication with Babylon and will afterwards lament for her, should be those very ten who will reign very soon before the advent of Antichrist, but other kings of the earth, who will not be lacking outside the Roman Empire, as in Persia, in Africa, in India, and other regions, who will perhaps remain up to the end of the world. Next, it is not necessary to understand by the kings of the earth only supreme and principal kings of the earth, but also great princes, and as it were petty kings, as are now many dukes, and potentates in Italy and Germany, and the like who, beyond those more famous ten, could exist at the time of the destruction of the City of Rome and first fornicate with her, not only through idolatry, but through other vices, by following the vanities of the world, and afterwards grieve and lament for her destruction.

Wherefore, from that place, on the supposition that by Babylon Rome is understood, there can only be certainly collected that Rome must ultimately at some time be altogether and irreparably overthrown; hence it is made more likely that it will be near the Day of Judgment and at the time of Antichrist, or thereabouts. But in what state Rome will be just before she is destroyed, in both temporal and spiritual empire and in faith, I do not see has been revealed, nor can it with foundation be defined. But there is nothing unfitting that by persevering in faith, religion, and in governance both temporal and spiritual through the Apostolic See, as she now is, she should at the end of the world be destroyed by some tyrant infidel or pagan or apostate. For just as this in large part happened in the time of Alaric, so it could be completed more bitterly and in every part at the end of the world. Nor is this contrary to the sanctity of that city, both because, notwithstanding faith and the presence of the Vicar of Christ, sins could be multiplied in it such that, joined with the preceding ones, they may excite the judgment of God against it in accord with the hidden counsel of his providence. And also because, although the city and its heads persist in the faith, it could happen that the multitude of the people, both by the example of the chief citizens and by the threats or promises of tyrant infidels, is corrupted and falls away. Next also because, as I was saying, that destruction will not only be because of vengeance but also for the proving and more perfect completion of many martyrs. And therefore it is not even against the promises made to the Church and to the Apostolic See about perseverance in the faith and in the chair of Peter that Rome be destroyed in that way, because the chair will never fail, nor its faith, whether it be established in this place or in that; for the Church will everywhere be the same and will always endure visible, even if by force of persecution it be forced to flee to the mountains, or hide itself in great part in hidden places.

12. Next, neither from that place nor from any other (as to what I know) can it be sufficiently collected whether this ultimate destruction of Rome is to be completed and consummated by Antichrist himself, or before him by one or several of those ten kings who will then rule in the Roman world. For that it will be in one of those ways is, on the basis of the said exposition, made very probable; because, as I said, so general a destruction of the City, the head of the world, and so great a calamity and persecution of the Church cannot be far distant from the times of Antichrist, and therefore will be either by him or by those who will immediately precede him. And again, from that principle it is made very credible that either Antichrist will not come before the Roman Empire is utterly destroyed or that by him the destruction of the Roman Empire will be consummated; but the Roman Empire will then most be destroyed when Rome is altogether extinct, and, contrariwise, while Rome perseveres in its state there will still be remains of the Roman Empire enduring. Therefore just like the Roman Empire so too the City will at the same time and under the same tyrants be destroyed. But because it could in one or other of the said ways come about, and neither of them has either been revealed or is repugnant to what has been revealed, it is clear that nowhere is it revealed that the Roman City will endure up to the times of Antichrist inclusively or intrinsically, so to explain the thing; therefore it could be destroyed beforehand by the ten kings. Again it is not only probable, but some contend even certain, that before the advent of Antichrist the Roman Empire is to be altogether destroyed by the ten kings; therefore it is probable that Rome is by the same to be overthrown. Which is also intimated in Revelation ch.17.

13. On the other hand, however, nowhere either is it revealed that Antichrist will not come until the Roman City has been destroyed; therefore if it be destroyed by him, the prophecy of this chapter, which we are treating of about the destruction of Babylon, will be sufficiently fulfilled. Again we said above that it is very probable and in conformity with the Fathers that although the Roman Empire is by the ten kings, the proximate precursors of Antichrist, to be so divided and diminished that it be almost destroyed, nevertheless its destruction is to be consummated by Antichrist himself; therefore by him also could Rome be destroyed and extinguished. But when I say 'by him' I do not understand it to be necessary that Antichrist himself be present in such war; for it is enough that he do it through himself or through his generals or the kings subject to him. Therefore can be understood in either way what is said of the fornicating woman in Revelation 17 and of the ten horns of the beast, that, v.16: "these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate, etc.", if we understand Rome by the whore and Antichrist by the beast, as is probable but uncertain, as I said above, and in vol.2 part 3 disput.56 sect.2. Where I taught nothing else about the ultimate destruction of Rome; nay about it I spoke as of a thing uncertain. Nor did Bellarmine speak otherwise, who thinks rather that Rome is to be destroyed by Antichrist himself. For in bk.3 ch.13 he thus speaks: "Antichrist will have hatred for Rome and will fight with it and will desolate and burn it." And he thinks the same in bk.4 ch.4 at the end. The same way of speaking is also followed by Bozsius bk.24 ch.6, and he cites Tertullian, Lactantius, Cyril, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine.

14. Last, finally, we say (so as to respond to King James) that from this whole ch.18 of Revelation, whether from the destruction of the City therein foretold, or from the circumstances with which it is described, it cannot be collected that the persecution of Antichrist will last a longer time than three years and a half. For if the ten kings are to destroy the City, although that war may last many years, or Rome may after it lie destroyed for many years, nevertheless Antichrist, after he comes, will be able to last for a brief time. But if Antichrist himself is to war against Rome, he could do it before he begins his spiritual (so to say) persecution of the Church, while he is acquiring temporal empire, which could last for several years, as far as it precedes the persecution, as I will say in chapter 9. And then the persecution could last only for the said brief time, as is per se manifest. Or certainly, although we grant that the destruction itself of the City will be part of the antichristian persecution, it could still, whatever John pre-indicates about that destruction, be completed in three, nay in two, years. Because it could not merely within a year, but even within a few months, be surrounded and stormed and committed to the flames and suffer the other things there described. And a little later there could follow that great weeping of the kings and merchants that John mentions; for if that weeping will be in the provinces and in the islands near Rome, notice of the fire could reach them within a few days, and to remoter parts in several days, or within a year, but the weeping itself could be completed in a briefer time.

But as to what the king objects, that a longer time will be needed both by the kings for contracting a great bond of affinity with that Babylon, and by the merchants for gathering riches, this, I say, proves indeed that the kings and merchants and Babylon itself are things that will endure for a long and lasting time before Antichrist comes or Babylon is destroyed, yet it does not prove that the destruction of the City itself, or the weeping following afterwards, will be lasting. Both because these things are different, and also because frequently things that have endured a long time are wont to be extinguished in a moment. Especially for the reason that in the whole of that chapter there is no word about Antichrist; hence although the things there being narrated would demand a more lasting time, we would easily respond that they are to be completed before Antichrist arises, as I declared could happen, but Antichrist will come after and must in a brief time be completed.

Summary: 1. The King of England first contends that a definite time has been put for an indefinite. 2. Second, that the time assigned by John signifies half a spiritual week. 3. Third, he argues from the uncertainty of the Day of Judgment. 4. He amasses many testimonies from Scripture. 5. The king's arguments are dissolved. 6. In Scripture a perfect number is often put for an indefinite one. By an imperfect number a definite duration is signified. 7. The place from the Revelation of John is incapable of accepting a metaphorical sense. The first foundation of the king is overthrown. 8. A perfect number is very often in Scripture put for a determinate time. 9. The second foundation of the king is destroyed. Daniel speaks one way about weeks but another way about the three years. The enumeration of months and of days cannot be accommodated to a week. 10. The doubt of Lyranus is rejected. A day in that place of John cannot be taken for a year. 11. A day in that prophecy is taken in the same sense. Confirmation from Ezekiel. 12. The third foundation of the king does not impugn the true opinion. It is not de fide that the judgment will be immediately after the forty five days. 13. The Day of Judgment can be known through conjectures taken from Scripture. 14. There will be very few who will be enlightened by conjectures. 15. Uncertainty about the Day of Judgment can be considered in a threefold way. 16. An objection of the king is dissolved. 17. The death of Antichrist will not be known to all men. Many of those who will have seen the death of Antichrist will not understand the Scriptures. 18. The Day of Judgment will be known in the last time to the faithful, not to infidels. 19. The parable of the ten virgins is explained of the particular judgment. The announcement of judgment will be more sudden than its arrival. 20. The same parable can be understood of the universal judgment. 21. A place in ch.1 of Acts is explained. 22. An objection is solved. The words of Christ are not to be restricted to the apostles alone. Augustine contends that the time before the manifestation of Antichrist is uncertain. 23. The place from 1 Peter 5 is explained. We must be vigilant because of the traps of the demon and the uncertainty of death. 24. Other places of Scripture are also explained. When death comes as a thief, then also comes judgment. 25. Death itself does not altogether come as a thief. 26. Death comes as a thief to the unprepared. 27. Although there be from the death of Antichrist a definite time, the Day of Judgment can rightly be said to be unknown.

1. Third, the King of England attacks the foundation on which we rest to assert that the persecution of Antichrist will last a very brief time. Against which he objects two things. One is that it is not necessary to interpret the words of John speaking of that time in their proper sense; because, when one looks at the manner of speaking of prophets, they can, with sufficient suitability, be understood metaphorically. Now he himself has in those words thought out a double allegory. One is that a definite number has been put for an indefinite. Because it is certain that John was accustomed to do that, as in ch.7 when he numbers 12,000 of those who must be saved from the individual tribes, and in ch.9 when he says, v.16: "And the number of the army of the horsemen were two hundred thousand thousand, etc." And the same is contained in other places, especially ch.14 where he numbers, vv3-4: "forty four thousand virgins," and ch.20 when he rather often says that Christ will reign with his saints a thousand years, and ch.21 when he describes diverse numbers of measures. Add that John is in his numberings imitating the ancient prophets, especially Daniel, Ezekiel, and Zachariah, with whom a definite number is often taken for an indefinite, as Daniel 7.10: "ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him," and often elsewhere.

2. The second allegory of the king is that those three times and half a time signify neither years nor a definite time, but half a spiritual week. "For those," he says, "who call to mind that John is in his visions imitating the manner of prophets will find it very probable that in those three days and a half he is imitating the weeks of Daniel, taking one week for the whole time that will intervene between the first and second coming of Christ, in half of which time or spiritual week he introduces Antichrist triumphing." This interpretation can also be assisted by the opinion of Lyranus, who thinks that in Daniel 12 it is uncertain whether a day there is taken properly for a natural day or metaphorically for a year, just as a week is taken by the same Daniel. The same therefore could be said of the places of John in Revelation, and so this exposition will be probable.

3. The second principal objection is that the words of John cannot be understood in their proper sense, because such sense is repugnant to other places of Scripture and to a certain dogma of the faith. He argues, then, that if Antichrist is to reign for a certain number of days and after his death the Day of Judgment will be within forty five days, as soon as Antichrist has begun to reign and persecute the Church faithful men will know for certain on which day the judgment will be. But this is contrary to Christ's words in many places. For, to begin with, in Matthew 24 he said, v.36: "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." Next he makes clear, by similarity with the flood, how suddenly that day will come, when he says, vv.37-42: "But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." "By all which things," says the king, "the supreme security of those times is signified, that men will be involved in diverse business and human cares when the last hour will suddenly and unsuspecting seize them." Just as Christ concludes in the said place, vv.43-44: "But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

4. Second, Matthew 25, to make clear the uncertainty of that day, Christ adduces the parable of the ten virgins, and concludes, v.13: "Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour." Third, we can add the words of Christ in Acts.1.7: "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power." Fourth, the king adds the words of 1 Peter 5.8: "Be sober, be vigilant." "Peter," he says, "bids us to be vigilant and sober, always intent on catching that day.” Fifth he says: “John in Revelation twice warns us that like a thief in the night thus will Christ come.” “I will,” says the Holy Spirit in Revelation 3.3, “come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee;” and ch.16.15: “Behold I come as a thief.” Sixth we can add that Paul said this in 1 Thessalonians 5.1-3: “But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them.” Finally that was also said in 2 Peter 3.10.

5. To the first part I reply that the literal exposition of the words of John which the Pontificalists, that is, the Catholics, follow, is founded, in the first place, on the propriety of the words of Scripture, which is to be preferred. For one must altogether beware of the danger of deserting the true sense of the Holy Spirit. “Which,” as Tertullian said in bk. De Pudicitia ch.9, “we must altogether observe, and the precept equally;” because “transgression in interpretation is not lighter than transgression in conversation.” But there is great danger of erring from the true sense when the propriety of the words is, without authority or necessity, abandoned; but neither of these reasons is here found for abandoning the proper sense of the words, as we will later show. Nay, on the contrary, the said proper sense has foundation in the consonance and concord of diverse places in Scripture, and in diverse ways of explaining the same thing by times, months, and days, both in the Old and in the New Testament, so that it is not credible that everything was said metaphorically and improperly. It is founded, in addition, on the common consent of the Fathers, through whom God teaches the Church the true sense of the Scriptures; but which of the Fathers so think is sufficiently clear from those whom we adduced in chapter 6. Finally it can also have a foundation in that no metaphor can square with the place, nor has it a probable foundation, as will easily be clear by running through the things that the king adduces.

6. To the first part, then, of the metaphorical sense, whereby it is said that a definite number is taken for an indefinite, and a great or small indefinite number for indicating a long or short time, we reply that the rule taken generally is true, and it is in this way rightly proved from the testimonies there reported, and from many others that could be brought forward, but it is badly applied to the present exposition. For, to begin with, as is learnedly noted by Bellarmine bk.3 De Romanis Pontif. ch.8, a definite number is then taken in Scripture for an indefinite time when it is perfect and complete in some order, as are ten, a hundred, a thousand. But when the number includes not only a great but also a small number, then it is a sign of a proper and precise numeration. And the reason is ready to hand, that the simple and absolute expression of one complete number can easily be capable of such metaphor, whether on account of some perfection of number, or for some mystery, as is wont to be considered in the number seven because of the creation of the world, or in the number one thousand because of its suitable perfection for signifying some fullness of time, as Augustine said bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.7, where he thus expounds the ‘hundredfold’, of which the Lord speaks in Matthew 19.29, to signify an abundant reward. And he proffers other examples in bk.2 De Doctrina Christiana ch.16. However, when there is minutely and distinctly added a lesser number to a greater, and a half number to a whole, it is a sign of a definite and proper enumeration, because otherwise we would never have any definite number in Scripture.

Again, because neither can there be in that imperfection of numbers any perfection or length of duration thought of, nor is a probable reason given that such addition and multiplication of numbers should be made. And there is a very good example to confirm this in Daniel 8.14, where it is said about the ravaging of Jerusalem done by Antiochus that it will last for 2,300 days. Which number all understand must be understood precisely and properly because of the special way it is prescribed. And thus does St. Jerome there study to prove and declare it from the books of the Maccabees and from Josephus. The same is handed on by Theodoret orat. 8 and the Gloss, and Lyranus, and accurately by Benedict Pereira.

7. Wherefore I judge this part to be in such wise true that therein no clarification or limitation I believe to be necessary, both because it is founded per se on a very true rule of expounding Scripture, namely retaining the proper sense when there is nothing that points to metaphor or that requires it to be thought out; and also because no particular exception to this part is forthcoming. For if someone object the example of the 144,000 sealed for salvation in Revelation 7.4, and the other example of 144,000 virgins standing with the lamb in Revelation 14.1, Ribera there responds that by those numbers a definite and precise multitude is there signified. But because this is difficult of belief, I reply that that number thus multiplied contains a mystery, and therefore it is put for an indefinite number; for the number twelve is a universal number and, when multiplied by itself according to the number of the twelve tribes, it makes that number, as Bede, Rupert, and others interpret.

8. In the other part of the metaphorical sense, however, because it is not to be gratuitously and everywhere constructed, a limitation must necessarily be added. Because very often a perfect number in Scripture signifies a definite time and a sure duration, as when the world is said to have been created in six days, or when it is said in Daniel 4.25: “seven times will pass over thee,” where although in the word ‘times’ there is some metaphor, which we have explained above, in the number seven none is understood. Again, in the prophecy of Daniel about the seventy weeks, Daniel 9 and often elsewhere. And therefore that part is to be understood only permissively or potentially, that is, such numbers can be taken in that sense, and the metaphor is common in Scripture. Yet, nevertheless, in the use and application of it to this or that place, it is necessary to consider the circumstances such that the metaphor square with them and be in no way contrary to them. Again too must be observed the common interpretations of the Church and the Fathers. Which two things, as I said, prove that also in the said places of Revelation metaphor has no place, because it can be accommodated neither to the words nor to the circumstances of the places, nor have the Fathers found it there, but have understood a certain and definite time to be there foretold.

9. But the other part of the metaphor that the king has thought out is plainly impossible. First because neither John in Revelation nor Daniel ch.12 named a week but times, months, and days; and much less did they speak of half a week, but made clear the propriety of their speech by other numbers of months and days. And there can be this confirmation, that when Daniel wanted to signify three years and a half by half a week, he did it openly in ch.9 when he says, v.27: “and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease,” that is, when three years and half of the seventieth week have been gone through. Second, never by a week is signified in Scripture a wholly indefinite time, but whenever the term is taken metaphorically there is at least kept a proportion to the number seven, but the metaphor is put there because it extends to the number of years, as in the said place of Daniel and in Genesis 29.27: “fulfill her week,” that is, seven years. However in the whole time that runs between the first and the second coming of Christ, no reason for the number seven can be thought of, nor a probable cause adduced for such metaphor, nor authority, nor example; what then is this license for interpreting at will or rather corrupting Scripture? Third, although the metaphor of a half a week could be accommodated to the words, “for times, a time, and half a time,” yet in no way can it be accommodated to the enumeration of forty two months, or 1290 days; for what reason or proportion or analogy for constructing such a metaphor can be thought of? Nay rather, as I have often said, that way of explaining times by months, and the number of months by the number of days, excludes all metaphor of this sort and shows that the sense is proper.

Fourth, if those three years and a half, which are foretold about the advent and duration of Antichrist, signified that half a spiritual week was in that way understood, they would at any rate not exceed half the time that intercedes between the first and second coming of Christ; but according to the opinion of the king, antichristianism began in the year of Christ 606, and so it has already lasted 1007 years and is still going on and will last for God knows how long; therefore it is incredible that that whole time, because of the allegory of half a week, is signified through a space of three years and a half. Next, according to this interpretation all that numbering of times, days, and months, which is done so accurately by John, is useless; because from them nothing certain or probable about the beginning or duration of the time of Antichrist can be conjectured, but each one can make up what beginning and space of time he wishes, and assert that it is half a spiritual week. However, the words of Scripture, although they are sometimes metaphorical, are yet not useless nor pronounced vainly; therefore, when the metaphor is such that it perverts the use, intention, and fruit of a prophecy, it is to be altogether rejected and avoided.

10. Wherefore also is to be put aside or rejected the doubt of Lyranus whether in those places a day is metaphorically taken for a year. And it is to be established for certain that it is there taken properly and signifies a natural day. But one must note that this can be understood of those places where there is discussion of the 1290 days of the persecution of Antichrist, or where there is discussion of the forty five days after his death. For Lyranus is not speaking of the former but of these latter days. Now about the former he does not deny that they will be natural days, which is of very great service for what we intend, etc. And therefore that it is certain is briefly shown. For if the days there signified a year, then, when the persecution of Antichrist is said to be going to last for 1290 days, it will be understood of so many years. How then will the word of Christ be true, Matthew 24.22: “And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect’s sake those days shall be shortened”? For how will they be shortened if they are going to be almost as many as hitherto the time of grace has lasted? And for a like reason, that could not stand which John says in Revelation 12.12: “Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! For the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.” And in ch.20 he says that Satan will be bound for a thousand years and must afterwards be loosed for a little time; but yet a time of 1200 and more years cannot be said to be little absolutely, nor in comparison with the time that Satan is bound. Therefore it is impossible that there a day is taken for a year but for a true day.

There is confirmation, first, because that number of days is later explained by a number of months, but who would say that a month there signifies thirty years? For never in Scripture is such a metaphor found of months as it is of weeks. There is confirmation, second, because if there be license to explain a day as a year, someone else may take the same to mean a thousand years, because it is written, Psalms 90.4: "A thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past." And it follows as a result that Antichrist will last for more than a thousand thousand years, which is ridiculous. There is confirmation, finally, from Justin Contra Trypho who for this reason mocks Trypho's interpretation. For he thought that by time there was to be understood a hundred years. "But if it is so, that wicked man must rule for at least three hundred and fifty years." Which he sets aside as absurd and ridiculous; in addition to the fact that no probable reason or foundation in Scripture for such signification or metaphor can be brought forward.

11. From which it is with the same certitude further concluded that also in the case of the last forty five days the discussion is about natural days. First indeed because it cannot be imagined that in the same computation a day is, with respect to the time of the persecution of Antichrist, taken properly but, with respect to the future time thereafter, it is taken metaphorically for a year, because it is said with one and the same word about each time, or about the whole of it, that it will last 2035 days; but it would be ridiculous to say that the same noun, put once in the same speech, signifies part of the time properly and part of it metaphorically. Second because the reasons given proceed also of the days, and especially because Christ said Matthew 24.29: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened;" therefore between the time of Antichrist and the beginning of the signs of the judgment there will not intervene 45,000 years, nay nor forty five, because what happens after forty five years does not happen immediately. Finally the metaphor of Lyranus does not, as he himself thinks, have a foundation in Scripture. For he cannot show from the Scriptures that a day sometimes metaphorically signifies a year. For in the place that he adduces, Ezekiel 4, where it is said, v.6: "I have appointed thee each day for a year," day does not metaphorically signify a year, but each word is taken in its proper sense; and a year is said to be computed for a day because for as many days as Ezekiel was going to sleep bound and restrained on his left or right side, for that many years Israel and Judah were going to be captives. As Jerome and all expound, just as when it is said, "A thousand years in thy sight" are as days, a day is taken properly for a natural day, but a thousand years are compared with a natural day, nay with a moment, in respect of divine eternity.

12. To the second part of the objection, I say in the first place generally that the whole of that objection does not proceed against the chief dogma that we are teaching, namely that the persecution of Antichrist will last a brief time, and that the testimonies of Daniel and John, that speak about that time, are to be understood properly and to the letter. For at most the objection proceeds against the last part about the forty five days interposed from the death of Antichrist to the Day of Judgment. For if we said that those forty five days are not precisely defined such that, when they are consumed, the Day of Judgment would be certain, the objection will altogether cease, even if the rest about the three years and a half, within which alone the persecution of Antichrist will last, are most certain and persistently maintained. Because if after the day of Antichrist it is not certain that the judgment will happen when the forty five days are finished, it will never be foreknown from the death of Antichrist when the day or hour of judgment will be; therefore the objection ceases. But the part about the forty five days, after which will be the judgment, is not a dogma of faith, nor is it necessary to contend stubbornly about it, and therefore the whole objection does not matter much for the cause. Provided it not be denied that those forty five days too are to be understood properly, both as to the number and as to natural days; for this is necessarily conjoined with the other definite opinion about the brief time of Antichrist, as has been made clear. Because, this notwithstanding, many Catholics think that from Scripture can indeed be collected that after the death of Antichrist the Day of Judgment will not come for forty five days, but that nevertheless it cannot thence be collected that, when those days are finished, it will immediately be; and this is enough for it to be uncertain, and consequently for the objection to cease.

13. But we can add that it is indeed true that Scripture does not say plainly that immediately after those forty five days the judgment will be, yet it insinuates it and it is sufficiently collected therefrom, as I showed above. But this is not enough for the Day of Judgment to be certainly foreknown, but only that it be with great probability conjectured, which is no inconvenience, because it is not repugnant to the testimonies adduced, since in them the discussion is about certain advance cognizance and foreknowledge. Next, we add that even if the conjecture about the forty five days be uncertain, nevertheless once the death of Antichrist has, after sufficient knowledge of his person, been seen, it can be certain for those who know the Scriptures that the Day of Judgment is near and not long distant, even if the day and hour are not certainly known. But that not only is not repugnant to the words of Christ but rather is contained in them, since he himself said, Matthew 24.29: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, etc." But that 'immediately' will be directly after the death of Antichrist, as has been shown from the Scriptures; therefore those who know the Scriptures will evidently understand that the Day of Judgment is very near, for that 'immediately' clearly indicates this nearness. Hence the same Lord subjoins, vv.32-33: "Now learn a parable of the fig tree; when his branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." Therefore such pre-cognizance of the Day of Judgment, or certain cognizance as to its nearness and not as a definite day, or a probable and conjectural cognizance as to the day itself, is not repugnant to, but rather very much consonant with, the Scriptures. Nor do the testimonies adduced prove anything against this, as will be readily clear by running through them one by one.

To the place of Matthew 24, I reply that Christ's first words, v.36: "But of that day and hour knoweth no man," are understood of certain and infallible foreknowledge, not of probable conjecture. I say, in addition, that conjecture cannot be had save from what is revealed, because the determination of that day depends on the will of God, which cannot be known except from the effects or signs revealed. But on the basis of revelation of the signs preceding the Day of Judgment, from them can the time of that day be conjectured, with indeed greater or lesser probability, according to the mode of the revelation and the signs. And these conjectures were often used by the holy Fathers for making some judgment about the approach of the Day of Judgment; nay, that for this end were those signs revealed by God is clearly collected from the mentioned words of Christ. But as to the rest of the words, wherewith the Lord teaches that the last hour of the Day of Judgment will suddenly seize upon men, I reply that the same objection can be made against Christ's words, "know that it is near, even at the doors;" for this foreknowledge can be enough that the Day of Judgment not suddenly seize on those who have believed the words of Christ, and have observed, and have wished to observe, the event of them.

14. I say, therefore, to begin with, that those will be very rare who have the aforesaid prophecies in close examination and understand and recognize them. And therefore although some few who understand and are wise in faith could from that anticipation be ready for the advent of the Lord, this does not prevent almost the whole world from thinking of nothing less than of its end, and thus the advent of Christ will suddenly seize almost the whole world. Which is rightly made clear by the example of the flood that Christ uses; for there were some men then who the rains did not suddenly seize upon, namely Noe and his family; and nevertheless Christ said absolutely that the flood came and found men unprepared and overwhelmed them all; thus therefore will it be in the case of his coming to judgment. Another simile can be taken from the time of the first coming of Christ, for it simply came suddenly with respect to the world, although a few wise could understand that his advent was near at hand.

15. Next I note that the uncertainty of the Day of Judgment can be considered either with respect to us and everyone who will be before Antichrist is revealed and his persecution begun, or with respect to those who will be at the time at which the persecution of Antichrist will already be advancing but who have not yet seen its end, or with respect to those who will be alive after the death of Antichrist and before the proximate signs of judgment will begin, namely 'the sun will be darkened' and the like, or with respect to those who have already seen such signs afar off. In the first times, then, the Day of Judgment is altogether uncertain, nay scarcely by conjecture can anything be judged about its delay or nearness, as Augustine epist.80 shows extensively, and as is sufficiently known by experience in the case of the Fathers, who reckoned a thousand years ago that the Day of Judgment was near. Neither is there controversy on this point. About the second time we say that the wise indeed who are then considering things with great faith and understanding and attention can conjecture that the Day of Judgment is not far absent, because they will certainly believe that the tribulation will be short, and that, when it is finished, the signs of judgment will immediately begin, for both have been foretold by Christ. Hence Gregory bk.34 Moralia ch.10 at the end, elsewhere 15, says: "When the Day of Judgment is approaching, by voices preceding or certain signs bursting forth, the virtue itself of the coming Lord will already be shining in some way upon them." Yet the conjecture will be confused as to the definite time, and rare with respect to the whole world, and uncertain with respect to many, because since there will, on the evidence of Christ himself, be many tribulations and many antichrists, it will be very difficult to understand whether the tribulation is the last and greatest and whether he is the Antichrist proper.

16. But the king says: "But the Pontificalists say that the world will not be ignorant that he is Antichrist, by the teaching of the two witnesses." I reply that the two witnesses will preach for a short time, and perhaps in few places and provinces of the world; and so it will not be enough for the whole world to know that he is Antichrist. Nay, even where they will be preaching many will be incredulous, just as they were in the days of Noe, or just as the Jews were when John gave testimony to Christ; and therefore although some believe and can make a certain conjecture about the approaching judgment, it will not be unfitting, because everyone else, and the world simply speaking, will think no such thing. Hence Ambrose on 1 Thessalonians 5 at the beginning seems to have understood about that day many things from the said testimonies: “The day of the Lord so cometh as a thief;” and “Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come.” And this, “If they shall say unto you, Behold, here is Christ, or behold there, believe it not. For suddenly,” he says, “and unexpectedly he will appear, as the lightning will appear from the east to the west, having with him the soldiers of the army of God the Father for the destruction of Antichrist and of his followers. For as the faithless were secure about the reign of the devil after the saints were killed, that is, Enoch and Elijah, and rejoiced in victory, sending gifts one to another, as Revelation 11.10 said, then upon them will suddenly come swift destruction.” In which words he says that the sudden advent of Christ begins before the death of Antichrist and for the killing of him, and then will it be very sudden for the unbelieving; for a few believers could now be expecting him, although even they would be uncertain even about the day and the hour.

17. However, in the third time after the death of Antichrist and before the signs of judgment, there could be some greater conjecture of the approaching judgment, yet that too will be among few. For, to begin with, the time will be very brief between the death of Antichrist and the signs of judgment, as is often proved from the words of Christ the Lord saying, Matthew 24.29: “Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, etc.” Next, in so brief a time the death of Antichrist could not be made know to the whole world, nor to a great part of it, because Christ when descending to kill Antichrist will not be revealed to the whole world, but will appear only in that part where Antichrist will be present, and from there his death must be disseminated by report or letters through a course of time, insofar as it can in a human manner be done. Therefore in the meantime the world will be no more worried about the Day of Judgment than if Antichrist was not dead. Next, among those too who know Antichrist and have seen or believed his death, there will be very few who will have read or understood the prophecies about the time of the coming of Christ to judgment after the killing of Antichrist. Nay even those who have understood them will never be sufficiently certain about the sense of them until they see them fulfilled; and therefore, although they could probably believe that the judgment will be after so many days, yet they will not know that day for certain. And thus nothing follows against the testimonies of Scripture about the uncertainty of the Day of Judgment, even if it be understood strictly about all time and all persons. And for the reason most of all that it is even not certain whether those forty five days will come to an end on the very Day of Judgment or on the day when the death of all men will be completed; after which day it is not revealed whether at once or after some days will be the universal resurrection and judgment. And thus the day and hour of judgment will always remain uncertain.

18. However, about the last time after the signs of judgment have begun, of which Christ says, “Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, etc.,” it is from the same Gospel clear that it will be known to all the faithful that the end of the world and the Day of Judgment are very near, since Christ says, “when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors.” But infidels, since they are altogether ignorant or do not believe such signs and the end or signification of them, will indeed be afraid and tremble, but will understand or think nothing about the future event.

Yet, nevertheless, with respect to all of them will always be true what Christ next subjoins: “But of that day and hour knoweth no man,” because infidels will be thoroughly ignorant of it, while the faithful, even the wise, although they may know it is near, yet do not foreknow definitely that it will be on such day at such hour; because they will not know that day destined for the universal death of all men, and the other determined for the resurrection, and the other foreordained for judgment; nay, they will even be ignorant whether they will be distinct days and how far they will be from each other. In addition too they will not know for how long a time those signs will last that precede the judgment after the death of Antichrist, because the wiser faithful, although they might conjecture that they will not last beyond forty five days, nevertheless do not know whether they will or will not occupy all those days; and as a result they will not know on which day the world will be consumed in flames, and so about the other things that will be up to the Day of Judgment. And in this way all the words of Christ are true to the letter and in all strictness and propriety, even if the words of John are understood in their proper and strict sense as well, which point will be made clearer in the following testimonies.

19. To the second testimony taken from the parable about the virgins in Matthew 25, the response is that everything indeed that is said therein could be accommodated to the private judgment of each person; the day and hour of that too is uncertain for men, and with that judgment the conclusion of the whole parable squares very well, “Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour.” But this ignorance of the day and hour of death does not take away the possibility of there being, before its happening, and consequently before the moment of particular judgment, a presentiment of death, and a conjecture that the judgment is near, although about the day and the hour a certain and definite knowledge does not appear nor is conceived. And thus in the same parable two things that will happen unexpectedly before this judgment must be distinguished. One is that the arrival of the bridegroom is first announced; the other is the bridegroom himself coming after. The first is contained in the words, v.6: “And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him;” the other is there subjoined, v.10: “And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him, etc.” From which we understand that the announcement of the coming of judgment is more sudden than will be the coming of it; for the first finds all the virgins slumbering or sleeping, that is, thinking nothing of the approaching judgment; but the coming of the bridegroom finds the prudent prepared and waiting for him with lamps lit, and so, although they did not know the day or hour of each, namely of the announcement and of the coming, yet the coming of the bridegroom was not for them as unexpected as the announcement of it proper. Hence, in the particular judgment, those two can be in such wise distinguished that the moment of death is the same as the advent of judgment, but the dispositions proximately preceding death will announce the advent of judgment, as illnesses and other frequent dangers of death. And thus Gregory said in homil.13 on the Gospels: “The Lord comes when he hastens to judgment; but he knocks when he indicates death is now near by the troubles of illness.” And this interpretation is followed by Origen in homil.22 on Matthew, and St. Thomas takes it there very literally, nor does it displease Augustine epist.80. Hence if we follow it, nothing from that parable can contribute to the present matter, because the reign of Antichrist will not be before the private judgment but the universal. But if we wish to speak about the particular judgment of the men who will be after the death of Antichrist, they too will not know the day and hour of their death, and consequently also of their own particular judgment; but they could have a presentiment through the signs and announcements of the approaching end of the world that it is not far distant.

20. Hence we say further that, although this sense is probable, it is not to be so taken that we deny that the parable can also be understood of the universal judgment, without prejudice to the things that we have said about the time of Antichrist. For in two ways can those words be expounded: "And at midnight there was a cry made." First, that by that cry we understand the trumpet and great voice wherewith the angels will call for gathering the elect, as Christ said in Matthew 24.31, as is expounded by Jerome, Chrysostom, and others on Matthew 25, and Augustine epist.120 ch.34. But the exposition and the equivalence are difficult; for the trumpet and the voice of the angels precede the judge who is coming now after the death of all men, and will call them to rise again to life and to come to judgment, according to the verse of Paul 1 Corinthians 15.52: "For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible." However, the cry that is said to go before in the parable of the virgins will be before the death of men, when they could still be made ready and disposed for receiving the bridegroom, as the prudent virgins did; therefore by this cry can the voice of the angels not be signified.

Now Augustine replies that the cry too, which is talked of in the parable of the virgins, will be after the death of all men, which is there signified by sleep in the words, v.5: "They all slumbered and slept," and as a result he says that the cry is not so that men may be made ready for receiving the light of justice anew, but for being resurrected. But then will the prudent virgins trim their lamps, preparing themselves through recognition of their good works for giving account. And according to this exposition too nothing from that parable can be taken for the present controversy; for after the universal death of all men it will be certain that the day and hour of resurrection and of the coming of judgment is near at hand, yet always will what is future be unknown until the voice of the trumpet is heard, unless perhaps blessed souls may see it now in the Word, which is not repugnant to the words of Christ, though it be uncertain.

There can, however, be another exposition, that the cry is not the voice of the trumpet but is the preaching of Enoch and Elijah and of other servants of God who will live at that time; or they may even be the signs of judgment that will precede, as 'the sun will be darkened' etc., for they will cry in their own way that the day of the Lord is approaching. And in this way too in that coming will the two things said above have to be distinguished; one is the previous announcement of the coming of judgment, which will not only be before unknown but even unexpected and sudden, because before it there will not be any other public urging or premonition besides the general ones that have already been sufficiently made in Scripture. The other is the coming of the judge, and this will not be so sudden that the preparation and expectation of it could not precede, yet always the day and hour of it will be definitely unknown until it come. And in this way is this uncertainty explained by Oecumenius ch.6 on 1 Thessalonians 5, when he says that the signs of the approaching advent can be certainly known, but not so the advent itself.

21. To the third testimony from Acts 1, first I reply that by the words, v.7, "It is not for you to know the times and seasons," is at most excluded a certain foreknowledge of the definite day and hour of the second coming of the Lord, as is noted by Cyprian bk.3 Ad Quirin. ch.89. Next I say that Christ wanted to reprehend curious investigation and useless desire to know the future, especially things that depend on divine power and predetermination, as is noted by Justin q.112 Ad Gentes. But Augustine in epist.78 adds that by those words is also excluded some number of years within which or after which the second coming of the Lord will immediately be, because this too is properly signified by the word 'times', and therefore it can fall into no man's knowledge how many years later the judgment will be. Which he so confirms that he says that, although from the words of Christ in Matthew 24 it be collected that the judgment will not be until the gospel is first preached in all the world, when the Lord says, v.14: "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come;" nevertheless, even when that sign is completed, never can the times be known (that is, the number of years) which remain to the Day of Judgment. Wherein he signifies two things: one is that the words of Christ, "it is not for you to know, etc." exclude not only knowledge through the stars or other human signs, but also signs revealed through the prophets. The other is that they were said by Christ not only for those disciples alone who then were and were questioning him, but also for all men who will be in any time whatever. Which he hands on more at large in epist.80.

22. Hence, indeed, can be taken an objection against what has been said. For it hence seems to be that it can never be certain how many years will be left until the Day of Judgment; but this seems repugnant to what we said about the three years and a half of the persecution of Antichrist. I reply, to begin with, that it is indeed true that the words of Christ not only pertain to the disciples who heard Christ but also to all of us; for the inordinate desire of everyone to foreknow future things that depend on the disposition of God is restrained by Christ, and he taught that it does not pertain to men to investigate them, nor to want to know them, except insofar as God has wished to reveal them. From which also is rightly inferred that the times of the coming of the Lord are uncertain for us, because nothing of the number of years of the duration of the world has been revealed to us. And this is what Augustine is principally handling and intending in those places. But under the coming of the Lord he also includes the signs proximate to his coming, and among them he sometimes puts the persecution of Antichrist, as in bk.18 De Civitate Dei ch.53, after he has said: "To be sure that very last persecution, which will be by Antichrist, Jesus himself will extinguish with his presence, etc." he subjoins, "Here it is wont to be asked, when will that be? Very inopportunistly." And at once he adduces the words of Christ: "It is not for you to know the times, etc." And in the said epist.80 he says that Paul handed on to us that, "Antichrist will be manifest and is to be killed by the mouth of the Lord Jesus Christ. But after how much time this will be," he says, "is not as much as obscurely said." Therefore Augustine contends that the times up to Antichrist are unknown, but that after Antichrist is made manifest Augustine does not deny that by those who have recognized him and have understood and considered the Scriptures it can be known for how short a time then the world will still endure.

Hence, what in the same epist.80 he a little later subjoins: "But that from the signs in the Gospels and the Prophets that we see happening daily we ought to hope that the coming of the Lord is near, who may doubt? Indeed daily it comes closer and closer. But by how great an interval it is close this it is said is not for you to know," this, I say, is I think to be understood of the remote signs of the second coming of the Lord, not of the proximate ones, of which he says later: "I think that they will not be, when they will be, such as those signs foretold in the Gospel in the sun, and the moon, and the stars, and the oppressions in the lands of the nations," which he himself interprets allegorically of the persecution of the Church in the time of Antichrist. Therefore at that time the wise among the faithful could foreknow the shortness of the time remaining up to the judgment. Nor will they be acting against the word of Christ, “it is not for you to know the times,” because they will not inquire after that knowledge by human conjectures or natural signs or singular revelation or inordinate curiosity, but they will through revelation given in Scripture see fulfilled what was foretold. For just as in his first coming God gave certain signs whereby it could by the wise be known that it was already being done, or was a short time distant, before it happened, and after a definite number of years, at any rate through the weeks of Daniel, although always the day and hour were unknown, so should it, with proportion, be understood in the second.

23. To the fourth from the words of Peter, “Be sober,” I reply, to begin with, that Peter is not there dealing with the uncertainty of death or of judgment, but of the sure and daily persecution of the demon whereby he tries to draw men to sin, 1 Peter 5.8: “he walketh about, seeking whom he may devour;” for this cause Peter adduced for warning us to be sober and be vigilant. And for this purpose are those words everywhere alleged by the Fathers, and the thing is so clear that proof is superfluous. Hence although there might to someone be revealed the hour of death and judgment, nevertheless the advice of Peter would be necessary for him, nay, if he were wise, the more certainly he would know the day of judgment was approaching, the more vigilant and sober would he be, lest he be overcome by the demon. But I add further that, although that advice was given by Peter because of the uncertainty of death and judgment, it is for us no obstacle; for although Christ the Lord sometimes warns us to watch lest we enter into temptation, Matthew 26.41, elsewhere he often advises a like vigilance because of the uncertainty of death, as in the parable of the virgins, and frequently elsewhere. Hence, just as we said about the said parable, that that uncertainty is not only not removed from us but not either from the men who will be at the time of the antichristian persecution, so should it be said of these words of Peter, even if they had been said in that sense, because men were always uncertain about the day of their own death and judgment.

24. To the other testimonies that contain the opinion and the comparison that “the day of the Lord will come as a thief,” I say in the first place that it is to be referred, not only to the universal judgment, but also to the day of death and private judgment of each one, as is wisely taught by Augustine in the said epist.80. Where also he thus expounds the words of Mark 13 where, after a long sermon about the day of universal judgment, Christ concludes, v.35-36: “Watch ye therefore, for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cockcrowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping.” And he proves very well that those words are said to all of us, as Christ subjoins, v.37: “And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch.” Now the Day of Universal Judgment will not find us and all men in this life, so that because of its uncertainty we should all watch; therefore is this said to each one because of his own private judgment, lest it come to him as a thief. “Because each one,” says Augustine, “ought also to fear about the very last day of this life of his.” But why Christ gave this warning, when he had given a sermon about the Universal Judgment, is with this reason and words expounded by Augustine: “For where his own very last day will find each one, there the very last day of the world will overtake him, since of what sort each one is on the day he dies, of that sort will he be judged on that day.” And later: “At that time, then, will that day come to each one,” namely the day of Universal Judgment, “when the day comes to him on which he must depart hence such as he must be judged to be on that day.” Hence is it rightly collected that to such extent does the Day of Judgment come as a thief to each one as the day of death comes as a thief to him; for as Augustine also says: “That day will find him unprepared whom the last day of his life will find unprepared.” And in the same way is that comparison about the private judgment explained by Oecumenius on 1 Thessalonians 5.

25. Now death is not said to come as a thief because it is sudden for everyone; for although the day and hour of it is uncertain, ordinarily it is foreknown to be at hand; and signs precede, not only general ones, but also special ones, which can stir us up to watch, lest death come at night as a thief, that is, when we are asleep and unprepared; yet, because even the special signs of death themselves are wont to happen suddenly, and then scarcely can a man prepare himself for death, therefore death, as conjoined to its own previous precursors, is said to come as a thief. Hence, therefore, even the Day of Universal Judgment is said to be going to come as a thief, to us indeed by the medium of our own particular judgment, as Augustine expounded, but to them who live in those last times because that day will with its proximate signs begin suddenly, as with Ambrose we said above. Yet, nevertheless, that day will not be so sudden but that the men who then live are by antecedent signs to be stirred up to watch and prepare themselves so that it not find them unprepared. Hence Paul in the same place of 1 Thessalonians 5, as Oecumenius on the same place notes, made this clear by the example of a pregnant woman, when he says, v.3: “then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.” For childbirth considered in itself is not altogether sudden, for pains precede that are signs of its approach, yet those pains themselves come suddenly, and therefore one must be prepared beforehand, otherwise great danger impends; and thus childbirth conjoined with its pains can be said to come as a thief, because the day and hour of it are always uncertain, and its pains begin suddenly; thus therefore must it be understood of the Day of Judgment.

26. Finally Augustine adds epist.80 that the day of the Lord will not come as a thief “to all” but “to the unprepared and sleeping.” Which he excellently collects from the words of Paul, vv.4-6: “But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober.” Therefore to the sleeping and to those who use the things of this world intemperately will that day come as a thief, but not to the watching and those who are preparing themselves. Because although they are ignorant of the time, day, and hour of that judgment, yet they are not ignorant that it is near at hand, either in itself or in the particular judgment of each one, and therefore do they watch lest that day overtake them as a thief. Hence what in the same place Paul says, v.3: “When they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them,” is understood by Augustine also of the time when the persecution of Antichrist will be advancing, and the proximate signs of the Universal Judgment will begin, and he says that those who will be troubling the saints will say “Peace and safety,” and to them will sudden destruction come as a thief; but those who are suffering persecution, that is, the sons of the Church, are to be in part afflicted with great fear (according to that verse, Luke 21.26: “Men’s hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth;” which will most happen to the faithful who are sinners, who will find that they are at that time less prepared), in part to be raised by hope, according to the verse, v.28: “look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh,” which will happen to those who have lived in a holy way, and have been found sober and vigilant.

27. Now all these things so understood can be very well fulfilled even if the time at which Antichrist is going to persecute the Church, and which will intervene between his death and the coming of the Lord, be certain and definite and revealed in the Scriptures. For, this notwithstanding, bad men and persecutors of the Church will say Peace and safety, at least in the whole time before the death of Antichrist, at which time sudden destruction will come upon them, and the day of the Lord like a thief, and still after the day of the killing of Antichrist a multitude of infidels will remain in their ignorance and thoughtlessness, and many too of the believers will be ignorant of the mystery and will, living badly beforehand, continue in the same custom until the signs of judgment will begin, and then they will greatly fear; and although they will not realize the certain day of their own death or coming judgment, they will against their will understand that the day of the Lord is at hand, when they can scarcely prepare themselves for him, and therefore will the day of the Lord come also upon them as a thief. But to the elect and just it will not so come, because, understanding the words of Christ and the prophets, and having them before their eyes, and stirred up and aided by divine grace, they will, rejoicing in hope, expect their judge.

Chapter 9: By confronting another difficulty, the time and beginning of the reign of Antichrist is made more fully clear.

Summary: 1. Antichrist has not yet come. 2. A difficulty about the beginning of the reign of Antichrist. 3. First response: the reign of Antichrist will last only three years and a half. 4. Disproof of this response. 5. The time of the reign of Antichrist is not determinately known. The time of the kingdom will be longer than of the persecution. 6. Proof from Daniel and Revelation. 7. Again from Daniel. 8. The time of the persecution is certain, of the monarchy uncertain. 9. The time of the reign of Antichrist does not exceed the life of a man. 10. An instance from heretics. 11. Response. Scripture speaks of Antichrist as of only one man. Heretics falsely think that the throne of Antichrist has already begun. 12. The future reign of Antichrist will be shorter than his life. Antichrist will obtain the kingdom by fraud, not by inheritance. 13. Antichrist, as he is first on his throne, thus will he be the last. 14. The signs of the coming of Antichrist have not yet been fulfilled. The Roman Empire must at that time be overthrown. The manner of its overthrow is uncertain. 15. Confirmation from the Fathers.

1. From things we have disputed of in the preceding chapters is only concluded that the persecution of Antichrist has neither passed nor been begun; for if it had passed the world would already have been judged; and if it had begun, the world must be ended within a brief time; which is incredible, because neither is any persecution now more bitter than it was in past times, nor has the daily sacrifice ceased to be publicly celebrated in the Church; and the other signs going to precede the Day of Judgment that have been predicted are partly not complete and have partly not yet begun to appear, and they require a longer time for their fulfillment, as the completion of the preaching of the Gospel in the whole world, the division of the Roman Empire into ten kingdoms and its total destruction, and other like things, which cannot be expected within the time of four years. Hence all the wars, heresies, and other ills of the world that we are hitherto suffering and that our forebears experienced, pertain to those things of which Christ said in Matthew 24.5-11: “ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars; many shall come in my name; and shall deceive many; many false prophets shall arise; many shall be offended; they shall deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you, etc.” And nevertheless he subjoins: “see that ye be not troubled; for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet.” For we see all these things and they are now and were once in the Church, and for a long time with the same vicissitude of things. Therefore the state itself of human things and of the Church conjoined with the prophecies shows evidently that the end of the world is not so near that it is, within the fixed and shortened time of the last tribulation, to be consummated; therefore it is manifest that the time of the persecution of Antichrist has not yet begun.

2. But there remains the difficulty that it has not, from this principle, been shown that Antichrist has not yet come and begun to reign; because his kingdom is going to last longer, and it is not clear how long it will last nor how long before the Day of Judgment it will begin. For the reason most of all that it is not even revealed whether the antichristian kingdom will be only of one man and king or of several succeeding each other on the same throne. For although it has been shown that Antichrist proper will be only one individual man, it is yet not thence necessarily concluded that there will be a single king in his kingdom or on his throne; for he could be one of many succeeding each other and reigning on the same throne, and from him will it be named the kingdom of Antichrist; and thus it could happen that the throne of Antichrist or the kingdom of Antichrist has begun and is prevailing in the world, although there is not yet seated in it the one and proper Antichrist. However, if all this is conceded, the argument against the heretics will be weakened, at least as to the part where they contend that the kingdom and throne of Antichrist has already begun.

3. This difficulty can be confronted in two ways; one is by asserting that, not only the persecution, but also absolutely and simply the kingdom and empire of Antichrist will last only for the said time of three years and a half. There can also be a foundation for the response, because many of the Fathers mentioned seem thus to speak and think. For Irenaeus and Hippolytus say absolutely that Antichrist will reign for three years and a half. Augustine also says that Antichrist’s most savage reign will last for a little time. In almost the same way does Victorinus also speak and many others, especially of the moderns, as Bellarmine bk.3 De Romano Pontifice ch.3, and Ribera on ch.8 of Revelation. It can also be deduced from Scripture, that it speaks indifferently of Antichrist and attributes to him only three years and some months for ruling, nor does it distinguish between his kingdom and his persecution; therefore neither can we distinguish them, nor do we have a foundation for attributing more time to his ruling than to his warring against Christ. Especially because Scripture says that the demon will communicate all his virtue and power to him; but the demon does not need many intervals of time for warring down the kingdoms of men, if he is permitted by God, but he will at that time be permitted to act freely, because of which he is said “to be loosed a little season,” Revelation 20.3, and in 12.12 it is said: “Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! For the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.” Therefore there is no reason that the reign of Antichrist, which will be as it were the kingdom of the devil, should be thought to last longer.

4. Nevertheless this response cannot satisfy for, as I touched on in vol.2 p.3 disp.54 sect.5, although it can rightly of the monarchy of Antichrist be truly declared that it will last only for the time of forty two months, namely from the time when, with the three kings extinct and the other seven or the remaining kings of the whole Roman world or even Christian kings overcome, he begins to dominate alone, nevertheless it is necessary that the time of his life and of his kingdom will last longer. And about the time indeed of his life, it is per se manifest that he will be born an infant in the manner of other men, and will grow little by little, and will over many years come to adult age before he is going to reign. Most of all because, as I will say below, he will not have the kingdom by hereditary right but will usurp it by tyranny and fraud, which he could not do except in adult age.

5. Now the time of the kingdom is more expressly than by others touched on by Benedict Pereira bk.15 on Daniel, not far from the middle, § ‘Ceterum’ etc., and he says that, although the time during which the persecution of Antichrist is to last is clear from Scripture, nevertheless he says, “how long Antichrist simply will rule is delivered by no one to the extent I know, and I think it has been ascertained by no one among mortals.” And at once he tacitly explains the Fathers just mentioned, that they are speaking about the duration of Antichrist from the time at which “he will violently and cruelly pursue the saints and will prevail over them.” And this seems to have been the opinion of Lyranus on Daniel 12, for about the words, v.11: “And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, etc.” he says: “Here the angel instructs Daniel about the limit from which the three years and a half are to be counted.” And later: “From then are to be counted the 1290 days.” Hence he later concludes that, “the three years of the persecution of Antichrist are not to be computed from the time when he begins to show himself and to draw some to himself, but from the time when he will already be of such great power that he will display himself to men for worship, and when the faithful will not dare publicly to celebrate the sacrifice.” And to be sure, if the words of some Fathers are carefully weighed, they do not signify more. For Lactantius says: “It will be given to him to ravage the world for forty two months.” Ephrem indeed says: “After three times and a half have been fulfilled of the power and wicked working of Antichrist, etc.” And likewise Jerome on Daniel 7: “For three years and six months are the saints to be permitted to the power of Antichrist.” Again Augustine bk.2 De Civitate Dei ch.8 only said: “The time for which Satan is to be loosed will be three years and a half,” and ch.23 he says that, not the kingdom absolutely, but the “very savage kingdom” of Antichrist will last “a little time.”

6. Next, from the Scripture itself this opinion seems sufficiently proved, first because Daniel ch.12 expressly designates the beginning of that time of 1290 days, namely “from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up.” But it is not likely that that very time will be the beginning of the kingdom and of the battles of Antichrist; because a bitterness of persecution so great that it compels Christians to abstain from public sacrifice, and the enormous audacity of setting in the temple as though God, which is the abomination of desolation, supposes great power and a kingdom sufficiently proud and full; therefore the duration of the kingdom of Antichrist cannot be enclosed within that brief duration. The order of the narration is also in concordance with John in Revelation 13, where he first says, v.1: “I saw a beast rise up out of the sea,” which almost all understand to be Antichrist, and he subjoins, v.2: “and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority.” And later, v.3: “and all the world wondered after the beast,” namely because of his victories and marvelous signs; all which things will precede the persecution. For afterwards is added, v.5: “and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months.”

7. Next, the same is confirmed by the narration in Daniel ch.7, where, after the vision of the fourth beast having ten horns, he thus describes the beginning of the reign of Antichrist, v.8: “and behold there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots; and behold in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things.” And later he adds, v.20: “whose look was more stout than the others.” And then he subjoins, v.21: “I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, etc.” From which discourse it appears that the horn, before it begins war against the saints, will have a small beginning, and later it will war against three kings and will subjugate them, and thus must it increase so that it become greater than the others, but these things cannot be done in a short time; and yet thereafter will follow the beginning of persecution; therefore it is necessary that the beginning of the reign of Antichrist precede by much time the beginning of his persecution. And accordingly it happens that the time of the whole reign of Antichrist is longer than three years and a half, during which (as Daniel says in the same place, v.25) the saints “shall be given into his hand,” that is, the hand of Antichrist. Clearly signifying that the brief time will be of persecution only, but the time of ruling will be greater.

8. Now how much time there will be of the reign of Antichrist simply we find nowhere revealed; and therefore nothing can with certitude be affirmed, except that it will be greater than forty two months. For neither will the help of the demon be enough for him to effect without delay of time and some years so many battles and war down so many kingdoms, because he will do these things in a human way, although it is credible that through the help of the demon he will achieve it more quickly and more easily. Hence also it happens that the reign of Antichrist must by some years precede his consummate and perfect monarchy, because not in a moment but in course of time will he attain it, and therefore it will be coming to be before it is perfect. Now the reign will begin at the same time as he will by tyranny have seized some dominion, and will begin to obtain supreme force and jurisdiction over other provinces. And in this way it is probable that the consummate monarchy will last only for that brief time of forty two months, because he will get possession of all kingdoms at the same time as he begins the persecution. But this is not as certain, because even after perfect possession of monarchy it could be that he does not begin the persecution at once, and therefore only about the persecution is it certain that it will last for only those months. Now about the monarchy it is probable but uncertain, while about the kingdom simply it is certain, that it will last longer.

9. But to confront the difficulty touched on at the beginning, we think it must be added that, although we cannot define the definite length of the duration of that kingdom, nevertheless one must believe that the time will not be more lasting or longer than could be, and than is regularly wont to be, the live of one man, namely seventy or eighty years. And in Antichrist it is credible that the time of his duration will be much shorter, because he is not to be permitted to live the whole time that he naturally could, but he will be divinely killed, or sent alive into hell, perhaps in the middle of his days, because,

Matthew 24.22, “for the elect’s sake those days shall be shortened.” Therefore we can rightly conjecture that the beginning of the whole life of Antichrist will precede the beginning of the persecution scarcely by fifty years, and the beginning of his reign scarcely by thirty, and perhaps it will be briefer. For Alexander the Great subjugated the world in a shorter time, as is taken from bk.1 Maccabees ch.1; but it is likely that Antichrist will seize all things more quickly because of the help of the demon and of the full license and permission of God, as I already said. But that the whole time of the duration of Antichrist will not be greater than could be the time of one human life is proved from the other principle set down in chapter 2, namely, that Antichrist will be one individual man only, as we will at once more fully explain.

10. For there remains the instance given above, namely, that this is rightly said and concluded about Antichrist proper that he will be one individual person; and consequently also about this future reign under his personal empire, so to say, there is still not enough proof from what has been said that the empire of Antichrist must be begun by Antichrist himself. For why could it not be begun by his progenitors and ultimately reach him? But if this can so happen, whence will it be clear that his throne and kingdom have not yet come or not yet begun, wherein Antichrist will sit and will thence advance to seize other temporal kingdoms and finally to the persecution of the Church of Christ? It can, therefore, happen that the kingdom has already begun, and that it will last for many hundreds of years; because there is for that kingdom no time predefined in Scripture, nor are there signs given for recognizing its beginning, but only its end. But if this be conceded, the difficulty touched on at the beginning arises, that nothing will have been achieved against the heretics; for they only contend that the throne and kingdom of Antichrist has already come, not some individual person who is Antichrist.

11. I reply, to begin with, that this escape does not aid the heretics of this time; for they contend that Antichrist proper has already come, and that the particular persecution predicted under him has already begun, and that it has endured for many years up to a thousand or more, and perhaps is going to endure for many years yet. But that this is false is plainly proved from the alleged prophecies, and it will be made more fully so by other circumstances. Besides too, these heretics err because on that lasting antichristian throne, which they fabricate, they do not think that some sole person seated thereon is Antichrist proper; but they say that all who are seated on that throne, for the whole time since, according to their imagination, antichristianism began, are truly and properly Antichrist. On which posit they are unable to explain who among them it is who will for three years and a half persecute the Church with that “great tribulation such as there never was” (Matthew 24.21); or who it is whom Christ “shall consume with the spirit of his mouth” (1 Thessalonians 2.8), for he will not kill all those sitting on that throne, nor many of them, for of one only is it foretold; finally who it is to whom the demon, by God specially loosed and permitted, will communicate his whole virtue and on whom he will confer his power, so that he may do lying signs and prodigies, for these and the like things are not yet happening and they are foretold of one man only. But if they say that he will be the one who will sit last on that throne, who must on it be destroyed and altogether extinguished, certainly Scripture only calls him by antonomasia Antichrist, and only him does it give to us among the sure signs of future judgment; in vain then do the heretics fabricate many others who equally deserve this name, since they cannot in others point to that property of Antichrist. Besides too, willfully and from mere malice do they imagine that already some royal throne exists the last king whereon will be that most proper Antichrist. For what are the signs of such throne? Or where has it been indicated in Scripture? Or why cannot someone willfully say that it is the throne of the kingdom of England? Just as they themselves say that it is the throne of the Apostolic See, and someone else feigns that it is the throne of the Turk, or some other similar one. That thought then is vain.

12. Nay I add rather that, although it not be so evident from the Scriptures that the whole time of the kingdom and throne that Antichrist will possess will not last longer than the duration of the life of Antichrist, nevertheless it can with great probability be collected from Scripture that the kingdom will last a less time than the person of the king in the royal state. Which I thus declare because, to begin with, the person of Antichrist will not be born of kings, nor will he be the legitimate heir of some kingdom. Both of these I collect from Daniel 11 where it is thus said, v.21: "And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; but he shall come in peaceably [alt. secretly], and obtain the kingdom by flatteries [alt. fraud]." Which words cannot be adapted to some series of men succeeding each other on some throne, but they are foretold of some one individual person; for in a long succession of kings on the same throne, although perhaps the first was vile and entered secretly by fraud, these things could not be asserted of all his successors. Therefore they are all said at once of some one tyrant founder (so to say) or beginner of some kingdom. Besides that that very person will be Antichrist is testified by Jerome thereon against Porphyry (who interpreted the place about Antiochus), when he says: "But ours interpret better and more correctly that at the end of the world this person will become Antichrist, who has to rise up from a little nation, that is, from the people of the Jews, and he will be so low and vile that to him no royal honor will be given, and he will by ambush and fraud obtain the principality." Now when he says "but ours" he plainly signifies that this was then the agreed opinion of ecclesiastics, which is also followed by Theodoret thereon. It can also be confirmed from Daniel 7 where is said, v.8: "and behold there came up among them another little horn," which all ecclesiastical writers have understood of Antichrist, as Jerome there says. But the horn is called little because he will be vile and of the lowest origin and hence not the heir of any kingdom, nay nor of royal stock, and therefore is he said to be born from "among them", that is, from among kings, not of kings. Therefore Antichrist will not succeed to any kingdom or throne, but will be the first king on his throne, which he himself will begin, erect, or usurp.

13. To these I add that Antichrist will not have in his kingdom a successor, because he himself, who will obtain the kingdom by fraud, will grow to greatness through the power of the devil, and will afterwards persecute the saints, and will at length be killed by Christ, and his kingdom will be destroyed. Therefore he will not have a successor in his kingdom, and consequently the kingdom will not last more, nay it will last less, than the king, because they will finish together and Antichrist will begin later to reign than to exist. All which things are collected from the same places of Scripture. For John in the said ch.13 is, under the name of the beast, speaking of one and the same man, who will rise from the earth, to whom the devil will give his virtue and his power, through whom he will subjugate the whole earth, and afterwards he will make war on the saints for forty two months. The same is taken from Daniel 7, where under the image of the little horn is the same Antichrist described, with the same progress in erection of the throne, and in increase of temporal power, and in transition to persecution of the saints and to blasphemies against God and Christ, v.25, “until a time and times and the dividing of time,” at which time both he and his kingdom will be destroyed; and with this are consonant, at least in a mystical sense, the words of Job 18.19: “He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.” Which words Gregory bk.14 Moralia ch.11 interpreted by those of 2 Thessalonians 2, and he adds: “Whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the spirit of his mouth. When therefore his iniquity will, with the state of the world, come to an end, his offspring will not be left among his people, etc. But none of his offspring remains in the world, because the strict judge will end his iniquities with the end of this world, etc. But that these things must be understood of Antichrist is shown when it is added, Job 18.20: ‘They that come after him shall be astonished at his day, as they that went before were affrighted, etc.’” We conclude, therefore, that the duration of the reign of Antichrist will not be longer than could be the life of one man. Hence it becomes evident that Antichrist has not up to our times yet come, or that his kingdom has begun, not only in his person, which is more evident, but neither in some other or others to whom he could legitimately succeed.

14. And to confirm this truth can be added two other signs of the time of the coming of Antichrist. One is the preaching of the Gospel through the whole world, which must precede the coming of Antichrist and has not yet been done; the other is the total destruction of the Roman Empire, which must also either precede the coming of Antichrist or is to be completed by his power and victories. But something of these signs I touched on briefly in vol.2 p.3 disp.34 sect.2, and I treated the same things in disp.56 sects.1 & 2 at length and carefully, and therefore have I in the present thought nothing should about them be added. Only concerning the latter, about the destruction of the Roman Empire, do I note that some learned man rebuked me because I said there that this sign about the overthrow of the Roman Empire is uncertain, and cannot be with sufficient consistency be collected from Paul’s and other prophecies of Scripture. But if what I said be carefully read, we did not bring the sign itself into doubt, which we said was certain, and clear from the common tradition of the Fathers, which has seemed to us to be also apostolic tradition. About the manner, however, in which it is to be expounded and understood we denied that there was so much evidence, because neither do the tradition and consent of the Fathers equally converge on the manner itself, nor can it be sufficiently defined from prophecies. Which now too we think to be true, and we adjoin a brief exposition.

For it can in various manners be understood that the Roman Empire is to be extinguished before the advent of Antichrist, first because it is to be divided into ten or more kingdoms of the Roman Empire under kings who will take it divided among themselves until Antichrist comes and usurps them all. And this, if nothing is added, is most certain and is clearly collected from the prophecies, especially of Daniel, and it is the unanimous opinion of the Fathers, as we said there. The second manner adds to the preceding that before the coming of Antichrist the name and dignity of the empire or of the emperor or of the king of Romans will, through those ten kingdoms, be altogether extinguished; and this manner we said is not certain, nor is it sufficiently collected from prophecies, nor is it affirmed by all the Fathers. Because although in one or more of those kings the name and dignity of the Roman king may continue, it could be that they will through Antichrist overcome it and despoil it. And thus the total destruction of the Roman Empire will not precede Antichrist but be by him completed.

15. From which opinion and explanation Jerome is certainly not far distant when on Daniel 7 he says: "Let us say that all scholastic writers have handed down that at the consummation of the world, when the kingdom of the Romans is to be destroyed, there will be ten kings, who will divide the Roman world among themselves, and an eleventh little king will rise up, who will overcome three of those ten." And later: "When these have been killed, the other seven too will bend their necks to the victor." Which words can be drawn to the aforesaid sense, although in them he does not make clear whether in those ten kings, or in some one of them, the Roman name will remain until it is by Antichrist extinguished. But Cyril Catechesis 15, although he first says Antichrist will come "when the times of the Roman Empire are fulfilled," he does not explain whether they must be fulfilled in such wise that it is now altogether extinct, or in such wise that now the time is fulfilled in which it must be made extinct. Hence he later subjoins: "Ten kings of the Romans will together rise up, after whom Antichrist will carry off the power of the Romans." But Tertullian in Apolog. ch.32 says: "The very great force hanging over the world will be held back by the provision of the Roman Empire." Where the scholiast says: "Just as the Babylonians did away with the domination of the Medes, and of the Babylonians the Persians, of the Persians again the Macedonians, of the Macedonians thereafter the Romans, so the empire of the Romans Antichrist, and of Antichrist finally our Lord." And the same Tertullian bk. Ad Scapulam ch.2 says of the Roman Empire: "As long as it lasts, so long will the age stand," because it will stand up to the persecution of Antichrist. Nay, Andreas Caesar on Revelation ch.16 says that Antichrist will assume the name and title of the king of the Romans, and that whole principality, now divided into ten kingdoms, he will utterly overthrow. Besides, Lactantius, bk.7 ch.15, says that the Roman Empire is to be destroyed, but he does not make clear whether altogether before Antichrist or by him, but ch.25 he adds "as long as Rome is safe, the judgment will not be." And Chrysostom homil.4 on 2 Thessalonians says that the Roman Empire is to be extinguished by Antichrist; and we have adduced many other things from Augustine, Theodoret, and others on the said place, wherewith we have shown that this part is probable, nor do I see that anything has anew been mentioned whereby this latter mode is shown to be improbable but the former altogether certain.

Nay rather I add that it seems at least likely that the temporal kingdom of the Roman Pontiff will last inclusive up to the times of Antichrist, until it is by him destroyed and usurped, as we will see below; and that by this can it be judged sufficiently that it not be thought that the Roman Empire must be altogether extinguished before the coming of Antichrist, but that the tyranny is by him to be brought to completion. Lastly, there can, for greater explanation, be two times of Antichrist distinguished: one of temporal battles wherein he will conquer the ten kings and usurp all things, the other of persecution of the saints and of apostasy from Christ. But that, therefore, before this latter time the Roman Empire is to be altogether taken away, is certain from everything that has been said, and from the other things that I adduced in the said place, and the said author pursues it more copiously. But about the former time I think it very probable that in that very time, and by the battles of Antichrist, the destruction of the Roman Empire will be completed, as the other things prove that I have mentioned; and so are the words of Paul very well understood, 2 Thessalonians 2.7-8: "Only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way, and then shall that Wicked be revealed.” Namely by exalting himself, v.4, “above all that is called God, etc.” And easily too are all the sayings of the Fathers made to agree. In this sense, then, we said that it is not certain whether the Roman Empire is altogether to be destroyed before the beginning of the reign and battles of Antichrist, or is to be altogether extinguished by them, which now also we think to be true.

Summary: 1. Protestants oppose two other arguments about the time of Antichrist. 2. Some said that Antichrist already existed in the time of the Apostles, and will come again. 3. It was the opinion of some that Nero will come again. 4. This opinion has no foundation in Paul. 5. That Nero is still living as a mortal is a fable. 6. Paul speaks of Antichrist and of Nero as distinct. 7. Certain think that some of the heresiarchs were Antichrist. The same is by some affirmed of Mahomet. 8. Mahomet was not the true Antichrist. 9. Nor is Antichrist on his throne successively. 10. Response to the places adduced already at the beginning. 11. The place of John ch.4 is explained. 12. Heretics object that the deeds of Antichrist could not be finished in a short time. What Paul signified by the name of ‘falling away’. 13. This sort of falling away can signify, first, the overthrow of the Roman Empire. 14. Second, Antichrist himself is called a falling away. 15. Falling away does not necessarily signify a general apostasy. Apostates do not pollute the Church because they are outside it. 16. Third, by the name of falling away is understood apostasy. 17. This apostasy will not be general. Many will then recover the faith. 18. This apostasy will be completed in a short time. 19. Instance; it is solved. Whether this apostasy will take over the whole world is uncertain. 20. The demon will be the most potent minister of this apostasy.

1. Besides the things that the King of England objects, two others are from Sacred Scripture wont to be opposed by Protestants to what we have said about the times of Antichrist, which, for completion of this point, it has seemed necessary to satisfy. The first is that, although the end of Antichrist will be at the end of the world, it is not necessary that its beginning be put off for so long a time; and consequently it cannot be that its duration be as short as has been by us described. Now for proof of this they introduce three places. The first is that of Paul in 2 Thessalonians 2 touched on above, v.7: “The mystery of iniquity doth already work, etc.” The second is 1 John 2.18: “Antichrist will come [alt. cometh],” where he is speaking of Antichrist proper, as is indicated by the article added in the Greek according to what was said above, and yet he says in the present tense, “he cometh.” Third is the place of 1 John 4 where, speaking in the same way about Antichrist, he says, v.3: “whereof ye have heard that it [alt. he] should come; and even now already it [alt. he] is in the world.”

2. But these things have from what was said above an easy solution, but because not only heretics but also some Catholics make trouble for us on this point, we propose them again, so that we may touch on some opinions of Catholics and make satisfaction to them all. Therefore, because of these testimonies, especially of Paul, some of the ancient writers said that the person of Antichrist came in the time of the Apostles; but that he did not then exercise and complete his whole iniquity, but will come again at the end of the world in order to complete his course and fulfill everything that has been written about him. That this was the opinion of the old writers is reported by Jerome and Augustine, the former on Daniel 11, the latter in bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.29; it is also followed by Victorinus in his commentary on Revelation about the middle where, expounding ch.13, he writes thus of Antichrist: "Now that he existed already in the kingdom of the Romans and was among the Caesars is testified by Paul when he says, 'he who now holds will hold until he be made out of the way.'" Hence he thinks that he who then held the empire, namely Nero, was Antichrist. But he thinks that the same is that Wicked who is afterwards to be revealed. He did not, however, think that he was alive or was going to live until the end of the world, but that he was dead and was going to be resurrected: "not by his own power (he says), nor of his father (that is, carnal father, or by human generation) but raised up by command of God" because of the sins of men, as he later pursues.

3. Sulpicius Severus too, bk.2 Sacr. Histor. near the middle, reports that in his time "it was received in the opinion of many that Nero was the coming Antichrist," which he himself neither affirms nor denies, but he only says: "He was deservedly the first who began persecution against Christians; I do not know whether he will also be the last to complete it." However he says later: "Hence it is believed that, even if he transfixed himself with a sword, he has been preserved, his wound cured, to be sent at the end of the age." To which opinion he seems to adhere, and according to it he understands of Nero the verse of Revelation ch.13 about the beast that received a mortal wound which was afterward cured. Hence he thinks that Nero now is not dead but kept in reserve so that he may at the end of the world come to complete the mystery of iniquity. But the same author, in Dialog.2 De Vita S. Martini at the end, although he affirms that Nero will return at the end of the world and will fight down ten kings and will again rule in the West and renew a bitter persecution against Christians to induce them to worship idols, yet he does not say that he will be Antichrist but rather that at the same time Antichrist is to be raised up in the East, who will advertise himself as Christ and try to turn Christians from Christ, though not to worship idols but himself, and draw them to observe Judaism; and he says that he will fight against Nero and overcome him and subjugate the world, until he is killed by Christ.

4. This opinion, indeed, although it contains an old wives' tale, yet does not proceed from heresy, nor does it strictly contain heresy, nor does it deny received tradition or the proper sense of Scripture whereby we have it that Antichrist is one definite person and will come at the end of the world and will last for a short time. But it adds on other things, not indeed contrary to Scripture, but badly founded thereon, and in themselves vain and incredible. For Paul, although he said (according to the more probable and more received exposition) that Nero did in his time work antichristian iniquity (so to say), yet not the same as Antichrist will afterwards work, but in imitation or, as it were, image of him. Hence although he said that Nero was Antichrist, he adds "in mystery" or that he is "the minister of iniquity," that is, the type of Antichrist, as we explained above. Without foundation, therefore, is it imagined that the person of Nero will be the same as the person of Antichrist; and vainly and contrary to divine custom, nay contrary also to divine goodness, is it thought that Nero now dead is to be raised up by God so that the iniquity, that he had begun in a prior life, he might afterwards bring to completion. For the work of resurrection, which is proper to God, is not done for working iniquity, but for other and more honorable ends worthy of God and in conformity with his divine wisdom and providence. Besides, Scripture never signifies that Antichrist will in a supernatural way be procreated or called back to the world by God, but that he is to be generated in the manner of other men.

5. Hence no less vain was the thinking of those who said that Nero is now kept in mortal life until he appears again. For this too could not happen without a miracle; but it is foolish to attribute such miracles to God for such ends or causes. Nor is it less frivolous to expound in this way the place of Revelation about the cured wound of the beast, both because it is expounded far otherwise by the Fathers, as was seen above, and also because from the words of ch.13 it is clearly collected that both the wound and its cure will be at the time of Antichrist, when the world, wondering after the beast, worships the dragon; and also because it is clear from the histories that Nero cut his own throat and was really killed. For as Gregory of Tours says, bk.1 Histor. Francor. ch.25, “trying to escape the sedition that had been stirred up against him, he killed himself at the fourth milestone from the City with his own hand.” And the same is contained in Paulus Orosius bk.7 Histor. for the year AUC 88, and he adds that in him the whole family of the Caesars came to an end. The same is also reported by Eusebius in Chron. for the year of our Lord 70; in the same way too does Nicephorus speak about the death of Nero, bk.2 ch.27 and bk.4 ch.1, and in profane histories the thing is very well known. Next if (as Sulpicius said in the latter place) Nero will not be Antichrist, why or on what foundation is he imagined to be coming again at the end of the world? These things, therefore, although they are not heretical, must be disdained as fables.

6. Now the place of Paul has been made sufficiently clear from what was said, that, as I said above, Nero or the whole pagan Roman Empire Paul calls the mystery or type of Antichrist, but he evidently distinguished it from the true Antichrist when he said, 2 Thessalonians 2.6-8: “ye know what withholdeth...until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked be revealed.” But to the first words from John we reply first that Augustine bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.29 allegorizes those words about the future: “Of whom you have heard, since he is going to come,” whether because he reads thus from the Greek or because thus did he tacitly interpret them. For it is not a new thing in Scripture that the present is taken for the future, as in John 4 the Samaritan woman said, v.25: “I know that Messiah cometh,” speaking of the present, and yet she immediately declares it by the future, “when he is [will have] come, he will tell us all things.”

7. However, other Catholics here confront us, that let it be true that Antichrist did not come in the time of the Apostles, yet he is not to be waited for at the end of the world; for that way of speaking indicates a greater nearness; and therefore it is not incredible that Antichrist has already come in Luther or some like heretic. But chiefly can be noted, by the by, the opinion of John Annius who, about Revelation, persuades himself that Mahomet is Antichrist, and some have followed him whom he refers to, and he is followed by Fevardus bk.5 on Irenaeus bk.30. But they rest for support, not on the words of John or Paul, nor on any testimony of Scripture, but on mere conjectures wherewith they accommodate to Mahomet the things foretold about Antichrist.

8. However I do not judge it necessary either to report or to refute those things, both because Benedict Pereira has diligently presented it in his little book against Annius, which he adjoined to his disputations on Revelation. And also because, although they could find one or the other sign of Antichrist in Mahomet, that is not remarkable, because there is no enemy of Christ who does not participate in some property of Antichrist; for that is why they are by a general appellation all called antichrists, as we saw above. Therefore it is necessary to point to a collection of all the signs of Antichrist in someone for him to be concluded to be the proper and true Antichrist. But this is impossible to point to in Mahomet except by denying many predictions about Antichrist, especially those about the time of his persecution and death, in the proper sense in which they were understood by the Fathers, and by twisting them to metaphorical senses alien to the propriety of the words and to the many circumstances that we have considered in the prophecies themselves; and also those about the brief time during which the persecution of Antichrist will last, and about the prodigy of his death whereby the persecution will end and be followed a little later by the judgment. Add too the things about the defection of the Roman Empire handed on by the Fathers in interpreting the words of Paul 2 Thessalonians 2.6-8: “ye know what withholdeth..., only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked be revealed.” For in the year 630, when Mahomet appeared, the Roman Empire was still vigorous under Heraclius, and flourished afterwards too, and endures up to our own times, although it has always been getting smaller.

9. In addition, all the things we will in the following chapters say about the witnesses to be sent against Antichrist, and about the seat and errors and various descriptions of Antichrist, clearly confound that opinion. And so the authors of it are compelled to refer some things to the person of Mahomet, others to his throne, or his empire, that will endure to the end of the world and will then rage more bitterly against Christians, and so those who think thus agree in many things with Protestants, whether by taking refuge in willful metaphors, or even by not interpreting the things foretold of Antichrist about one and the same person, contrary to the context and certainty of Scripture. And therefore, although this opinion does not contain the impiety of Protestants, it is to be avoided lest they be given a greater occasion for error, and lest by perverse interpretations a thing in itself difficult and obscure be made more involved. Hence rightly does Damascene in bk. De Haeresib. at the end call Mahomet a type and precursor of Antichrist, but not the true Antichrist himself. And the same must be understood of Luther and the other heresiarchs that there have hitherto been; for judgment must be made about them from the same principles, so that it is not necessary to delay over them one by one.

10. To the objection, then, made about the words of John, I deny that the word ‘cometh’ in the present is taken because of the nearness of the fact for the future, but often because of the certainty of the prophecy. Which is very well proved by Ezekiel 39 where to the present is added the past when it is said, v.8: “Behold it comes and it is done;” and yet the discussion is about the Day of Judgment, as Jerome expounds, which day, both because of the certainty of the prophecy and for exaggeration, so that it may always be thought of as present and already done, is signified by words of the present and of the past. In this way, then, did John speak. Which is made sufficiently clear when he adjoins, 1 John 2.18: “even now are there [have there come to be] many antichrists;” for it was the same as to say that, although one individual Antichrist, both head and exemplar of the rest, is most certainly coming, that is, will come, yet already now in the present time there have come to be many antichrists, that is many ministers and precursors of him, who as they participate his deeds so also his name. When, therefore, John says that they have now come, he makes it sufficiently clear that the other has not yet come but is said to come, because he most certainly will come, because while others are as it were preparing his ways he is already said somehow to come.

11. And thus too are easily understood the other words of ch.4. For, to begin with, when, v.3, “every spirit that confesseth not [alt. removeth] Christ” is said to be “Antichrist”, either it ought to be understood of Antichrist taken generally, because there have been many heretics who remove Jesus, and all the Jews remove him and deny that he is true Messiah and true God, or it must be understood that he is Antichrist, not in person, but in spirit, just as John the Baptist is said to be Elijah, Matthew 12 and Luke 1. Hence in the Greek it reads, “And this is of Antichrist,” namely the spirit of Antichrist, as is read by Cyprian bk.2 Ad Quirinum ch.8, or “is of the spirit of Antichrist.” And thus is Antichrist rightly put there with the article, because all who remove Jesus, nay all heretics, have the spirit of Antichrist, although they are not he himself in person. And thus agreeably too are expounded the following words, “whereof ye have heard, that he come,” that is, will come, and is already beginning to come through his precursors, through whom he is already in the world according to his spirit and participation in his office and name, and therefore are they called precursors of the spirit of Antichrist rightly by Tertullian, bk.5 Contra Marcion. ch.16.

12. The second principal objection of heretics is that the things that Antichrist will do and that are foretold of him will, in the brief time prescribed by us, not be able to be completed. And they chiefly stress the words of Paul, 1 Thessalonians 2.3: “except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, etc.” Which falling away (as Calvin said) signifies so universal an apostasy of the whole world from Christ that it needs a succession of years, nay of many tyrants, heretics, or enemies of Christ, because one man’s life or diligence is not sufficient to complete it. Yet that such will the apostasy be, and that it is signified through ‘falling away’ by Paul, is supposed to be certainly, as it were, the opinion of all Pontificalists by the King of England in his Preface, and he proves it by a certain noteworthy reason when he says: “otherwise their Church would be every day liable to errors; which is altogether repugnant to their doctrine.” Next, that the beginning and author of the same apostasy will be Antichrist, and that it must be completed by him, is sufficiently indicated by Christ when he said, Matthew 24.21-22: “then shall be great tribulation, such as never was...for the elects’ sake it must be quickly finished,” namely when Antichrist himself has been killed, as Paul made clear.

13. We reply, to begin with, that it is not necessary to understand by ‘falling away’ in the place of Paul a universal apostasy from the faith but a complete destruction of the Roman Empire, or a division of it into ten kingdoms, as is interpreted by Tertullian bk. De Resurrectione Carnis ch.24, and by Jerome, the said q.11 to Algas., and by Ambrose and Primas on that text. But destruction of the Roman Empire we admit is not to be carried through in a short time, but little by little over many years and kings. For first the Roman Empire will be divided into ten or more kings, but afterwards Antichrist will come, and he will contend with them for some years and eventually will overcome them, as we said. So, for the total falling away or defection of the Roman Empire the life of one man will not be sufficient; but for the final completion that is to be done by Antichrist the life of one man will suffice, as has been sufficiently explained.

14. Second, we say that by the name of ‘falling away’ is there signified Antichrist himself, for thus does Augustine, bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.19, read ‘fugitive’ and he says: “He calls him fugitive, namely from the Lord God; because if it can rightly be said of all the impious, much more of him.” But in the Greek in that place is put the word ‘apostasy’, by which name Antichrist is understood by the Greeks there to be signified; it is indicated by Chrysostom in homil.3, ‘Ut Illum Intellexit’, and he is followed by Theophylact. Theodoret too and Oecumenius hand it on, and Hugo Eterianus in bk. De Regress. Animar. ch.23. Now Antichrist can be thus called, either to declare that he will be the supreme apostate, for in this way are abstracts wont to be put for concretes so as to signify excellence or excess in such property, or certainly the name of the effect is, by metonymy, attributed to the author or cause; for because Antichrist will be cause of the greatest future apostasy in the Church, the name of apostasy is attributed to him.

15. From which it is clear that what the King of England says in his Preface p.64 does not stand nor is true, that all Pontificalists regularly affirm that by the name of ‘falling away’ a general apostasy is there signified. For although some, in a better and sounder sense than Protestants, thus interpret that word, not all, however, regularly affirm it, as has been seen. Nor do I sufficiently understand the reason with which the king tries to prove that all Pontificalists must necessarily so think, “because,” he says, “otherwise their Church would be every day liable to errors.” For what is this inference? That if by falling away is signified the destruction of the Roman Empire or Antichrist himself, therefore the Roman Church will be every day liable to errors? There is surely no connection, no likelihood of inference. But perhaps by that argument he only wished to prove that the apostasy, which he means to be signified by the word ‘falling away’, will be general and not particular. However neither is this too thence proved, nor does the inference have even in this sense any likelihood. Because although there are every day, or frequently, particular apostasies from the Roman and Catholic Church, it does not therefore become every day liable to errors; because it both always condemns the errors of them who depart from itself, and apostates themselves immediately exit from it, and it itself, although it is sometimes diminished in persons, always remains unspotted, according to that verse of 1 John 2.18: “even now are there many antichrists.” And later, v.19: “They went out from us, but if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us.” And later, v.20: “But ye have an unction from the Holy Spirit, and ye know all things.” The Church therefore always retains the Holy Spirit and truth (as he adds in ch.4.6), although every day many depart from it. Hence too in the final apostasy, which will be under Antichrist, although it can in a sound way be called general, the Catholic and Roman Church will always be immune from error, as will immediately be said.

16. Third, then, we add and concede that ‘falling away’ does there signify that an apostasy from the Roman Church and from the faith of Christ will be in the world at its end, namely if we retain the Greek word in its genuine propriety. Which exposition seems to me the one more indicated by Chrysostom. Anselm again, although he puts in first place the exposition about defection from the Roman Empire, at once adds: “Whether as a multitude of churches departing from the Roman Pontiff, or a multitude of men departing from the faith.” But St. Thomas, understanding that falling away to be the future defection from the Roman Empire, adds that it must be understood not only of the temporal Roman Empire but also of the spiritual, “into which, on the witness of Pope Leo, the temporal has been changed.” But the falling away from the spiritual Roman Empire he says is a falling away from the Catholic faith of the Roman Church. And this was the ancient exposition, as Augustine above reports, which he himself does not reject.

17. But this apostasy from the faith will not, as the heretics imagine, be so general that the true faith will perish from the whole Church of Christ, for this both has no foundation and is repugnant to the promise of Christ, Matthew 16.18: “and the gates of hell will not prevail against it,” and to his other words, Matthew 24.22: “but for the elect’s sake those days shall be shortened,” namely so that they do not fall away from charity, let alone from faith. And Daniel ch.12 said, v.1: “at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book;” and at the end he concludes, v.12: “Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand and three hundred and five and thirty days,” which Christ said in other words, Matthew 24.13: “But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved.” There will, then, not be lacking those who will endure. Nay rather, so far from being the case that all who are believers beforehand will then lose the faith, instead many, and most of all from the Jews, must then be converted to the faith, as is testified on that place by Theodoret and Gregory in homil.12 on Ezekiel. And Augustine bk.20 De Civitate Dei says: “That through Elijah the Tishbite, at the last time before the judgment, the Jews will believe in the true Christ, that is, in our Christ, is a thing most frequent in the words and hearts of the faithful.”

Hence the same Augustine in the same book, ch.8, says that the Church, elect and predestined by God, is never to be led astray, not even in the persecution of Antichrist, but, he says, “the Church will be here at that time, even when the devil is to be loosed, just as, since it was here instituted, it has been and will be here for all time.” And later he says that then Satan is to be loosed, “so that the most faithful patience of the elect might be proved,” not so that it might be conquered, “for,” he says, “those with whom he must make war will be such that they cannot be conquered by his so great power and snares.” But, later in the same chapter, he questions further whether in that time of apostasy not only will some believers remain but also whether some, who were not in the faith, will be added to it; and he replies to begin with, that many children must in those three and a half years be baptized by faithful parents, and thus they at least will be added anew to the faith. Then he says in general: “Neither those who fall from the faith, nor those who are joined to the Church, will be lacking at that time,” which he confirms extensively. That time, then, is called a time of falling away or of apostasy, not because the whole Church and all the faithful will deny Christ, but because there will be great devastation, and temptation will overcome more than will remain victorious, or than were ever conquered in any other persecution. But how great will be the multitude of the apostates is uncertain; for although some say that two parts of the faithful will fall and a third remain, I do not find it anywhere revealed or sufficiently founded.

18. This apostasy, therefore, will not be so universal that it could not happen within that brief time, namely three years and a half, both because in those last times, before even Antichrist comes, the Church will be troubled with many persecutions and contradictions. For as Christ foretold, Matthew 24.10-12: “And then shall many be offended, and shall betray one another, and hate one another. And many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many. And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold.” And thus when Antichrist comes, he will find men well disposed, so that he might in a brief time make of them a great loss. Hence Augustine bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.19 reports that many of the ancient commentators understood the words of Paul, 2 Thessalonians 2.6-7: “And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time, for the mystery of iniquity doth yet work,” not of the Roman Empire, but of the bad and the counterfeit who are in the Church, until they come to so great a number that it makes a great people for Antichrist, and this is the mystery of iniquity, which seems hidden.” And later he says that then all the bad or the hidden heretics will go forth and be joined to Antichrist so as to adhere to him, and he will help them to overthrow the rest. Add that he says later from Paul and Revelation, that, “his future presence will be after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and will all deceivableness of unrighteousness, for then will Satan be loosed and through him will Antichrist wonderfully but deceitfully work.” Hence, then, is it easily understood that there is no need for a succession of many centuries (as Calvin said) for that general apostasy which will happen in the time of Antichrist; or certainly if the world will be disposed through many centuries for that general falling away, the disposition will not be under Antichrist or be made by Antichrist but by the many heretics and precursors of Antichrist. For both are signified in Matthew 24 by Christ, in 1 John 2 and 4, and in Paul 2 Thessalonians 2.

19. But if someone urges that this proceeds correctly if the antichristian apostasy should seize on some one province alone, or at most one part of the world; but so will it not be, but it will seize on the whole world, and it does not seem possible for it to be in so brief an interval of time so broadly extended. We reply, to begin with, that it is not clear that the persecution of Antichrist will roam in so many regions of the world; and that it is likely that the error of Antichrist is not be as spread about throughout the whole world as the Gospel is before the Day of Judgment to be preached in the whole world, because the former is not so foretold in Scripture as is the latter. Nor either do the prophecies say that Antichrist will reign in the whole world taken properly and in its whole universality, but they say that Antichrist will seize the Roman world previously divided into ten kingdoms, and that afterwards he will move war against the saints, hence it is likely that in the same Roman world will be that spiritual slaughter and apostasy of many faithful. But for this there will not be necessary a succession of many kings or times. For one Antichrist could have very many ministers of his iniquity, who will together disseminate his errors through various parts of the same world; and at the same time (God permitting) the demon will exercise all his strength and, partly by signs and lying wonders, partly by temporal promises, partly by coercion and exquisite torments, he will in a brief time bring it about that the greater part of the faithful will renounce Christ and receive the mark of the beast. And so not only the time of many centuries but also not the time of the life of one man either will be necessary for bringing about the aforesaid apostasy.

20. I add next that it is not necessary for such persecution and falling away to invade the whole Roman world; because this has not been revealed, but only that it will be greater than it ever has been, which could be both intensively, so to say, wherever it happens to be, and extensively with respect to other persecutions that it could possess, even if it not reach all the provinces and places of the whole monarchy, not to mention all the parts of the world. Especially because, just as Christ said those days are to be shortened for the sake of the elect, so it could happen for the sake of the same end that it be confined within certain boundaries of the world, God not permitting, because of the same end and other counsels of his secret providence, that it be more fully extended. Or certainly, if perhaps the tribulation as to places or regions or provinces of the world is going to be more general, and will bring about that great apostasy in all of them, still a more lasting duration of time will not be necessary for that effect, because it is not necessary that it happen in diverse places by succession of time; for it could be done at the same time by various ministers in diverse places. For Satan is to be loosed, who has everywhere invisible ministers very well prepared, and Antichrist will not lack visible ones, and he could in a short time send them out everywhere with great force and human power, aided by the industry and power of the demon, and he will urge them on to supreme diligence and speed, Revelation 12.12, “knowing that he hath but a short time.” Therefore that apostasy could, for whatever reason, be completed within the time shortened by God.

Chapter 11: That at the time of Antichrist two true men are to be sent to bear witness against him is shown from Revelation ch.11 against two false expositions of Protestants. Summary: 1. The two witnesses from Revelation ch.11 are said by the King of England to be the two Testaments. 2. Some favor this exposition. 3. Those two witnesses will be true men. 4. Proof from the Scriptures. 5. Other words of John are harshly and falsely accommodated to the two Testaments. 6. The Latin language is not unknown in the way the king imagines. 7. It is shown from the time determined by John that they are not the two Testaments. 8. The metaphors fabricated by heretics are turned back against them. 9. Interpretation of another metaphor of Protestants. 10. Heresiarchs have not been killed by that imaginary Antichrist. Heretics are more to be said to rise from themselves than to rise again. 11. The falsity of that metaphor is shown from the time and place. The prophets of heretics pervert kingdoms, not convert them. 12. The Catholic truth is made firm. 13. That great city, in whose streets will lie after death the bodies of the two prophets, signifies the world, but more properly and truly it signifies Jerusalem. The spirit of life cannot be understood of the glory of the souls but of the resurrection of the two witnesses. 14. Although those two witnesses not be Enoch and Elijah, yet are they true men. 15. The same place of Revelation shows that Antichrist has not yet come. Nor have the two prophets or others like them yet been.

1. Since we have started speaking about the time of Antichrist, it is necessary, before we pass on to the other heads proposed by the king, to digress with him and dispute of the witnesses to be sent against Antichrist, especially because this disputation is closely conjoined with the one we have pursued about the time of Antichrist. For one of the chief signs whereby we can show that Antichrist has not yet come is taken from this, that the witnesses to be sent against him have not come. Now this foundation about the sending of the two witnesses is taken from Revelation ch.11. And therefore the true sense of that prophecy must be looked into and explained. When, therefore, John has foretold the persecution of Antichrist in the words, v.2: “the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months,” he subjoins, v.3: “And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth.” Which days make almost the same number of months, namely forty two.

About this prophecy, then, we first inquire whether those two witnesses, whom God promises he will give at the time of the persecution of Antichrist, will be true men, or what they will be. For the King of England interprets this whole place metaphorically, and he has two expositions which we will consider in this and the following chapter. According to the former exposition, he denies that those two witnesses will be men, but he says that they are the two Testaments, the Old and the New, which against Antichrist and “the Babylonian monarchy,” as he himself speaks, “bear a constant and manifest witness; and therefore Antichrist will very much attack them with hatred, and leave nothing untouched whereby to dishonor, corrupt, and suppress them.” So far more or less the king, who takes this occasion to inveigh against the Supreme Pontiffs and the Roman Church, imagining that many things against the divine Scripture have by them been said and done “full of insult and shame. Of such sort are,” he says, “to call it a waxen nose, a dead letter, and a Lesbian rule, to have mixed with it the apocryphal books, and to have tried to put them on a par with it;” nay, “to prefer to it the traditions of men, and under foreign tongues to suppress it and, by prohibiting it from being read in the common speech, to keep it hidden,” and finally, “to have destroyed and killed it,” when other Latin translations besides the Vulgate, corrected and emended by the authority of the Pontiffs, have by the same Pontiffs been prohibited under censure. But these witnesses, slain by Antichrist, God has at last, through the King of England and his ministers, raised up or returned to pristine light and completeness, as he himself wishes. And thus does he conclude that the prophecy has been fulfilled.

2. To this metaphorical interpretation occasion has, as to the part about the two witnesses being the two Testaments, been given by some ancient writers. For in the book on Revelation, placed among the works of Augustine under his name, in homil.8 there is thus contained: “I will give to my two witnesses, that is, to the two Testaments.” Now that work is without doubt not Augustine’s, and has rightly been relegated to the appendix by the scholars of Louvain. But it is believed to be of Ticonius, whose work on Revelation the same Augustine mentions in bk.13 De Trinitate ch.3, where he also says that that Ticonius was a Donatist heretic. And therefore one should not care much about his interpretation, although he does not altogether deny that those witnesses are men, for he says later that they are the Church which, because of the two Testaments, is set down in the number two. Which exposition is imitated by Bede bk.2 on Revelation ch.11, where he also understands by the two witnesses, “the Church united from two peoples and radiated with the light of two Testaments.” However Bede both seems to have spoken mystically and does not insist on that exposition, for he at once reports the other about Elijah and Enoch, and he does not reject it but tacitly approves it. And if any later Catholic author has seemed to approve or insinuate that mystical exposition, he has not dared to depart from the literal sense. And therefore the metaphor, as it is handed on by the king, is proper to Protestants, and is said to have been invented by a certain Robert Abbatus, a Calvinist and, insofar as it excludes the other proper and literal sense, it is altogether improbable but, insofar as it is applied against the Roman Church, it abounds in errors and heresies.

3. I say, therefore, that those witnesses of whom John speaks will be true men, specifically to be sent to give testimony for Christ against Antichrist. This assertion I judge to be so certain that it cannot without rashness be denied. The proof is first from the propriety of the words, which to abandon without foundation is great rashness and corruption of the Scriptures. But this has no foundation, whether in Scripture itself, as is clear from the words, wherein that metaphor has no foundation, or in the Fathers, because they all contradict it, as we will see below, or in any reason or conjecture; for the king adduces none, but only a willful adaptation, accommodated to his own opinions and errors, and overflowing with insults against the Catholic Church. It is not, then, an interpretation of Scripture but a corruption.

4. In addition, if we ponder each point little by little, we will easily understand how inept the accommodation is. For, to begin with, we collect from those words that God promised to give two witnesses at the time of the coming and persecution of Antichrist, as is clear from the context in John, for therefore does he join the two things, v.2: “the holy city shall they tread under foot, etc.” and immediately, v.3: “And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy,” that is, I will give to them the spirit of prophesying, or I will in the time of that calamity send them for prophesying. Therefore those two promised witnesses cannot be literally the two Testaments, for these were given to the Church from the beginning; nor is anything in the time of Antichrist to be added to them, nor will they be given in a new way, save insofar as those prophets will be sent to propose and interpret sacred doctrine in a greater spirit. Nay rather if Antichrist, according to the opinion of the king, has from the 606th year of Christ arrived, and if from the same time (as Protestants also fabricate) the Scriptures began to be corrupted by the tradition of men, then in no way were two witnesses then given for prophesying, but those already long before given began then to be killed or corrupted.

Next, in the same place of Revelation it is said that those two witnesses will prophesy for 1260 days, that is, for almost the whole time that Antichrist will tread the holy city, that is, the Church, under foot; which time, according to the exposition of the king, includes all the times of the Roman Pontificate from the 606th year of Christ up to, for example, Luther. Therefore in this whole time both Testaments are being preserved in their virtue and wholeness in the Church, and their doctrine is become very greatly known and is fighting against Antichrist, nor will anyone dare to corrupt it, because it is there said of the two witnesses that for that time, v.5: “if any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth...and if any man will hurt them, he must in this manner be killed.” And at once their great virtue and power is described, and finally it is added, v.7: “And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them.” Therefore Antichrist will not corrupt the Scriptures until the end of his time and his persecution. But yet, according to the opinion of the king, the Scriptures are suffering war from the Pope from the time when antichristianism began in the Papacy, and for the whole of this time the Scriptures are not prophesying in the Church but human traditions, whereby the Scriptures are obscured and corrupted; what adjustment of fit is there, then, between such a metaphor or harmony of the prophecy of John and this made up interpretation?

5. In addition, John says that after the two witnesses have been killed by the beast or Antichrist, vv.8-9: “their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city...where also our Lord was crucified...three days and a half,” which the king declares was said, “because for half the spiritual week, which intervenes between the first and second coming of Christ, the corpses as it were of the Scriptures will, to the contempt of all, lie exposed, dishonored, corrupted, suppressed, etc.” In which words are two things to be noted. The first is that, in order to accommodate, according to his metaphorical sense, these two corpses to the two Testaments, he makes up and exaggerates many things that neither can he prove nor do they have any likelihood; and so it is established that he has through error from his Protestants accepted them, and that thereupon they serve in no way to explain the metaphor. For he says that the books of Scripture for many centuries back “have been condemned to silence, because the reading of them was forbidden to laymen, such that he who dared take them in his hand or to look into them was burned as a heretic.” But each of these is plainly false, both because neither law nor example can be shown for these things, and also because the opposite is manifestly clear from the use and practice of the Catholic Church.

6. The king indeed adds that the books of Scripture lay hidden in an unknown tongue. But Latin is not an unknown tongue in the Church, except to the unlettered and uneducated, for whom it is not useful to wish by themselves to understand or interpret the Scriptures, but it is more expedient that what is fitting for them to know or understand of the Scriptures they learn from their pastors and preachers of the Gospel. Nor has Sacred Scripture been otherwise preserved and handled in the Catholic Church. Next, in order to fabricate that metaphorical killing of both Testaments, the king says that Scripture has been deformed, although however it has, in the completeness both of all the canonical books and of all their parts, been preserved in the Church and put forward by legitimate authority. Again he says it has been corrupted; which is plainly false, because by the Church, when necessary, a reading that had been corrupted was emended; but where no change had been made, it was preserved in its antiquity. But finally he says that it was killed in the year 1562 because, besides the emended Vulgate edition proposed by the Church, others made and corrupted by heretics are not permitted. All which things are both per se frivolous and altogether foreign to explaining the said place of Scripture.

7. Another thing to be noted in the said words of the king is that in them he again inculcates his exposition, namely that John did not by those days and months understand a definite time but half the course of the whole time from the first up to the second coming of Christ; which exposition we have above sufficiently refuted. But now I ask, when he says that “for half that time” the Testaments of Scripture “will lie as corpses, exposed to contempt, neglected by almost everybody, and not by many understood” – I ask what he intends when he says “for half the time”? For either he means that for the whole half time, which intervenes between the first and second coming of Christ, the bodies of the Scriptures like corpses will lie in that state, or he means that they are only in the half time to be killed without designation of the time during which they will lie dead. This latter is repugnant to the prophecy of John when he says, v.8: “their dead bodies shall lie in the streets of the city.” And later, v.9: “and they of...the tongues and nations shall see their dead bodies three days and a half.” Those corpses, then, will lie for the whole half week, which, if it is a spiritual week as the king wishes, includes the whole half part of the time that runs between the first and second coming of Christ.

But if this be conceded and the king chooses the former sense for his words, let him declare to us, I ask, how it could happen that for that same spiritual week those two witnesses will give their testimony, or how they will prophesy for 1260 days, as John says; by which days, too, the king teaches that half a spiritual week is signified. Especially because John says that those witnesses are to be killed after they have finished giving their testimony; which cannot be understood of the first half part of that spiritual week, that is, of the six hundred years from the first coming of Christ when (as the king wishes) Scripture was alive; for John is plainly speaking of the same time when Antichrist will be persecuting the Church; therefore at the end of that time the witnesses will be killed. How then will the same bodies afterwards lie for a whole half week in the street? Add that, after the witnesses have been killed, they will no longer bear witness against Antichrist, because they have now finished their testimony, and because, as soon as they are made alive again, they will be called to heaven, and because at once will Antichrist be killed. But yet, from the opinion of the king, the two Testaments, after they were made alive again by the spirit of Luther or the like, are still persevering in giving testimony against Antichrist and are dwelling among men, and him whom the king himself calls Antichrist, he himself is still alive and will live to the end of the age. Therefore that accommodation or rather fiction can in no way stand.

8. Besides, if it were licit to use such vain interpretations or accommodations, what would be easier than to show that those metaphors about the two Testaments, as about the two witnesses killed by the enemies of Christ etc., are much more truly accommodated to the heretics of this time, or to the king himself, than to the Catholic Church? For then is a man killed when of the spirit by which he lives and speaks he is deprived; therefore, most of all could Scripture then be said to be killed when of the spirit by which it was made and should be interpreted it is deprived. For the body as it were of Scripture is the written letter, but its spirit and its life are the sense of it; therefore it is then truly killed when by each one's own human or perhaps diabolic spirit it is explained and induced to testify. Now it is clear that in no other way is Scripture by the king and by Protestants treated of and expounded, as the king shows in this very exposition of the present place, and as he testified above in establishing the rule of his faith. So it is necessary that among men of this sort Scripture should lie as it were dead, and its body be borne in their hands as it were a corpse. To which things does the verse too very well agree that, v.10: "they that dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them, and make merry," "because (says the king) their carnal lusts will no longer be held back, nor be reduced to order by the sword of the word of God," because among them it is not "living and efficacious, but dead and without the divine spirit." For, in whatever way they live, they promise themselves justice and glory by the mere faith that sins are not imputed to them, and they preach that neither observance of the commandments nor penance for sins is according to the Scriptures necessary. Next, while these fellows are boasting that they alone understand the New and Old Testaments, it is very certain that they possess them without life and spirit, and that among them these lie precisely like dead bodies.

Next, in this way can that metaphorical interpretation from almost the whole said ch.11. be refuted and confounded. For if those two witnesses will not be true men, but are only the word of God in the two Testaments, it is either impossible to hold to the order of the whole chapter and interpret it suitably, or infinite metaphors must be willfully and without foundation invented, which is repugnant to the soundness of Scripture and to an agreeable way of explaining it. For if those witnesses will not be true men and prophets, what is it that is said of them, v.6: "These have power to shut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophecy"? For how do the Scriptures have this power in the whole time of their prophecy; or what is the time of the two Testaments save either the whole time that the Church lasts, or certainly that especially in which the Protestants want Scripture itself to have been preserved more complete, incorrupt, and living? Again, as to the remark, v.6: "they have power over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will," in what probable way can it be accommodated to the two Testaments or to anything else besides two men? And the same argument can be made about the remaining part of the chapter, as has been sufficiently made clear; therefore must those words be understood in a proper sense about men. Which opinion, as to this part, that the two witnesses will be true men, we judge to be the Catholic one; both because it is in Scripture sufficiently express and cannot, except with great violence, be twisted to a metaphorical sense; and also because the Fathers and expositors have thus commonly understood those words, as we will see in the following chapter.

9. But now there follows for examination another interpretation that the king rather frequently says is received, namely among his Protestants. Who, in order to accommodate the prophecy to their preachers of the new Gospel, posit a metaphor in the number two, whom the king says are called two witnesses because they were few and appeared in goat's hair and sackcloth, "because they preached penance;" but they are said to have been killed because many were cruelly killed and burned in fire, but to have been resurrected in their successors because there were not lacking those who, by preaching of the word of God, possessed their virtue and their place, but to have done miracles because in a short time, by virtue of their spirit, they brought back many and great nations to the true way, that is, of faith. These things the king takes more or less from his own private spirit, not however from sure science, but, as he himself says, from his own conjecture, which he can neither find in the holy Fathers, for he admits that they erred in explaining Revelation, nor in the words themselves of Scripture, since he twists them at will to self-serving metaphors, which can indeed be sufficient for pouring scorn on that exposition. However, for greater display of the error of it, I note that certain things in that accommodation are false, others accommodated perversely, and others omitted, perhaps because they can receive no place or agreeable sense in the metaphor.

For, first, it is false that these pseudo-prophets were so few that they might rightly be believed to be signified by the name of two. For the sects of heretics of this time are so many that they can scarce be counted; and there are as many opinions as heads; nay in each one can many heads and many masters be found. For the reason most of all that in that number two the king wants not only the inventors of each heresy but also their successors, who up to this day are preaching new faith, to be included; but they assuredly are more than may be aptly signified by the noun two. Next, more evident is the falsehood that these new preachers appeared in preaching penance, since it is clear that one of their chief false articles is that penance is not necessary, but a new life, which they establish in a new and unheard of faith in their own justice alone. Besides, prophets are not said to appear in sackcloth because they preach penance, but because they profess a harsh and penitent life, or because they do penance; but these preachers of a new Gospel, what asperity of life, I ask, do they profess, or what penance have they done? Certainly not even the king himself has dared to say it, lest he affirm a manifest falsehood. Those fellows, then, are not the witnesses clothed in sackcloth whom God will send against Antichrist.

10. Moreover, if by the two witnesses are understood all those preachers, John, when he says that those two have been killed by Antichrist, must as a result be understood to be affirming that all those preachers have been killed by the same beast; for he says that two were killed in the same way as that two preached. But this is false, for there are few of these heresiarchs who have been killed by men, or punished by the Church with a worthy penalty of death, but many of them died not without prodigies and signs of divine justice; therefore, either that interpretation supposes something false, or the metaphor does not stand. Much more incongruous, indeed, is that they are said to have been resurrected in their successors, for this is not resurrection but new generation of offspring; but John speaks of the raising up and resurrection of the same men who had fallen. For he says, v. 11: "And after three days and a half the Spirit of life from God entered into them,” namely into those same who were lying killed, “and they stood upon their feet.” In addition, that perverse preachers have imitators and successors is not a new thing, and therefore neither does it effect admiration and astonishment; but at the resurrection of those slain witnesses, “great fear fell upon them which saw them.” That resurrection, then, is not the succession of another like person, but the miraculous and prodigious raising up of the same person. Next is added that the enemies of those preachers saw them ascending into heaven, whither they had, immediately after their resurrection, been called; but when did the Church see or hear anything the like in the successors of Luther, Calvin, or Henry VIII? The accommodation therefore is frivolous.

11. And hence finally is proved that it is also insufficient. For, to begin with, they cannot explain why those prophets of theirs are said to prophesy for 1260 days, although in Scripture a time definite in so many numbers and parts is not wont to be put for an indefinite one, nor can a reason for such metaphor or a like example be adduced. And much less can they explain why it is said that the bodies of those their prophets will lie, v.8, “in the street of the great city...where also our Lord was crucified.” For since on this point they affirm that the discussion is properly about the death of their prophets, these words too should be properly understood of their dead bodies; how, then, will they lie in the street of the city for three days and a half when almost all that died by punishment of death were at once burned? Next, neither can they accommodate the place, for by the great city in which their Lord was crucified they understand Rome, as we will see below; but neither Luther nor Calvin or their successors were killed in Rome. And the same argument proceeds even if that city, as the truth is, be understood as Jerusalem, for we read about none of the Protestants that he was, because of his new Gospel, killed there. Nor also can they expound what are those three days and a half, except by having recourse to a spiritual week, which, according to their sense, can embrace more than a thousand years. Besides, where is there found in these pseudo-prophets, v.6, “power to shut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophecy,” or have power “over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will,” or of doing some other marvelous works that have metaphorically been signified by those words? Certainly we read that these false prophets did no marvelous work. And the perversion rather than the conversion of provinces and kingdoms, which was done by their false doctrine, is no sign of the virtue of their word or spirit, since they did not draw men to penance or observance of the precepts or perfection of life, but to license of living without ecclesiastical obedience, nay, by promising salvation through faith alone without the yoke of the divine law, they have with ease deceived men prone to the things of sense.

12. The true and Catholic opinion, then, is that those prophets foretold by John will be two mortal men only, to be sent into the world by divine virtue and providence at the time of the coming of Antichrist, with the grace and virtue of the Holy Spirit for preaching the true Christ our Lord against Antichrist, and for confirming his faith with true and new miracles, for a true and exact 1260 days, that is, for almost the whole time of the persecution of Antichrist, as is asserted by the words of John understood in their propriety, and as was explained above in chapter 3. And it possesses the most agreeable reason of divine providence, lest in a time of so bitter persecution God should seem to leave his Church without sufficient and proportionate external help. For it is appropriate that God should through men come to the help of men, which we see to have been observed by him at all times and occasions; therefore in those days too he will provide men a like help through those witnesses.

13. At the end of those days, indeed, the two prophets will be truly and properly killed by Antichrist, that is, either by himself or his ministers; for this the Scripture does not declare, and the truth of the words is preserved in either way. Again, after death their bodies will truly lie in the street of the great city for three whole days and part of another; by which city some understand the world, insofar as it abounds with corrupt men, for the city is there spiritually called, v.8, “Sodom and Egypt,” by which names is this world wont to be called in Scripture; but it is better understood as Jerusalem, for it is added there: “where also our Lord was crucified.” About these words we will say more later. Now, in those days the wicked and the followers of Antichrist will truly and properly rejoice over the death of the prophets, and will in dishonor of them not allow their corpses to be buried. Which also God purposely permits so that their resurrection may be more miraculous, which will after three and a half days truly and properly happen, according to the words, v.11: “And after three days and an half the Spirit of life from God entered into them;” which things cannot be understood of the glorification of the souls of those prophets, as some heretics have imagined, both because the glorification of the souls of those martyrs will not be put off for three days, not even for a moment, and because it is at once added: “and they stood upon their feet,” where the discussion is evidently about the resurrection of the bodies. Which, for those two prophets, will not be reserved for the time of the general resurrection, but will be done at once, in the sight and to the wonder of other men still living in this mortal life, and they will hear the voice from heaven calling them, v.12: “Come up hither;” which voice they will obey by ascending into the heavens to the wonder of their enemies. Of whom at once a great part were, when a great earthquake toppled the city, overwhelmed and killed; the others, however, who remained, struck by terror, gave glory to God, as John concludes, v.13.

14. Nor is it necessary to confirm all these things otherwise than by the context itself and the words of Scripture, for this in their propriety is what they signify, and no reason arises or necessity, nay nor suitability, to drag them to metaphorical senses and to accommodate them by one’s proper choice and feeling alone to one’s own opinions, as in truth is done by the King of England and other Protestants. Add that all the Fathers and interpreters understand those words of prophecy in their proper sense; for although they differ either in designating the persons of those witnesses or in other lesser circumstances, as we will soon see, yet in this dogma, that the prophecy is to be understood properly and literally, they all agree, as we will report in the following chapter. Here only I refer to Lactantius bk.7 ch.17, where, passing over the name, he says that a great Prophet will come at the time of Antichrist, about whom he interprets the place of Revelation literally. However, I do not see why he speaks of the great Prophet in the singular and not of two prophets, as John expressly speaks. The thing, then, should be understood in this way. Nor against this proper sense of that context does the king adduce anything besides the things that he disputes about Enoch and Elijah, about which we will see in the following chapter. For now we plainly say that, although those two prophets not be Enoch and Elijah, it does not thereby happen that they will not be men and true prophets and preachers, properly to be killed by Antichrist and to be raised up by Christ. For God could from holy men then living call two by his grace to that ministry, and impart to them the spirit of prophecy and miracles, and in them could all the things there foretold properly and very truly be fulfilled. This sense and truth, then, demonstrated in this chapter can per se stand, whatever be thought, in the case of the other question, about Enoch and Elijah.

15. Hence I at length conclude that this place explained in this propriety and generality suffices for demonstrating that Antichrist has not yet come, in abstraction even from the special disputation about Enoch and Elijah. Because not only is it evident that Elijah and Enoch have not come, but also that neither have any two prophets hitherto appeared preaching in such wise against some enemy of Christ that in them everything has been fulfilled that John there foretells about those two witnesses and prophets, as is evident when one considers with propriety and truth all the circumstances we have noted. For no preachers have hitherto been who preached for 1260 days with power of performing miracles in the sky, the waters, and the earth, and who after those days were publicly killed, and their bodies for three days and a half lain in the street of some city so that afterwards they should be publicly resurrected. Therefore, with that proper and true sense standing, it is evident that those two witnesses have not yet been sent, and accordingly that neither has Antichrist come. Much more evident is it, then, that this prophecy cannot be made to fit the Pope.

Chapter 12: That Elijah and Enoch are the witnesses to be sent against Antichrist is shown.

Summary: 1. King James contends that the witnesses to be sent against Antichrist will not be Enoch and Elijah. 2. Enoch and Elijah still exist in mortal life. 3. Proof from the Scriptures. No mortal man attains immortal life unless he first die. 4. Elijah and Enoch have not yet attained glory. 5. Evasion. Response. 6. No one before Christ achieved glory. 7. Evasion. Response. Enoch and Elijah are by the Apostle taught not to be enjoying immortal glory. 8. The Fathers uphold the same opinion. King James accuses Bellarmine wrongly. 9. The opinion of St. Irenaeus is considered. 10. Of Tertullian. 11. Of St. Jerome. 12. Of St. Augustine. 13. Of St. Ambrose.

1. Although, as I said, it is not necessary, for showing what we intend, to know or define who those two individual men will be whom God will give as witnesses and preachers against Antichrist, because, provided it is clear that they will be true men, the demonstration proceeds, as I have shown, whoever they will be; nevertheless, since on this point the Protestants inveigh vehemently against the Fathers, against Catholics, and against the continual tradition and common sense of the Church, and make mockery of the Scriptures by their own decision and spirit, we cannot therefore pass over this question. On which point we will only add what will seem necessary for replying to the king and refuting his new opinion, for the rest that could here be said has been dealt with by us in another place. King James, then, contends that the opinion is false which asserts that Elijah and Enoch will come at the end of the world in their own mortal flesh to preach against Antichrist; and he calls it, with the accustomed license and liberty of Protestants, “an empty and old wives’ tale,” nay, “the vanity of a Jewish fable, and an idle dream.” For thus are Protestants with insults and exaggerations wont to persuade the unlettered and ignorant of what they cannot with reasons or testimonies confirm. So the king adduces no testimonies or reasons wherewith to prove his opinion but only tries to establish that the testimonies Bellarmine adduced to confirm the old dogma are not efficacious; and this he has thought to be sufficient for confirming his own opinion, because he supposes it to exceed our human grasp, as I will immediately report. We however will first uncover and refute the errors of all those among whom he himself dwells; then we will confirm the ecclesiastical and true opinion; while finally we will make satisfaction to his objections or rather evasions.

2. We lay down at the beginning, then, that Elijah and Enoch are living up to now, not with a celestial and glorious, but with a mortal life, that is, a life in which they neither see God face to face nor have attained in their bodies immortality or the clarity of glory. The first part, that Elijah and Enoch are alive, the king admits as certain, but for the rest he supposes the contrary dogma, and posits the foundation of his opinion when he says: "How could this stand with theology and reason, that these two glorified bodies should from paradise or heaven descend, should preach, should fight against Antichrist, and should be killed by him?" Now this foundation he seems to collect, in the first place, from Genesis 5, where of Enoch it is said, v.24: "And Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him." "Or called him," he says, "to himself." And from 4 Kings [2 Kings] 2 where Elijah is said to have been seen carried into heaven. Next, he uses this dilemma: "Now they must be either in heaven or in paradise; if in heaven (which is without doubt true), their bodies must have been glorified, since nothing corruptible can penetrate thither, Revelation 20. But if they are in earthly paradise, first we desire to know where that paradise is, etc." And later he subjoins: "it is blasphemy to believe that from when Adam was ejected from paradise any of Adam's posterity has reached there." He also afterwards adds that the earthly paradise was destroyed by the flood, if not before.

3. However, that foundation is not only new and unheard of, but is also repugnant to Scripture's universal ways of speaking, from which it is repugnant to remove anything without the authority either of the same Scripture or of the unwritten word of God manifested by the tradition of the Church and the Fathers, which here cannot be shown but rather the contrary can be. The assumption is proved in two ways. The first is taken from the universal rule of the Scriptures, that no mortal man is transferred to immortal and blessed life except by intervention of bodily death, and that consequently no one achieves the glory of the body save by means of the resurrection which is to life. Both are taught with sufficient plainness by Paul 1 Corinthians 15 when he says, vv.21-22: "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead; for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." And later, v.36: "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die." And later, vv.42-43: "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory, etc." And the rest whereby he plainly teaches that this is the general rule from which not even Christ wished to be excepted; for it was necessary also for him to die and so to enter into his glory, and therefore is he called "the first begotten of the dead, the first fruits of them that rise." For no one is carried to glory unless he have first tasted death. Hence in Hebrews 9 the same Paul says, vv.27-28: "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered, etc." And in Romans 5.12: "as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed unto all men."

4. But Elijah indeed and Enoch have hitherto not died, as Paul teaches about Enoch in Hebrews 11 when he says, v.5: "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death;" and about Elijah it is collected from 4 Kings 2, where is narrated, v.11, that he was carried into heaven as he talked with Elisha. And the king thus admits it about each with so great exaggeration that he says all the Fathers agree on this, that “both Enoch and Elijah are still alive, which,” he says, “no Christian has ever I think denied.” And explaining later how they are alive, he says: “For God is the God of the living, not of the dead; by how much more among the living are Enoch and Elijah, who have never in the manner of others tasted death.” Therefore, since they have not yet tasted death, they do not yet possess a dwelling in heaven and perfect beatitude of soul and body, according to the aforesaid rule of Scripture.

5. The reply could, however, be made that no rule is so general that it not suffer exception, or admit of privilege; therefore, although the said rule is general, Enoch and Elijah could easily be by privilege excepted. Nor should this seem marvelous, since it was the opinion of many Fathers that the men who are found alive near the judgment will not die but must be changed and taken up into the state of glory, if they were just; why then could not Enoch and Elijah along with them be excepted? Especially because the general law is that men should complete the present course of life within a few years, and that it is certain Enoch and Elijah, who have not died for so many thousands of years, were exempted from this law. However, although we admit that it is not so certain that no exception is to be admitted in this latter law as in the former, nevertheless the true opinion, and the one received by theologians and more approved by the Fathers and altogether in conformity with the Scriptures, is that this rule too does not admit of any exception. For absolutely all men, even those who will be at the end of the world, will die before the Lord comes for judgment, according to the order set down by St. Paul in the words just mentioned, “it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment.” Of which matter we have elsewhere more largely disputed. Yet we add that, although the exception about the men who will be at the end of the world is excused from error and rashness, because an occasion for it is taken from Scripture and it has some foundation in the Fathers, nevertheless this exception in the case of Elijah and Enoch cannot, because of its novelty and lack of foundation in the Fathers, be by force of this second rule excused of rashness; since besides the places cited, David in Psalms 88 [89] with great weight says, v.48: “What man is he that liveth and shall not see death?” supposing it as certain that there is no one of whom it could be affirmed. Since, therefore, Enoch and Elijah have not yet seen death, they have assuredly not yet been made immortal, according to this rule of Scripture.

6. But so as to make it more certainly clear that that opinion cannot without error be defended, we add a second general rule of Scripture, namely that no man descending from Adam obtained celestial glory, whether in his soul alone or, which is more weighty, in body and soul, before the coming and death of Christ the Lord. This rule is handed on to us by Paul in Hebrews 9 when he says that into the second tabernacle, or the holy of holies, only the High Priest was wont with blood to enter, v.8: “The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing.” Which condition, namely, it still had up to the point of Christ’s death, when the veil of the temple was rent and the gates of the heavenly kingdom were opened. Hence in the hymn ‘Te Deum Laudamus’ the Church sings: “Thou, the sting of death o’ercome, hast oped for believers the realm of heaven.” And Innocent III, in ch. ‘Maiores’ De Baptismo. said that, “the kingdom of heaven up to the death of Christ was barred to everyone.”

7. It will perhaps be said that the way at that time indeed was not so made manifest that all the just might pass along it, nor the door so open that all might enter it; nevertheless it could to one or another on whom God wished to confer this benefit be extraordinarily made open. But to the contrary, for this is an exception to a rule given by the Holy Spirit, which it is not licit to fashion from one's own brain. Next, there stand in the way against it the words of Christ in John 3.13: "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." Certainly, he who says "no man" excludes all save himself, and the exception confirms the rule to the contrary. Again, Paul in Hebrews 11, after he had numbered Enoch among the ancient Fathers, subjoins, vv.39-40: "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise; God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." Therefore neither Enoch nor Elijah received the promise, nor have been made perfect, that is, not yet received beatitude of body and soul. For Paul had introduced Enoch in his own name and person, but Elijah he had without doubt included under the prophets, and he designates him in particular when he says later, v.37: "they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins;" for of Elijah we read that he was, 4 Kings [2 Kings] 1.8: "girt with a girdle of leather about his loins," and that 3 Kings [1 Kings] 19 he "wandered about" in flight from the persecution of Jezebel, "being destitute, afflicted, tormented, wandering in the mountains, and hiding in a cave" (Hebrews 11.37-38). Therefore, just as Enoch and Elijah are included under all who obtained a good report through faith, so are they also under those who did not receive the promise nor were made perfect.

Besides, Paul speaks thus in ch.10 of the same epistle, v.19: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way that he hath consecrated for us," that is, to which he gave beginning, or upon which he himself first of all entered or, as Theophylact says, "he made a new way, along which he first went." The same more extensively in Theodoret, and it is understood in the same way by Chrysostom and Oecumenius. Hence, if even one man before Christ himself walked along that way and entered the gate of beatitude, Christ did not consecrate that good way. And there are like words in ch.6.18-20: "we...have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us...which entereth into that within the veil, whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus." Certainly, if Enoch and Elijah have entered, they entered as forerunners rather than Christ. Hence, because no one could have entered thither before him, thus did the Lord speak to the Apostles, John 14.2-3: "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself." Which testimonies I have considered more extensively in another place, and have confirmed with the expositions of the Fathers, and have profusely proved and defended this truth, and therefore I abstain now from a longer confirmation.

8. To these documents of Scripture are added the testimonies of the Fathers who, with unanimous consent, teach that Enoch and Elijah have not tasted death but are still alive in body and soul; but none of them says that they live in an immortal and glorious body, and many either indicate or openly teach that they still live in mortal bodies, although they are conserved by divine virtue, and are preserved from all corruptive alteration up to a predefined time. But the King of England says that Bellarmine adduced, for confirming his opinion, the testimonies of five Fathers, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Epiphanius, Jerome, and Augustine, but that they only say that Enoch and Elijah are alive and do not affirm that their bodies are mortal. Nay, he adds that the contrary is handed on by Irenaeus and Tertullian. For the former said, "Enoch and Elijah will remain in Paradise gazing on eternity until the consummation." But the latter says that "Enoch has not tasted death, as candidate for eternity." But we must more diligently consider their testimonies one by one.

9. Irenaeus indeed says bk.5 that "Enoch and Elijah remain there gazing on incorruptibility." But where, I ask, does he say they remain? To be sure, "in paradise," he says, "where the first man was put," that is in earthly paradise; but that is not the place of blest bodies; therefore Irenaeus contradicts the king when the king says that "Enoch for many ages back is in heaven in a glorious body." Nay rather, Irenaeus adds "there," that is in the same terrestrial paradise, "they remain until the consummation," that is, until the end of the world. But how this is to be understood we receive from the same Irenaeus bk.4 ch.30 where he says of Enoch: "he has been translated and is conserved until now." For these words do not signify, certainly, that he was translated into immortality, but that he is by God conserved in an extraordinary way "until now" and up to the end of the world, which he signified in another place by the noun "consummation." Hence what he says, "gazing on incorruptibility," does not signify that he has already put on immortality, or incorruptibility, but the present incorruption that they experience in themselves and see; for "gazing on" is the same as "observing" and looking at their incorruption. By which too they can be said, as it were, in some sign and participation to gaze on their incorruption, and to give hope thereof in that, if God so conserves mortal men, he can easily be believed also to be able to raise the dead to immortal life, for this is what Irenaeus there is intending to prove.

10. In addition, Tertullian in his book Contra Iudaeos ch.2 writes thus of Enoch: "He has translated most just Enoch, uncircumcised, from this world, who has not yet tasted death, as candidate for eternity." Where the fact he is a candidate does not signify that he is already in eternity, but that he is close to it and is aspiring to it, having as it were a certain sign of it, for this does the word 'candidate' properly signify. Hence the same Tertullian in bk. De Anima ch.50 says: "Enoch and Elijah have been translated, nor has their death been found, namely it has been put off. Moreover, they are preserved as going to die, so that they may extinguish Antichrist with their blood." By entreating God, surely, for their martyrdom, so that he might kill Antichrist with the spirit of his mouth. What is it, then, that the King of England says, that Tertullian plainly denies Enoch will die, when he admits it in such express words in this place? Nor is Tertullian contrary to himself because he called Enoch "candidate for eternity" because, as I said, to be a candidate for eternity is not to have been translated into eternity but to be aspiring to eternity. Hence the king's argument is frivolous when he says: "Badly now does he have the right of eternity confirmed for him if he is going to die again." For he can have a confirmed right of obtaining eternity in his time, although he is going to die, just as Christ had while he lived in mortal life; and the just confirmed in grace can have the right of eternity, that is, to eternity confirmed, although they are first going to die. Thus, therefore, can Enoch have a confirmed right of eternity, although he is going to die, because he is without doubt confirmed and preordained in grace, so that through martyrdom he should pass to eternity, as in this latter place Tertullian said. And thus he joined both together in his book De Resurrectione Carnis ch.58, where of Enoch and Elijah he says: "Not yet checked off for resurrection, because neither having discharged death, but because translated from the world and by this very fact already candidates for eternity, they are getting to know the immunity of the flesh from all vice and from all injury and insult.” Of which opinion the sense is clear, that they are not yet checked off for resurrection, because they have not yet reached to that perfection of glory of their bodies that they will after death and resurrection obtain; but by translation they have attained another kind of immunity from the effects and injuries of mortality, by reason of which are they said to be candidates for eternity. Hence he subjoins: “By what faith then do they give testimony, except that by which these teachings of future integrity must be believed?”

11. Over Epiphanius I do not delay, but I frankly admit that, wherever he touches on talk about Enoch and Elijah, he only says that they are not dead and that they are still alive giving testimony to eternity and the future perpetual duration of bodies; but whether they are afterwards going to come or to die he does not treat of, nor does he define either of them, as can be seen Contra Haereses 9 and Contra Haereses 64, immediately after the fragment from Methodius, and in Anchoratus towards the end. I come to Jerome, whose opinion is clearer on this matter, for in epist.148 to Marcella, treating of the place of Paul 1 Thessalonians 4 about those, v.17, “who shall be caught up...to meet the Lord in the air,” he says: “You wish to know whether they run to meet him in their bodies, so that they do not die first, although even our Lord died and Enoch and Elijah are, according to the Revelation of John, said to be going to die, lest, that is, there be anyone who has not tasted death.” And epist.61 to Pammachus, against the errors of John Jerome towards the end, he says that “Elijah and Enoch are not yet dead, and they possess, inhabitants of paradise, the limbs with which they were taken up and translated, etc.” And although he does not make clear what will later happen to them, he indicates sufficiently that they have not been translated to celestial glory but are divinely conserved in paradise, with the same bodies and of the same quality. Which he makes more clear later when he says: “For so great a time they remain at the same age at which they were taken up, and they have teeth and a stomach and yet they do not need food.”

12. Next, Augustine too eloquently uncovered his opinion on this point and delivered the true doctrine of the faith in bk.1 De Peccat. Merit. et Remiss. ch.3 where, when he had said that Adam was mortal in paradise, although he was not going to die had he not sinned, he adjoins: “I think that such condition, yet in animal and mortal body, has been conceded also to those who were translated hence without death. For neither are Enoch and Elijah withered by old age for such long life, nor yet do I believe that they have already been changed into that spiritual quality of body such as is promised in the resurrection, which went first before in our Lord.” The same Augustine treats of it more extensively in bk.9 De Genes. ad Litteram ch.6 where he says: “Nor must it be thought that Elijah is already such as the saints will be when, their day of labor finished, they will receive their denarius, or that he is such as are men who have not yet departed this life, from which life however he departed, not by death, but by translation.” And later he says that the same must be thought of Enoch, and about both he concludes: “Enoch and Elijah, dead in Adam, and bearing in the flesh the offspring of death, which debt, in order to pay, they are believed to be yet going to return to this life and, which has long been put off, going to die.” And other places we will refer to below that assuredly, if the king had seen, he would not have asserted that Jerome and Augustine denied only that Enoch and Elijah were dead but did not affirm that they were going to die, for they eloquently affirm both,

13. To these Fathers can Ambrose be added who in bk. De Paradis. ch.3 says, to begin with, that Enoch did not see death, and he says the same of Elijah in bk.1 De Abele ch.2. However, on 1 Corinthians 4, when expounding the words, v.9: "For I think that God hath set forth us apostles last," he says: "Therefore does he attribute this to his person, because he was always in necessity, having suffered persecutions and oppressions beyond the rest, just as Enoch and Elijah will suffer, who at the last time will be apostles. For they have to be sent before Christ to prepare the people of God and to fortify all the churches to resist Antichrist, and they, the reading of Revelation testifies, suffer persecution and are killed. And he had said almost the same on 1 Thessalonians 5. But if anyone perhaps does not acquiesce in this testimonies, because it is not certain the work is of Ambrose, we say, to begin with, that it cannot be denied but that it is of some grave and sufficiently ancient expositor. Next, we add an indubitable work of Ambrose, tractat. De Symbolo, where he says, ch.23: "Elijah and Enoch are the witnesses of the resurrection, who for so many circles of years, and up to the second coming of our Lord Christ, will remain perpetually in the flesh." And then in bk.4 De Fide ch.1 he expressly says: "Enoch was translated, Elijah taken up, but the servant is not above the Master; for no one has ascended to heaven except he who descended from heaven. For Moses too, although his body did not appear on earth, we yet nowhere read is in celestial glory, except after our Lord, by the pledge of his resurrection, broke the chains of hell and raised up the souls of the pious. Enoch then was translated, Elijah taken up, both servants, both with the body, but not with resurrection, not with the booty of death, etc." that is, not with the glory of those who are resurrected, nor with the dowries of glory, which are as it were the spoils of the death and the cross of Christ.

Again, Gregory the Great in bk.9 Moralia ch.3, elsewhere ch.4, speaks thus of Enoch and Elijah: "Hence it is that those two outstanding preachers have, with death delayed, been removed, so that they may at the end be called back for the use of preaching. These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks. One of whom Truth promises through himself in the Gospel, 'Elijah will come and will restore all things,'" Matthew 17.11; and bk.14 ch.11 at the end, elsewhere 12 at the beginning, he says: "They who went before in the former parts of the world, Enoch and Elijah, will be called back to the center, and the fierceness of his cruelty (that is, of Antichrist) they will suffer in their still mortal flesh:" where I note the phrase "in their still mortal flesh," because by it he signifies that they are now living in that mortal flesh; and bk.29 ch.25: "And if Enoch was taken up into heaven, he has delayed death, not avoided it." And homil.29 on the Gospels he says that "Elijah was taken into the airy heaven, so that he might be led into some secret region of the earth, where in great quiet of flesh and spirit he might live, until what time he returns at the end of the world and pays the debt of the flesh. For he has delayed death, not avoided it." Lastly Cyprian in bk. De Montibus Syna et Sion contra Iudaeos, not far from the beginning, says that Enoch was translated living to a place that God knows, and that at the end of the world he will come from that place to confound Antichrist, whence he evidently supposes that he is not in glory but lives rather in mortal flesh.

Chapter 13: That John understood by the two witnesses Elijah and Enoch is shown by conjecture and the authority of the Fathers.

Summary: 1. Enoch and Elijah, because they are not dead, are signified to be going to come to face Antichrist. 2. This conjecture is proved from the tradition of the Fathers. 3. Response of the king. 4. The words of the king are weighed one by one. 5. The king supposes without foundation that this prophecy of John has been fulfilled. 6. Satisfaction is made to the foundation of the king. 7. It is a thing more curious than useful to want to know where Enoch and Elijah are. 8. It is more probable that they are leading a life in the terrestrial paradise. 9. Again, it is more probable that the terrestrial paradise has not been overthrown.

1. From the attack, then, on this error a very compelling reason is collected to prove that those two witnesses will be Enoch and Elijah even if, for confirming it, we had to hand no other testimony from Scripture. For if Elijah and Enoch are not living in glory, nor have immortal bodies, but are being divinely maintained for so many years preserved from death and corruption, why, I ask, has so signal a miracle been done and so extraordinary a kind of providence except because the life of those men has not yet been completed, and some signal work is left for them to do in this life, on account of which they are being kept by God, and so that they may in their mortal bodies suffer something for his glory? Therefore, when other testimonies are lacking, a great argument is thence taken that they are being kept to resist Christ's greatest enemy, Antichrist, and to come to the aid of Jews and Gentiles in their greatest peril and at a time of the greatest necessity, and to undergo a signal death for Christ. Therefore, although the Evangelist John does not name them, he sufficiently points to them when he says, Revelation 11.3, "I will give to my witnesses," supply spirit or virtue, and "they shall prophesy." In which way of speaking he gestures that those witnesses do not need to be created or produced anew but already exist, and that they are then to be sent with the spirit of prophecy, etc. Rightly then do we understand that those witnesses will be Enoch and Elijah.

2. With which conjecture agrees the common tradition of the Fathers. For Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Gregory expressly hand this on in the places mentioned. And again Gregory homil.12 on Ezekiel, and Ambrose when expounding Revelation, Augustine tractat.4 on John specifically about Elijah, and bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.29, in treating of the same, has these notable words when he says that "it is a thing most frequent in the hearts and mouths of the faithful" that Elijah will come before the judgment and that through him the Jews will believe in the true Christ. The same is handed on about Elijah by Justin Martyr in his Dialogus contra Tryphon when he says that Elijah will in person be the precursor of the second coming of Christ just as the spiritual Elijah was precursor of the first coming. The same is said of Elijah by Dorotheus in his Synopsis: "Against Antichrist is kept a leader of war, who will oppose himself to him and refute his seduction and pride, who has received from God that he should be the precursor of the second and illustrious coming of the Lord." The same is extensively taught about Elijah by Julianus Pomerianus bk.1 De Judaeis before the middle, and by Chrysostom homil.4 on 2 Thessalonians. "Elijah," he says, "will come, confirming the faithful," and other things he pursues which we will consider in the following chapter. St. Prosper in Dimid. Temporis ch.13 expounds of Enoch and Elijah that place of Revelation. Damascene says very well in bk.4 De Fide ch.27: "Enoch and Elijah the Tishbite will be sent and shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children [Malachi 4.6], that is, the synagogue to our Lord Jesus Christ and to the preaching of the apostles; and they will be slaughtered by him [sc. Antichrist].” The same is handed on by Theodoret on Daniel 12 and Malachi 4. The same, next, is commonly handed on by expositors of Revelation 11, especially Andreas of Caesarea sup.ch.30, who says that most of the doctors took Elijah and Enoch for those witnesses, whom he himself is following; and he says that it is from a tradition of the heralds of Christ unwaveringly received in the Church. Bede, next, agrees, and Anselm and Thomas of England, who is wont to be known by the name of St. Thomas. We will also add more Fathers in the following chapter.

3. But to all of them the King of England in a single word, sufficiently alien to a Catholic mind, replies saying: “Since we have happened into this discussion about the ancient Fathers, allow me by this occasion, I beg, to admonish you by the by that it is no wonder if the Fathers here rather often err and understand less correctly many mysteries of Revelation, for the reason that the book was in their times still sealed; and although the mystery of iniquity was already then working, that man of sin, however, had not yet been revealed. For in the case of all obscure prophecies the most certain rule is that they can never be sufficiently understood until the time they are completed.” And he later subjoins words very harsh: “So far am I from believing this futile and old wives’ tale that, on the contrary, in this so learned age, I hold him who believes this (I call God to witness), not just for a theologian of great name, but not even for a Christian, that rather I associate him with the Scribes and Pharisees who were so mad that, although Christ taught the contrary, they dreamt that Elijah nevertheless was always going to come. But I am more level, for the reason I mentioned above, than the old theologians who erred on this point.” These are the words of the king, with whom we can justly remonstrate, so that we may ponder the weight, reason, consistency, and truth of such words.

4. For, to begin with, that he dares to reprehend so many and so signal Fathers is little consonant with the promise he first made. Next, although a prophecy not yet fulfilled is wont to be obscure with respect to diverse circumstances and to what is foretold only through enigmas and metaphors, nevertheless in the things that have regard to the substance of the prophecy and that are revealed through its proper words, it is not wont to be so obscure but that it should at least be known to the whole Church and to the wise doctors therein. For who would say that the prophecies about the future coming of Christ, before they were fulfilled, were not understood by the wise in the people of God, at least as to the substance of the article about the future coming of the Messiah and the signal future Prophet? Also as to other circumstances expressly foretold and in proper words, as that he would be born in Bethlehem of a Virgin and the like? So therefore we say in the present case, let it be that the book of Revelation is sealed and obscure as to many things therein revealed as long as they are not fulfilled; nevertheless some things have with sufficient clearness been foretold in proper words, in expounding which the common consent of the Fathers does not err. Others indeed, although they are obscure, are illustrated by consonance and comparison with other clearer prophecies, and also in expounding these the Fathers do not err, when by common consent they hand on, as a certain ecclesiastical dogma, the same sense. For when a prophecy is so obscure and unique that it can be said to be sealed, even the Fathers themselves do not hand on their expositions as certain, but use conjectures, and so they do not in their case as a rule agree. But in the present case the prophecy of Revelation is sufficiently clear about the two witnesses, at least in general, that they will be men and prophets, as was shown in the preceding chapter; but from other Scriptures and the agreement of them all, the Fathers conclude, with almost unanimous consent and great earnestness and certitude, that those witnesses will be Enoch and Elijah; therefore it cannot, without great audacity (not to say anything more serious), be said that they have in this respect erred.

5. Besides, the reason or excuse of the king presupposes a worse error, for he says that the understanding of that prophecy was hid from the Fathers because it had not yet been fulfilled, but he supposes it fulfilled that the Pope is Antichrist, and that either the two Testaments, corrupted by the Roman Church, or Luther, Calvin, or the like apostates are those two promised witnesses. Which supposition the king neither does prove nor can prove, because it has neither vestige nor shadow of truth but the calumny and imposture of the Protestants, as is clear from what has hitherto been said and as will be further illustrated and confirmed in what follows.

In addition, if that book has already been unsealed to the king, how is it he always moves about in conjectures when he tries to expound it, and hands down that the whole disputation about Antichrist is so obscure and involved that it can compel no one to belief, nay and also calls his own opinion merely conjecture? Assuredly, after there is certainty about the prophecy from the event and because it has been fulfilled, it is no longer ambiguous or conjectural, because what was foretold by it is to be believed, not only with opinion, but with certain faith. But if perhaps he says that he does not believe with certain faith that the prophecy of John about Antichrist has been fulfilled, but that he only thinks this thing itself by some sort of conjecture, and thereupon that his whole exposition is merely conjectural; assuredly, if he so responds, he is convicted, to begin with, of wrongly affirming that the book has now in these times been unsealed, or that the man of sin has been revealed, and that the prophecy about him has been so fulfilled that it can now be sufficiently understood. For that which human conjecture affirms has been neither revealed nor sufficiently understood. Hence with surely greater reason we can conjecture, nay even gaze upon and say, that the king errs when he says that he understands the mysteries of this book, the which, as he himself says, the Fathers could not attain to.

Next I ask why he does not hold him for a Christian who believes the aforesaid opinion about Enoch and Elijah? For if he himself is in this whole disputation led only by conjectures, can it be that he who does not believe the conjectures and dreams of the Protestants, who are seducing the King of England, is not a Christian? He will say that for this reason is he not to be held a Christian, that he does not believe Christ saying that Elijah has already come, and that therefore he hopes along with the Jews that he will still come; for this the king signifies in his words. But assuredly Christ had already from the beginning of the Church given his testimony about Elijah, and yet the Fathers constantly taught that opinion about Enoch and Elijah; therefore, if he is speaking consistently he must not hold any of those Fathers for Christians because, although (as he wishes) they do not understand Revelation, they ought at any rate to have faith in the words of Christ. But if it was licit for them, without loss of Christianity, to understand the words of Christ otherwise than the king interprets them, why will it not also be licit for us to think with the Fathers rather than with the king about the sense of Christ's words and to have faith in them? We conclude, therefore, that not only with preservation of Christianity, but also according to the sound faith of a Christian man and according to true and serious theology, one must believe and must hope that Elijah will come; but to make the thing plainer, we will more diligently consider the words of Christ and of the prophets in the following chapter.

6. First, however, it is necessary to make satisfaction to the king's foundation, which supposes Enoch and Elijah already to have glorified bodies, and for that reason he frankly admits that "it exceeds his grasp how it could be consistent with theology or reason that they should descend from heaven, should preach, and should fight against Antichrist; that they should be killed by him after they were for many thousands of years exempt from the curse of death." He confirms this with the dilemma given above, that they are either in heaven or in paradise, and he attacks both. Then he adds: "Since their bodies have been so long free of sin, they have no need of harsh treatment, and there is, thereupon, no reason they should appear clothed in sackcloth." But, to begin with, it matters very little to us that he affirm the Catholic opinion exceeds his grasp; for that, to be sure, is not so much born from the depth of the mystery or the difficulty of the thing as from preconceived error or from defect of theology. For he apprehends that the bodies of Elijah and Enoch are already glorified, and for that reason he does not grasp that they might come again to preach, to fight, and to die. Let him put aside his error, then, and he will easily grasp the rest. But I add that God could recall even glorified bodies to the state of mortality and commit all the aforesaid things for them to do and suffer; just as he could catch up Paul to the third heaven or, as grave doctors affirm, raise him up to the vision of the divine essence, and afterwards take him back to the common condition of wayfarers. However, that miracle is not now necessary for us, because for us it is certain that those bodies are not glorified. For why does the king not believe this? From this perhaps, "because for many thousands of years Enoch and Elijah were exempt from the curse of death under which all by nature lie." But this is of no moment; for it is easy for God to preserve, for however long he wishes, a mortal body from death, without the dowries of glory, just as would have been given, did Adam not sin, to everyone in the state of innocence. With whom Augustine, in the places above cited, compares Enoch and Elijah, rightly distinguishing between the immortal body that cannot die and the mortal body that, although it could die, does, by the special providence or operation of God, not die for a long time. But of Enoch and Elijah Scripture never said that they could not die, but that they have hitherto not yet died; why then does the king not grasp that it can be and will be that they should sometime return among men and die?

7. Now when he asks wherever it is they are, we first reply with the Fathers that the question is more curious than necessary for grasping and defending the other things of the faith or the dogmas of theology. For God could conserve them where he wished and, wherever they are, he could thence restore them to this lower world. Thus Augustine, bk.2 De Peccat. Origin. ch.23, among the questions that are dealt with on condition of saving the faith, and wherein we either use conjectures or suspend judgment because of ignorance, he puts this one about "Where now are Enoch and Elijah whom yet we do not doubt live in the bodies in which they were born." Chrysostom too homil.21 on Genesis says of Enoch: "If someone in curiosity ask and say, 'whither has he translated him?', let him learn that it fits not human minds to explore more curiously the things done by God, etc." And like things are contained in his homil.22 on Hebrews at the end of the letter. Next we say that perhaps they have been translated to some heavenly place where they are immune from the alterations and impressions of the elements, even if they have not been drawn up to the empyrean heaven, which is held to be the proper seat of glorified bodies. For the words of Scripture are not discordant with this way of speaking, nor does the thing itself have much difficulty or wonder. For what the king infers as it were in mockery and as absurd, that they are to be “running about hither and thither between heaven and earth in the manner of tree gardens” is frivolous and worthy of derision. For if the angels daily ascend to heaven and descend for the salvation of men, if Christ himself, after he once ascended, will descend again to judgment and rise again to reign, what marvel that two men, elected by God for an extraordinary work and ministry, should have been once translated and should return again to fulfill their course and ministry, and should finally return to heaven in consummation?

8. Next, we judge it more probable that they are in the earthly paradise where Adam was placed, as Athanasius said in his epistle for the Synod of Nicaea near the beginning, and about Enoch it is signified in the book of Wisdom, as we will see in the following chapter, where we will also confirm this further. Nor is there any repugnancy in what is written about Elijah, that he was seen borne into heaven, for as Gregory rightly said, homil.29 on the Gospels about the airy heaven, it must not be understood of the ethereal heaven. But as to what the king says, “it is blasphemous to believe that since the time Adam was expelled from that paradise anyone of Adam’s posterity has arrived thither,” if it be understood about him who should say that anyone by his own virtue or industry or labor can reach or enter thither, it would rightly be said. But if it be understood of him who attributes this to divine virtue and gift or dispensation, it is not only said without foundation but is also worthy, along with that censure, of a not dissimilar censure, that it is against the opinion of the holy Fathers, which Scripture greatly favors, as I will immediately say. But as to what the king asks, so as to impugn this further, where that paradise is?, it pertains to questions indifferent, as above Augustine also said, and whatever be thought about it matters little to the present cause.

9. Next, as to what he adjoins that “the terrestrial paradise has without doubt been destroyed,” had he taken away that ‘without doubt’, it would be tolerable, because grave authors are not lacking who so think, and because it is not a damnable opinion, since it is not plainly contrary to the Scriptures, or common tradition, or the sense of the Church. But that it be so ‘without doubt’ is said without foundation, because the king can show no place of Scripture by which he may take away all doubt from the assertion. Nay rather, it is far more probable that paradise was not destroyed by the water of the flood, but has up to now been preserved in its delight and beauty, and that there Elijah and Enoch live in a certain felicity of life, as Bernard rightly described it in serm.3 & 6 De Ascens. Domini. And Augustine in the said ch.23 De Peccat. Origin. said that with curiosity is the question asked “of what sort or where paradise is, where God established man, whom he formed from the dust, although however Christian faith does not doubt that that paradise exists.” Where he not only says that it did but that it does exist. However, about this question I have, to my ability, disputed elsewhere, and therefore I omit it; also because the present controversy does not depend on it. For although that paradise had been destroyed in the flood, God could have prepared a fitting place elsewhere for the state of those two prophets, or restored that very place or part of it to its pristine state, or at any rate to a delightfulness fitting those men. And finally, although now those witnesses live there happily and without sin, yet they will come clothed in sackcloth, not to make satisfaction for past sins, nor perhaps because they need harsh treatment of the flesh to avoid other sins, but for the example of the men then living, that they should show grief and sorrow (as Athanasius says).

Chapter 14: Whether from other places of Scripture it can be shown that Elijah and Enoch will be the precursors of the second coming of Christ and the witnesses against Antichrist.

Summary: 1. By many other testimonies of Scripture it is proved that the two witnesses will be Enoch and Elijah. 2. It is shown first of Elijah. 3. King James interprets Malachi of the first coming of Christ and of John the Baptist. 4. Malachi speaks in proper sense of the second coming of Christ. 5. In literal sense, indeed, he speaks of Elijah as precursor of the second coming of Christ. 6. The same is more clearly proved from Ecclesiasticus ch.48. This place Protestants destroy with insults because they cannot do it with reason. Other words from the same ch.48 are by the writer of Ecclesiasticus foretold about the same Elijah. 7. The exposition of the king is refuted. 8. Christ speaks of a double Elijah, one true, one mystical. 9. Christ did not reject the common opinion about the coming of Elijah. 10. The Baptist did not restore all things, since he converted few. Elijah by his first coming will convert few, by this second many. 11. John is metaphorically called Elijah by likeness to the true Elijah. 12. The Catholic opinion is confirmed by the authority of the Fathers. 13. The sayings of the Greek Fathers are put forward. 14. Bellarmine is defended. 15. The king's opinion about Enoch. 16. Some appropriate reasons are adduced why another associate should be joined with Elijah. 17. Which associate is to be joined with Elijah. 18. It is very probable that Enoch will be the associate of Elijah. 19. The words of Ecclesiasticus are very much in favor. Elijah will be sent chiefly to convert the Jews and Enoch chiefly the Gentiles.

1. King James in his Preface confidently affirms that “no word is found in Scripture to support either that Enoch and Elijah will return and will fight with Antichrist and must be killed in the same conflict, or that they will suffer anything the like.” Now to show this, he runs through the places of Scripture wherewith not only Bellarmine, whom he himself accuses, but also the most ancient Fathers and all Catholics are wont to confirm that dogma; and he advances to respond to them all, nay and tries to prove that they who interpret the said places in this way “are acting in bad faith.” We, however, following the opinion of Catholics, assert that there are many testimonies in Scripture wherewith that true dogma is in such wise confirmed that, although they do not make it per se sure divine faith, nevertheless they do prove the aforesaid truth such that it can without fear be prudently believed, especially when is added the consent of the ancient Fathers and the interpretation of almost all expositors. And since we have already said enough of the place in Revelation, we will now run through the rest. And because those that speak of Elijah are clearer we will speak first of Elijah and after of Enoch.

2. We say first, then, that Elijah will come to be the precursor of the second coming of Christ, and to convert the remnants of Israel to Christ and turn them away from Antichrist, and in this way he will fight against Antichrist. This assertion is proved in the first place from the words of Malachi 4.5-6: “Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.” Which words were understood about the true Elijah in person, and about his mission before, and close to, the day of final judgment, by the more or less common consent of the ancient Fathers. Chrysostom homil.58 on Matthew, and homil.4 on 2 Thessalonians, Theodoret orat.90 on Daniel at the end about ch.12, Ambrose on 1 Corinthians 4 on that verse 9: "For I think that God, etc.", Augustine bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.29, Gregory Moralia ch.4, Prosper In Dimid. Temporis ch.13, Damascene bk.4 De Fide ch.28, Isidore bk. De Vita et Morib. Sanctorum ch.35, and Julian Pomerius bk.1 Contra Iudaeos before the middle. Again the expositors on the same place, especially Cyril, Theodoret, and on the places of Matthew 11 & 17 especially Jerome, Euthymius, Theophylact, Anselm, and St. Thomas, and on Revelation ch.11 especially Aretas when he says: "And, certainly, that Elijah will come is manifest, since Scripture has predicted it, which is prophesied by Malachi: 'Behold I will send you Elijah.'"

3. These things notwithstanding, however, the King of England judges this interpretation not only to be false but also a Jewish fable and hence heresy; and anyone who believes it he does not think to be a Christian because he contradicts the words of Christ. He says, therefore, that Malachi is not speaking of Elijah in person but in spirit; nor about the second coming of Christ but about the first, whose day he calls "great and dreadful" because of the day of the passion and death of the Lord, and accordingly that the prophecy has been fulfilled in John the Baptist. All of which he proves by the testimony of Christ in Matthew 11, where, having said many things about John, he adjoins, vv.13-14: "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come." What is clearer? And he adds ch.17 when the disciples asked him, v.10: "Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come?" he says in reply, v.11-12: "Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things. But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not." And the Evangelist subjoins, v.13: "Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist." Mark too has almost the like things in ch.9, which we will consider later. And for this his opinion he only mentions a certain Bibliander, a heretic. But he could also adduce Jerome, who understands to be signified there by the name of Elijah, not only John the Baptist, but the whole chorus of prophets bearing testimony to Christ, and he adds that Christ in the Gospel understood John in Elijah; and Rupert there seems dubious about the sense of Malachi, although he at the same time says that many doctors, "with whom," he says, "we almost all agree," believe that Elijah will literally come and restore all things.

4. But I note that it is one thing to speak of the primary literal and most proper sense of Malachi, another of the secondary or mystical and spiritual sense. I say, then, that it cannot be denied but that the Prophet literally and in the most proper sense and in the appropriate name is speaking of the second coming of Christ and of the proper person of Elijah. The proof is first that Malachi, from the beginning of the chapter, is clearly speaking of the Day of Judgment, for he says about it, v.1: "For, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, etc." Which words manifestly indicate that the discussion is about the day of wrath and of divine vengeance, before which will precede the fire that burns all things; which most properly agrees with the Day of Judgment, but in no way with the day, or the time, of the first coming of Christ. And in the whole of the following context, the same sense is proved. Thus too on this point neither the Hebrew nor the Catholic expositors or Fathers are in disagreement. Therefore, when he later says, v.5: "I will send Elijah before the coming of the great and dreadful day," he is speaking about the same Day of Judgment, which will be "great for the just, and horrible for sinners,” as Jerome says; for both the literal context and sequence demand this, and the propriety of the words sufficiently indicates it; the words of Joel 2 also agree. For just as Malachi said: “I will send Elijah before the coming of the great and dreadful day,” so Joel, after he has extensively depicted the things that precede the Day of Judgment saying, v.3, 10, 11: “a fire devoureth before him, the sun and moon shall be dark, the Lord shall utter his voice,” and the like, he concludes, v.11: “for the day of the Lord is great and very terrible;” therefore that great and horrible day in both places is the Day of Judgment. Which is also called ‘great’ by Zephaniah 1.14, and he admirably describes the horror of it when he says, vv.14-15: “the voice of the day of the Lord; the mighty man shall cry there bitterly...a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, etc.” In like manner is the same day called ‘great’ and ‘of wrath’ by John Revelation 6.17. The words of Malachi, then, are not rightly accommodated to the day of the passion of Christ, nor will there be found an ancient expositor or a saint who has understood it thus. And it is specially noted by Chrysostom homil.59 on Matthew when he considers the last words of Malachi: “lest I come and smite the earth with a curse,” which are rightly accommodated, not to the first coming of Christ, but to the second.

5. Hence, secondly, it happens that there too Malachi is speaking literally of Elijah and predicting that he will be the precursor of the second coming of Christ. Which is more confirmed by the interpreters of the Septuagint, “Behold, I will send Elijah the Tishbite,” as it is contained in the version of Jerome and the recently corrected Latin, and it is read by Cyril and Theodoret on Micah, and by Tertullian in bk. De Anima ch.35, by Augustine, Euthymius, Aretas above; and by Chrysostom homil.38 & 58 on Matthew, who notes that added to the name of Elijah was the circumstance of his fatherland, so that ambiguity might be removed and it be noted that the discussion is about the proper person of Elijah.

6. Third, the same is proved from the words of Ecclesiasticus ch.48, where from the beginning of the chapter the Sage is speaking of the prophet Elijah, and describes his signal sanctity, great prodigies, and marvelous signs, and his singular translation; and later he subjoins, v.10: “Who art written down in the judgments of times to cool God’s anger, to reconcile the heart of the father to the son, and to restore the tribes of Jacob.” Where, I ask, is Elijah written down in this manner save in Malachi? Therefore Malachi is speaking about the same Elijah as the Sage is, and hence about the proper person of Elijah. To which words the King of England replies that, although it is clear Ecclesiasticus is alluding to the words of Malachi, Christ in interpreting Malachi also expounded Jesus ben Sirach. “Nor is it unbecoming,” he says, “for this mortal Jesus to be explained by the immortal and true Jesus, although to the shame and confusion of the heresy of the Jesuits.” And the like insults do the Protestants freely proffer when they can make neither probable nor likely the things they say. For who, when reading that chapter of Ecclesiasticus, would be persuaded that he is not from the beginning speaking of the true Elijah? For that Jesus had taken up the burden of praising glorious men, his forefathers, as he had said in ch.44, and beginning from Enoch, through Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the other prophets, he reached Solomon at the end of ch.47, and afterwards he begins in ch.48.1-3: “And Elijah the prophet arose like fire, and his word like a burning torch, who brought a famine upon them,...and thrice threw down fire from heaven,” and other things that he is openly reporting historically, up to that verse 12: “When Elijah indeed was hidden by the whirlwind, Elisha was filled with his spirit.” And thereafter he pursues a discussion of Elisha. But in the middle of his narration he interposes those words about Elijah, “Who art written down in the judgments of times, etc.” How likely is it, therefore, that the relative pronoun ‘who’ does not refer to the proper person of that Elijah about whom, in the preceding and following words, the discussion was being weaved about Elijah? Or who would impose such an interpretation on Christ? Especially since in the same kind of locution it is said to him, vv.5-9: “who raised a dead man from the netherworld; he threw down kings; who hearest judgment in Sinai; who anointest kings; who is taken up in a whirlwind of fire,” and immediately, “who art written down.”

7. I rather suspect that under the word ‘explain’ the king understood the word ‘emend’ or ‘correct’, and that therefore he said that it was not unbecoming for the mortal Jesus “to be explained,” that is, “corrected” and “emended” by the immortal Jesus, thinking that the mortal Jesus had not rightly understood the words of Malachi, and therefore was that Jesus explained by the immortal Jesus otherwise than he himself thought. For since the king thinks that book is not canonical, he may easily admit in it what could be emended. But although this would not be unbecoming for a mortal man speaking from himself, it would however be unbecoming for the Holy Spirit who was speaking through him, as the true faith teaches when it proposes to us that book as canonical. Such royal interpretation, then, cannot be a shame to the Jesuits; let the king see whether it be an honor to himself. Nor is by it any heresy refuted that, by the grace of God, could hitherto with truth be noted in the Jesuits; but rather is that interpretation proved to involve heresy, because either it thinks badly of the book of Ecclesiasticus, or certainly it attributes, not interpretation, but corruption of its words to Christ.

8. Fourth, that Malachi spoke of the person of Elijah we prove from the very words of Christ in Matthew 17 where, when the disciples asked what it was that the scribes were saying, that Elijah must first come, that is before the coming of the Messiah, Christ replied to them by saying first, v.11: “Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things.” But then he adds a second thing, namely, v.12: “But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall the also the Son of man suffer of them.” From which context I collect, first, that Christ spoke of a double Elijah, for of one he says, “he shall come,” but of the other he says “he is come already;” about the first again he says that “he shall restore all things,” but about the other he does not say this, but rather that he was badly treated and as it were condemned by the Jews, because they did not believe him but “have done unto him whatsoever they listed.” Next, he tacitly indicates his own double advent: one in which he was to suffer of the Jews, before which the spiritual Elijah came, about whom he had in the immediate place been speaking; the other in which he will come, not to suffer, but to complete all things, before which Elijah proper will come, about whom he therefore predicted that “he shall restore all things.” According to which sense the sum or paraphrase of Christ’s response is: It is true indeed that the true and proper Elijah will come, not now however, but at the time when all things must be restored and completed. But I say to you that there is another spiritual Elijah, who has already come as precursor of this my advent, wherein I came to suffer for men, by whom he was also himself badly and faithlessly treated.

9. Now that this is the true and literal sense of Christ’s words I show, first, because it is simplest and most consonant with the context and propriety of the words, which propriety should be kept, except where the metaphor is clear, and so let it be here. For in the first sentence both the name of Elijah and the future verb ‘shall come’ are understood properly, and we will immediately explain the same about the words ‘restore all things’. But in the second part the name of Elijah is expounded spiritually, because Christ himself made it so plainly clear that the disciples understood the sense, but all the other words are retained in their propriety. Add that in the former words Christ plainly nods assent to the Scribes’ opinion, which was in that people common and much received, and he approves it as true, namely, that Elijah the prophet will come. Nor did he ever indicate that they were deceived who understood that prophecy of the prophet Elijah. But afterwards, as if adding a new mystery that does not destroy the letter and truth of the prophecy, but raises it to a spiritual sense, he adds: “But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not.” Since, then, this is the plain sense, without cause does the King of England labor to overturn it, saying that Christ in the first part used the future word ‘shall come’, not by affirming, but by referring to what the prophet had said, and that later he added the past ‘is [has] come’, so as to explain the prophecy and to teach that it was already fulfilled. But assuredly he applies great violence to the words, “But he answered and said, Elias shall truly come;” for these are not the words of one referring but of one affirming and consenting. Nor were the disciples doubting whether the prophet had said it, but whether it would be, and he responded that indeed it would be; and nevertheless he adds that, in another spiritual way, Elijah has already come. For thus did Paul 2 Thessalonians 2 say of Antichrist, v.7: “the mystery of iniquity doth already work,” and about the same he subjoins, v.8: “and then shall that Wicked be revealed;” thus can we understand that Christ said that Elijah had already come in mystery, but was still going to come in person. And this is made more clear in Mark 9, where he first reports that Christ said, v.12: “Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things.” And later he subjoins, v.13: “But I say unto you, That Elias is indeed [also] come;” where the former words are very clearly said by way of affirming, and not of referring, and in the latter the word ‘also’ denotes a distinction of one Elijah from another, and of a double coming too.

10. Second, the said exposition is confirmed because it very well agrees with other places of Scripture, wherein the talk is about Elijah proper who will come, and of the spiritual Elijah who has already come. For where there is talk is about the Elijah proper who will come, of him it is said that “he will convert men to God,” or that “he will appease the anger of God,” and in this way too Christ attributes to him that “he shall restore all things,” by which word ‘all’ he embraced what Malachi and Ecclesiasticus had in other words said. Nor can those words be rightly accommodated to John the Baptist, since by his preaching he profited the Jews little. But as for what the Calvinists respond, that he has restored all things because he preached Christ who restored all things, is frivolous and very distorted. Both because the phrase “shall restore all things” signifies the efficacy and future effect of the preaching of Elijah himself at the same time and in itself, as is plainly clear from the propriety of the words. And also because otherwise any preacher of Christ might be said to restore all things, even if by his preaching he profit nothing; which is ridiculous. Finally also because, when Malachi says of Elijah “he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children,” it cannot be expounded that he will preach him who will do the converting; nay, neither will we rightly expound by saying that he will so preach that it be sufficient for converting; but the plain sense is that he will effectively convert, or he will so preach that he does convert; for this is the force of the verb, and this the words of God declare that are subjoined by the same prophet, “lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.” In this way, then, did Christ say “he shall restore all things,” in that, although the Jews did not believe the first Elijah and departed from the true Christ in his first coming, they will be restored by the second Elijah, according to that verse of Isaiah 10 and of Paul Romans 9.27: “Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved.” But the other part about the spiritual Elijah concords with the words of the same Christ in Matthew 11.14: “if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come,” that is, he will exercise with you the ministry of Elijah, which will be to convert men, especially Jews, to Christ. But because it could not be perfected without their consent, therefore did he say “if ye will receive it,” as Chrysostom and Theophylact noted. And Jerome says: “This which was said, ‘if ye will receive it, he is Elias himself,’ that it is mystical and needs understanding is shown by the following speech of the Lord, when he says, ‘He that hath ears to hear, let him hear,’” that is, let him who can understand attend and perceive the higher sense of the words. For just as the angel foretold of John, Luke 1, that he will come, v.17: “in the spirit and power of Elias,” thus in the present case is he said to be Elijah.

11. Third, the metaphor itself, whereby the name of Elijah is attributed to John, indicates about the proper person of that prophet, on whom that name was first imposed, that it was predicted he will have to be sent as precursor of some coming of Christ and will preach to the Jews so that they be converted to Christ; for because in this office John is likened to Elijah, there is he himself named Elijah, as going to come in the spirit and power of Elijah. Just as the same Luke declared in ch.1 by adding, v.17: “to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children,” alluding to the place of Malachi, as is clear from the words themselves, and as, in addition to the expositors there, Augustine notes tract.4 on John, when he says that John spoke in the spirit of Elijah, because he was in the first coming what Elijah will be in the second. The same by Gregory in homil.7 on the Gospels. The metaphor itself of Elijah attributed to John, then, indicates that the former prophecy was foretold literally of Elijah proper. Which is also thus confirmed, because when the angel said he shall come “in the spirit and power of Elias,” he plainly distinguishes Elijah from John; therefore he supposes that Elijah will come “in spirit and power, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, etc.,” and hence supposes that, of the Elijah distinct from John, similar words had been before predicted. Wherefore, although we grant that the words of Malachi are sometimes brought forward about John the Baptist, as if he was predicted in them, the thing would have to be understood in a spiritual sense, perhaps intended also by the Holy Spirit; but the proper literal sense is not to be excluded, which is in many other ways evidently proved. Just as when John adduces those words about Christ, John 20.36: “A bone of him shall not be broken,” the proper literal sense is not excluded whereby it is signified that in type it had been literally kept, as Augustine observed tractat.20 on John, and Chrysostom homil.84. In this way too, although the words of Malachi are accommodated in a spiritual sense to John, their propriety must be kept literally. For of John it had been literally foretold by the same Malachi 3.1: “Behold I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me.” Which words Christ first reported in Matthew 11 as having been said properly about John, hence he gives as preface, v.10: “this is he of whom it is written, etc.” but afterwards he brings in the place of Malachi far otherwise, or rather he alludes to him by attribution, or accommodates the words in a spiritual sense to John.

12. Lastly, by the authority of the Fathers this exposition of the Lord's words is proved. For Jerome on Matthew 11 says that John is mystically called Elijah because of likeness, and he adds that just as Elijah will be, according to Malachi, the precursor of the second coming of Christ, so John was the precursor of the first. For although there he only refers to this opinion as the opinion of others, yet he puts it in the last place and tacitly approves it; but on Matthew 17 he supposes as true the tradition of the Hebrews about the true Elijah's future coming as precursor of the second advent, and he afterwards thus expounds the words of Christ: "He himself, who will come in the second advent of our Savior according to faith of body, comes now through John in truth and spirit." And Augustine, bk. 83 Quaest. q.58, says: "In the second coming the Lord will come in glory, of whose advent Elijah is hoped for as precursor, as John was of the first; and therefore is it said by the Lord, 'Elijah is already come, and men have done many things to him, and if you will receive it, he is John the Baptist, who is to come.' Because he is in the same spirit and in the same virtue and as it were in the office of a preceding herald; and the latter has already come, but the former will come." Where he very clearly expounds that Christ spoke of a double Elijah, a true and a mystical. And in bk.1 Quaest. Evangelicar. q.21, he understands about the true Elijah those words of the Lord: "Elias indeed shall come;" and as to what is added, "and shall restore all things," he expounds: "he will himself restore either those whom Antichrist's persecution has confounded, or, by dying, what he owes." The same in tractat.4 on John, as I reported above. And likewise Ambrose bk.1 on Luke, on the words, 1.17: "and he shall go before in the spirit and power of Elias." Among other reasons and likenesses he posits are: "Because the former is precursor of the first, the latter of the subsequent coming of the Lord." And bk.2 De Virginibus at the beginning he says that: "Elijah, who was a virgin, was for that reason caught up to heaven, and," he says, "he will be the precursor of the Lord's coming." Gregory too, bk.35 Moralia ch.9, elsewhere ch.6, understands it of the true Elijah, and he declares how he will restore all things when he says: "For now the Church has lost the Israelites, whom it was not able by preaching to convert, but then, at the preaching of Elijah, while he is collecting as many as he has found, the Church receives as it were more fully what it has lost." And in the same way were the words of Christ understood by the same Gregory bk.20 Moralia ch.25, and homil.12 on Ezekiel.

13. In addition, Origen tract.3 on Matthew after the question of the Apostles, "Why therefore do the Scribes say that Elijah must first come?" adds: "To this Jesus responds, not indeed by rejecting what had been handed on by the Scribes about Elijah, but he denotes that another coming of Elijah has happened before him, which the Scribes did not know." And thus immediately he expounds the following words of Christ about a double Elijah, in person and in spirit, of whom one will come, the other has already come. Hence very well does Chrysostom homil.38 on Matthew 11 say: "Christ signified John, for both have undertaken one ministry, and both have been made precursors. Wherefore he did not say, he is assuredly Elijah, but, if you wish to receive it, this is, etc." and the rest that he there elegantly pursues, and more extensively and better in homil.58, where he expounds the words of Christ, "Elijah shall come," about Elijah the Tishbite, of whom Malachi also had spoken. And homil.4 on 2 Thessalonians he likewise declares that John is said to be Elijah because of the ministry of precursor, wherein indeed he was like Elijah. And Theophylact on Matthew 17, expounding the words of Christ, he says: "By saying that Elijah indeed shall come, he shows that he has not yet come, and that when he comes in the second advent he is going to restore to the faith of Christ all the Hebrews whom he will find open to persuasion, etc." Finally Tertullian bk. De Anima ch.35 favors the same exposition, to pass over later authors, Bede, Anselm, and others, who thus understood the words of Christ.

14. What is it, then, that the King of England says, that there is nothing in the Scriptures that gestures that Elijah will come before the judgment? Surely it is not likely that so many Fathers have with so great concord come together in collecting this assertion from Scripture without a great and evident foundation in the same Scripture? Wherefore he is too extreme when he blames in Bellarmine the aforesaid interpretation of the words of Christ and calls it impudent, and says it is a paraphrase not to be borne, or that it was introduced cunningly and in very bad faith. For either he has not read the Fathers, or he blames them all cunningly and disguisedly in one Bellarmine and contrary to what he elsewhere professes; but both are intolerable and unworthy of the king. For the reason most of all that neither any reason nor any consideration of any moment about the words of Christ does he produce whereby he might impugn the received sense of the words of Christ; nor does he make satisfaction to the things that we have introduced in order to persuade him. Since, therefore, other testimonies of Scripture cannot be otherwise rightly understood, and the words of Christ in their best and plain sense are in harmony with them, and the common interpretation of the Fathers agrees, there should be no doubt but that Elijah will be the precursor of the second coming of Christ, and hence that he is one of the two witnesses foretold by John in Revelation.

15. But of Enoch as if in mockery the king speaks thus: "But Enoch must be yoked in this business together with Elijah, for no other purpose, if I mistake not, but to take up the yoke on the other side." However, these witticisms and words of derision are jabs not only at Bellarmine (as the king pretends) but at all the Fathers, nay at the Evangelist John himself. For if the aforesaid words must be listened to, they not only mock and exclude Enoch but altogether every associate of Elijah in his preaching and advent. For it is thus that anyone could say: what need for someone else to be yoked together with Elijah except perhaps for taking up the yoke on the other side? Why then did John foretell that two witnesses and two prophets will come? Who has known the mind of the Lord, and who has been his counselor? Or who might demand of him a reason that he will send two witnesses and not one only, or more? Or why in his first coming he sent only one precursor, but in the second two? Or why for preaching the gospel he sent twelve apostles and not more, nor fewer, and at the end of the world he will be content with two witnesses against Antichrist? Futile then are little objections of this sort; for God, Ephesians 1.11, "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."

16. Although to someone who considers rightly, many reasons of this divine providence can at once occur. For in the first coming one precursor alone was sent because he was sent only to one people of the Jews and to one place of the earth, and at the time when that people was still continuing in the faith and was instructed in the teachings of the prophets, and therefore one outstanding witness, who would be, John 5.35, "a burning and a shining light", seemed sufficient. But Elijah is to be sent to the Church now diffused through the whole world, and consisting of Gentiles and Jews, and at the time when they will scarcely find faith on the earth because of the enormous persecution of Antichrist, and therefore he will have some associate who will help to bear the yoke of gospel preaching and of the defense of Christ. So that there may be two candlesticks standing in the presence of the Lord, and illumining both peoples; and two olive trees from whom greater abundance of grace in a time of such great necessity might be communicated to the Church. Therefore the king greatly errs in doubting about the number of two witnesses, or by mocking it as if it lacked reason.

17. Now who that associate will be is not as tried and certain as that the other will be Elijah. Hence in what the king adds, that no place of Scripture speaks of the return of Enoch, he errs little. For Aretas too on Revelation 11, in his ch.39, said: "That Elijah will return is manifest; but about Enoch indeed we do not have from Scripture a testimony that has regard to his coming." Hence it has happened that about this associate of Elijah Catholic doctors have had various opinions; for Victorinus on Revelation 11 thought that Jeremiah would come with Elijah; but Hilary canon.20 on Matthew, rejecting that opinion, associated Moses with Elijah, whose opinion some of the modern expositors on Matthew 17 have followed. But this office of prophesying along with Elijah at the time of Antichrist is attributed to the Evangelist John by others, along with Hippolytus, bk. De Consumm. Mundi. Who, however, does not exclude Enoch, but adds John third. This, however, has no foundation and is repugnant to John himself, who makes mention of two witnesses only. Nor is it altogether credible that Moses, Jeremiah, or John should come with Elijah, because no trace or indication of that thing is contained in Scripture, and it is far more true that they are all dead and are now reigning with Christ; and therefore it is not likely that they will die again and need to be drawn away out of heaven from the beatific state so as to come down to fight with Antichrist, as we have more extensively treated of elsewhere.

18. It remains that we should altogether assert that Enoch will come with Elijah to be the other witness and preacher against Antichrist. For in affirming this opinion the gravest and almost all Fathers agree. Tertullian bk. De Anima ch.50, Augustine bk.9 De Genesi ad Literam ch.6, and bk.1 De Mirabilib. Sacrae Script. ch.3, Ambrose on 1 Corinthians 4, Damascene bk.4 De Fide ch.27, Bede, Anselm, and St. Thomas on Revelation, where also Andreas Caesar says that most of the doctors follow this opinion, and Aretas says that it is had from the tradition of the heralds of Christ. And the argument is a strong one, because Enoch is not dead but was translated, as Scripture teaches Genesis 5, hence it happens that at some time he will die, "because it is appointed unto men once to die," from which rule he cannot with foundation be excepted. Therefore it is very likely that he is reserved for this end, so that he may come with Elijah and die for Christ.

19. Add the words of Ecclesiasticus 44.16: "Enoch pleased God and was translated to paradise, so as to give the Gentiles repentance." Which words are by the Fathers understood of the earthly paradise, as I reported above. But the King of England contends that it is sufficiently expounded in this way, how he was placed as an example for men in the future, whereby they may be incited to do penance and follow God. Which exposition seems to be handed on by Theodoret q.45 on Genesis. And it could be tolerated if another were not being excluded, or if many other circumstances did not force one to interpret that something further is signified in those words. For if he was translated only as example, he would certainly have had to be transferred, not to the earthly paradise, but to the heavenly, nor would he have had to be kept in his mortal body on earth, but to be immediately crowned with glory and honor. Next, there were assuredly going to be few who would need to be moved to penance by that very distant and very hidden example; therefore some other mode of moving men to penance is there foretold. Finally, in that causal notice, “he was translated to paradise, so as to give the Gentiles (or the generations, as the Greek has it),” it is sufficiently indicated that he has been by a special providence preserved to excite men at some time to virtue and penance. Hence it is probable that not without mystery is “Gentiles” put there, because Elijah will be sent more to conversion of the Jews, but Enoch to recalling the lapsed among the Gentiles. This assertion, therefore, has in Scripture this sufficiently probable foundation, which, having been confirmed by the authority and conjecture of the Fathers, unless someone wishes willfully to turn his back, and to think more than he should, makes the thing sufficiently credible and morally certain.

Chapter 15: The seat of Antichrist in place and rank is very far distant from the See of the Pontiff.

Summary: 1. King James tries to prove that Rome is the seat of Antichrist. 2. He is speaking of Rome itself, not of the pontifical throne. 3. Although Rome were the future seat of Antichrist, it was not thence rightly concluded that he will sit on the See of Peter. 4. The King of England’s proofs. 5. Whether by the name of temple Paul understood the Church. 6. By temple can be understood the congregation of the faithful. Also can be understood churches, excluding the temple in Jerusalem; finally, any place dedicated to the divine cult. 7. Augustine thinks Antichrist himself is the said temple of God. 8. To the King of England is given the option of choosing whichever he likes of the said expositions. 9. From the king’s own exposition the conclusion is no more drawn that Antichrist will sit in the Roman temple than in any other. Response to the instance. 10. The bosom of the Church is very ample, and does not include Rome only. The Pontiff does not advertise himself as God, but shows himself Vicar of Christ. 11. A second proof of the king from Revelation. 12. The woman should not be confounded with the beast. 13. If that woman is Rome, she is certainly pagan Rome, not Christian. The beast on which she rides signifies not Antichrist but the series of Gentile tyrants. 14. Confirmation from consideration of the words of ch. 17 of Revelation. 15. From this place cannot be collected that Antichrist will fix his seat at Rome; rather is collected that Rome must be overthrown by him. 16. The same is proved by a dilemma. 17. Conclusion.

1. We have, as I think, sufficiently disputed of the time of the coming of Antichrist, and consequently of the witnesses who will come to preach against him; what follows is to speak of the seat of Antichrist, which is the second member of the disputation of the King of England, or the second place he rests for support to show that Antichrist is already sitting on his seat and his throne. However, neither is it thus expressly collected by the king, nor would the inference be of any moment. For in two ways can the antecedent of that argument be understood; in one way about the See itself of the Roman Pontiff, insofar as it is the pontifical throne, whereon Antichrist is said to be going to sit; in another way only about the place of the Roman City, such that Antichrist will therein place his throne and the royal curia of his empire. Now the antecedent cannot be understood in the former sense, because the argument would be useless and beg the question; for it is the conclusion that the king is trying to prove, namely that Antichrist will sit, nay is also already sitting, on the pontifical and Roman

See; if therefore the antecedent is understood in that sense as the foundation and principle of the argument, the conclusion to be proved would be being assumed, and the argument would be ridiculous.

2. It is necessary, then, that the king speak of the place itself of the Roman City and take for the foundation of his reasoning that Antichrist will locate the seat of his empire in that city, so that he may thence collect that the Roman Pontiff is Antichrist, because the pontificate has its see in the same city. And in this way the conclusion, considered in itself, is indeed frivolous, because in the same city diverse princes, very different in empire, morals, and title and mode of ruling, can place the seat of their empire, at least at diverse times. Nor can it for that reason be thence inferred that one empire is the other. Otherwise it could in the same way be inferred that Constantine was a Turk, because he placed the seat of his empire in the same city of Constantinople wherein the Turk is afterwards sitting. Nay, it could also be inferred that Peter and his successors before Boniface were Antichrist, because they had their See in the same Roman City.

3. Now although this condition of having the seat of empire in the same city is not enough for showing that he who sits is the same, nor that he has properly the same seat, that is, by the same title of ruling or the same power and dominion; nevertheless, it is a necessary condition; and therefore the king along with his Protestants strives greatly to show that this condition of fixing the seat at Rome agrees with the true Antichrist, so that therefrom, with other things added, they may infer that he who now sits in that city is Antichrist. But since, from what has hitherto been said, it is clear that the other conditions predicted about the time of Antichrist do not agree with him who now sits there, and since it must be shown in what follows that also other qualities and properties revealed about the person of Antichrist are not found in the Pontiff, there would, even if we should grant that Rome will be the place of the seat of Antichrist, be nothing of relevance for concluding that Antichrist either has come or is the Pontiff. Yet nevertheless, because that principle too, namely that Antichrist will sit at Rome, is false, we will in this chapter, so as to make more evidently clear how vain is that fiction or imposture about the antichristian seat having been or needing to be placed at Rome, consider the proofs of the king, and we will show that his assertion is false and repugnant to his own principles and expositions of Revelation; but later we will throw in a few things about the future seat of Antichrist.

4. That the Roman City will be the place of the antichristian seat is proved by the king first from Paul 2 Thessalonians 2 who says about Antichrist, v.4: “so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.” “That is,” says the king, “in the bosom and precisely in the innermost parts of the Church.” And he adds: “Already in what place the Apostolic See is I leave to anyone to work out; but also who is sitting in it conducting himself as God, condoning sins, defining articles of faith, censor and judge of all men, himself to be judged by no one.” In which words this argument is virtually contained. Antichrist will sit in the Church, which is the temple of God; therefore his seat will be in the bosom and innermost parts of the Church, that is, in the chief and, so to say, the more intimate part of it; therefore it will be at Rome; therefore the Apostolic See, which is there, is the seat of Antichrist. He proves virtually this final inference, “since he who sits there shows himself that he is God.” Thus far the king.

5. In this argument, to begin with, we do not stop at the antecedent, insofar as it has been by us presented and virtually contains the exposition, that Paul understood the Church by the temple of God. For this sense does not contain error but rather is probable; for Jerome in his epist. 151 to Algas. q. 11, prefers that sense to others, and he is followed by Hugo Eterianus, bk. De Regres. Anim. ch. 23; and this sense is approved by Oecumenius on that place in such way that he excludes others when he says: "He does not mean the temple that was at Jerusalem, but the Church of God." Other Greeks indeed sometimes insinuate that Paul is not speaking only of the temple at Jerusalem but also of the churches of Christ, indicating that he does not exclude the first. For which opinion Chrysostom is cited on 2 Thessalonians 2 when he says: "He will command that he be placed in the temple of God, not at Jerusalem only, but also in the churches." For thus Musculus translates in the Venetian edition for the year 1549, but in the new Paris editions for the years 1581 and 1588, with Germanus Hervetus as translator, the word 'only' is not read, nor 'churches' in the plural but the singular, in this manner: "He will command to worship him as God, and he will sit in the temple of God, not the one in Jerusalem, but in the temple of the Church." Theophylact, however, seems to have read or expounded Chrysostom otherwise, when he says: "Not in the temple specifically, which is in Jerusalem, but in churches simply, and in every divine temple." In Theodoret too I do not find the exposition exclusive, according to the version of the same Germanus Hervetus in the Cologne edition for the year 1573, but its words are: "he called the temple of God the churches, wherein he will seize the first seat." In which words he rather seems to be tacitly excluding the temple at Jerusalem, although, by saying 'churches' absolutely, he includes them all, and consequently even those that were at Jerusalem.

6. Wherefore, by understanding the Church too by the temple of God, there are two or three expositions of that term. One, that by the Church is understood not a material place for the worship of God, but a formal Church, so to say, that is, the congregation of the faithful. And this is what Jerome indicates above when he says: "Or, as we think more truly, he will sit in the Church, showing himself that he is as it were Christ himself and the Son of God." And he signifies the same on Matthew 24 when expounding verse 15 "in the holy place, that is, in the Church." And certainly the words of Chrysostom, which I reported according to Hervetus, are not alien from this sense. And the same sense is put down as probable by Andreas on Revelation in his ch. 62. Another exposition is that the temple of God is taken for a material place of sacrifice and worship, which we call 'Church'. And this exposition can be sub-distinguished. Hence the second exposition will be that the temple of God be taken generally for the churches of Christ, and specifically for those alone, to the exclusion of the temple in Jerusalem. And this was expressly posited by Oecumenius; and Theodoret does not disagree with him, although he did not expressly posit the exclusion. The third exposition will be that by the temple of God is understood any divine temple, whether it be in the Church of Christ or in the Synagogue. And this is handed on by Theophylact and he is followed by Cajetan when he says that: "a determinate temple is not signified, but anything dedicated to God." Such that the temple of God is put to exclude only the temples of idols, as Augustine also wished in bk. 20 De Civitate Dei ch. 19.

7. But Augustine adds there a fourth more metaphorical exposition. For by the temple of God he understands Antichrist himself, and weighs the fact that the Greek does not have, "so that he sitteth in the temple of God," but "into the temple of God," that is, that he shows himself as the temple of God. Which can be understood either of the person himself of Antichrist, and thus it will have to be understood, not in that common way in which the just are called the temple of God, but in another singular way in which he wishes to be held for true God. Just as is said there to dwell in Christ the fullness of the godhead bodily, and thus the humanity of Christ, or Christ as man, can be called in a singular way the temple of God. Hence when Paul says 2 Thessalonians 2.4: “So that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God,” he does not, according to this exposition, put those two things there as diverse, but the latter part is an explication of the former; for Antichrist will show himself into the temple of God, preaching that he himself is the true God, and showing that he is to be as such adored. Or by Antichrist can be understood, not the person of Antichrist alone, but together with a mystical body gathered together from the corrupt men who will follow him; and thus is Antichrist said to sit in the temple of God, because he will show his congregation as the true Church of God, wherein he will himself sit as God. And this latter sense is the one that Augustine more follows.

8. If it please the King of England, then, that the temple of God in the place of Paul signifies the Church, we make no contention; but let him choose himself which of the said expositions he more approves; for it is not now important for us to decide between them, but what only is of concern to the issue is to show that none of them can be of service to the assertion, or rather the vain thinking, of the Protestants. For if the Church signified by the temple of God is the congregation of the faithful, although Antichrist will sit in this Church showing himself as God, it does not follow that he will place his seat in the Roman City. For the congregation of the faithful is diffused through the whole world, and of itself abstracts from material place; hence that he is in this way sitting in the Church as God is nothing else than to be held and reputed for God in the very Church of Christ and by those who will be his members. Which could be true whether it happen at Rome, or Constantinople, or Jerusalem, nay whether it come about in Europe or Asia. But it is necessary to note that the congregation, wherein Antichrist will be worshipped as God, is called the temple of the Church of God because, before it was perverted by Antichrist, it was the temple and Church of God; but, by taking Antichrist for God, it will, in that respect, be made to be the Synagogue of Satan, or antichristian. According to this opinion, then, nothing is collected about the Roman City, that it will be the seat of Antichrist. Nay, from the blasphemy is elsewhere overthrown of those who say that the Pontiff sitting there is Antichrist; for, as Jerome says, “Antichrist will sit in the Church showing himself that he is Christ and Son of God;” the Pontiff, however, does not so sit, but as minister of God and Vicar of Christ and servant of the servants of God. And this reason proceeds more or less in the same way of the fourth exposition, as will be readily clear to one who considers, for the exposition of Augustine also returns to it, that by the Church is designated a congregation of men, not a material place, and that the same is signified by the name ‘temple of God’.

9. But if it be pleasing to understand by the Church only the churches of Christians, there can, since Paul speaks indefinitely of the temple or Church of God, no more be an inference that Antichrist will sit in some temple in Rome than he will do so in one in Constantinople or in Jerusalem or some other like place. Nor is what the king adds of any importance, that Antichrist will sit “in the bosom and the innermost parts of the Church,” both because these words are not from Paul but he has himself added them from his own head, and they are therefore contemned with equal ease, and also because England was sufficiently in the bosom and innermost parts of the Church and yet, God permitting, it has become the seat of Antichrist; and Luther and Calvin poured out their venom in the middle precisely of the Church, and hence in its bosom and innermost parts, although they could not overturn Rome. The king will perhaps say that, although the temple of God was put indefinitely, it is taken by antonomasia for Rome, or for the Roman temple that is as it were the chief of all. He could also be helped by the words of Theodoret on 2 Thessalonians 2 who says: "He called the temple of God the churches wherein he will seize the first seat;" for we say that the first seat is Rome; therefore Antichrist will seize it. But that is also said willfully and without proof. And besides we will easily reply that Antichrist will not sit in the temple that is really chief, but in the one that he himself will wish and preach is chief; for it is more credible that it will be in Judea rather than in Italy. For since Antichrist will advertise himself for true Christ and Messiah, he will say that the head of his Church is Jerusalem, not Rome, as we will soon see. Now Theodoret by 'first seat' did not in fact understand Rome, nor any of the primary churches, but in each church or temple the primary place and seat due to God alone; or he spoke of the first seat, not the one that now is or that was in his own time, but that Antichrist will himself erect. And this discussion proceeds equally according to the third exposition which, under the name of 'temple', embraces both the Jewish temple and the churches of the Christians; for thus is the proposition of Paul more ample and indefinite, and therefore the determinate place of the Roman City can be therefrom less inferred.

10. From which also is concluded that in vain does the king propose to be worked out where the Apostolic See is; for although it is plain to all that it is at Rome, it does not follow that Antichrist will place his seat in that very place, even if he will sit in the bosom of the Church. Because the bosom of the Church is very ample and the good and bad exist in it, and one indeed sits legitimately, the other by ambition and tyranny is imagined the head of the Church. Besides the fact that (as I began to say above), although Antichrist were to expel the Pontiff from Rome and place his seat there, he would not sit in the same seat; nor thence could it be concluded that he who now legitimately sits so sits as Antichrist will sit. For he who sits now does not preach himself as Christ or Messiah, as Antichrist will preach. Wherefore what the king subjoins is vain, that the Pontiff conducts himself as God, 'by condoning sins, etc.' For it is one thing to bear the vicariate of God and, as his minister and in the way he himself instituted, to perform supernatural effects and to exercise divine jurisdiction; but it is another thing to behave oneself as God, to propose oneself as the God to be believed in and worshipped. For the former is done by the Pontiff legitimately, but the latter will be proper to Antichrist, as the Scriptures teach and the Fathers interpret, and as we will declare more extensively in the following chapters.

11. The second proof that Rome will be the seat of Antichrist is taken by the king from Revelation, and he supposes from ch.13 that the beast which John saw rising up and having seven heads and ten horns is Antichrist. But next he takes an argument from ch.17 where John narrates that he saw a harlot woman sitting on the same beast (as the king interprets); about which woman John thus concludes at the end of the chapter, v.18: "And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth." And about the same he had earlier said, v.5, that its name is "Babylon the great," and he calls it the same way in ch.18. Therefore says the king, "this place clearly and without any contradiction declares that Rome is or will be the seat of Antichrist.” He proves the inference: “First because no Papist is now denying that by the name of Babylon is Rome there very plainly understood. Next, that this woman,” he says, “is the Antichrist is proven from the time at which he will exercise his force and work, which will be for forty two months, as is contained in ch.13.”

12. But before I respond to this argument, I note that in these and other words of the king he is confounding the woman with the beast and conversely; for he says the woman is Rome and Babylon, and again he says it is Antichrist, and a little later he says it is clear that the beast of seven heads is Antichrist. And yet, on p.108, he says that the beast is the royal city. And likewise, on p.99, he confounds the woman with the beast, and says she signifies now the city, now its empire, now Antichrist. Which confusion both is repugnant to the common exposition and obfuscates the light of understanding; for if Rome is the woman and Babylon, how is it Antichrist? Or how will it sit on the beast which is said to be Antichrist? Next, in ch.13, it is not said that power was given to the woman for forty two months but to the beast; therefore it is not thence proven that the woman is Antichrist, but that the beast is. Nor ought they to be confounded; for the woman represents one thing, and the beast another, nor can the beast carry itself. Nor yet do we say this to avoid the objection, but to declare the true sense and to prepare the way for avoiding the calumnies that hide in that confusion and equivocation, as we will see below in chapter 20. But the objection can be formed in this way. The fornicating woman, which is named great Babylon, is Rome, and she is said to sit on the beast, that is, on Antichrist, as her prince and foundation; therefore Rome will be the seat of Antichrist. The proof of the consequence is that, although it would seem that the prince sits rather in the city where he has his seat than the city on him, yet the city itself too is said to sit on the shoulders of the prince, insofar as it is ruled and preserved by his power and virtue. Thus Rome is therefore seen to sit on the beast Antichrist; it will therefore be his seat.

13. About this objection many things could be said, were they not said above. We could, therefore, easily avoid the objection by saying that the fornicating woman seen by John in Revelation ch.17 signifies, not Rome, but the world, and that the beast on which she sits is not Antichrist but the devil. However, for responding to the king, it is not necessary to deny probable interpretations, much less the more received ones. We concede, then, that the woman signifies Rome, not however Christian Rome but pagan Rome, as I made clear in chapter 6. When therefore it is assumed that the beast on which the woman was sitting is Antichrist, we reply that this must either be denied or at least distinguished and understood in a sound way. For the beast is said to have seven heads, which are there expounded as being seven kings, none of whom is Antichrist, but another who is said to be eighth, although he be of the seven and is specifically called, v.11: “the beast that was, and is not,” as was touched on above. Therefore the beast having seven heads and ten horns is not, so to say, adequately Antichrist, but the succession of tyrants who in the Roman Empire persecute Christians, after whom Antichrist rose up as it were “among them another little horn,” as is said Daniel 7.8. From here, then, is not rightly inferred that Rome at some time sits on that true and proper Antichrist, but on the pagan Roman emperors, persecutors of the Church and antichrists in type and by figure or participation. Therefore of these emperors or antichrists the seat was indeed Rome, when it held empire over all the kings of the earth and was drunk with the blood of the martyrs, that is, when it was pagan and not Christian Rome.

14. Hence if ch.17 of Revelation is attentively considered, never is it therein signified that the fornicating woman was seen to be sitting on the beast insofar as the beast represents Antichrist proper, but only insofar as it represents his tyrant precursors and pagan Roman emperors. And that is why perhaps, when John says that he saw the woman sitting on the beast, he adds only, v.3, “having seven heads and ten horns;” because Antichrist is neither one of the seven heads nor of the ten horns. For John himself, after he had said, v.10, that of the seven kings five are fallen and one is and the other is not yet come but was to come and to rule for a short space, he subjoins, v.11: “And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and he goeth to perdition.” And afterwards he declares, v.12: “And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings...which receive power...with the beast,” unto whom, v.13, “they shall give their power and strength.” But next he subjoins about these, that, v.16: “they shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire,” that is, serving in this the beast, with whom, v.13, “they have one mind,” and to whom, “they shall give their power,” as had before been said.

15. Hence further I collect that, so far is John from saying that the whore sat upon that beast insofar as the beast foreshadows the true and proper Antichrist, that instead he signifies that by him or by the kings his ministers she is to be destroyed. Therefore, from that vision, not only is it not proved, nor can be collected, that Antichrist will fix the seat of his empire at Rome, but the contrary rather is not obscurely proved, since it is by Antichrist himself to be destroyed. Which is much confirmed in ch.18, especially against the King of England, who understands the words of that chapter, v.2: “Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen,” about the Roman City; and thus, from that sentence, the description there is of the perpetual desolation and abolition of the Roman City, whence is inferred, by a necessary consequence, that that destruction of Rome is to be done by Antichrist and the kings subject to him; first, from the words of the preceding chapter, which we have just reported; second from the following ch.19, because that fall of Babylon, which is described in ch.18, is not the consummation and burning of the whole world but, according to that interpretation, of a certain particular city; it will therefore be before the end of the world. And yet from ch.19 is collected that the Babylonian fall will be near the end of the world; for immediately after it Christ, vv.11-21, is shown descending on a white horse, and with a sharp two-edged sword proceeding from his mouth, accompanied by the armies of heaven, to destroy the beast with the kings and their armies, who are killed with the sword of him that sat upon the horse; therefore that the Babylonian destruction will be done by Antichrist and his army is, as a result, sufficiently understood. Therefore is thence evidently concluded that Rome will not be the seat of Antichrist.

16. Third, the same is concluded in this way, that if it is to be in that way destroyed at the end of the world, it will be done either by Antichrist or by some other; if by Antichrist, it will certainly not be his seat, for these two are repugnant to each other. Nor can it be imagined that he will first fix his seat therein if he is afterwards going to destroy it; both because this neither has foundation nor is likely, and also because the monarchy of Antichrist will not last so much time that it could suffice for that change of things, and because, in addition (as is collected from ch.17), he will from hatred of the whore destroy it, either by himself or through the kings his friends; therefore he will from the beginning wage enemy war against it; therefore it cannot be thought that Rome will first be the seat of Antichrist and must afterwards be destroyed by him. Nor can it either be said that it must be destroyed by another after Antichrist has fixed his seat in it, both because this is repugnant to the words cited from ch.17, where it is said that it is to be destroyed by the kings, friends of the beast, that is, of Antichrist, and of the executors of his counsels; and also because, from other places of Revelation, and from Daniel and Paul, it is clear that Antichrist is not to be overcome by any pure man, but is to be killed by Christ himself. Therefore, if Antichrist were once to place at Rome his seat, Rome would not need to be destroyed by any enemy of Antichrist, nor by Christ himself before the general conflagration of the world, because Christ, when he comes to kill Antichrist, will not destroy any city, nor is this read of him, but only that he will send Antichrist and his false prophet alive into hell, and will kill the rest of his associates with his own sword, Revelation ch.17.

17. The assertion, then, that Rome will be the seat of Antichrist is both not proved by the king and is contrary to his words and expositions and plainly false. Next, it is a very good conjecture that Antichrist will destroy the Roman Empire and will pursue it with great hatred, as is also collected from Revelation ch.17, and from 2 Thessalonians 2 and from all the Fathers; therefore it is not likely that he will place his seat at Rome, because he desires, along with his empire, to destroy even the Roman name.

Chapter 16: Where the seat of Antichrist will be.

Summary: 1. It is more certain that the seat of Antichrist will not be at Rome than elsewhere. 2. It is commonly believed that the seat of Antichrist will be at Jerusalem. 3. This opinion is favored by the testimony in 2 Thessalonians 2 of St. Paul. 4. It is however more probable that the Apostle is speaking of the temple in Jerusalem than of the Church. 5. Confirmation from Matthew. 6. In confirmation of the common opinion is added another testimony from Revelation. Enoch and Elijah are to be killed in Jerusalem. 7. King James contends that by the name of the great city Rome is signified. He confirms it with a threefold reason. 8. He contends also that it can be said Christ was killed at Rome. 9. Response to the first proof of the king. How the term 'spiritually' is to be understood in the testimony of John. It is applied to Sodom and Egypt. 10. The king's second proof is confronted. 11. Again, the third proof. 12. The blood of the martyrs who were killed by Roman authority or approval is said to be found in Rome. 13. Although Christ was killed by Roman authority, he is violently to the words of John said to have been killed at Rome. The blood of the martyrs who were not killed at Rome is at Rome. 14. Jerome is expounded. In Revelation the holy city is diverse from the great city. Jerome declared his mind elsewhere more clearly.

1. It is indeed far more certain that Rome will not be the seat of Antichrist than it is certain what the place or city will be wherein he will place his throne. Nor ought that to be surprising, because in all obscure things that are very far from human cognition, what they are not is more easily recognized than what they are. But it is also not so necessary for us to know where Antichrist will sit than to know that it will not be at Rome, because this latter point conduces much to confound heretics; but the former, although it be unknown or uncertain, is not of much importance. Yet nevertheless, so as, from this assertion, to confirm with greater authority in this chapter the denial demonstrated in the previous chapter, we will in a few remarks propose what seems on this point to be more likely.

2. Catholic doctors, then, judge it very likely that Jerusalem will be the royal seat of Antichrist, and that the temple in Jerusalem, restored by Antichrist, will be as it were the foundation and head of the false religion that Antichrist will try to introduce into the world. Which opinion descends without any doubt from ancient tradition. For Irenaeus bk.5 ch.25 openly says that Antichrist will reign in Jerusalem; Lactantius bk.7 chs.15 & 17 says that he will reign in the East, and in that part of Asia which is called Syria, that is, in Judea; Hippolytus in orat. De Consummat. Mundi says that he will sit in Jerusalem. The same is taught by Augustine; the same by Gregory of Tours bk.1 Histor. Francor. at the beginning: "Antichrist," he says, "will first introduce circumcision, asserting he is Christ, then in the temple in Jerusalem he will place his statue, etc." The same by Cyril Catech. 15, by Damascene bk.4 ch.27, by Sulpicius Severus Dialog. 2 on St. Martin, and all those who expound the Scriptures immediately to be dealt with. Now so great a consensus of Fathers could certainly not be founded in mere human suspicion or opinion, since it is about a future thing that is contingent and specially dependent on divine providence and permission; therefore one must believe it has flowed from a common understanding of the Scriptures; for there are in Scripture many testimonies that signify this point; however, because they are prophetic and obscure, the Fathers seem to have collected the true sense of them from some tradition.

3. Now there seem to be two chief testimonies whereby this truth is confirmed that we will now consider, and we will by the by touch on other testimonies and reasons or congruences. The first testimony is that of Paul which the king was using 2 Thessalonians 2.4: "so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God." For it is far more likely that Paul there is speaking of the temple in Jerusalem. For, first, thus do the ancient Fathers more frequently expound it. Irenaeus bk.5 ch.25 says: "He will transfer his kingdom to Jerusalem and will sit in the temple, seducing those who will worship him as if he were himself Christ." And ch.30 he says: "He will sit in the temple in Jerusalem." The same in Hippolytus in orat. De Consummat. Mundi, Ephrem orat. De Antichristo p.3 says: "He will honor the Jews above measure, and the people of the Jews will affect him very greatly with honor. Hence he himself too, as preferring them in honor, will designate for the advantage of all of them his place and temple, and his prudence in restoring it." The same in Cyril of Jerusalem Cateches. 15; and Damascene bk.4 ch.27, when expounding Paul, says: "Further, the temple of God he understands not to be ours but the Jews', for he will come not for us but for the Jews." Thus too is the place of Paul interpreted by Sedulius Hymo, St. Thomas, and commonly by others. And it can be thus made persuasive. For it is more likely that Paul is speaking of a material temple, which is a place of worship and sacrifice, than of the metaphorical temple of the Church or of the human spirit; both because that meaning for the word 'temple' is more proper and more in use, and could be more easily understood by the faithful whom Paul was then wanting to instruct; and also because he is without doubt alluding to the words of Christ in Matthew 24.15: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation...stand in the holy place." Where there is no doubt but that Christ is speaking of the material temple. Now at the time when Paul was writing only the temple in Jerusalem was through antonomasia called by the faithful the temple of God, because then either Christian temples had not yet begun, or they were not called by this word, as is clear from the ancient Fathers. Nor is the term 'temple of God' in its propriety and as it signifies a place of sacrifice found in any other meaning in Scripture and especially in the New Testament, therefore it is more likely that Paul used the term in the same signification.

4. This testimony is confirmed from another in Matthew 24 when Christ says: “When ye see the abomination of desolation...stand in the holy place;” for there ‘holy place’ was understood to be the temple in Jerusalem by all the witnesses who interpret the place of the statue or image of Caesar, as Chrysostom hom.76, Theophylact there, again Hilary can.25 on Matthew, when he says: “These things he spoke of the times of Antichrist.” And later: “and when he is received by the Jews he will stand in the place of sanctification, so that where God used to be invoked by the prayers of the saints, there he, received by the infidels, should be venerable with the honor of God.” Ambrose too bk.10 on ch.21 Luke, expounds it of “the inner temple of the Jews.” And the same sense is indicated there by Jerome when he said that the words of Christ can be understood either simply of Antichrist, or of the image of Caesar that Pilate placed in the temple, or of the statue of Hadrian that was placed in the holy of holies. Jerome, then, understood that holy place to be the temple and the holy of holies, and yet right there he says that Paul is in 2 Thessalonians 2 speaking of the same place. Now both are very well confirmed by Daniel 9.27: “and there shall be in the temple the abomination of desolation [alt: and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate];” for whatever is there signified by abomination of desolation, it cannot be doubted but that Daniel understood the temple in Jerusalem; for no other temple of the true God then existed, nor is there discussion of another in the Old Testament; but Christ the Lord alleges the place of Daniel; therefore he understood by the holy place the same temple; now Paul alludes to both; therefore he is speaking about the same temple that Daniel was, as Origen rightly noted bk.6 Contra Celsum, about the middle.

5. The second principle testimony is Revelation 11, where is said that the witnesses who will speak against Antichrist are to be killed, v.8, “in the great city...where our Lord was crucified,” that is, Jerusalem; now they will be killed by Antichrist, as is there said, v.7, and in the same place Antichrist must be killed; therefore it is far more likely that Antichrist will there chiefly reign. Thus Andreas on that place in his ch.30 says: “For in this great city he will, in imitation of David, set up (as is probable) the seat of his kingdom.” The same in ch.62, with greater doubt. More clearly does Aretas say, ch.30: “He will cast out their unburied bodies in the streets of Jerusalem, for therein will he reign as king of the Jews, whom he will seduce.” And in the same way is that place understood about the city of Jerusalem by the rest of the ancient and modern expositors on that place, and many other Fathers have taught that Elijah and Enoch are to be killed in Jerusalem by Antichrist, which they did not assume save from this place. Hence it is with sufficient probability collected that that city will be the royal city of Antichrist; for that is why rather in it than in other places will the witnesses of Christ continually preach, because it will be the head of superstition, just as formerly Peter and Paul studied to teach chiefly in the City of Rome, which was the head of the pagan empire; hence, just as they themselves were there crowned with martyrdom, so Enoch and Elijah too will be killed by Antichrist in his royal city of Jerusalem. For since he will be a Jew and is to be taken up and worshipped by the Jews as Messiah, as we will say a little later, it is per se likely that, after he has usurped monarchy in the East, he will place his throne in the royal city of Jerusalem, which he himself will restore. Therefore that city, restored and enlarged by Antichrist, is called there by John ‘the great city’, or certainly ‘great’, because in it great and marvelous things have happened; but because it will at that time be most corrupted in faith and morals, therefore is it called by John in the same place “spiritually Sodom and Egypt.”

6. Yet, indeed, the King of England, notwithstanding the evidence of the said words, contends that Rome is signified in those words by John. And first he notes that, when John said, v.8: “And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt,” the word ‘spiritually’ is attributed both to Jerusalem and to Sodom and Egypt, so that it may be believed the discussion is not about the material Jerusalem but the mystical, by which he understands Rome. Next he considers that John, after the aforesaid words, did not add simply “where their [alt. our] Lord was crucified,” but with interposition of the particle ‘also [et]’ “where also our Lord was crucified, etc.” and thus he expounds: “The seat of Antichrist will already be full of spiritual fornications and idolatries, just as formerly were Sodom and Egypt, nay with such cruel persecution of the saints that in it is Christ again crucified in his members,” according to the common rule that things done in the body and members may be attributed to the head. Third, he confirms this exposition from the words of John in Revelation ch.18 at the end, where of the mystical Babylon he says, v.24: “And in her was found the blood of the prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth.” For, under that distributive term ‘all’, he wishes Christ to be understood as well, because he was slain upon the earth. Hence he seems to collect that Christ too can be said to have been killed at Rome.

7. Finally also he adds that Christ can be said to have been killed at Rome because he was killed by the authority of the Roman Empire and as a criminal against the Roman Emperor, “such that he who tried to excuse him was held to be no friend of Caesar.” And this interpretation can be assisted by the fact that some Catholics do not understand those words in their proper sense. For Jerome epist.7 tries with many arguments to show that the discussion there is not about the city of Jerusalem proper. First, because at the beginning of the same ch.11 John calls Jerusalem ‘the holy city’ when he says, v.2: “and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months.” Next, because no special city but the world is wont in Sacred Scripture to be spiritually named Sodom and Egypt, thus he concludes that the city is the world. But Lyranus on that place understands by that great city the congregation of infidels; therefore, if it is licit to depart from the proper sense of the words, there will be no reason for the king’s interpretation not to seem probable.

8. We reply, to begin with, that the things the king notes are slight, whether for proving his exposition or for overturning the truth. For what he first notes, that the adverb ‘spiritually’ is attributed not only to Sodom and Egypt but also to Jerusalem, is manifestly false and contrary to the letter. Because, in the first place, the name Jerusalem is not put there so that it may be noted as taken spiritually, but it is by periphrasis described by other metaphorical names, whereby its vile and fetid properties are noted, and by the death of the Lord which happened therein, and thus it does not appear how that adverb ‘spiritually’ could be attributed there to Jerusalem. Next, it is made more manifest by noting the order of the words, which is thus: “And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified.” Where it is very clear that the word ‘spiritually’ is not conjoined with ‘great city’, nor is put for indicating that ‘city’ or ‘great’ is used not properly but metaphorically, but it is conjoined with the word ‘called’ and put for explaining how that city is called ‘Sodom and Egypt’, namely mystically and not properly; therefore it draws off, so to say, from their proper signification the words put in predicate position, not the subject itself to which those metaphorical predicates are attributed. Nor even can the term ‘spiritually’ be conjoined with the following words, “where also their Lord was crucified,” because that is now as it were a new proposition, indicating that the city is great for another condition or property of it that is very different, to which the word ‘spiritually’ is not there attributed, unless someone wants his own judgment to pervert the words. Therefore the word ‘spiritually’ is in no way attributed to Jerusalem, because neither under this term itself nor under periphrasis or description is it said thereof. And thus from the force of the context is it concluded that only the names Sodom and Egypt can, because of the term ‘spiritually’, be there understood metaphorically, and on this Jerome and Lyranus above mentioned, along with all expositors, agree.

9. Now in the things that the king notes in second place, the particle ‘also’, which the king weighs, is no obstacle to the truth; for the literal and true sense is that not only is that city spiritually Sodom and Egypt, but that also in it was committed that horrible crime of killing Christ. Hence we gladly accept what the king there admits, that the discussion there is about the city wherein the royal seat of Antichrist will be. Again we admit the thing he adds, that it will be full of darkness and fornications, whether spiritual or carnal, because of which it is called Sodom and Egypt. But the interpretation he subjoins, that Christ is said to have been crucified there not in himself but in his members, we altogether reject and condemn. For although that rule of interpreting the Scriptures about the Lord and his body is well worn, yet, as Augustine says when explaining it: “What becomes the body, what the head, needs certainly to be understood.” Because although the rule taken in itself and generally is true, one can in the bad use of it, done without discrimination and understanding, very gravely err. Which without doubt often happens to the king, not only on this point, but also in this whole discourse about Antichrist, nay also in other dogmas of the faith, and in the abuse of other rules of interpreting Scripture, as we have already several times noted above. And in the present case it is manifest, first because there is no necessity there for such rule or metaphor, and it is not to be applied or attached without foundation. Second, because the words do not help but rather are opposed, for when it is said, ‘their Lord’, the head is expressly distinguished from the members who were killed for him. Third, because the words, ‘where also their Lord,’ are put for designating the great city about which the discussion is, and for distinguishing it from the rest; but if the discussion is about the head in its members, the sign is useless because not only in Jerusalem, not only in Rome, but in the whole world, and in almost all its cities, Christ has been crucified in his members. Next, none of the expositors have so understood that place, nor any of the Fathers.

10. The confirmation that the king added in third place, from Revelation ch.18, did very much move Bede and others who said that Babylon in that chapter did not signify any special city but the whole world; which exposition was shown above to be very probable; however, once it is posited, the objection ceases. Yet, if we suppose that Babylon is Rome, the king’s argument is of little moment; for if from those words, ‘the blood of all, etc.’, he thinks to collect that Christ too was killed at Rome, and for that reason he expounds him as having been killed in his members, then Abel, and the martyrs of the Maccabees, again Stephen, Andrew, and all the apostles were killed at Rome, for they too were 'slain upon the earth'. But they were not killed at Rome in their persons proper, nor in their members, because Abel was not head of martyrs, or anyone like him, nor in them does the rule about head and body have place; in what way, then, were they all killed at Rome? What the king then replies about the others, we will reply about Christ; and much more easily and probably, because it is not necessary to understand that distributive term of all the saints killed from the beginning of the world, but of those who were killed by tyrants persecuting Christ's Church; and so it is not necessary to include Christ under them.

11. You will say that it seems at least necessary that all the martyrs of the New Testament are included. For this reason learned modern doctors respond that the sense is not that all the saints were killed at Rome, but it is said that therein was found the blood of all the martyrs, because they were killed by Roman power and authority, as many as were everywhere killed for Christ, especially up to the times of John. This exposition can also be sufficiently founded in the letter, for thus it has, v.24: "in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth." Where I weigh the phrase 'upon the earth', for in this latter place is not said 'in her', that is, in Babylon, but 'upon the earth', that is, everywhere in the world; therefore it does not say that all were killed at Rome but that the blood of all those everywhere killed is attributed to Rome. But someone will instance that even in this way not all martyrs were killed by the work of the Roman emperors or magistrates. For Stephen was killed by the Jews on popular impulse or on their own authority; many too were killed in Persia and in other places outside the Roman Empire. The response is, to begin with, that these were few and that no account is being taken of them, nor is it necessary that the universal terminology of Scripture should always be understood without any exceptions. Or it can also be said that the blood of all those killed for Christ is found at Rome, because Rome approved by its example the martyrdoms of them all, and provided all tyrants with example and minds to persecute Christians; and finally because either Rome cooperated in the deaths of them all, or consented in affection, and is thus made partaker in the killing of all.

12. And all these things fit best with the death of Christ, and thus are the things better accommodated that the king says in last place in his interpretation, that Christ is said to have been killed at Rome because he was killed by authority of the Roman emperor. For this is very violently accommodated to the words of John in ch.11. For he is not there dealing with the authority, but with the place "where their Lord was crucified," as the words themselves show, and the occasion for which they were added, namely to give a sign whereby it may be understood what city the discussion is about; for which end it serves little to know the authority or power whereby Christ was killed; for he could, even if he was killed by the authority of the emperor, be killed in the whole Roman world or any city of it. However, in ch.18 all the killed, under whom the king wishes Christ to be included, are not said to be killed at Babylon, but 'upon the earth', while the blood of them all is said to be at Babylon, or Rome, namely by participation, authority, cooperation, or consent, as has been said. Now in this way the blood of Christ too, not in his members only, but even in his own person, was found at Rome, either because of the reason of the king, because he was killed by Roman soldiers and a Roman magistrate, and as it were in defense of the authority of Caesar; or certainly because the Roman emperors, by persecuting and killing Christians, were professing very great hatred for Christ, and thus were being made partakers in his killing. The king, therefore, by his own interpretation solves precisely his own objection that he had put in the preceding confirmation; he does not, however, expound but corrupt the words of ch. 11 that we are treating of.

13. To Jerome we reply, to begin with, that he does not favor the king, because he interprets the place, not of Rome, but of the whole world. And nevertheless we say that even that interpretation we do not approve of, because it is foreign to the words and mind of the writer, as has been explained; and learned men judge that Jerome was not there speaking in his own person but in the name of Paula and Eustochius, and that he was putting forward the things that they thought contributed to the commendation of Jerusalem and the vindication of it from shame, not considering nor rigorously examining the truth of the things they were saying. Nor are the reasons of Jerome compelling, both because the same city in different respects or times is called holy and wicked, as is frequent in Scripture; and also because it is probable that ‘the holy city’, of which John is speaking at the beginning of that chapter is not same as the ‘great city’ of which he is speaking at the end, for the former is the Church of Christ while the latter is Jerusalem. Nor is it uncommon in Scripture to compare Jerusalem with Sodom, as the expositors there extensively show; and even had it not been done elsewhere, this would not prevent John, foreseeing the future state of Jerusalem in the time of Antichrist, from making that comparison and using that metaphor. For Rome too is not in ancient Scripture found called Babylon, and yet Peter and John imposed that name by metaphor. Next, the same Jerome on Daniel 11 at the end expressly teaches that Antichrist will place the throne of his kingdom in Jerusalem, and that there on Mt. Zion he is to be killed by Christ. And in this sense he extensively expounds that place of Daniel; which sense, as he himself says, “he has pursued prolixly, to show the slander of Porphyry and the difficulty of Scripture, the understanding of which without the grace of God and the doctrine of the forefathers the most ignorant claim even most of all for themselves. Which words I report for this reason, that I may in the same words excuse my own prolixity too in this book.

Chapter 17: From the description of the person of Antichrist that Paul delivers in 2 Thessalonians 2, it is shown that, rather than being the Pope, he will be the greatest adversary of the Pontiff.

Summary: 1. King James contends that the Supreme Pontiff is Antichrist. From the place of Paul above cited the fabrication of the king is plainly refuted. 2. Antichrist will be a man of sin, or covered over with all sins. Scriptures uses the genitive case in the place of adjectives for emphasis and antonomasia. 3. The notes of Antichrist do not in any way fit the Supreme Pontiffs. Boniface III is vindicated from calumny. 4. Phocas did not confer the primacy on the Roman See, but at most made the fact clear. 5. Henry VIII should really be called a man of sin. 6. The king suppresses some of the words of Paul in the text above adduced. Some assert that by the name of God Paul understands idols. 7. And that Paul himself even understands the true as well as false God. 8. The supreme pride of Antichrist is his wish to surpass God, not men. A temporal king who usurps spiritual primacy is more truly called Antichrist. 9. Antichrist will raise himself above God. 10. An argument ad hominem. The Pontiff does not make himself God but worships God. 11. He who justly guards his right does not properly extol himself. If Boniface III is to be called Antichrist, as the king contends, his predecessors too should be so called. 12. Protestants falsely accuse the Pontiffs of mocking Catholics with deceptive signs. No Roman Pontiff has used delusions to demand the empire of Antichrist. 13. Not Boniface III, not Deusdedit, nor other Pontiffs. 14. Protestants glory of the word of God. But vainly.

1. This is the third head of the disputation that the king proposed about Antichrist. Who immediately at the beginning of the same disputation introduces the description of the person of Antichrist delivered by Paul in 2 Thessalonians 2.4: “that man of sin, the son of perdition, who exalteth himself above all that is called God.” In which, omitting the first two parts, he considers only the third, and that one he adapts to the Pontiff, so as to convict him of antichristianism. And he in this way more or less concludes: the Pope extols himself above all that is called God; therefore he is Antichrist. The antecedent is clear, for about kings, or about priests, or both, God says, Psalms 82.6: “I have said, Ye are gods.” But the Pope extols himself above all kings and bishops, “for he raises himself above the power of both swords.” Therefore he extols himself above everything that is called God, and accordingly he is Antichrist. Nor has the king in that place in the words of Paul wished to consider another property whereby the person of Antichrist might be described or known; but, after a long digression about the seat and time of Antichrist, he returns, on p.102, to the description of that person, and tries to elicit it, not from the clearer places of Scripture, but from the most obscure visions of Revelation. But before, compelled by necessity, we digress with him to these more obscure and less useful things, we must stop at this place of Paul. Since it can therefrom be evidently agreed that the person of Antichrist is described in such wise that he must be conceived as not only distinct from the Roman Pontiff, but also altogether different and opposite to him in faith and morals, and finally as the supreme enemy and adversary of the Apostolic See.

2. And in the first place I consider the former words, which the king omits: “that man of sin, the son of perdition.” For by these words is that man described as most wicked, and that he will be the most ruined. Which a little later the same Apostle has more clearly explained, when he says, vv.8-10: “that Wicked...whose coming is after the working of Satan...with all deceivableness of unrighteousness.” Hence Chrysostom on that place in *homil.*3: “He calls him man of sin, because he will do sins innumerable.” And Theodore says: “He called him man of sin, seeing that he is by nature a man who has taken up into himself all the working of the devil. But he is the son of perdition so that he may himself perish and procure perdition for others.” Hence he says that in this he will emulate Christ, that just as Christ was the cause of salvation for all, so he himself will be the author of perdition for all. Theophylact: “he calls him the man of sin himself, as he that will carry out every kind of sin and will trip up others into sin.” Like things are contained there in Oecumenius; and with the same colors does Cyril depict Antichrist, *Catech.*15, when he says: “He will deceive the Jews and circle them round with every kind of inhumanity and with evils, so that he should excel in malice all who before him were wicked and impious.” And St. Ephrem in serm. ‘De Antichristo’: “The dragon will vomit out into him all his bitterness along with all his malice, and will deceitfully give him to drink a lethal virus hidden within himself.” And like things are contained in Damascene bk.4 ch.27 and in others who, in interpreting thus the words of Paul, write about Antichrist, whether expressly or tacitly. For the words of Paul, “that man of sin, the son of perdition,” are said by exaggeration and antonomasia. For the genitives there have the place of adjectives, and they are wont to have that great force when they are put absolutely, as the same Paul in Colossians 1 called Christ, v.13: “the Son of his dearness,” that is, most dear Son, on whom the Father has poured all the treasures of his love, as Augustine thought bk.15 De Trinit. ch.19 at the end. In this way, then, does Paul in this place call Antichrist man of sin, that is, supremely evil and most ruined, or as Cardinal Hugo expounded, “servant of sin,” or, as Cajetan says, “man having the fullness of all sins.” And hence too do the theologians, along with Gregory bk.15 Moralia ch.28, say that he is the head, under Satan, of all evils, because in him will be all the fullness of malice. And because, just as Christ is more holy than all the good, so Antichrist will be worse than all the bad, as St. Thomas along with the Gloss said on 2 Thessalonians 2.

3. Who, then, would be so bold and impudent as not to fear attributing this description to Boniface III or to the Pontiffs who were after him? For what evil did Boniface III do for which he will have deserved to be called ‘man of sin’ and ‘son of perdition’? Nothing assuredly of this sort do we read handed on to memory in the histories. For he lived a holy life and issued holy decrees and died a holy death, as is clear from Patina and others. And the Protestants only object to him that he repressed the ambition of the Patriarch of Constantinople in seeking the primacy of the Church, and constantly and faithfully defended the Roman See as mother and head of the churches. But this is worthy of the highest praise, for it was not usurped by him or newly invented, but conceded by God and accepted by the Fathers and his predecessors. For that all the earlier Pontiffs up to St. Gregory the Great did that was shown above.

4. They bring as instance that he usurped the name of Universal Bishop conceded to him by the emperor Phocas, as Anastasius reports. We reply, to begin with, that either they are treating of the name of Universal Bishop or of the thing signified by it, namely the primacy of the Church. The primacy indeed of the Roman Church over that of Constantinople and others could not have been conferred by Phocas; for it was before him always in the Roman Church, and the Patriarchs of Constantinople themselves long before and always acknowledged it, as was shown above. At most, therefore, could Phocas defend and make clear the primacy of the Roman Church against the insolence of Cyriac the modern archbishop of Constantinople. And that this alone he did is reported by Anastasius and Paul the Deacon, whose words Baronius recites for the year 606 n.2. But if they are treating of the name of Ecumenical or Universal Bishop and are placing in that this great sin, I do not, to begin with, find this term in the words of Anastasius or Paul, but the terms ‘primacy’, ‘first see’, and ‘head of churches’, which are very ancient. Next, even if it be true that John, the Archbishop of Constantinople, wanted to usurp the name of Universal Bishop, and that Cyriac labored with the same ambition, and that for this reason Boniface obtained from Phocas that he should restrain him, and that Phocas himself did so, and that he declared with an imperial edict that that name can be fitting only to the Roman Pontiff, nevertheless neither does Anastasius report nor can it be shown that Boniface or his successors accepted that title, explained and signified by that term. Next, let us concede, if it please, that Boniface did use that title and name; is this then a great sin such that for this reason Boniface deserves to be called a man of sin? Certainly if the thing itself and the dignity are true, as indeed they are, explaining it with this or that term does not make much difference, and perhaps wanting on that occasion to use the name to suppress and confound Cyriac could have seemed expedient. Otherwise, if Boniface sinned in accepting that title, the Synod of Chalcedon certainly was more gravely delinquent, because it offered that name to Leo the Great and his successors, as evidenced by Gregory bk.7 indict.1 epist.10.

5. But if Gregory and his predecessors, as the same says, refused to accept it, either because of humility, or because they did not judge it necessary for their times, or because they feared the term's ambiguity, thinking it could be supposed the name of Universal Bishop took every other bishopric out of the way, nevertheless Boniface already in his own time, after having sufficiently explained the term and the intention of Cyriac, Bishop of Constantinople, could, in order to resist him without prejudice to his own humility, accept the name for the guarding of that very dignity. Assuredly, it is a thing worthy of wonder that Henry, King of England, should have dared, for the excuse of his lust, to usurp the name of head of the Church, unheard of up to his times, and not be by King James reckoned a man of sin, but rather true head of the Church whose successor he himself is and whom he ought to imitate, and Boniface III, for a name received from his forefathers and for the defense of his dignity, he has dared to call Antichrist, that is, man of sin and son of perdition. I omit the fact that the rest of the Pontiffs, who were on the See after Boniface, neither ordinarily used that title nor deserved that unworthy name of man of sin. For although we do not deny that some were of corrupt morals, yet they were few, and among them none was held so wicked that he deserved to be called by antonomasia man of sin and son of perdition, and many, contrariwise, were very holy; among whom some were martyrs, many illustrious for their life and sanctity, and all the rest without any corruption or scandal preserved the Church in faith and justice. The description, then, of Antichrist insinuated in those words of Paul, will by no one who has but the judgment of reason be adapted to the Roman Pontiff.

6. I come to the other words that the king considers, although he does not completely report them, for they hold thus, v.4: "Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped." For the king omits the word 'opposeth', because it does not conform to his interpretation; for the Pontiff does not oppose Christian kings, or bishops, whom the king there wishes to be signified by the name of Gods, but professes himself the spiritual father and protector of them, and a most equitable guide. He also passes over those latter words 'or that is worshipped', because they utterly overthrow the sense he has thought out. But let us see first how the holy Fathers understood those words. For they have reckoned that Paul did not understand kings, judges, or princes of the world, or priests or prelates of the Church, but as the words indicate: "all that is called God." And the Fathers are specially wont to expound it of the idols and gods of the Gentiles, because Antichrist will throw them all out and raise himself above them all, that is, above all who are called God, though falsely. Thus Chrysostom says: "He will destroy the Gods of the Gentiles, and will command himself to be worshipped as God." Likewise Theodoret: "He will say that he himself is Christ and true God, and thus he will rise up against all that is called God." More or less the same is in Theophylact, Oecumenius, and Ambrose and other expositors. But Irenaeus, bk.3 ch.6, interprets the place of Paul about the gods of the Gentiles, "which are called gods, but are not," and over them Antichrist must he says be extolled, "not above the true God." Which one may doubt how one should understand. For the same Irenaeus, bk.5 ch.25, although he expounds the words in the same way, at the same time says of Antichrist: "Being an apostate and a brigand, he wants to be worshipped as if God." Hence he adjoins: "Putting away idols indeed so as to persuade that he himself is God, but extolling himself as one idol." Therefore Antichrist will in truth extol himself above the true God and above the false ones or idols. But Irenaeus thinks that by the words 'above all that is called God,'

Paul only understood false gods, but that he signified his exaltation above the true God in the other words, v.4: “so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.” Hence in ch.28 he says: “Sitting in the temple of God so that they who are seduced by him may worship him as Christ.”

7. It is, however, not foreign to the universality of the said words that they be understood to include both the true and false Gods, namely “above all that is called God,” whether truly or falsely called, and whether religiously or superstitiously worshipped. And thus Lyranus on that place and Rabanus in his tractate De Antichristo say: “Above all the gods of the Gentiles, and not only above them but also above all that is worshipped,” that is, above the Holy Trinity which alone is to be worshipped and adored. And same is clearly thought by Oecumenius on that place when he says: “He will oppose and be extolled in his pride not only against the God of all things but also against idols. For he will he not lead men to idolatry either, but to worship himself as God, therefore is it said that he will raise himself above all that is God or Divinity.” And on 1 John 4, treating of the same words, he adjoins: “By this which he adds, and above all divinity, he signifies Christianity too,” where there is to be sure the worship of the true God. In addition, Chrysostom on that place, when Paul says together, “opposeth and exalteth,” expounds it thus: “For he will not lead toward the cult of idols, but he will be a sort of adversary of God,” namely, of the true God; therefore he will also be above him extolled, for he will make himself “to be worshipped as God,” as the same Chrysostom subjoins in homil.40 on John when expounding the words, 5.43: “if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive,” he says: “Antichrist will say neither that he has been sent by the Father nor that he is come by his will, but he will tyrannically claim all power, will profess that he is the God of all things, as Paul says, above all that is called God or is worshipped.” But other Fathers speak now about idols and false gods, now simply about all cult of God. For thus Tertullian, bk. De Resurrect. Carnis ch.24 says: “He will oppose and be high exalted above all that is called God, or religion, such that he sit in the temple of God affirming that he himself is God.” The same is also contained in bk. De Anima ch.57; and in bk.5 Contra Marcion. ch.16 he says: “Above all that is called God and above all religion.” The like words can be seen in Hippolytus, Ephrem, and in others in my tractate De Antichristo; in Cyril Cateches. 15, Lactantius bk. 7 ch.17, Jerome in the said q.11 to Algas., and the same is the opinion of Augustine tract.29 on John. And it matters little that Paul said it in the former or the latter words, provided it is clear that, in the complete description of Antichrist which he there sets down, he spoke not only of gods metaphorical, so to say, or that are so by some participation, as are kings and prelates, nor only of the false gods of the Gentiles or idols, but also of the true God.

Very frigid, then, and empty is the exposition, or rather adaptation, of Protestants. First, because it is against the common sense of the Fathers. Second, because “all that is called God” includes more. Or if the phrase “that is called” has the emphasis “that is called, since it is not,” as Irenaeus indicated, it thus pertains, not to kings or prelates, but to idols; because kings and prelates are, in the way they are said to be gods, not falsely so called, because they are by the mouth of God himself so called according to a certain analogy or participation; or if one takes absolutely “all that is called God,” whether it is so or whether it is not, it includes everything called God. And further the name ‘God’ should most of all include what is more frequently and by all and by all the vulgar called God; now bishops or kings, although here or there in Scripture they are called gods, yet they are not vulgarly or commonly called so; but the idols of the Gentiles were then most of all signified by the name of gods, and in addition to them the true God was then, especially by Christians, most of all said to be God; therefore about these rather than about kings is Paul speaking.

8. Add too that the conjecture is not to be contemned that Paul did not wish there to point to and describe any elation whatever of spirit, but to a supremely corrupt and inordinate one in that man of sin, as the words themselves, and more so what he later adjoins, bear on their face. Therefore he is not speaking only of exaltation above other men in temporal or human powers. For in this way have there been many very proud emperors extolling themselves above all human power; and the King of England himself wishes to be thus extolled in his own kingdom, so that he alone be recognized as head in temporal and spiritual affairs; and in this way he raises himself above both swords, so that below God he refuses to recognize a superior, even in order to the salvation of the soul, but, wishing to be judge of all, he thinks that he can be judged by no one. With much greater reason, then, can a king of this sort be called Antichrist, at least in image or imitation. For Athanasius in epist. Ad Solitar. Vit. Agent. near the end, speaks thus of Constantius: "Grave are those things, and more than grave, yet of that sort are what are combined in him who bears the image of Antichrist. For who, when seeing him make himself prince of bishops in giving decrees, and preside in ecclesiastical courts, would not rightly say that he is that abomination of desolation which was foretold by Daniel?" These things Athanasius said of Constantius because he wished to usurp the courts of bishops in matters ecclesiastical, especially in causes of faith; what then would he have said of a secular prince who arrogates to himself spiritual primacy?

9. However, although this type of pride recalls the image of Antichrist, still it does not yet recall the truth; for Paul wished to indicate more about Antichrist, and so he did not conclude his description there but added, v.4: "so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." Which words has the king in that description without cause omitted, since they very much make clear the person of Antichrist and his pride; they also expound how is to be understood the former phrase: "exalteth himself above all that is called God;" not indeed by raising himself, within the order of ministers of God, above the power of both swords, but exalting himself above God himself and commanding that he be worshipped in the temple as God. And this is made more plain by what he next adjoins, v.9: "whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders." For all these things thereto tend, that he should make himself God, v.10, "with all deceivableness of unrighteousness."

10. From which too is clear that the argument of the king is evidently turned back against him. First ad hominem, because he himself says that the Roman Pontiff is an idolater in worshipping saints, divinities, and gods, and in thence subjecting himself to them and serving them; yet Antichrist will subject himself to no divinity, but will extol himself above all of that, and will not venerate either idols or images but will oppose them, as the Fathers collect from the words of Paul; therefore the king is not speaking consistently when he says that the Pope is Antichrist. Next, it is very evident that the Pope does not make himself God, nor command himself to be worshipped as God, nor is he an adversary of God or of Christ; for he procures the glory and worship of God as his minister; he is therefore not Antichrist, nor does he extol himself as Antichrist will. Again, Antichrist, as I was reporting from Chrysostom, will not say that he was sent by the Father or by God, but he will come in his own name, as Christ even indicated in John 5. But the Pontiff confesses that he has not only been sent by the Father but also that power has been committed to him by Christ, and that he is his servant, nay and servant of the servants of God; what conversation, then, is there of light with darkness, of Christ with Belial, of the Vicar of Christ with the adversary of Christ?

11. Hence I add that very unjustly is the phrase ‘extolling himself’ attributed to the Pontiff on the ground he guards his dignity over the power of both swords. For he who defends his right, and a right given to him by God for the good of the Church, does not ‘extol himself’ (which verb signifies excess and arrogance, and in this sense is it without doubt taken by Paul), but defends a divine institution and procures the universal good of the Church; but the Pontiff was in truth by Christ established over the power of both swords, as was shown above; therefore he does not extol himself when he vindicates that rank of honor for his own See. And indeed if by this title he deserve the name of Antichrist, antichristianism began, not with Boniface III, but with the beginning of the Church; for the Pontiffs always recognized and defended that rank of excellence in their See, as we showed above. Next, a no less efficacious argument is taken from the final words, wherewith Antichrist is described working signs and lying wonders, for the Roman See has not used these arts and wonders to guard its dignity. Nay, the King of England himself has said that he does not know by what arts it has ascended to that height of power; and no wonder if he does not know them, because there are none besides the sincerity of the word of God and the effectiveness of the promise of Christ establishing the Church upon its rock, and confirming it with true miracles, as we will touch upon in chapter 19.

12. But the king says that these wondrous signs and lies are the miracles that Catholics glory have been and are done in the Church, which he himself mocks, bringing in even an example about the miracle done in the Eucharist, wherewith Bellarmine elsewhere confirmed its truth. Which example is defended so learnedly and piously by the same Bellarmine in his response ch.9 that it seems nothing can be added to it. There only needs to be noted that these false wonders are sometimes attributed to Antichrist, as in this place of Paul, but are sometimes foretold about a certain false prophet of his, as in Revelation 13.12-13. And both places the king expounds about false miracles of the Church, yet he confounds Antichrist with his prophet, and the Roman Pontiff with the Church. But in order to uncover his error and the Protestants’ calumny, we must distinctly treat those two points and places. Here, then, the Apostle is speaking about the miracles of Antichrist himself. So in order for the king to prove to us that the Roman Pontificate has passed over into antichristianism, he must point to some Roman Pontiff who has used delusions and lying wonders for erecting the empire of Antichrist. But this he cannot show; therefore he must admit that the description of Antichrist given by Paul does not fit the Pontiff.

13. The minor we can prove from the histories beginning from Boniface III and running through the others, which would be prolix; therefore let it be enough to say in sum that Boniface did no signs whereby he obtained any dignity or power or empire, as is sufficiently evident from the histories and from what was said above. But about his successors, even the most holy, few true miracles are read of in the ecclesiastical histories, far from false ones being invented. For that Leo II, who occupied the See many years after Boniface III, was a holy man is handed on by Anastasius, Platina, and others; and the Roman Church in yearly cult venerates him among the saints. And yet no miracles or signs are read of him whereby he either usurped any power or obtained the name of sanctity. Now Martin I, who after Boniface III occupied the See before Leo II, did not only not use signs or portents to deceive the Church, but rather did he only with pontifical faith and spiritual power and constancy of mind resist the emperor Constans and Paul the bishop of Constantinople, when he said that: "Even if the whole world wishes to embrace dogmas foreign and alien to the faith, he himself could not either by anyone's threats or blandishments or by death itself be in any way wrenched away from the Apostolic and Evangelical doctrine." Therefore with this faith, not by false miracles, he commended the Apostolic See, and for that reason does he greatly praise the same faith in his letters. And because of the same faith God by a true miracle freed him from the hand of Spatharius trying, on the command of the consenting emperor and the exarch Olympius, to kill him, and afterwards honored him living and dead with true miracles. Thus too the Pontiff Deusdedit, older than Martin and younger than Boniface, is preached in the histories as holy and is venerated in yearly tradition, and he, without lying wonders, preserved his dignity by the true sanctity of life that is both related by the histories and venerated by the Church, and made manifest on one occasion by God with a simple and true miracle, cleansing a sick man of leprosy by a mere kiss. And like things are related of Gregories II, III, and VII, of Agatho, of Leo VIII, and of others in histories grave and deserving of trust, and to them are, along with sanctity of life, some miracles attributed without any fiction or suspicion or deceit.

The miracles, then, that were sometimes performed by the Roman Pontiffs after Boniface, are very far distant from Antichrist's signs; for these latter will be "with all deceivableness of unrighteousness," as Paul says, but the former are read to have always been done in defense of the faith and in honor of Christ. Next the king admits in another place that he does not know the arts by which that throne of the Rome See was carried up to so excelling a power; why then does he now make up that it was obtained by false signs and lying wonders?

Finally Paul adds another sign and as it were another small part of the description of Antichrist when he says, v.8: "whom the Lord Jesus shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." Which words Protestants, and the king following them, also traduce into metaphors, saying that the spirit of Christ's mouth is the word of God preached by Luther and his ministers, whereby God weakened the Papacy and little by little destroyed it. However, neither is that Paul's sense nor is what is said even true in that sense. For Paul understands by the spirit of Christ's mouth his efficacious command, and by the brightness of his coming his true descent and glorious appearing to kill Antichrist. For this is what the words in their propriety signify, and there is no reason for them to be twisted into metaphorical senses. And thus did the Fathers understand them. Chrysostom on that place in oratio 4 says: "By his sole command and presence, for it is enough for him to be present and all these things have perished." Theodoret: "When he appears from heaven, he will merely speak, and he will bring destruction altogether upon that accursed one." And he adjoins the place of Isaiah 11.4: "with the breath of his lips will he slay the wicked." Oecumenius: "The spirit of his mouth he calls his order and command." Ambrose on 1 Thessalonians 5: "Suddenly and unexpectedly Christ will appear, as the lightning appears, having with him the force of the armies of God the Father, to the perdition of Antichrist and his followers.” And he confirms it from Revelation 11. Jerome in the said q.11 to Algas. expounds: “by the spirit of his mouth,” that is, “by divine power, and by the command of his majesty, who commands and it is done.” And later: “As the darkness flees at the coming of the sun, so by the brightness of his coming the Lord will destroy and demolish him.” And Augustine bk.18 De Civitate Dei ch.53 says: “That very last persecution, which will be by Antichrist, Jesus will himself extinguish by his presence, just as it is written, etc.” and he introduces the words of Paul. According to this propriety, then, and true sense of the words, it is sufficiently clear that the description of Antichrist in this respect has not been fulfilled in the Roman Pontiffs.

14. But neither that which the Protestants boast of in their metaphor have they ever been able to point to. For they glory of the word of God, although however nothing do they less believe or hold in truth. For they keep the dead body of the word of God (as I was saying above) and endue it with their own spirit. And in this their spirit do they put their faith, and with it alone do they wage war against the Church of God and the Roman Pontiff, as we demonstrated evidently in book 1. Far be it, then, that with such word and spirit of their mouth they should be able to prevail against the rock on which God founded his Church, against which the gates of hell will not prevail. Nor on that account, because they have perverted many from the faith and obedience of the Roman Church, has the prediction of Paul been therefore through them fulfilled; for there have never been heretics who do not deceive many, and Arius perverted more than Luther, and not for that reason could he destroy the Vicar of Christ or the Church; that glorying then is empty, and the presumption vain. Whoever, then, has fully considered all the signs and colors wherewith Paul has described the coming Antichrist will understand with evidence that he is not only dissimilar to the Pontiff but will even fight diametrically opposite to him; for since he will be Christ’s enemy, he cannot not be the greatest adversary of Christ’s Vicar.

Chapter 18: The things that the king introduces from Revelation chs.6 & 9 are refuted. Summary: 1. Him who sits on the pale horse in Revelation ch.6 the king interprets to be Antichrist. 2. Response to the king’s conjectures. 3. The place of Revelation can also be accommodated to Antichrist. However it is in no way damaging to the Roman Pontiff. 4. In another place of Revelation ch.9 the king strives to show that the Pontiff is the star falling from heaven. 5. Many calumnies are objected falsely against the Pontiffs. Idolatry, cult of demons, homicide, sorcery, fornication, theft. 6. Other testimonies accumulated by the king against the Roman Pontiff. 7. The fancies of Protestants rest not on truth but on calumnies. 8. By the star falling from heaven in Revelation ch.9 some understand the good angel. That fall in location is not a moral fall. There is confirmation in Revelation ch.20 from something else similar. 9. Some say that the star is Lucifer. They interpret of the same the rest of that vision. 10. Some accommodate the falling star to evil men. 11. Others transfer the vision to some signal enemy of the Church. 12. None of the ancients understood Antichrist by this star. 13. The star falling from heaven cannot be said of Antichrist. 14. On the assumption Antichrist is the falling star, it does not square with any of the Pontiffs. Objection of the king. It is refuted. 15. The smoke ascending out of the mouth of the pit cannot be accommodated to Boniface. 16. After Boniface no crafty locusts, but many very holy men, flourished in the Church. 17. Protestants foolishly sound the trumpet against Catholics. 18. The disciples of Antichrist will not, as the king wishes, be idolaters. 19. St. John is speaking of the sins, not the disciples, of Antichrist. 20. Response to the first of the calumnies of Protestants. Defense of Gabriel Vasquez from the crime imputed to him. Response to the second and third calumnies. 21. To the fourth. 22. To the fifth. 23. To the sixth. In the lavishing of indulgences no improper gain is got. 24. Response to what the king asserts last against the Roman Pontiff. 25. Ch.9 of Revelation has regard more to the wicked than to the state of the Church. If indeed the talk in John is of Antichrist, it thence follows that he has not yet come.

1. The king presses on in his Preface, p.102, and, in order to prove his conjecture about the antichristianism of the Pontiffs, he introduces four visions from Revelation wherein he says Antichrist is depicted. The first is in ch.6, where John tells of the opening of six seals of the book, which in ch.5 he had seen closed, and after the first vision of a white horse, on which Christ was riding, and the second of the red horse, the persecution which Christians had suffered either from tyrants or from their relations and friends, and the third of the black horse, which signified famine and other plagues, or rather the darkness and the persecutions of heretics, he adjoins a fourth vision of a pale horse, which is described in these words, v.8: "Behold a pale horse, and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him. And power was given unto them [alt. him] over the four parts of the earth (or, as the king reads from the Greek, over the fourth part of the earth), to kill with sword and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth." This pale horse, then, or his rider, the king wants to be Antichrist; which he hence confirms that immediately connected to him is the opening of the fifth seal, wherein the holy martyrs cry and plead for judgment and vengeance to be hastened, which is at once, in the opening of the sixth seal, conceded to them. But what this whole explanation has to do with the cause the king does not make clear.

2. In brief, then, we reply that it is either false or very uncertain that by the pale horse Antichrist is signified; for if the expositors of Revelation are accurately gone through, there will be found almost as many expositions as heads. For some, applying those seals to various pagan Roman emperors and signal persecutors of the Church, accommodate the pale horse to Domitian, as Peter Aureolus, whom Viegas follows. Others, understanding persecutions of diverse orders to be there signified, attribute the pale horse to Trajan, because the insignia or pale color, of death and of hell, are easily applied to him; he also persecuted the Church more or less at the time when John, while seeing the vision, learnt that mystery from the fourth animal, as Ribera there pursues. But Andreas understands Diocletian or Maximian, in whose time persecution, together with pestilence and famine, afflicted the Church. Which Aretas also reports and seems to follow. Others, interpreting the rest in other ways, have judged that by the pale horse Mahomet was signified and his own and his successors' persecution of Christians, as Joachim and Pannonius. Others say false brethren are signified, hypocrites and false prophets persecuting the Church, as Anselm, Richard, Victorius, Cardinal Hugo. Victorius, however, by the red, black, and pale horses say that the wars, famine, and pestilence announced by Christ in the Gospel are signified. And the same pleased Tyconius homil.5, who adds that by the pale horse are understood "evil men, who do not cease stirring up persecutions." Ambrose again, or he who goes under his name, interprets the place far differently and very mystically, and there is in others an infinite variety. However I find no one who has specifically understood that fourth seal of Antichrist; although if we understand it generally of false prophets and hypocrites, it does rightly follow that Antichrist is by antonomasia included under it.

3. And this is probable; and that conjecture is at most able to show it, because in the opening of the fifth seal are presented the petitions of the holy martyrs imploring vengeance and judgment, and immediately in the sixth seal transition to judgment is made. Although it does not strictly show that either. For, in the same place, we read in the opening of the fifth seal that response is made to the saints, v.11: “that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellowservants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.” From which response we understand that the interruptions of the saints are presented as done before the end of persecutions, and especially before the persecution of Antichrist, to which can be referred that “little season” which the saints are bidden to wait for. There is, then, nothing to compel us to understand Antichrist by the pale horse. But let us freely grant it to the king. But what argument, I ask, can be taken up to found or give persuasion to his thinking about the Roman Pontiff? Assuredly none, for although the coming Antichrist is described there, no trace of that description is found in the Pontiff. For the pale color, according to the opinion of all, indicates the very great fear that tyrants, and especially Antichrist, will very much inspire in the minds of men and the faithful; but the Pontiff holds the men subject to him away from the terrors and threat of death, but governs them, in virtue of the spirit and word of God, with love rather than fear. Hence that which follows, “death and hell,” in no way fits with the Pontiff; because he does not profess to have received power “to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with the beasts of the earth,” for these things are done by tyrant emperors and apostate kings and rebels; but the Pontiff receives the power of the sword wherewith he disperses their darkness, and destroys vices and plants virtues. Therefore, the opening of that seal, in whatever way it be understood, pertains in no way to the point we are treating of.

4. The king brings forward the second vision from Revelation ch.9, in which the fifth angel sounded the trumpet. For in ch.8 John had said that when the Lamb opened the seventh seal, v.1, he saw seven angels standing before God, and that to them were given seven trumpets, v.2, and in that chapter he had described the sounding of the first four trumpets, but in ch.9 he begins by saying, vv.1-3: “And the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth; and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit, and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. And there came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth, and unto them was given power.” In which words, and in the whole sound of this trumpet, the king only considers two things. The first is that: “that star, which fell from heaven, signifies someone of outstanding dignity who fell from heaven; because although he should be the light of the world, as Christ commanded, he, deserting from his office, failed like Lucifer, raised up a kingdom for himself.” The second is that the locusts indicate a pestilential swarm of small animals, crafty and of monstrous savagery, which that star sent out into the earth. “And in this way,” says the king, “the seat of Antichrist began to be erected,” thinking that the star is Antichrist and that the man of outstanding dignity, who failed like Lucifer, was Boniface III, whom he makes to be the beginning of Antichrist. Now what those very savage small animals are he does not make clear; but he seems to understand either all the Pontiffs, or all the doctors and pastors, or perhaps the Jesuits, who study to extend the empire of the Pontiff.

5. But afterwards, the king passes over to the sounding of the sixth trumpet, wherein he only considers what is said at the end of the chapter, vv.20-21: "And the rest of the men which were not killed by these plagues yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood; which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk; neither repented they of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornications, nor of their thefts." All which things, in the fashion of Protestants, he interprets of Catholics or (as he wishes) of Papists. And first he attributes to them that they worship demons, from Vasquez bk.3 De Cult. et Adorat. disp.6 ch.3. Second, by idols etc. he understands images, "because it cannot be denied but that the head of the doctrine about the cult of them is the Romish Church." Third, by murders he expounds the slaughterings and massacres that the Roman Church carries out by persecuting heretics. Fourth, the sorceries he says are "the Agni Dei, blessed garments, relics, prayers, whereby men are thought to be preserved from various dangers." Fifth, the fornication he says is partly spiritual through idolatry, partly proper, because it is in the Church more frequent on account of the celibacy of priests and clerics in sacred orders, and because of "so many idle flocks of monks and people sanctimonial. For leisure is a great incentive for lust." Sixth, the thefts he attributes, lastly, to us both metaphorically and properly when he says: "But they become accomplices in theft most of all in that they steal from God the titles of honors and the fullness of power that is due to him alone, which they confer on Antichrist their head. Nor are they less involved in accumulating the riches of theft by jubilees, indulgences, relics, and other things of that sort, etc."

6. Third, so that he may show that in all these are described the times of Antichrist, the king passes to Revelation ch.10, where John sees an angel standing on the sea and the earth crying with a loud voice, vv.6-7: "that there should be time no longer; but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." Indeed he proceeds, as a result, to ch.11 when he says that the end of Antichrist is there described, and he expressly points to that fact that he is signified by the beast rising out of the bottomless pit, and that it is the same beast that is mentioned in chs.13 & 17, "because always he is said to rise from the bottomless pit." About which we do not much contend, as is clear from what was said above, and as I will again say below. But here the king seems to inculcate this point for this reason, to persuade that John in ch.9 is treating of Antichrist, after whose destruction the judgment will follow and time shall cease.

7. Thus more or less the king; in which, if we carefully consider the matter, the things which pertain to that interpretation, that we should understand Antichrist by the star or the beast, are indifferent and do not in anything regard the display or defense of the faith; but those things which contain calumnies, false witness, and (to say what they really are) blasphemies against the Roman Church possess no proof but only the Protestants' freedom and custom of cursing, by whom miserably deceived the king imitates their talk, and for that reason we could omit a response and despise all those things. But because we are debtors to the wise and the unwise, we will speak first about the literal exposition of Revelation ch.9, but afterwards we will refute the vain adaptings of the king and his false calumnies.

8. First, then, the star John saw that fell from heaven and that was given the key of the bottomless pit, has among Catholics two chief expositions, one interpreting the star in good part, one in bad part. So, first, some say that the star is not the bad angel, nor any corrupt person, but some holy angel to be sent by God near the end of the word to open up the bottomless pit, namely by allowing the princes of darkness to ascend thence so as to attack men, partly with the darkness of heresies and infidelities by blinding their minds, partly by afflicting the just with very grave evils and persecutions. Which exposition cannot easily be refuted. For when the star is said to have fallen from heaven, it does not signify a moral fall from justice to iniquity, as Lucifer is said to have fallen from heaven in Isaiah 14; but it signifies a very swift local descent, and so is declared by that word. And when afterwards it is said that the sun is darkened etc., it is not said that the star sent the darkness or worked the subsequent evils, but only that it opened, that is, gave license or took away impediments, and then there followed what is subjoined, v.2: “and there arose a smoke out of the pit,” and the rest that follows. This interpretation is also explained from another like one of Revelation ch.20, where John says, vv.1-3: “an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon...and Satan, and bound him...and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, etc.” For there is no doubt that he is a good angel; what wonder, then, that the same angel will also have been sent “to loose the devil a little season,” as is there subjoined? This opinion is surely very probable.

9. But the second exposition, which interprets the star in bad part, is no less probable, but it has several divisions. For the ancient expositors interpret the star as the devil, namely Lucifer, about whom in the person of the king of Babylon it is in Isaiah 14 said, v.12: “How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! How art thou cut down to the ground, etc.” up to v.15, “thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit.” Hence they weigh the fact that John did not say that he saw the star descending but that he saw it descended from heaven, because it did not then descend, but it descended before men were created or sinned. Or if perhaps John then saw as it were a descending star, he was indicating the bad angel which had already descended long before. Now to this star as thus expounded the key of the bottomless pit is said to have been given, because the power of hell as of a kingdom has been committed to him. Hence Christ our Lord too, in Matthew 12, attributed a kingdom to Satan when he said, v.26: “If Satan cast out Satan...how then shall his kingdom stand?” And in the same place, v.24, Beelzebub is said to be “the prince of devils.” Nor is it an obstacle that the key will serve to open up, as is there said; for the power of a kingdom, or city, or a house is extended also to this act. And according to this exposition can the rest be understood; for the smoke of the furnace is rightly understood to be the temptations of the devil, and the locusts his ministers, whether bad angels or ruined men, etc.

10. However, others by that star do not understand the bad angel, or some class of bad men, or some corrupt man. For Ambrose there says: “By the star are heresiarchs designated, because just as stars shine brightly in heaven, so they themselves do before they fall, and their doctrines and wisdom used to shine brightly in the Church.” And thus as a result he understands that the locusts are the ministers of heresiarchs, and in this way does he pursue the rest. But Anselm, although he understand the demon by the star, interprets by the locusts the heresiarchs themselves, ministers of the demon; because just as locusts jump and do not fly, but fall back at once to earth and bite and gnaw it, so heretics jump in pride, but since they cannot by knowledge fly to the heights, they fall back to earth and gnaw at the good. Hence, in conformity with this exposition, we can rightly understand by the star the signal heresiarch Luther, who although he seemed before to be, or ought to be, in his way a star, was permitted by the secret judgment of God to fall into the bottomless pit of errors and to pour out darkness from which shot up a huge multitude of locusts, ministers or rather even heresiarchs.

11. Others, finally, understand by the star not some heresiarch, but someone signal who, not only by pouring out darkness, but also by pursuing tyranny and power, will pursue after Christians. And thus Lyranus by the star understands the emperor Valens who, on the persuasion of his wife, fell from the height of the Catholic faith into the Arian heresy, and sent preachers to infect the Vandals and Goths with the same heresy. Which Vandals he says are by the locusts signified, who devastated Italy and other Catholic provinces. Which exposition was followed by Peter Aureolus on the same place, and by Antonius part.1 Histor. title 6, ch.1 §2, as to this second part; for by the falling star they interpret Genseric, or some other like king of the Vandals, rather than Valens. What wonder, then, if someone should say by a like analogy that Henry VIII, King of England, was that star falling from heaven, who not only fell from the heights of faith into the most ugly schism and heresy, but also was altered from an illustrious defender of the Roman Church, not only in arms but also in doctrine, into a most bitter enemy. Hence at once was the very dense smoke of corrupt doctrine spread through his whole realm, and obscured the light and understanding of the faith, and thence have corrupt ministers and very bitter persecutors of Catholics in a brief time been multiplied like locusts and scorpions.

12. These and the like things, indeed, can be easily by anyone thought out. However I do not for this reason propose them, that I judge they would all be fitting to Scripture, or probable; but so that the reader may understand that they are no more likely than the things that Protestants have convinced the King of England of; for only by willful accommodation, without foundation in the text of John, and without order and observance of the things that in the sounding of trumpets are put forward, have they been thought out. Hence, although there has been so much variety among ancient authors in expounding the stars, and although many of them say that there the precursors of Antichrist, the future calamities in the Church near the times of Antichrist, are designated, yet I find none of them who, before the King of England and his ministers, said that the star was Antichrist, or the locusts his proper ministers, but at most his precursors, as Anselm calls them and others of the authors mentioned.

13. And rightly indeed did none understand Antichrist by the falling star, because the beginnings of Antichrist will be very diverse from the things signified by the falling star. For in Revelation Antichrist is always introduced as a beast ascending from the bottomless pit, as the king himself a little later noted, but the star seemed to be falling as from heaven, which mode or arising is far different. Nor does it matter if someone say that the demon too is represented by the beast rising from the bottomless pit, and yet can be signified too by the falling star; for the demon was first a star and, by falling to earth, was changed into the dragon and the beast of the bottomless pit. However, Antichrist will not first be a star, nor will he be as an angel in heaven, or as a signal person having in this world or in the Church some high place of kingship or priesthood from which he will have fallen, but he will be (as Daniel 7.8, 11.21 depicts him): “little and despised, a vile person to whom they shall not give the honor of the kingdom;” for such will be the beginnings of Antichrist, as was touched on above, and as I will again say in what follows. Therefore the accommodation or representation of the star falling to earth does not square with him, to pass over other things that can thus scarce be coherently expounded; for in any interpretation they contain the greatest obscurity.

14. Lastly, let it be that the star is Antichrist and that by it is signified some man of outstanding dignity; assuredly, once this interpretation has been admitted, there cannot therefrom be proved that any of the Pontiffs, and significantly not Boniface III, was Antichrist. For none hitherto has so abandoned his dignity that he has deprived the Apostolic See of its majesty and excellence, but all very consistently guarded and defended it. But if some by tyranny, or by violent death, were deprived of it, there is no fall from, but a consummation of, dignity; nay, although someone had by guilt or heresy fallen from that dignity, there would be no judgment of antichristianism, because it would have been a personal fall, not one that adheres to the See, nor one that redounds to it or to its successors. However, even this fall has by the grace of God not been found in the Roman Pontiff, especially as he is Pontiff and is illumining the Church; for never have the Pontiffs taught or sown heresies, as was extensively shown above. But it is in particular not read of Boniface III in any history that he introduced corrupt doctrine into the Church, or did anything contrary to the words of Christ: “You are the light of the world.” With what face, then, or what appearance of truth is it said that he was “a star falling from heaven because, having been established in outstanding dignity to be the light of the world, he deserted his office”? The king tacitly replies that he deserted his office because he erected a kingdom for himself. But this has already been sufficiently refuted. And it is in this way again disproved; for he erected either a spiritual kingdom for himself or a temporal. Not the first, because he did not usurp the Pontificate but was legitimately elected to it; and, having been established in it, he arrogated to himself no spiritual power that had not been handed on and observed by his predecessors, as has above often been said and demonstrated, where enough was also said about the name of Universal Bishop. Nor either did Boniface erect any temporal kingdom for himself, because he waged no temporal war, nor was he by any historiographer accused of temporal tyranny. Which is a sufficient argument that he is very far distant from Antichrist, who will first wage temporal war and usurp empire, and afterwards persecute the saints.

15. And hence can easily be proved that the rest of what in that blowing of the trumpet is heard about “the smoke arising out of the pit, etc.” cannot be accommodated to the times of Boniface, because by that very thick smoke, darkening the sun and the air, all expositors understand heresies and corrupt doctrines; for nothing more apposite to that darkness and smoke can be signified, since it is certain that everything there is not properly but metaphorically taken. For although in the imaginary vision they are seen under visible form, yet they were not representing a corporeal smoke at some time rising to darken the sun, but some future tribulation in the Church, darkening the truth and light of the faith. But at the time of Boniface III no such doctrine went out from the Roman workshop, nor was there any innovation as regard the truth of the faith, nor can with any foundation any other such thing be designated, as we showed extensively in books 1 and 2; therefore this prophecy did not then begin to be fulfilled in the Roman See. Which argument can be made about the whole of the rest of the time up to our own age; because never has the smoke of infidelity risen from that See, as was proved in the same place.

16. Next, as to what the king on this point subjoins about the swarm of locusts, that is, “small animals, crafty and of monstrous savagery,” how it has followed on after Boniface he cannot show. For after Boniface there were in the Church very holy and very wise pastors and doctors, such as were, from the Greeks, Damascene, Maximus, Germanus of Constantinople, Theophylact, Photius, Euthymius, and others; while from the Latins Remigius, Bernard, St. Thomas, St. Bonaventure, Peter Damian, Laurentius Iustinianus, Hugo and Richard of St. Victor, and singularly from England Bede, Anselm, Lanfranc, and infinite others from all provinces of the Christian globe, adherents of the Roman See, lighting up its faith and doctrine, received from the ancients, and handing it on to posterity. Nor either in the ministers of that See was there done in the Church any savagery or persecution by scorpion torments. Therefore those locusts or savage little animals are very unsuitably accommodated to the doctors or ministers of the Roman Church, although those small animals may have represented heretics instead, or other precursors or ministers of Antichrist, as all the ancients and wise have understood. And although we grant they do signify the proper ministers of the true and singular Antichrist, it is thence rather proved that he is as far away as possible from Boniface and his successors.

17. But once an accommodation has been excluded of the words that sounded in the fifth trumpet, the other things are easily refuted that from the sounding of the sixth trumpet are seized upon by Protestants by mere calumny to disparage Catholics. But one must notice that there is described in that vision a huge disaster and future slaughter in the world in the very last times, whether under Antichrist or (which is more probable and more received) near his times under the kings who will destroy the Roman Empire before Antichrist comes. But three things must be distinguished in that vision, namely the huge multitude of fierce horses with their riders, a multitude of men killing and men themselves killed, who are said to be, v.18: “the third part of men,” and others, of whom it is said at the end, v.21: “neither repented they, etc.” Therefore the fierce horses without doubt represent either heretics and their ministers, as many wish, or the armies of tyrants, as others more likely think; and by these it is said a third part of men must be killed, namely of those “who have not the seal of God in their foreheads,” as is said at the beginning of the chapter, v.4, and is commonly expounded of the wicked and impious. Besides these were the rest of men who were not killed in the plagues, of whom it is said at the end of the chapter that they, v.20, “repented not of the works of their hands,” and these remaining men the King of England wants to be the disciples of Antichrist; for he says the doctrine of Antichrist is made clear in those words, and he then accommodates them all to the doctrine of the Roman Church.

18. But, to begin with, he is in conflict with other Scriptures wherein Antichrist is said to be going to destroy idols, Daniel 11.37: “nor shall he regard any god; for he shall magnify himself above all.” And Paul 2 Thessalonians 2.4: “who exalteth himself above all that is called God,” as we explained extensively above. Through the words, “And the rest of the men...repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood; which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk,” the disciples of Antichrist cannot be signified nor his doctrine, because he himself will teach rather that idols are not to be worshipped, and he will persecute those who cultivate them. And hence some collect that those plagues and slaughters will not be under Antichrist but precede him and, because idolatries will not by them be altogether ended, they are to be done away with by Antichrist. But others think that it does not matter that those fierce horses are the army of Antichrist himself, for although he will persecute idolaters, he will not be able to kill all of them in the world. Just as Mahomet also went after idolaters yet could not destroy them. Some, then, could be living even after the persecution of Antichrist, and about those that remained after the slaughterings of so many men and did not repent of their idolatries it is rightly said that they are to be condemned with Antichrist himself or with bad Christians. For in like manner Antichrist, although he will persecute Christians, will yet not be able to kill them all, nor pervert them, and still if any of the remaining were corrupt and did not repent of their fornications and murders etc., they too will be damned.

19. And in this way can the latter words of John be understood: “neither repented they of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornications, nor of their thefts.” For these vices do not indicate the doctrine of Antichrist but the corrupt morals of men. Which was noted there by Richard of St. Victor when he says: “To be noted is that when he says: ‘neither repented they of their murders, etc.’ he has rebuked their corrupt actions.” Now these vices are wont indeed to be found in many Catholics, but much more in heretics, among whom it is very well known that sorceries in particular are practiced; but their murders and very unjust slaughterings we both read of in the histories and holy Fathers in the case of the ancient heretics, Donatists, Arians, and behold with our eyes in the case of the modern ones, who have reached a point of fierceness that often they kill themselves so that they may at the same time thwart their enemies lest they fall into their hands. Next, there can under those words be included also other infidels who do not worship idols, as Pagans who are especially wont to be given to the vices of the flesh, signified by fornications; and Jews who are more frequently involved in usury and other unjust business. And next, under those four members are included all kinds of mortal sins, of which those who did not repent, although they have some knowledge of the true God, nay although they have the true faith, will be damned. Wherein are by those words also heretical Protestant reproached who promise sinners salvation without repentance.

20. It remains for us briefly to respond to the individual calumnies of Protestants that the king has imbibed. And, to begin with, as to the worship of the demon, it is very well known that in the Roman Church it is not only condemned but those guilty of that crime are very severely punished. Nor has any Catholic doctor called it into doubt. Now Gabriel Vazquez, a man of signal doctrine and piety, does not in this dissent from Catholic doctors, but treats de facto, not de iure, the question whether one who is mocked by a demon appearing to him under some appearance or figure of Christ, and who gives worship to the sign or light that appears, could through ignorance or good intent be excused from idolatry or superstition. He also says that he can in both ways be excused, because if the ignorance is invincible, as it can be, it excuses guilt. But if the intent of the worshipper is not directed to the sign that appears but only to Christ therein represented, or called to mind, he is also excused from guilt, because in both ways he is not worshiping the demon but Christ. Which doctrine evidently supposes that the worship of a demon is per se damnable. To the second, we concede that the Roman Church is the head of Catholic doctrine about the cult and worship of images; but how great the separation is between images and idols was sufficiently treated of in book 2. To the third about murders, we say that they are indeed sometimes committed by bad Christians and that they will be damned for them if they do not repent; but the penalties that are by public authority in the Catholic Church inflicted on heretics are not murders but punishments that are just.

21. In the fourth calumny two errors are included; one is to condemn the sacramentals of the Church as superstitious and sorceries, which is evidently false and blasphemous, since sorceries rest on the virtue of the demon, and sacramentals on the help of God, on prayer, and the intercession too of the saints, and the prayer of the Church, as we touched on in book 3 and have elsewhere more extensively treated of. The other error is tacitly to deny the veneration of relics and the divine miracles that are sometimes done through their means, to find fault, contrary to Scripture in Acts 19.12 with the handkerchiefs and aprons of St. Paul, and in 5.15 with the shadow of Peter, and 4 Kings [2 Kings] 13.21 with the relics of Elisha, and against all tradition and ecclesiastical history so constant that either to deny it or not put faith in it is very insolent. But what is there added about superstitious prayers, Pontiffs, and pontificalists, is no obstacle, because they themselves condemn that superstition, and punish it using those signs or writings or words, as I said when treating of superstition.

22. The fifth accusation stirs up ancient heresies; for it seems to condemn celibacy, virginity, and monasticism; which heresies certainly, if they belong to Christian doctrine, were the faith from the beginning of the Church of Antichrist, not of Christ. For Christ himself taught virginity and poverty, and Paul counseled it; and there were from the beginning in the Church flocks of monks and monasteries of holy virgins; but these things have been extensively treated of by us in other places. Now we briefly draw the attention of the reader to making a distinction between vicious and holy leisure; for the former is an incentive to lust and to greater vices, but the latter nourishes charity and is desired by it, as Augustine says bk.10 De Civitate Dei ch.19: "The love of truth seeks holy leisure." For this leisure, although it is often free of exterior works, is not however free of divine studies, meditations, and prayers, by the aid of which it happens that lust is dominated and is not victorious, although it sometimes pulsates. And for that reason did Paul say, 1 Corinthians 7.34: "The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit." And he later adds, v.35: "And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction." The state, then, of the continent is not only more perfect, but is more profitable for preserving continence if a man use it rightly; nor is it to be condemned because of the particular vices of persons, which are not lacking in other states, and are sometimes for the greater common good to be tolerated, and, as far as possible, corrected; which the Roman Church observes with holiness and prudence.

23. But what is said in the sixth member about murders is the false calumny of Protestants, and deserves no other response; and scarcely are they capable of that who have conceived hatred and indignation against indulgences, and have been so blinded thereby that they are not able to distinguish pious and voluntary alms from thefts. For in conceding indulgences, there is not only no unjust gain but not even unfitting gain, nor is there gain that results to the temporal advantage of the one conceding the indulgence, but it is a paternal providence for coming to the aid of the common necessities of some of the faithful through the pious works of others, inducing them to works of satisfaction for sins, among which are the alms where other indigent persons can be helped. But on this matter we have disputed more at length in the proper place.

24. To the things, finally, that the king introduces in third place from Revelation chs.10 & 11 to show that in ch.6 the discussion is about Antichrist, the response is, first, that from the words of ch.10, where, vv.5-6: “the angel...sware by him that liveth for ever and ever...that there should be time no longer,” is at most proved that the tribulations and divine punishments, which in ch.9 are predicted, pertain to the last times of the world; but hence it does not necessarily follow that among the plagues announced in the said ch.9 is contained the last persecution of Antichrist, for it is enough that it be very imminent. For because men in the first plagues have neither done penance nor wished to emend, God will finally permit the last plague, after which the world will end. Hence the threat, “that time should be no longer,” does not have to be understood as needing to be fulfilled immediately after the preceding plagues, but after the last one, that will already be at hand. Which is from the following words easily understood, for it is added, vv.6-7: “that there should be no more time; but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished.” But the seventh angel does not immediately begin to sound the trumpet, but there is first sent, in ch.11, the persecution of Antichrist, and the preaching of the witnesses against him, and at the end is added, v.14: “The second woe is past; and behold the third woe cometh quickly.” But the second woe had begun in the trumpet of the sixth angel, for the first woe had been completed in the fifth trumpet, as had been said in ch.9. Therefore the second woe, insofar as included in it is the persecution of Antichrist, was not complete, nor was wholly included, in the voices and predictions of the sixth trumpet, but will continue after all the things said in ch.10 and in the first part of ch.11 up to the said words: “The second woe is past; and behold the third woe cometh quickly,” namely the woe of the day of the Last Judgment. Hence is immediately subjoined, v.15: “And the seventh angel sounded, etc.”

25. Hence if one attentively considers the words and context of John, one will easily understand that the first plagues of ch.9 pertain to the whole world, and more to the impious and infidels and wicked than to the Church and the saints, as is indicated by the words of ch.9, v.4: “And it was commanded them that they should not hurt” and later “save only those men which have not the seal of God on their foreheads;” but the last persecution, which is announced in ch.11 and following, will be against the Church and against the saints, as is clear from the beginning of ch.11. Hence we can further distinguish two times of Antichrist, one in which he will conquer the monarchy, and this time can be included in the visions of ch.9. For without doubt he will bring calamities and plagues to the world by his wars and armies, wherewith he will trouble the whole world; and during that time he will not so show himself contrary to Christ as when after he has obtained the monarchy, nay he will proceed with falsehood and with pretence, as the most ancient saints also taught. But the other time is of persecution of the Church, and about this without doubt John begins to speak in ch.11. Finally, if we were to grant the king that all the predictions of the fifth and sixth trumpets pertain to the person of Antichrist, and that they will be at the end of the world, we would thence more evidently conclude that those plagues have not yet begun, and that Antichrist has not appeared, or begin to stir up his wars; or at least that he could not have begun a thousand years ago from the times of Boniface III, for the world would already have ended, as was demonstrated above.

Chapter 19: The same is shown from ch.13, and everything that the king there picks up is refuted.

Summary: 1. Outline of Revelation ch.13 as to the first part of it. 2. The four properties of the beast that John narrates he saw are shaped by the King of England to fit the Roman Pontiff. 3. Response to the first point. Antichrist will not only be full of corruptions but rather everywhere the fullest and most corrupt; and his empire will first and chiefly be temporal, then he will arrogate divinity to himself. The leopard comparison is because of speed. 4. Response to the second and third point. The properties of the leopard and the feet of the bear fit Antichrist, not the Roman Pontiffs. The cult shown to the Pontiff is veneration, not divine worship. 5. The king badly compares empires with pagan and Christian Rome. 6. Outline of the second part of ch.13 of Revelation. 7. The next beast that John narrates he saw signifies Antichrist and his emissaries. 8. John also speaks of some primary helper of Antichrist. By the second beast is signified the singular prophet of Antichrist, to whom is assigned a double note: hypocrisy and counterfeit power. 9. This false prophet will perform cures, so that Antichrist may be worshipped as God. He will work false wonders. He will in appearance bring fire down from heaven. He will give voice to the statue of Antichrist, and make it to be worshipped. 10. The mark of the beast will be a sign whereby the supporters of Antichrist will be openly acknowledged. The name of Antichrist will recall the number 666 according to the Greek letters. That name is still unknown. 11. The aforesaid exposition is strengthened by the consent of the Fathers. Edibles for sale will by the mark of Antichrist be polluted. 12. So that there may be no place for the cross, the mark of Antichrist will be imprinted by the false prophet on people's foreheads. 13. The metaphorical expositions of the king are by the letter proved to be wrong. He does not want antiquity and solidity to be attributed to the Roman Church. 14. The beast properly signifies an individual man. But mystically it refers to the apostate congregation of heretics. 15. The Roman Church does not have the horns of a lamb, that is, hypocrisy. Nor does it teach or has ever taught errors like the dragon. 16. The darts of the heretics are turned back against themselves. Henry VIII and his like are the true images of the beast. The Anglican Church is of the same form. 17. The signs that King James says are made for strengthening the authority of the Pontiffs. Signs always were and always will be in the Catholic Church. 18. Miracles were done formerly by many saints. 19. Miracles are not done primarily for the authority of the Pontiff, but for the glory of Christ and the confirmation of the faith. They indirectly establish pontifical authority. 20. Excommunications discharged by the Pontiffs King James makes up to be the fire from heaven. 21. The fire in John does not signify excommunication. Excommunication is not a new thunderbolt, but was wielded before the times of Boniface. 22. Instance. Solution. 23. When the Pontiff is venerated, the image of the beast is not worshipped. In John it is one thing to make an image, another to worship it. 24. The words of Revelation are weighed. Excommunication has the force of compulsion, not seduction. 25. The mark of the beast is fabricated by the king to be obedience to the Pontiff. It can be better said of the Anglican oath of fidelity. John is speaking of a permanent sign, not of mere profession. 26. No one without the mark of Antichrist will be admitted into human contracts. 27. King James' opinion about the number of the name of Antichrist. 29. The number is not of the time of the coming of Antichrist. The year in which Boniface assumed the See does not allow of that number. Evasion. It is a thing unaccustomed to count years from Pompey. A second evasion. It is parried. 30. Boniface vindicated from a usurper the name already given to the Pontiff Leo. 31. The king contends that the word 'Latin' contains the number of Antichrist. Heretics are on this interpretation antichrists, since they are also themselves Latins.

1. A third description, as it were, of Antichrist is collected by the king from Revelation ch.13, and he labors much and runs far to and fro to accommodate it to the Roman Pontiff; but in truth he labors in vain, and with the more license he speaks and accommodates the words of Scripture on behalf of his own decision and feeling, the more he shows the error wherein he dwells and involuntarily impugns it. But before we consider his discourse, we propose to put before our eyes the sum of that chapter according to the proper and more received literal sense. For it has two parts. In the first John narrates that he saw a beast rising out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and a blasphemous name upon its head. About which beast he says it is like a leopard, and has feet as a bear's and a mouth as a lion's mouth; and the dragon gave it all its virtue, and one of its heads was cut through to death, and the mortal blow was cured; and the whole earth in wonder worshipped the beast. And later John describes the power given to this beast for speaking great things and blasphemies, and for persecuting the saints for forty two months. And these more or less are the things that are in the first vision and part of that chapter contained.

Now about this first beast, what it is or represents, and in what sense are to be taken the things said about the mortal wound given to it and cured, and about the time of its persecution, we spoke in chapter 6, where we impugned the king's metaphors; and therefrom we proved that the vision cannot be accommodated to the Pontiff, nay that therefrom the beast had not yet appeared. Yet, nevertheless, it is necessary in this place to refute some things that are insultingly accommodated by mere abuse to the Pontiff, and that only Protestant and adulterators of Scripture have put in the mouth of the king.

2. Poking the Roman Pontiff, then, he says that the beast appeared like a leopard, "both on account of the color, because it is sprinkled with spots, that is, infected with corruptions, and because it has a certain adulterated reason for ruling, in appearance spiritual, in fact secular, since it is exalted above the kings of the earth." Second, he says that it appeared like a lion-leopard, "which is a spurious beast, a mix of lion and leopard." Third, he says that it was seen "with the feet of a bear to signify its strength, but with the mouth of a lion to make clear its rapacity and savage nature." Fourth, he expounds that it opened its mouth in blasphemies against God and waged war on the saints, because, he says, "all the earth must worship it, which was never demanded of anyone by the old pagan Rome, which did not disdain to call the kings joined in compact with it courteously allies and friends." Now, he proves that this worship is given to the Pontiff from the manner of inaugurating a Pontiff, and he calls as witness Cardinal Bellarmine himself.

3. However, on the first point, the interpretation itself or the analogy, it is, when compared with the truth and the letter, not apt or sufficient, because Antichrist will not be "infected with corruptions," but will be everywhere most corrupt, nor will he usurp temporal rule under the appearance or shadow of spiritual power, but will first and chiefly seize temporal power and will usurp it with violence, and then he will also arrogate divinity to himself, as is understood partly from Daniel and clearly from Paul, as was touched on in the previous chapter and as will again be said in the following. Hence Richard of St. Victor bk.4 on Revelation ch.4, understanding far otherwise by the beast the pagan empire of the Gentiles persecuting the Church, says that “the comparison with the spotted leopard is because of the diverse assertion of philosophers,” that is, because of their diverse superstition. But Ambrose there says that “the hypocrisy of Antichrist” is designated in the reality of the colors, “for since he will be a most wicked man, he will decorate himself in diverse virtues so that he may more easily deceive any foolish men.” Bede, however, and Primasius, along with Tyconius homil. 11, say that in the spots of the leopard is represented “the diversity of Gentiles who follow Antichrist,” either because it will be a multitude gathered from diverse peoples, or because it will be spotted with diverse heresies, as St. Anselm says. Hence if the spots of the leopard represent vices, they designate, not any defects whatever, but the universal vices that will exist in Antichrist. Add that Antichrist is compared because of his speed with the leopard, because he will in a very short time obtain empire and trample everything under foot. Just as in Daniel 7 Alexander the Great is for this cause represented by the leopard, as St. Jerome and others expound. Again, because of his cruelty in shedding human blood. No one, however, unless he be very impudent, will dare to fabricate the like properties in the Roman Pontiff. Nay, neither the King of England, nor all the wiles of heretics could have pointed out the corruptions that they fashion in the Apostolic See; for the things that pertain to doctrine are not corruptions, although they are judged such by men corrupted by conflicting errors and heresies; but as to what has regard to morals, they are for the greatest part fashioned and exaggerated by the same enemies of the Church; and if any corruptions of this sort have sometimes been found in prelates of the Church, they pertain to personal and human defects, which do not stain the See itself.

4. Hence, the things the king said in the second and third point about the likeness of the lion-leopard and the bear’s feet, we do not take seriously; for they agree aptly with the true Antichrist. Now from the same properties and their signification it is proved that the description cannot be accommodated to the Pontiff; for why might Boniface III or some other Pontiff his successor be called spurious, since he was so neither in his origin nor in his election, but was legitimately created Pope? Or what rapacity or savage nature has been found in them, that they should be said to have bear’s feet? For Antichrist is said to be going to have bear’s feet, because “it stamped the residue with the feet of it,” as is said in Daniel 7.7. But what the king adds in the fourth place about the worship of the Pontiff is ridiculous; for he is not worshipped as God but as Supreme Prelate of the Church and Vicar of God. For what is it to show worship? For Paul says, 1 Timothy 5.17: “Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor.” Why then is it a wonder that he who presides over the whole Church should be held worthy of great veneration, especially since all that veneration redounds to the honor of Christ?

5. Wrongly, then, does the king compare pagan Rome with Christian, for the empire of the former is as far from that of the latter as the earthly is different from the celestial, the corporal from the spiritual, and the temporal from the eternal, as was abundantly shown in book 3. The Roman emperors, then, were only temporal lords, and possessed a limited domain, and for that reason they treated the kings of other domains not as subjects but courteously as allies; but the Roman Pontiffs are spiritual Prelates and Kings, and have the whole world for their territory, and all the sheep of Christ for their flock, and therefore can all Christian kings be called their subjects; and yet they do not disdain to call them (unless they be heretics or schismatics), not merely courteously, but also very humanely as sons, and also sometimes as lords. Nay, sometimes they have done it with so much submission of mind that the king and Protestants abuse their words so as to subject them to the emperors, as we noted in book 3 about Pope Gregory. And these things are enough about the first beast.

6. In the second part of the same ch.13 John narrates, v.11, that he saw “another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon,” about which he says much. First that he makes all the habitants in the earth to worship the first beast. Second, that was given to him to do “great wonders,” and in particular “so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men.” Third, that by these signs “he deceiveth them that dwell on the earth...that they should make an image” of the first beast. Fourth, that was given to him “to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.” Fifth, that “he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark (of the beast) in their right hand, or in their foreheads; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark of the name of the beast, or the number of his name.” Sixth is added the mystery of the number of his name in these words: “for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred three score and six.” All which things are so obscure that they might scarcely be guessed at by human ingenuity, much less comprehended. And, as Cardinal Bellarmine rightly noted, an evident sign that they have not been fulfilled is that today they are as obscure and enigmatic as when they were first written; now prophecies that are made in enigmas, although they are obscure beforehand, are, at least when they are fulfilled, understood and made clear, otherwise they would be useless; since therefore these are as obscure as they were before, it is sign that they have not been fulfilled. And yet the King of England in his own manner makes many accommodations such as he thinks are adapted to his opinion or to disparaging the Roman See. But before we reply to him, we will put forward the proper and literal sense of this vision, so that by comparison with it the error of his invented interpretation may more evidently appear.

7. This latter beast, then, either represents the false prophets and preachers generally of Antichrist, whom he himself will send to give persuasion of his divinity and to persecute the saints, as is there expounded by Primas, Bede, Anselm, and others, and as Gregory thinks bk.13 Moralia ch.26, otherwise ch.36; or it at least signifies someone among them who is extraordinary and an excellent magician, and potent also in his strength and his army, who through seduction by signs and compulsion by force will turn men to worship Antichrist. Thus Irenaeus bk.5 ch.28, after he has related the first vision of this chapter, subjoins about this latter: “Then afterwards, and about his armor bearer, whom he calls also the false prophet, he spoke, John said, as a dragon and worked all the power of the first beast for him and in his sight.” The same opinion is approved by Andreas Caesar, alleging in his ch.37 also Irenaeus. But Aretas also in his ch.37, although at the beginning he seem to understand Antichrist also through this latter beast, afterwards when he makes the thing clearer he calls him “the precursor of Antichrist,” and distinguishes between them, comparing them with John the Baptist and Christ. Victorinus too understands in the singular the false prophet who will do wonders and lying signs before Antichrist. And this opinion is now more frequently followed by the learned writers he refers to, and he is followed by Malvenda bk.8 De Antichristo ch.19. But Ambrose on Revelation says under disjunction that this beast is either the many preachers of Antichrist or one worse than the rest.

8. But although it is true that under the prophet called false by antonomasia others are sketched, nevertheless it cannot be denied but that John is speaking about some individual man, a signal supporter of Antichrist, and a deceiver of men, both because the context itself, soundly looked at, sufficiently indicates it, and also because ch. 19 the same John clearly points it out when he says, v. 20: "And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone." Where he is evidently describing the same false prophet whom he had seen under the name of a beast rise up from the earth, and he is speaking about him as an individual man equally with Antichrist; and he numbers them as two men damned in a special way, and distinguishes them from the rest of the followers of Antichrist when he subjoins, v. 21: "And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword, etc." There is no doubt, then, but that by that second beast a particular man and extraordinary preacher of Antichrist is signified, whose two chief properties are designated by the two conditions of the beast. For he is said to have horns as of a lamb because of hypocrisy; for he will show himself as mild and will be a most cruel persecutor, or he will show himself as preaching the true Christ but he will speak as a dragon, because he will preach Antichrist, moved and driven by the dragon which "gave to the first beast all his virtue and power." And thus are those two metaphorical properties expounded by Irenaeus, Andreas, Aretas, and others mentioned above, and Ticonius, otherwise Augustine homil. 11 on Revelation, although he accommodates them to all heretics. And of the same opinion is Gregory in the place cited above, when attributing the same properties, as if by participation, to all the false preachers of Antichrist.

9. The rest, indeed, of what John predicts about this false prophet, although the Fathers and Catholic expositors admit it to be obscure and difficult of understanding, yet all who examine the literal sense of it study to preserve therein, as far as possible, the propriety of the words. Therefore, when he says that that beast will make all those who dwell in the earth to worship the first beast, they understand it of divine and true worship [latría], for Antichrist himself desires to be worshipped with this worship, as was shown in chapter 17 from Scripture and the Fathers. Again, when he says that he will do signs, they expound the words of fictive sensible miracles and of lying wonders, according to Christ's words in Matthew 24.24: "For there shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders." For just as these words with respect to false prophets will be fulfilled by antonomasia in Antichrist, so John thinks they must be fulfilled, with respect to false prophets, by this precursor of Antichrist; but that Christ is speaking of external signs appearing to and deceiving the senses no one has ever doubted. Hence when John further says that the second beast will make, v. 13, "fire come down from heaven," they all understand it also of true descent in place, and of true fire, or at any rate of a sensible body having the appearance as of fire. Because this is also consequent to the first interpretation of the signs generally, and is in conformity with the propriety of the words, and there is no necessity to make up other metaphors, especially since John says that the fire will descend "in the sight of men." Likewise, what John adds in the third place about the image of the first beast is understood of his proper sensible image or of a statue of Antichrist, which they will make who believe in him and will place in temples and perhaps in the temple in Jerusalem, so that it and Antichrist as true

God therein may be worshipped. And with the same propriety is it understood that this false prophet will give life to the image so that it speak; for by pact with the demon can this very easily be done, just as in the histories it is very well known that unclean spirits were wont to speak in the sculptures and idols of the Gentiles.

10. Now about the mark of Antichrist and of its being imprinted on the hands and forehead, all agree also in this, that it will be in men a sensible sign accommodated to external profession of his religion, and perhaps as a striking sign of apostasy or departure from the Christian religion into the gathering of the antichristian sect; although no one can divine in particular of what sort that mark will be. For the former is required by the truth and propriety of the words of John, but this latter is not explained by them, nor has it been revealed in other places of Scripture, nor can it be investigated by reason. Finally, about the name of the beast too all teach that it will be of such sort that it is clear from the letters that, when reduced to an account of numbers according to the manner of the Greek language, it contains the number 666. But because Greek letters can be composed in a variety of ways so as to give that number, the said expositors add that it cannot be known of what sort Antichrist's name will be until he appear, and then the sense and truth of the prophecy may be known from the fact. For although it now happen that someone's name consists of letters that, according to the Greek tongue, give that number, as some have tried to show about the name of Mahomet or of Luther, it is not a sufficient sign, if other things are lacking, of Antichrist, because it is very ambiguous and equivocal and so must be joined together with the other things.

11. Now this brief paraphrase or literal exposition of the words of John I take from the authors just mentioned. For Irenaeus in the said ch.28 says of this false prophet that he will perform signs "with the working of magic." And in the same place he adjoins the rest of the words of John, and understands them simply and properly without any interpretation. But in ch.30 he teaches extensively what we have just said about the number of the name. Victorinus too on Revelation says on the sign of fire: "These things magicians do also today through renegade angels." And he adds: "He will also cause a golden image to be set up to Antichrist in the temple in Jerusalem, and the renegade angel will enter into it and will give out therefrom voices and oracles." And about the name and the sign of the mark he thinks in the same way. Almost the same is contained in Aretas in his ch.27 where he plainly says of the fire that it will so come down that it is seen "by bewitchment of the eyes of those who look upon it," and of the mark he says that it will be "the carving of a pernicious name," and that it must be given "as a sign whereby men may or may not do business," supposing it to be a sensible sign. And Andreas ch.27 says: "Whatever the precursor of the false Christ will do to deceive men, all this he will do through tricks and incantations, so that Antichrist may have testimony from a man who has accomplished such great miracles." And later: "It is not wonderful or new if in the eyes of men an impostor should cause fire to come down from heaven." And he adduces the example of fire set alight by virtue of the devil or fallen down from above to consume Job's herds, Job 1.16. But afterwards he interprets the other words about the image proper and its speaking, and he confirms it with examples of similar illusions of demons. Again he speaks of the mark as of a sensible sign, and he understands that it will have to be imprinted properly on men as a necessary sign for buying and selling necessary things, "so that," he says, "at least on account of want of things necessary for life, he may force to a violent death" those, that is, who have refused the mark.

12. And also, finally, in ch.38 he treats of what we said about the name of Antichrist, and he confirms it with the authority of Hippolytus. “He will bestow a mark on the right hand and the forehead, lest anyone with his right hand draw the precious cross on his forehead.” Now later he thinks that the mark will be the name of Antichrist himself sensibly imprinted with a seal on the forehead and hand. But about the name he denies that of what kind it will be can be known. Ephrem speaks likewise of the mark of Antichrist in his tractate De Antichristo at measure or §2: “On a man’s right hand or the forehead will be impressed this his impious mark, so that a man may have no ability to sign himself with the sign of Christ.” And in the following measure he likewise expounds the signs or false wonders of external sensible illusions. And finally in the last measure he repeats the same about the mark, thinking that it will be a sensible sign “which the adversaries of Christ will assume in place of the cross of the Savior.” But he speaks indistinctly about them, as to whether they are to be done by Antichrist or his false prophet, and he seems to attribute them all to Antichrist. Next, Primasius, Bede, Rupert, and others on Revelation, nay all the moderns too, agree on the things we have said, although in expounding the mark and name of Antichrist they deliver opinions various and differing among themselves; which variety is no obstacle to our intention and therefore there is no need to report or consider it, and one writer can be looked at for all of them, Malvenda bk.8 De Antichristo chs.18 & 19.

13. It remains for us to compare to this simple sense of Scripture the king’s mystical and metaphorical expositions, or his accommodations for ill-speaking. For he understands by this second beast the Apostolic Church obedient to the Roman Pontiff, which he, in the manner of the impious Protestants, calls Apostate. And yet he subjoins about it: “Whose origin is more firm and more stable, so that it be what may visibly succeed to the true Church.” In which words, compelled by the truth of the matter, or not noticing what he was saying, he professes the Roman Church to be true and Catholic. For that is the true Church which visibly succeeds to the more ancient true Church, as was shown in book 1. Hence the comparison whereby this Church is said to be “more firm and more stable,” if it be made in contrast to the synagogues of Satan and the congregations of Protestants and apostates, is made rightly and very truly; but if it be made in contrast to the Apostolic See, it is not rightly made by saying ‘more’, but should be made by saying ‘equally’. For the true Church cannot be separated from the rock, nor vice versa; and therefore the succession of Peter is as firm and as stable as the duration of the true and visible Church is certain; but both are as firm as the word of Christ is certain: “the gates of hell will not prevail against it.”

14. But as to what concerns the interpretation of the beast, we have sufficiently shown that, in its proper sense, it signifies a certain single individual man. But we concede that it can mystically signify any congregation at all of impious heretics and apostates who follow and preach Antichrist; whether, as we reported from Tyconius, it be said generally and in type that by this beast all sects and ministers of heretics are signified, or whether it be said of those who preach the individual and proper Antichrist, as expounded by many Catholics. In this manner, then, it is true that the beast is the apostate congregation. But this apostate congregation is now multiple; for every synagogue of Satan gathered under the Christian name is an apostate congregation; and such is every congregation of Lutherans, Calvinists, Puritans, and Protestants; and that the Anglican pseudo-Church is similar has been clearly shown in book 1 from its state and its fall.

15. But in order to show that the Roman Church is represented by the beast, the king says in the first place that it has “horns like those of a lamb because it recalls the bride of Christ and shows a defender for itself.” But the Church recalls these things, not in hypocrisy, but in true faith and worship of Christ and imitation of him, wherein it differs much from the beast. He adds: “In truth, however, it speaks like a dragon because it teaches damnable and diabolical doctrines.” But this by him is never shown; by us, on the contrary, it has been sufficiently proved in book 1 that this testimony is not only false but even heretical, because the true and visible Church of Christ can never fall from the faith, since it is the pillar and ground of the truth on account of the promise of Christ saying: “I will be with you unto the end of the world; and the gates of hell will not prevail against it.” Also in book 2 from chapter 3, not only have we vindicated this Church from all the errors that the king invents in it, but we have also proved that, because of the contrary heresies, the Anglican Church, as far as it is now militant under its king, is apostate and schismatic.

16. Wherefore, before we proceed to other things, we please to advise the reader to consider with how much greater and truer foundation the royal metaphors can be turned back against him and his pitiable kingdom. For why shall we not say that the first beast is Henry VIII and his successors who imitate him and have on their heads the name of blasphemy, namely ‘head of the Church’ supreme not only in temporal things but also in spiritual? Why again shall Henry not be said to have been spotted like a leopard since he befouled the profession and doctrine of the faith wherein he was strong with the most ugly spots of lust, schism, and at length heresy? Nay he also seemed to imitate the leopard in speed and ferocity; for in a very brief time he made almost his whole realm apostate, and killed with savagery eminent men constant in faith. Next, much more truly is the King of England said to usurp, by an adulterated reason for ruling, spiritual power under the appearance of temporal power, and to solicit an undue cult and worship when he wishes to be recognized, obeyed, and honored as head of his own Church. And in this way can the rest be easily accommodated. In like way, too, we will say that the second beast is the Anglican Church fallen from the true faith, venerating the king as its spiritual head, and speaking forth infinite words of blasphemy against the true Catholic Church of God and the Vicar of Christ; or certainly that second beast we will say is the flock of ministers and false prophets applauding the king, seducing the inhabitants there to worship the first beast by recognizing it as head of the Church. These then and the like things can be both thought up easily and said with greater foundation; both because they are true and very well known in all the world, and because, although the King of England not be Antichrist, he can justly be numbered among his types and precursors, since he persecutes Christ in his Church and in his Vicar, which, although he cannot accomplish in deeds, he tries to effect in words and insults.

17. From here the king advances further, and what John says of the signs and wonders to be done by this second beast, to seduce the nations and draw them to worship the first beast, he accommodates to the miracles of the Catholic Church, which he affirms to be “false and lying wonders” and done to win over authority and power to the Pontiff. Which things, since they are said against all divine and human authority and faith without proof, would seem rather in need of being condemned than refuted. However it is pleasing to ask briefly whether they believe that in the Church of Christ true virtues and true miracles could have been done after the six hundred and sixth year or not? If they deny they could have been done, they mock the promises of Christ and, for their own choice, set a limit to them. For Christ said indefinitely, Mark 16.17: "These signs shall follow them that believe; in my name they shall cast out devils, etc." And elsewhere, Matthew 17.20: "if ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, etc. nothing shall be impossible for you." And elsewhere, John 14.12: "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do." These promises, then, cannot be limited to a definite time, otherwise anyone might say that only the Apostles could do true miracles, or something similar; which is very absurd. Therefore, not only for the first centuries of the Church, but for every age did Christ concede to his Church that such true signs would, at opportune times, be done in it.

They will say that these promises were made to faith, and therefore that power lasted in the Church as long as the true faith lasted in it; but after it was corrupted, they ceased, and false miracles began. But this is to fall into another pit of errors; for if the Church has begun to lack the true faith, the Church has perished, contrary to the words of Christ: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it." They will say that the true Church visible has perished; but it has already been sufficiently shown that the true Church of Christ is visible and that to it Christ promised perpetuity up to the end. Besides the fact that there ought to be signs and sensible miracles, and therefore true miracles cannot be done except by the visible Church; therefore the promises of Christ were made to it, and in it will last forever the power promised by Christ.

18. If then they cannot deny the power, why do they deny the true miracles that are in these times done in the Church? For no fewer signs of truth are seen in them than in those that were done in the ancient Church. For, to begin with, they were done by very holy men, Benedict, Bernard, Francis, Anthony, and others the like. Next, they were frequently done to bring conviction of the faith and introduce it in new provinces, as is reported of England by Gregory, the almost immediate follower of Boniface III; and that like things were afterwards done in the same province in confirmation of the same faith is told by Bede bk.5 Histor. ch.13; and the ecclesiastical annals report that with the cooperation of like miracles the faith was after the times of Boniface introduced in Flanders, Holland, and other provinces. Besides, in the later miracles the same indications of truth are found as were found in the earlier, namely in the miracle of raising the dead, in the evidence of a dead corpse lying open to view, and true revivification by lapse of time and confirmed by many acts of life and public conversation. Next, these histories are proved to be no less worthy of faith than the miracles; therefore rashly and impiously are they all judged false.

19. But as to what the king says, that these miracles of the Church were done to confer and exalt the power of the Pontiff, it is not so; for they are ordinarily done in confirmation and propagation of the true faith, or to the glory and honor of Christ; often also they are the effects of true and firm faith, to which Christ promised: "If ye have faith as a mustard seed, etc." Sometimes are they done by the mercy of God wanting to grant miraculously such benefits to those who need and ask for them. But I say that this is ordinarily so, because since the article about the primacy of the Pontiff pertains to the dogmas of the faith, and since knowledge of it is most necessary for confirmation of the true faith and Church, true miracles in confirmation of that truth could also have been done whenever they were, according to the disposition of divine providence, opportune or necessary. And finally, although true miracles are not always done for that end, nevertheless insofar as they are done by ministers of the Church obedient to the Pontiff and preaching with his authority, they do sufficiently confirm the same truth about his primacy. Who then may not see how execrable is the calumny that the miracles of the Catholic Church are comparable with the signs of the antichristian beast?

20. But because among the signs of the beast John designated a special one when he says, v.13: “so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men,” the king affixes an assuredly egregious interpretation to these words when he says: “Namely the thunderbolt of excommunication, whose force is so great that it is able to drive princes from their thrones, so much so that all are to be killed and burned for heretics who refuse to worship the image of the beast, that is, his supreme power circumscribed by no limits.” In which things a double metaphor is indicated, which if it is adduced in allegorical sense, is of little moment for conviction; for it is contemned with the same ease as it is invented, because it has been thought up by Protestants only for ill-speaking; but if the sense is proposed as literal, it is very ridiculous and repugnant to the intention of the Holy Spirit and to what the Protestants themselves say. I will briefly show both.

21. For the first metaphor is whereby “fire comes down from heaven” is said by metaphor to be the thunderbolt of excommunication. But this metaphor, to begin with, is novel, without foundation in Scripture, or in the Fathers or expositors, or in the common way of speaking. But who would believe that John used the words only in that metaphorical signification which Protestants have recently fabricated for their pleasure and solely for making mockery? Next John sets it down as a new sign, singular, and worthy of admiration; but to discharge an excommunication is not new, nor singular, since it is done even by heretics themselves, hence it contains no admiration since it happens every day. Nay if that is the sign of Antichrist, antichristianism assuredly began before Boniface III. For Innocent I first discharged an excommunication against the emperor. Next, the beast will make fire come down from heaven with the art and power of the demon; but the thunderbolt of excommunication is done by the power conceded by Christ, and in virtue of his words, Matthew 18.17: “but if he neglect to hear the Church, etc.” Therefore John is not speaking of this sign, nor is the metaphor likely.

22. The king will perhaps say that these things are true of ordinary and just excommunication, but that he is speaking of the thunderbolt of that excommunication “whose force is so great that it is able to drive princes from their thrones.” But on the contrary there is, first, that even such excommunication can be just and be done by legitimate power, as was shown above. Yet in truth the excommunication itself is improperly said to drive from the throne; for although those two effects proceed as two punishments from the same power and are imposed at the same time, they are distinct. Now, however, putting on the manner of the king, we will speak of them as one. Therefore, that thunderbolt too is done by true and celestial power, and it is not a lying but a true sign, as we have proved; it is repugnant, then, with metaphor. Second, this sign, that is this excommunication, is not discharged or done in the Church by preachers or the faithful obedient to the Pontiff but by the Pontiff alone; and so according to the royal accommodation it is not done by the second beast but by the first; but the sign of making fire come down from heaven is not attributed by John to the first beast but specifically to the second; therefore such interpretation mixes up the beasts.

23. The second metaphor of the king dwells on the “image of the beast,” by which the king wishes the supreme power of the Pope to be signified. But this metaphor is easily refuted by almost the same arguments, both because it has no foundation of authority or of reason or proof, and because to recognize and venerate this supreme authority of the Pope is not new in the Church of Christ, but all the Pontiffs preceding Boniface put on that image and used that power, and all the truly faithful obeyed him, as was extensively proved in book 3. Beyond this, however, this metaphor is combated by the words, v.14: “saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast.” For who among papists, as those fellows speak, or more truly who among Catholics has ever taught the faithful to make or confer power on the Pontiff, since rather we all constantly preach that Christ alone confers it? That image, then, is not pontifical power but something that can be made by the art and hands of men. Nor can the king say that to make an image is nothing else than to recognize and confess power; for John expressly distinguishes two things, making the image and worshipping it; however, with respect to power, to recognize power is to venerate it; therefore making the image is something else; hence it is more or less evident that in the words “make an image” there is no metaphor, as I said above. Which is also very much proved by the following words, v.15: “And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should speak.” For these things plainly show that the talk is of a material and sensible image. For how can it be imagined that the Church gives life to the power of the Pontiff so that it should be able to speak or do anything the like?

24. Finally, I consider in those words a double sign, one of making fire come down from heaven, and this sign the second beast is said to do, not for coercion, but for seduction, so as to lead those that dwell on the earth to the first beast and to worship his image, as is clear from the words, v.14: “And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast.” However, the thunderbolt of excommunication is not pronounced so as to lead men by seduction, but by force and coercion; which becomes greater if along with excommunication removal from the kingship is conjoined. Therefore the metaphor of excommunication does not square with such a sign. Next, the other sign, namely to give life to the image of the beast and make it speak, although it too be for seduction, nevertheless proceeds to coercion, for there is added, v.15: “and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.” And here too the metaphor cannot be accommodated; for the Church does not give life or speech to the Pontiff so that his power may be extended to killing rebels, but rather he himself commits this power to his ministers; it is abuse, then, of Scripture, not interpretation.

25. The king next proceeds further to accommodate the mark of Antichrist to the Pontiff, and he says that the mark of the beast is the profession of obedience which is made to the Supreme Pontiff. But Paul, when he advises the faithful, Hebrews 13.17: “Obey them that have the rule over you,” did not judge that the profession of ecclesiastical and Christian obedience is the mark of Antichrist but of Christ. And we can with truer reason say that the oath of fidelity whereby the king oppresses the Catholics of his realm is the mark of Antichrist, whenever he compels them, under appearance of profession of civil obedience due to himself, to deny obedience to the Vicar of Christ. Besides, beyond the error on which the accommodation is founded, it is repugnant to the words of John. First, because by the profession of obedience either there is understood only the mode itself of living under obedience to the Pontiff, or there is understood some special formula of professing this obedience. The first sense is not according to the mind of John, because he speaks expressly of some sign worn by the followers of Antichrist, whereby they profess his sect and obedience, as was seen above and as is very evident from the very words. But if by the profession be understood a special form of professing obedience to the Pontiff, it does not square with the words of John. First, because John says, v.16: "all both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond" will wear the mark of the beast; but a special profession of obedience to the Pontiff is not exacted of all the faithful, small and great, but from ecclesiastical pastors or doctors, or others established in a similar rank.

26. Second, the mark of Antichrist should be so common and familiar to all that without it no one is permitted to buy or sell even the necessities for life. Hence the Fathers note that it is imprinted for the end that all men are compelled to receive it even for the support of life, as now in England Catholics are compelled to go the churches of heretics, or to profess the oath of fidelity, lest they be deprived of goods necessary for life or of life itself; but in the Roman Church profession of obedience to the Pontiff is not required so that men may be able to buy and sell, not even under compulsion of losing the necessities for life, but on special occasions when it is demanded for the safety of taking up doctrine, rank, or office; there is then no comparison of this mark to that profession. Third, the mark of Antichrist will be some permanent sign worn on the hands or imprinted on the forehead, so that it can be seen for the purpose of admitting men to the said contracts, but profession of obedience is a transient sign (so to say), which is displayed on one occasion when taking up some office, but is afterwards worn neither on the hands nor the forehead. The accommodation of the mark then is frivolous.

27. He comes finally to the number of the name of Antichrist and applies two expositions. One is that the number is not of the name but of the person of Antichrist, that is, that the number need not be contained in the letters of his name, but in his very person, because within the years of that number, namely 666, Antichrist will have come. Which exposition he collects from the fact that the same number, which had first been said to be, v.17, "the number of his name," is afterwards called, v.18, "the number of the beast," at the place: "Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast," and at once is added: "for it is the number of a man." And in these latter words the king seems to understand by the man Christ the Lord; for he says that according to this exposition it is said to be the number of a man because it is "the number of the years of the Lord." Now he says that in this way the prophecy has been fulfilled in Boniface III, "who first," he says, "named himself universal archbishop, by which title St. Gregory had predicted that Antichrist will have to be known." But that exposition indeed is not new; for John Annius and certain others used it to show that Mahomet was Antichrist. And although we were to allow it to the king, it would be of no importance, as I will immediately say.

28. But it cannot be denied that John foretold that the number 666 will be in the name of Antichrist, for he said expressly, "or the number of his name," that is, contained in the letters of the name, and thus have all interpreters understood those words. This, then, cannot be denied, though there be nothing repugnant in the same number of the name indicating mystically some property pertaining to the person. Hence, if it might stand with the truth of other prophecies or of history that signified by that number is the time of the rise of Antichrist according to the number of the years of the Lord, or the time of duration of his throne, as others said of Mahomet, this would indeed not be repugnant to the words of John. However, that it was not so in the case of Mahomet was shown by the fact itself, as Pereira showed. But about Antichrist proper it is clear from other prophecies, according to which he could neither come so quickly nor will his throne last so long a time, as was shown above.

29. Now according to the accommodation of Protestants it is clear that the number cannot be referred to the time of the duration of Antichrist, because by their opinion he has already lasted more than 1,000 years. For that reason, therefore, the king has striven to accommodate the number to the time of his origin. However even this sense has no foundation in the text, for the same number, which John first called “the number of the name of the beast,” he immediately calls, for the sake of brevity, “the number of the beast;” but when he adds that the same is “the number of a man,” by ‘man’ he does not understand Christ; for whoever thought that? Or on what foundation can it be affirmed? Add that neither in that sense does the truth respond to the number, because Boniface was not on the See in 666. He replies first that the number must not be computed from the year of the birth of Christ but from the year in which Pompey destroyed the temple. But neither can that subsist with reason; for why from that time rather than from any other you like should the number be counted? Nor is it consistently said, because then it will not be the number of the years of the Lord, as he had said just before. And for that reason he responds in another way, that sixty years after Boniface the reign of Antichrist was confirmed and thus was that number completed. But this is no less frivolous and willful, because neither did the Pontiffs in those sixty years after Boniface more usurp the name of Universal Bishop than in the hundred or more following, nor did they more increase in power or dignity.

30. Besides which it is also false that Boniface usurped the name of Universal Bishop, because he only vindicated it from someone else who was usurping it, and showed that it could fit his own See alone, although it is not clear that he used the title. But if this be called usurpation, then not he first, but Pope Leo many years before, will have to be said to have usurped that name; because the Synod of Chalcedon both bestowed on him that title, as I reported above from Gregory, and he himself in his letters names himself Bishop of the Universal Church, which is the same. Next, it is false that Gregory said that Antichrist will have to be known by the title of Universal Bishop, but the words of Gregory are: “Whoever calls himself, or desires to be called, universal Priest, is in his exaltation a precursor of Antichrist, because he in his pride sets himself before the rest.” But in what sense Gregory condemned that name was made clear above. But whatever was the case about the word and the use thereof, it is clearly collected from the place of Gregory that Boniface was not Antichrist, but at most can it be inferred that he was exalted, or was by a certain imitation a precursor of Antichrist, from which it plainly follows that he was not Antichrist. The king certainly might better consider the fact that Gregory there puts as a note of Antichrist that “he will call himself God,” and that “he wishes to seem God above all men.” Which neither Boniface nor any Pontiff has hitherto done. And we can more truly object to him the opinion of Athanasius in epist. ‘Ad Solitar. Vit. Agent.’ mentioned above, where among the images of Antichrist he puts “a secular prince usurping ecclesiastical primacy over bishops.”

31. Finally, another exposition of the number of the name of Antichrist is allowed by the king, and he accommodates it to the Pontiff, because in the name ‘Latinus’ written in Greek letters the number is contained. “Which,” he says, “rightly accords with the Roman Church, with the Roman faith, and with the Latin liturgy.” But how violent and frivolous all these are is patent. And to begin with, Bellarmine noted that λατίνος is written not with ει but with ι, and in this way the number is not rendered. Yet, nevertheless, Aretas in his ch.38 on Revelation put among the other names that can be thought up for Antichrist the name λατρίνος, but he at once added that it ought to be written with a diphthong (namely, contrary to the manner and propriety of Scripture) so as to be able to give that number. Next, John spoke of the proper name of Antichrist, but there was no Pontiff who was called by the proper name of Latinus, yet by the common name even the King of England is Latin by name, and Luther and Calvin were Latin; why then is the Pontiff more to be reckoned Antichrist because of the name Latin than any one of these? All these things, then, which are said of Antichrist and of his skirmisher in that ch.13, clearly show, when soundly understood, that Antichrist, insofar as he is there described, has not yet appeared, and is miles away from the Roman Pontiff; but the twisted and violent metaphorical interpretations of Protestants betray with no less clarity the error in which those blind fellows dwell.

Chapter 20: The things the king notes about chapters 14, 15, & 16 are shattered.

Summary: 1. The King of England tries to prove that Antichrist must be killed in Rome. Antiquity is opposed to his invention. The king would more truly say that Rome is to be destroyed by Antichrist. 2. In Revelation, as in other prophecies, the order of things is sometimes not kept to. The plagues of Revelation will be true, not allegorical. King James on this place of Revelation pours out curses and abuse against the Pontiff. 3. The darkness in the plague of the fifth vial is sensible, not intelligible. 4. Protestants unskillfully confound the vial poured out into the Euphrates. 5. The kings, about whom the discussion is in ch.16, will not fight against Antichrist but for him. Proof from the words of John. 6. Heretics are like those kings and are against God and his Christ by conspiracy alone. 7. King James compares the alumni of the Society of Jesus to little frogs. Such office is glorious for the Society. 8. The interpretation is not coherent. The unclean spirits are posited by the king now as the enemies of Antichrist, now as his friends. 9. The workers of the Society of Jesus sow peace not discord.

1. Having finished the third vision, the king, before passing on to the fourth vision, to be taken from ch.17, snatches at certain things from chs.14, 15, & 16; which, although they are rather slight, we have thought it worth the effort to take note of so that we leave untouched nothing that pertains to the cause. At the beginning, then, of ch.14, John narrates the special glory of the holy virgins there manifested to him; then he narrates the vision of the angel flying in the midst of heaven, and having the everlasting gospel, and announcing the Day of Judgment. And on these two points nothing occurs worth noting. Third, John says, v.8, “And there followed another angel saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of her wrath;” where the king notes that this ruin of Babylon, which this angel announced beforehand, is the death of Antichrist. Now by Babylon he wishes Rome to be understood, as we have above rather often said. Hence he signifies that Antichrist must die at Rome and in the burning and destruction of it. However, that Antichrist is to be killed at Rome is a new fiction thought up without foundation for generating some corrupt suspicion about the Roman See. For the ancients handed on that he is to be killed in the East, as is collected from Lactantius bk.7 chs.17 and following, and from Hippolytus, Irenaeus, and other ancients. But Jerome on Isaiah ch.25 said that he is to be killed on Mount Olivet. It can also be collected from Daniel ch.11 at the end, and from Revelation ch.11, as I noted above. And in ch.19 the Evangelist John said that Antichrist is to be cast alive into hell, namely at the command of Christ, as Paul in 2 Thessalonians 2 signified, and Daniel ch.8 when he says, v.25: "he shall be broken without hand." If then by Babylon we understand Rome, so far is the ruin of Rome from being the death of Antichrist that rather by him, or his leaders or associates, it is to be destroyed and delivered over to fire, as can be collected from Revelation ch.18. For as I noted above, if Rome is to be destroyed before the time of judgment, it will only be at the time of Antichrist and by his effort, so that, with the Roman name extinct, he himself may seem to erect a new and more excellent monarchy. But if by Babylon we understand this world, the burning of Babylon supposes that the persecution of Antichrist, and his destruction and perdition, are already finished; therefore neither will the ruin of Babylon be in this way the death of Antichrist.

2. But after these voices and warnings of the two angels, a third angel follows, announcing both the punishments that will fall upon the followers of Antichrist and the blessedness of those who, patiently bearing tribulation and keeping the commandments of God, have died in the Lord. And since this discrimination is to be made in the judgment, therefore immediately the vision and representation of the judgment is subjoined. But these things, as all expositors note, were said in large part by anticipation; for before the judgment is made, seven plagues must precede, which are announced in general in ch.15, and are reviewed one by one in ch.16. Which to explain is not now our office. But because the king plays with their allegorical sense, I note briefly that the plagues are understood literally and properly of corporeal and external calamities, as were the plagues of Egypt, to which they are compared by Irenaeus bk.4 ch.50, Andreas ch. 46 on Revelation, where he expounds them individually, and he is imitated more or less by Aretas. And rightly; for everything that is said there can be understood truly and properly, and therefore it should be so understood. Yet, nevertheless, the king, in his own manner, converts those plagues by his allegories into curses and abuse of the Holy Church and the Pontiff; he does not however accommodate them all, but those that he can pervert and accommodate, and he always assumes the same errors, understanding the Pontiff by the beast but the Apostolic Church by the false prophet; and in this way the darkness in the fifth vial poured out on the seat of Antichrist he says is the darkness of ignorance and error of the Roman Church. For thus are heretics wont, in excuse of their own ignorance and stubbornness, to accuse the Church of ignorance and blindness; for since they are themselves blind, they cannot see the light of the Church, as Augustine often notes against the Donatists.

3. Besides which, neither is the metaphor necessary, as I said, nor can it be accommodated; for those plagues are to come upon the beast and his kingdom, that is, on Antichrist and the men deceived by him, as is there said. Hence they will already presuppose a very thick spiritual darkness; the talk then is not about that. But the darkness to be poured out afterwards through the fifth vial will be truly corporeal and at any rate temporal, because sensible and very frequent darkness will either be poured out on Jerusalem, where Antichrist's seat will be, and on all that region, or the human splendor and fame of the antichristian kingdom will be obscured by the greatness of the calamities, from which Antichrist will by his arts not be able to free his subjects. Hence it will happen that all will be afflicted with great pain, such that, vv.10-11: “they gnawed their tongues for pain. And blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds.” Which words the king never could nor ever will be able, without blushing, to accommodate to the Church; but it can easily be understood how they might with better analogy and founded more in the truth be transferred to the darkness, and tongues, and blasphemies, and impenitence of Protestants.

4. The king progresses to the sixth angel who, by drying up the Euphrates, v.12, prepared “the way of the kings of the East,” which he says has been fulfilled, “since already the man of sin has begun to be revealed, all the impediments having been taken away that can delay their journey,” that is of the Eastern kings, “to invade that monarchy.” Where by “the kings of the East” he understands himself and similar kings, rebels against the Roman Church and persecutors of it, as later in the fourth vision, on page 121, he more clearly expounds. And for these kings, he says, the way is to be prepared by the pouring out of the sixth vial, so that, with the impediments taken away, they may freely and unexpectedly invade the monarchy of the Church (which he himself makes up to be the monarchy of Antichrist). Just as Cyrus, he says, by an unexpected crossing of the Euphrates, took Babylon and its king Belshazzar, who was abusing the vessels prepared for the ministry of God, and in this way killed him as sitting in the temple of God.

5. In all which metaphor, omitting the impiety and audacity, I note the supreme ignorance of the Protestants who give this exposition; because not only are they speaking on behalf of their own opinion beyond the literal sense, but they are also accommodating the words against that sense. For the kings for whom, by the pouring out of the sixth vial and the drying up of the Euphrates, the way will be prepared, are not foretold to be coming against Antichrist, but rather to help Antichrist in the extermination of the people of God, as we will note below about the prophecy of Daniel in chapter 22, and it can also be taken from the words that John a little later subjoins, v.14: “the spirits of demons...which go forth into the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty.” And thus all interpret that place about a calling together of all the kings of the earth, and especially of the Eastern kings, to be done by Antichrist for vanquishing all the Christians. Which calling together and huge gathering for battle is under the names of Gog and Magog made mention of by the same John in ch.20, after Ezekiel ch.28. How, then, can the metaphor square with understanding the kings to come from the East to be heretics rising up against the Pope? What more frivolous, and what more ridiculous, could be said or thought up?

6. Add that the kings will not gather together when Antichrist will begin to be revealed, but after Antichrist has been recognized by the whole world and has been publicly preached enough by his false prophet; nay, after his kingdom will have begun to be afflicted by other tribulations, as is manifest from the preceding vials and the following words; but these heretic fellows have risen and gathered together before Antichrist was known or begun to be revealed; for they themselves first made up that fable, and the throne on which they have themselves imposed that name was always very well known to the Church, and has suffered none of the things foretold in those vials.

Next, the gathering together of those kings will be “to the battle of that great day of God Almighty,” when, that is, Christ will triumph over them and will destroy Gog and Magog together. But these heresiarch fellows are not gathered together for one day, and they went forth long before the times of the great day of the God. In this alone, then, do they conform to those kings, that they have in truth risen up against Christ, and are preparing the way for Antichrist, and are starting war against the Vicar of Christ (under the title of the fictitious Antichrist).

7. The king, however, concludes his prolix allegory by introducing the words written by John of the same sixth vial, v.13: “And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet.” Through which he understands a new sect rising up to illumine and support the throne of Antichrist that is obscured and tottering in darkness, which he says is signified by the number three because they are directed by three masters, “of the dragon,” that is Satan, “of Antichrist,” that is the Pontiff, and “of the false prophet,” that is the Roman Church. By which sect he understands without doubt the Society of Jesus, and he compares its doctors and preachers to frogs, whom he disparages at pleasure in the manner of heretics. Now to respond on their behalf is neither fitting for me nor necessary. For their works bear witness of themselves, and there is one who sees and judges. Nor do the alumni and workers of the Society have little whereof they can glory; since they have been held worthy by the Vicar of Christ and by his Church to suffer shame and insults for the faith of Christ and for obedience to his Vicar.

8. Only as to the abuse and corruption of the words of Scripture will I note that, besides the other errors about the false interpretation of the beast and of his false prophet and the abuse of the other words of that Scripture, there is in the allegory itself, when applied to the text, neither fixity nor order. For he says in this place that three evil spirits are sent to support Antichrist and to hold up his throne; hence when John says of them, v.14: “which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle,” it plainly follows that the kings to be gathered by these spirits will be the friends and supporters of Antichrist; but a little earlier he had said that those kings, for whom the sixth angel prepares the way, are the enemies of Antichrist, and that a way has been expedited for them so that they might without impediment invade the monarchy of Antichrist; but these two things cannot stand together at the same time. For the kings who will come without impediment and are to be gathered by those three spirits are the same; how then are they called both to invade and to support the tottering throne of Antichrist?

9. In addition, those three spirits are said to be going to gather the kings to the battle, that is, against the visible Church of Christ, which battle will be at the time of Antichrist; but the workers of the Society do not gather kings to any battle, but to peace and union with the Vicar of Christ, nor to vanquishing the visible Church but to peace and union with it. Again, those kings are to be gathered specifically for the battle of one day, which by antonomasia is called “that great day of God Almighty,” because in it he will come “as a thief,” as is immediately said, v.15, namely to destroy Antichrist and all the kings gathered with him, as in ch.20 is plainly declared under the names of Gog and Magog. But this cannot in any way be accommodated to the preachers of the faith who now are in the Catholic Church, to pass over an infinite number of other things that show clearly that John is speaking of a corporeal and material battle, designating even the place where the kings are to be gathered, and declaring openly that the three frogs are three unclean spirits of demons performing signs wherewith to gather the kings to that battle. Therefore vain and impudent is the allegory made up by lazy and obstinate Protestants.

Chapter 21: From the vision of Revelation chs.17 and following the new error about Antichrist is refuted rather than confirmed.

Summary: 1. King James teaches that the harlot woman is Antichrist and accordingly the Pontiff. He proves this with calumnies. 2. That woman signifies a city, not a man. Some understand it of the city of the impious, others of the Roman City. 3. Other calumnies are shown to be false. 4. Christian Rome is in no way drunken with the blood of the martyrs. 5. The king confounds the notes of the woman and of the beast. 6. He asserts too that Christian Rome has committed fornication with kings. He is refuted by his own words. 7. If Rome is to be restored to its prior state near the end of the world, the words of Revelation do not square therewith. 8. The Roman Church can never be antichristian. 9. That the Pontiffs give indulgence to lusts is sheer calumny. 10. The Church never approves invalid marriages. Legitimate dispensation does not make marriages illegitimate but honorable. 11. The king carps at the adorning of the Blessed Virgin and of temples. The adorning of temples is not new in the Church. 12. Images in the Church are decently clothed. There is greater religion in the adorning of the Blessed Virgin, especially at Rome. 13. The king tears with insults at the liberality of Catholics towards religious. 14. Concession of power for slaughtering kings with impunity is falsely attributed to the Pontiff. The Pontiffs have lavished indulgences on those who are fighting against pagans. 15. Various concessions are reported from Anglican history. 16. The falsity of the things said is proved from the form of the concessions. 17. The question whether it is licit to kill a tyrant with impunity does not here have place. 18. After other insults, the king carps at the pride of the Roman Church. Old Rome believed herself a queen because of the empire. Not pride but faithful charity exalts the Church. 19. Notes of the true Church. 20. Prosperity bends both ways. Tribulations are more frequent in the Church. 21. God provides moderately, even with miracles, for the prosperity of his Church. 22. King James weighs the Pontiff and the Turk in the same scales. However, there is no agreement between light and darkness. 23. The greatness of the Pontiff was from the time of Christ already established. It became, at the time of Constantine, known to the world. The Turks got the possession of things a long time later. Nothing of greatness was added to the pontificate when Mahomet was on the march.

1. The Evangelist John reports in Revelation ch.17 that he was carried away into the wilderness, and that he saw a harlot woman sitting on a scarlet beast full of names of blasphemy, etc. From this vision, which the King of England has put in fourth place, he strives to conclude that the Roman Pontiff is Antichrist; and he proves it in this manner. The harlot woman represents Antichrist, and all the properties which are in that chapter attributed to the woman conform to the Roman Pontiff; therefore he is Antichrist. The major premise the king does not prove but presupposes the foundation of his disputation as a thing known. The minor, however, he broadly pursues at will by multiplying insults, without proof or foundation of truth, against the Roman See; but only because since infancy he has, under the doctrine of heretics, imbibed that false opinion and depraved faith, and has been confirmed in it by custom; now, moved with both ignorance of mind and indignation, he dares to set his mouth against heaven and to defile sacred things with profane.

2. But, to begin with, the foundation on which he rests is false, for the woman does not represent Antichrist. Because John himself said that the woman has written on her forehead “Babylon the Great;” but no one has ever said that Babylon either properly or figuratively signifies Antichrist; for Antichrist will be a certain man, as was demonstrated above, but Babylon always signifies some city or congregation of men, as the same John at the end of that ch.17 concluded, v.18: “And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.” And thus do all the Fathers and expositors of that place agree that the woman or Babylon represents some great city, because this is not only in an enigma but expressly revealed, and is made clear by the same prophet. But which that city is, is variously expounded. However we reported above in chapter 7 that there are two probable opinions, one explaining this place of the city of the impious, the other expounding it of the Roman City, and we made both opinions clear and showed that each was probable; and we made clear in detail that all the insignia of depravity, with which John adorns her, are appropriate to both. But we noted there that, according to the Catholic and true clarification, if Rome is Babylon it must be understood to be, not Christian, but pagan Rome, as it was at the time that John was writing, and for as long as it endured in that state; and if perchance it will return, whether altogether or in large part, to that state before the end of the world (as many think), it is for that state too deservedly signified by the same name; for Christian Rome, while it continues under the true faith of Christ, cannot be said to be Babylon, since it does not give admittance to the confession of false dogmas, or of several sects or gods. And therefore rightly did Jerome, bk.2 Contra Jovin. near the end, say to Rome: “You have destroyed by the confession of Christ the blasphemy written on your forehead, etc.” And for this reason did Peter accurately distinguish the Church that was at Babylon from Babylon itself, saying, 1 Peter 5.13: “The Church that is at Babylon...saluteth you.” And in the same way does Jerome speak in epist.18 to Marcel. saying: “There indeed is the holy Church, etc.”

3. With the foundation of the king destroyed, then, his argument collapses. Wherefore all the accommodations that he assumes under that foundation are the calumnies of Protestants, not interpretations of Scripture. Nor can the king himself escape this response, since he rather often contends in his Preface that the harlot is Rome, and he confirms it with the confession of those of our own. But here we must beware of the cunning of Protestants, which Sander noted in bk.8 De Visib. Monarch., and the king seems to be imitating it in the present case, for he says that the same woman is Rome, and is Antichrist, and again that the beast is Antichrist, as I noted above in chapter 15, so that, by thus confounding Rome with the Roman throne and with Antichrist, he afterwards transfers the discussion to every governance of that city and, finally, to the Roman Church and See, and accommodates everything to it that is said about Antichrist as well as about the infidel City of Rome and its pagan empire. Such things, then, are all that in his whole discourse he fabricates about that chapter. For since Rome is said to have been “the mother of harlots” when “she was in service to the superstitions and idols of all the nations,” as Pope Leo says in serm.1 De Nativit. and in serm.1 De Sanctis Petro et Paulo, for that reason the king transfers that crime to the Apostolic See. And just as we, on account of that See, say that Rome is the mother and teacher of all churches, so he calls it the mother of all spiritual fornications. But what those spiritual fornications are that the Roman See has either exercised or taught, never has he hitherto been able to show; since it has never, not even in the slightest, differed from the ancient and primitive faith, as was proved in books 1 and 2.

4. And in like manner, when pagan Rome is said to be “drunken with the blood of the martyrs” because of the persecutions of the emperors, the same king dares to attribute it to the Roman Church and See; but what assuredly I do not see is with what appearance or shadow of truth it could be said. For what “monstrous persecutions of Christians” has the Roman Church stirred up, or when did it spill the blood of martyrs, so that, for this reason, it may be said to be drunken with the blood of the martyrs? But perhaps the king is calling martyrdoms the just punishments of certain heretics and apostates, although however those punishments are so rare that neither because of them could the Roman Church be said to be drunken with the blood of heretics; for, as the Fathers and expositors note, an unnumbered multitude of martyrs is denoted by these words. Next, to pass over the rest, the things said about Rome in Revelation can be attributed with no greater foundation to the Roman See from the time of Boniface III than, for example, from the time of Sylvester, as has often been said and proved. Let the king, then, cease to keep turning his back, and let him either admit that Rome, by reason of that See, was always a harlot, or let him desist from transferring the crimes of pagan Rome to Boniface or other later holy Pontiffs and their legitimate successors.

5. Next, because the king confounds the woman with the beast that is carrying her, he tries to interpret about the Pope not only the properties of the woman but also the insignia of the beast. And first, he refers the interpretation of the seven heads to the seven regimes of the city, which we attacked above; next he has a remarkable exposition of the ten horns, which we will treat of better in the next chapter. And finally, he digresses to explaining the predicted destruction of Babylon in ch.18. But because we have above in chapter 7 treated of the destruction of Babylon described in that ch.18, it will not be necessary to run through all the allegories and accommodations that the king fabricates in this latter place, especially because they contain nothing new but the same curses and insults, founded on the same errors, against the Roman See, and amplified, without any proof, by new exaggerations. With these things more or less passed over, then, I have thought only that certain points, which either have some shadow of an objection or contain a more pernicious and scandalous calumny, should not be passed over.

6. First, then, on p.122, so that he may bite at the same time as objecting, he considers the words of ch.18 where, after the ruin of Rome has been described, it is said, v.9: “The kings of the earth, who have committed fornication and lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her and lament for her.” From which he intends to conclude that Babylon is not pagan Rome but Christian Rome, because what is there related, “was with pagan Rome never done, nor could be done, by any of the kings whom she by force and arms subjected.” Therefore that Babylon is Christian Rome; and the kings who were lamenting her ruin are those, he says, “whom she adorned with honorific names and titles, and indulged with pardon for their lusts and illicit marriages.” But to the objection we reply, to begin with, that the same can be turned back against the king; for the thing was never done, nor could be done, even with Christian Rome, because those kings, whom she adorned with honorific titles, she subjected, not indeed by force and arms, yet with Christian faith and peace, as Pope Leo said in serm.1 De Sanctis Petro et Paulo. Next I say that about both Romes, or about both states of the same Rome, the objection is impertinent, because the prophecy has not yet been fulfilled, for Rome has not yet been made altogether extinct. For although she suffered some grave calamities and not small disasters under the Goths and Vandals, yet by them was the prophecy of John in the said ch.18 not fulfilled, because by those destructions was it not brought about that, v.21, “she should be found no more at all,” as I noted in the said chapter 7. Although about those destructions too it might very truly be said that they came upon pagan Rome rather than Christian Rome. For she was then as it were a mixture, for although in her was the Apostolic See and the Christian religion, yet there was still in her much remaining of Gentilism, and a great part continued of pagan citizens, and God, to purge her of those dregs, permitted the calamities, as is learnedly and eruditely shown by Malvenda bk.4 De Antichristo ch.6; and therefore although, by the capture and destruction of Rome, the faithful Church that was then in her could not fail to suffer great harms and losses, yet because the idolatries and crimes of Gentilism were causes of the ruin, therefore can it be said that they came rather upon pagan Rome than Christian.

7. Hence I add further, what I reported in the said chapter 7 from the opinion of many wise men, that it is not incredible that near the times of Antichrist Rome must actually during them be again conquered by the nations and recalled to its former pagan status, the Church having been therefrom ejected or so afflicted that it should hide as it were in a corner or in caves, and then could the prophecy of John be very well fulfilled in pagan Rome, and the pagan and idolatrous kings who had partaken in her fornications and delights could lament for her. And thus rightly too could she be called Babylon, just as she was called before, even if the Church would exist, which the name of Babylonian can never fit. Hence wisely did Sander say, bk.8 Monarch. ch.8, that Antichrist must be waited for, not in Rome, but among the remains and fragments of the Roman Empire. Especially because, although perhaps some infidel king might first rise up who would conquer Rome and exercise there his tyranny, that thing is not to be imputed to the Apostolic See or to the Roman Church more than the persecution of Nero or of Diocletian was ascribed formerly to the same Church.

Finally I say that it could also happen that Rome should suffer that last and eternal destruction even if it never returns to paganism, but remains under the command of the Pontiff, and that it should suffer it because of its crimes, not only past, but also those that there will be in those last days. For, as I was saying above, although the Church continue faithful therein, either it could be very depraved in its morals, or there could be multiplied in it sects, whether of heretics or of pagans, with so much power and liberty that the Pontiffs should not be able to repress them. And in such a state it could also be called Babylon because of the confusion that, in that state, could not fail to be very great. And in like manner could the kings lament over it who were partners in its delights, whether they will be pagans, or the faithful given over to corrupt morals, or heretics supporting the sects and crimes which could then exist through all Italy or all Europe, and could so prevail that they should, along with the authority and power of external kings, invade even Rome.

8. In whatever way, then, that prophecy be understood, therefrom can it not only not be collected that Rome is already now antichristian, but also neither can it with any likelihood be inferred that the Church, which is now at Rome, either is already, or will at some time be, antichristian and infidel, because although many citizens and members of it should defect from the faith, they come to be by that very fact outside the Church, which always remains faithful. And much less does it follow that the head of the true Church is or will ever be Antichrist, because although the city is thoroughly destroyed because of apostasy, or for any other cause whatever, the head and rock of the Church could stand firm, or reside elsewhere, or go into hiding. Nay, although God should permit the person of some Pontiff in those times to fall and to yield to the tyrants by professing errors, not for that reason would the Pontiff, as he is Pontiff, fall, nor would the Church fall, but, after deposing him, the Church could for itself create a Pontiff. Which is said for exaggeration and for more explaining the thing; for it is more credible that God will not permit it, especially during so great a tribulation and oppression of the Church.

9. Now as to the calumny that the king mixes in by the by with his objection, saying that Pontiffs are wont to give pardon to the lusts of kings or to permit illicit marriages, we reply that it is false and cannot be proved by the king, but that by us, or by the miserable lapse of England itself, it is evidently refuted. For to give pardon to lusts can happen in two ways. First by giving pardon to the lustful after penance and satisfaction for their lusts; and this has very often been done by Pontiffs. From which fact are they understood to be, not Antichrists, but Vicars of Christ, who committed to them the keys of heaven, and who to Peter when he asked, Matthew 18.21: "How oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? Till seven times?" replied, v.22: "I say not unto thee, Until seven times, but, Until seventy times seven;" that is, if he will have listened to the Church and done penance, otherwise he is rather to be separated as a heathen and a publican. In another way can it be attributed to the Pontiffs that they provide pardon for lusts for those who persist in them, or approve similar deeds, or publicly and with scandal to the Church conceal them. And that such a crime is in this sense falsely attributed to the Apostolic See England herself is witness; for on account of no other cause did Henry VIII, and his kingdom with him, begin schism against the Roman Bishop save because he refused to give pardon to his intolerable lust. Similar examples to prove the same falsehood could also be sought from the histories of Portugal and from other histories. But in a clear matter they are not necessary, nor does it become us to recall to memory the already forgotten and wiped out offenses of kings.

10. But in the other phrase that the king adjoins, "to permit illicit marriages," he seems clearly to allude to the marriage of Henry with the most Serene Catherine, which the Pope permitted, nay not only permitted but also constantly defended, because it was not illicit but true and holy. But the King of England will approve the marriage of Henry with Anne Boleyn, which was not an illicit marriage but a most ugly adultery and an execrable incest. Permission, then, for illicit marriage can also be done in various ways. First by approving matrimonies illicitly made, even if they are invalid; and this is falsely attributed to the Catholic Church or to the Apostolic See, nor can an example be by the king produced whereby he could in any way make it credible. Nay, although a marriage was valid, if it was done illicitly (as often happens), although the Church approves the marriage, it does not approve the offence; nay, nor permits it, but forbids and punishes it if possible; for sometimes, because it cannot punish it without greater scandal, it hides it; but this is frequently wont to be the fault of powerful princes, not of the Apostolic See. Marriage is permitted in another way so that it be done with a dispensation, because it would without it be illicit, and this the Church often does, and most justly does, because when it happens because of impediments introduced by human right, these can also by the power of the Church be taken away; and it is often expedient for the common good, or for some other just cause. Thus too was it done in the case of the marriage of Henry with Catherine, as is very well known and demonstrated by many most learned men. But on account of these dispensations, not without trickery or fraud is it said that “the Pontiff permits illicit marriages,” for these words have, so to say, a composite sense; for they signify that he permits those that remain illicit, which is false; but he permits by dispensing, so that what without dispensation would be illicit is done licitly.

11. The king goes further, and on occasion of the words of John in the said ch.18 verse 11: “for no man buyeth their merchandise any more,” he exaggerates the wealth of the Roman City, and condemns (to omit other things) “the adornment of temples, and the cult of holy images.” He adds too a horrible lie of Protestants, which they have imposed on him, namely that “they clothe and adorn daily in Rome the Blessed Virgin with novel and very exquisite kinds of dress, although these recall the habit of harlots.” However in this objection the Protestants sufficiently show that they are calumniating and pursuing with hatred, not the Rome that they imagine is novel and antichristian, but the old and Catholic Roman Church. For the adornment of temples is not new in the Church but, from the time when temples began to be publicly built, they also began to be sumptuously adorned, and most of all at Rome. Of which thing, besides the most grave histories of Eusebius and later writers, there are very evident witnesses, the most ancient monuments, and the ornaments of temples and reliquaries, which today are observed in Rome, and are in the acts of the Pontiffs themselves, Sylvester, Damasus, and others up to Gregory, most copiously found. And, in addition to the examples, the holy and Ancient Pontiffs taught it, Felix IV and Leo I, as we have dealt with more extensively elsewhere. The same is manifest about the cult of images, of which enough was said in book 2.

12. But the calumny about the indecent clothing or cult of the image of the most Blessed Virgin, it is sufficiently refuted by the decree of the ecumenical Synod of Trent, confirmed by the Roman Pontiffs, and received in use. For in sess.25, in the decree about the cult of saints and images, after it has made clear the Catholic doctrine, it subjoins about the morality to be kept in practice: “Further, let all superstition in the invocation of saints, in the veneration of relics, and in the sacred use of images, be removed, all base gain eliminated, finally all lasciviousness avoided, so that images may not be painted or adorned with frivolous charm.” And again it commends to the bishops: “Let them exercise care that nothing disordered, or fitted in topsy-turvy or haphazard fashion, nothing profane, nothing dishonorable appear, since sanctity becomes the house of God.” And this care and religious solicitude we know is observed in Roman temples with great diligence and piety, and we observed it for many years with our eyes, and we noticed it with more consideration in the images of the most holy Virgin; and therefore we confidently affirm that in those words is contained nothing but sheer calumny and the impudent mendacity of heretics.

13. Nor is the accusation dissimilar that in third place the king objects to the Pontiffs on the occasion of those words of John, vv.12-13: “The merchandise of gold, etc., and souls of men.” For he says: “Now, of all the sumptuous merchandise, those which are of great price, namely the souls of men, are named last,” and at once he interposes the words wherewith he inveighs against the religious and pious expenses that Catholics take on in building convents for religious, and especially against the Society of Jesus which he loads down with injuries and insults. Which things I gladly omit, both so that the pious ears of those reading this work may not be offended, and also because I have in this work determined to reply, not on behalf of the Society, but on behalf of the Catholic faith and the singular prerogative of the Apostolic See. And although in those words some errors against the faith are involved, as against purgatory, against intercessions for the dead, and against the religious state, they are only touched on by the by and cannot in this brief work all be refuted. And also about the former we have, as this work gave opportunity, said enough in books 1 and 2, but about the last we hope at some point, with divine help, to bring to light a work about the religious state, a close ally to our other work about the virtue of religion, wherein we expressly refute that error. After the words, then, that we have passed over, the king subjoins: "And certainly I believe that the business with souls is not the least, since men are bewitched by the hope and promise of eternal life, so that a little brother might easily be persuaded to stab his king, etc." And finally he concludes: "and thus to throw away both spirit and soul."

14. In these words the king signifies either that Pontiffs are wont to promise indulgences or remission of sins to men if they kill their kings and temporal princes, or that Catholics teach that it is a work of piety to devise and inflict death on a prince and king who is an enemy to faith and religion, and that it is most meritorious and a kind of martyrdom to suffer death for perpetrating such a crime; and that in this way the brother who killed the king of Gaul and others like him were deceived by the promise of eternal salvation. And the first sense, indeed, seems to have been intended by the king, for it sufficiently follows upon what went before. But to it Bellarmine briefly and learnedly responds that Pontiffs are indeed wont to give indulgences to Christian soldiers fighting in just wars against infidels, or to concede them to those departing life. For Gelasius II almost five hundred years ago conceded to soldiers capturing Spain against the Saracens an indulgence in these words: "If any of you, having received penance for his sins, shall have died in this expedition, we absolve him, by the merits of the saints and the prayers of the whole Church, from the bonds of his sins." And afterwards he conceded another indulgence for other living cooperators, as is in Baronius for the year 1118 n.18. Another indulgence was conceded by John VI at the time of the emperor Louis III to all those dying in the war for the defense of the Church against the pagans, as Baronius reports for the year 878 n.34, from epist.144 of the same. Again, there is a celebrated indulgence which to those taking up the cross for the expedition to the Holy Land was conceded by Pope Urban in the Council of Claremont in the year 1095, as Baronius reports for the same year nn.25 & 50. The same indulgence was confirmed by Eugene III for the year 1145, as is reported by Otho of Frisingen De Gestis Francorum bk.1 ch.34, and extensively by Baronius for the same year, nn.30 and following.

15. Finally, a like indulgence was conceded by Gregory VIII in a certain epistle to all the Christian faithful, which is reported by Roger of England in his Annales and by William of Neuberg bk.3 Histor. Anglican. ch.20. The words of the concession are: "To those who with contrite heart and humble spirit have assumed the labor of this journey, and in penance for their sins and in right faith have died, we promise a full indulgence for their crimes and eternal life. But, whether they will survive or whether they will die, let them know that, for all their sins for which they have made a right confession, they will have, by the mercy of Almighty God and by the authority of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul and of us, a relaxing of the satisfaction imposed." And the same indulgence was confirmed by his successor Clement III, as Roger and Baronius report in their Annales. And William of Neuberg, ch.22, adds that Count Richard of Poitiers, son of the king of the English, was first of all the princes to take the cross of the Lord, and that afterwards the king his father together with the king of Gaul agreed on the same purpose, and promulgated throughout their kingdoms with their own letters the indulgence conceded by the Pope, and that it was afterwards approved and received in the English Council of many bishops.

16. If therefore now King James dares to condemn all indulgences of this sort, he is sufficiently confounded by the agreement of so many Pontiffs, Councils, kings, and of the whole Church, and by ancient tradition, besides the other things that on this point have been by us disputed in our own tractate vol.4 Disp. de Indulg. But if he makes accusation of the Pontiffs that they give the like remissions to those who dare by private authority to kill their kings, or that they stir them up to perpetrating the like crimes by the promise of indulgences, this is an accusation that is new and in the Roman Church unheard of but thought up by Protestants to bring hatred on the Pontiff. For the Roman Pontiffs, so far from promising indulgence for perpetrating crimes, have been accustomed rather, in the form of conceding an indulgence, to add the phrase “truly penitent and confessed,” or to append some equivalent one.

17. But in the other sense the king, in his condemnation, presses the celebrated question whether it is licit for any private man to kill his legitimate king who is ruling tyrannically and, in particular, is perverting religion and the Catholic faith. Which now to dispute would be prolix and foreign to our purpose. Therefore, along with Cardinal Bellarmine, we only respond, to begin with, that from the deeds of certain private persons, even if they were Catholic, is not rightly collected that such deeds are approved by the Church; for to collect doctrine from deeds, especially of a few people, is either an enormous fog of ignorance or a manifest calumny; since Christ himself said also of the Scribes and Pharisees, Matthew 23.3: “All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works.” Next we say that, not Catholics, but heretics, parents of Lutherans and Protestants, have taught that a king, not only because of heresy or tyranny, but also because of any mortal sin whatever, loses his kingship, and can be chastised at will by fellow citizens. Which doctrine was followed by John Hus; but the Catholic Church condemns it as heretical, as is clear from the Council of Constance sess.8 & 15, and has been elsewhere shown by us. Nay, in the same Council sess.15 a certain assertion submitted to it is reported: “Any tyrant whatever can and should licitly and meritoriously be killed by any vassal or subject whatever, even by means of secret ambushes, notwithstanding any oath made, and not waiting for any opinion or command, etc.” But this assertion is declared to be heretical, and he who stubbornly defends it is denounced by the Council as a heretic. Wrongly, then, does King James accuse the Roman Church or its Catholic doctors of bewitching or persuading by that doctrine a little brother or anyone else to kill his king with hope of eternal salvation. And these things are on this point for the present sufficient, for it will again come up in book 6.

18. In fourth place, after other insults against the Catholic Church, the king adds that the Roman Church must be very harshly punished because of its pride; which pride he says is explained in these words, v.7: “She saith in her heart: I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow.” And later he exaggerates this pride when he says: “For there is with them no more certain note of the true Church than success and external prosperity.” But, to begin with, as to what concerns the words of Scripture, it is certain that they are said of the city of the impious, or of pagan and proud Rome, which gloried that she sat as a queen, that is, because she ruled over many kingdoms and provinces, and was not a widow because she was married to the emperor and supreme lord of the nations; just as, on the contrary, Jeremiah weeps for Jerusalem because, Lamentations 1.1: “how is she become a widow...she that was princess among the nations.” When therefore is added, “and shall see no sorrow,” the error of the nations is indicated who thought Rome and her empire would be perpetual, on the evidence of Jerome in the said q.11 to Algas., where, among other things, he says that the name of blasphemy written on the forehead of the harlot in Revelation is ‘Rome Everlasting’. And in more or less this way is it expounded by the Fathers and doctors, and therefore the sport of the Protestants is ridiculous and impious. Above all since in the true Church of Christ it is not pride but faithful charity that professes she is the bride of Christ, since Paul says, Ephesians 5.25: “Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church.” And after explaining the similitude in these words, v.31: “For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife,” he adds, v.32: “This is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and the Church.” Hence since Christ is King of kings, what marvel that his bride should sit, Psalms 45.9,14: “the queen in gold of ophir...in raiment of needlework.” For not in herself but in the Lord, by reason of marriage, does she glory in so great dignity. And for the same reason, not from pride or vain presumption, does she not fear to see widowhood or grief, because she has heard from the bridegroom: “And the gates of hell shall not prevail against it,” and “Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.” Wherefore, if it be licit to use by accommodation the words of Scripture, much more justly might England fear that threat and those punishments, because she really says: “I sit a queen,” because I acknowledge no other spouse besides the temporal king, nor any other superior in spiritual or temporal things; “I am no widow,” because I have the supreme head and Vicar of Christ as my own and as spouse; “and shall see no sorrow,” because the spirit dictates that this is the true Church of Christ that will remain for ever with Christ, and will little by little overcome the Roman Church.

19. Lastly, what the king adds of himself, that there is with us no more certain note of the true Church than “success and external prosperity,” it contains two falsehoods. The first and clearest is seen in the comparison, for all Catholics with one consent hand on as the more principal and most certain notes of the Church, that it is “one, holy, Catholic, and Apostolic,” along with others that are in these, when rightly explained, tightly contained, as are to have legitimate succession from the primitive Church through a certain and indubitable connection with it in doctrine, in governance, and pastoral office, and especially in the chair of Peter. Again that it is founded on that rock through perpetual union and obedience with it. But other notes, that are multiplied by some Catholic doctors, are either reduced to these, or are not so much notes proper and certain, as very likely signs of the true Church.

20. The other false assertion is that “external prosperity” and “success” are absolutely and without any clarification or restriction numbered among the notes of the Church. For pious and wise men are not ignorant that temporal felicity is a thing indifferent; and that good success in these things is common to the bad and the good, to the faithful and infidel, to Catholics and heretics. Nor even are they ignorant that nothing is more proper to the Church of Christ than temporal afflictions and tribulations and persecutions; while, on the contrary, external peace and abundance of temporal things are wont to be granted more abundantly to the bad than to the good; either because they receive, for any good they do, those temporal goods in place of reward, or because they deserve, on account of their sins, that there be granted to them goods that God foresees will make them daily worse; or certainly, so that the good be made better, both by lacking those temporal goods that are wont to bring occasion of spiritual ruin, and by sustaining the annoyances of the impious who, elated by prosperity, afflict them.

21. Temporal prosperity, then, considered in itself, is not by us set down as a note of the true Church, because it is not a note of the true faith, nor of true sanctity. But because the Church of Christ, while it lives on earth, has need also of these temporal goods (as St. Augustine rightly said), therefore does Christ the Lord provide for it with special care, by his singular providence in lavishing, conserving, and defending these goods. And often by help extraordinary and plainly celestial he assists it in obtaining good success and in avoiding the opposite. And thus temporal prosperity, coming in this way to the Church or to princes, is reckoned by Catholics among the signs of the true faith and hence of the Catholic Church. And thus did Cardinal Bellarmine, bk.4 De Eccles. last chapter, put indeed temporal felicity in fifteenth and last place as inferior to the rest, but not without prudent and sufficient clarification, for he adds: "Temporal felicity divinely conferred on those who have defended the Church." And such are the examples he adduces, and in the same way do many other authors speak whom he himself refers to, and Bozius does so copiously in vol.2 De Signis Ecclesiae especially chs.20 and following.

22. In the remaining part of that discourse, which the king adjoins on chapters 19, 20, & 21, I find nothing worthy of note or pertinent to the cause besides what he says by the by in passing, whether that which is said in Revelation ch.20 about Gog and Magog "is to be taken of the Pope and the Turk or not, I leave to the judgment of others;" and he gives as reason: "Because they grew up to their greatness at more or less the same time." In which words he errs and sins in many ways. First against piety and also human courtesy when he numbers the Pope among the enemies of Christ and among the persecutors of the Church, and equates him with the Turk; wherein he not only shows how much he is degenerating from all pious and Catholic princes who have attended the Pope with supreme reverence and honor, as was sufficiently shown above, but he also clearly shows himself to be blabbing out similar words, not by weight of reason, but only by passion and hatred. For there is no agreement or comparison between Christ's Vicar, the parent of the faithful and master and defender of his faith, with an infidel tyrant, the most bitter persecutor of Christians. But those who are wise in their own eyes and are led by their own spirit easily say that darkness is light, and light darkness.

23. Next, he errs against the truth of history when he says that the Pope and the Turk grew up at the same time to their greatness. For if we speak of the magnitude of the Pope as to spiritual dignity and power, he never increased in it; for from the beginning it was whole and (so to say) in the highest grade in Peter, and the same has been derived without increase or diminution to the successors of Peter, looking, that is, at the very power in itself; for the use of it could have grown, just as the Church grew and impediments were taken away and greater occasions came along. And in this sense too can the Pope be said to have come to his greatness from the times of Constantine, for then his dignity began to be known to the whole world, and the emperor himself and other temporal princes began to subject their necks to him. Nay, also as to temporal domination he then more or less came to his greatness. But the empire of the Turk began after much time, for although the nation of the Turks, who were formerly called Gazari, is ancient, yet their sect and empire are much more recent; for also the impious Mahomet began after the six hundredth year of Christ, and the Turks did not begin to invade the Eastern Roman Empire until the times of Constantine called Copronymus and Iconoclast, and until the year one thousand, and they did not obtain even a hundredth part. Hence if the Turk be said then to have grown up to his greatness, as ought in truth to be said, it is altogether false that the Pope and the Turk reached their greatness at the same time. Now King James seems to have looked back to the beginning of Mahomet, because he appeared in the world a little after Boniface; however in this way too it is false either that at that time any greatness was added to the Pontificate, or that the nation of the Turks or their empire then began. Next, that accommodation about Gog and Magog has no likelihood, not only in the Pontiff, which is very evident, but even in the Turk as well; and therefore it should neither be called into doubt nor remitted to the judgment of others, as was touched on above, and as we will see in the following chapter.

Chapter 22: From the description of Antichrist in the prophet Daniel, the fable handed on about Roman antichristianism is refuted.

Summary: 1. The prophecies of Daniel are very little brought forward by King James. 2. In Daniel empires are shadowed forth by animals. Description of Antichrist. 3. By the ten horns of the fourth beast an equal number of kings in the Roman Empire are represented. 4. Whether this number is definite, or put for an indefinite one. 5. The Fathers think the number is definite. 6. The King of England explains the number. In this matter anyone is permitted to have an opinion. Ten and seven often indicate an indefinite number. 7. It is more certain that ten is put for a definite number. 8. The foundations of the King of England are overturned. 9. The number seven is here more distinctly handled. Antichrist is an instrument of the demon. 10. Two places in Revelation about the number seven are expounded. 11. The ten horns of the beast the King of England interprets of all the Christian kings from Boniface III. 12. About the little horn King James is altogether silent. What others have thought about it. 13. The opinions of the King of England are overturned by the words of the prophecy themselves. 14. The little horn will rise up after the Roman Empire has been divided. 15. Boniface III did not, as Daniel prophesied, erect a new empire. 16. King James inflicts a signal injury, not only on foreign kings, but also on English ones. 17. False interpretation given by the king to the words of Revelation. In the text of John, to be conquered is not to be converted but to be overthrown. 18. The ten kings are never going to wage war against Antichrist. To give in one's heart is to permit. Rome will not be the seat of Antichrist. 19. Description of Antichrist. He will arise from ignoble and indigent parents. 20. He will obtain the kingdom by cunning, not by heredity. He will get hold of power tyrannically. 21. He will misuse the sharpness of his mind for pride and ill speaking. 22. He will trample on religion, and will try to turn things sacred upside down. He will arrive near the Day of Judgment, not before. 23. The same notes of Antichrist are inculcated in other places by Daniel. What Daniel said of Antiochus rightly falls on Antichrist. 24. Antichrist will place himself in the temple as God. 25. Also belonging to him are the things foretold by Daniel of Seleucus and Epiphanes. 26. The individual words about them and about Antichrist are considered. Some seem to belong to Antichrist alone. The persecution of Antiochus against the Jews is an advance display of the persecution of Antichrist against the faithful. 27. Contempt of God in Antichrist.

Antichrist will not worship the gods of the nations, but he will perhaps in secret worship the demon. 28. Other prophecies of Daniel in chs. 11 & 12 about Antichrist. 29. From what has been said, it is clear that antichristianism in the Pontiffs is sheer imposture. The falsehood is from the comparison made more apparent. The expositions of Protestants are not only willful but also violent.

1. Although I read attentively the discourse of the King of England about Antichrist, and saw therein no mention about the prophet Daniel, save by a cursory and incidental assertion that John in Revelation imitated the modes of speaking of Daniel, Ezekiel, and the prophets, I greatly marveled and began to doubt whether the king believes that Daniel prophesied about Antichrist. The suspicion was increased by the fact he says, at the beginning of his disputation, that Paul very clearly explained what John in his visions obscurely handed on, and he passes over Daniel as if he did not pertain in any way to the cause, or as if he had foretold Antichrist neither obscurely nor clearly. But if it is thus perhaps true, and the king does not believe that Daniel prophesied about Antichrist, he must be asked why he believes it of John and denies it of Daniel? Because both spoke in enigmas and neither expressly laid down the name of Antichrist; and the visions of Daniel, by the judgment of all the Fathers and expositors, point to Antichrist less obscurely than those of John. Nay, Christ the Lord in Matthew 4 sufficiently indicates that Daniel spoke about Antichrist, and the same is the perpetual tradition of the Church. But if the king dare not deny this, I am amazed at why, in so prolix a disputation and so monstrous an accusation against the Pontiff, he has omitted the very grave testimony of so great a prophet! I suspect, therefore, that he passed over Daniel in silence because his descriptions about Antichrist not only could not, with any color, be twisted to confirm his own error but do rather refute them, and point not obscurely to the truth. For this cause, then, although we have used the testimonies of this prophet above to show that Antichrist will be an individual person and for how long a time he will reign, we have thought it worthwhile to collect from him a description of Antichrist, for he hands it on more copiously than others do, and through it is Antichrist more evidently distinguished, not only from the Pope, but also from all the others who have been falsely thought to be Antichrists.

2. First, then, in ch. 7, Daniel says that he saw four beasts, which signified four kingdoms of the world, as he himself declares, but that the four kingdoms, by the common consent and exposition of Catholics, were the empires of the Chaldeans, of the Persians, of the Greeks, and of the Romans, was briefly declared above in chapter 3. Now, setting aside the three first beasts or kingdoms, which quickly passed away, Daniel says about the fourth beast that, among other things, it had ten horns, and he subjoins, v. 8: "I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots; and behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things." By these, then, and the following words, that we will add later, we understand that Daniel described the person of Antichrist. Which, although it was above by the by and on occasion rather often pointed out, must here be expressly and wholly expounded, since, if all the properties that the prophet attributes to the little horn are collected together, the lie and imposture of the falsehood of Protestants about Roman antichristianism will be evidently refuted. However, we must suppose that the little horn represents Antichrist. Now it is first necessary to interpret the ten horns, but about the fourth beast nothing needs to be added to what Daniel himself has said, namely, that the fourth beast is, v.23: “the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces.” By which all Catholics understand the Roman Empire, setting aside the interpretations of Porphyry and the Hebrews, on whom can be seen St. Jerome and other expositors; for of this there is in the present work no controversy.

3. Again, about the ten horns Daniel declares that they represent ten future kings, and he indicates sufficiently that they will not be altogether distinct from that greatest kingdom signified by the fourth beast, nor in their lands and provinces outside the total sway of the Roman Empire, but they will be ten kings of the very same fourth kingdom; for thus he speaks, v.24: “And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings.” Hence all collect that the very same Roman kingdom, which before was one empire, is to be divided into ten kingdoms. Which was also signified in ch.2 of the same prophet by the ten toes where the statue ended.

4. Now about this number of ten horns there is doubt whether, just as Daniel saw precisely ten horns, and neither more nor fewer, there are by them in the same way signified ten kings in the same definite and precise number, or indefinitely a multitude of kings among whom the Roman Empire was to be divided. Which question is touched on by Augustine bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.23, and he thinks it uncertain whether the number ten signifies a whole multitude of future kings in the Roman Empire before Antichrist comes, or rather points to precisely ten kings. Propser too in Dimidio Temporis ch.8, although he does not move a question about the number, nevertheless doubts whether by those ten kings be understood “kings more ferocious who existed in the Christian religion.” Aretas also ch.36 on Revelation says generally that the ten horns signify that “the consummation of things that contribute to malice turns out to be antichristian,” where he indicates an indefinite number, although he reports another opinion when he says: “But about these too some have said that then the world is going to be divided into ten kingdoms.” And to this opinion Pereira seems to incline in bk.2 on Daniel, where by the ten toes of the statue he says is signified that “the Roman Empire is going at the end to be divided into many kingdoms and many kings, among whom some will be stronger, some weaker, and therefore the toes were partly of iron, partly of clay.” And in the same place he says that by the ten horns in ch.7 are signified “many kings.” And the same in bk.8, treating of the opinion of Augustine, speaks under disjunction saying that it cannot be denied but that when Antichrist comes there will be in the Roman world “ten kings or many kings.”

5. However the Fathers jointly, not raising any doubt or question, say simply that the ten horns signify ten kings, as far as Daniel interprets them, and that they will be in the Roman world at the time of the advent of Antichrist. Thus does Irenaeus speak bk.5 ch.25, and in ch.26 he more fully expounds in the same sense the ten toes of the statue in Daniel 2 and the ten horns of the beast in Revelation chs.13 & 17; and although he does not expressly make it clear, yet he always speaks of a definite and precise number. Hippolytus too, in orat. De Consummat. Mundi says only that the ten horns seen by Daniel are ten kings, and that the same are signified in the ten toes of the statue; and in the same way does Cyril of Jerusalem speak, Catechesis ch.15, Lactantius bk.7 ch.16, Tertullian De Resurrect. Carnis chs.24 & 25, and of the same opinion are Jerome and Theodoret on Daniel 7 and 2, when they understand that by the ten horns of the beast, wherever in Daniel and Revelation there is mention of them, signify ten kingdoms into which the Roman Empire will be divided. Andreas too agrees, chs.36 & 53 on Revelation, who says, among other things, that “by the ten horns is signified the division of the earthly kingdom into ten parts.” Which is also touched on by Aretas ch.54 who, when making reference only by the name of ‘others’, thus says: “they say.” And this opinion is commonly followed by modern expositors and doctors; and one of them, sufficiently learned, affirms it with so much emphasis that he says it is so manifest those ten kings must be understood to be neither more nor fewer than he is greatly amazed St. Augustine could have been in doubt on the point. Nay he says: “When one has considered so great consent of the Fathers, he who would dare to stand opposed or gape will be putting on far too bold a face.”

6. And nevertheless the King of England in his Preface p.120, treating of the place in Revelation 17, says the number ten is there taken for an indefinite number; and he uses the argument that John is there alluding to this place of Daniel, as if supposing it rather certain that Daniel took the ten for an indefinite number. He adds another argument too, how the number of seven heads and ten horns of the dragon or the devil cannot otherwise be understood except as declaring an indefinite number. But I, to begin with, do not judge that this controversy pertains to the dogmas of the faith, but is a thing that lies in opinion. For the Fathers alleged for the second opinion do not hand it on as certain; nay, neither do they put much force on the precise and proper number ten, but on the division of the empire into several kingdoms, and they use that number because Scripture so speaks. Now it is clear that the number ten is one of those that is in Sacred Scripture taken for a large or whole multitude. Hence, when the authority of Augustine and the doubt of others are added, he who doubts in that place about the signification of the number ten does not seem able to be condemned or judged rash or daring. Especially because about the number of the seven heads, both in this place of Daniel and in that of Revelation ch.13, many doubt whether it signifies a definite number or some community or collection of impious kings, as we saw above in chapter 4. Hence in this place Daniel says that three horns were rooted up before the face of the little horn, although he understand it precisely of three kings, because the number three is not wont to be taken in any indefinite signification, nor is it there necessary, nevertheless by the seven other kings, who are to be subjected to or confederated with Antichrist, all the others who will exist at that time could be understood, whether they be fewer or more, because the number seven is among the mystical ones that are wont to signify universality; and not without authority or without any apparent occasion is such a signification there assumed, so that the prophecy may be more easily understood and fulfilled.

7. For these reasons, then, I do not think the certitude of the second opinion should be exaggerated too much, although I consider it should be preferred and is simply true. First, because of the testimonies of Scripture, because not in one or another place but in many, both in Revelation and in Daniel, when the division of the Roman Empire into many kingdoms is under this figure foretold, it is done under the number ten. Second, because there is no necessity for metaphor or impropriety in the term, since nothing prevents those future kingdoms from being ten and not more; and multiplication could as easily happen in that number as in any other. Especially because, although perhaps more small kingdoms, or lesser principalities, could at that time exist in the Roman world, nevertheless all could be reduced to ten principle kingdoms and heads, as it were. Thus, therefore, can that number ten easily be taken properly and precisely, nor is it necessary to have recourse to indefinite numbers. Third, because of the more common consent of the Fathers.

8. Nor is the first conjecture of the King of England of any moment, but it should be turned into the contrary; for because John is alluding to this place of Daniel, and because in this place the number ten is more probably being taken properly, therefore the judgment should be the same in the places of Revelation. But to the other argument, which he takes from comparison with the number of seven heads and ten horns attributed to the dragon or the demon, saying that it cannot be understood otherwise than about a definite number put for an indefinite, we reply by denying the assumption. And since he himself does not designate the place of which he is speaking, we must run through the three places where John makes mention of that number, namely in chs. 12, 13, & 17.

9. And indeed we admit that in ch. 12 the number is attributed to the demon; for John plainly says, v. 3: "And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns." And yet even in that place we say that the heads and the ten horns are the same as in ch. 13 and in Daniel ch. 7. For although the discussion is there about the demon and in other places about Antichrist, the organs and members or instruments of each are those heads and horns, that is, the ten kings, three of whom Antichrist will destroy and seven will serve him, for the demon and Antichrist will be very closely joined, not indeed by hypostatic union, as some have imagined, but by moral influence and motion. For Antichrist will, while he lives, be totally possessed, moved, and governed by the demon; and thus he will be the chief member and as it were the conjunct organ wherewith the demon will move the rest to the same end and the same effects. And therefore those ten horns and seven heads are attributed both to the demon and to Antichrist; to the demon as principal but more remote agent in that order; to Antichrist as to the more proximate but, if compared with the demon, less principal agent. Although, in respect of other men, Antichrist can also be said to be principal cause, hence he is by the saints and theologians also called the head of the wicked, of all of them indeed by excess and abundance of malice, but of those whom he will subjugate in his own time, and whom he will use as instruments, by influence and motion as well.

10. But the second place is Revelation ch. 13, and there the discussion is not of the dragon but of the beast to whom, v. 2, "the dragon gave his power," that is, of Antichrist, and so there too one should not explain the definite number with an indefinite. The third place is Revelation ch. 17, where the beast can indeed represent the demon, and then the same must be said as we said about ch. 12. Either it can signify the Roman Empire, as was also seen above, and then are those same ten kings, on whom the Roman Empire stands, represented, as the same John expounded, and thus there as well the same number is definite. And about the number of the seven heads we showed above in chapter 5 that it signifies, not an indefinite, but a definite number. Which the King of England also admits, since he says that the seven heads are seven regimes of the Roman City, and neither more nor fewer; whence one can retort with an argument ad hominem that the same should be said of the number ten.

11. Before passing on, however, to the eleventh little horn, we must here briefly consider the new and remarkable interpretation of those ten kings that the King of England has provided for us. For he says that those kings are all the Christian kings who, from the time of the decline of the Roman Empire, marched under obedience to the Roman Pontiff, and about them he expounds the words of Revelation 17.12: "And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast," "because," he says, "the more illustrious kingdoms of the Christian world did not lay claim to their liberty until the pagan Roman Empire was collapsing." Hence he infers that those kings began at the same time as Antichrist inaugurated his kingdom, that is, at the time of Boniface III, as he himself expounded earlier. And of these kings he says that they persevered for a long time in one mind, "worshipping the beast, kissing its feet, conceding it all power and authority, drinking down together with it the chalice of idolatry, making war with the lamb in persecution of the saints at the command of it which ruled over so many nations and peoples." But as to what John. after the words, v.14, "these shall make war with the lamb," subjoins, "and the lamb shall overcome them," he expounds by saying, "through our conversion after we shall finally at some point hate the whore," that is, Rome, "and leave her desolate and naked, etc." "Next," he says, "he (namely the angel or John) subjoins a reason for this very sudden change in us, when he says, v.17: 'For God hath put in their hearts to fulfill his will...and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled.'" This is the interpretation of the king about the ten kings in Revelation; and since he himself says that John is alluding to the words of Daniel, he indicates that he thinks the same about the ten horns in Daniel.

12. But before we reject this interpretation, we must explain what is to be understood by the little horn. About which we cannot affirm what the King of England thinks, because he makes no mention of it in his disputation; but, as I said at the beginning of the chapter, what is deserving of wonder and generates suspicion is that he does not believe the horn represents Antichrist. But if perchance this is so, who then, I ask, is the horn? Or why is it separately and individually numbered? Especially since the king says that the number ten does not signify a definite number, but is put for an indefinite one, wherein is also included that eleventh king represented by the little horn. What, to be sure, the king could reply that would be likely or satisfy the prudent does not easily come to mind. I know, indeed, that Porphyry said that the horn represented Antiochus, nor are there lacking others who thought it signified Mahomet or the Turk. However, Jerome refutes Porphyry because Antiochus preceded the Roman Empire and drew an illustrious origin from Alexander the Great and from the empire of the Macedonians, and he was born king or prince; but the horn is foretold to be after the Roman Empire and its division, and is said to be little because of its humble beginning and rise. The other opinions, indeed, can also be easily refuted, because the properties are not in those kingdoms found which are there attributed to the horn, as I touched on above in chapter 2, and as the reader will be able easily to understand from what is to be said; for now it is not necessary to delay over them.

Let it be certain and fixed, then, that the little horn represents Antichrist; for, when all the places of Scripture have been considered, as well as the prediction of Christ about the great tribulation of the Church that will happen just before the judgment, in no one else can all the properties there predicted by Daniel and attributed to that horn be found save in Antichrist. And thus in affirming this opinion do all the Fathers and expositors agree, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory, whom I referred to above in chapter 2, Athanasius epist. Ad Solitar. Vitam Agentes near the end, Justin Against Trypho a little from the beginning, Origen bk.6 Contra Celsum near the middle, Cyril of Jerusalem Catechesis 15, Irenaeus bk.5 Contra Haereses chs.25 & 26, Theodoret orat.7 on Daniel, Prosper in Dimidium Temporis ch.8, Ruffinus in Exposit. Symbol. on the article about the coming to judgment, and the rest of the expositors both of Daniel and of Revelation and of Paul 2 Thessalonians 2, where Chrysostom is very good.

13. Hence, therefore, we collect, to begin with, that the interpretation the king hands on about the ten horns is false, namely, that they are all the kingdoms of the Christian world that from the time of the Emperor Phocas up to Luther, or up to Henry VIII King of England, gave obedience to the Roman Pontiff. For the ten kings whom Daniel mentions never gave obedience to Antichrist, or to the little horn, but rather, as soon as the horn rose up, three of the ten horns, v.8, “were plucked up by the roots,” because, as is said later, v.24, “he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings.” Where clearly the prophet is speaking of temporal power and of usurpation of three kingdoms by wars and other like force. Hence all the Fathers and expositors add that, when the three kings have been vanquished, the remaining seven will give their hands to Antichrist and will be, by force and fear rather than of their own accord, allied to him as inferiors and subjects. But no Pontiff, whether Boniface III or anybody else, overcame three kings in war, nor were any others subjected to him in terror against their will and by war or power or the victories of the Pope, but were drawn to him by faith and divine calling; therefore the things said about the ten horns and about the little eleventh one cannot be accommodated to Christian kings and the Roman Pontiff. For the reason most of all that the three kings whom the little horn will vanquish are the kings of Ethiopia, Egypt, and Libya or Africa, as is the common tradition of the Fathers, whom I have often referred to, taken from Daniel 11 as it is there expounded by Jerome, Theodoret, and others. But the Supreme Pontiffs never waged war in Egypt or Ethiopia, nor desired to dominate those kingdoms.

14. In addition, it is clear from the vision of Daniel that, before the rise of the little horn, the fourth beast, that is the Roman Empire, will be torn apart into ten kingdoms; for the angel expressly says to Daniel, v.24: “And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; and another shall arise after them.” Those ten kings, then, will be of the same Roman kingdom; therefore a division will first be made among them before the little horn arises. And the Roman Pontificate, even as to the state which it had under Boniface III, began before so great a decline or division of the Roman Empire; for at that time the Roman Empire was still enduring under one emperor, Phocas, and it endured for a long time afterwards, at any rate up to the division of the empire into West and East. And although there were then many impious kings in the earth, they had not yet altogether thrown off the yoke of the empire or had obtained supreme power. So neither were they the ten kings of whom John is speaking, nor could the little horn be Boniface III or any like successor to him.

15. Besides, not only do the actual events not agree with the words and vision of the prophet, but the truth of the thing is opposed. Because Boniface set up no kingdom as is predicted of the little horn by Daniel, nor did he receive or usurp any new power or jurisdiction; nay neither a new name or title, as has been often said. Therefore, although his personal rise or election to dignity was after the kings, yet the Pope, or the Pontifical throne, about which heretics are most of all speaking, could not be said to have arisen after the division of the empire into ten kingdoms, nay nor after any decline in it. For in truth it began with the empire itself, and it began to have external splendor and majesty while the empire was still flourishing under Constantine; but in external or temporal dominion it grew a little, and had various vicissitudes over time. Therefore in no way can be said of it that it came after the ten kings, or after all the kings among whom the Roman Empire was divided or must be divided. And hence neither can those ten kings be the Catholic or Christian kings who have hitherto marched under obedience to the Vicar of Christ.

16. All the other things, indeed, that the King of England, after his interpretation of the ten kings, adds to his exposition of the other words of John display so much absurdity that they do not need refutation. For, to begin with, he inflicts great injury, not only on the rest of the illustrious Christian kingdoms and on their kings, but also on his own kingdom and his own progenitors, when he calls all of them up to Henry VIII enemies of Christ for “making war with the lamb” and “persecuting the faith” and “persecuting the saints” and “cultivating idols, drinking down the chalice of idolatry along with the beast.” For what war have so many holy kings and Catholic princes raised up against Christ? Or which saints have they persecuted, or which idols have they worshipped? Certainly if to venerate the Pontiff, Vicar of Christ, was to persecute Christ, this did Constantine do, and the other pious and Catholic emperors and kings. If to repress the rashness and obstinacy of heretics is to persecute the saints, this did the ancient pastors of the Church, aided by the power of the Christian emperors, from the times of Augustine and other holy Fathers. Finally, if to venerate images or to use them with reverence is the cult of idols, this did all Christians from the beginning of the Church. Therefore, let him either make all the Catholic princes who were in the Church after Constantine, nay all the holy Pontiffs too, into antichristians, or let him cease to insult the later ones who were in it from the time of Boniface.

17. Besides, the interpretation of the words, v.14, “and the lamb shall overcome them,” that ‘to overcome’ is ‘to convert’ them so that they rise up against the Pope and the Roman City, is clearly repugnant to the propriety of the words and to the context of John when he says, about the ten kings, v.13: “These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast.” For three of them, conquered and overcome by Antichrist, will transfer all their power to him, not voluntarily, but compelled by necessity, while the others, fearing his power, will help him and serve his counsels. And thus all will rise against Christ, as is subjoined, v.14: “These shall make war with the lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them,” not only the ten kings but also Antichrist himself, the principal enemy and leader in the battle. He will not, then, overcome by converting, but by fighting and by killing, and by properly and truly conquering them, “for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings;” and this is made more clear by the words that follow, “and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful,” that is, those who will then exist will also conquer them or be partakers in the victory. Therefore, those kings who will be conquered will not be called, or chosen, or faithful; therefore ‘to be overcome’ is not ‘to be converted’ but ‘to be destroyed’. And this is also confirmed by the same John in ch.16 where he says that three evil spirits will, v.14, “gather the kings of the earth to the battle of that great day of God Almighty,” that is, the day on which God will show his power against them, conquering and overcoming them in miraculous fashion, as the same John describes in ch.21. For without doubt this battle of the great day of God Almighty is nothing but the battle of Gog and Magog, of which he treats in the same ch.21, as the better interpreters have understood it. Lastly, we will from the places of Daniel a little later confirm that this is the true sense of that prophecy and of the victory to be achieved by Christ.

18. Hence it is clear too that it is altogether false that those ten kings are to be converted by God to be against Antichrist, or that they will fight against him and will conquer him and his seat, and will pursue his royal city with so much hatred that they will deliver it to the fire and totally overthrow it. For this is repugnant to the express words of John cited a little before, v.13: "These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast." For from the following words too, which we have expounded, is clearly collected that they will persevere in that state until they fight against Christ and are overcome by him; never, therefore, will they fight against Antichrist, nor overcome him.

Nay in those same words, which the king twists, is this clearly contained. For he says, v.17: "For God hath put it in their hearts," that is, of the kings, "to give their kingdom to the beast," that is, to Antichrist, "until the words of God shall be fulfilled," that is, are brought to completion, which were foretold about the destruction of Babylon and about the death of Antichrist himself. But God is said to have put it into the hearts of the kings, not by inspiring or suggesting, but (according to the mode of speaking of Scripture) by permitting, and by using their malice for the execution of his providence. In this way, then, will God permit those kings, perhaps previously Catholic but corrupt and wicked, to be joined to Antichrist, and to devote to him their favor and power, and thus to hand over to him their kingdoms, and make them tributary to fate, until the prophecies about Antichrist are fulfilled. The confederacy, then, will endure up to the end; never, then, will those kings rise up against Antichrist or his kingdom. Wherefore, if the "Babylon" and "whore" and "great city" which those kings will hate and "shall make desolate and naked" is Rome, assuredly is there thence rather drawn a proof that Rome will never be the royal seat of Antichrist and that the assailants against Rome will not be the enemies but the friends of Antichrist. When, therefore, the King of England numbers himself among those kings, saying "we hold the whore in hatred," he is numbering himself among the allies and supporters of Antichrist; let him see and consider, then, what the fruit is that follows from those his interpretations.

19. With the interpretation, then, of the ten horns thus exploded, and with the supposition that for certain they represent ten kings who will be at the time of Antichrist and will hand over, in the way explained, their power to him, it is more evident too that the little horn is Antichrist, as the Church has always understood. It remains, then, for us briefly to see how the prophet describes the little horn. For first must be weighed the property indicated in the word 'little', for it is set down to signify that Antichrist is to arise from the most vile beginnings and from the most abject parents and from an infamous nation, for not without mystery is that word added, as all have understood. And it is, in the other words immediately added, made more clear, since about the same little horn is said, Daniel 16.8: "there came up among them;" for it is signified there, as I noted above, that he will not arise from one of those kings but in their lands will appear.

20. Hence a second property can be noted, namely, that he will not have a kingdom by hereditary right; but from small beginnings, by various arts and impostures and tricks of the demon, he is in a short time so to grow in strength that "before him there were three of the first horns plucked up," that is, that in a brief time "he shall subdue three kings” and his look “was more stout than this fellows,” as is said in the same place, vv.24, 20, and as Theodoret rightly expounded when he said: “Because he saw the horn being born, he called it small as having proceeded from the little nation of the Jews, and as obtaining in the meantime an obscure kingdom, but, after he has plucked up three kings, he rightly calls him greater than the rest.” Again, the third property I collect from the same words, namely that he will be first and chiefly a tyrant, who will begin his kingdom first with industry and corrupt arts, afterwards he will increase through power and wars, overcoming three kings and depriving them of their kingdoms, and subjecting the rest to himself, or joining them to himself as inferiors and weaker, as is made more clear by John in Revelation.

21. The fourth property can be taken from the words, v.8: “and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things.” Where, by eyes of man, Theodoret understands to be signified interior mind and judgment, and that the eyes of man are attributed to Antichrist because he will be very astute and will govern with human prudence. Others expound it more simply in this way. Although he is going to have the face of a man, because he will be a true man, he will not speak as a man but as a most proud demon; because John elsewhere said, Revelation 13.11: “he spake as a dragon.” For he is said to speak “great things,” or grand things, both because he will bear himself in great pride, and also because he will speak forth blasphemies against God; for as is immediately subjoined, Daniel 7.25: “he shall speak great words against the most High,” for both are properly signified in those words, and one is the consequent of the other. For he will with incredible arrogance proclaim himself to be God (as we noted from Paul), and so he will direct himself against the most high God and speak against him.

22. The fifth property is taken from the words, v.25: “he shall wear out the saints of the most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time.” Which words are about the persecution of Antichrist and the time of its duration, which were expounded above as occasion demanded. Now to be noted are only the words: “he shall...think to change times and laws.” Wherein is declared that the persecution will not only be temporal and political because of temporal domination, but at the same time, and most of all, spiritual, for he will try “to change times,” that is (as Jerome says), ceremonies, feast days, or certainly the whole Religion that has for a long time been established in the world and been rooted in the hearts of men, “and laws,” that is, both divine and human. Nor will he himself profess any of the ancient religions or laws, but will introduce a new one, believing that he can change laws and times. And the same notes of Antichrist does Athanasius in the said epist. Ad Solitar. Vitam Agent. collect when he says: “Does not Daniel’s vision in these notes surely signify Antichrist? Namely, because he will make war with the saints, and shall prevail against them, because in malice he will surpass all who were before him, and because he will subdue three kings, and will speak words against the most High, and because he will plan to change the articles of both times and laws.” The sixth property can be collected from the following words, vv.26-27: “But judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end. And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High, etc.” For in these words is put as note of Antichrist that he will arrive near the times of judgment, and that only by the coming of the supreme king Christ will his kingdom be consumed and he himself be killed. Which property, as pertaining to the times of Antichrist, we explained above, and it is pointed out there by Jerome, Theodoret, and other interpreters.

23. Now these properties of Antichrist the same prophet in the following chapters partly confirms and clarifies further, partly also increases them. For in ch.8, after he has reported the vision of the ram, the he goat, and has declared them of Darius the king of the Persians and of Alexander the Great king of the Greeks, he finally at the end puts forward certain things that, although they are literally understood about Antiochus, who descended from the Greek kings that succeeded Alexander and much vexed the Jews, have been by many Fathers understood to be in his person said of Antichrist. Especially Irenaeus bk.5 Contra Haereres ch.25, and Origen bk.6 Contra Celsum near the middle, and Gregory bk.32 Moralia ch.12, elsewhere 14. And in truth the words of the prophet so properly square with Antichrist and are so consonant with the things that are in other places said of Antichrist, that they seem to be said of Antiochus chiefly because of him. For his beginning is foretold in these words, v.9: “And out of one of them came forth a little horn,” and again, v.23: “a king of fierce countenance...shall stand up,” where his morals are also noted. But about his progress it is added, v.9: “which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, etc.” Of his state is said, v.10: “he waxed great, even to the host of heaven.” Now his astuteness and arts, by which he will rise, are signified in these words, v.23: “understanding dark sentences,” and again in these, v.24: “And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power,” that is, not power of himself but of the demon, God permitting it. Now of his wars and cruelty it is said: “and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice.” Next, his pride and battle against God is thus described, v.11: “Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down.” And again, v.25: “he shall magnify himself in his heart...he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes.” And then about the persecution of the saints it is said, v.10: “it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them.” And again, vv.24-25: “he shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper.” And lastly about his end is it said, v.25: “he shall be broken without hand,” which sufficiently accords with the words of Paul, 2 Thessalonians 2.8: “whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth.”

Although, therefore, these things were truly and literally fulfilled in their own way of Antiochus, yet they are believed to have been said by antonomasia of Antichrist; for in him are they all with greater fullness and excess found as if in the head of Antiochus himself and of evil men. Now from all these things are the six properties noted above chiefly made clear. And there is only added another about the mode of his being killed, which can be the seventh. For the eighth can be taken from ch.9 of the same prophet in almost its last words, v.27: “for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate;” for although it is in other ways expounded both there and in Matthew 24, nevertheless it is very probable that it is also understood of Antichrist, as Irenaeus wished bk.5 ch.25, at least in a secondary or mystical sense. For the literal discussion is not there of Antichrist, but of the destruction of Jerusalem done by Titus, as is clear; however the words agree much more with Antichrist, according to what we said when expounding the words of Paul and of Revelation. The eighth property, then, is that he will make himself God and will sit in the temple so that he is worshipped, and he will place his image, and through it too will he be worshipped as God, as is said in Revelation. And this will be further confirmed from the following testimony.

25. For there is another similar place in the same prophet ch.11, from the words, v.21: "And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honor of the kingdom; but he shall come in peaceably [alt. secretly], and obtain the kingdom by flatteries [alt. fraud]." For in the whole first part of the chapter Daniel had prophesied about the kings of the Persians and the Greeks, and more at large about the successors of Alexander, and especially about the kings of Syria and Egypt, whom he calls the kings of the south and of the north, and eventually he comes (as Jerome deduces) to Seleucus Philopator, the son of Antiochus the Great, whom he calls, v.20, "a most vile person, and unworthy of the royal honor [alt. a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom]," and about him he subjoins, "within a few days he shall be destroyed." And at once he adds the words, "And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, etc." Which words, according to the context of the letter and the sequence of the prophecy and of history, are without doubt understood of Antiochus Epiphanes, a most impious king, brother of Seleucus, who vehemently harassed the people of God, as is clear from the books of the Maccabees; and almost all that follows in that chapter is said literally of him, as Jerome admits there, and Theodoret and others, and it is taken from Chrysostom orat.2 Contra Iudaeos. Yet, nevertheless, the same Jerome, Theodoret, and other expositors there, and Gregory in bk.32 Moralia ch.11, and Prosper in Dimidio Temporis ch.9 understand many of those words to be said of Antichrist, because they very much befit him, and because Antiochus in many things was a type of Antichrist.

26. By those words, then, which we have reported, is confirmed and explained what is said in other places about the beginnings of Antichrist. For he is said to be "a vile person" just as he is said to be "a little horn," because he has a vile and despised origin, and therefore at the beginning "they shall not give to him the honor of the kingdom," because he will not originate from kings, nor will he obtain the kingdom by hereditary right, but "shall come in secretly, and obtain the kingdom by fraud;" because he will be cunning and will understand "dark sentences." But in the following words Daniel does indeed describe the wars and victories of Antiochus, when he says, v.24: "he shall enter...upon the fattest places of the province, etc." But under their figure are predicted the battles and crimes of Antichrist, and therefore sometimes they are so exaggerated that only with Antichrist do they seem able to agree. Such is the remark, v.24: "he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers;" which things Jerome notes are not properly accommodated to Antiochus, because he did not in kingdom and riches exceed all his predecessors. They are set down, then, because of Antichrist, who will obtain a much fuller power and monarchy than Antiochus obtained. But afterwards the prophet describes the persecution of Antiochus against the Jews, depicting also in figure the persecution under Antichrist of the Church, to whom do most agree the words, "he shall forecast his devices," namely his counsels, "against the strong holds," and will arm power against the strong thoughts of the holy faithful, as the Fathers expound; hence it is said later, v.28: "his heart shall be against the holy covenant, and he shall do exploits." And later, v.31: "they shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate." All which things Antiochus did in his way; but just as everything in figure happened to the Jews, so were they a shadow in respect of the truth that will be in Antichrist.

27. But afterwards most properly are about the pride and blasphemies of Antichrist the words, v.36: “And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods, etc.” And later, v.37: “Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers...nor regard any god; for he shall magnify himself above all.” By which words is very well explained what we treated of above, where it is said of the little horn that it had a mouth speaking great things. Again, what we said about the words of Paul, that he will show himself as God, usurping the true place and worship of God. Hence the Fathers collect from this place that Antichrist will demolish the idols of the nations and will not worship the gods of the nations. From which Jerome also notes that these words so agree with Antichrist that they cannot be understood of Antiochus, who was an idolater, and compelled the Hebrews to worship the gods of the nations, as is narrated in the books of the Maccabees. This, then, can be the ninth property of Antichrist, namely that he will not be a worshipper of idols, which is to be understood to mean in public or of the ancient gods of the nations. For Daniel at once adds, v.38, that he will honor the God ‘Maozim’ [“God of forces”], about which there is much controversy and various expositions as to who he will be, but these are not important for the present. And it seems more probable that Antichrist will have some secret place in which he will secretly worship the demon, his helper, under some image or idol, as I treated of in vol.2 part.3 disp.54 art.4; where I did not say, as some have imposed on me, that perhaps those words are to be understood only of Antiochus, but I reported this opinion in first place, and then I preferred the common opinion, that of Jerome and of Theodoret, and I confirmed it with the argument of Jerome, which I have also touched on in the present place, and it is a very strong one.

28. Next, in the remaining part of the chapter the prophet foretells the battles and victories of Antichrist, and in particular how he will conquer the three kings of Egypt, Africa or Libya, and Ethiopia, and will seize their kingdoms. But afterwards he will come with great power to Jerusalem, to war against it, vv.44-45: “he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many. And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain,” which Jerome and others expound of Mt. Zion or Mt. Olivet. And finally about his death is subjoined: “yet shall he come to his end, and none shall help him,” because, that is, 2 Thessalonians 2.8, “the Lord shall consume him with the spirit of his mouth,” or with his empire, and, Daniel 8.25, “without hand;” for the Lord will command the earth to be opened so as to devour him, and he will be cast alive into hell, as is said in Revelation 19.20. But a little later in ch.12 Daniel declares how long a time the persecution of Antichrist will last, how shortly after his death there will be the judgment and universal resurrection, as Augustine expounded in bk.20 De Civitate Dei ch.23, and as was fully expounded above. And these, more or less, are the notes and signs of Antichrist wherewith Daniel has described Antichrist for us, which are pursued more extensively by Jerome and Theodoret and, among the moderns, by Pereira bks.8 & 14 on Daniel, and by Malvenda here and there in his learned books on Antichrist.

29. Let all, then, who have faith in the Scriptures, compare these properties and notes of Antichrist with those that are manifest to the whole world about the Roman Pontiff, and they will be able to see clearer than light how great was the impudence, and the horrendous rashness, or rather insanity of the heretics who have dared to dishonor the venerable Apostolic See with such incredible infamy, and how great is the blindness of those who allow themselves to be tricked by their trifling and inane thoughts. For Antichrist's beginnings will be abject and obscure, not only in race and origin (for that is not much to be concerned about), but in kingdom and power. But the origin of the Roman See cannot be conceived, as to its very dignity, to be higher, for it was founded by Christ himself and has thence flowed by legitimate succession to individual persons, even the persons of Boniface and those after him. Next, Antichrist's kingdom will be by him begun through false arts and tyranny; but the kingdom of the Pontiff had no chief beginning after Christ, but had succession, not by fraud or tyranny but by legitimate election. Add to these that Antichrist's kingdom will be temporal, will begin through fraud, and will be expanded by wars and slaughter of enemies; but the primacy of the Pontiff is spiritual and, as to its dignity considered in itself, is always the same, and although it has, as to subjection of peoples, increased, yet not by corporeal wars, but by the word of God and the faith of believers. By which faith, as it has at one time been expanded, so by the infidelity of some it has in some places been diminished, although by the grace of God it always grows elsewhere. I pass over the rest that pertains to morals, times, seats, and ends, for we have above sufficiently compared them among themselves, and shown that they are not only diverse but even altogether opposite. And now we wish only to note, and to draw attention to, how great is in all these things the consonance and concord of the Scriptures, so that it is thence too apparent how violent to the visions of Revelation are the accommodations of Protestants; since these are not only willful and without precedent and contrary to the propriety of the words and against the truth of things, but they are also contrary to other clearer places of the Scriptures, by which, according to the prudent rule for interpreting Scripture, the more obscure places should be understood.

Sum of the things treated of in this book with an appeal to the King of England
Summary. 30. Sum of the whole book in more or less each chapter. 31. Heretics a type of Antichrist. 32. Appeal to the King of England.

30. Although the matter and argument of this book seem to contain nothing but calumny, or certainly rather horrendous blasphemy, and so to many of the prudent it could seem perhaps better to omit them than, with offense to pious ears, to bring a thing so incredible to the question; nevertheless we have judged that this our labor will neither be vain nor be of much offence to pious ears. For since the most serene King of England, in his discourse on Antichrist, seems to put such confidence in his conjectures that he boldly demands, as a thing arduous for us or indeed impossible, a response through the individual parts of his disputation to them, it has seemed, not only useful, but also necessary both to respond to them individually and also to show that everything objected has been without solid foundation thought out, and does not even deserve the name of conjecture. So much so that it is certainly to be wondered at, in a thing of such great moment that the hinge of eternal salvation turns on it, that prudent men could be carried off by such slight allusions or allegories.

For this cause, therefore, did we set down first a foundation about the person of Antichrist, and we demonstrated from the words, order, and concord of the Scriptures, and also from the common consent of the Fathers, that he will be a certain individual man. Next, by running through the individual parts proposed by the king, we have from the same principles shown that, to begin with, his time has not yet come, and that the persecution, such as was not from the beginning, which is to be launched by him, has not yet begun, and that the witnesses to be sent against him have yet to appear. But afterwards we proved that his seat neither is nor ever will be at Rome. And lastly we have, from the properties foretold at large about him by the prophets and Apostles, considered the person of Antichrist, and how he will through incredible tyranny, and deceptive arts, and lying signs, and huge battles, ascend from the lowest beginnings to the monarchy of the world, and next that he will come to it in such great arrogance and pride that he will be exalted above all that is called God; we have so described him that it is very evident that no mortal man, much less the Roman Pontiff, has hitherto been so wicked and abominable.

31. But if some image of him is in any part of the earth to be thought of, we have shown that he is not certainly to be thought of in the holy Roman See, but in the chairs of heresiarchs, or on the royal thrones of pagans and schimastics who persecute the Roman Church. Just as Jerome called Antiochus and Nero Antichrist, Damascene Mahomet, Irenaeus the Marcionites and similar heretics, Cyprian all the adversaries of Christ. For none save some among these Antichrists and enemies of Christ has transferred such a name or such a calumny to the Roman Pontiff. Nor has it been able to arise in the thinking of him who, along with Augustine and other Fathers, has considered with attentive mind the plainly divine origin of that See, and its happy progress, and admirable stability.

32. It remains, most serene king, that, setting aside all perturbation of spirit, you should think over with attentive mind the force of the reasons and the weight of the authority, and should reflect how many absurdities do from a free study of Scripture proceed; considering at the same time the very grave words of St. Jerome who, when disputing with Porphyry on Daniel 11, thus concluded: "This therefore have I in more prolix manner set down, that I might show the difficulty of Sacred Scripture, whose understanding none claim without the grace of God and the doctrine of our elders for themselves save even especially the most unskilled."

BOOK SIX

CONTENTS

BOOK 6: ON THE OATH OF FIDELITY OF THE KING OF ENGLAND.

Chapter 1: What is the target of the present controversy, and the state of the cause, and what method of disputation must be observed in it.

Summary: 1. Various kinds of oath of fidelity. 2. Catholic dogma is that an oath of fidelity in respect of civil obedience is licit. 3. Several Councils have taught the same dogma. 4. From the Council of Aachen the difference of ecclesiastical primacy from lay is proved. The opinion of Constantine about the jurisdiction of bishops. 5. Never formerly was it heard that a lay prince has spiritual jurisdiction. Rochester's retraction in respect of the offered oath. 6. State and division of the controversy.

Chapter 2: Whether in the first part of the formula of the oath anything beyond civil and contrary to ecclesiastical obedience is proposed to be sworn.

Summary: 1. Division of the formula of the oath into four parts. 2. In the first part of the oath of King James poison lies hidden. An evasion is excluded. 3. By the words of this oath the power of the Pontiff is abjured. 4. Chief reason. 5. Other errors that are contained in those words. 6. Another error. 7. The final oath contains virtually in itself the earlier ones.

Chapter 3: In the second part of the oath as well something beyond civil obedience and against ecclesiastical obedience is offered to be sworn.

Summary: 1. This second part of the oath differs in almost nothing from the first, and further it deprives the Pontiff of the power of jurisdiction. 2. Double sense of this second part. The first sense is excluded and is shown to be alien to the mind of the king. 3. The second sense intended by the king contains an error. 4. In that part of the oath is included profession of an error against the faith. How many sins lie hidden therein. 5. An evasion is excluded. 6. The succeeding words of the oath contain an error and one similar to the preceding. Another error in the second part. 7. Subjects licitly can and should reveal treason to a prince. 8. Treason is not to be revealed if it is taken in an improper sense. 9. This revealing cannot be licitly promised in an oath. 10. The accusation placed against Garnet. 11. A thing heard in confession can for reasonable cause, with concealment of the person, be made manifest. First limitation of this doctrine. 12. Second limitation.

Chapter 4: Whether in the third part of the oath something beyond civil obedience and against Catholic doctrine is contained.

Summary: 1. The third oath of the King of England. Two kinds of tyrants are distinguished by theologians. 2. A prince, although governing tyrannically, cannot be licitly killed by private authority. 3. The contrary doctrine is condemned as heretical. Error of Wycliffe and John Hus. 4. Foundation of the true doctrine. 5. Whether it is licit to kill a prince in defense of one's own life. 6. What holds in defense of the republic. 7. A tyrant in title is licitly killed. 8. What is required for a tyrant in title to be licitly killed by a private person. 9. Another limitation. Final condition. 10. Opinion of others. 11. It is refuted. Response to Augustine. 12. A new difficulty. 13. The difficulty is explained. 14. A second difficulty. For what reason an heretical king may be deprived of lordship of the kingdom. 15. The difficulty is clarified. When a republic can deprive a tyrannically governing king of the kingdom. 16. A Christian kingdom depends on the Pontiff in deposition of a tyrannical king. 17. How a king can be punished after a just declaratory sentence. 18. A private person cannot, on his own authority, kill someone justly condemned to death. 19. From this doctrine an error is demonstrated in the third part of the oath. 20. It is also demonstrated from the very words of the oath. Second reason. 21. A twofold error included in the third part of the oath.

Summary: 1. The errors set forth in the first four chapters of this book are repeated and exaggerated in the final part of the oath. 2. The Pontiff can absolve the subjects of an heretical king from the oath of fidelity. 3. Confirmation with another reason. 4. The oath of the King of England is not of itself obligatory. 5. The formula of the oath that is related in this paragraph attributes supreme spiritual power to the king. 6. In the final words of the oath, profession of all the preceding errors is repeated.

Summary: 1. The foundations of the king. 2 A triple consequence is deduced from these foundations. 3. The final class of proof of the King of England. 4. Satisfaction is made to the foundation of the king. From the title of the oath it is demonstrated that the oath was made up for the purpose of distinguishing Catholics from sectaries. 5. From the title of the second oath is collected that the king wishes for primacy in spiritual things. The chief target of this oath is the denial of pontifical power. 6. Confirmation from the equivocation of the words. Civil power is subordinate to spiritual. 7. The conclusion is drawn that this oath demands more than civil fidelity. 8. A latent objection of the king is met. 9. What the civil obedience of subjects is. 10. The obedience due to kings is part of the right of nations. By what reason it can be said to be of natural right. Sometimes it is not binding. 11. Civil obedience in Christian subjects is limited by divine faith. 12. A certain evasion is refuted. 13. The Pontiff by excommunication deprives a king of the jurisdiction of his kingdom as to the use of it. 14. An objection is refuted. 15. The deposition of a king is not the proper effect of excommunication. The power of the Pontiff to depose kings is shown from the daily use of the Church. 16. Satisfaction is made to the argument of the king. 17. The third corollary of the king is refuted. The final one is refuted. 18. Response to the final proof of the king. The propositions that the king infers are considered. 19. The tenth proposition involves a repugnance and gives occasion for calumny. 20. The twofold opinion in the eleventh proposition. 21. The thirteenth proposition is true and rightly follows from rejection of the oath. 22. The final proposition is false and wrongly inferred. 23. The falsity is shown of the words that the king adds to his proposition. 24. All Catholic doctors admit in the Pontiff jurisdiction to depose an heretical king.

Chapter 7: The Supreme Pontiff was not only able, but also obliged, to turn English Catholics by his warning away from profession of the said oath.

Summary: 1. Three objections of the King of England against the Pontifical Brief. 2. The foundations of the contrary doctrine. The Pontiff has power to examine the oath proposed by the king. 3. The Pontiff is bound by his function to condemn such oath. 4. Any controversy about the oath whatever, although it be a doubtful one, is to be settled by the Pontiff. 5. The first objection of the king is turned back against him. 6. The Pontiff has imposed on the king no punishment. 7. Difference between the Briefs of Pius V and of Paul V. 8. Response to the second objection of the king.

Chapter 8: Might Catholics who admit this oath be by any reason or in any way excused from fault?

Summary: 1. Twofold objection of the king against the Pontifical Brief. 2. Response to the first objection. 3. To the second. 4. Whether he who takes up the oath can be excused from sin. First excuse. 5. Second excuse. 6. Third excuse. 7. The first excuse is refuted. 8. A grave sin is committed in abjuring the power of the Pontiff even in a single act of deposing a king for just cause. 9. It is shown by an argument ad hominem. Foundation of the said pontifical power. 10. The second excuse is refuted. 11. A confirmation of pontifical power is refuted. An evasion is excluded. 12. In what sense and in what persons the third excuse may have place.

Chapter 9: Is it licit for English Catholics to enter the temples of heretics and to communicate with them in their rites, without intention of cult or of cooperation with them, solely so as to avoid temporal penalties?

Summary: 1. English Catholics were being compelled by diverse penalties to frequent the churches of heretics and to participate in their rites and sermons. 2. The divine precept about external confession of faith is explained. 3. The proper motive for confession of faith is to manifest our internal faith. 4. In the precept to confess the faith the negative is included. 5. The precept to confess the faith and not to conceal the faith is not at every moment obligatory. Twofold concealing of the faith. 6. For what time the precept to confess the faith is obligatory. 7. Reason for doubt. 8. First argument whereby it seems to be shown that it is licit to enter the churches of heretics etc. 9. Second argument. 10. Third argument. 11. The declaration of the Supreme Pontiff is very much in conformity with the Scriptures. 12. And it is also in conformity with the Fathers. 13. A twofold evasion is refuted. First reason to prove that communication with heretics is illicit. 14. Confirmation. The reason of St. Augustine is further clarified. 15. Second reason. 16. Why the precept to confess the faith in the aforesaid critical moment is obligatory. 17. This is clearly supposed and taught by Navarrus in cons.10 De Haeret. n.10. The example of St. Ermenegildus. 18. The doctrine handed down is confirmed by reason of scandal. 19. It is next proved from the danger of losing the faith. 20. Response to the first reason for doubt. 21. Response to the second. When the precept to confess the faith is most obligatory. 22. Response to the third reason for doubt. 23. Public protestation is not sufficient to make superstitious communication honorable.

Summary: 1. He who in hatred of the Roman Church ill-treats any part of it persecutes the Catholic Church. 2. State of the controversy. 3. The reasons whereby the king excuses himself. 4. Ill treatment of Christians in temporal things is not persecution of the Church. 5. What Christian persecution or persecution of the Church is. 6. What persecution proper of the Church is. 7. The first means which persecutors are wont to use. 8. From the end itself of persecution is shown that the ill treatment of the English faithful is persecution of the Church. 9. The same is shown on the part of the means. How grave the persecution was under Henry. 10. How much the persecution increased under Edward, under Elizabeth, under James. 11. The second means of persecution. How much under Elizabeth. 12. And under James. 13. The meeting of the four Irish bishops for extirpating the Catholic faith. 14. An evasion that the king uses is excluded. 15. Other evasions of the king are refuted. 16. The progress of persecutions under King James. 17. His second evasion is met. The king is not excused from persecution because of the benefits that he reports he has, for reason of political governance, conferred on Catholics.

Chapter 11: Whether those who for the Roman religion and obedience are in England punished with death are to be numbered among true martyrs.

Summary: 1. So as to escape the disreputable mark of persecutor of the Church, the king asserts that faithful and religious men have been killed for crimes and treason. 2. The truth for the affirmative is shown. The Carthusian and Franciscan martyrs; again the illustrious martyrdoms of Thomas More and Rochester. 3. The martyrdom of Thomas, Earl of Northumberland. 4. The testimony of Baronius about the martyrs of England. The martyrs of the Society of Jesus. 5. Grave testimony for Henry Garnet of the Society of Jesus. 6. An evasion of the king is refuted. 7. From his own words it is demonstrated that some of those killed by him have died for Christ. 8. They are martyrs who, when offered the pardon they deserve from death, spit it back so as not to deny the Roman faith. 9. Those inflicted with death for not keeping an unjust law are martyrs. Many Catholics who were killed for transgressing the laws of King James have died for Christ. 10. For the same cause were the martyrs of the nascent Church being killed. 11. They are martyrs who for violation of laws prohibiting acts of the Roman religion are killed. 12. He who is killed because he is performing acts of the Catholic religion will be a martyr. 13. It is no crime of treason to obey the Pontiff. Confirmation from an edict of King James for the oath of fidelity. 14. Those who are in various ways ill-treated for the faith of Christ will not lack the glory of martyrdom. 15. A twofold way of enduring the aforesaid afflictions.

Chapter 12: Response to what the king objects against the second Pontifical Brief and against the letter of Cardinal Bellarmine.

Summary: 1. The king's refutation of the brevity of Cardinal Bellarmine. 2. The chief strength of the second Brief of Paul V. 3. Since the king does not have anything to object against the second Brief of the Pontiff, he uses exaggeration of words. 4. By what spirit the form of swearing the oath was contrived. 5. Response to the final inference of the king. 6. The king's objections against the letter of Cardinal Bellarmine are refuted. 7. The illustrious martyrdoms of Thomas More and of Rochester are vindicated from calumny. 8. The final objection of the king against Bellarmine.

Conclusion of the work and peroration to the King of England.

BOOK 6: ON THE OATH OF FIDELITY OF THE KING OF ENGLAND.

Preface: Wherein the foundation and origin of the controversy is declared.

Although this book is allotted final place in this work, since so it is required both by the connection of the things themselves and by the clarity and order of doctrine that the King of England held to in his own, nevertheless its matter and argument provide the foundation and occasion for this whole controversy, as the king himself at the beginning of his Preface fully makes clear. Wherefore, so that the target of the disputation may be held before the eyes, I have thought it necessary to put the beginning and origin of this sort of oath, and its progress up to the present state, before the eyes. In the first place, however, I take as supposition what neither Catholics nor schismatics bring into doubt, that an oath of fidelity due to a temporal king and presented in fitting form is in itself honorable and conformable to reason, such that a king may licitly exact it from his vassals, and such that they may be able, nay and should, piously offer it when it is by fitting way and reason required, and afterwards should be bound to observe it and fulfill it. For since the subjects of each king are, on the witness of Paul, bound to obey and keep fidelity to him, and hearken unto him in all that has regard to kingly power, as was shown in book 3, it is per se manifest that an oath about keeping this obedience and fidelity (which we call an oath of fidelity) is per se and by its object honorable; and thereupon it both can be demanded by a king for his greater security and stability, and should then be furnished and kept by his subjects. Hence too is, by the by, left clear that the form of this oath, so that it may be honorable, should be such that it not exceed the limits of royal power, because neither can a king justly exact promise of an obedience not due to him, nor are his subjects bound to do it or to swear it. Nay, if such promise is prejudicial to the rights of others, they cannot in conscience do it, as we will say more fully in what follows.

Now this oath of fidelity, although it is per se honorable, is not reckoned to be so necessary that it be exacted from individual vassals and persons of all orders in all kingdoms. Nay, rather, in republics well established and living in quiet and peace, and especially in Catholic kingdoms, it is accepted by usage that overseers and other princes, as magistrates, in the public assemblies of cities should, in the name of the whole kingdom, supply to the prince, either as soon as he receives the power of the kingdom, or even afterwards at prescribed times according to the custom of each kingdom, this oath of obedience and fidelity. Now it is not wont to be demanded of the people, not because it could not be done, but because the princes themselves, reigning in peace and tranquility and confiding in the fidelity of their subjects, judge it neither necessary, nor opportune, nor convenient. But in the kingdom of England, from the time when schisms and heresies began to be sown in it, even the custom of demanding from subjects a special oath began to be introduced. Hence, just as Henry VIII was author of the schism, so did he first himself begin to propose to his subjects a new form of oath, whereby he demanded that, not only civil obedience, but also the obedience that is due to the Roman Pontiff alone be promised to him.

FIRST OATH PROPOSED TO THE ENGLISH

Sander reports in bk.1 De Schismate Anglicano near the middle that King Henry, almost at the beginning of his schism, asked from all the orders of his kingdom in the public assemblies that there be exacted from all ecclesiastics an oath whereby they would promise to him the same obedience that they had before been accustomed to promise to the Roman Pontiff; which, although it was at the beginning allowed, not simply, but with a certain limitation, as I will say below, yet the king, by this reason, ultimately obtained what he was seeking. Now Sander does not report that a special form for giving this oath was decreed by Henry, but that he simply applied to himself the form in use for swearing obedience to the Pope, namely that it was to be promised with the same tenor of words and confirmed with an oath. Nor yet does he report that everyone from the people was compelled to give the oath, but only ecclesiastical persons, nor all of them, but those that had a vote in the assemblies, as far as can from that history be collected. Nor do I even find that at the time of Edward any similar oath was again proposed or demanded of the people or ecclesiastics. But Elizabeth immediately at the beginning of her reign, or in her first assemblies, which they call Parliament, delivered a new form of oath, and commanded all, lay primates excepted, solemnly to profess it; now the form of the oath is the following, as Sander reports it bk.3 at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth:

FORM OF OATH FIRST PROPOSED BY ELIZABETH TO HER SUBJECTS AND UNDER JAMES AFTERWARDS EXPANDED

I, A.B., do altogether testify and declare in my conscience that the Queen is the sole supreme governess both of this kingdom of England and of all the other dominions and regions of Her Majesty, no less in all spiritual and ecclesiastical things or causes than in temporal, and that no external prince, person, prelate, State, or potentate, either in fact or in right, has any ecclesiastical or spiritual jurisdiction, power, superiority, preeminence, or authority in this kingdom. And so I completely renounce and repudiate all external jurisdictions, powers, superiorities, and authorities.

Now rightly does Sander note that the woman was afraid or ashamed of usurping the name of head of the Church that Henry had arrogated to himself, and therefore she changed the name into that of supreme governess. In fact, however, there was, he says, no difference save in name only, for what the king had said with a metaphorical name, Elizabeth said with a more proper one. Nay, afterwards many suspected that the queen intended something more by that formula of oath, namely to arrogate all spiritual power to herself, even in the administering of the sacraments; but she declared that she wished to attribute in those words nothing other to herself than what had by the Orders been conceded to her father and brother under the name of head of the Church.

This form of oath, then, was kept in the time of Elizabeth, but afterwards James expanded it by adding a special promise of keeping faith and obedience to the king, because of which it could now be called an oath of fidelity; for before it seemed to be a sort of sworn confession or profession of primacy, as of a certain article of the Anglican faith. The form, then, of the first oath presented by King James, which he himself reports in his Apology, besides the formula above, adds only the following promise:

I, A.B., do etc. and I promise that hereafter I will give faith and true obedience to His Royal Majesty and to his legitimate heirs and successors, and that I will, with all my strength, assist and fight for all the jurisdictions, privileges, preeminences, and authorities conceded or due to His Royal Majesty and his heirs and successors, or united and annexed to the imperial crown of this kingdom. So help me God, etc.

Afterwards, however, as at the beginning of his Preface and at the beginning of his Apology and often in his book, the king stresses that, on the occasion of a treason or plot that was aimed, through an attack of gunpowder, at him and the public orders of his kingdom gathered together into one, he himself contrived a new form of oath, which he ratified by public law and decree, that was to be demanded of and given by all who were his, both so that any associates of that crime still left over might be apprehended, and so that he might render himself and his more secure from the like dangers and machinations. Now the form of the oath is as follows:

THIRD FORM OF OATH, WHICH WAS BY KING JAMES THOUGHT OUT AND DEFENDED

I, A.B., do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare in my conscience, before God and the world, that our supreme Lord, King James, is the supreme and true king of this kingdom and of all other dominions and lands of His Majesty, and that the Pope, neither by himself nor by any other authority of the Church or of the Roman See, or by any means in company with certain others, has any power or authority to depose the King, or to make disposition of any of the dominions or kingdoms of His Majesty, or to concede to any external prince authority to injure him, or to invade his lands, or to discharge any of his subjects from their obedience and subjection to His Majesty, or to give any of them license to bear arms against him, to sow discord, or to cause any violence or loss to the person, the State, or the governance of His Majesty, or to any of his subjects within his dominions.

Again I swear from my heart that, notwithstanding any declaration or sentence of excommunication or privation, whether done or conceded, or to be done or conceded, by the Pope, or his successors, or by any authority derived, or claimed to be derived, from him or from his See, against the said king, his heirs, or notwithstanding any absolution of the said subjects from their obedience, I will nevertheless give faith and true obedience to His Majesty and to his heirs and successors, and I will defend him and them with all my strength against all plots or attempts whatever that against his person or theirs, and against his and their crown and dignity, will by reason or color of any sentence or declaration or in any other way have been committed, and I will expend all my effort to reveal and make manifest to both His Majesty and to his heirs and successors all treasons and treacherous plots that against him or any of them may come to my notice or hearing.

In addition I swear that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this doctrine and proposition, that princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope can either be deposed and killed by their subjects or by anyone else whatever.

And further I believe, and in my conscience am resolved, that neither the Pope nor anyone else whatever has power to absolve me from this oath or from any part of it. Which oath I acknowledge has been with right and full authority legitimately administered to me, and I renounce all indulgences and dispensations to the contrary. And all these things I completely and sincerely acknowledge and swear according to the express words here by me pronounced, and according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation or mental evasion or secret reservation whatever. And this recognition and acknowledgement I make from my heart and my will and truly, in the true faith of a Christian man. So help me God.

Now, on the occasion of this oath, not only doubts, but various opinions too and dissensions rose up among the Catholics themselves of England. For many shrank from giving such an oath for the reason that, in the formula for swearing it, the obedience due to the Pope, although not expressly, is directly and implicitly denied and is promised to the king, and thereupon is virtually contained and recognized therein the article about the primacy of the king. But others said that they could without scruple of conscience give that oath, provided it was done with the mind and intention of promising only civil obedience to the king, for the other things, since they were not contained in the oath, cannot, if the intention of the swearer is correct, be attributed to the swearer; because, although others perhaps might suspect something, that is only from ignorance which, by an admonition and protestation made beforehand in the presence of Catholics, can be sufficiently removed, and thus all scandal avoided. Now with this taken out of the way, there seemed to them to be no internal malice in the oath. But since, deceived by these colors and induced, perhaps, by a certain human fear, some even of the first Catholics and ecclesiastics, not only descended into this opinion, but even took the lead in giving the oath, it was necessary, in a matter so grave and exposed to dangers, for the Supreme Pontiff to apply, by his own pastoral care, a suitable remedy. Wherefore Our Most Holy Lord, Paul V, admonished the Catholics of England, in letters given to them in the form of a Brief, what in so difficult a thing they should think and observe. The form of these letters is of such sort:

FIRST PONTIFICAL BRIEF

“Beloved sons, greetings and Apostolic benediction. With great sadness of heart have the tribulations and calamities always affected us that you undergo daily for holding the Catholic faith. But when we understand that everything is in this time more exacerbated, our affliction has been in extraordinary manner increased. For we have received that you are compelled, under proposal of most grave penalties, to enter the temples of heretics, to frequent their meetings, to be present at their public sermons. Assuredly we without doubt believe that those who have hitherto, with so much constancy, undergone the most atrocious persecutions, well-nigh complete miseries, in order that they might walk faultless in the law of the Lord, will never bring it about that they should be polluted by communion with those who have deserted the divine law. Nevertheless, impelled by the zeal of our pastoral office, and with the paternal solicitude whereby we labor unceasingly for the salvation of your souls, we are compelled to warn and to implore you that under no condition should you go to the temples of heretics, or hear their public sermons, or communicate with them in their rites, lest you incur the wrath of God. For it is not licit for you to do these things without detriment to the divine cult and to your own salvation. Just as also you cannot, without the most evident and most grave injury to the divine honor, bind yourselves with an oath, which we have in like manner with grief of our heart heard has been proposed to you to be given, having the tenor hereunder written, namely: I, A.B., do truly and sincerely etc. as above.

Which things being so, it should to you be clear from the very words that this sort of oath cannot, with preservation of the Catholic faith and the salvation of your souls, be given, since it contains many things that are openly contrary to faith and salvation. Wherefore we admonish you that you should altogether guard yourselves from giving this and similar oaths; which indeed we more keenly demand of you because, having experienced the constancy of your faith, which has, as gold in the furnace, been tested by the fire of continual tribulation, we hold as a thing proved that you will with eager heart undergo any the most atrocious torments, and will with constancy meet in the end death itself, rather than injure in any respect the Majesty of God. Our confidence is also confirmed by that which is daily brought to us about your exceptional virtue and fortitude, which not otherwise than in the first beginnings of the Church shines in your martyrs in these now most recent times.

Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness, taking the shield of faith; be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might [Ephesians 6.14, 16, 10], nor let anything hold you back. But he himself, who will crown you, who beholds in heaven your combats, will perfect the good work that he has begun in you [Philippians 1.6]. You know that he promised his disciples that he would not leave them orphans [John 14.18]. For he is faithful that promised [Hebrews 10.23]. Hold therefore his discipline, that is, rooted and grounded in love [Ephesians 3.17]; whatever you try, do it with one mind in singleness of heart [Colossians 3.22] and in the unity of the spirit [Ephesians 4.3] without murmuring or hesitation [Philippians 2.14]. Since indeed by this shall all men know that we are the disciples of Christ, if we have love one to another [John 13.35]. Which love, indeed, although it is most to be desired by all Christ's faithful, certainly for you, most dear sons, is altogether necessary. For with this your love the power of the devil, who now so greatly rises up against you, is broken, since it rests chiefly for support on the contentions and quarrels of our sons.

We exhort you, therefore, by the bowels of Our Lord Jesus Christ, by whose love we have been snatched from the jaws of eternal death, that before all you have mutual love among yourselves. Truly were most useful precepts about exercising in turn fraternal love prescribed to you by Pope Clement VIII, of happy memory, in his letters in the form of a Brief to his beloved son Master George, Archpriest of the kingdom of England, dated the fifth day of the month of October 1603. These then diligently follow, and, lest you be held back by any difficulty or ambiguity, we instruct you to keep with exactness the words of these letters, and to receive and understand them simply as they read and lie, all opportunity taken away of interpreting them otherwise. Meanwhile we will never cease to pray God the Father of mercies that he mercifully have regard to your afflictions and labors, and guard and protect always, with his unceasing protection, you whom we endow mercifully with our apostolic benediction. Given at Rome in Saint Mark, under the signet ring of the fisherman, the tenth of the calends of October, 1606, in the second year of our Pontificate."

Because, however, some at that time, perhaps to deceive Catholics so that they might by that occasion not refuse the oath, spread about in England rumors whereby to render suspect the faith of those letters, saying that the Brief was not true, nor was written by the Pontiff, but was fabricated by someone else, therefore did the Supreme Pontiff write a second Brief, so that the truth of the first might be made more certain, whose tenor is as follows:

SECOND PONTIFICAL BRIEF

“Beloved sons, greetings and Apostolic benediction. It has been reported to us that there are found some among you who, although we by our letters, given in the form of a Brief last year on the tenth of the calends of October, made sufficiently clear that you could not with a safe conscience give the oath which was then being required of you, and although in addition we strictly prescribed that you should in no way give it, are now daring to say that letters of this sort about prohibiting the oath were not written from the opinion of our mind and by our own will, but rather by the consideration and industry of others. And for that cause do the same strive to persuade you that our mandates in the said letters are not to be listened to. Truly has this message perturbed us, and the more so because, having knowledge of your obedience (our sons uniquely beloved), who, that you might obey this Holy See, have piously and generously taken no account of wealth, resources, dignity, liberty, finally life itself, we never suspected that among you could the faith be called into doubt of our apostolic letters, so that, under this pretext, you might exempt yourselves from our mandates. But we know the cunning and the deceit of the enemy of human salvation, and to him rather than to your will do we attribute this resistance. For which reason we have decided again to write to you and once more to signify to you that our apostolic letters of the past year, given on the tenth of the calends of October, about prohibition of the oath, were written, not only on our own initiative and from our sure knowledge, but also after employment of grave and long deliberation about all the things that are in them contained; and to signify that you are on that account bound altogether to observe them, rejecting any interpretation that persuades otherwise. Now this is our simple, pure, and complete will, we who, solicitous for your salvation, think always those things that are more expedient for you. And that our thoughts and counsels might be enlightened by him, who has set our humility over guarding the Christian flock, we do unceasingly pray; whom also we daily beg that he might increase in you our sons, most greatly beloved, faith, constancy, and mutual charity and peace among yourselves. On whom all do we, with all affection of charity, most fondly bestow our blessing. Given at Rome in Saint Mark, under the signet ring of the fisherman, the tenth of the calends of October, 1607, in the third year of our Pontificate.”

Stirred up by these pontifical letters, and by the epistle from the most illustrious Cardinal Bellarmine, written to the Archpriest of England, the King of England, against each Brief and the epistle, and in defense of this last oath, wrote a little book, or had it written, keeping his own name secret. In which he chiefly tries to show that nothing other by that oath is exacted of his subjects than civil obedience and fidelity; and therefore does he vehemently complain that his subjects are being deterred from giving him civil obedience. For thus does the king himself at the beginning of his Preface, p.13, affirm, and in another place of his Apology he speaks thus: “As to what concerns the next head of the letter, wherein he forbids all pontificalists to enter our churches or to frequent our rites and ceremonies, I do not now have a mind to touch upon these things; since indeed that part alone now of the business presses, that I should to the world speak out the injuries and injustices of the Pontiff who forbids my subjects to profess their obedience toward me.” And in another place, with great weight and exaggeration of words, he thus affirms: “For I, as far as my mind can follow, do not believe the heaven is further distant from the earth than the profession of civil obedience to the civil king is different from all the things that are in any way at all annexed to the Catholic faith or the primacy of St. Peter.”

Now these and many like things, which are in the Apology contained, were not left by Cardinal Bellarmine without sufficient response and attack. For as soon as the Apology came into his hands, he wrote an antidote for it, although keeping his name covered; wherein he proved that oath to be, not one of fidelity, but of infidelity, and not profession of only civil obedience to the king, but also of denial of pontifical power. The king, holding as it were that response in contempt, has in this second edition of his Apology judged that nothing should be thereto added. But almost at the beginning of his Preface, after he has inveighed bitterly against the author of that response and has very gravely complained of the injuries, reproaches, and other defects in its mode of writing, he finally concludes that the author “never directly responded to that on which the hinge of the cause turns.” By this occasion, indeed, he again there declares that there were two heads only which in his Apology he discussed: “First, to prove that in the oath of fidelity there is nothing contained other than the merely civil and secular obedience due to supreme princes from their subjects. Second, to show that this power over kings unjustly usurped by the Pontiffs is in conflict with the Scriptures, the Councils, and the Fathers.” Now, of these two heads, the latter has been extensively treated of by us in books 3 and 4, where we responded with sufficient directness to all the things that the king in that part of his Apology or his Preface adduced; but the other, which we judge to be briefer and clearer, we also briefly will pursue in this book. But lest he object to us also that we have strayed from the target, we will again a little more fully and distinctly put it forward.

Chapter 1: What is the target of the present controversy, and the state of the cause, and what method of disputation must be observed in it.

Summary: 1. Various kinds of oath of fidelity. 2. Catholic dogma is that an oath of fidelity in respect of civil obedience is licit. 3. Several Councils have taught the same dogma. 4. From the Council of Aachen the difference of ecclesiastical primacy from lay is proved. The opinion of Constantine about the jurisdiction of bishops. 5. Never formerly was it heard that a lay prince has spiritual jurisdiction. Rochester’s retraction in respect of the offered oath. 6. State and division of the controversy.

1. So as to put before our eyes the proper target of this disputation and the state of the controversy, various kinds of oath that can be exacted by a temporal king, and that are collected from what has been said, need to be distinguished. One can be said to be civil oath, because it is of only civil obedience in things merely temporal and truly pertaining to the power of a king. Another is sacred or ecclesiastical oath, that is, of only ecclesiastical or spiritual obedience to be given to a temporal king as to one having supreme ecclesiastical or spiritual power. By which oath the power of the Pontiff and the obedience due to him are as a result abjured. A third can be said to be a clearly and straightforwardly mixed oath, because by it profession is expressly made of both powers in a temporal king and obedience in both is promised to him, and consequently both are also foresworn to the Pontiff. A fourth can be said to be an extenuated mixed one, because by it civil obedience is expressly sworn; but covertly and under less clear words the obedience due to the Pontiff is denied and attributed to the king.

2. About the first kind of oath, as I said, there is no controversy between the Pontiff and the King of England. For however much the king complains that injury and injustice are done to him by the Pontiff in prohibiting his subjects not to promise to him and keep civil obedience, in truth it is not so, as Bellarmine rightly noted in his response to the royal Preface ch.2, and in the Apology, by responding to the objections against the first Brief of the Pontiff § ‘Pergit deinde auctor etc.’ Because in neither Pontifical Brief is rejection of such an oath found, nor can the king allege any Catholic author who has judged this kind of oath not to be in agreement with the Catholic faith. Wherefore without cause does the king labor in his Apology, p.25 and following, to prove from the Scriptures, Councils, and the Fathers that either civil obedience is in conscience due to kings or the oath whereby it is promised is licit; for that this is not only true but even a Catholic dogma is confessed by us all. But this and nothing else is proved by the testimonies alleged by the king, as we expressly showed in book 3 by running through them one by one. And certainly the testimonies of the Fathers, which he himself adduces, do eloquently so speak; for either they distinguish each obedience, or they speak with moderation and limitation. For Augustine, when he had said that Christian soldiers obeyed Julian, although he was an apostate and an infidel, at once adjoined: “When it came to the cause of Christ, they acknowledged only him who was in heaven.” But Tertullian, when saying, “We honor the emperor,” at once adds, “in this way, as it is both licit for us and expedient for him.” And there are like things in Gratian in Decret. 11 q.1 just before the end.

3. Nor is less superfluous what in his Apology, at the beginning of his response to the letter of Bellarmine, the king brings together from the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 10th Councils of Toledo to prove that an oath of fidelity made to a king by all his subjects is to be kept. For those Councils deal with a pure, licit, and honorable oath of fidelity, which was made even then in Spain to its kings and is also made now and is very faithfully kept. For it did not come into the mind of the Fathers of those Councils that there could in the Catholic Church be another sort of oath, whereby ecclesiastical obedience is promised to a temporal prince, or any spiritual power recognized in him or abjured in the Pontiff. Hence in the 10th Council of Toledo ch.2 it is expressly said: “If any of the religious, from a bishop down to a cleric of the last order or a monk, be found to have by profane will violated general oaths given for the safety of the king and of the nation or fatherland, let him be thereupon deprived of his proper dignity and excluded from place and honor.” Which words make it sufficiently clear that the discussion is about general oaths that are wont to be offered to the king in any human republic for its conservation, and for civil obedience, and for the safety of his own life and possessions. And in like manner are the other Councils clearly speaking of an oath that was accustomed to be made, not only between the faithful, but also among any Gentiles whatever. Hence the 4th Council of Toledo ch.25 thus speaks: “A sacrilege indeed it is if faith promised by nations to their kings is violated, because transgression of the pact is done, not only against them, but also against God, in whose name the promise itself was offered.” And in the same way do the others speak. Therefore they are dealing with a common pact between a king and his kingdom confirmed by an oath of fidelity, which is a purely civil and political oath, about which there is no controversy. Hence those Councils seem to have been adduced more for show and appearance than for proving the cause. Nor to the target of the cause is more pertinent canon 12 of the Council of Aachen under Louis and Gregory IV in article 2, or a member of it, where those are in general condemned who rise up against a king and fail to keep with him their oath of fidelity. For that Council too speaks of a pure civil oath, both because no other was at that time heard of in the Church to be made to kings, and also because the Council premises as foundation: "It is clear that whoever resists a power given by God resists, according to the Apostolic teaching, the ordinance of God;" but the power of a king is only civil; of a like oath then is the Council speaking.

4. But if the King of England puts faith in that very grave Council, as is appropriate, I request first from him that he attentively consider the foundation laid down, for immediately at the beginning the Fathers thus speak: "It has seemed first that the norm of universal religion and of ecclesiastical discipline consists in two persons, namely the pontifical and the imperial." Which foundation it confirms first with the authority of Gelasius, who puts the authority of the Pope before the power of kings, next on the authority of Fulgentius, who says: "As much as pertains to the life of this age, there is found in the Church no one superior to the Pontiff, and in the secular world no one superior to the Christian emperor." And in part 3 of the same Council many things are handed on about the royal office and power, and in ch.5 of that part there is reported a saying of Constantine to the bishops: "God has given you power to pass judgment even on us, and therefore are we rightly judged by you, but you cannot by men be judged." When, therefore, Councils decree that oaths of fidelity made to kings are to be kept, they do not confound civil obedience with ecclesiastical, but lay down that to each is to be given what belongs to each, to Caesar what is Caesar's, to God what is God's. And thus is there about the first oath of merely civil fidelity and obedience no controversy.

5. But about the second kind of oath, whereby a faithful vassal of a Christian king recognizes him as supreme head or governor of the Church in ecclesiastical and spiritual things, and promises him obedience in the same spiritual things, there was formerly indeed no controversy in the Catholic Church, because never was such an oath heard of in it, because its matter was always judged sacrilegious and contrary to the doctrine of the faith. But from the times of Henry VIII that oath began to be introduced in the kingdom of England; and at the beginning that king himself did not dare to propose it in the assemblies of his kingdom, because it was a new thing and unheard of, and he knew that to Catholic men, and especially to ecclesiastics, it would be very bitter. And therefore he compelled Rochester, a man of great authority, to propose it and to persuade others of it by his own authority; now he, although he was not ignorant of the iniquity of the oath, induced at that time by fear or human reasonings, obeyed the king and proposed an oath to the rest of the bishops, not simply, but with a certain limitation added, namely, "as far as it was by the word of God permitted and licit for them." But afterwards he very heavily repented this lapse sprung from human weakness, and publicly called to witness that he should not have allowed the oath with that exception, as if it were a thing doubtful, but should have laid bear the truth by the word of God, so that others might not be induced into the fraud. Therefore, from then on schismatics and the fearful began to approve and give the oath, but Catholics to detest and avoid it. And the same disagreement among Catholics and heretics continues until now, and will continue endlessly as long as those schismatics persist in their error, since for us it is certain that the Catholic faith condemns such an oath.

Yet, nevertheless, the question now at issue is not about this oath, for the King of England knew well that the Roman faith condemns that oath and that it must not be offered by his true and constant Catholic subjects; nay (as we will see below), for this cause does he say that he has changed the formula of the oath so that his subjects may not be led, with great danger, into those difficulties. For although he himself and other English Protestants think, in their own private error, that the oath is licit, because they think the promise is about a thing licit and due, nevertheless they do not deny, nor can they deny, if they do but use their natural reason, that it is unjust to give such an oath against one's conscience, whether with a mind not to fulfill it or believing that such obedience is only to be given to the Supreme Pontiff. Wherefore there does not remain between us on this point a controversy about the oath, but about the matter of it, which controversy coincides with the one about primacy, which was treated of in book 3.

And, for the same reason, there is no question about the third oath, which comprehends openly each obedience, civil and ecclesiastical. For since good comes from a complete cause and evil from some defect, and since one part of the matter of such oath is perverse, it is manifest that the whole oath is unjust. For just as a conjunctive proposition, one part of which is false, is simply false, so that oath, since by it is promised conjunctively, so to say, both civil and ecclesiastical obedience to the king as to supreme head, is simply unjust and detestable. Next, one who believes that a temporal king is supreme in temporal and spiritual things, although he is not in error on the first part but only on the second, is a heretic simply, because one heresy suffices to make a heretic; in like way, therefore, that oath is profession of a certain heresy and thereupon is abominable. And the same ought to be no less evident and certain about the fourth form of oath, wherein a promise of civil obedience to be made to the king, and the abjuring of pontifical obedience, is proposed, not clearly, but covertly and tacitly; because in morals those two are equivalent, and it matters little to constancy of faith that Catholic truth is denied openly or under some veil and pretense. Hence too on this point there is no principal controversy; but because it can, by the ignorant, be brought into doubt, we will below in an opportune place confirm the said truth.

6. The principal point, then, on which the king has established the controversy, is not about the right, so to say, but about the fact, that is, whether in the form of oath invented by the King of England there is exacted of subjects only civil obedience and in no way ecclesiastical obedience, neither expressly, nor tacitly, nor covertly, nor tenuously. And likewise, whether by that oath the primacy of the Pope is abjured and his supreme spiritual power denied, or whether profession is only made of supreme royal power in its order and rank, without profession of a spiritual power that it is usurping. For the King of England contends that in the oath is only contained a promise of purely civil obedience and profession of supreme royal temporal power. For thus does he say in his Preface p.12: "With very great study and very great concern I took care that nothing be in the oath contained beyond promise of that fidelity and temporal obedience which nature itself prescribes to all born in the kingdom." And later he says he wrote the Apology wherein he undertook to prove "that nothing was contained in the oath except what has regard to such merely civil and temporal obedience as is to supreme princes due from subjects." And he repeats the same in other places both of his Preface and of his Apology, some of which I have reported in the preceding preface. This, then, is what we must in the first place examine. And, to begin with indeed, we will discourse of the thing itself considered in itself and, by going through, as the king seems to demand, the individual parts of the formula of the oath, we will show how unjust and contrary to the faith the

Chapter 2: Whether in the first part of the formula of the oath anything beyond civil and contrary to ecclesiastical obedience is proposed to be sworn.

Summary: 1. Division of the formula of the oath into four parts. 2. In the first part of the oath of King James poison lies hidden. An evasion is excluded. 3. By the words of this oath the power of the Pontiff is abjured. 4. Chief reason. 5. Other errors that are contained in those words. 6. Another error. 7. The final oath contains virtually in itself the earlier ones.

1. The said formula of the oath is divided into four parts or paragraphs; the first is at its beginning, the second in the paragraph, “Again I swear,” the third in the paragraph, “In addition I swear,” and the fourth in the paragraph, “And further I believe;” these need to be broken up, and one must carefully consider whether in all or in some of them is found true the pronouncement of the king that nothing is contained in the oath except what has regard to civil and temporal obedience. Now, before I descend to the individual parts, I first give warning that it has by others been noted that the verb ‘I swear’ is not added on in the first and final sections, and so in them no oath is sworn, and thereupon as great a certitude required about the truth of the things is not so proposed in them that someone may not be able, without at least grave fault, to confess them, although he not believe them, as is necessary in the other two parts that are pronounced under oath. But this consideration is false and pernicious. For, first, it is beyond doubt true that even the things contained in the first and final part are proffered under oath. For in the first it is said, “in my conscience before God,” which two remarks taken strictly are wont to be forms of swearing oaths; and although, individually taken, they be sometimes ambiguous, yet taken together conjointly they mutually aid each other and determine the signification to an undoubted form of swearing. And the certitude is increased from the solemnity of the oath, and from its matter, and because it is at once said in the second section, “Again I swear,” and from the other things that I will now state. For in the final section is placed the phrase “in my conscience,” and it is next simply supposed that this oath is so valid an oath as to all its parts that the Pontiff cannot absolve anyone from any of them. And what takes away all doubt is said later, “And all these things I completely and sincerely acknowledge and swear.” And at the end it is concluded, “in the true faith of a Christian man,” and, “so help me God.” Which last words are sufficient for swearing to everything that precedes, as is also contained in canon right, ch. ‘Ego N.’ De Iureiurando. But I add lastly that, since in the first part is said, “I acknowledge, profess,” and in the final part, “I believe,” and since the matter pertains to the dogmas of faith, even if an oath not intervene, it will in that matter be a very grave sin to confess or profess anything false, because it would be against the confession of faith which is necessary for salvation, as witnessed by Paul Romans 10.9.

2. Taking this as supposition, then, I note, first, at the very beginning of the oath, “I, A. B., do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare in my conscience, before God and the world, that our supreme Lord, King James, is the supreme and true king, etc.,” that although these words, purely proposed and understood, seem to contain expressly nothing other than profession of temporal lordship and kingship, yet in those words “our supreme Lord, King James” poison lies hidden. For, according to the intention of the speaker, and from his other formula for swearing that oath, which has never been retracted and is sufficiently known from his public profession and writings, and according to the common and received sense in that kingdom, the phrase “supreme Lord” signifies that he is supreme simply, as well in spiritual things as in temporal; supreme positively, I say, in his kingdom, because he is above everyone, both lay and ecclesiastic, and in both temporal and spiritual things, and negatively in respect of the whole world or the Church, because he does not recognize therein any superior. Since, therefore, in the very form of the oath, everyone who swears is compelled to recognize the king in that way as supreme lord, he is tacitly compelled to confess the king’s primacy in Great Britain and Ireland, and his exemption from all superior power, and consequently he is tacitly compelled to abjure the supreme spiritual power of the Pontiff. Thus, therefore, in that single phrase “our supreme Lord” something beyond civil and temporal obedience is contained.

Someone will say, let it be that this was the intention of the king, which can certainly not be denied, he deliberately did not express it in the formula itself, so that there might not in pontificalists (as he himself speaks) be caused a scruple of conscience which they could not set aside easily by swearing, not according to the intention of the speaker, but according to the simple sound of the words, and in the accommodated sense that those words could make, by understanding them only of supreme lordship in temporal matters. However this escape, although it might be sustained speculatively, as they say, and abstractly and with scandal removed, yet in use and in practice in such a place, and among such persons, and with the other circumstances, and with the danger of scandal that arises there at the same time, scarce can such a signification be removed from those words; and consequently it will be a sort of external confession and profession of the power of a king supreme in all matter, and without any limitation besides that which is added in the words themselves about lands subject to his dominion. Which limitation increases the rest of the words so that they are understood to be said without any limitation. And much more do the following words make it clear, where now not covertly, but expressly, the oath is extended beyond civil and temporal obedience. For the addition is:

3. “And that the Pope, neither by himself nor by any other authority of the Church or of the Roman See, or by any means in company with certain others, has any power or authority to depose the King.” Who, I ask, would say that by these words is only demanded from subjects such a civil obedience “as is to supreme princes due from subjects”? Certainly other kings of the Church are no less supreme princes in temporal things than the King of England, and yet neither do they exact such an obedience, nor do they believe it is due to them from their subjects, nor do their subjects recognize it; therefore the King of England plainly declares that he is speaking and thinking of himself as a supreme prince having no superior on earth, and is demanding this profession by that oath from his subjects. Next, by those words obedience is not so much sworn to the king as power is foresworn to the Pope; but to treat of the power of the Pope, and to propose swearing or foreswearing it, does not pertain to the civil or temporal power of a king, nor to the civil obedience due him; therefore those words evidently exceed the limits of civil obedience, both because the very words signify something else besides civil obedience due to a king, as is from them themselves manifest; and also because the very act of exacting such an oath, and of imposing the obligation to profess this or that about the power of the Pontiff, is an act of jurisdiction more than civil, nay of a superior jurisdiction, or one not subject to the power of the Pontiff; because to civil power it does not pertain to prescribe limits to spiritual power, especially supreme spiritual power. Therefore, to make the thing clear in theological terms, in two ways does the king demand in those words an obedience more than civil, first in the signified act of proposing non-civil matter, second in the exercised act of using a power more than civil and in compelling his subjects to be subject to it and to recognize it by their profession.

4. Add that by those words is proposed profession of a certain error against a doctrine approved by the Universal Church. For although the matter is in truth ecclesiastical, if the doctrine proposed were true, it would be, however tolerable, a usurpation of jurisdiction; since, however, the form itself of the oath contains error, and since it compels subjects to profess it, not only does it demand something beyond civil obedience, but it also compels them to deny pontifical power and to confess something contrary to sound doctrine. The assumption is clear because that article of the oath includes this proposition and faith in it: "In the Pontiff or in the Universal Church there is no power to depose a baptized king in any case, or for any cause or guilt." For although in the form itself of the oath all those words "in any case, or for any cause or guilt" are not expressly added, they are contained in other equivalent ones, namely when it is said that "the Pope, neither by himself nor by any other authority of the Church or of the Roman See, nor with certain others, has any power or authority to depose the King." For if he has no power, he therefore has not have power to punish, nor does he by any other title have effective power for such an effect or such a deposition. And this same thing is amplified in the other clauses, namely that the Pope does not have power to depose the king from the kingdoms established under this dominion, or to concede to another king the authority to invade them. For all these depend on the principle that the Pope cannot compel him by such punishment of deposition, even if he be a heretic or a schismatic or a persecutor of Catholics, nor can use other means of temporal or corporeal coercion to punish him, or to defend the Church and to snatch Catholics from so great a danger. But how false this dogma is, and how alien to the principles of the faith, to the usage of the Church, and to all even right reason, given the supposition of the pastoral office that Christ committed to his Vicar, was sufficiently shown in book 3; and therefore I do not for the present further delay on the point.

Finally, of the same nature is the other section with which this part of the oath is concluded, wherein the king compels his subjects to swear that in the Pontiff there is no power "to discharge any of his subjects from their obedience and subjection to His Majesty, or to give any of them license to bear arms against him, to sow discord, or to cause any violence or loss to the person, the State, or the governance of His Majesty, or to any of his subjects within his dominions." Which section is of almost the same nature as the preceding, and it proceeds from the same error, namely, that in the Pontiff there is no power of coercion through corporeal violence or other temporal penalties; which doctrine is erroneous, as was shown in the same book 3. Wherefore in this section too there is something beyond civil obedience proposed for swearing, and spiritual power is usurped, and subjects are compelled to profess it in the oath itself and to acknowledge it in the king. And next too pontifical power is abjured and an error contrary to the faith is sworn.

5. Nay, there are here new errors involved. One is that the Pope does not have power of relaxing oaths, even if a just and reasonable cause intervenes; which is against ecclesiastical custom and the use and approval of General Councils ch.2 De Re Iudic. 6, and against the consent of Catholic doctors, and against the power of binding and loosing given to Peter, and thus made clear in the use and morals of the whole Christian people. And in addition it is also against reason, for in similar oaths is always either included the tacit condition if the promise can be fulfilled without loss and danger to the swearer, but especially when the danger and loss comes from the injury and violence of him to whom the promise is made. Or there is understood the reserved right of a superior, who, notwithstanding the promise made by a subject, can prevent him from fulfilling it or from carrying out the promised action, if a just and reasonable cause intervenes, and consequently can relax the oath, by prohibiting the matter of it. Next this error supposes the prior one; for if the Pope can depose a king, it is as a consequence necessary that he can take away the bond of obedience and of the oath, because obedience is not promised to James as he is James but as he is king; hence if he ceases to be king, by that very fact obedience is not due to him, and thereupon neither is the oath binding; for once the matter of the oath has been taken away, the obligation of the oath must as a result be taken away.

6. Another new error is that not only is the Pontiff denied the power of deposing a king himself heretic, but also of coercing his subjects by penalties of this sort, as is clear from the phrase “to any of his subjects.” For it must be noted about the sense of those words that there is no one who teaches that the Pontiff can by his own choice, and without a compelling reason of justice, give any prince license to take up arms against another king or his subjects, and inflict on him any force or harm; just as also he cannot at will give license to subjects to stir up disturbances against their king, as the King of England in the discourse of this book seems to attribute to the Pope, as we noted and refuted at the end of book 3. For which Pontiff has ever arrogated this power to himself? Or which Catholic or which person in possession of the use of reason has ever taught or preached this? One should not, then, cover or extenuate those words by imagining that the sense of them is that the Pope cannot give that license at will or without cause, for this neither does the king fear nor has it ever come into the mind of men.

7. The sense, then, is that the Pontiff cannot inflict any violence or loss, not only on a king, but also neither on his subjects, nor give anyone license of doing anything the like against the subjects of the King of England, even if they are apostates and rebels from the Roman Church, and sowers or supporters of schismatics and heretics. In this way, then, we say that in those words a great and new error is contained, or certainly the same error about primacy is made more explicit. For what is this other than to profess that the subjects of the King of England do not have on earth another superior besides the king himself, and that they cannot be coerced or punished by another because of their crimes, even if they are pernicious to other Catholics and to the Church of Christ? Therefore by all these section is the supreme power of the Pontiff either expressly enough, or at least implicitly, denied and abjured, and attributed to the king. Hence the conclusion is drawn that it is both false that nothing is in this oath exacted besides profession of civil and temporal obedience, and that it is on the contrary very true that this oath is mixed and contains virtually whatever was in the former oaths being offered for swearing to. Nor do I see what might with any appearance of probability be said in reply to these reasons; but we will, in the following chapter, touch on a certain escape that the king insinuates.

Chapter 3: In the second part of the oath as well something beyond civil obedience and against ecclesiastical obedience is offered to be sworn.

Summary: 1. This second part of the oath differs in almost nothing from the first, and further it deprives the Pontiff of the power of jurisdiction. 2. Double sense of this second part. The first sense is excluded and is shown to be alien to the mind of the king. 3. The second sense intended by the king contains an error. 4. In that part of the oath is included profession of an error against the faith. How many sins lie hidden therein. 5. An evasion is excluded. 6. The succeeding words of the oath contain an error and one similar to the preceding. Another error in the second part. 7. Subjects licitly can and should reveal treason to a prince. 8. Treason is not to be revealed if it is taken in an improper sense. 9. This revealing cannot be licitly promised in an oath. 10. The accusation placed against Garnet. 11. A thing heard in confession can for reasonable cause, with concealment of the person, be made manifest. First limitation of this doctrine. 12. Second limitation.

1. This part begins from the words, “Again I swear,” and contains almost nothing diverse from the preceding, but in it are made clearer all the things that are foresworn in the first part against the power of the Pope, in order, no doubt, that they may be understood to proceed not only of extra-judiciary power, so to say, or of power of acting through human force, but also of the power of jurisdiction and of judiciary power, which is in this second part more expressly denied and foresworn to the Pope in the following words: “Again I swear from my heart that, notwithstanding any declaration or sentence of excommunication or privation, whether done or conceded, or to be done or conceded, by the Pope, or his successors, or by any authority derived, or claimed to be derived, from him or from his See, against the said king, his heirs, or notwithstanding any absolution of the said subjects from their obedience, I will nevertheless give faith and true obedience to His Majesty and to his heirs and successors, and I will defend him and them with all my strength against all plots or attempts whatever that against his person or theirs, and against his and their crown and dignity, will by reason or color of any sentence or declaration or in any other way have been committed.”

2. In order, therefore, not to give any place for subterfuge, I ask whether the king understands that the sentence of a Pope deposing, because of crimes, a baptized king, and one who professes himself a Christian, can be just, or whether instead he believes that it is always unjust. The first, I believe, he will not assert, otherwise he would be inducing his subjects to swear to something very base, namely to not obeying a just sentence that brings with it a just command. For if the sentence is just, the command whereby subjects are bidden to keep it will also be just, since otherwise it could not be committed to execution. Again, if the sentence of deposition passed by a Pope against a king can be just, it will also be effective; therefore it has the effect of the punishment which it imposes. Hence, since a punishment imposed by sentence of deposition from the kingship is ipso facto to deprive the king of the dominion and property of his kingdom, a just sentence does effectively deprive him of the kingdom; therefore it is against justice and the obedience due to the Pope to resist such a sentence and to defend the person of the king against the execution of such sentence; therefore, he who believes the first understanding and nevertheless swears to this second part of the oath is swearing to a thing plainly unjust and wrong. And, in another respect, it is contradictory to want to keep obedience and fidelity to someone as to a true king whom you know has, by a just declaration or sentence, been with effect deposed from the kingship. So that if the Pope himself were to exact an oath from the faithful that, notwithstanding any sentence or declaration whatever of his deposition, even for the crime of heresy, passed by any General Council whatever, they will defend him in his See and supply him with the same obedience and fidelity, the oath would be unjust, because it would be about a thing unjust and contrary to the Church and to faith. Of such sort, then, is this oath of the king, if the said sentence is supposed to be just. This then the king will without doubt not admit, nor do I even think that he has such an unfair valuation of his own state of things that, if he do concede that a sentence passed by a Pope against some king can be just, he would nevertheless deny that it could possess the same justice against himself. For what greater immunity or innocence could he allege in himself than in other kings who were rebels against the Roman Church or deserters and attackers of the faith? Or although he not acknowledge in himself a cause worthy of deposition, whence does he know that it cannot be in his successors, although nevertheless he exacts the oath equally about all of them? There is no doubt, then, that the foundation of this oath is that such a sentence cannot be just.

3. Hence, therefore, we draw the evident conclusion that the subjects of the King of England are required by those words to swear that a sentence of deposition against a king can neither be valid nor just; for this they do in truth profess when they swear not to obey such a sentence or to keep it. Hence we further conclude that the same are required to swear that there is in the Pontiff no power for passing such a sentence. The proof is that for no other reason does the king believe, and wish by his subjects to be believed, that that sentence will be unjust, except that it would be passed without any power and jurisdiction of the Pope over a king; for this yoke does the king try with all his means to break and to remove from himself, and therefore in his book he often repeats that he has nothing to do with the Pontiff and the Pontiff nothing to do with him, and the like. Nor can the king allege or claim in such a sentence any other reason of injustice that would be permanent and could give a foundation to this part of the oath. For, although at the beginning of his Apology he himself indicates two other causes, namely that disparity in cult of religion is not a sufficient cause to enable subjects to conspire against the king, and that he should, cause unheard, be condemned, which complaints I will treat of below; nevertheless neither of these is universal and lasting (to say nothing now of their quality). And thus the form of oath cannot be founded on those causes, both because the Pontiff had not yet written his Brief, about which the king is complaining, and also because the oath does not speak of a sentence passed or to be passed against the king or his successors; it comprehends, therefore, every sentence, whether it is passed when the party has been heard or whether not heard, or whether on account of disparity of religion, or whether for any other crimes or cause whatever. Therefore the injustice, which the king supposes in the sentence and on which he has founded the formula of the oath, does not exist, unless because he believes that it cannot flow from legitimate power and jurisdiction.

4. I conclude, therefore, that in the words of this oath not only is civil obedience demanded of subjects, but also profession of this error, that the Pope does not have power and jurisdiction to pass a sentence of deposition against a king for any cause at all, and thereupon I conclude that this proposition of the king is not true, "that nothing is contained in the oath except what has regard to merely civil and temporal obedience." And hence the further inference is drawn that subjects sin very gravely in giving that oath. For they outwardly profess that the Pope does not have jurisdiction over a king whereby he could pronounce a just sentence of deposition against him, for whatever cause and in whatever way he pass it, in keeping with the order that, if the power were not lacking, natural justice would demand. For he who makes this oath either believes or does not believe what he professes; if he believes it, he is in heart and deed a schismatic and errs in a doctrine of the faith; but if he does not believe what is contained in the form of the oath and yet swears it, he sins both against confession of the faith and against the religion of oath, whether he swears without the intention of fulfilling what he swears, or whether he swears with the intention of keeping it; because in the first way he is a perjurer, in the second way he makes the oath a bond of injustice and proposes to obey men rather than God, by promising to obey the king against a just sentence and precept of the Pontiff.

5. But if the king say that those who swear simply do not understand everything that is contained in the oath, we reply that the excuse is frivolous, both because we are treating, not of the ignorance of persons, but of the quality and justice or injustice of the oath; and also because that ignorance can scarcely be invincible in Catholics, unless they are very rustic types and too little instructed in religion; because the literate and expert will easily understand the errors lying hid in the oath, and those who are less learned will at least be in doubt and will be bound to search out the truth; but no one is so ignorant that he could with a safe conscience rashly swear without first inquiring of what sort the oath is. Which above all has place in England, because, since all Catholics know, even rustic types, that the king and his counselors are pursuing the Pontiff with very great hatred and are rejecting the Roman faith, and since they see in the very form of oath many things foresworn against the Pontiff, they must be in doubt of what sort that foreswearing is; therefore if they swear rashly, they are not excused from the very serious faults that we have made clear are present in the oath. And then, since such oath results in contempt of the Apostolic See and loss to the Christian religion, it cannot be admitted without great scandal; and so Catholic pastors and doctors of the Church which is in England should not keep the truth secret and permit the simple to be ignorant, for in an event of this sort there is less evil in tolerating temporal affliction, or permitting the inconstancy of a fall in some, than to hide or disguise the truth.

6. And this discussion made about the unjust foreswearing of a just sentence which can by a Pontiff be passed against a king, can also be applied to the like foreswearing of any absolution from an oath of fidelity which the Pope can concede to the subjects of a king that is made in the words “notwithstanding any absolution of the said subjects.” For these words too exceed political obedience, because that the Pope can or cannot absolve from an oath is not matter of civil obedience but is ecclesiastical matter, having regard to the interpretation of the power of binding and loosing given to Peter by Christ the Lord. And in addition, these words are connected with the preceding ones and contain the same error; because the obligation of obedience in any order or state whatever lasts as long in the subject as the dignity or power and jurisdiction lasts in the superior, because these things are correlative and one depends on the other. Hence, in the case both of prelates of the Church and of civil magistrates, by the very fact that a superior person is deposed from his prelacy or magistracy the obligation of obeying such a person ceases in the subjects, because they are not now subject to him. Which also has place in the Supreme Pontiff, if he renounces the pontificate or is deposed for heresy; thus therefore, if the Pontiff can depose a king, he can also absolve subjects from obedience to him; therefore there is at least equal error in abjuring all absolution from fidelity made by the Pontiff as in abjuring all sentence of deposition. I add, indeed, that a new error is involved in this second part, because the Pontiff can, even without deposition from the kingship, command subjects not to obey a king who is stubborn in some error, or in some public and scandalous crime, and to absolve them from their oath of obedience for the time being by way rather of suspending the obligation than of absolute privation, as we will treat of below when dealing with the censure of excommunication.

7. It remains to consider the final words of this paragraph, wherein there is required the oath of a special promise to reveal all treachery, in these words, “and I will expend all my effort to reveal and make manifest to both His Majesty and to his heirs and successors all treasons and treacherous plots that against him or any of them may come to my notice or hearing.” About this promise, then, I note that, if its words are taken in a simple and proper sense, it is honorable and contains nothing which either exceeds civil fidelity or is repugnant to sound doctrine. For “treachery” signifies the very great crime of lèse majesté against a prince or a republic, which in the vernacular is called ‘betrayal’; therefore treacheries of this sort, or treasonous plots, subjects are bound, even when a special promise is excluded, to reveal to their legitimate kings both by the law of charity and piety and observance toward them and the republic, and also by title of subjection and fidelity which by the very law of nature they owe by reason of that subjection to their prince; and therefore to strengthen and increase this obligation by promise and oath is honorable and holy. But it is necessary that the words “that...may come to my notice or hearing” be understood in a sound way of merely human notice, and that it not be obtained through sacramental confession; for it is in no case licit to reveal the seal of confession, as I will next say. And indeed, if the words of this promise were, as I said, simply taken, they include of themselves that clarification and limitation, because (among Christians and Catholics especially) those words, pronounced generally or indefinitely according to their common sense, do not propose any other sense, nor introduce any greater obligation.

8. But although this be true when one speaks of the force of the words and without consideration of special circumstances, nevertheless, when these are all weighed, one must beware of a double fraud or deception in the words. One is that by the name ‘treachery’ the king does not understand only that which is truly and in itself treachery, but also everything that is in his own judgment, and according to the errors of the preceding sections, reckoned to be treachery. Therefore, even if the king is legitimately deposed by the Pontiff, and his subjects are legitimately freed and absolved by the same Pontiff from the bond of oath and of obedience due to a king, every plot of the kingdom or of the republic or of the subjects to expel the king and free themselves from tyranny (if he is perchance exercising tyranny) the king will call treachery and a treasonous plot, although however in truth it is not such, but is a just defense or a just war or punishment, as I will show in the following chapter. When treachery, then, is understood in this sense, the exaction of such a promise is unjust; and it would be base and sacrilegious to swear it, both because, as I said, it is not treachery, for in that case faith is rather to be kept with the republic, or with the community of the subjects oppressed by force, than with the tyrant, who is unjustly oppressing them, since in truth he is not now king; and also because then the natural secrecy, under which notice of such a plot would be held, is obligatory, because it is about a thing just and necessary for the common good of the community which is justly defending itself; and therefore a promise contrary to that secrecy neither obliges nor can be honorable, and accordingly cannot be solemnly sworn. Wherefore those words, considered in themselves and taken on their own, so to say, might be lacking in suspicion; nevertheless, when taken together with what precedes, they are to be avoided, because this latter sense seems to be most of all intended by the king.

9. Another fraud can be that the promise seems to be made even if notice is obtained through sacramental confession; for that this was the mind of the king, and of those who produced that form of oath, can be collected from this, that among them there is no sacramental confession, and they regard the seal of confession as nothing, and establish no difference between that notice and any other notice. Nor will he much doubt about this mind of the king who has carefully considered what he wrote about the seal of confession in his Preface p.147. For there, although he admits that scholastic doctors, from when they began to exist in the Church, have all asserted that whatever is revealed to a confessor under the veil of confession, however harmful and pernicious a thing it may be, the confessor is bound to keep secret the name of the one confessing; nevertheless he so proposes the doctrine that he seems rather to be making fun of it. For he says that: "From when those scholastic doctor fellows began to be in the Church, the ancient foundations of theology also began to be subverted by novelties begged from philosophy," signifying that the opinion about the seal of confession pertained to this lapse or defect of theology. But the Christian world is not ignorant that the innovators of this age have hatred for scholastic theology, either because they are ignorant of it, or because it more accurately uncovers and impugns their errors. However, that the foundations of that doctrine and opinion about the seal of confession are older than the scholastic doctors, and always were and are now in the Church, has been elsewhere expressly proved by us, and cannot now be treated of by the by in a worthy way, nor is there need, since the king, in the place cited, refused to contend about the doctrine as to this part of it.

10. He adds, however, that none of the ancient scholastics denied that, if something was made known to a confessor the hiding of which might cause great harm to the republic, the confessor can and should, as often as it happens, reveal the thing, though he hide the man, so that he might confront the danger. Which opinion he thinks to be so certain that he says that the contrary one, which he attributes to the Jesuits, contains a new and pernicious dogma, such that neither a king nor a republic can be secure where that doctrine finds protectors. But this doctrine he has there proposed and exaggerates for this cause, that he might accuse Henry Garnet of being aware of a plot that was not revealed and make him a participant in it through not allowing the excuse of secret confession. Although, not content with this charge, he adds later, and tries to show, that Garnet had knowledge of the plot, not in confession, but outside the sacrament. But as to what concerns Garnet's deed, I can say nothing with sure knowledge, because I was not present, nor have I been able to read a sure history of the affair. I know, nevertheless, that Garnet, whom I knew familiarly for many years, was a man adorned by God with great gifts of mind; for, besides the excellence of his genius and his eminent erudition, I always observed in him great candor of mind and integrity and probity of morals, which I have, by sure signs and testimonies, always understood that he preserved up to his death. Wherefore I have no doubt that, in keeping the plot secret, whether before he was arrested, or in giving his judicial confession, he preserved great prudence, fidelity, and truth. And therefore, since Cardinal Bellarmine affirms that many witnesses, and one of them grave in the first rank and beyond all exception, solemnly affirmed to have heard from Garnet's mouth at the very moment of death that he was not aware of the plot save in sacramental confession, I think faith is to be given to both, namely, both to Garnet denying that he had any other notice, and to the witnesses affirming that Garnet denied it. Nor let the king take it indignantly if we prefer the testimony of the faithful and of Catholics to the testimonies of the heretics who have imposed on the king himself.

11. But as what to pertains to right, or to the doctrine asserting that a thing heard in confession can, in order to avoid a great harm, be revealed without revealing the person, we say that it is indeed true absolutely, and has never been denied by Jesuits; for Bellarmine in his Apology ch.13 frankly admits it, and I in vol.4 De Poenit. disp.33, when expressly clarifying the secret of confession and the precept about it, expounded in sect.3 n.3 that the secret must be understood in relation to the person of the sinner, and therefore, for utility's sake, a confessor can speak about the thing itself keeping silent about the person, which I again confirmed and made clear in sect.7. Nor will the king be able to show an author of the Society who has taught the contrary doctrine. They do however apply the necessary clarifications, lest anyone abuse the doctrine. One of them, in defense of Garnet and in response to the king, was acutely to be sure and prudently used by our Bellarmine, when he says that it is indeed licit in general words to warn a prince about a treachery known in confession so that he might avoid the danger; but yet it must be understood, in the first place, about a Catholic prince who believes in and holds in due reverence the religion of sacramental confession, and next about a pious and Christian prince of whom it can be presumed that he will not ask anything beyond what is right. Otherwise, a priest is being held to put himself in very great danger and difficulty, nor ought or can he licitly reveal the secret of confession to him whom he knows both to hold confession as nothing and to be going to try with all his strength to interrogate and make examination about the person of the traitor.

12. And to this has regard the other general clarification, that the understanding of the doctrine must be that it is licit then to speak about a thing itself known in confession when the person is neither directly nor indirectly revealed. Hence because in morals the danger is equivalent to the fact (for, Ecclesiasticus 3.26, "he that loveth danger shall perish in it"), therefore he who so speaks about the thing itself that he exposes the person of the one confessing to moral danger, that is, by giving moral occasion, or preparing the way, for it to come to his notice, is acting against the seal; for he is, at least indirectly, revealing the person, and so it is by no reason licit. Nor is this doctrine, so understood, contrary to the security of kings and kingdoms. For rather this very great religion and observance of the secret is necessary so that, by way of confession and by the counsels and warnings of the confessor, some remedy might be applied to these sorts of treasons and iniquities, which would otherwise clearly cease; for if penitents are not made secure of their safety by that secrecy, there would be no one who would dare in confession to reveal the like facts. And so those rather, who either mock confession or subvert its secrecy, are consulting too little the security of kings and kingdoms.

Finally, to return to our point from which we have digressed, since in the formula of the oath the King of England is exacting from his subjects a promise to reveal all treacheries that might come to their notice, Catholics can rightly fear, nay and believe, that it is demanded without any distinction, whether the notice be through confession, and whether revealing the treachery is done at the same time with revealing the traitor, or with moral danger of it, or in any other way at all. In which sense too that form exceeds civil obedience and involves something against Catholic religion. And therefore also in this respect the oath is very suspect; and for that reason can Catholics and prudent men rightly demand a greater clarification of it, although they are bound for other causes simply to refuse it.

Chapter 4: Whether in the third part of the oath something beyond civil obedience and against Catholic doctrine is contained.

Summary: 1. The third oath of the King of England. Two kinds of tyrants are distinguished by theologians. 2. A prince, although governing tyrannically, cannot be licitly killed by private authority. 3. The contrary doctrine is condemned as heretical. Error of Wycliffe and John Hus. 4. Foundation of the true doctrine. 5. Whether it is licit to kill a prince in defense of one's own life. 6. What holds in defense of the republic. 7. A tyrant in title is licitly killed. 8. What is required for a tyrant in title to be licitly killed by a private person. 9. Another limitation. Final condition. 10. Opinion of others. 11. It is refuted. Response to Augustine. 12. A new difficulty. 13. The difficulty is explained. 14. A second difficulty. For what reason an heretical king may be deprived of lordship of the kingdom. 15. The difficulty is clarified. When a republic can deprive a tyrannically governing king of the kingdom. 16. A Christian kingdom depends on the Pontiff in deposition of a tyrannical king. 17. How a king can be punished after a just declaratory sentence. 18. A private person cannot, on his own authority, kill someone justly condemned to death. 19. From this doctrine an error is demonstrated in the third part of the oath. 20. It is also demonstrated from the very words of the oath. Second reason. 21. A twofold error included in the third part of the oath.

1. After the preceding oaths a third is in these words added, "In addition I swear that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this doctrine and proposition that princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope can be deposed or killed by their subjects or by anyone else whatever." In these words three things must be considered; first the doctrine itself, second by what right this oath is exacted of subjects, third how much these words are repugnant to the things by which the king promises to show that nothing is contained in this oath besides civil obedience. About the first, since the king, solicitous of his own security, often insists on the common question whether it is licit for a private person or for subjects to kill a tyrant king, and since on its true resolution much depends the understanding of this and the other parts of the oath, I have thought it necessary to preface a few things about it. There is, then, a distinction made by theologians between two tyrants; one is he who has, not by just title, but by force and unjustly taken hold of a kingdom, and who in truth is not king nor lord but occupies his place and wears his shadow; the second is he who, although he is true lord and possesses the kingdom by just title, is ruling tyrannically as to use and government, because, that is, either he turns everything to his own advantage, despising the common, or he unjustly harasses the subjects by despoiling, killing, perverting, or perpetrating other like things publicly and often unjustly. Such was Nero, for example, who is numbered among the tyrants that God sometimes permits to be lord by Augustine bk.5 De Civitate Dei ch.19, thus reading that verse of Proverbs 8.15-16: "By me kings reign...and tyrants by me hold the earth [alt. and nobles, even all the judges of the earth]." And among Christians is most of all to be numbered in this order a prince who leads his subjects into heresy, or something else as far as apostasy, or into public schism.

2. The present question, then, is principally dealt with in respect of a legitimate prince governing tyrannically, because the King of England speaks of these princes, and because we hold him in this rank of legitimate kings. We say, therefore, that a prince cannot, because of tyrannical governance or any crimes at all, be justly killed by private authority. The assertion is common and certain. St. Thomas taught it in bk.1 ch.6 De Regimine Principum, where he confirms it with the best moral reasons. The same is handed on by Cajetan, ST IIa IIae q.64 a.3, on which are other moderns, and by Soto bk.5 De Iustitia q.1 a.3, Molina vol.4 De Iustitia tract.3 disp.6, Azor vol.1 bk.8 ch.12 q.17, and ch.26 q.7, and vol.3 bk.2 ch.2 q.1, and ch.7 q.30, Cardinal Toletus in his Summa bk.5 ch.6, and the summists generally on the word ‘tyrant’. The assertion of this truth is agreed to by the jurists, Bartolus, Alexander, Socinus, Cardinal Praepositus, and the others whom he refers to, and Gigas follows them tract. De Crim. Laesae Maiest. q.65 the whole of it. The same is handed on by Lucas de Penna in bk.1 Code ‘Ne Armorum Usus’ bk.11, and by Conrad Bruno tract. De Seditiosis bk.5 ch.2 nn.9 & 10, and by Thomas Actius opusc. De Ludo Sachor. q.2 n.50 extensively and well, and Restaurus Castaldus, with many references, tract. De Imperat. q.82 the whole of it, and Paridius de Puteo tract. De Sindicat. § ‘An liceat occidere regem’, who intends this though he speaks confusedly, as I will say below. Covarruvias in Epitom. 4 Decretal. p.2 ch.3 §4 n.6. This truth is also in conformity with the precepts of 1 Peter 2.13: “Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man [alt. to every creature] for the Lord’s sake, whether it be to the king, etc.” And later, v.18: “Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.”

3. But it is more in its species defined and the contrary condemned as heretical in the Council of Constance sess.15 where (as I reported in book 5) this article is condemned: “Any tyrant whatever can and should licitly and meritoriously be killed by any vassal or subject whatever, even by means of secret ambushes, notwithstanding any oath or confederacy whatever made with him, and without waiting for the opinion or command of any judge.” And the Council declares that they who stubbornly defend this article are heretics and must be punished as such. For this definition, as all modern authors understand, proceeds of a tyrant in ruling, not one in title and usurpation of kingship, which may be collected from the words themselves. For a vassal and a subject are properly spoken of with respect to a true prince and superior. Again the words, “notwithstanding any oath...made whatever,” include also oaths legitimately made to true kings; for the words are universal. Hence there is no doubt but that the author of that article at least spoke universally about all tyrants, whether in title or in governance, as is clear from his words and exaggerations. Again, because the article arose from the doctrine of Wycliffe and John Hus, who said that temporal lords, through any mortal sin whatever, lose their principality by that very fact, and can therefore be chastised by their subjects at will, as is contained in the same Council sess.8. Now the Council condemned the article because of its universality and precipitate nature, which it displays in all its articles and amplifications, and it chiefly condemns it in that it includes true kings and princes governing tyrannically. But it can also be extended to a tyrant who is so most properly through unjust usurpation and retention of a kingdom, if it is with all its exaggerations rashly asserted, namely “notwithstanding any oath or confederacy whatever made with him;” for this is false and against natural reason, which declares that compacts, especially sworn compacts, are to be kept.

4. But the reason for the assertion is that a king governing tyrannically might be killed by any private subject whatever either under title of just revenge or punishment, or under title of just defense of himself or the republic. The first is altogether false and heretical, because the power of avenging or of punishing offenses is not in private persons but in the superior, or in the whole perfect community; therefore a private person killing his prince under that title is usurping a jurisdiction and power that he does not have; therefore he sins against justice. The major is de fide certain, and is handed on by Augustine bk.1 De Civitate Dei chs.17 & 18 when he says that “it is not licit for any private power to kill a guilty man, license to kill whom is not conceded by any law,” and chs.21 & 26 when he says “he who kills another without public power or its just command is a murderer.” But the reason is both that revenge and punishment for offenses are ordered to the common good of the republic, and have not been committed except to him to whom the public power of governing the republic has been committed; and also that to punish is the act of a superior and of jurisdiction, so if it is done by a private person it is an act of usurped jurisdiction; and next, because otherwise there would ensue infinite confusion and disturbance to the republic, and occasion would be given for seditions and murders. But if for this reason it is murder to kill a private man by one’s own authority, even if he is a murderer, a thief, and an assassin, a much greater crime is it to lay one’s hands by one’s own authority on a prince, though he be unjust and a tyrant. Finally, because otherwise there would be no security in kings, for vassals easily complain that they are being by them unjustly treated.

5. The other title indeed of defense, although perhaps it might in some case be in place, yet not in the case of which we are treating, namely whether a king can be killed by a private person solely for tyrannical governance. Therefore we must distinguish whether someone is defending himself or the republic. Again, if himself, whether he is defending his life or limbs or against grave mutilation of body, or is only defending external goods and goods of fortune. For it will not be licit to kill an invading king solely because of defense of external goods; both because the life of a prince is to be preferred to these external goods on account of his dignity and because he represents God in a certain special way and holds his place; and also because a prince has a certain superior administration over the goods of all his subjects; and although perhaps he go beyond them, not for that reason is he to be resisted as far as killing. For it is enough that he remain afterwards obliged by justice to restore or compensate for the things taken away, and that the subject can demand them, as far as he can do so without violence. But if however the defense is of his own life that the king is advancing violently to take away, then indeed it will ordinarily be licit for a subject to defend himself, even if the death of the prince do thence follow, because the right to protect life is the greatest; and then the prince is not in any necessity that might oblige the subject to lose his life for him, but he himself has put himself voluntarily and unjustly in that peril. But I say ‘ordinarily’, for if the republic would necessarily be thrown into confusion by the death of the king, or would suffer some other great disadvantage against the common good, then charity for the fatherland and for the common good would oblige to not killing the king, even with peril of one’s own death; but this obligation pertains to the order of charity, of which we are not now treating.

city so as unjustly to ruin it and kill the citizens, or something the like. And then certainly it will be licit to resist the prince, even by killing him, if defense cannot be done in any other way. Both because, if this is licit for one's own life, it is much more so for the common good, and also because the city itself or the republic then has a just defensive war against an unjust invader, even if he is its own king; therefore any citizen at all, as a member of the republic and expressly or tacitly directed by it, can in that conflict defend the republic in the way he is able. But we are not at present treating of the case where a king is actually carrying out aggressive war against the republic itself to destroy it and to kill the multitude of the citizens, but of the case when, reigning in peace, he troubles the republic in other ways and is harmful to it, and then there is no place for defense by force, or by ambushes against the life of the king, because then there is not being brought to bear against the republic an actual force that it is licit to repel by force. Hence to attack a prince then would be to start a war against him by private authority, which is in no way licit, "because natural order, adapted to the peace of mortals, makes this demand that authority for undertaking war should lie with the republic or the prince," as Augustine said bk.22 Contra Faustum ch.24. Again, because just as it is not licit on one's own authority to avenge, through someone's death, the evils he has committed, so neither is it licit on one's own authority to prevent future evils that one fears from someone by killing him. For the reason is the same, and in the case of private malefactors it is evident; the same then has place with greater reason in a prince.

7. Now, in order for us to be able to illustrate this doctrine more fully and to apply it better to the proposed section of the oath, there is first need to speak about the other member, that is, about a tyrant in very title, whether the preceding doctrine has place in him or not. For there is commonly drawn a distinction between these two kinds of tyrants; for the assertion is that this tyrant as to title can be killed by any private person at all who is a member of the republic that is suffering the tyranny, if he cannot otherwise free the republic from that tyranny. So thinks St. Thomas in Sentences bk.2 dist.44, which is 2 art.2 in the body of the text and in answer to the final objection, and almost all the doctors cited have followed him, and one can look at Conrad Bruno tract. De Seditios. bk.6 ch.3, where he reports various examples; they are, however, amassed from just and unjust acts and so do not prove the right but the use. The reason is, therefore, that in this case there is killed, not a king or prince, but an enemy of the republic. In this way the same St. Thomas bk. De Regim. Princip. ch.6 defends the deed done by Aod, Judges 5, who although he was a private person killed Eglon, King of Moab, whom Israel was in service to, because he was not true king of the people of God, but an enemy and a tyrant. The same is also handed on by Abulensis on that place q.26, and he adds that he could have been killed by any Israelite. Thus too did Judith kill Holofernes, Judith 4, which is praised in ch.5. Thus too does St. Thomas in the former place approve the opinion of Cicero praising those who killed Caesar, because he was usurping empire, not by just title, but by force and tyranny. Therefore do the doctors also say that the crime of lèse majesté was not committed against this tyrant, because in such a tyrant there is no true majesty. They also say that this sort of tyrant does not come with the name of 'prince', and therefore the decrees that say it is not licit to kill a prince do not include this tyrant, as can be seen in Gigas tract. De Crim. Laesae Maiest. q.65.

Which limitation has place above all when the tyranny is being exercised, not by a supreme prince, but by some inferior. For not only kings but also inferior potent lords can through tyranny usurp some lordship or jurisdiction or magistracy. For then, in a case of actual aggression, the people can resist an invader, although after he already possesses it in fact and is dominating, they cannot on their own authority kill him, nor start a new war against him, if they can have recourse to a superior. Because when they do have a superior, it is not licit for them on their own authority to take up the sword, and it will be less licit for any private person, otherwise everything will be thrown into disorder and great confusion will arise in the republic. And for that same reason, even when there is no superior to whom recourse can be had, it is necessary that the tyranny and injustice be public and manifest; for if it is doubtful, it will not be licit to remove him who is in possession, since in case of doubt his condition will be better, unless it is certain that the possession was tyrannical. Besides, in order for the killing of such a tyrant to be licit, it must be the case that it is necessary for obtaining the liberty of the kingdom, for if a tyrant can in a less cruel way be removed, it will not be licit immediately to kill him without greater power and examination of the cause.

9. In addition, the common opinion must be understood when no contract, or signed agreement, or pact confirmed by an oath intervenes between the tyrant and the people, as Abulensis noted above; for pacts and oaths, even with enemies, are to be kept, unless perhaps they were evidently unjust and done by coercion. Another limitation too must be applied, if the same or greater evils are feared for the republic from killing the tyrant than it is suffering under him. And thus Bartolus said, tract. De Guelfis et Gebell. 9, that it is licit in that case to kill the tyrant for the common good, but not for a private one. For if someone kills the tyrant so that he himself might become master of the empire through a similar tyranny, he is, because of the new tyranny, not excused from the guilt of homicide. Again if it is believed that the son of the tyrant or some like associate of his will inflict the same evils on the republic, it will not be licit, because an evil is done without hope of greater good, and because in truth the republic is not then being defended, nor liberated from tyranny, by which title alone would that death be justified. Next, it is necessary that the republic not expressly object; for if the republic is expressly opposed then it not only does not give authority to individual persons, but even makes clear that the defense is not appropriate for you who needs in this to be trusted, and hence as a result it happens that it is not then licit for a private person to defend the republic by the death of the tyrant.

10. But these things notwithstanding, there are not lacking authors whom this distinction and opinion do not please, but they think it should distinctly be said that it is not licit for a private person to kill a tyrant, whether he is a tyrant in governing only or also in title. Thus does Castro think bk.14 Adversus Haer. at the word 'tyrant', insofar as he is speaking distinctly; and the Council of Constance has the same understanding, and all its reasons tend in that direction. Azor proclaimed the fact more expressly when rejecting the said common opinion in vol.2 bk.11 ch.5 q.10. The foundation is, first, that the Lateran Council speaks about a tyrant absolutely and generally. Second, that Augustine bk.1 De Civitate Dei also says absolutely that without public administration it is not licit to kill anybody. Third, that St. Thomas does not say that this tyrant is laudably killed by any private person, but says indefinitely that he is laudably killed. Fourth, that no malefactor can by right be killed, nor can he who is in possession be overthrown in fact, unless he is first heard and judged. Nor is evidence of the perpetrated deed sufficient, unless sentence precedes.

11. But these things are of little cogency against the received opinion. For the Lateran Council, as I said, does not state a universal negative proposition that no tyrant can be killed, but it condemns the universal affirmative that every tyrant can be killed, and not as stated absolutely but with many amplifications; and therefore its statement is reduced to this indefinite one, that not every tyrant can be killed before sentence pronounced against him; from which no argument against the common opinion can be taken. To Augustine I respond that the private man who kills a tyrant of this sort does not do it without public administration, because either he does it by authority of the republic tacitly giving consent, or he does it by the authority of God who has, through the natural law, given to each one the power of defending himself and his republic from the force that a similar tyrant is doing. To St. Thomas we reply that he speaks sufficiently clearly, for in the body of the article he says: "When the means are to hand, anyone can expel such a domination;" but in his solution to objection 5 he plainly means a private person by the word 'anyone', both by thus interpreting the words of Cicero about the killers of Caesar, and because he thus concludes: "For then he who kills a tyrant to free the fatherland is praised and receives a reward." To the final reason is said that it proceeds when someone is to be killed in punishment for an offense, or is to be deprived of the goods he possesses quietly, and without actual conflict, formal or virtual; but in our case the question is not about vengeance but about defense, nor does the tyrant have possession quietly but through actual force; because although perhaps the republic is not starting war, because it cannot, nevertheless (as Cajetan rightly notes) it is always waging implicit war, because it is resisting as much as it can.

12. But hence arises a new difficulty, because according to this doctrine there is no difference between the two cases or tyrants. Because even a tyrant as to title is not licitly killed by private authority but by public; but in this way it is also licit to kill a king governing tyrannically. Hence I argue further that a tyrant in title is to be killed either in vengeance for his crime or by reason of defense. It has already been said that in the first way he cannot be killed by any private person with private authority, both because to punish is an act of jurisdiction and of a superior, as I said above, and also because neither the republic itself, which has suffered the offense of such a tyrant, can in this way punish him, but by public council and with the cause cognized and sufficiently judged; and so, for a private person to do it, the tacit or presumed consent of the republic is not enough, but there is required an express declaration by a special or at least by a general commission. Hence too it would, by this title, not be licit for any external person, nay neither for a public person having jurisdiction over such a tyrant, to kill him by this title without the express commission of the offended republic. But if only by title of defense is this killing licit for a private person, there is thus no difference between the two tyrants; because it is also licit by title of defense for a private person to kill a true king who is tyrannically invading his own kingdom or city, as I said. Again, such a killing in that way is not licit by a power tacitly conceded by the republic to its members, but by authority from God, who by the natural law has given to each one the means to defend himself and his fatherland, nay to defend any innocent person. Therefore by this title to kill a tyrant is licit in both cases and both tyrants, not only for members of the republic, but also for foreigners; therefore there is no difference.

13. In the first place I reply to the last question that it is true that a tyrant seizing a kingdom without just title cannot be justly killed by any private person by way of vengeance or punishment; for this is proved by the arguments made in the first member of the dilemma. Hence I admit that, to this extent, there is no difference between this tyrant king as to the absolute reason of justice, although the crime with respect to a king proper is far graver and one of lèse majesté, which it is not in respect of the other tyrant but simple injustice and usurped jurisdiction. There remains, therefore, that only by right of defense is it licit for a private person to kill this tyrant. But herein there is a great difference between him and a corrupt king. For the king, although he is governing tyrannically, does not, as long as he is not moving actual unjust war against the republic subject to him, inflict on it any actual force; and therefore there is with respect to him no place for defense, nor can any subject by this title attack him or move war against him. However, a tyrant proper, as long as he is unjustly holding the kingship and is dominating by force, is always actually inflicting force on the republic; and so the republic is always waging actual or virtual war against him, not vindictive war, so to say, but defensive war. And as long as the republic does not make clear the contrary, it is always reckoned to be wanting to be defended by any of its citizens, nay by any foreigner too; and therefore if it cannot otherwise be defended except by killing the tyrant, any member of the public may licitly kill him. Hence also is strictly true that it is not then done by private but by public authority, or rather by authority of the kingdom wanting to be defended by any citizen as by its member and organ, or by authority of God, the author of nature, granting to each man the power of defending the innocent. Hence in this too there is no distinction between the two tyrants; for neither of them can be killed by private authority, but public authority is always necessary. The difference, however, is that this power is reckoned to have been committed to any particular person against a tyrant proper, but not against a lord proper, because of the distinction declared.

14. But from this there now arises a new difficulty necessary for the present purpose. For from this latter resolution about a tyrant proper, it follows that the former one, about a king governing tyrannically, only proceeds before there has against such a king been passed a sentence of deposition; not, however, after it has been passed, as the King of England badly infers and as is deserving of examination. For, to begin with, the consequence has a considerable foundation in the Council of Constance; because that Council only speaks of killing a tyrant prince by private authority, “without waiting for the opinion or command of any judge;” for in this way did the Council of Constance condemn the contrary assertion; therefore, if the legitimate judge of such a king, whoever he is or could be, has passed a just sentence against him whereby he has by that very fact deposed the king from the kingship, the definition of the Council does not now hold. Next, even the reason given ceases, and so the first assertion, as it has been proposed, will not then have place. For then the just and legitimate sentence being waited for is now assumed, and thus the aggressor is not proceeding by private authority but in virtue of the sentence, and consequently as an instrument of public authority. Next, after a king has been legitimately deposed, he is not now legitimate king or prince, and as a result the assertion that speaks of a legitimate king cannot hold of him. Nay, if such a king, persevering in his stubbornness after legitimate deposition, retains the kingship by force, he begins to be a tyrant in title, because he is not legitimate king nor does he possess the kingship by just title. The thing is made more clear in the case of an heretical king; for by his heresy he at once is by that fact deprived in a certain way of the lordship and property of his kingdom, because either it remains confiscated or it passes by right itself to the legitimate Catholic successor, and nevertheless he cannot at once be deprived of the kingdom, but he justly possesses and administers it until by a sentence at least declaratory he is condemned of crime, according to ch. 'Cum Secundum Leges' De Haeres. in 6. However after sentence has been passed he is altogether deprived of the kingdom, such that he cannot by just title possess it; therefore, from then on he can be treated as altogether a tyrant, and can consequently be killed by any private person.

15. This difficulty supposes that against a king supreme even in temporal things a punishment of deposition and a sentence of privation of kingdom can be passed, which the King of England refuses to hear; yet it is very true, and is evidently collected from the principles laid down in book 3, and it will be said again in what follows. But by whom such a sentence can be passed is a large question; briefly, however, we now suppose that this power of deposing a king can exist either in the republic itself, or in the Supreme Pontiff, though in diverse way. For in the republic it exists only by way of a defense necessary for its own preservation, as I said above in book 3 chapter 3. Therefore if a legitimate king is governing tyrannically and the kingdom has no other remedy for defending itself unless it expel and depose the king, the whole republic, along with the public and common council of the citizens and nobles, can depose the king, both by force of natural right whereby it is licit to repel force with force, and because this case of necessity for the proper defense of the republic is always understood to have been made an exception in that first compact whereby the republic transfers its power to the king. And in this way must it be taken, because St. Thomas says ST IIa IIae q.42 aa.2 & 3, it is not an act of sedition to resist a king governing tyrannically, that is, if it is done by the legitimate power of the community itself and prudently without greater harm to the public. Thus too did the same St. Thomas expound it in bk.1 De Regimine Principum ch.6, and his disciple Soto bk.5 De Iust. q.1 a.3, Bañez 2.2 q.64 a.3 dub.2, Molina vol.4 De Iust. tract.3 disp.6. The other jurists, however, speak confusedly on this point, for Paridius de Puteo above and Antonius Massa tract. Contra Duel. nn.78 & 79, so affirm it that they seem to concede the license even to individual citizens; but contrariwise Restaurus and Castalis on the said q.82 so oppose it that they seem to deny it even to the community, but they are to be tempered according to the aforesaid.

However, in the Supreme Pontiff this power exists as in a superior having jurisdiction to chastise kings as subject to him, even supreme kings, in the way shown above. Hence if the crimes are in spiritual matter, as is the crime of heresy, he can directly punish these crimes in a king even up to deposition from the kingdom, if the stubbornness of the king and providence for the common good of the Church so demand. But if the vices are in temporal matter, he can, insofar as they are sins, chastise them by direct power; but insofar as they are damaging temporally to the Christian republic he can punish them, at least indirectly, insofar as the tyrannical governance of a temporal prince is always also pernicious to the salvation of souls.

16. Nay, there must further be added that although the republic or the kingdom of men, considered in the sole nature of the thing as it existed among the Gentiles and now exists among the heathen, has the power that we said for defending itself from a tyrant king and deposing him, if it be necessary, for that purpose, nevertheless Christian kingdoms have, in this respect, some dependence on and subordination to the Supreme Pontiff. First, because the Pontiff can prescribe to any kingdom that it not, without consulting him, rise up against its king, or not depose him, unless first the cause and reason have been by himself cognized, on account of the moral perils and loss of souls that in these popular tumults morally intervene, and so as to avoid seditions and unjust rebellions. Hence we read in the histories that almost always in these cases kingdoms consulted the Pontiffs, or even asked him to depose a foolish or tyrannical king. As was related about Childeric, King of Gaul in the time of Pope Zachary, ch. 'Alius' 15 q.6 and about others in book three chapter 23 above; and about the King of Portugal, Sancius II, at the time of Innocent IV the Portuguese histories relate extensively that he was by the Pope deposed from the royal administration, although not deprived of the kingship; as is also reported in ch. 'Grandi' De Supplend. Neglig. Praelatorum in 6. Secondly, a Christian kingdom depends on the Pope in this, that the Pontiff is able not only to advise or consent that a kingdom depose a king pernicious to it, but even to prescribe and compel it to do so when he will have judged it necessary for the spiritual salvation of the kingdom, and especially to avoid heresies or schisms. Because then most of all has place the use of indirect power about temporal things for the sake of a spiritual end, and because he can of himself immediately depose a king in such a case; therefore he can compel a kingdom to carry it out, if it be necessary, otherwise his power would not only be ineffective but even insufficient. Lastly, because such a precept is in that cause most just.

17. On the supposition of this foundation, then, one must say that, in the last point proposed, after the passing by legitimate power of a condemnatory sentence against a king about depriving him of the kingdom or, which is the same, after a declaratory sentence of a crime that has such punishment by right itself imposed, he indeed who passed the sentence, or he to whom he committed it, can deprive the king of the kingdom, even by killing him, if he cannot do it otherwise, or if the just sentence is extended to this punishment too. However, the deposed king cannot at once be killed, nay nor forcibly expelled, by any private person until it is prescribed to him or the general commission is in the very sentence or in right declared. The first part evidently follows from the preceding principle; for he who can justly condemn someone can also carry out the punishment, by himself or by the assistance necessary for it; otherwise the power to declare right, without effective coercive power, would be vain. And for this reason, as Augustine says bk.1 De Civitate Dei ch.26, the minister of a king acts rightly in killing a man by precept of a king, because then he is executing rather the power of the king than his own. Thus, therefore, when a republic can justly depose a king, its ministers act rightly in coercing or killing the king, if necessary, because they are now not operating by private power but by public. And thus did Soto rightly speak bk.5 De Iustit. q.1 a.3, although a king who is a tyrant in governance alone cannot be killed by anyone whatever, "when," he says, "the sentence has already been passed, anyone can be set up as minister of its execution." And in the same way a king, if the Pope deposes him, can only be expelled or killed by those to whom he himself has given the commission. Which, if he give command for the execution to no one, will pertain to the legitimate successor in the kingdom or, if none can be found, it will concern the kingdom itself. And the doctors hand down that it must in this way be kept in the case of the crime of heresy, when an heretical king has, by public sentence, been declared deprived of the kingdom, as can be seen in Castro bk.2 De Iust. Haeret. Punit. ch.7, Simanus De Cathol. Institut. tit.46 n.75.

18. But from these things is the second part easily proved, that although someone is justly condemned to death, no private person whatever can kill him at will unless he is commanded, or otherwise directed, to do so by the one who has the authority, because no one can kill another except a superior who has such a power over him, or the superior's minister; but he cannot be called a minister if he is not directed by princely power. But if this is true with respect to any malefactor, with much greater reason, certainly, does it proceed with respect to a king. Someone will perhaps say that an implicit or tacit direction of the republic is sufficient, which by the very fact that it has deposed a king wishes him to be by everyone expelled, and coerced, and, if he resists, even killed. But this is false and thought up or imagined contrary to reason; for a judge condemning a private heretic or malefactor, does not at once give the means to everyone for noticing it in him; therefore neither does the republic, nor the Pope when condemning a king who is a heretic or otherwise tyrannical, concede such license, even tacitly or implicitly, to everyone. For by no just reason can this license be more presumed against a prince than against others; for prudence and a just manner in the execution itself are always necessary, and there is greater danger of disturbance and excess in coercing the person of a prince or king than of others. Hence if the Pope declares by sentence some king a heretic and deposed from the kingdom, and declares nothing further about the execution, not any prince can immediately move war against him, because neither is he, as we suppose, superior to him in temporal things, nor does he receive that power from the Pope by force of the sentence alone. And therefore, as I was saying, only his legitimate successor, if he is a Catholic, has this faculty, or if he himself is negligent, or there is no successor, the community of the kingdom succeeds to that right, provided it is Catholic. But when it seeks help from other princes, they will be able supply it, as is per se clear. Now if the Pontiff (as we showed in book 3 by examples was often done) attributes to other kings the power to invade such kingdom, then it can justly be done, because neither just cause nor power are lacking.

19. From this true and certain Catholic doctrine, then, we prove manifestly that the third part of the oath contains on various heads an excess of power, injustice against good morals, and an error against true and Catholic doctrine. First proof: for by what authority does the king compel his subjects to swear that a proposition is heretical which the Catholic Church has not hitherto condemned? For if the king say that it was condemned in the Council of Constance, he cannot, to begin with, consistently say this, since he holds the authority of Councils, especially modern ones, for nothing. Next, where does he read in the Council of Constance the phrase "princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope"? Or the phrase "by their subjects or...anyone else whatever"? Since, therefore, these phrases added to the proposition make it and its sense very different, such a proposition is by a fallacious and imaginary inference attributed to the Council. But if not by the authority of the Council but by his own he condemns that proposition, he without doubt exceeds and abuses a power which he does not have. And it is besides remarkable that he often contemns the power of the Pope to define the things of faith and dares himself to arrogate it to himself, for although he does not say this in words he professes it in fact. In which too he seems to be too little consistent with himself; for he glories elsewhere in the same Apology that he does not hammer out new articles of faith in the manner of the Pontiffs. Next, since he himself thinks nothing to be de fide except what is contained in Scripture, he should show us in Scripture where that proposition is condemned as heretical, or the contrary divinely revealed, so that it can be held as heretical. Certainly, although Paul said, Romans 13.1, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers," he never added that everyone should be subject also to powers excommunicated or deprived by the Pope; nor can one of these be collected from the other, since they are far different, not to say almost opposites, for a deprived king is not now a higher power. And hence I conclude further that the profession of this oath, as to this part, is a sort of confession of royal authority and power both to condemn propositions as heretical at will, and to propose authentically to the faithful what they should de fide believe or protest as heretical; which is on the part of the king an excess and usurpation of spiritual power, and on the part of those who confess such an oath a sort of virtual profession of a false faith.

20. Besides, from the words themselves it is very plainly clear that the king in this oath is not merely requiring civil obedience or the swearing to it. For to demand under oath the detestation of a proposition as heretical clearly exceeds civil obedience, which is of a far inferior order to Christian faith. Especially when such a precept is new in the Church, such that not only does the king compel his Christian subject to detest a proposition elsewhere condemned by the Church (which sometimes a Catholic king, keeping to the due measure, can do), but he compels him also to detest a proposition that he himself condemns anew on his own authority, as now the king is doing. Hence it continues sufficiently proved that this oath is on the part of the king unjust, because in many ways it exceeds his power; and thus it is violent coercion and usurpation of alien jurisdiction. But on the part of the faithful too it is unjust to accept it, for the general reason indeed that they are swearing either to something illicit or to a lie; for if they believe that the proposition is heretical because of the king's authority alone, the oath is for this very reason alone damnable, and much more so because the proposition which is condemned is most true and, from true principles of the faith, certain, as was proved in book 3. But if they externally abjure such a proposition which in their mind they do not believe to be heretical, they are committing manifest perjury, as is per se evident. And beyond this, such a profession contains a special and proper injury against the Pontiff, whose power and obedience they are, because of human fear, denying.

21. Finally from these things is easily understood that this part of the oath involves doctrinal error too. One error is that there is not in the Pontiff a power to depose an heretical or schismatic king, and one who is dragging or perverting his kingdom into the same schism or heresy. For profession of this error is chiefly and more directly made through those words than through others, as will be clear at once to anyone reading them, and as was in many ways proved above. The other error is less express indeed in the words, but it lies hid and is virtually contained in the very opinion that, in things pertaining to the doctrine of faith and to the detestation of heresies, a temporal king can demand even sworn faith from his subjects. Nay, also in this, that the opinion of the king is to be preferred to the opinion of the Pontiff. Which is to be sure a sort of virtual profession of the primacy of a temporal king in things spiritual or ecclesiastical, for there is nothing greater in the primacy of Peter, nor more necessary to the conservation of the Church and its union, than the supreme power in proposing things of faith and condemning heresies that the King of England is in those words arrogating to himself; therefore profession of such an oath is manifest profession of schism and error; therefore true Catholics are in conscience bound to repudiate it.

Chapter 5: On the final part of the oath and the errors contained therein.

Summary: 1. The errors set forth in the first four chapters of this book are repeated and exaggerated in the final part of the oath. 2. The Pontiff can absolve the subjects of an heretical king from the oath of fidelity. 3. Confirmation with another reason. 4. The oath of the King of England is not of itself obligatory. 5. The formula of the oath that is related in this paragraph attributes supreme spiritual power to the king. 6. In the final words of the oath, profession of all the preceding errors is repeated.

1. In the final part of the oath the same errors more or less are repeated, and so there hardly remains anything that needs to be added about it; but because they are in part further declared and exaggerated, in part too the depravity of the oath increased, the individual elements must be briefly noted and expounded so that they may by everyone be easily understood. First, then, the authority and power of the Pontiff are abjured again in these words: "And further I believe, and in my conscience am resolved, that neither the Pope nor anyone else whatever has power to absolve me from this oath or from any part of it." In these words is plainly affirmed this proposition: "The Pope cannot absolve subjects of a temporal king from an oath of fidelity." Because what is affirmed about this in the oath is not on account of a special reason in it, nor on account of a dignity that may be greater in the King of England than in other temporal kings, as is per se evident and as the king himself in his Preface plainly professes. But when it is said, "the Pope cannot etc." it is understood simply, that is, in no way, for no cause, in no case; for this is what the words signify according to their plain and common sense and understanding, in the way the king himself a little later wishes the words of this oath to be taken. Besides the fact that it is sufficiently clear from the end of the oath and from its first part that this is the mind of the king.

2. Now in this way that proposition is heretical, because it is contrary to the power of binding and loosing given to Peter, as the Catholic Church has always understood and exercised it. For thus are the subjects of any heretic at all, by the fact that the heretic has been publicly denounced by a public sentence, absolved from their oath of fidelity, from the decree of Gregory IX on the last chapter De Haereticis; and the power and very just reason for that punishment are explained by St. Thomas ST IIa IIae q.12 a.2. In like manner anyone is absolved from the bond of an oath of fidelity given to a lord who has been publicly excommunicated and denounced, from Urban II on the last chapter 15 q.6, and Gregory VII along with the Roman Synod in ch. 'Nos Sanctorum' on that very place. Where the bond of the oath is not altogether and simply taken away, but as it were suspended for the time that the one excommunicated stubbornly persists in censure. But it is otherwise when a king or prince is for heresy or other crimes deposed and deprived of lordship of the kingdom; then the oath is altogether taken away and, with its matter removed, nullified as it were. And in this way Innocent IV, along with the Council of Lyons, absolved from their oath of fidelity all the vassals of the emperor Frederick; and other examples were presented above whereby the ancient and universal sense of the Church, which is the best interpreter of Scripture, is made clear. For if all rights say about human custom that it is the best interpreter of human laws, why will the best interpreter of the law by Christ laid down, and of the power of binding and loosing bestowed by the same on Peter, not be the universal and very ancient custom of the Church and its use of such power? Which power was by the same Pontiffs who used it defended with the highest authority and doctrine. Especially Gregory VII bk.8 Register epist.21, and Innocent III in epistle to the duke of Carlinga in ch. 'Venerabilem' De Elect., and Boniface VIII in Extravag. 'Unam Sanctam' De Maiorit. et Obedientia.

But if the king does not believe this proposition founded in Scripture, declared by the authority of Pontiffs and Councils, and received hitherto by common consent, by what right or by what authority does he wish to compel all his subjects to believe, affirm orally, and confirm by oath the contrary falsity? Or how can they themselves be "resolved in their conscience," as is said in the oath, to believe it and to swear to it without any reason or motive? Unless they believe that the king alone together with his ministers has, for confirming his own error and demanding faith in it, greater authority than has the Roman and Universal Church together with the Supreme Pontiffs handing it on with such constant tradition and consent. But if the king does intend this, and is obliging his subjects to this faith, he must admit that in this oath he is not fighting for merely temporal jurisdiction but for spiritual primacy.

3. Which I evidently declare also in another way. For it is against natural reason to say that no one can be absolved from a promise confirmed by an oath through a change in its matter, by taking the promise away and as it were nullifying it. For although someone may have promised by an oath to return a deposit, if the other yields up his right, the depositary is absolved from his oath. Hence if such a change is brought about by a superior power, the obligation of fidelity is equally taken away. Which was also recognized by Triphon, Justinian Code law 50 'Bona Fide' and following of deposit, when he says that, if someone has received a deposit under trust of returning it to the owner, and the owner is later condemned by the praetor and his goods confiscated, the depositary is freed from the trust of returning the deposit to the same owner, and should put it in the public treasury. Because as he says later: "Reason of justice demands that the fidelity to be kept in a contract is not to be regarded only in respect of the contracting parties, but also in respect of the other persons to whom that which is done pertains." Which is most of all true where the authority of a superior and the public good intervenes. Nor has the king, as I think, hesitated to exercise a like power in his own kingdom, by for example depriving a subject of his goods who has been apprehended in the crime of lèse majesté, and consequently by transferring all the actions or all the promises made to him either to himself or to his treasury, whether certainly by simply nullifying them, or by presenting or remitting them to the debtors; from which it necessarily follows that, although those actions and promises had been confirmed by oath, the debtors remain absolved from the oath. Therefore it cannot be denied but that this mode of absolving from an oath might be honorable and valid, if there is in the absolver power to make disposition either about the matter of the oath, or about the right of the creditor or lord or of the promisor. Therefore the power of absolving vassals from an oath made to an heretical king, or to one dangerous to Christian subjects, is either very unjustly and against all reason denied to the Supreme Pontiff; or it is denied without other foundation than that he is not believed to have power to coerce and punish temporal kings. And so this part returns to the earlier ones, and it plainly contains profession of error against the primacy of the Pontiff, and an heretical assertion about the primacy of the king and about his absolute exemption from obedience to the Pontiff, especially as to coercive force through temporal penalties.

4. Next, I will not omit to note (because the king does not speak of an oath in general, but of this oath) that in the true and Catholic sense, though contrary to the mind of the king, it can be said that no one can absolve the swearer from that oath, because, namely, no one can be properly absolved who has not been bound; but that oath does not bind the swearer, because an oath cannot be a bond of injustice, as that oath is, and therefore no one can be loosed from it. Yet, nevertheless, he can be declared absolved, or not bound, because the Pontiff can do it by special authority, and he did sufficiently do it when he declared that the oath is illicit and contrary to eternal salvation. For thence it not only follows that it must not be given, but even that, if it has been given, it must not be observed. Hence it also happens that the Pontiff can in another sense absolve from that oath after it has already been made, that is, from the sin committed in supplying such an oath, provided a penance worthy thereof, as a necessary disposition, precedes.

5. Second, in the same part, confession of supreme royal power in spiritual things, and of its exemption from the Pontiff, is made in the words: "Which oath I acknowledge has been with right and full authority legitimately administered to me." And afterwards the oath is confirmed in these words: "And all these things I completely and sincerely acknowledge and swear." For that that confession is contained in those words is clear first from the phrase "with full authority;" for although the word 'supreme' was with purposeful diligence avoided, lest perhaps it deter the more simple, nevertheless the word 'full', on the basis of the king's mind sufficiently understood from the whole discourse, is placed there as its equivalent, for the oath is not said to be with full authority except because there is among men no power that is able to impede, prohibit, or remove it; but this is supreme power. Next, since the oath is itself expressly against the power of the Pope, the signification, when "with full authority legitimately administered" is added, clearly is that the royal power administering the oath is either superior to the power of the Pope or equivalent to it. What therefore the king in other places expressly professes, is here covertly, and in the use of usurped power, involved. Hence he who consents to such an oath is clearly swearing that an act of usurped power is an act of legitimate power, which is open perjury and contrary to confession of the Catholic faith. And lastly, the king is from these words too convicted of not demanding only civil obedience in this oath, since he demands recognition and confession of his own power to decide against the power of the Pope.

6. Third, in the final words a new oath is added of this tenor: "And this recognition and acknowledgement I make from my heart and my will and truly, in the true faith of a Christian man. So help me God." Which is a fresh confirmation and repetition of all the preceding errors, and of a confession of them, not merely external, but also internal, so that the swearer cannot be excused either of internal infidelity or of perjury. And in addition I weigh the word 'my will', which involves an open lie, which is sufficient for it not to be capable of being sworn by Catholics without perjury. For it is evident that they are not themselves giving the oath with their will but coerced by threats and terrors. Because, as the king had himself said a little before, "if they renounce such oath they are wretchedly put and thrust into danger of loss of life and fortune;" how then can they truly swear that they are giving such oath with their will? For that 'with their will' does not signify there any will at all, but a will that is uncoerced by grave fear and powerful human violence, and that the swearer would have even if he were not coerced; but Catholics know that they do not have such a will, and the king himself is not ignorant of the fact; therefore on this head too the oath is unjust, because it involves and requires in it perjury.

Chapter 6: The reasons are considered by which the oath is defended.

Summary: 1. The foundations of the king. 2 A triple consequence is deduced from these foundations. 3. The final class of proof of the King of England. 4. Satisfaction is made to the foundation of the king. From the title of the oath it is demonstrated that the oath was made up for the purpose of distinguishing Catholics from sectaries. 5. From the title of the second oath is collected that the king wishes for primacy in spiritual things. The chief target of this oath is the denial of pontifical power. 6. Confirmation from the equivocation of the words. Civil power is subordinate to spiritual. 7. The conclusion is drawn that this oath demands more than civil fidelity. 8. A latent objection of the king is met. 9. What the civil obedience of subjects is. 10. The obedience due to kings is part of the right of nations. By what reason it can be said to be of natural right. Sometimes it is not binding. 11. Civil obedience in Christian subjects is limited by divine faith. 12. A certain evasion is refuted. 13. The Pontiff by excommunication deprives a king of the jurisdiction of his kingdom as to the use of it. 14. An objection is refuted. 15. The deposition of a king is not the proper effect of excommunication. The power of the Pontiff to depose kings is shown from the daily use of the Church. 16. Satisfaction is made to the argument of the king. 17. The third corollary of the king is refuted. The final one is refuted. 18. Response to the final proof of the king. The propositions that the king infers are considered. 19. The tenth proposition involves a repugnance and gives occasion for calumny. 20. The twofold opinion in the eleventh proposition. 21. The thirteenth proposition is true and rightly follows from rejection of the oath. 22. The final proposition is false and wrongly inferred. 23. The falsity is shown of the words that the king adds to his proposition. 24. All Catholic doctors admit in the Pontiff jurisdiction to depose an heretical king.

1. Hitherto we have refuted the oath and shown its deformities “in its parts and bit by bit,” as the king in the same words declared he wants; now lest we should seem to be giving sentence against a party unheard, which is also a complaint of the king, we have thought it necessary to bring into examination whatever in defense of the oath the king either indicates or we have been able to think of, so that it might be thence more evident that rather could the condemnation of the oath be therefrom increased than the oath defended or excused.

First, then, can be objected to us the royal authority which, in words express and rather often repeated, affirms that he wished to require from his subjects by that oath nothing other than civil obedience and its profession. Thus does he often make repetition both in his Apology and in his Preface. For on p.4 he says that he has sufficiently shown that he desired nothing more through the oath than that he might be made secure about the faith and constancy of his subjects “which,” he says, “they are bound because of conscience to supply me.” In the Preface he more often, namely on pp. 11, 12, 13, & 14, and more plainly, not only affirms it but also proves it in more or less this way: Since Parliament in its lower house had asserted in the oath a clause “whereby the power of the Pontiff to excommunicate me was taken away, I immediately wanted it deleted;” therefore may one thence collect “with how much concern I took care that nothing be in the oath contained beyond profession of that fidelity and temporal obedience which nature itself prescribes to all born in the kingdom.” A proof of this sort is collected for this inference from the same place that, after the abjuration of the power of the Pontiff to excommunicate a king was taken from the oath, nothing was left in it besides civil obedience and fidelity. For if anything can be argued, most of all is it that “because the right of removing kings is to the Pontiff denied and abjured, and because this is most just and does not exceed civil fidelity, therefore, etc.” The proof of the minor is, first, that such right “has in no legitimate way been acquired by the Pontiff, but has been appropriated by the unjust usurpation and secular violence of Popes,” which he often repeats in his Preface, and on p.22 in particular he says he took it as a thing to be proved in his Apology that the usurpation of the Pontiffs is repugnant to the Scriptures, the Councils, and the Fathers. Second, that such removing or deposition of kings “far and wide exceeds the limits of excommunication, which is a spiritual censure;” therefore excommunication by the Pontiff cannot supply subjects with a just and legitimate cause for them to contrive anything against a king or his command. Thus more or less the king in that place.

2. And from this foundation he tacitly infers, both there and in other places, that subjects cannot by the Pontiff be absolved from the civil obedience due to a king, because a Pontiff cannot depose a king from his rank and lordship; therefore neither can he bring it about that the obedience not be due to him, because it is due by natural right, which right the Pope cannot take away. For this is what the king wished to signify in the words, “which nature itself prescribes to all born in the kingdom.” In like manner he infers that the Pontiff cannot absolve subjects from their oath of fidelity, because the matter of that oath, which is civil obedience and the promise of it, is immutable and always honorable, since it is due by the right of nature; therefore by no human power can it be brought about that the swearing of it not be always binding. The proof of the consequence is that no one can be absolved from an oath’s obligation, under which he promised something, unless the promise itself, or its matter, be first remitted or nullified, because the bond of an oath is per se inviolable and obliges by human, and most of all by divine, right; since therefore the matter cannot be removed from this oath, neither indeed can the oath itself be loosed. Third, there is hence collected as well that there is a great difference between this last oath and the ancient oath of primacy, because in the latter oath spiritual power as well, but in the former the temporal power only which the Pontiff usurps over kings, is abjured. Hence in his Preface the king much blames Bellarmine because, as he says, “he tries to prove that this oath of fidelity is nothing other than the ancient oath of primacy now fashioned in obscurer words and with ambiguities of circumlocution, etc.” From here he next says, at the beginning of his Apology, that “this oath was not established for any other end than that a distinction exist not only between faithful subjects and perfidious traitors, but also between pontificalists themselves who believe fidelity should be kept to kings and those of them who, under pretext of disparity of religion, think it is licit to conspire against a king.” Thence he later concludes that “this oath was established for the end that there will be the likeness of a pledge and contract of his subjects’ faith towards himself.” It contains, therefore, nothing besides civil obedience.

3. Finally, to this place has regard another class of proof that in his Apology, at the beginning of his attack on the letter of Bellarmine, the king introduces, by reduction to inconsistency. Because he who teaches that this oath is to be refused must in traitorous and absurd positions necessarily entangle the subjects whom he is striving to ward off from this oath. And he numbers fourteen propositions of that sort, all or some of which he says are necessarily inferred from rejection of the oath. Now which those propositions are will be clear below in our response to this part.

4. These are the things that I have from various places and sayings of the king been able to collect in his defense, which, although they are frivolous excuses and always turn on the same hinge, I have thought should not be omitted; both so that it might be more evident to all that nothing of service that could conduce to showing the difficulty or the truth has by us been passed over; and also so that, if possible, the king himself may note by what light reasons and what badly founded opinions he is, in a thing of such great moment and such great peril, allowing himself to be led. Therefore to the words of the king we say, in the first place, that his deeds do not conform to his words, and that one should go along more with the deeds and the things themselves than with the words or promises. For what matters it that the king affirms that he wished to exact by that oath nothing other from his subjects than civil fidelity and obedience if, from the form of the oath and in all its parts, the contrary is clearly shown? For in the royal edict, where this formula of oath is contained, the title written above it was: "For uncovering and repressing papists," that is, Catholics and those who obey the Pope and recognize his primacy; but if the oath demanded only civil fidelity and temporal obedience, it could not be a sign for distinguishing papists from sectaries or from apostates from the Pope, because civil obedience is common to all; for those who obey the Pope do not deny just civil obedience to their kings. Therefore such an oath is for no other reason said to be given for uncovering papists save that those who admit the oath are reckoned by that very fact to be renouncing the Pope and abjuring his power, and because those, on the contrary, who refuse it show themselves by that very fact to be faithful and obedient to the Pope; it is not, then, given for civil obedience alone; for (as also the king himself contends with all this strength) civil obedience does not conflict with the Roman Religion, and thereupon neither with obedience to the Pope, which they profess whom the king calls papists.

5. Besides, in the same royal edict two oaths are contained, distinct in their titles; for one is inscribed "About the primacy of the king in spiritual matter," which was the sort of oath in use under Elizabeth and which was by King James expanded with a certain promise, as we noted above in our preface. But the other was entitled: "Against the power of the Pontiff over Christian princes," which is nothing other than what the king now calls the oath of fidelity; for nothing else was in that edict passed, nor was mention up to that point made of anything else; therefore from the inscription itself it is clear that this oath contains abjuration of the power of the Pontiff over kings rather than fidelity of subjects toward the king. For the former is both directly intended, as the inscription shows, and is immediately and expressly declared and rather often repeated in the words; but the latter is at most indirectly and remotely or by a certain consequence contained in the oath itself, although it was by the king himself, perhaps, per se and principally intended. Hence rightly can we note here and apply a distinction of scholastics and moral philosophers about the intention of the doer and of the deed, and about the intention of the end and the choice of means for the end. For the king could by this oath have principally intended the civil fidelity of the subject and the security and indemnity of his affairs, but the means that he used to obtain it was abjuration of pontifical power; and thus, although the former end was perhaps the chief one in the doer, that is, in the king instituting the oath, nevertheless, in the oath itself, the particular target and as it were object of it is denial of pontifical power; and in this way we say that it is the principal end of the deed, that is, of such oath, because it is its intrinsic end and its proximate matter, as has been made clear in the individual parts of it. And thus, however the thing may be with the principal intention of the king, which we are not worried about nor do we wish to charge him with lying, it cannot be doubted but that the oath itself, which the king uses as the means, has exceeded the limits of civil obedience and, in order to strengthen that obedience beyond what is right, has invaded pontifical power by abjuring it and by at the same time overturning and denying the foundations of the faith.

6. To make this more fully clear, I note that in this phrase “the fidelity of civil obedience,” as far as the King of England uses it, there lurks an equivocation whereby the simple and ignorant can easily be deceived. For the king exacts from his subjects a civil obedience and fidelity of the sort that recognizes no superior to the king on earth, whether directly or indirectly, and of the sort that can in no case or for any cause be by any jurisdiction existing in mortal man impeded or taken away. And because so great a supreme power cannot be recognized in the king unless the power of the Pontiff is denied, which alone could be that superior on earth, even in civil matters, at least indirectly, therefore he has, in order to strengthen his civil obedience in the rank and manner in which he demands it, used the means of abjuring pontifical power. And therefore in his words he says that he is demanding from his subjects only civil fidelity, although in truth he is extorting from them the abjuration of the Catholic faith. However, according to sound and true doctrine, civil obedience is generally said to be that which is due to the higher temporal and civil powers, to each in its rank, and in its matter, and within its measure, according to the remark of Paul Romans 13.7: “Render therefore to all their dues; tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor.” And that of Peter, 1 Peter 2.13-14: “Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord’s sake; whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors as unto them that are sent by him, etc.” Therefore to civil magistrates too is civil obedience due, subordinate, however, to kings who are supreme; now to kings who do not recognize a superior in temporal things is also due the civil obedience that is greatest in its order; it cannot fail, however, if it is to be Christian obedience, to be subordinate to the spiritual power. Because it ought to be in accord with the measure of faith, for everyone, whether king or subject, is bound in accordance therewith “to obey those that have the rule” over them, Hebrews 13.17, and chiefly to the Vicar of Christ, to whom Christ himself has subjected all his sheep, among whom kings are numbered. And therefore, if by a temporal king such civil obedience is demanded as excludes obedience to the Pontiff, it is not now merely civil obedience but passes over into spiritual and ecclesiastical obedience. Now such is the obedience that the King of England is demanding of his subjects; therefore, in this formula of oath, as if forgetful of civil obedience, he relies wholly on the denial and abjuration of pontifical powers.

7. Hence it is clear, first, that what the King of England says is simply false, that he is demanding through this oath only “that fidelity from his subjects which they are in conscience bound to supply him.” For subjects are in conscience bound, as Christ said, Mark 12.17, to “render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s, and to God the things are God’s,” and consequently also to the Vicar of Christ the things that are his; and because these pertain in a singular way and title to God, they are contained under the second member of Christ's words. Wherefore, just as, when Caesar gives commands against God, God is to be obeyed rather than men, as Peter said, Acts 4.19 and 5.29, so, although Christians are in conscience bound to obey the king as supreme in his order, yet are they not bound, nor are they able, to obey him when he commands abjuration of pontifical power, nor even are they bound to obey him contrary to the obedience due to the Pontiff, which obedience is of a higher order, to which civil obedience is in such way subordinate that in certain cases, or for just cause, it should sometimes yield to it. Therefore it is false that in the oath nothing is demanded from the subjects of the king except what they are in conscience bound to supply him.

8. Now what he repeats a little later in the Preface with a small change in the words, "that nothing is in the oath contained beyond the profession of fidelity and civil obedience which nature itself prescribes to all born in the kingdom," must be read with caution and care. For it contains an objection and a latent error. The objection was made above, that obedience and fidelity are due to kings by natural right; therefore it is due to them independently of the Pontiff; hence the Pontiff himself can no more change it than he can change the right of nature, nor can he more absolve from it than from natural right. But the error or deception lies hidden, because the king does not think that one must judge in a higher way of civil obedience among Christians than among heathens; for to each is due from their subjects the civil obedience which nature itself prescribes; and so he thinks that the civil obedience to be supplied by Christians to their princes is not to be defined in other terms or with other rules than is the obedience due from the heathen to their kings. And that this was the mind of the king he will easily persuade himself who recalls to memory the king's other clearer words that he wrote in his Preface p.34 against Bellarmine. For he says: "Since he numbers me with heretics and puts me on a level with Julian the Apostate, he must think me to be outside the fold and flock of pontificalists. Therefore I am in right to be reckoned with heathen princes, over whom he himself admits the Pontiff has no power." On the basis of this principle, therefore, the king wanted to signify in other words that, just as the Pope cannot depose a heathen king nor absolve the latter's subjects from obedience to him, so neither can he free the former's own subjects from their obedience and fidelity; and that accordingly he is demanding nothing in the oath than what nature itself has imposed on all born in the kingdom.

9. Now Catholic truth teaches that, although faith and grace do not destroy nature, they do however perfect it and constitute it under higher rules and laws; and therefore civil obedience among Christians, although it arises from the law of nature, is nevertheless defined and limited to a civil obedience that is in conformity to a such state, and is not repugnant to faith and religion, and is subordinate to the just laws and precepts of the Church. And, on that account, civil obedience among Christians is not to be equated in all respects with civil obedience among the heathen, or among men, who can be governed by pure natural prudence without any light of faith. Because the heathen or infidels, not having been baptized, are not subjected to the Pontiff and to the laws of the Church in the sort of way that Christians are; and therefore Christian princes, even those who are supreme in temporal things, can be prohibited by pontifical law from commanding, even in civil matter, something to their subjects in many cases where heathen princes cannot be compelled, because they are not in the bosom of the sheep, nor did they even enter it. But King James (as we proved in book 1), although he cannot be excused from the crime of infidelity, or heresy and apostasy, is not for that reason to be numbered among the heathen in exemption from the obedience of the Pontiff, for by reason of baptism he cannot in himself delete its character; so neither can he be exempt from the debt of ecclesiastical obedience, even if a thousand times he destroy the yoke and break the bonds and say: I will not obey. For he will be able in fact to resist and not obey, but he will with God always be guilty of the disobedience, not only of himself, but also of his subjects. Wherefore, when he says that “nothing is in the oath contained beyond profession of that fidelity and temporal obedience which nature itself prescribes to all born in the kingdom,” if he understand it (as he seems to) of obedience loosed from all rule and direction of the faith, such as can exist even among the heathen who use right reason, he sufficiently confesses, by that very fact, the error of the oath and the perversity it involves, because he demands such civil obedience as excludes in it ecclesiastical obedience and as is put in preference to it; but if we wish in a sound way to interpret the civil obedience that nature prescribes to all those born in the kingdom, it will thus be false that nothing else is contained in the oath, as will be clear in our response to the objection that we have put together from those words.

10. For we reply that the fidelity and obedience given to kings, although it is founded and rooted in natural right, is more truly and properly said to be of the right of nations, because it is not of natural right immediately but on the supposition of a joining together of men in one political body and perfect community. Or certainly it can at most be said that it is of the right of nature on the supposition of a pact and convention among men themselves, just as is of natural right the obligation or promise of a vow to God and of an oath among men, as above in book 3 and also in bk.3 De Legibus we have declared at length. And hence it happens that the obligation of civil obedience is not, as to its matter and mode, equal in all men who are born in a kingdom, but exists in each one according to the original institution of the kingdom and the condition of the pact and contract between the king and the people, about which there is wont to be agreement either by written laws, which are elsewhere called fora, or by a custom exceeding the memory of men. And hence also it happens that the bond of such fidelity or obedience either is sometimes not obligatory, or can sometimes even be rescinded, according to the conditions that in the first contract between the king and the kingdom were either expressly stated or, by the demand of the right of nature itself, internally included. And in this way the obedience does not oblige to the obeying of a king when he prescribes things illicit or contrary to the salvation of the soul. And the perversity of a king can be so great against the common good of the republic, or against the compacts and agreement made with the king, that the whole kingdom can by common counsel rescind the pacts and depose the king, and thus liberate itself from civil obedience and fidelity to him, as we said above in chapter 5.

11. Thus, therefore, in a good sense can Christians who are born in a kingdom also be said to have the fidelity of their kings prescribed by nature, though in a way that is accommodated to the common right of the nations of the Christian and Catholic world, or rather to divine right and faith. But this way is that civil obedience is subordinate to ecclesiastical and is directed by it, as far as those things are concerned that have regard to the salvation of the soul, and consequently that the bond on which the obligation of civil obedience is founded can be dissolved by the Pastor of the Church, if he who has the civil power abuses it to the spiritual ruin of his subjects, or of himself, together with public scandal and harm to others. But in this sense it is false that the King of England in that oath is only demanding from his subjects the civil obedience that nature itself prescribes to all those born in a Christian kingdom; because nature itself in Christians, having been illumined by divine faith, asserts that kings are to be obeyed in civil matters unless they include or prescribe something against the faith or against ecclesiastical obedience, in the way that, as has been sufficiently and more than sufficiently proved above, is done in this oath by the King of England.

12. Now to the sign by which the king tries to prove the contrary, that he did not permit the clause, in which the power to excommunicate him is abjured, to be put into the oath, we reply that, though it be so (which, because of the word of the king testifying to the fact, we do not doubt), yet the sign is insufficient. First because, although an express abjuration of the power of excommunicating was removed, an implicit and covert one was left. Second, because there is expressly put in the oath an abjuration of the power of the Pontiff to depose a king for any cause, however just it be, and of loosing subjects from any fidelity or obedience due or promised or sworn to the king; which power is with no less certitude fitting to the Pontiff than the power of excommunicating. Both are made clear easily from what has been said. Because in two ways is it possible for a king who is obstinate, or who is a rebel against religion, to be deprived by the Pontiff of the power of the kingdom, and for his subjects to be absolved from their fidelity; in one way as to use alone and by way of a certain suspension; in another way as to property and dominion and by way of deposition; and both does the king of England deny in the oath, the first indeed more expressly in the second and fourth sections of the oath than in the other sections, but the other in the whole of the oath and in all its parts. Catholic doctrine, however, teaches both.

13. For the first mode of privation is intrinsically included in the very bond of major excommunication, as Pope Gregory VII teaches in ch. 'Nos Sanctorum' 15 q.6, where he says that those "who are tied" to excommunicated persons "by fidelity or oath we by our apostolic authority absolve, and we in every way forbid that they keep fidelity with them." In which words a new prohibition is not so much made as is that declared which by virtue of such censure is done. For the censure deprives persons not only of sacred but also of civil communication in all things or cases not excepted by right; but therein is not only an exception not made, but a prohibition is even made clear. But that it is not an absolute deposition but a sort of suspension is clear from the limitation thereto adjoined: "Until they come themselves to make satisfaction;" for hence is it clear that the absolution is not perpetual but for as long as the bond endures. It is therefore by way of suspension of power as to use, and not by way of deposition. But because those final words are said not to be found in the manuscript codex found in the Vatican, a like decision with that express declaration is found in Pascas 2 on ch. 'Iuratos' 15 q.6, "as long as he is excommunicated." And a similar limitation is contained in the final ch. De Poenis.

14. Nor does the king's objection stand in the way of this, that excommunication is a spiritual censure and that therefore the privation of jurisdiction or of temporal power even as to use and by way of suspension exceeds its limits. For the consequence is denied; for although excommunication is said to be a spiritual censure, whether from its principal matter and end or because it proceeds from spiritual power, yet, just as the power itself, although it be spiritual, is extended indirectly to temporal things, so also the censure of excommunication is in the same way both spiritual and extended indirectly to temporal things; for it deprives not only of sacred communion but also of civil and human, as is clear from the institution and usage of the Church, approved by perpetual tradition and founded on Scripture. For in 2 John 1.10 is said: “neither bid him God speed;” and Paul in 1 Corinthians 5.11: “With such an one no not to eat.” And the reason he in the same place insinuates when he says, vv.3, 5: “I have judged...to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.” In this way, then, is a man harassed also in temporal and corporal things, so that the harassing give him understanding, so that he return from his stubbornness.

15. But the other way of privation, by way of deposition from the kingdom or from some other temporal power, and consequently with perpetual absolution of subjects from civil fidelity and obedience, is not the proper and intrinsic effect of major excommunication, provided nothing further is added, as I assume from the proper matter of it and from the common usage of the Church, and it is sufficiently collected also from the rights mentioned. Yet, nevertheless, even this deposition and absolution is, by way of singular punishment, joined to censures when the offences of princes compel Pontiffs to use that severity, which use was sufficiently proved by us in book 3. And hence is the power demonstrated, because so public and constant a use, and one without the violence of arms so effective, could not exist without the faith of the Church recognizing in the Pontiff a legitimate power for imposing punishment which is included in the power of binding and loosing given to Peter by Christ and in the pastoral staff, which he has received for ruling the Church, as we sufficiently showed in the place cited. And here as well Paul’s reason has place, that often a man that is a sinner needs to be very severely afflicted in bodily and temporal goods so that he may return to his right mind. Again, a very good reason is that subjects often need this remedy so that they be not overthrown. For that is why Paul said about a heretic, Titus 3.10, “after the first and second admonition reject him;” which is wont to be much more necessary in the case of a prince than in the case of others.

16. And thus there is no problem in what the king says, that this punishment exceeds far and wide the limits of excommunication; for let it be so, yet when deposition is thus understood it does not, as is in the oath abjured, exceed the limits of pontifical power. But when he says that this right has by no legitimate title been acquired to the Pontiff, we reply that it has indeed not been by any human title properly acquired but has been by divine right conferred, as was shown from the words of Christ in book 3. Where we also refuted the words of the king, “by the unjust usurpation and secular violence of the Popes.” For to say these things is easy, especially for a powerful king and one too much caught and blinded by affection of supreme power (to speak pace him), but it is impossible to prove them. And the king has thus introduced no proof or evidence for this unjust usurpation, nor is it likely that an unjust usurpation has prevailed against the power of emperors and kings. Hence those words that the king adds about “secular violence” are more per se incredible, because this violence is not done except by arms and secular power; but this was not so great in the Pontiffs that it was sufficient for inflicting violence on emperors and kings. And thus is there no such violence of the Pontiffs read of in the histories; it is asserted gratuitously, then, and by mere freedom of speaking.

17. Wherefore, from among the corollaries that the king infers, the first and second, about the absolution of subjects from obedience and oath of fidelity, have been from what has been said been sufficiently rejected. But the third about the comparison of this oath with the previous one about primacy is also easily refuted. For rightly did Cardinal Bellarmine say that the one is virtually and covertly included in the other. Because the power by which the Pontiff deposes kings who are schismatic and pernicious to the flock of Christ is not other than the very power that he received from Christ, which is one and indivisible (so to explain the thing), and therefore it is not divided or lessened, nor can it be in part abjured and in part retained. Since, therefore, in this oath the power of checking and punishing kings is abjured to the Pontiff, his whole spiritual power is thoroughly abjured, which is what was expressly done in the previous oath. Now a sufficient indication of this truth is that the king himself, so as to seem to be denying with a foundation this power of deposing him, denies as a result that Christ gave to Peter, or through him to the Roman Pontiff, supreme spiritual power for ruling the Church, thinking that these are so connected that one cannot be denied without the other. Therefore, while in this oath one is expressly denied, the other is as a result and virtually denied and with the same perjury. But the final inference and, as it were, protestation of the king about the end of the oath is of no help to him. For let it be that he intended by that oath to separate out and recognize traitors, yet the means that he used was the abjuration of pontifical power. Hence by that oath not only does he civilly distinguish faithful persons from traitors, but he also induces faithful Catholics to betray and abjure their faith; from which it turns out that he discriminates much more between believers and non-believers, or at any rate between those resolutely refusing an unjust oath or wretchedly making pretense of it to avoid temporal disadvantage. Wherefore, such an oath should be in right reckoned a character of the Anglican schism than a pledge or contract of the faith of subjects.

18. It remains that we respond to the final proof of the king taken from the fourteen propositions that he infers from rejection of the oath. And to begin with we say that there is evidently collected from them that the intention of the oath is not so much about supplying obedience to the king as about denying power to the Pontiff and usurping it to himself. For, out of all the propositions, only one pertains to guarding royal dignity, and that one does not follow from rejecting the oath; but the others are almost all directly about Pontifical power and they are, in a sound sense, very true, and therefore is the oath rightly rejected, because it contains the contradictory assertions, as the king himself admits when he says that these propositions follow by antithesis from the rejection of the oath. Now to make this more evident, I will note the individual propositions and what must be thought about them.

The first is: That I, King James, am not legitimate king of his kingdom and of all my other domains. But this follows not at all from detestation of the oath, for although James be true and legitimate king, nevertheless the oath is corrupt in the way that pontifical power for deposing him for legitimate cause is abjured; for this power the Pope does have over legitimate and true kings and emperors.

The second is: That it is licit for the Pope to depose me from the kingdom purely on his own authority, or if not on his own, yet by authority of the Church or the Roman See; if not by authority of the Church or the Roman See, yet by other means and with the help of others it is licit for him to depose me from the kingdom.

The third is: That it is licit for the Pope to give rulings at will about my kingdoms and domains.

The fourth is: That it is in the power of the Pope to concede to any foreign prince whatever power to invade my domains.

The fifth is: That it is licit for the Pope to absolve my subjects from the faith and obedience due to me.

The sixth is: That it is in the power of the Pope to give license to one or more of my subjects to bear arms against me.

The seventh is: That it is in the power of the Pope to give pardon to my subjects for offering violence to my person or domains, or to any of my subjects.

The eighth is: That if the Pope, by a sentence passed, excommunicate or depose me, subjects are not at liberty to persist in the faith and obedience due to me.

The ninth is: That if the Pope judicially excommunicate or depose me, subjects are not at liberty to defend with all their strength my person and my crown.

The tenth is: That if the Pope has promulgated any sentence either of excommunication or deposition against me, subjects are by force of that sentence in no way obliged to reveal all the conspiracies or treasons commenced against me that they happen either to hear or learn of.

The eleventh is: That it is not heretical nor detestable to think that princes excommunicated by the Pope can be with impunity deposed or killed by their subjects or by anyone else at all.

The twelfth is: That the Pope has power to absolve my subjects from this oath or from any part of it.

Now all these assertions more or less come together into one, which is declared as it were by parts in those twelve positions so as to exaggerate the thing. But in some of them there is sometimes added a phrase which destroys and changes the true sense. What, then, is said in the second position, that the Pope can depose King James purely on his own authority, is very true and Catholic provided the word ‘purely’ does not exclude legitimate cause, but declares only a sufficiency, without the aid of any other, of that authority. And because the proposition speaks in particular of such person in whom a legitimate cause is not lacking, as is sufficiently clear from what has been said and as is manifest to the Universal Church, therefore the proposition makes true sense without any equivocation, because it does not exclude legitimate cause but supposes it. But in the third, which is more or less similar, the phrase ‘at will’ contains ambiguity and gives occasion for calumny; especially because in other places the king is wont to say ‘at pleasure’ or something the like. Therefore, if it be understood of a just and legitimate choice, the proposition is true; but if it be understood of pure and absolute will and mere pleasure, thus it is an imposture and can by no likely consequence be inferred from rejection of the oath. And for the same reason about the rest. For all are about the same supreme power of the Pope to coerce Christian rebels, even if they be kings, as far as to depose them, should the gravity of the cause and the necessity of the spiritual kingdom demand it.

19. Only in the tenth proposition must one note (as was indicated above) that partly it involves a repugnance and partly gives occasion for calumny. I say that it involves a repugnance because, if the king, through a just sentence of the Pope, is by that very fact deposed, by that fact do those who before were subjects to him cease to be subjects; for the king himself would now not be king nor superior. And therefore, if any plots were made against him, they could not now be properly called treasons. Nor would the citizens be bound, at any rate by a title of fidelity of subjection, to reveal them. But I add that that way of speaking can be exposed to calumnies because, although a criminal king be deposed, he cannot at once by plot or ambush be justly killed by anyone among the people; because neither may a private citizen who is a criminal be licitly killed in these ways by other citizens on their own authority, but only on public authority, or by power received from it, whether by command or special commission.

Wherefore if, after a king has been deposed, some people, without having received power from a legitimate judge, were through private ambush to devise death against him, one who, outside the confessional, were to become aware of it, would be obliged from charity, with the concurrence of the circumstances that are wont to be necessary for such an obligation, to reveal them so as to prevent an evil to his neighbor. But when one proceeds against the person of such a king according to the tenor of the just sentence, not exceeding the limits of the power conceded by a legitimate judge, then all obligation of revealing a secret would cease, because now the ambush would not be iniquitous but a just war. Because, therefore, that proposition speaks indistinctly, for that reason I said that it can give occasion for calumny, as if it were saying that even when plots and treasons are unjust and iniquitous citizens are never held by any title, even of charity, to make them manifest; which is false, nor does it follow from rejection of the oath, as is of itself evident.

20. The same caution must be used in the eleventh proposition; for its opinion is in sum that an excommunicated king can be deposed or killed with impunity by anyone at all. Which, as thus simply pronounced, is very false; for excommunication alone and by itself does not give power to kill the one excommunicated, nor to deprive him of the lordship of his own affairs, but to deprive him only of communion, and the one excommunicated can, as a result, be deprived of the use of any of his own property if this cannot be done without such communion. An excommunicated king, therefore, if the sentence contains nothing else, cannot at once be deposed or killed by his subjects or by anyone else, nor does this follow from rejection of the oath. But if in that proposition under the term 'excommunication' is included also deposition and distrust, which is in a canonical sentence sometimes done, thus it will contain truth; nay, even understood of the sole censure of excommunication in common form, if the sense of the proposition were that an excommunicated prince, while the excommunication lasts, is deprived of the right of commanding his subjects to obey him, but that, if he compel them, they can themselves resist him, even by just war, the proposition will in this sense be very true and the contrary doctrine heretical, against the force and the power of the keys of the Church; but in that proposition, and its bare words, all this is not sufficiently explained, and therefore calumny should be avoided and one should speak plainly.

21. The thirteenth proposition is: That this oath may by no means be administered to my subjects with full and legitimate authority. This does indeed plainly follow from the rejection of the oath, because an unjust oath can by legitimate authority be supplied by no one. The proposition is, however, very true and certain, which is evidently shown from the former ones, for it is clear from the tenor of them that all the articles are about the power of the Pontiff, and thereupon many articles contrary to the power of the Pontiff are contained in the oath; therefore it is manifest that there is in a temporal king no legitimate authority to administer such an oath to his subjects. And with the like clarity it follows that such an oath is not being given about civil obedience alone, but about apostolic power; nay is being demanded contrary to it.

22. The final proposition is: That this oath would have to be taken with equivocation, with mental evasion or tacit reservation, and not from the opinion of one's mind and from one's inmost breast, in the true faith of a Christian man. Now this in no way is connected with or follows from rejection of the oath. Because although that part of the oath too is rejected, it is not thereby affirmed that this oath must be taken with equivocation. For these affirmations are contraries and both can be false and between them there is a mean, namely that the oath is supplied in neither way. Hence so far are we from saying or thinking that such an oath is to be taken with equivocation that rather we reject this too. Both because it would be done with perjury against the final part of the oath, and also because it would be done with scandal and with omission of confession of the faith at a due time; nay, also with external denial of the faith, as we will in the following chapter more explain.

23. Finally, after these propositions, the king adds these words: "These are the articles elicited by antithesis from various parts of the oath. To these the opposite theses neither touch upon the primacy of the Pontiff in spiritual causes, nor has it ever been concluded and defined in any fully completed General Council that this sort of power over kings pertains to the authority of the Pontiff. And lastly their scholastic doctors themselves, in some inexplicable quarrelling, disagree with each other about them up to this day." But it has already been sufficiently shown by us how the power, which is in these articles explained, pertains to the spiritual dignity of the Pontiff, and how, as a result, the opposite theses included in the oath are directly repugnant to it. But what the king subjoins, that in no fully completed General Council has it been concluded and defined that this sort of power over kings pertains to the authority of the Pontiff, nay, that about this very power there is dissent among scholastics, is plainly false in both its parts; neither can it be affirmed by the king except because, since he was himself not able to peruse the Councils or the scholastics, he has been deceived by Protestants. For above in book 3 it was shown that many General Councils acknowledged and approved this power in the Supreme Pontiff; besides the fact that, without a definition of a Council, the definitions of the Pontiffs would be sufficient for making the truth certain. However, more often the Pontiffs together with General Councils have used that power, as Innocent III in the Lateran Council ch.3 and Innocent IV in the Council of Lyons. Hence, there is no doubt but that Councils themselves, by approving the things done, recognized the power in the Pontiff. In addition, this truth is founded on the common tradition and consent of the Church.

24. Nor is there dissension on this point among Catholic theologians; for it is those, I think, whom the king understands by the name of scholastics, for his own theologians detest scholastic theology. But about the common consent of Catholics on this point enough has been said in book 3, and more extensively by our Cardinal Bellarmine in his book against Barclay, at the beginning. And those who say they disagree should show us the Catholic authors who contradict this truth, which certainly they cannot do. For even those scholastics who have seemed sometimes to restrict the power of the Pontiff, as Occam, Gerson, Parisius, and the like, never denied to him this power of deposing kings who were heretical or pernicious to the salvation of their subjects; although, in the mode of speaking, there be among them some diversity as to whether the Pope of himself and immediately does it, or only by giving command to the subjects to throw off such a king; and in this too many of them, and those who think better, and all the rest, judge that both modes fall under the power of the Pontiff. And in truth it is per se incredible that a Christian kingdom has no remedy against an heretical king; for it is against all reason and against the accurate providence of God, since an heretical king may very easily infect the whole kingdom, as experience teaches. Hence the Pope too, if he be a heretic, can be deposed by the Church; therefore it is necessary that there be power on earth that can depose an heretical, stubborn, and incorrigible king. Therefore it should above all exist in the Pontiff as in the supreme visible pastor on earth of souls; nor could such a power have been located in anyone else more agreeably in order that the depriving, which is exposed to many difficulties and perils, might be done with greater maturity and justice, as has been explained.

Chapter 7: The Supreme Pontiff was not only able, but also obliged, to turn English Catholics by his warning away from profession of the said oath.

Summary: 1. Three objections of the King of England against the Pontifical Brief. 2. The foundations of the contrary doctrine. The Pontiff has power to examine the oath proposed by the king. 3. The Pontiff is bound by his function to condemn such oath. 4. Any controversy about the oath whatever, although it be a doubtful one, is to be settled by the Pontiff. 5. The first objection of the king is turned back against him. 6. The Pontiff has imposed on the king no punishment. 7. Difference between the Briefs of Pius V and of Paul V. 8. Response to the second objection of the king.

1. Hitherto we have pointed out the injustice and errors of the aforesaid oath of fidelity, and we have refuted vain excuses; it remains for us to defend the Pontifical Briefs and make satisfaction to the complaints and objections of the king; which can from the principles laid down be briefly and easily carried out. At the beginning, then, of his Apology, the king dares to blame the Pontiff because “in his Brief sent to Britain and there made public he has forbidden all the little papists to suffer themselves to be obligated to this oath of fidelity.” And three sins especially he notes in it, one against the king himself, another against English Catholics, a third in the manner itself of refuting the oath. About the first he speaks thus: “Since war has not been declared, it cannot be denied but that the Pontiff has acted against good morals and against the custom especially of Christian princes, because he has condemned me unheard.” Hence he later thus concludes: “The Pontiff, if he considers himself my judge competent, as is wont to be said, why does he condemn me unheard? But if things stand otherwise, and if there is no business between the Pope and me (which is most true), why does he get mixed up in a work not his own, and put his scythe to another’s crop, especially in a matter that is civil and in no way concerns him?”

Second, he proves that the Pontiff has sinned against the Catholics of England, because “he has thrown them into wretched difficulties, such that either they renounce, with danger to life and loss of fortune, fidelity to their prince, or they bring, with loss of Catholic faith, the salvation of their souls, as the Pontiff pretends, into peril.” For both of these perils would be avoided if, as they had begun to do, they were allowed to give the oath in good faith. Third, he proves that the Pontiff has been deficient in manner, “because he takes on a lot of work in reviewing the whole formula of the oath as to its wording, but afterwards, with one general word, he proscribes the whole oath,” not indicating what he is blaming, so that it might either be emended or favorably interpreted, or, if he despises to do this himself, so that his Catholic subjects might have some excuse if they refuse the oath.

2. These objections, however, proceed from two erroneous principles. One is that the Pontiff does not have direct spiritual power over the king; the other is that much less does the Pontiff have even indirect power over the king in temporal matters. But the contrary dogmas were established and proved by us in book 3, on the supposition of which all the objections are easily refuted. For we say, to begin with, that the Pontiff could of his own right examine a formula of oath prescribed by the king and, to the extent he made judgment of it, condemn or prohibit it as sacrilegious either as contrary to the Christian religion or as contrary to the reverence of an oath. The proof is, first, that an oath is a thing very spiritual and sacred; therefore it falls directly under the spiritual power of the Pontiff; therefore it pertained to the function of the Pontiff to condemn an oath in respect of a thing unjust and very pernicious to the faithful, such as has above been sufficiently shown to be contained in that formula.

Second, when a civil law either exceeds its own temporal limits or makes disposition about temporal things by fostering sins or giving occasion to them, the Pontiff by his spiritual power, as far as it extends indirectly to temporal things, can condemn it, and invalidate it or declare it invalid, as was extensively shown above in book 3 chapter 22; but that formula, as the king himself contends, is a certain royal decree or civil law, and (as we have shown) it exceeds the limits of civil and temporal matter, and contains many things contrary to Religion and good morals, such that it cannot by the faithful be kept without loss of their souls; therefore the Pontiff in condemning it used the legitimate power of the keys, namely the key of knowledge, by making clear the injustice and malice of the oath, which is the proper function of the pastor to whom it concerns to feed the flock of Christ, and the key of power, by prohibiting the use of such oath. Hence there is a confirmation too, for the Supreme Pontiff has the right to defend the power that Christ has conferred on his See; but that oath is directly contrary to pontifical power; therefore he could by right efficaciously condemn and prohibit it.

3. Next we add that not only was he able but he was also, by force of his function and office, obliged not to keep silent about or to hide the truth, but to warn his subjects to abstain from such an oath. The proof is, first, that he is bound to uncover public scandals and occasions of sinning in doctrine when, by fraud or deception, they are offered by the enemies of the Church to the faithful. And he is likewise bound, insofar as is in him, to take away by his power or impede such perils, especially when they are approved and proposed by some public authority. For both of these are included in the words of Christ, “feed my sheep,” for there the power is given, as was above made clear extensively, and those words contain, together with the conferring of the power, the imposition of a precept on Peter and his successors, as is clear both from the form of the words and from their matter; for this precept, on the supposition of the function, is connatural with it, on account of which Paul said, Hebrews 13.17, that those will give an account for the souls of their subjects who have the rule over them. But in this oath all those things come together, namely the hidden occasion of error and deception in accepting the abjuration of pontifical power under color of an oath of civil fidelity, and consequently an occasion of schism, heresy, and perjury; therefore the Pontiff was bound, by force of his function, to disclose the truth, notwithstanding any disadvantage whatever, because the truth in the case of such great spiritual harm is not, on account of disadvantages feared from the malice of men, to be passed over in silence.

Again, this obligation follows from another principle, because the Pontiff, as a faithful and prudent steward, is bound to protect and defend ecclesiastical rights. Which, although it be true of all ecclesiastical goods, has place especially in protecting pontifical dignity and power, because it is the foundation of ecclesiastical unity, as Christ himself taught, and is most of all necessary for keeping the truth of the faith, as experience itself shows and as was proved in book 3. But this pontifical power is subverted by this oath; in the kingdom, indeed, of England by power and corrupt doctrine; and thence it could rebound by corrupt example to others; therefore was the Pontiff bound, notwithstanding any difficulty or impediment, to oppose himself to that oath and to detest it.

4. Nay rather, we add further that not only in a thing so clear, as is the perversity of that oath, but also if it were a thing doubtful, did it pertain to the Pontiff to disclose the truth, lest in a thing so grave and dangerous the faithful should dwell in the dark. Thus does Innocent III generally teach in ch. ‘Per Venerabilem’ Qui Filii sint Legiti., and he adduces the saying of Deuteronomy 17.8-12: “If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, etc.” up to “And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the Lord thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die.” Which law, to the extent it is directive and moral, has place even now, not by virtue of the Old Law, but by virtue of evangelical faith, because, on the supposition of the power of the Supreme Priest of the Law of Grace, that obligation necessarily follows from a law connatural, as it were, with that power. Hence is the reason proper, because the matter is spiritual, both because it pertains to the doctrine of faith and morals, which pertains to the pastors of the Church, not to kings, as was above sufficiently proved from Scripture and the Fathers; and also because it immediately touches the salvation of the soul, for it treats of whether such an oath is harmful to the soul or not; therefore to the pastors of souls, and especially to their head, does judgment in a case of such doubt pertain.

There is a confirmation and declaration; for when a like controversy has arisen between a king, even a Catholic one, and the Pope whether some oath is licit and conformable to the faith, such a controversy is certainly not to be settled by war; because neither is war a fitting means for declaring moral truth, nor would in that way provision be suitably made for the Church in spiritual things, for schisms would thence arise and a kingdom divided against itself could not stand. Nor even could such a controversy be ended by arbitrators, because, in declaring moral truth, such judgment about a thing doubtful does not go beyond human opinion, nor can it with greater power be passed by any arbitrator, and so it does not suffice for the security of the Church, nor can the Pontiff submit himself to such a judgment; therefore it is necessary for such a controversy to be settled by the king or the Pontiff. But no one who has read the Scriptures would in this business prefer royal to pontifical power, since the latter is simply superior, spiritual, and belongs to the Vicar Pastor, to whom Christ committed his sheep for directing them in faith and morals. A king in a like controversy, then, should be directed and governed by the Pontiff, and be as a sheep led and fed by the pastor.

From these it is sufficiently proved that the King of England not only wrongly complains about the Supreme Pontiff that he has passed judgment on his formula for the oath, but also very gravely sins in disagreeing with his judgment, since he is bound to obey him as a subject, especially in spiritual causes, to which the controversy about the oath very evidently pertains. Add that he has hitherto been unable to bring any just excuse or defense of his oath, as was shown in the first part of this book, and what we said there proves that none can be found. Nor has he even against the Pontifical Briefs objected anything grave or of any moment, especially as to what pertains to the point of the principal cause, which is about the uprightness of the oath, as we will see in what follows.

5. In his first matter of blame, then, wherewith he accuses the Pontiff, because the Pontiff is condemning him unheard since there has between them been no war declared, the king himself sins in many ways in making the accusation. First, because the reason about undeclared war is impertinent. For even among temporal princes, especially Christian ones, although neither is subject to another, it is not licit to condemn unheard, even after declaration of war. For in order that a war be itself justly declared on the part of the attacker, it is necessary that he not make moves against an unheard party. For, on the witness of Augustine, bk. Quaestionum in Josue, otherwise bk. Sex Quaestionum q.10: "Wars are wont to be defined as just that avenge injuries, if any people or city, which is to be attacked by war, has neglected to avenge what has by its own been done wickedly or to return what has by injury been taken away." But these cannot hold of a party that has not been heard; therefore even in a just war a just condemnation cannot be made against an unheard party; therefore not even after declaration of war can one king by a sentence, or in any other way, condemn unheard another his equal or superior, in the way that the king seems to suppose in his objection. Next because, although among other princes equally supreme it might in any way whatever proceed, a far different reason intervenes between himself and the Pontiff; and therefore he is abusing that comparison as well, since he is by right subject to the Pontiff by reason of baptism and of the faith that he therein professed. But if the king himself does not fear publicly to deny this truth and to profess the contrary, how can he complain that he is condemned unheard? Besides, when the king says that war has not been declared between himself and the Pontiff, if he understands it of a material or corporal war, what relevance is that to the cause, which is principally and directly, so to say, spiritual? But a spiritual war has above all been declared between the King of England and the Supreme Pontiff, and it was first publicly declared by Henry, whom James his successor imitates; and this is enough for him, even were he condemned, not to be able to complain that he is condemned unheard.

6. Next, why does he complain that he has been condemned? For in neither Pontifical Brief is any condemnation read of, nor excommunication passed, nor deposition pronounced, nor any other punishment inflicted, or sentence stated. But if he calls the condemnation and prohibition of the oath condemnation, he wrongly says that he has been condemned unheard, because the formula of the oath is heard and read everywhere, which is enough for him to be able to be condemned. Nor is it necessary for a person to be further heard when against him no declaratory sentence of crime committed in publishing or seeking such an oath, nor any punishment on account of the same crime against a king, has been passed. But the king says the Pontiff has condemned him unheard, "partly by numbering him with the persecutors, partly by commanding English Catholics to abstain from this oath." But neither of these pertains to a proper and juridical condemnation that ought not to be passed against a person unheard. For to judge by private opinion from a fame that is public and manifest in its effects, and to speak about someone as about an author of some crime, is often licit, even if he himself is not first heard, as is per se manifest. But for what reason the King of England could justly be numbered with the persecutors of the faithful we will see in chapter 10. But about the prohibition of the oath we have already said that the king has been sufficiently heard as to this part by the reading of the formula itself of the oath, which neither does he himself deny, nor can there be doubt that it was by his authority done and proposed to his own subjects.

Wherefore, if the king is only speaking of private condemnation, so to say, the dilemma he subjoins adds nothing to the issue, because judging privately about someone does not need a competent judge, that is, a judge using jurisdiction; nor is it even necessary, as I said, to hear the person to be judged; for it is enough to have sufficient causes, reasons, and motives to so judge. Nor is the dilemma rightly accommodated even to the second member of the prohibition of the oath, because condemning false doctrine does not need a competent judge of its author, nor the hearing of him otherwise than by his writings. But to prohibit under precept such an oath, there must indeed be jurisdiction over those to whom the precept is made, which jurisdiction English Catholics in the Supreme Pontiff, as in their pastor, do recognize. Rightly, therefore, could the Pontiff impose such a prohibition on the English, especially since he did not so much make a new law as declare a divine and natural law about avoiding an illicit oath, and about fleeing from profession of false error, and confirm it with his precept. But although, with respect to the king, it be very true that the Pontiff is his competent judge, as we showed above, yet nevertheless in this act he exercised no judgment of jurisdiction over the king. For although the author of a like oath were some unbaptized heathen prince, if the oath involved some error in the Christian faith, or injury to our religion, the Pontiff could condemn it and prohibit it to Catholics living under any gentile emperor whatever, as is sufficiently manifest from what has hitherto been said.

7. Wherefore wrongly does the king on p.7 of his Apology compare and make equivalent the sentence passed by Pius V against Elizabeth with this Pontifical Brief of Paul V when he says: "Could he (that is, Pius V) have laid down anything more bitter or more grave than this Pontiff has laid down against me? For what difference there is between these two, to loose subjects from the bond of obedience and to command them to take up arms, as Pius V did, and to proclaim to subjects that they should not obey a prince demanding an oath of fidelity, as today's Pontiff did, cannot easily be discerned." But although the deed of both Pontiffs was very fair, they are so far distant that a difference can very easily be discerned between them. For Pius V pronounced a sentence against the person of the queen, declared a very grave punishment, and used his power severely, though justly, against her. But Paul V has in his Briefs passed no sentence against the King of England, nor has he hitherto punished him with any penalty, or declared by his authority that he has incurred it; but he has disclosed the wickedness of the oath alone and, as was a necessary consequence, forbidden the king commanding it to be obeyed. But he did not (as the king always alleges) simply and absolutely forbid subjects to give their king an oath of fidelity, but that they not give this oath, which is injurious to Christian faith and religion. And so these things are very different, to prohibit the king's subjects to take this oath or to absolve them from civil obedience to their king; for they can, without coercion to this oath, give and swear the civil obedience that is not repugnant to the purity of the Christian faith.

8. To the second objection about the losses and dangers of the subjects, the reply is that subject Catholics are not being reduced to those difficulties by the Pontiff teaching truth and prohibiting what was per se evil, but by the king commanding such an oath. For, on the supposition of the force and coercion of the king, the Pontiff could not, in fulfilling his function as was right, keep silent about or hide the error. To the third a response has been very well made by others, that the Pontiff wrote as a legislator, and so indicated briefly what was to be avoided. But we can add that it was not necessary for the Pontiff to designate what in the oath he was reprehending, for from its beginning up to its end there is almost nothing in it which should not be avoided and shunned, because in its individual parts, as we have shown, either the same or diverse errors are inculcated. And all its sentences are so connected with each other that scarce are any of them free from suspicion of error. Wherefore not only by a prudent, but also by a necessary, counsel did the Pontiff designate nothing in particular as worthy of blame, lest he should seem tacitly to approve the rest.

Chapter 8: Might Catholics who admit this oath be by any reason or in any way excused from fault?

Summary: 1. Twofold objection of the king against the Pontifical Brief. 2. Response to the first objection. 3. To the second. 4. Whether he who takes up the oath can be excused from sin. First excuse. 5. Second excuse. 6. Third excuse. 7. The first excuse is refuted. 8. A grave sin is committed in abjuring the power of the Pontiff even in a single act of deposing a king for just cause. 9. It is shown by an argument ad hominem. Foundation of the said pontifical power. 10. The second excuse is refuted. 11. A confirmation of pontifical power is refuted. An evasion is excluded. 12. In what sense and in what persons the third excuse may have place.

1. After the beginning and as it were preface of his Apology, the king first reviews the Brief of the Pontiff to the letter, and then advances to attack it. Now we can distinguish the Brief itself into three parts; for first the Pontiff prefaces a few words to console the faithful in their tribulation and to instruct them in morals; next he condemns and prohibits the oath; and finally he exhorts his sons to courageous resistance for the faith and to concord of charity. All which words pretty much the king attacks in the same order, but it has seemed more agreeable to us to complete first the matter of the oath and then to digress with the king about the other things. After setting forth the formula of the oath, the Pontiff forbids the taking of it in these words: "Which things being so, it should to you be clear from the very words that this sort of oath cannot, with preservation of the Catholic faith and the salvation of your souls, be given, since it contains many things that are openly contrary to faith and salvation." Against which words the king objects nothing new but repeats the two attacks which, though he often presses, he adds no force to beside acrimony. The first is that the Pontiff blames the oath in very few words and refutes it without any proof. Hence the king subjoins: "With this, in truth, does the old saying square that is spread around about the philosopher: he says much but he proves little, nay indeed, he proves absolutely nothing." The second objection is that a profession of fidelity to a prince cannot be in opposition to religion and salvation, and of the contrary assertion he says: "It so exceeds my theology, as little as it is, that an utterly new and thoroughly exotic assertion I cannot judge; nor one pronounced from the mouth of him who advertises himself enough as universal bishop and ecumenical pastor of all Christian souls.” And this argument the king repeats on pp.31 & 31 of his Apology.

2. But in these objections, as I said, if the pious and thoughtful reader attends to them, he will find no force of reason or no solidity of doctrine but only a license of speaking. To the first reproof, then, we have already given for the brevity just causes in the previous chapter. But to the new rebuke, “that the Pontiff says but does not prove,” Bellarmine rightly responds that the things the king mentions are not those of a man faithful and Christian but of a pagan or infidel philosopher, whether it was Aristotle speaking of Moses, as the king indicates, or Averroes of Christ, as they say, or Galen, as it is found written in him; for all of them were being ruled, not by faith, but by their own judgment and opinion, whom the heretics in this respect imitate; and therefore it is no wonder if they object to the Pontiff what others opposed to Christ or to Moses. But the Pontiff, since he was speaking to the faithful, to whom it is said: “unless you believe, you will not understand,” was not putting together a disputation nor adjoining a prolix proof, but judged that a setting forth of the simple truth was enough. For since he was speaking to the orthodox, who do not doubt of his authority and power, and among whom are many uneducated and ignorant not able to follow theological reasons and proofs, it was not fitting to burden them with reasons and proofs but to teach the simple truth. Nay, even for doctors it was necessary not to place a thing of so great moment on the unreliability of opinions and of human reasons, but to secure it on pontifical authority, and to make it clear in a brief declaration of truth. I add, indeed, that even in those words the Pontiff insinuated a very certain and very evident proof by saying: “it should to you be clear from the very words;” for no other proof is necessary besides the words of the oath; and that is very sufficient, as we have demonstrated in the first six chapters, and these can serve for a sort of commentary on these words of the Pontiff.

3. To the second objection it has already been often replied that it was not necessary to speak of an oath of civil fidelity generally, but of this oath, which is rather of abjuration of faith toward the Pontiff than of fidelity to the king. An oath of fidelity, then, taken generally is not repugnant to the Roman religion, nor to Christian faith, which is the same, nor even to the salvation of the faithful; and he who does not know this does not merit the name of theologian. However, to speak freely for the truth, he who attributes that assertion to the Pontiff has not sufficiently considered it, since in neither of his Briefs, nor indeed in the universal decrees of the Pontiffs, is any trace of it to be found. But this oath of fidelity does clearly conflict with true religion, and is against the salvation of souls; and this is what the Pontiff said, and it is very true and from the words of the oath manifest, as was answered and proved by us in the preceding and earlier by Cardinal Bellarmine. To which proofs the king replies nothing, but digresses thereafter in his Apology to proving the authority and power of kings in temporal matters, as if any Catholic denied it. Hence he adduces nothing that pertains to the point of the present controversy. For all the proofs are that kings have supreme power in temporal matters, but not that they do not have it as subordinate and subject to the power of the Pontiff, as was very extensively shown in the discourse of book 3. Response was there given to everything that the king here proposes, and so nothing more remains for us to say of this objection. Only I will not omit to note that the king, on p.33, wrongly attributes to the Pontiff that, led by uncertain rumors, he released this Brief rashly; for it is very clear from the very few words of the same Pontiff that, not by report or rumors or other extrinsic testimonies, but by the clear words of the oath was he moved, or rather compelled, to forbid such an oath to the faithful. Nor are dissimilar the things that the king, up to the end of this part, subsequently brings forward, which I gladly omit, because they pertain to facts only and Bellarmine gives a copious reply to them.

4. Someone can, to be sure, doubt about this part of the Pontifical Brief whether, it notwithstanding, he who has refused to give the oath could in any way be excused from the guilt of infidelity or of sacrilege. And the reason for doubt can, in the first place, be that no dogma seems in that oath to be denied or abjured. For in it there is at most denied the power of the Pontiff to depose a king, for the rest depends on this principle; but although we believe it to be true that the Pontiff has this power, yet it does not seem to pertain to the dogmas of the faith, because it is not found expressed in Scripture nor has it been by the Church defined as de fide; therefore although the power be denied by giving such an oath, no dogma of the faith will be denied. Hence can further be inferred that no one is with great sacrifice, and especially with evident danger to life, bound to refuse such an oath, because, if it does not contain external denial, it is not intrinsically evil nor against religion; and thereupon he will, on account of grave cause, be excused from fault.

5. Second, the excuse can be increased, because the words of the oath are not so clear that they cannot be taken and sworn in some other sense, in which even the power of the Pontiff for deposing kings is not abjured; therefore in this way is this oath licit or excusable from fault. The proof of the consequence is that, although the one proposing the oath is demanding it in a corrupt sense and with a bad intention, the one swearing it is not bound to conform with the former's intention, but can use the amphiboly that the words allow; and then he swears neither against truth nor against religion or confession of faith, because the swearer intends to swear no such thing. The difficulty, then, seems to be in the proof of the antecedent, for in the first clause, when the king swears "that he is supreme lord, etc." it can be understood in a sound sense about supreme temporal lordship; and when there is subjoined that the Pope cannot depose him, the swearer can tacitly understand "at his will or pleasure," as the King of England is wont to say; therefore these words of his can thus be taken as if the tacitly understood phrase were expressed or, which amounts to the same, there can be tacitly understood the phrase "without legitimate cause." And the same phrase can be conceived in the mind and be repeated in the rest of the words of the same clause. And, in the second clause, this can be founded specifically on the words: "and I will defend him and them with all my strength against all plots or attempts whatever." For "plots" and "attempts" are taken in worse part to mean conspiracies and tumults unjustly stirred up. Therefore each one can take the words in this sense, and he will not sin in swearing them in that same sense; therefore he can conceive and swear all the preceding words in the same sense, because in the one context the later words explain and limit the preceding ones. And thus, as a result, the remaining clauses admit of a similar excuse, as will be readily clear to one who considers them.

There is also wont to be a confirmation from the English, that this amphiboly is accepted by those who are worthy of trust, because the oath has been set forth in the English tongue and, in the original, for the words "kill the king" is put in the vernacular the word "murder," which in English means "kill unjustly," and thus is it commonly taken; therefore in the oath too it can be thus licitly taken even in its literal and common sense, especially in a matter of loss of life or of all one's goods. But in that sense it is true that it is never licit for subjects to “murder” the king, and it is heretical to assert that it is at any time licit, just as it would be heretical to say that it is at any time licit to do injustice. Therefore the other words can, because of the connection, be drawn to the same sense; or certainly, because the whole proposition is, since it is conjunctive, false by reason of the second part. For in the third clause is proposed conjunctively for abjuring the proposition “it is licit to depose and kill the king” (that is, unjustly); therefore the whole proposition will be false and heretical by reason of one of its parts; and thus it will be possible for it to be abjured without sin, because a conjunctive proposition, of which one part is false, is false simply, and likewise, if one part is heretical, it will be heretical simply.

6. The third popular evasion is wont to be about excuse through ignorance, which some of the English have tried to prove not only can be, but has in fact been, invincible in them. Because the opinion asserting that it is licit to give the oath has been made probable by the authority of many men and by diverse reasons and expositions of the clauses; therefore, although the oath be in itself corrupt, as the Pontiff has declared, nevertheless those who allow it will, by conforming themselves to a probable opinion in a case of so great necessity and extreme peril, not in practice be sinning. And these are the excuses which I hear have been found out by some people for permitting a like oath, but in truth they are frauds rather for deceiving souls than legitimate defenses of such a promise contrary to true religion, as we will briefly prove by running through them one by one.

7. The first excuse, then, could have been discovered rather by heretics than faithful theologians; for what is assumed at the beginning of the excuse is false and heretical. For the proposition, ‘the Pope has power to depose heretical and stubborn kings, or kings pernicious to their kingdom in matters pertaining to the salvation of the soul,’ is to be held and believed among the dogmas of the faith. For it is contained in the words of Christ spoken singularly and with special reason to Peter, “whatever you bind,” and “whatever you loose,” and “feed my sheep,” in exactly the way the Catholic Church, which is the pillar and ground of the truth, has understood them, and as Boniface VIII very clearly declared in Extravag. ‘Unam Sanctam’ De Maiorit. et Obedien., when he concludes that this truth is of necessity for salvation. And thus do all Catholic doctors, both jurists and theologians, receive this truth in this rank of certitude, as was in book 3 expressly disputed and rather often stressed. Since this power is there in that oath abjured, the Catholic faith is plainly abjured. Hence if it is done from the heart, the faith is lost and a fall is made into heresy; but if it is done with pretense, manifold perjury is committed and sin is done against confession of faith, as is clear.

8. But I add too that what is assumed in the latter part of the excuse is very false, because although that truth would not be de fide with the greatest strictness, in the first rank, as they say, but with a sure, theological certitude, it will be a very grave sin to abjure such a truth and the act of pontifical power. The proof is in the reason just made, that either the abjuration is done falsely and many perjuries and things injurious and pernicious to the Pontiff are committed; or that it is at least contrary to the reverence and obedience due to him by right, and it clearly includes the malice of schism, which therefore the king does not dare to deny about himself, although he disguises the malice of it, as we sufficiently proved in the first book. But if the abjuration is done from the heart, more gravely and formally, so to say, schism is being committed; and, although it be against one's intention, the oath is by that very fact rendered iniquitous and a bond of iniquity. For to deny in a matter most grave, and necessary for the unity and concord of the Church, a sure truth, even if it were not per se primarily de fide, is a most grave sin against the charity of the Church, and against justice, by denying to the Apostolic See what is by legitimate title its own; therefore to swear such an abnegation is a sacrilegious and pernicious oath. It cannot, therefore, be allowed in any way for avoiding any temporal disadvantages whatever.

9. There is an ad hominem clarification; for it is certainly not de fide that James is true king of England, for it has nowhere been revealed; nay, neither is it theologically certain; for it will be enough if it is believed by a sort of human faith to be morally certain; and yet the king will not, indeed, deny that to swear James is not true king of England is a grave sin, because it is to swear either something that is in truth false or at least something that cannot without great rashness be believed or affirmed as true; and therefore the king will easily concede that such an oath cannot, even to avoid death, be done. But however much the king in his Preface turns aside, it is far more certain that the Pontiff has power over the king himself than that he himself is true king; for the former has more and higher principles than the latter. For that James was true successor to the kingdom could be founded only in a certain human tradition and proof; and he himself has feared not a little lest, since he was a heretic and succeeded a queen already declared a heretic, it be brought into doubt; which fear the public acceptance of the kingship together with the patience and toleration of the Pontiff was able to take away. But the power of the Pope over a king has foundation in the word of Christ, in the common confession of the Church, in the decrees of Pontiffs and Councils, in the doctrines of the Fathers and the best and Catholic theologians and of the prudent interpreters of each kind of right, and in frequent and longstanding use; how then can one certitude be compared with the other? If, then, the king does not grudgingly concede that it is unjust for him to be abjured as king by his subjects, how does he dare to dispute that it is not very unjust and pernicious for faithful Christians to abjure to the Pontiff his right, power, and obedience, which in that oath is evidently done?

10. The second excuse seems to have been found out by men timid and little constant in faith and charity; for it is very frivolous and in many ways repugnant to the words of the oath. For, first, at the end of the oath is added a clause excluding every extraordinary sense of the words through tacitly understood phrases or in any other way at all. For thus is it said: "And all these things I completely and sincerely acknowledge and swear according to the express words here by me pronounced, and according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation or mental evasion or secret reservation whatever." If, then, anyone pronounces these words without the intention of fulfilling them, by that fact he is a perjurer; but if he pronounces them from his heart and mind, the whole of the second excuse has no place, as will be readily clear to him who considers it. For although we might grant that the phrase "without legitimate cause" or "at his pleasure" can be tacitly understood in the abjuring of the power of the Pontiff considered in itself and without the adjunct of the other clauses, yet such a tacit or mental addition cannot, on the supposition of the last clause, be adjoined without perjury.

Next, in this oath there is not only made a promise never to kill the king, or to cooperate in a plot against him, or the like things, which pertain to doing and might be understood of unjust doings, but the power of the Pontiff itself is abjured with so many distributive phrases that that sense or tacitly understood limitation has no place. For thus is it said in the first clause: “and that the Pope, neither by himself nor by any other authority of the Church or of the Roman See, or by any means in company with certain others, has any power or authority to depose the King, etc.” Which words can in no way be restricted to the power of deposing unjustly or without cause. Both because all power is denied to the Pope both in the particular respect of this king and in the general respect of all his successors, as is added in the second clause and along with the distributive phrases, “notwithstanding any declaration or sentence of excommunication or privation, whether done or conceded, or to be done or conceded.” And also because there is a swearing virtually that such a sentence or deposition cannot be just or efficacious due to defect of power, even if the king, who is demanding the oath or about whom in particular the oath is being sworn, is a heretic or a schismatic.

Besides, in a like manner and with the same augmentations, the power of loosing subjects from the bond of obedience is abjured, as well as that, notwithstanding any absolution at all, subjects should defend the king even against the Pope, and without taking account of any censure or excommunication. Which cannot be restricted in the mind to an unjust or to no excommunication, because the words are so universal that such a limitation is repugnant to them, namely, “notwithstanding any declaration or sentence of excommunication or privation;” from which words cannot be excluded the declaration that such a one is a heretic or a schismatic, although it be true and done by the Pope through some power of his whatever, for those words include everything. Next, the whole profession or confession and abjuration is directly contrary to the definitions of the Pontiffs and the Councils; therefore it is an express external denial of dogmas of the faith, which can never on account of tacitly understood interpretations or phrases be made licit, because it is against the obligation to confess the faith and not to deny it even externally. To pass over the public scandal to other believers which cannot be separated from such action; nor should it be given, even to avoid death, as we are taught by the example of Mattathias Maccabaeus.

11. Hence to the confirmation about the vernacular English word ‘murder’, which is said to signify the same as ‘unjustly kill,’ the response is that, if was only proposed there for swearing that it is heretical to say “a king can be murdered by his subjects,” it would be a tolerable excuse. But now not only is that proposed but also that it is heretical to say that princes deprived or excommunicated by the Pope can be deposed by their subjects, which is contrary to the doctrine of the faith. Nor does the evasion have place that the whole conjunction, by reason of one part, is false, both because, in the form of the oath in the way it is contained in the royal book, there is read the disjunction “deposed or killed;” and also because, even if the conjunction “deposed and killed” were read, the sense amounts to the same, because the swearing is not that the whole conjunction or hypothetical proposition is heretical, but the swearing is that the individual parts are heretical, namely that a prince deposed by the Pope can be deposed by his subjects and can be “murdered;” and thus there is always condemned as heretical a proposition that is Catholic and according to the faith certain. Most of all for the reason that the word ‘murder’ is for this purpose put there, because it supposes that, notwithstanding the sentence of the Pope, the killing of a king is an unjust betrayal of him and against the faith due to a king, and thus is this whole thing there sworn. Hence, although the word taken by itself have that meaning, yet in the oath it is made clear and expanded by many other words such that the limitation does not have place, especially in respect of the whole oath and of all its clauses. Wherein there is often an express and absolute and universal abjuration of the power of the Pope to punish kings, even rebellious and stubborn ones; and in addition there is recognized in the king an authority and a power to exact such an oath, and other things are mixed in that cannot with truth be sworn, or be excused from perjury by those equivocal and tacitly understood words.

12. About the third excuse one must distinguish the times and the persons. For as to the times we can speak of the time before the declaration made by the Pope or of the time after it. In the former time there could perhaps have been, with preservation of conscience, some contention or diversity among Catholics. After the declaration of the Pontiff, however, in no way can an opinion be judged probable that is contrary to the decision, how there is with him power of declaring doubtful things of this sort pertaining to good morals and the faith by which subjects are bound to stand, otherwise such power would be useless. Of which fact we have above sufficiently spoken. As to the persons, however, one must distinguish among those who are learned, and who can by themselves consider the quality of the oath and pass judgment on it, and the rest who are ignorant, who must be led by the opinion and judgment of others. About these latter there is no doubt but that some could be excused by ignorance if the priests, who were reputed honest and learned, were teaching them that the oath could, with preservation of conscience, be given, provided the intention is kept of not swearing anything contrary to faith or to the power of the Pope. But this ignorance will not now after the Pontifical Brief have place even among these more simple folk, because they are bound to prefer the Brief to all their private teachers. If, nevertheless, there were some so unlearned that they had heard or understood nothing of the pontifical declaration, such ignorance could still persist in them, because they will be exactly as if the Pope had declared nothing. However, the thing is so notorious and public in those parts that scarce could the case morally arise. But with the other educated faithful who can by themselves consider the movements of the oath, even were the Pontifical Brief taken out of the way, I think that never was the opinion of them probable who taught that profession of such an oath was licit, because the words of the oath were always so clear and so multiplied, and were in so many ways entrapping the conscience and inducing approval and profession of schism, that, although in one or other little word or specious phrase an evasion was able to have place, it would have been impossible to find a truly probable way of making the whole oath honorable, or of excusing it and avoiding its perils, as is sufficiently proved by the things that have hitherto been weighed in respect of its individual words. If at the beginning, then, any of those commended for doctrine and life fell into that opinion, led perhaps by fear or human reason, they did not sufficiently consider the thing; whose ignorance, whether it was probable or not, there is not need now to judge, but I think they should fear the stain, and by both penance and public confession, whereby the weaker may be animated and instructed not to fall into the fraud, make compensation for it and, if necessary, blot it out with their own blood.

Chapter 9: Is it licit for English Catholics to enter the temples of heretics and to communicate with them in their rites, without intention of cult or of cooperation with them, solely so as to avoid temporal penalties?

Summary: 1. English Catholics were being compelled by diverse penalties to frequent the churches of heretics and to participate in their rites and sermons. 2. The divine precept about external confession of faith is explained. 3. The proper motive for confession of faith is to manifest our internal faith. 4. In the precept to confess the faith the negative is included. 5. The precept to confess the faith and not to conceal the faith is not at every moment obligatory. Twofold concealing of the faith. 6. For what time the precept to confess the faith is obligatory. 7. Reason for doubt. 8. First argument whereby it seems to be shown that it is licit to enter the churches of heretics etc. 9. Second argument. 10. Third argument. 11. The declaration of the Supreme Pontiff is very much in conformity with the Scriptures. 12. And it is also in conformity with the Fathers. 13. A twofold evasion is refuted. First reason to prove that communication with heretics is illicit. 14. Confirmation. The reason of St. Augustine is further clarified. 15. Second reason. 16. Why the precept to confess the faith in the aforesaid critical moment is obligatory. 17. This is clearly supposed and taught by Navarrus in cons.10 De Haeret. n.10. The example of St. Ermenegildus. 18. The doctrine handed down is confirmed by reason of scandal. 19. It is next proved from the danger of losing the faith. 20. Response to the first reason for doubt. 21. Response to the second. When the precept to confess the faith is most obligatory. 22. Response to the third reason for doubt. 23. Public protestation is not sufficient to make superstitious communication honorable.

1. Although the King of England in his Apology, when referring to this part of the Brief, refused to touch on it, I have judged that, for the completeness of this work and for the great instruction of the faithful, as well as for the greater declaration and confirmation of the things we have said about the oath, it is opportune and necessary in this place to say a few things on this point. But the occasion or necessity for this doctrine has arisen from the harsh ill treatment that Catholics in England are suffering when they are, by the bitterest laws, deprived of their goods and subjected to other grave penalties unless they enter the churches of heretics and participate in their sermons, prayers, or other rites. For, immediately from the time of Elizabeth, Catholics began to be coerced by the gravest penalties to frequent the churches of heretics and to participate in their rites and sermons. And first, as Sander reports bk.3 for the year 1559, a fine of twelve pence per head was proclaimed for those refusing to frequent the churches as before. But afterwards (as the same Sander reports for the year 1582), "Having called the orders together, they promulgate a law by which they impose on individuals of each sex (provided they have reached the sixteenth year of age) who refuse to attend the prayers, sermons, and churches of protestants a fine of twenty English pounds monthly, that is, almost seventy gold coins." And there was added, as the bishop of Tarragon reports, that those who did not have the sum of gold coins were to be detained in prison until they should pay it. Which rather bitter laws and penalties have been carried out up to the present day, as we will report in the following chapter. For this reason, therefore, some people, moved by pious pity for the Catholics, began to doubt whether they might, in keeping those laws, be for some reason excused of guilt, such that they might not, without evident obligation, be compelled to undergo so many evils, nor also, with peril of conscience because of human fear or too much love of temporal things, be subjected to unjust and tyrannical laws.

2. But in order that the reason for doubt and the true decision about it might be better founded, there is need to preface a few things about the obligation and precept of confessing the faith not only in words but also in deeds. And, to begin with, three things must be discerned that in this matter are commonly distinguished; namely ‘to confess the faith externally’, that is, publicly or in the presence of others, such that those who see or hear understand by the external signs I display that I am a Christian; to this is opposed, at the extreme, ‘to deny the faith’; as a sort of mean between these is ‘to conceal the faith’, which is only opposed negatively to confession, not as contrary to it in the way that to deny the faith is.

Now, of these three, it is certain that the first, namely to confess the faith, falls under divine precept. Thus do all Catholic doctors teach along with St. Thomas IIa IIae q.3. It is also de fide certain from the verse of Paul Romans 10.10: “With the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.” For in this final phrase “is made unto salvation” Paul signifies that confession of faith is necessary for salvation; for, just as it is said that with the heart is belief made unto righteousness, because faith is necessary for justification, so is confession of faith said to be done unto salvation, that is, eternal salvation, because it is necessary for attaining it and preserving grace. And hence too it is clear that Paul is speaking of external and perceptible confession of faith, for internal confession pertains to the former member, of believing with the heart, for we do not in any other way confess the faith internally, that is, the truths of the faith, except by attributing internal assent to them, which is to believe with the heart. Beyond this, then, is external confession required for salvation. Which is also explained by Paul when he says it is done “with the mouth,” not because it can or should only be done with the mouth, for it can also be done by the bodily actions and the other external signs by which we profess religion; but, because words are signs that are more express and established principally for expressing the mind, Paul for that reason specifically attributed confession of faith to the mouth.

Moreover, Christ in Matthew 10 said absolutely, v.32: “Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven.” Which words do not so much have the express form of a precept as of a promise, but in other places Christ explained that our confession is necessary for us to obtain his confession, as we will see directly. Now rightly does the promise of Christ square with Paul’s phrase “unto salvation.” For the Apostle distinguished between faith of the heart and confession of the mouth, and he said the former was necessary for righteousness, that is, to obtain remission of sins and internal renovation of soul, because internal faith is the foundation of righteousness itself; but for the former external confession of faith is not thus necessary, except perhaps in the general intention to obey all the precepts. For a man is in any case justified by internal faith, along with contrition of heart and love, before he proceed to the external act of confession of faith. Hence rightly did Ambrose say on Psalms 38: “Faith belongs to the beginning for believers, confession belongs to the execution of it.” And therefore confession of faith is not said to be unto righteousness, but “unto salvation;” for, after righteousness has been obtained, there is still need of confession of faith for persevering in that righteousness and consequently for obtaining salvation, for Matthew 10.22: “he who endureth to the end shall be saved,” and Christ will confess him before his Father.

But this precept is not only a divine positive precept, but is a moral precept connatural, as it were, to faith itself, or to man once the state of faith has been supposed; and therefore at all times and in every state of the Church confession of faith was necessary for salvation. Now the reason for this truth is touched on by Augustine bk. De Fide et Symbolo at the beginning where he says: "Faith demands of us the office both of the heart and of the tongue; for says the Apostle, 'With the heart man believeth...' And therefore it is necessary for us to be mindful of righteousness and salvation, seeing that we who will reign in eternal righteousness cannot be saved from the present wicked age unless we too, striving for the salvation of our neighbors, confess also with our mouth the faith we carry in our hearts." By which words he insinuates that confession of faith is necessary on account of our neighbor. And he declares the same more fully in serm. 181 De Tempor., otherwise serm. 59 De Diversis, in these words: "Without faith it is impossible to please God; this he recognizes in our hearts who searches the reins and the hearts. But on account of preserving the unity of the Church in the dispensation of this time, confession of the mouth is necessary along with faith of the heart, because with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation, not only of preachers but also of the learned; for in no other way may brother feel for brother, nor may the peace of the Church be preserved, nor could one teach another or be taught by another the things that are necessary for salvation unless what he has in his heart he were to transmit, by signs of the voice as by his own vehicles, to the hearts of others. Faith then is to be preserved in the heart and brought forth by the mouth. For faith is the foundation of all goods."

3. Therefore Augustine thinks that faith of the heart is per se and first necessary on account of God, while confession of faith is necessary on account of neighbors or the Church; for just as internal faith is the foundation of the union of the soul with God, so confession of faith is the foundation of ecclesiastical unity and peace. Not that the confession itself of faith is not also a precept for the honor and cult of God, but because it does not so directly and immediately tend to God, or is necessary because of him, as internal faith is. Wherein one must also consider that confession of faith can be done in two ways; in one way for showing exteriorly the internal faith that we have in our hearts, such that this be the chief and as it were sole proximate motive for such confession; in another way it is done for carrying out some external cult and exhibiting it to God; and in this way the sacrifice of the mass and the use of the sacraments and the other ceremonies can be said to pertain to confession of faith, though properly they are acts of religion and are done and prescribed chiefly and proximately for the cult and honor of God. However the formal, so to say, and proper confession of faith is that which is done to make manifest to others our internal faith, and this without doubt is referred immediately to men; for it was not necessary on God's account, and therefore the reason for this precept is rightly founded on the necessity of this confession for joining together the faithful in the peace and the unity of one Church, which faith itself demands. And thus too did the same Augustine expound that verse of Psalms 115 [116].10: "I believed, therefore have I spoken." "Because those who believe," he says, "do not perfectly believe, they do not wish to speak."

And hence is also collected that the second, namely 'to deny the faith' is against a divine precept, or falls under a prohibitory or negative precept. Which is in the same way de fide certain, Christ the Lord saying, Matthew 10.33: "whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I deny before my Father which is in heaven." For he who denies will hear, "I do not know you," as Theophil. there says. Hence Paul 2 Timothy 2.12: "if we deny him, he also will deny us," where Ambrose, Theodoret, and Primas note the fact. And Chrysostom hom.35 on Matthew gives the reason when he says: “He seeks a free confession, and he leads us to greater love, and desires us to be exalted and unconquered, wherefore he gives all of us these precepts.” And in the same way does he interpret there the words of Christ, Matthew 10.16: “be ye wise as serpents,” which expose their body to any wound so that they may preserve the head; for thus should the faithful rather hand over their body than deny the faith, which is the head and beginning of all goods. Which things are also contained in Jerome there, and Hilary can.10, and Augustine bk.2 De Doctrina Christiana ch.16.

4. And this precept follows from the first; for in every affirmative precept there is included the negative of not doing anything against what is prescribed by the affirmative; as that, if we are bidden to love God, we are implicitly forbidden to do anything against divine love, and thus about the others; for one contrary destroys the other, hence if one is prescribed, the contrary is without doubt forbidden. Since, therefore, confession of faith is prescribed, the denial of faith is there implicitly forbidden, for this latter is contrary to confession, as is per se evident. Nay, from the precept of internal faith follows necessarily the prohibition of denying the same faith. For he who denies the faith by his mouth is either denying the same faith in his heart, and thus he is an infidel and is acting not only against confession of faith but also against the precept of faith; or, denying the faith with his mouth, he is retaining it in his heart, and thus he is lying with a lie very pernicious and contrary to the honor of God, because by denying the faith he has attributed a lie to God, saying that what God has said is false; he has also very gravely offended against the Christian religion and, in so far as in him is, has destroyed the Church and rended its unity. Therefore is that lie prohibited, not only by the general precept not to lie, but also by the special precept of the Christian faith and religion, as Augustine rightly thinks in bk. Contra Mendacium ch.6. Hence also it happens that, just as a lie is pronounced in two ways, namely, either by denying what is true or by affirming what is false or what is contrary to the truth, so in the present case, this denial of faith can happen in two ways, namely, either by simply denying that the truth of the faith is true or certain, or by professing the contrary error, for profession of the false is necessarily denial of the true, and it involves the same or greater malice.

5. The third one that we proposed, namely concealing the faith, has as it were a middle nature, because it is neither always bad nor always licit, as also all Catholic doctors teach. The reason is that to keep silent about the truth, or not to pronounce it, is not to deny it but to hide it, as is evident of itself; and thus too to conceal the faith is not to deny the faith; and therefore, to this extent, it is not always bad. But, in another way, the precept to confess the faith, since it is affirmative, is, although always obligatory, yet not obligatory at all times; for this is the nature of an affirmative precept, as we now suppose; and for that reason, not to confess the faith, which is done by concealing the faith, is not always bad, because, if the carrying out of some act is not per se necessary, ceasing from that act cannot be always bad, as is evident of itself. Concealing the faith, then, will only be vicious if faith is concealed at the time for which the precept to confess the faith is obligatory; just as to keep silent about one’s own sins is not always but only then bad when the precept to confess them in some court is obligatory. Hence a double concealing of the faith can be distinguished; one is by way of simple negation, which can be licit or without sin during the whole time in which or for which is man is not bound to exhibit an external confession of faith; the other is by way of moral privation or omission, because it is allowed at the time at which a confession of faith is to be shown, and it is in this way the lack of a due action, and therefore is it called a moral privation. And this is a sin grave of itself, because it is against the precept to confess the faith. For an affirmative law prescribing an act at some time prohibits, as a result, the omission of it at the same time, as is evident of itself.

And of this omission can be rightly understood the words of Christ, Luke 9.26: “For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father’s, and of the holy angels.” For ‘to be ashamed’ seems to be less than ‘to deny’; for not only he who denies but also he who, when he should, omits to confess Christ and the truth of his faith (which is the same) is ‘ashamed’ of Christ. And although Christ used there the word ‘ashamed’ (which properly signifies to avoid something because of shame or fear of some contempt or derision), because either it was more accommodated to the current matter of which he was speaking, or because at the beginning the doctrine of the gospel was derided by Gentiles and Jews, and thus many were, through shame or disgrace, going to be despised; nevertheless the doctrine and the warning are general; for by whatever reason, whether shame or fear of losing his life or other temporal goods, someone omits confession of the faith at the due time, he will meet the same rebuke and warning.

6. But it at once occurred to ask what that time is for which the confession of faith is obligatory; but to explain this expressly does not belong to the present occasion. Let it be enough, then, to suppose that it is the time when confession of the faith is necessary to guard the honor of God or of the Christian religion, as is reckoned to be whenever someone is being questioned by a tyrant or a public power about his faith, or certainly as often as when to keep silent and not to confess is in effect to deny. For this is the other way in which this omission becomes vicious, because it involves virtual denial of the faith, because in morals the implicit is reckoned for express when it has the same effect. And thus does the precept of not denying the faith forbid not only express denial but also tacit and virtual denial. But such an omission will be called a virtual denial of the faith when the very omission to confess is commonly taken for a sign of denying the faith. Just as not to wear in ordinary and common use the clothes and tonsure of a cleric or of a monk without special cause or necessity is a sort of virtual denial of such state, which can sometimes be enough for external apostasy. Thus, therefore, can it happen in confession of the faith, if there be justly instituted anywhere some sign so proper to Christianity that he who omits it seems by that very fact to deny that he is a Christian, as will be more explained in what follows.

7. From which things is understood that the difficulty of the proposed question lies in this, that we should consider whether to do those acts of going to the churches of heretics, or to hear their sermons and to pour out prayers in their company, or to participate in their rites, is to deny the true faith or (which is the same) to profess the contrary error; or whether indeed it is only not to confess the true faith and, on this view, whether it is a simple negation or a sinful moral omission. Now the reason for doubt is taken from the difference between words and actions or other things; for words both signify more expressly than things and do not have another proper use, for they are per se primarily instituted for this purpose; but other things, as clothing, houses, food, and the like, or even the acts of hearing, seeing, and such are not per se instituted for signifying the mind of the doer, but for other natural or human uses, although sometimes they seem, by a sort of consequence, to signify something. Hence it happens that the signification of things is wont to be more obscure and ambiguous or equivocal than the signification of sounds. Next, it also happens that pretense, or dissimulation without lying, also seems to have place more easily in the use of other things or actions than in the use of words, which have a more certain and, so to say, more usual signification. Next, there is, from this same principle, a far other reason for doubting about this actions of going to churches, etc., of which we are now treating, than about profession of the oath of fidelity; for the latter is done by express words and for this end alone of explaining the mind; and the words of the formula of the oath are such that they contain an express denial of the doctrine of the faith and consequently a confession of the contrary heresy; and therefore no one who does not live in the same heresy, or unless he fall into some ancient one that said the faith could even with an oath be denied under tortures without sin, can doubt but that the profession of that oath is not licit.

8. However, about the actions proposed in the question it seems there can be doubt. First because these are in their proper objects and materials indifferent; for to enter a church is in itself good or at least indifferent. Nor does it for this reason become intrinsically evil that heretics are badly using the place; for this pertains to their corrupt intention, without which entering thither is indifferent; for even to enter a synagogue of Jews or a temple of pagans is not of itself evil. Likewise, to hear a talk of some doctrine, even a corrupt one, is not intrinsically evil; for someone can be listening to it in order to confute it, or to enjoy the eloquence of the speaker, or to deride it. Next, to participate in their prayers and sacred acts, taken materially, is indifferent, because someone can, while he is there, be pouring out secretly the prayers of Catholics and in the Catholic rite, or be thinking of the true faith. In other respects, indeed, those acts do not have the signification contrary to the faith that they may per se be posited to have, because they are not specifically posited to signify faith, but only to perform something which is done immediately by one or other of those acts. But if such acts, whether from the discourse of the onlookers, or from the common use of others, are wont to indicate a corrupt faith, that is accidental, provided they are not done by a Catholic with that intention; because he himself does not signify a false faith, nor does he deceive others, but permits them to be deceived. Therefore those who do such acts only for obeying the king in external material acts, so as to avoid temporal loss, are not denying the faith, nor are they lacking in the confession of faith that is by precept due, because there is then no special necessity on account of which the affirmative precept to confess the faith is at that time obligatory; therefore all reason of fault ceases. Hence Catholic doctors have taught that it is not per se evil to communicate with heretics in sacred actions, as long as these are not by name made clear.

9. Second, if there were there any fault, it is most because there is profession of false religion, at least in pretense; but this pretense is not always intrinsically evil; therefore it will most in that case be licit, so as to avoid very heavy fines and ill treatment. The consequence is clear, because if such pretense is not intrinsically evil, it will not be forbidden because evil; therefore at most it will be evil because forbidden, or accidentally so because of the evils that thence follow; but these reasons cease in so urgent a necessity, because a positive prohibition does not oblige with such strictness, and the disadvantages that now follow are not intended but permitted, and therefore they are not imputed. The major too is clear, because we are supposing that the intention of the doer is not to profess anything false, but only to be there present and to do something either good or indifferent, whatever others thereby think, which is material pretense or dissimulation. The proof of the minor, then, is first that there have not been lacking Catholic and grave authors who have taught that it is not intrinsically evil to simulate a false or superstitious religion, or to feign it in external acts by doing them only materially, as they say, that is, without intention of religion or cult, but on account of some human utility. Nay, many attribute this opinion to Jerome who says that it was licit for the Apostles to keep the legal precepts in appearance at that time when they were already deadly if done in earnest and with intention of cult, as I said extensively in bk 9 De Legibus ch.16, where I mentioned many authors and adduced the testimonies of the Scriptures which moved them. Now the reason was touched on above, that such pretense is not a lie; for there is no intention by it to signify anything false or against one's mind, but there is only concealment, or non-confession, of some truth or of the faith. But concealment has, by the first reason, that it is not evil like denial of the faith, because the latter is not without lying; moreover, by the second reason it is not evil, because there is nothing that then obliges to make oneself manifest or to confess the truth.

10. But it can be replied that these reasons rightly proceed of a malice found per se in those acts; yet, nevertheless, they are evil by reason of the scandal that cannot morally be separated from them, and that is enough for an act to be always morally bad. But against this is objected, third, that the scandal too not only can be separated but is also in fact separated from those acts, according to the way they are said to be able to be done in that kingdom by Catholics. For, to begin with, everyone knows that those who hold the Roman faith are not doing those acts of their own accord or from their heart, but only to avoid the penalties. Nay, they also know that the precept was given by the king himself rather because of greed for gold and silver than because of the cult of God or religion, and that therefore he more willingly imposes pecuniary penalties than corporal ones; hence, as a result, they are also persuaded that Catholics are not doing those actions for the sake of religion, or in contempt of the faith, but only to avoid the plundering of their goods. Therefore there is nothing whence they might reasonably take scandal, since the action is not of itself evil, and since the appearance of evil, which it seemed to have, is being removed by that public knowledge. Add that the faithful are said to make beforehand a public profession of their right intention and true faith; therefore, if there is any scandal remaining, it is not given but taken, which to the doer is not imputed, especially when so grave a cause and necessity intervene.

Nevertheless, it must without any doubt be said that it is not licit for English Catholics to gather in a church of schismatics and heretics to hear heretical sermons and to perform profane rites. Thus does our Supreme Lord Paul V in his Brief admonish in these words: "Assuredly we without doubt believe that those who have hitherto, with so much constancy, undergone the most atrocious persecutions, well-nigh complete miseries, in order that they might walk faultless in the law of the Lord, will never bring it about that they should be polluted by communion with those who have deserted the divine law. Nevertheless, impelled by the zeal of our pastoral office, and with the paternal solicitude whereby we labor unceasingly for the salvation of your souls, we are compelled to warn and to implore you that under no condition should you go to the temples of heretics, or hear their public sermons, or communicate with them in their rites, lest you incur the wrath of God. For it is not licit for you to do these things without detriment to the divine cult and to your own salvation.” From which words one may collect that this is not only a positive or human prohibition, by reason of which those acts become evil because prohibited, but is a law declarative of the malice or baseness existing in the acts themselves, by reason of which they are prohibited because evil. For this is signified by the words “For it is not licit for you to do these things...;” and therefore does the Pontiff use words not so much prohibitory as admonitory and attestative of the malice of such communication with heretics. There is next collected from those words that this fault is sufficiently mortal and grave “lest you incur the wrath of God. For it is not licit for you to do these things without detriment to the divine cult and to your own salvation.” Hence although perhaps there was before some controversy or diversity of judgment among Catholics on this point, now it should altogether cease, because it is not licit for them to be in doubt about an authentic declaration of the Pontiff in matter moral and pertaining to the salvation of souls.

11. We must, however, show how this declaration is in conformity with the principles of the faith, and with the doctrines of the holy Fathers, and with reason. For, to begin with, in Scripture communication with infidels is very much forbidden, especially in the case of sacred things; but there is no doubt but that heretics are included under infidels. Nay, about these is Paul chiefly writing 2 Timothy 2.16-18: “But shun profane and vain babblings; for they will increase unto more ungodliness. And their word will eat as doth a canker; of whom is Hymenaeus and Philetus, who concerning the truth have erred, etc.” And therefore in Titus 3.10 he gives admonishment to avoid a man who is a stubborn heretic, and he warns very gravely in 1 Corinthians 6 and in Romans 16.17-18 to keep away from “them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine,” he says, “which ye have learned... For they...by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple.” Again the words of 2 John 10-11 are to be noted, for when he had said of heretics “neither bid them God speed,” he subjoins the reason, “for he that biddeth them God speed is partaker of their evil deeds.” Wherefore, although all communication with heretics is forbidden by the apostles because of the danger, yet that communication most and with greater strictness that is “in evil deeds,” which they certainly do insofar as they are heretics. But such are the deeds of which we are now treating, and it cannot be denied but that Catholics coming together with them in churches to perform the like meetings are communicating with them in the same deeds. Wherefore, although perhaps not every other communication with the persons of heretics not yet declared to be excommunicated is under strict precept forbidden, this particular one, which is in evil and schismatic deeds, so to say, is always forbidden. For Paul says 1 Corinthians 10.20-21: “I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord’s table, and of the table of devils.” And 2 Corinthians 6.14: “Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers,” that is, as St. Thomas expounds, “do not communicate in the works of infidelity with infidels.” For as the Apostle subjoins, v.14-15: “for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?”

12. This law of the Scriptures the holy Fathers have followed and handed on to us. For Irenaeus in bk.3 ch.3 says that the Apostles and their disciples were afraid so much “that they did not communicate as much as by a word with any of those who adulterated the truth;” and he reports the testimony of Paul and the widely known examples of John the Evangelist and of Polycarp, and in bk.1 ch.13 he says: “those who exhale against and anathematize them must fly elsewhere and far from them.” To the same opinion Cyprian epist.55 to Cornelius, at the end, says: “For the rest, may our most dear brothers bravely shun and avoid the words and speeches of those whose word eats as doth a canker, as the Apostle said.” And later: “Let us be as separate from them as those fugitives are from the Church.” And later: “This,” he says, “is not only the warning but the also the command of the blessed Apostle, to depart from such people. ‘We command you,’ he says [2 Thessalonians 3.6], ‘in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which ye received of us.’” This precept, then, is apostolic, on the witness of Cyprian, and it is fitting very properly to the present cause; for the meeting places of the schismatics of England are very disorderly and are new human inventions foreign to the traditions of the Apostles; therefore, from the precept of Paul, a faithful man cannot communicate in such rites and assemblies. Like things are contained in [Cyprian’s] bk. De Lapsis at the end. But, touching more clearly and expressly on the same state in epist.4 to the people, against those who, contrary to legitimate morals, were rending the Church and contemning its rites, he says: “There is one God and one Christ and one Church and one Cathedral founded on Peter by the voice of the Lord. Another altar cannot be established or a new priesthood made besides the one priesthood and the one altar.” And he subjoins a little later: “Depart far from the contagion of this sort of men, and their sermons by flight avoid like the cancer and the plague, on the admonition and saying of the Lord, ‘They are blind and leaders of the blind’ [Matthew 15.14].” And later, “Let no one,” he says, “take the sons of the Church out of the Church; let them perish alone by themselves who have wished to perish; let them remain alone outside the Church who have left from the Church.” And later: “Avoid the wolves which separate the sheep from the shepherd.” What clearer could be said about the Anglican schismatics?

In addition, St. Hilary can.10 on Matthew interpreting mystically the words of Christ, v.5, “Go not into the way of the Gentiles, etc.” says: “Not that they were not sent also for the salvation of the Gentiles, but that they should abstain from the work and life of Gentile ignorance. And that they are forbidden to enter the cities of the Samaritans is that they are warned not to enter the churches of heretics.” Augustine bk. Contra Mendacium, and bk.2 Retract. ch.62, expressly teaches that it is not licit to pretend heresy even for converting the heretics themselves, and he thinks that it is always a pernicious lie. And in epist.162 at the beginning he teaches that communication with heretics, except in things that are ordered to their conversion, should be altogether avoided; therefore especially in things that pertain to religion. And there are many monuments of antiquity whereby it is clear that the holy Fathers shrank from the rites of heretics and most of all from all communication with them in sacred things. For it was for this reason always forbidden to receive communion from them, as is clear from the decree of Pope Julius in ch. ‘Is qui Acceperit’ 24 q.5 with similar ones. The example is to be noted too which Gregory of Tours reports bk.1 De Glor. Martyr. ch.80, that a priest, namely a Catholic or (as he says) a “Roman” priest, refused to taste food blessed by a heretic priest, even if he did not use an heretical rite in the benediction, and that God approved the deed with a miracle. How much more, therefore, must communication be avoided in heretical ceremonies themselves? Hence we also read that Gregory bk.1 epist.41 wrote to Leander that it was necessary for a time to omit the rite of baptizing with a triple immersion, because heretics were abusing it for false signification.

13. But this doctrine of the holy Fathers is general and someone might be able to elude it, either by interpreting it not as strict precept, but as advice by reason of danger, or by limiting the same to ordinary and voluntary use, not to unavoidable coercion with enormous danger. However neither evasion has place in the words of Augustine in serm.6 De Verbis Domini where, treating of Romans 13.2: "Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God," he asks: "But what if it order that which you ought not to do?" And he replies: "Here certainly despise the power by fearing the power." Which he declares with an example subjoining later: "If the emperor commands, let it be for me to obedience in the right, but not in idolatry. In idolatry a greater power forbids. Pardon me: you threaten prison, he threatens Gehenna." Next, from the opinions mentioned of the saints, if the individual words are weighed and all of them among themselves compared, both evasions can easily be refuted; but this will be done more efficaciously by explaining the reasons for this truth and by, on the occasion of them, further urging and enriching the testimonies of the Fathers. The first reason, then, is that the communication with heretics, about which the question is being moved, cannot be done except by profession of the new religion, or rather superstition, of the heretics, or at any rate by pretense of it; but each is intrinsically evil and against the precept of confessing the true faith and of honoring Christ and his true religion; therefore on account of no human fear is such communication licit. The consequence is evident from what has been said. But the antecedent as to both its parts is shown thus. For those who meet together in churches with heretics can be present there in two ways. First, with a mind to worship God in those rites and ceremonies or with the intention of performing those rites as licit and religious; and this is formally and truly to profess a false religion; just as he who adores an idol with true intention of worship truly professes idolatry, and he who now performs the Jewish rites with intention of worship would be truly a professor of the sect of the Jews. Hence it is necessary that he who thus professes a false religion denies the true one, and consequently also the faith on which it is founded. Nor can there in this by any doubt, nor do Catholics intend to partake of the rites of heretics in this way.

In the other way, then, can this be done without intention of cult or religion but only of a certain coerced political obedience as to external presence of the body with the purpose of secretly there worshipping God in the Catholic rite. But in this very thing is necessarily included a pretended profession of schism and an exterior communication with heretics in their own rites, because, according to the common and received use of that nation and place, this is signified by those external actions, and for this end is meeting and common assembly made. But such pretense is always evil, as Augustine proves extensively in the said book Contra Mendacium and in various epistles De Cessatione Legalium ad Hieronymum, and I along with him proved it in bk.9 De Legibus ch.17. It is also briefly shown first from Paul 1 Corinthians 10.21: "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils," that is, of Gentile superstition and idolatry; "ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils," that is, by eating things sacrificed to idols, even without intention of cult and adoration of the idol, as the following words make clear, which we will consider a little later. And thus did the Fathers understand the place by gravely censuring the eating of food sacrificed to idols when it is done externally by way of religious act and as use of sacred food. As one may see in Cyprian in the said book De Lapsis and in many epistles wherein he very gravely condemns all external signification of communicating or consenting to the rites of infidels, especially in epistles 31 and 52, some words from which I will report below. The same does Tertullian bk. De Spectacul. ch.13 say extensively: “We abstain from idolatry, we despise the temples no less than the statues, we do not sacrifice, nor do we eat of what is sacrificed.” And later: “We keep our eyes and ears from things sacrificed to idols;” and bk. De Idolatr. ch.13 he says: “One must hold back from this place on the feast days (namely of heretics) and other extraordinary solemnities, which we sometimes by our wantonness, sometimes by our fear subscribe to, communicating against the discipline of the faith with the Gentiles in the things of idols.” And he subjoins the question: “Whether a servant of God should, without a habit and without nourishment, communicate with the Gentiles themselves in these things, etc.” namely in so far as they are done for the sake of religion; and he replies: “As to these things there is no communion between light and darkness, life and death.” Which doctrine is also extensively handed on by Origen bk.8 Contra Celsum a little from the beginning. There is also about it a striking place of Chrysostom in ‘Imperfecto’, whose words I will immediately refer to. But the proper reason is that all communication in these superstitious rites, even if it is done with a feigned intention, is a sort of participation in the superstition. Hence, just as exterior idolatry, even done with feigned mind, partakes of the malice of idolatry, so too all exterior superstition, even pretended, puts on the malice of superstition.

14. A confirmation for this reason is that feigned exterior profession of such schism is a sort of approval and affirmation thereof, that it is religious and of true faith; but this is intrinsically evil, even if it not be interiorly believed or intended, because it is exteriorly to confess a false religion. For neither can the signification be separated from such deeds and in such matter, namely of religion and cult; because exterior acts, clothing, or other ceremonies are not assumed for cult except because of some signification; therefore he who exteriorly uses them by way of religious cult approves, at least exteriorly, that rite of worshipping God. But this is intrinsically evil, for to approve or confess in words that such rite is religious is evil and against faith and religion; therefore to approve the same also in deeds is equally corrupt, and this is the very strong reason of Augustine in the places cited. Which is hence further made clear, because this pretense of false religion is a certain exterior negation of the faith; but this is always evil, as we laid down at the beginning; therefore so is the pretense. The major is clear, because the pretense is approval of superstitious religion and, consequently, it is confession of the false faith from which that superstition proceeds; but the affirmation of error is denial of truth; therefore the pretense is denial of the Catholic faith that is contrary to the heresy. Next, since the true religion is one only, he who approves that one exteriorly rejects every contrary; therefore he who exteriorly approves heretical rites denies in the same way by that very fact the Catholic religion; and thus he fails contrariwise in confession of faith. Hence, on this reason too, such pretense is very contrary to the honor of the Christian religion; for it leads to contempt of it, since it is exteriorly denied and rejected, and the contrary is strengthened in the minds of its enemies, as we will say a little later. From which finally is concluded that such pretense is never licit, even for avoiding death, both because external and pretended denial of the faith is never licit for avoiding any evil at all, and also because a man is especially bound to keep a precept, even a positive and human one, notwithstanding any danger of violent death, when transgression of it is extorted for contempt of religion, as I said in bk.3 De Legibus ch.30.

15. We can in another way explain the force of this obligation, because in that critical moment, when the faithful are coerced by unjust laws to participate in the sacred rites of heretics, the affirmative precept to confess the Catholic faith by resisting such laws is specifically binding, and accordingly those who make external pretense and obey, even if they do it with feigned mind, are failing in confession of faith; and thereupon they are to be reckoned among the lapsed in persecution of the faith. This doctrine I take from Cyprian in the places mentioned before, especially from epist.31, which is to him from the clerics existing at Rome, where, after they had said that not only those who sacrificed exteriorly to idols, or ate things sacrificed to idols, were failing in the faith, but also those who had offered, when present, or sent, when absent, notifications of submission, they add the notable words: "He is not immune from crime who wishes to seem to have made satisfaction to proposals or edicts or laws against the Gospel; for in this very fact he has obeyed because he wished to seem to have obeyed." And later Cyprian stabs more vehemently at the English as both schismatic and weak in constancy of faith when he says: "Far be it from the Roman Church to abandon her vigor with such profane ease, and to loosen the nerves of severity after having overthrown the majesty of the faith." And the words are in agreement of the same Cyprian when he says in bk. De Lapsis: "Nor let them deceive themselves into not doing penance who, although they have not soiled their hands with abominable sacrifices, have yet polluted their consciences with notifications of submission. And that profession is the affirmation of a Christian denying what he was, of a Christian rejecting that he himself did what another by doing committed. And although it is written, 'Ye cannot serve two masters,' he has served the secular lord, has submitted to his edict, and has obeyed human command more than God."

I take the same doctrine from Chrysostom homi.25 on Matthew in 'Imperfecto', where he first shows the necessity of confessing the faith, and among other things he says: "If God had created only a heart for you, the faith of the heart would be sufficient for you; but now God has created a mouth for you, so that you may believe with the heart and confess with the mouth." And he adjoins: "Not only with the mouth but also with the five bodily senses; but if even one sense was too little the confession is not perfect." But, when declaring the necessary occasion for such confession, he adds the following words, which, because they confirm this truth in many ways and bring light for solving the arguments, I will report complete. "Therefore," he says, "if anyone say to you, 'do not eat the thing sacrificed to an idol, but look only at the idols, how splendid they are', if provoked you look, you have with your eyes denied Christ. Not because looking at idols is anything, but you sin because you look when invited. But if you do not look, you have with your eyes confessed Christ. Therefore is it written [Psalms 119.37]: 'Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity'. But if he say to you, 'I do not wish you to look at the idols but only to listen, how that Gentile blasphemes Christ so that he might glorify the Gods', if you listen, you have with your ears denied Christ. If he say to you, 'I do not wish you to hear blasphemy against Christ, but lo, how incense is offered to the gods, stand only and receive the odor of the incense,' if you smell it, you have with your smell offended Christ. Again if he say to you, 'do not eat the meat with your teeth, just feign that you are eating from the sacrifice,' if you pretend, you have thus with your taste denied Christ. But if you refuse to feign, you have confessed Christ, just as did Eleazar in the book of Maccabees, who refused to eat sheep's meat under the appearance of pork. If he say to you, 'I do not wish you to feign that you are eating of the sacrifice, but only touch the idol with your hand or hold the thurible', if you touch or hold, you have with your touch denied Christ. But if you refuse, you have with your touch confessed Christ, as it is written [Psalm 7.3]: 'If there be iniquity in my hands'. For all the members of your soul or of your body God made not only for your use but for his glory."

16. Now by reason can be shown the said assumed proposition, namely, that in that critical moment the affirmative precept to confess the faith is obligatory, because the precept especially then or for that time obliges when the faithful is by an infidel or heretic tyrant, or by any public persecutor whatever of the faith, questioned about his faith, as whether he be a Christian or obedient to the Roman Pontiff, or if he is questioned whether he believe that a sect or a rite of worshipping God foreign to the Catholic or Roman Church is licit or holy; for in these cases the faithful is bound not only not to deny openly the Catholic faith, or not to confess a false one, but also not to turn aside or to dissimulate or keep silent, but openly to confess the Catholic faith and religion; but in the case in which the faithful are by edict coerced to enter the temples of heretics and to take part in their rites, they are being virtually questioned by the public power whether they approve those rites or not, or whether they profess the Catholic religion; therefore the faithful are bound to confess the truth by not obeying such edicts, for the refusal is a sort of confession of the faith to which the precept then obliges. The major proposition is common to the theologians along with St. Thomas IIa IIae q.3 a.2, where Cajetan and all the modern expositors not only agree but also hand it on as certain dogma. For although there be some controversy whether any questioning at all suffices (which for the present is not important), yet, when the questioning is by the public power, there is no doubt about the obligation to confess the faith, because then most of all is the necessity urgent to honor God and the Christian religion; and therefore he who then turns aside takes from God his true honor and is truly ashamed of Christ. About which Cyprian thus writes in the cited book De Lapsis: "Christ says in his precepts: 'He who is abashed of me before men, him will the Son of man be abashed of'; and does he think himself a Christian who is abashed or afraid to be a Christian? How can he be with Christ who is ashamed or afear'd to belong to Christ?"

17. But that in the case of which we are now treating, Catholics are being questioned by the public power, both about their religion and faith and also whether they approve or refuse the superstition of the Protestants, is manifest from the fact itself. For that is why they are being under very grave penalties coerced to enter the churches, etc., so as to show whether they are pontificalists or belong to the Roman religion, as they themselves say, and whether they detest the Calvinist religion. Nay rather, they are questioned in such way that they cannot exteriorly show both; therefore that occasion is one where the precept to confess the faith most obliges, at least by refusing such communication with heretics. Which is very well confirmed by the example of St. Ermenegildus, prince of Spain, who, so as not to receive the Eucharist from the hand of a heretic, even at the bidding of his father, refused to the point of death. Which deed is much commended by Gregory bk.3 Dialog. ch.15 when he says: "The man, given to God, reproached, as he ought to have, the arriving Arian bishop, and repulsed from himself his perfidy with deserving rebukes." By which words he signifies that he did it by the duty of obligation, so that he might not seem to be communicating with heresy.

18. Another reason for this obligation can be taken from scandal, which seems so intrinsically annexed to these actions that it seems inseparable from them. But this is enough for any external communication with schismatics to be sinful and detestable, according to the doctrine of the Apostle Romans 14 and 1 Corinthians 8 where he calls this sin, v.12, “sin against Christ,” and 10.28-29: “Eat not...for conscience sake...Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other.” And from the deed of Mathattias in 2 Maccabees 6 and from his excellent words it is clear that death is to be borne rather than this scandal be given to the brethren. But there is clarification that scandal intervenes in this business. First, on the part of the heretics themselves, for from this sort of weakness of Catholics they are confirmed and hardened in their error, and they despise the Roman faith. Hence Sander bk.3 Histor., after he had reported that at the time of the queen, because of the very bitter law and coercion, many Catholics refused not at some time to go even publicly to the churches, sermons, communion, and assemblies of schismatics, he subjoins: “In the meantime the queen and hers reckoned things to be from the beginning going splendidly with them, because, although there were so many worshippers of the ancient faith in the kingdom, yet they knew that most were embracing, or in some way or other by their presence approving, the rites publicly prescribed to them, although interiorly they were worshipping another faith, about which they themselves did not care much or thought it necessary for the time to conceal. And they rejoiced not a little that some of the priests did not even shrink from administering these rites.” In this way, then, this pretense of Catholics resulted in increase to the schism and great contempt to the Roman religion, and occasion for the same scandal always remains. And thus there is found also in such action another malice, because it redounds to the favor and help of heretics insofar as they are heretics, that is, as they perform the works of their error; but this is intrinsically evil, as in a similar case was noted by Navarrus cons.12 De Haereticis n.6 at the end and following. Hence this scandal is also most found on the part of Catholics, especially the simpler of them; for they easily imitate others who seem to be wiser; and thus this sort of custom becomes an offense to the weak. For if anyone (as Paul says) sees him who has knowledge in the churches of heretics taking part in their rites, his conscience, since it is weak, is made to imitate him, and thus the weak perishes in the knowledge of the more learned. And, which is chief, it hence happens that as the multitude increases, now they use, not in pretense, but from their heart that rite to worship God, such that the simple do not know how to distinguish between the ancient religion and the new superstition. There is, then, an evident harm and scandal, by reason of which this sin is not only against fraternal charity and divine honor, but also against confession of faith, which obliges most of all, on the witness of St. Thomas above, when, by dissimulation or silence, due honor is taken from God, “and utility should on neighbors be bestowed.”

19. Lastly we can add to these a reason taken from moral danger; for if a faithful people frequents the assemblies of heretics, and especially if it hears their sermons, they live in very great danger of losing the faith. For although one or another could hear them without danger, nay and attack and confound them, yet the simple crowd is easily deceived, and therefore even the more advanced are bound to abstain from such sermons lest by their example they bring others with them, and so the faith of these is endangered. And therefore does Chrysostom warn orat.2 De Provid. et Fato that one should flee places and sermons that are full of pestilential opinions more than contagious and infected places, because the latter harm the body but the former kill the soul. “Do not stand,” he says, “but jump back, do not delay, fear even the briefest pause here. These things we say, not fearful of the firmness of those opinions, but afraid for your weakness, etc.” Therefore too does Augustine warn in bk. De Fide et Symbolo ch.1: “So that the faith cannot by the deceitful cleverness of heretics be in the least part violated in us, one must make provision of pious and cautious vigilance.” And Gregory Nazianzen in orat.53, which is about the new Lord’s Day, gravely blames those who, as he himself says, “accommodate their faith to the arbitrament of time,” namely, when heretics have possession of affairs, following their own will in matters of faith and, as he subjoins, “employing dispensation in the faith.” Which is rather a sort of dangerous pretense; and therefore does he also say that those who thus walk “limp in the faith,” because in truth they fail in confession of faith and live in danger of losing the faith; and although perhaps they themselves be constant, they put their brothers in danger.

20. Now, to the reasons for doubt, the response is easy from what has been said. To the first is said that those actions, taken abstractly and generally, can be said to be indifferent, insofar as they are not intrinsically evil, yet, taken in the particular case, as done in such way and in such circumstances, they do contain an intrinsic malice. For, as I was reporting from Chrysostom, to look at idols is not intrinsically evil, but to look at them because of inducement, or fear of a tyrant, is to deny Christ. “Not,” he says, “because looking at idols is anything, but you sin because you look when invited.” To enter, then, in such way a church of heretics or a synagogue of Jews is in itself nothing; but to enter for the sake of religion and to perform the rites of heretics, so as to obey the command of a heretic, is evil. Thus too, although to hear the sermon of a heretic is not per se and intrinsically evil, yet to go to sermons frequently, and at the command of those inducing to heresy, and with scandal and danger to the weak, and sometimes to oneself, is pernicious. It is also much more clearly superstitious to take part in the prayers and rites of heretics, because either it is a sort of tacit approval of this kind of superstition, or cooperation too is mixed in. Which is most of all seen in participation of the sacraments; and therefore, among all the rites that are done by Calvinists, the more hateful is communication with them in the sacrilegious supper and the fictive Eucharist that they administer; for those who participate in that are evidently cooperating in an infidel superstition and are receiving, for the sacrament of Christ, what is a nothing, and are by their own deed approving that custom. Thus, next, although in a case of necessity a Catholic might be baptized by a heretic who is using a true and substantial rite of baptism, yet if the heretic make use of other rites accidental, superstitious, and foreign to the custom of the Roman Church, he cannot cooperate in them, although he could sometimes tolerate them, if neither scandal nor contempt of religion intervene and he cannot avoid them.

And thus too is response made to the other part of that reason. For those acts are by common imposition and use acts of religion, and they have this signification partly from the nature of the thing, partly from imposition and the use of men; hence, when taken in the particular case and on such occasion and with such inducement and in consort and communication with such schismatics, they clearly signify their religious cult and rite, and have for this purpose been instituted by such a king. Wherefore, just as it is intrinsically evil to assume the sign of a false religion, nor can it, on account of that fear, be licitly done, as is a thing settled in theology, so is it per se evil to perform those acts in such a way and on such an occasion. But the doctrine that, when a heretic has not been denounced, it is licit to communicate with him in sacred rites, which Navarrus hands down, by the same is it expressly said that the proviso is that the sacred acts themselves are done in the Catholic rite, and that there is no communication in an heretical rite, ceremony, or impiety; and in addition that no offense to Catholics or no danger to the faith intervene, as was made clear expressly by Azor when reporting Navarrus in the said book 8 ch.11 q. 4 in the volume.

21. To the second reason the response is that the pretense of a false religion is intrinsically evil, as in the said book 9 De Legibus I showed extensively from the opinion of Augustine above mentioned and of many doctors whom I there referred to; and the same opinion is held by all who deny that it is sometimes licit to assume the sign of a false religion or to perform an external act of infidelity, even if internal faith is retained. Because, although he who assumes the sign does not intend its signification, he cannot separate it, and therefore, willy nilly, he signifies by the act itself that he is an infidel; and thus, in the very deed, he confesses a false religion, which is contrary to the precept of confession of faith. For, just as the true faith obliges to its confession, so it also obliges to avoiding the contrary infidelity, and consequently also to avoiding the exterior confession thereof. This obligation is also more urgent when the harassment of a public tyrant is insistent on the contrary; for then most of all does the precept oblige of confessing the true faith and of avoiding all opposed pretense. And this obligation will be greater the greater is the scandal and the greater is the danger of overthrow of faith and of contempt for the Roman religion; all which things most come together in the present case.

22. Through which is response made to the third reason, which was about scandal; for we say, in the first place, that there are, besides the scandal, other sufficient reasons. Next, we say that the scandal is not avoided because of the escapes there proposed. For when it is said that it is known to all that those things are not done by Catholics from the heart but by coercion, we reply that this is uncertain (for it was possible for many to be ignorant of the fact), and that this is enough for very grave scandal, for that very pretense is a grave sin; besides the fact that other dangers and injuries to the Christian religion are not avoided. Again, when it is said that the king is not so much harassing the faithful because of religion as because of greed for money, I reply that this is said by guesswork; but however it may be, it matters little, because the intention not of the doer but of the deed must be looked at; for although the king intend monetary gain, he is proximately giving inducement to profession of a false and superstitious religion, together with express, or at least tacit, denial of the Roman religion; but this is intrinsically evil, and so, for whatever reason it is intended by the king, it is to be resisted.

23. Next too the protestation does not excuse, both because it cannot morally be as public and notorious as is the pretense itself of heresy, and also because the protestation, although it were known to all Catholics, does not remove the fact that the action is a pretense and an external profession of error and of false superstition; nor does it remove failure to confess the faith, nor contempt of religion, nor danger to souls. Nay, in that way license is given for exterior profession of any infidelity at all along with protestation, made before faithful Catholics, that it is not being done with an infidel heart, but from human affection for not losing one's resources and other temporal goods; but this is very base and pernicious and against reason; for this fictive profession of corrupt religion is not only evil because other faithful will believe that it is done from infidelity, but also because this is being signified to whoever sees and understands such signs. But at most the protestation takes away that estimation from Catholics, because the protestation is wont to be done only before the faithful, not before infidels. In addition too, even were it done among all, the action is always against the honor of God and to the contempt of the faith, and with danger and scandal to the weak. The protestation, therefore, does not purge the malice of such actions. And in this way does Azor ultimately explain his own opinion, in vol.3 bk.1 ch.7, after q.2.

Chapter 10: Whether the ill treatment that Catholics are suffering in England is true persecution of the Christian religion.

Summary: 1. He who in hatred of the Roman Church ill-treats any part of it persecutes the Catholic Church. 2. State of the controversy. 3. The reasons whereby the king excuses himself. 4. Ill treatment of Christians in temporal things is not persecution of the Church. 5. What Christian persecution or persecution of the Church is. 6. What persecution proper of the Church is. 7. The first means which persecutors are wont to use. 8. From the end itself of persecution is shown that the ill treatment of the English faithful is persecution of the Church. 9. The same is shown on the part of the means. How grave the persecution was under Henry. 10. How much the persecution increased under Edward, under Elizabeth, under James. 11. The second means of persecution. How much under Elizabeth. 12. And under James. 13. The meeting of the four Irish bishops for extirpating the Catholic faith. 14. An evasion that the king uses is excluded. 15. Other evasions of the king are refuted. 16. The progress of persecutions under King James. 17. His second evasion is met. The king is not excused from persecution because of the benefits that he reports he has, for reason of political governance, conferred on Catholics.

1. This question is not to be treated in the sense that we should return again to the first controversy about where the true and Catholic religion is, whether in the island of England, or in the whole world, or, which is the same, in the Roman Church; for this was sufficiently disputed in book 1. And, from the things there said, we suppose that the true faith and the Christian religion exist in the Roman Church; from which it evidently follows that if in England the faithful (who are called papists by heretics) are ill-treated because they are in union with the Roman Church, and profess its faith, religion, and obedience, that is proper and altogether true persecution of the Catholic faith and of the Church of Christ, and he who is author of it is an enemy of Christ and a persecutor of Christians. Nor can anyone doubt of this consequence or conditional proposition, once the said hypothesis has been posited; for if the Roman Church is the true Church of Christ, he who persecutes the Roman Church because of his own religion, or he who opposes its religion, is persecuting and attacking the Church of Christ, and consequently that will be persecution of Christ and of his Church. Which is then most so called when it is not only private persecution of one or another person, but is also public and general to the whole community. For although the persecution of any member at all, insofar as he is such or on account of faith or justice, is persecution of the same Christ and seems, by reason of its general cause or motive, to redound against the whole Church, nevertheless by antonomasia that is said to be ecclesiastical persecution which attacks the community of the Church and its universal body. However, it is not necessary for such ill treatment to deserve the name of persecution of the Church that it be directly and immediately done either in the whole Catholic Church, as it is diffused through the whole globe, or in the Roman Church, as it is a particular bishopric; but it is enough that it prowls about in some Christian kingdom on account of the same Roman and Catholic faith. For Augustine says bk.8 De Civitate Dei ch.53: "For what is it not to consider that the Church, bearing fruit and growing in the whole world, can in some nations be suffering persecution from kings even when in others it is not suffering?" And he brings forward the example of the persecution done in Persia by the king, and by the Goths in their dominion, and by Herod in Jerusalem. For such ill treatment in one kingdom or principal part of the Church is not done without some participation and troubling of the Universal Church; for the whole is in a certain way shaken. Because although the persecution is in motion in one province, it is trying to overturn the foundations of the whole Church.

2. With this supposed, then, as a constant, the sense of the present controversy, since it is de facto clear that those who profess the Roman religion are, by the princes after Henry VIII of that kingdom (Catholic Mary excepted), in many ways ill-treated and afflicted with great sufferings, is whether it truly is and should be called persecution of the Church and of Christ, or only either unjust war or just punishment. And the occasion for the question has been provided to us by the King of England, who complains greatly about the Pontiff that he seems to be numbering him among the persecutors of the Church. Hence he contends that the penalties and afflictions that in England are by royal authority being inflicted on the papists (as we are by them understood to be) do not merit the name of persecution of the Church because they are being inflicted, not by title of religion, but in just punishment of crimes committed against the king and the republic. Hence at the beginning of his Apology he thus speaks: "It cannot be denied but that the Pontiff has vehemently sinned against the good morals and the custom of princes, especially Christian ones, since he has condemned me unheard, which thing indeed he has done by numbering me among the persecutors; as is not obscurely indicated by the fact that he is encouraging his Catholics to aspire to the glory of martyrdom." But next, in his attack on the first Brief of the Pontiff, he digresses at length about this and first he affirms of Elizabeth on p.18 that: "on none of the pontificalists did she impose punishment for religion's sake until their crimes and outrages had extorted from her, as it were unwillingly, the sufferings that they have borne." Now this he in this place more or less proves because the queen, neither before nor after the issuing of the Brief of Pius V against her, can justly be branded with the infamy of persecution. He shows the first part because, at that time, before Pius V had fulminated his sentence against the queen, "neither did she impose on Catholics any heavier fine or severer laws, nor was any capital punishment at that time established against Catholics." He shows the second part since, from the time when that sentence had been passed against the queen, "so many plots and machinations and public rebellions rose up in the kingdom that the punishments of the delinquents were not only just but also moderate;" therefore the queen cannot, on account of those punishments, be branded with the infamy of persecution, but can rather be commended with the name of great clemency.

3. Next he makes transition to himself and his own kingship, and on p.23 he thus speaks: "As to what they falsely accuse me of about the persecution of Catholics, it can never be proved that anyone for the sake of conscience, and therefore of religion, has hitherto in my reign either been punished with death or lived merely in danger of death. Unless perhaps (he adds) this wretched interdiction given by the Pope to Catholics not to make, on their oath, promise to me is becoming henceforth the cause why many of them are rightly punished.” Next, with many arguments and signs he tries to show that he does not merit the name of persecutor. First generally by comparison with the queen, because James has conducted himself with much greater mildness and piety toward Catholics than the queen. Second, because he has used so much clemency toward Catholics “that even they themselves have come to the hope that they will soon enjoy the freedom of their religion,” and that other sectaries, familiars of the king, are astonished and fear therefrom great calamity for the kingdom. Third, he reviews the human favors and temporal benefits conferred on Catholics, as are the giving some recusants the dignity of knight, making others sharers in access and conversation with him, lavishing on them honors and benefices without any discrimination of religion, and the like. Fourth, he numbers among these benefits that he has admonished his judges not to afflict priests with punishment, even if they have been convicted, and chiefly he exaggerates “a most clement edict whereby it was permitted to all priests who had not been apprehended, and were at that time active outside custody, to leave the kingdom within a predetermined day. But if any were being detained in prison, they were permitted also freely to depart, and if any others were afterwards apprehended, they were sent off across the sea and there restored to liberty.” From which he concludes that ingratitude is shown in the Pontiff “who has with so unjust a measure compensated so many benefits.”

4. But because for us it is certain and has been examined that the persecution which the Catholic Church is now suffering in England, and suffered after Henry under Elizabeth, is one of the gravest of persecutions that the Church has hitherto in any particular kingdom endured, therefore, in order to show this from its own beginnings and foundations, I note that in every persecution, so as to pass judgment on it, what must be looked at is, first of all, the target and end at which the persecution is tending, next the means through which the attainment of that end is intended. In order, therefore, for some ill treatment of the Church to be a proper and public persecution, it is necessary and sufficient on the part of the end that it be ordered to bringing about destruction or change of the Catholic religion in the whole Church or in some notable part of it. For although the ill treatment of a Christian people or kingdom be ordained to seizing tyrannically the temporal lordship thereof, and although for this reason many temporal harms be done to Christians by rapes, murders, and other like injuries, if these do not tend to the overthrow of the Christian religion but come to a stand in the appetite only for temporal empire, there will not be a persecution proper of the Church as we are now treating of it. Because by it the faithful are not being ill-treated insofar as they are faithful and Christians, but insofar as they are men and citizens, just as Gentiles and pagans are sometimes ill-treated. It will, therefore, be able to be called a bodily persecution, not a spiritual one, a human persecution, not a Christian one, for the latter ought to be because of Christ or because of his faith, according to the verse of Matthew 5.11: “Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you...for my sake.” And 1 Peter 4.15-16: “But let none of you suffer as a murderer... Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.”

5. However, if on the contrary the persecution tend to that end, and be done under that name, by whatever means intended, it will be a Christian persecution. Because, as is said in morals, the end is what gives being and species to an action. Hence just as he who favors Christians because they are Christians, and confers any benefits whatever on them because of faith and love for Christ, is honoring Christ and can expect a reward from him, according to the verse of Matthew 10.42: “And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones...only in the name of a disciple...he shall in no wise lose his reward;” so also, contrariwise, he who directly intends to offend the Catholic religion and to turn therefrom those who profess it, whatever means he use for this purpose, will be properly a persecutor of Christians, and consequently also of Christ, according to his word when saying to Paul, Acts 9.4: “Why persecutest thou me?” But as to the means, in the same place of Matthew 5 the same Lord insinuates various ways of persecuting Christians when he says, v.11: “when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake.” Where Augustine bk.1 De Sermone Domini in Monte, accurately distinguishing those three things, says that “persecutions” are properly done by force or ambush; but “to revile” is to dishonor someone in his presence and to afflict him with insults; “but to say all manner of evil against someone” is properly to disparage someone in his absence and to damage his reputation. But although these things are rightly said when the word ‘persecution’ is taken strictly, nevertheless even the ill treatment that is done through insults or defamation of Christians deserves the name of persecution, as is said of the Apostles Acts 5 that, v.41, “they departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Jesus.” And 1 Peter 3.14: “If ye suffer for righteousness’ sake, happy are ye.” Therefore, according to the diversity of means or tribulations, a persecution can indeed be greater or lesser; yet, in whatever way it be done, if it is done by reason of the Christian faith or religion, it will be Christian persecution. Just as Augustine in the cited place said that “then does someone suffer for Christ when he is, according to the true faith and Catholic doctrine, called a Christian, and is for that reason ill-treated.”

6. Next, so as to bring more light to the cause, we judge it useful to explain more distinctly both the ends of the persecutions of the Church and the means by which they are wont to be done. For a persecution can either be only against good morals, by introducing through violence and human power some corrupt morals into the kingdom, and by gravely afflicting those who resist or fight in any way for the truth. But such ill treatment, as long as it is contained within those limits, is, because it can exist in any kingdom, even a merely human and Gentile one, wont for that reason not so much to be called an ecclesiastical persecution as unjust and tyrannical government. Therefore ill treatment by a Christian prince is wont to advance further to rending the unity of the Church, and to so despising obedience to the one head that he afflicts all those subjects of himself who do not consent to the same schism, and judges them for this very thing alone worthy of punishments. And this now properly reaches some rank of ecclesiastical persecution. Finally, the end and target of the persecution can be change of faith and of the true religion founded thereon, along with ill treatment and affliction of the faithful who resist such change. And this is, on the part of the end, consummate persecution of the Church, because it strives utterly to overthrow its foundation.

7. But the means which persecutors of the Church are wont to use for this end are more or less these. First, by force and power to overturn divine cult in the Church by destroying churches, burning images, converting monasteries and sacred places to profane uses. Just as is related by Optatus bk.6 of the Donatists, whom he accuses in the words of Elijah [1 Kings 19.10]: “They have thrown down thine altars.” “Why,” he says, “have you overturned the desires of men along with the altars themselves? Why have you destroyed the way with your prayers?” And Augustine bk.3 Contra Crescon. ch.59 therefrom convicts the Donatists of having persecuted the Maximianists, “because they destroyed the basilica of Maximian.” Thus too were the Arians overthrowing the temples of Catholics, as Victorius reports bk.1 De Persecut. Vandal. Other persecutors also overthrew and burned images, as is sufficiently well known. Another means is wont to be to proclaim laws and edicts contrary to the faith, whereby the faithful are compelled, under the gravest penalties, to abjure the faith and to profess something contrary to the rules of faith. Which not only did the Gentile emperors do, but also those who defected from Christ, Julian, Valens, and the like. To these are added the carrying out of punishments and tortures. And sometimes too violent means are wont to be applied, whereby the children of Catholics are taught and instructed by heretical ministers and masters, and in order that they may, on the contrary, be kept away and in every way hindered from the discipline of Catholics, as is in memory recorded was done by Julian the Apostate. Next, sometimes tyrants are wont with human enticements and favors to tempt the minds of believers, as is in the ecclesiastical histories matter of common report.

8. First, then, must be proved that the ill treatment of the faithful in England is, on the part of the end, ecclesiastical persecution. For it will be clear if we observe its beginning and origin. For Henry VIII, in order to make proceed in his kingdom the sentence of his divorce against Catherine, in contempt of the Holy See, introduced a new form of the Church in England, and set himself up as head of that church; and he established a decree that there was in that kingdom no need of the authority of the Pontiff in any administration of the affairs of the Church. And, by this power thus usurped, he decreed the introduction into his kingdom of new rites of religion and laws for worshipping God that were far other than they had formerly been; and for this end he did many things which we will later touch upon. This target had Edward also, or rather his protector and advisers, who so increased and amplified the end “that within a short time the awesome sacrifice, the divine office, and all the sacraments ceased altogether in England to be done in the Catholic rite,” as Sander reports. Nay, although Henry forbade, the article of primacy excepted, change to be made in other things pertaining to the faith, straightaway with Edward the Zwinglian heresy began to be introduced, as we saw above. The same end was restored by Elizabeth as soon as she was assumed to the monarchy; for she both declared herself supreme governess of the whole of England no less in spiritual and ecclesiastical things than in temporal, and wished it to be sworn by her subjects. Nor did she in every way insist only on preserving the schism but also on introducing the Lutheran heresy, or some other little different from it, and on completely changing the Catholic religion that her sister Mary had begun to restore; and she labored in that care and solicitude to the end of her life.

Now, that the same form of religion, namely one repugnant to the Catholic, is being by King James preserved in his kingdom, and guarded, and in all ways intended, there is no need to prove. For this the king himself, with sufficient eloquence and explicitness, rather often professes in his own book, as is sufficiently manifest from the profession of his faith treated of above, and we will, in the following, point out many of the words and places in it where he shows and declares this end. From all which it is clear that those three corrupt ends which we above distinguished in persecution of the Christian religion, namely corrupt morals, change of religion by schism, and change of faith by heresy, are all found in this Anglican disturbance; for it began from corruption of morals, and proceeded to schism, and was consummated in open heresy, and does thus now persist. For schism is not even denied by the king himself; but that was already founded on heresy, as was shown in book 3, and it has culminated in many other heresies, as was proved in books 1 and 2; but schism and heresy cannot exist without great corruption of morals. Therefore, on the part of the end, all the evils which can be found in ecclesiastical persecution there come together.

9. But that it was on the part of the means too, both before Elizabeth and under her, and after her under James, a most bitter persecution, is proved by running briefly through the heads that we have touched on. The first was about violent overthrow and usurpation of sacred things; but this began at once with the change of religion under Henry. For Henry alone seized violently 10,000 monasteries and temples built by Catholics over many centuries, and turned them to profane uses, as Bozius reports vol. 1 De Signis Ecclesi. ch. 10; and the sequence and manner of his tyranny is more extensively described by Sander bk. 1 pp. 154 and following. "And at the beginning," he says, "Henry prescribed that all the men and women of all the orders should hand over all the most precious ornaments and relics of their churches to his treasurers." Next, he says he obtained in the public assemblies that all the minor monasteries, whose revenues did not exceed 700 gold coins, should be given over to his own pleasure; and in this way he seized 376 monasteries, and from them 120,000 gold coins each year, and he dismissed into the world more than 10,000 religious of both sexes. Within three years, indeed, he overthrew all the monasteries of his kingdom, and through supreme violence devoted all their goods to his exchequer. But by how much force and how he entrusted this with corrupt arts to execution, is pursued extensively by the same author. But after this, he moved war against the images, tombs, and relics of the saints, and destroyed all the more famous ones, and treated them with contempt and plundered them. But other churches, although he did not utterly overthrow them, yet he seized whatever was precious in them, and violated them in infinite other ways, treating everything sacred with dishonor.

10. Now all these things were continued and increased under Edward, for if any images or crosses had remained in England, they were partly overthrown and partly burned; and everything gold and silver, chalices and sacred ecclesiastical vestments, and all the goods of churches were devoted to the king. And the divine office began to be recited in a heretical rite and in the vulgar tongue, and thus, with the divine sacrifice taken away and the altars destroyed, the churches of Catholics ceased to be temples of God and of Christ, and were transformed into synagogues of Satan. But afterwards Elizabeth again took out of the way the temples, monasteries, and all the sacred things that her sister had in part brought back to the ancient beauty of the true religion, and invaded with greater force and power everything sacred, and tried with all her strength to take away all use of the ancient religion. James, however, although perhaps he did not find monasteries to destroy or their immovable goods again to occupy, nor temples that had not yet been debased by heretics, is nevertheless reckoned to be inflicting violence on sacred things. First, because he acts by his own power to preserve that abomination of desolation, and with the same violence he prevents anything redolent of the Catholic religion from being restored in his realms. And although in Ireland (as we have thence received) the Church, formerly wrecked by heretics, is now by order of the king being rebuilt with the expenses of the Catholics, yet it is being done so that it might serve the sacrilegious rites and assemblies of Calvinists; which is to double, so to say, the injury and the persecution. Next, if any sacred vessels are being secretly retained by Catholics, and the ministers of the king find them, they seize them and convert them to their own and profane uses. Nay (as we have received from those worthy of faith), under this color they steal all precious vessels of gold and silver or ornaments of women, feigning that they are sacred vessels and are being kept for adornment of reliquaries or altars.

11. Another way of persecuting the Christian religion is wont to be by edicts and laws violent and repugnant to the Catholic faith, of which sort it is very well known that innumerable were passed in England under the aforesaid kings, and are being passed daily. For Henry, at the beginning of his fall, compelled his subjects by public edict to give him an oath of primacy, as was seen above; nay, he was inflamed with so much hatred for the Pontiff that he prescribed by public law, under punishment of death, that everyone should delete the name of Pope from their books. And other similar laws were under him and under Edward passed against the Catholic religion. But later Elizabeth, immediately at the beginning of her reign, proposed an oath about her ecclesiastical primacy to be taken by her subjects. For although she did not use the name of 'head of the Church' but of 'supreme governess', it was however afterwards made clear that the same thing was signified by both phrases. Also was added the penalty of privation of goods and perpetual incarceration for those who refused the first time, but the penalty of death the second. In addition, the use of the sacrifice and of the sacraments in the Roman rite was forbidden under penalty of 200 gold pieces the first time, 400 the second, all goods and perpetual incarceration the third. Again, she forbade anyone, under penalty of loss of all one's goods and perpetual incarceration, to bring into England Agnus Deis, crosses, or any other sacred thing consecrated by authority of the Pontiff, and, under penalty of death, to carry Briefs or Bulls from Rome. To reconcile anyone to the Roman Church she wanted to be the crime of lèse majesté. Those who sailed outside the kingdom for the sake of religion she first deprived of all their goods. Afterwards, however, she proclaimed a law whereby all clerics ordained by pontifical authority were within a certain day compelled to leave the kingdom and never, under penalty of lèse majesté, to return from overseas. And she promulgated innumerable like edicts.

12. Nor has King James, in attacking the Catholic faith, been more sluggish in his laws. For, as is extensively reported by Cardinal Bellarmine in his response to the Apology, there proceeded from the king in the year 1606 an edict whose title was 'For Detecting and Repressing Papists'. From which title is manifest that the edict was passed for the cause of religion and for defection from the Pope. Hence in its first article the laws passed by Elizabeth are confirmed, but in others many things are under the gravest penalties established for the same end. As that the fining with diverse pecuniary penalties of Catholics who refuse to receive the supper of heretics, or to enter their temples and take part in their sacred rites, was being done, through increase of these on each occasion, in a far more bitter way than under Elizabeth. Next, although the king say that he has tempered the ancient oath, he has not however removed it. For we know by faith worthy of report that it was last year decreed that all subjects should give the oath. In addition, those who also refuse to accept the new oath of fidelity are thrown into the prison of murderers; and if they there also refuse, they are deprived of all their goods and delivered over to perpetual incarceration. Again, as that he who leads any of the king's subjects back to obedience to the Church is held guilty of lèse majesté, and he undergoes punishment for the crime unless, having confessed the crime within a certain period, he take both the oaths, of primacy and against the power of the Pope. All which edicts and laws are manifestly ordered to the target of turning men from the Roman religion, and they contain considerable coercion; since, by the threat of privation of goods and perpetual incarceration, men are kept from acts in harmony with the Roman faith and religion, and are drawn toward an oath of perfidy and the sacrilegious superstitions of heretics.

13. Add that it was before under Elizabeth not so bitterly done as in these later years, especially from the year 1605 to the present. The same edicts have in Ireland (as is being written from there) been promulgated by legates and governors sent with great power from the king, by whom Catholics are so ill-treated that they are scarce permitted to live, unless they renounce the ancient religion. For it is prescribed to all, under the gravest penalties, that they go to the churches of Protestants on the Lord's days and on feast days and take part in their impious rites, and Catholics are compelled to leave their fatherland if they do not wish to be in conformity with Protestants. In addition, Catholics are forbidden, under pain of perpetual incarceration, to teach grammar or any other science to young men within the kingdom. Parents are prohibited, under pain of confiscation of goods, to send their sons outside the kingdom to Catholic studies of letters; but if it is clear that they have sent them, they are detained in prison until their sons return. Again, those who are their own master are likewise forbidden to depart the kingdom for the sake of obtaining knowledge, under pain, if they are apprehended on their departure, of perpetual incarceration. No one is permitted to be chosen for some magistracy, nor admitted to control of it, unless he first take the oath about the ecclesiastical primacy of the King of England. All these things and many more, which I omit for brevity's sake, are ordered to the same end of tearing up by the roots the Roman religion from that island where it was seeming still to be in vigor. Hence when, by order of the king, the four archbishops, who are the only ones in that province, met in Dublin to deal with affairs of religion, they all swore with one mouth to procure by all means and ways that in their own and their suffragan dioceses, and so far in the whole island, uniformity in rite of religion be preserved. "To the end," they say, "of eradicating thoroughly the papistical religion and of planting in its place the true (of course) faith and religion."

Now this ill treatment by edicts and laws stops not only at threats but in great part proceeds to implementation, as Sander in bk.3 of his history extensively reports about the time of Elizabeth. And about this time it is clear to us, by constant report and relations very worthy of faith, that Catholics are being very greatly ill-treated by plunder and rapine, and having been reduced, at the extreme, to poverty they have neither strength nor spirit to resist. Of which thing we could report many examples; but let one suffice, about a certain illustrious man, the Viscount Montagu, who, in order not to take the new oath, paid in the previous year of 1611 6,000 pounds in compensation, that is, 24,000 Portuguese cruciats or ducats. Nor is there need for us to employ longer proof for the other means of tortures, punishments, and coercion by which the faithful are ill-treated very gravely; because both in the following chapter will it be necessary to relate many arguments and examples of this truth, and now will the same be more evidently made clear by response to the objections, or rather excuses, of the king. For even the king himself does not dare altogether to deny the afflictions and penalties that the orthodox have suffered in England and are also now suffering; but he makes pretense of other excuses which need to be considered so as to make very clear that the persecution is so clear and cruel that it can by no subterfuge be hidden.

14. First, then, the king excuses his predecessor Elizabeth by the above made partition of times. For before the passing of the sentence by Pius V she did not gravely ill-treat the faithful, while after the sentence she did not ill-treat them but defended herself, nor did she persecute the faith but crimes and plots. Now the first member rests on a false foundation. For the king says that, before the excommunication by Pius V, there were passed in England rather severe laws against Catholics. But the excommunication was passed by Pius V in the year 1569, and yet in 1558 and the following year the laws related above were passed, which can and should be called, not only rather severe, but even very severe. For the penalties of privation of goods or of perpetual incarceration, taken in themselves and singly, are very grave; how then is the law not to be judged very severe that imposed both penalties on him who refused once the oath of primacy, that is, of perfidy? Again, the other laws imposing pecuniary penalties both on those who keep the Catholic custom in sacred rites and on those who avoid the sacrilege of Protestants, since they deprive them little by little of their goods necessary for life and ultimately deliver those persevering in good to perpetual incarceration, cannot fail to be judged very grave and very severe.

15. The king adds besides that no penalty of death was at that time established for pontificalists. But the contrary is clear from the said laws; for on him who for a second time refused the oath of perfidy was the penalty of death being imposed. And the same penalty was being paid by one who brought any pontifical Bull at all into England. And a doctor of the Catholic faith, if he converted anyone from heresy, was guilty of lèse majesté, and thereupon was held also guilty of death. Nor only by the laws, but also by the execution of them, and in innumerable other ways did the queen already at that time ill treat Catholics. For Sander reports bk.3, for the year 1585, that many bishops, who refused either to swear or to consent to the other impieties, were deposed from their rank and delivered to prison, and there at length “were by long and tedious miseries extinguished.” Again, other nobles and other religious of both sexes either endured other ill treatments or, to avoid them, were compelled to leave their fatherland and, abandoning everything, become exiles. It is therefore very evident that Elizabeth ill-treated Catholics with the gravest persecution before Pius V turned his attention to her. Hence, if in fairness of spirit, as the king demands, he himself wanted to judge and ponder the thing with all its circumstances, he would far more truly say that Pius V imposed no penalty on the queen before her stubbornness and her savagery toward Catholics compelled the Pontiff to the defense of the innocent.

Let us see, next, how legitimate is the excuse about the acts of Elizabeth in the later time. “Elizabeth,” says the king, “exasperated by the censure and deposition of Pius V, was moved with anger and indignation against Catholics.” But what then is this excuse? Surely none; nay, rather is the iniquity of the persecution thence made graver and more detestable. For, as was shown, Elizabeth had, before the sentence of Pius V, for many years been ill-treating Catholics in order to turn them from obedience to the Pontiff; and although Pius IV had sent her a legate, who admonished her not to destroy her most noble kingdom for hatred of the Pontiff, and affirmed that, if she feared anything for herself by right of the kingdom, it could easily be settled by the kindness of the Apostolic See, she neither wished to hear the legate nor permitted him to cross over into the island, as in book 3 for the year 1566 Sander reports. He adds too that another legate was nevertheless sent by the same Pontiff to England to exhort her to send, with all promise of security, some of her bishops to the Council of Trent, so that the cause of the faith might be dealt with, whom also she proudly rejected. Again he says that she was by various letters from the emperor, kings, and other illustrious Catholic men made always more harsh. What wonder, then, if Pius V, when he had for almost four years of his Pontificate patiently awaited some correction or moderation in the morals of the queen and was achieving nothing, at length judged that severity was to be used against her? No one, certainly, who did not doubt of the power of the Pope will dare to blame his indignation nor excuse the stubbornness of the queen.

We can also adapt to the present cause the excellent opinion of Augustine who, in bk. De Unitate Ecclesiae ch.24 speaks thus to the Donatists: "If you have erected an altar against the Church of Christ and are separated from Christian unity, which is diffused through the whole world, by a sacrilegious schism, and if you oppose by blaspheming and attacking as much as you can the body of Christ, which is the Church diffused through the whole world, the holy and canonical Scripture proves you are the impious and the sacrilegious; they, however, who so kindly decree that, for so great wickedness, you are to be deterred and coerced with warnings of losses, with privation of places or honors or money, so that, bethinking why you suffer those things, you may flee your cognized sacrilege and be freed from eternal damnation, are esteemed to be both most beloved and most pious advisers. This love the Pontiffs owe you, so that your sacrileges too they may both on account of Christian mildness decree are not to be punished as they deserve, and on account of their Christian care not let go altogether unpunished. This does God work in them, whose mercy, even in these troubles of which you complain, you refuse to acknowledge." Although Augustine speak these things more or less, not about a Pontiff coercing a schismatic king, but about an emperor raging in favor of the Church against subject rebels, nevertheless, as I said, these very words and the whole opinion are very well adapted, with proportion, to the present cause. Nor will anyone be able to contradict them save he who denies the power of the Pope to coerce schismatic kings; but he will bring the controversy back to the question of the cause of religion. And in this way too is the conclusion drawn that, although Elizabeth, provoked by the sentence of the Pontiff, increased the persecution, not for that reason did she change the target and end of the persecution; for always she fought against religion and was in that intention, by the occasion of a just sentence, more confirmed and made more cruel, and in this way the persecution of Catholics was not changed or taken away, but increased.

16. To the other things that the king proposes about himself and his own governance, we reply briefly that, in the first place, from the comparison he makes between himself and Elizabeth, he at most shows that at the beginning of his rule he behaved himself more gently toward Catholics and in some way tempered the persecution of Elizabeth; but he did not cease from it. For we can easily show that even James himself from the beginning of his reign persecuted the Catholic religion. First, because in the first year of his reign, and in the first Parliament, he not only confirmed the edicts of the queen but also not a little expanded them, as Bellarmine in his response testifies. Second, because the king himself says that Catholics, having trusted in his kindness, came to the hope that they might trust they would soon enjoy the liberty of their religion. Therefore he admits that, even while he himself was reigning, it was always forbidden to Catholics to profess or observe their religion; therefore were they compelled to desert it; but what can be a more evident persecution of the Church than to forbid the use of it by unjust laws and force? Third, the king himself admits that his supreme clemency toward Catholics reached the point that they were, within a fixed day, permitted to leave the kingdom, or rather were coerced, for the exile was conceded to them for avoiding graver penalties. And this the king calls “a most clement edict.” But let him hear what about a like concession made at the time of Elizabeth Sander writes. “They formed in those very days a new plan, about sending into exile some of those whom they were holding in bonds; either because they felt that by the death and slaughter of priests they effected nothing, or because they judged that their clemency, whose praise they so greatly aspire to, could, when dyed especially by this fact, be noised abroad in many places.” What then if someone make the same judgment about the like plan of the king? Perhaps he will not err much from the truth. However, let us grant that the king did it in the spirit of mitigating the ill treatment and lessening the penalties, “assuredly neither is perpetual exile a great argument for leniency,” as the same author adjoins; nay, considered in itself, it is a very grave penalty, and to be compelled by it to avoid graver penalties is a great calamity, and, finally, when it is imposed on the condition that to return is a capital offense, it is very harsh and savage.

17. But the king says that during his reign it cannot be proved that anyone was punished with death for the cause of religion. But, to begin with, this is no grace, nor is the deed of thieves to be reputed a benefit who are wont to glory that they have given those life whom they did not do away with. Next, very wicked is the conclusion: ‘Catholics are not being killed; therefore neither are they suffering persecution’; as if, indeed, only killing and death are coercion and grave punishment. Hence Augustine De Unitate Ecclesiae ch.20: “As often as princes, by the terrors of even the milder punishments, deter from good life and good deeds by threats and savagery, they are persecutors and oppressors.” Next, what is asserted is false, as we will show in the following chapter. And from what the king adds, and signifies will be, that the forbidding of the oath is occasion for the killing of many who refuse, it sufficiently shows that the purpose of the king is to persecute the saints unto death for the sake of religion. For, as we showed, religion and conscience oblige the faithful not to admit this oath; therefore, he who for that cause kills the faithful is persecuting them unto death for the sake of religion. “Their blood not on the Pontiff,” as the king prophesies, but will on the head of the persecutor fall, unless he be corrected. For the Pontiff, who, by declaring the truth, forbade the oath, did not give cause for shedding such blood; but the king, who both imposed such oath by attacking the truth, and decided to persecute unto death those who refuse it, will be true cause of blood so cruelly shed. Besides, the favors and benefits that he relates he has conferred on Catholics are also of little moment for excusing persecution; for not for the sake of religion did he begin to favor them, or rather to dissemble with them, but for political reasons, so that he might, at the beginning of his reign, in some way conciliate everyone to himself. And perhaps he was by such flatteries and honors eager to win their hearts, so that he might afterwards in things also of religion find them more obedient to his will. But if it is so, that is no excuse, but is rather to be reckoned part of and augment to the persecution. Finally, what the king frequently alleges in his defense, that he was compelled to act more severely against pontificalists by the wickedness of their plots, both does not excuse the persecution, which he had begun much before, as we showed, and helps nothing to excuse from persecution the ill treatment of Catholics that has thence ensued, as we will show in the following chapter.

Chapter 11: Whether those who for the Roman religion and obedience are in England punished with death are to be numbered among true martyrs.

Summary: 1. So as to escape the disreputable mark of persecutor of the Church, the king asserts that faithful and religious men have been killed for crimes and treason. 2. The truth for the affirmative is shown. The Carthusian and Franciscan martyrs; again the illustrious martyrdoms of Thomas More and Rochester. 3. The martyrdom of Thomas, Earl of Northumberland. 4. The testimony of Baronius about the martyrs of England. The martyrs of the Society of Jesus. 5. Grave testimony for Henry Garnet of the Society of Jesus. 6. An evasion of the king is refuted. 7. From his own words it is demonstrated that some of those killed by him have died for Christ. 8. They are martyrs who, when offered the pardon they deserve from death, spit it back so as not to deny the Roman faith. 9. Those inflicted with death for not keeping an unjust law are martyrs. Many Catholics who were killed for transgressing the laws of King James have died for Christ. 10. For the same cause were the martyrs of the nascent Church being killed. 11. They are martyrs who for violation of laws prohibiting acts of the Roman religion are killed. 12. He who is killed because he is performing acts of the Catholic religion will be a martyr. 13. It is no crime of treason to obey the Pontiff. Confirmation from an edict of King James for the oath of fidelity. 14. Those who are in various ways ill-treated for the faith of Christ will not lack the glory of martyrdom. 15. A twofold way of enduring the aforesaid afflictions.

1. So that the King of England may in some way escape the infamy of persecutor of the Church, he has tried to throw the infamy back against the religious and faithful men killed for Christ in the same island, constantly affirming that they were for evil deeds and the crime of treason, or for grave disobedience in transgressing the civil laws, inflicted with a just punishment, and were not killed for the cause of conscience and religion. And therefore he affirms that those who call them martyrs are lying and he much ridicules them. Hence in his Preface he thus speaks: “Although it be enough and more than enough that by fitting proofs is it patent that the Jesuits are guilty of treason and plots, and although they have themselves, conquered by truth, confessed it, nevertheless they must be held for martyrs.” Later, indeed, after a long digression directed against Fr. Henry Garnet and others, he adjoins: “This I constantly aver, which I put also in my Apology, that here no one, whether in my own times or in those of the deceased queen, has been for the cause of conscience and religion inflicted with punishment.” But if this is true, the conclusion necessarily is that no Catholic who, at least in the times of Elizabeth and James, was inflicted with the punishment of death, has been a true martyr, because (as is the constant principle in theology) the penalty does not make the martyr but the cause, as we have from Cyprian, Augustine, and other Fathers made clear above in book 1 chapter 22. But on what arguments or indications the king relies to prove that the violent deaths of the holy English faithful, carried out by royal authority in England, were inflicted, not for the cause of religion, but for other crimes, we will afterwards see. And we will show that the glory of the martyrs is not obscured by those arguments, but is rather lit up and proved by the words of the king himself; for so powerful is the light and splendor of truth that it can never by cleverness or violence be so hidden that it does not eventually betray and show itself.

2. We say, therefore, that not only under Henry VIII, but also under Elizabeth and James, many in the Anglican persecution have for Christ undergone death, who are, with great glory and abiding truth, counted among the true martyrs of Christ. Thus about these holy men do all Catholic writers think who have in these times written about English things. For Polydore Vergil, relating at the end of his History the fall of Henry in denying the power of the Pope and constituting himself head of the Anglican Church, subjoins: “But that decree was not approved by all. And in the first place by the Bishop of Rochester, a man of great learning, supreme integrity, and innocence; again by Thomas More, knight, most adorned in letters and good morals; who finally preferred to depart from life than from that opinion, so that they might in heaven, as they themselves were hoping, the sooner enjoy eternity; and some few others voluntarily did the same.” Where, although he does not by express name call them martyrs, yet, when he testifies of their innocence and discloses the true cause of their killing, he confirms both that they were very martyrs and that they were killed for the sole reason of religion. Sander affirms the same of them, and of others killed under Elizabeth, and he shows it with various examples and reasons in bks. 1 & 3 De Schismate Anglicano. For in bk. 1, for the years 1533 and following, he relates that many illustrious religious of the Carthusian and Franciscan families were martyrs, and he confirms that they gloriously triumphed in giving illustrious testimony for the truth. Afterwards he describes the martyrdoms of Rochester and More, and distinctly relates of More that he was asked “whether he approved the law publicly passed in which all power was abrogated from the Roman Pontiff and supreme government of the Church conceded to the king.” To which interrogation, although he had first responded in such way that he seemed neither to be denying the faith nor offering himself rashly to danger of death, at length, under urgent necessity, he thus replied: “I by the grace of God always Catholic, and never departing from the communion of the Roman Pontiff, heard at some time that the power of the Roman Pontiff was indeed legitimate and laudable, but yet that it was of human right and not divine prescription. Therefore, when I saw that the state of this kingdom was being carried to such place that necessarily there had to be investigation into the origin from which the power of the Roman Pontiff flowed, I gave myself for a whole seven years to most diligent research of the matter, and I discovered that the power of the Roman Pontiff, which rashly (to say nothing more serious) you have abrogated, is not only legitimate, laudable, and necessary, but is also of divine right and prescription. This is my opinion, this my faith, in which by the grace of God may I die.’ Scarce had he said these things when all in a loud voice cried out that More was a traitor and an enemy.” And likewise of Rochester, he says that he was killed for the fact that he refused to consent to the article about the spiritual primacy usurped by Henry. But he adds that both were killed for the fact that they refused to swear that the marriage of Henry with Anne Boleyn was legitimate. From which King James takes opportunity to mock their martyrdoms; but that on this head too they were made more illustrious, we will in the following chapter show. Next, the same author in almost all the following years of the life of Henry relates most illustrious martyrdoms; however, because King James says nothing of the time of Henry, these things are at present sufficient.

3. Now in his third book he affirms that many were for sole cause of faith killed by Elizabeth, whom he judges also to be martyrs. And first, before the Brief of Pius V had been readied, he reports that Thomas, Earl of Northumberland, who had taken up arms against the heretics, was betrayed into the hand of the English, “and having,” he says, “been offered life if he would change his opinion of religion, he ended with a famous martyrdom faithfully in the Lord.” Now the author interposed here the words “offered life if he would etc.” lest perhaps anyone think this ear should be excluded from the glory of martyrdom on the ground that he seemed to have been killed for starting rebellion; for it is not so, for the condition offered him was sufficient for him to have died for testimony of faith rather than for a prior deed (of whatever sort it was). Which is for many other examples a thing to be heeded. Afterwards, indeed, in the year 1571, although many laws, noted in the preceding chapter, had been passed against Catholics, Sander says: “When many devoted Catholics either were truly committing offense against these laws, or netted at least by the calumny of the laws were being held in custody, some were punished with prison, some with proscription of goods, some also with death, both priests and lay folk of both sexes from all orders.” And for the following year 1581 and thereafter he relates also the very famous martyrdoms of Fr. Edmund Campion of the Society of Jesus and of many others, about whom he finally says: “But I have in vain commemorated in this intended summary for what crimes punishment was so cruelly inflicted on the innocent, since it is clear to all that the true and sole cause was profession of the ancient religion and defense of the Apostolic See and communion against the rebel sons of the Church.” Which later he confirms with many signs and testimonies. Hence, as to what King James says, that Elizabeth committed these and the like things irritated by Pius V, it can do nothing to prevent all these from being true martyrdoms. Nay rather, therefrom can be more shown that all those murders were committed in hatred of the Roman religion and for confirming the sect contrary to it, and thereupon nothing can in them be wanting for true nature of martyrdom.

And in the same way about these martyrs does Genebrard think in his Chronicle for the year 1534, referring to Paulus Jovius, Georgius Lilius in his Chronicle, and Sleidam bk.9. Again Sirius in his History, Bozius De Signis Eccles. p.1 bk.11 ch.1, where he relates extensively the martyrdoms of the Carthusians under Henry, and notes that these endured them willingly. “For the condition was proposed to them,” he says, “either to depart from the faith or undergo those torments.” Next, indeed, he relates the torments and martyrdoms of others under Elizabeth, all of which he pursues more extensively in bk.12 ch.22. After these Didacus de Yepes, a Spanish bishop, in his English History often confirms this truth, but especially in bk.1 ch.14 he reveals the counsel and industry of the heretics in wrapping the cause of religion under the name of the crime of lèse majesté, so that Catholics might under that pretext and calumny be killed, and should not obtain among Christians the glory of martyrs. And in bk.2 ch.5 he refers to Andreas Filipater writing excellently about these martyrs who were made by Elizabeth.

4. In addition, the most illustrious Baronius in his Martyrology for the 29th day of December, on which day the Church celebrates the feast of St. Thomas of Canterbury, after a brief description of his martyrdom subjoins: “He deserved to see our century, in this respect most happy, what a number of Thomases, most holy priests, and other most noble Englishmen, crowned with an ampler (may it be permitted to say) martyrdom and enlarged with crowns of a double title!, since not only for ecclesiastical liberty (as Thomas), but for guarding, restoring, and conserving the Catholic faith, do they repose in a most noble martyrdom; as, among others, those whom recently the holy Society of Jesus lavishly fed, like innocent lambs in sacred enclosures, with holy erudition for martyrdom, victims most pleasing to God; whom the Roman, whom the Rheims sacred colleges, which I would call high citadels from the face of the North and most strong defenses of the faith, have sent out to their triumphs, and have carried forward to their crowns. Band of Englishmen, go on in spirit, go on in virtue, most nobly and gloriously, who have given your name to so illustrious a campaign, and in a sacrament pledged your blood! Certainly I emulate you with the emulation of God, since I behold you candidates for martyrdom and designated martyrs of the most noble purple. I am compelled also to say: May my soul die with the death of the just, and may my last days be similar to theirs.” Which words the most grave man spoke, not only about those who suffered in the times of Elizabeth but also about these who did so under James too in his time, of whom that there were not a few we have it as ascertained fact in the reports of many persons worthy of faith, although it not be written down in some history committed to print that has come into our hands.

5. Next thus does Petrus Opmeccus think about the English martyrs in a very recent work of chronography for the year 1535, and Laurentius Beyerlinck in vol.1 of the same chronography for the year 1606, where, after describing the gunpowder plot against the King of England and the punishments inflicted on the authors of the plot, he gives grave testimony about Fr. Henry Garnet, which it has seemed opportune in this place to transcribe. “A little later there came also into suspicion of the gunpowder plot, by hatred, I would believe, of the Society of Jesus in which he had enrolled himself, Henry Garnet, a man cultured in all kind of letters, who however had never involved himself in those arts, protesting that he had found out about them nothing publicly. Catesby had revealed in the secret of conscience that there was something in his heart that might advance religion, yet he so wrapped it in the cover of words that he never made mention of a royal killing. The acts of the court, and what both against him and for his defense was brought forward into the open, have been explained in published books. Meanwhile on the 28th of March (others say the 3rd of May), unafraid and with unruffled face he was drawn to the place of punishment and to killing, protesting that he rejoiced greatly that he had found that death which would open up for him the entrance to immortality. Nor had he alone come into suspense of that outrage, but many in addition, of whom not a few, who were living in Belgium, are said to have been defiled by that stain. The day on which the plot was first discovered, having been recorded in the annals and famous in the whole kingdom, was commanded kept for perpetual remembrance of the thing.”

6. I know that to all these things King James will reply that no faith is to be put in these authors, both because they are pontificalists and also because they were deceived by false rumors. However, since not only the faith in God of all those authors but also their doctrine and prudence are well known, and some of them were illustrious in integrity and purity of life, they are rather to be believed than Protestants who have both denied the faith and have become, by hatred for the Pontiff, worse than infidels. Wherefore those who speak, not from the relation of others, but from sure science and experience, as Sander and those whom he alleges, are certainly witnesses superior to all exception. But that those who report what they heard were not moved lightly is manifestly shown by their words. Hence one should rather believe that the king has, in the things he affirms about the legitimate proofs in his courts, been deceived by heretics and enemies of the Pope than that so many wise men have been led by vain rumors; since they affirm the thing not as doubtful but as certain, and many of them testify that they learnt the things they publish from writings and testimonies most worthy of faith. Which was also, without any fear of falsity or refutation, done by the most illustrious Bellarmine, to pass over other writers of the Society who have given testimony to this truth.

7. But, passing over conjectures and witnesses, we can demonstrate the same truth from the words of the king himself. For I suppose, from the things said above in book 1 chapter 22, that nothing else could be wanted in the persons killed by the monarchs of England but that they were put to death for justice, faith, or true religion; for all the other conditions requisite for martyrdom, and all the indications of true martyrdom, are found in their death. Because as well in the antiquity of their faith as in their constancy and patience of mind, and also in the gravity and prudence of their words, they imitated the ancient martyrs, as I made clear in the said chapter. Hence, neither the King of England himself nor any of the Protestants have hitherto been able to find any other reason or way of obscuring these martyrdoms except by denying that those martyrs suffered for the cause of religion. And perhaps for this reason have they dared to pretend this excuse because, since it depends on fact, its proof seems to be difficult; however so powerful is the force of truth that James was not able even in his words to deny, nay even to hide it.

8. For in his Preface p.153, when he had said that no one in his or the queen's time was inflicted with the ultimate penalty for the cause of religion, he subjoins a proof in these words: "For however much one may be given to one's religion, however much one may openly and steadily profess it, no danger of death hangs over him from the laws; unless, by some ascertained external act, he has offended against the laws, or has entered upon conspiracy or counsels pernicious to matters supreme; excepting only the sacrificing priests and the rest of the pontifical party who are initiated into sacred orders in regions beyond the sea, who, infamous for so many plots, so many betrayals in England by them either conceived or praised, are kept away, under penalty of treason, from our borders." In which words is first to be noted the general rule whereby the king says that over those "who openly and steadily profess the Catholic faith hangs no danger of death from the laws." For he does not deny that other grave penalties and afflictions threaten them, nor can he affirm that it is licit by the laws for them to profess their faith in those acts and ways that the faith itself prescribes or teaches, as will be clear from what must be said. Next are to be noted the exceptions; one is about "those who have entered upon conspiracy," of which it is not necessary to say anything, for if they have been legitimately convicted of such a crime, they are justly punished for it; nor does that death pertain to martyrdom. But the custom (as has from certain of the examples been shown above, and as repute generally preaches) is for them to be promised remission of penalty if they abjure the Roman religion; and in that case, if along with repentance for past offenses they suffer, they will not lack the glory of martyrdom, because they are ultimately undergoing death for their constancy of faith; but about this elsewhere. Now, as to what pertains to our issue, there is a second exception for those "who by some external act have offended against the laws." And over this point one must pause, and we will consider it along with the rest of what is said about the religion and extermination of Catholics.

9. I ask, therefore, about which laws the king is speaking, whether about purely civil ones, by which thieves, murderers, and other like persons are punished with death, or about laws by which Catholics either are compelled to profess a false sect or to abjure the obedience and power of the Pontiff, or are forbidden to perform acts of the Catholic religion, or to teach it. Truly the king cannot be speaking of the former laws alone, otherwise his assertion will be easily convicted of falsehood. Both from the laws mentioned in the preceding chapter, and from facts known to all the world, and also from the words of the king in his Apology, where those who refuse the oath recently published are threatened with death, as we already considered in the preceding chapter, and we have heard already by certain report that some have in England been killed for that refusal alone. The king, therefore, must be speaking of laws in matter of religion making disposition against the Roman religion. But hence it evidently follows that those who are killed for transgression of such laws alone are killed for the sole cause of religion and conscience, and thereupon are true martyrs; because, as I said, nothing else can in such a death be wanting for true martyrdom.

10. Now the proof the inference is, first, in the laws prescribing acts contrary to true religion, as are to swear the primacy of the queen or king, and to abjure the power of the Pope, or to delete his name from all books, as Henry prescribed. Because no one can keep such a law except by acting against his conscience, or by interiorly or at least exteriorly denying the Catholic religion; therefore to be killed for transgression of such laws is the same as to be killed for keeping one's conscience and religion immaculate. The consequence is evident, and the antecedent is clear from the opinion of Peter and the Apostles, Acts 5.29: "We ought to obey God rather than men." Hence rightly did Augustine say, epist. 166: that "if it happen that the emperor is living in error and gives laws for his error against the truth, those who do not do what he commands because God prohibits it, although they are tortured, are not punished but are now tested and afterwards crowned." And the like opinions of the Fathers are collected by Gratian 11 q.3 ch.92 and following. And there is confirmation, because not otherwise have all martyrs from the beginning of the Church suffered. For, by the edicts of the emperors, they were being bidden to do something against the faith and cult of the true God under threat of death, which they chose rather to undergo than to obey such commands. But in the same way are transgressors of such laws in England being punished. And this reason and assertion have place also in the case of those laws of England that prescribe other sacrilegious acts, as participation in the Calvinian supper and similar communications with heretics in their rites and synagogues. For although in the laws there is no capital punishment imposed, nevertheless, whatever punishment it be, to undergo it for transgression of such a law is a sort of participation or beginning of martyrdom, which, if they undergo it unto death, will be able to consummate martyrdom, as I will say below.

11. But about the laws forbidding exterior acts that are good and have proceeded from the Catholic faith and religion, as to do sacred things, to say private masses, to absolve the penitent, to exhort Catholics, to teach the ignorant or those deceived by heresy, and specifically to teach that the Pope is the head of the Church existing everywhere, even in England, and the like – about these laws, I say, it can also easily be proved that those who are killed for transgression of them are true martyrs and are killed for cause of religion. For these laws are similar to the precept of the priests and scribes given to the Apostles in Acts 4.18, when "they called them and commanded them not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus." To whom Peter and John replied, vv. 19-20: "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." And again in ch.5, when the high priest blamed the Apostles, saying, v.28: “Did not we straitly command you that ye should not teach in this name? etc.” The Apostles replied, v.29: “We ought to obey God rather than men.” And when for that cause they were beaten, v.41: “they departed...rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name.” Where I consider that, although the priests had the Apostles beaten for transgression of their precept, these themselves nevertheless judged that they had suffered “for his name;” hence, if that suffering had reached unto death, it would without doubt have been a consummated martyrdom. From which we generally collect that, if a human precept or law forbid acts of the true Catholic religion, which are ordered to its defense, preservation, and propagation, and if someone is killed for transgression of the law by a persecutor of the faith, he is truly killed for the cause of religion, even if the tyrant say the punishment is imposed for transgression of his law. For the reason is altogether the same. Since, therefore, by these laws of England similar acts of the Catholic religion are forbidden, they in no way prevent any who are killed for use of such acts from dying because of the faith and religion.

Now the reason is that those laws are unjust and can introduce no obligation, both because they are civil laws and are in matter of religion making disposition against religion; and because they are prohibiting acts in themselves licit and holy to the spiritual ruin of the Church that exists in that kingdom. And therefore not to observe those laws is no fault; nay, if it be done in a prudent way and without rashness, it is a signal act of fortitude and religion, and a sign of great charity; therefore death inflicted for such acts is in truth not punishment for transgression of law, because where there is no law there is also no transgression, and consequently no fault; therefore neither is there true punishment. It remains, therefore, that there is only persecution of religion and only affliction or suffering of such a person because he professes or defends or preaches such religion; but this is to suffer for cause of religion and for Christ, just as the Apostles suffered. Now this reason more evidently proceeds when the action prohibited by man is commanded by Christ; both because a man then suffers so as not to prefer man to God, according to the Apostolic opinion, “we ought to obey God rather than men;” and also because in that moment of crisis the precept of Christ is binding, Matthew 10.28: “Fear not them which kill the body.” For where the author of Imperfecti homil.25 says: “Not only is he betrayer of the truth who in transgressing the truth speaks a lie, but also he who does not freely proclaim the truth when he ought freely to proclaim it.” Hence he subjoins that not only a priest but also a layman is debtor to professing the faith in such a moment of necessity. How then will he not be a martyr if for that cause he is killed?

12. I add, indeed, that although such deeds prohibited by human law might sometimes be omitted without transgression of the divine precept, either because they are only of counsel, as to vow chastity or profess religion, or because, if they fall under an affirmative precept of God or the Church, it does not bind either for such time or with so many dangers, and therefore it could very well be then omitted without transgression of the same, nevertheless, if someone, notwithstanding the unjust prohibition and tyrannical threat, perform, for zeal of the faith, those acts in the way they are licit for him and as he judges them expedient for the glory of God and the utility of souls, if for that reason he be killed, he will be a true martyr, because not “as a slanderer or a thief,” or disobedient to the king, whose law is unjust, “but as a Catholic Christian” does he suffer, and on account of justice is he killed. For a man does justice not only when he obeys a precept but also whenever he works for Christ and the glory of God, although he be then not under obligation; therefore he who suffers so as not to omit this, so to say, voluntary justice, that is, a justice not then necessary by precept but pleasing to God and useful for neighbors, suffers in truth for justice; therefore if he be killed for the same cause, he is truly killed for the cause of religion, and thereupon he is a true martyr.

Since, therefore, the king admits that in England pontificals are killed for transgression of such civil laws, he cannot deny but that they are killed for cause of religion, and consequently neither can he refuse to acknowledge them as true martyrs. For an unjust and invalid law cannot impede the truth of martyrdom, nor alter the true cause of such death; which cause is in truth the mere profession of such acts, which for this reason displease the king and his counselors because the Roman religion displeases them, and they are afraid lest by those acts it be preserved or restored in that island, and lest the opposed sect be confounded. Nor does it matter if they say that those acts are prohibited, not because of religion, but for civil reasons, that such men are seditious and promote plots, etc. For, to begin with, these are for the most part false calumnies and pretexts for overthrowing the Catholic religion. For granting, but not conceding, that some Catholics have in this matter sinned in some respect or gone to excess, not for that reason should their disgrace redound against all Catholics; for this is against reason and against justice, as is clear. It is most of all unjust that for this cause the Catholic religion itself (so to say) is defamed and suffers persecution through the prohibition to subjects of the use of it and of all the means necessary or useful for its preservation or propagation. Next, in English laws many things are prohibited and punished under penalty of death that are neither necessary nor useful for avoiding that danger, if it be one; as, for example, 'to prohibit the affirmation that the Pope is the head of the Church' certainly contributes nothing to that end. Nay rather, the law brings it about that the faithful obedient to the Pope are compelled to hide themselves, from which and the like violence such plots are wont to spring. And the same holds about the prohibition of the use of sacrifice and other sacred things, as of images, and about the administration of the sacraments in the Catholic rite. Yet, if subjects were allowed freely to profess their faith and those who are of the Pontiff were known, the occasion for plots and the like dangers would be taken away; therefore such laws, or the deaths that happen under title of them, cannot, by this color, be excused from persecution for the cause of religion. From which finally we say that, if there is any danger of ambushes and plots, it comes from the stubbornness of the heretics themselves. And therefore if, for avoiding the danger, they want rather to overturn the Catholic religion utterly than to desist from their stubbornness, they show evidently by this very fact that they are persecuting the Catholic religion in order to retain their heresy and to preserve therein the temporal state; therefore when for a like cause they kill priests or other faithful, they are taking them away for cause of religion, and thereupon they are, willy nilly, sacrificing them as true martyrs to God.

13. Nor should Catholics be moved or brought into any doubt because the laws of England condemn those who so act as enemies, traitors, and secret adversaries of the king and the republic; for they cannot be judged such before God, but before the depraved judgment of men. For the makers of such laws think the dignity of the Pontiff is contrary to the royal majesty, and therefore do they call profession of obedience to the Pontiff the crime of lèse majesté although, however, to deny obedience to the Pontiff is the crime of lèse majesté against the Divine Majesty, who has committed his vicariate on earth to the Pontiff; and therefore the obedience that is attributed to him is attributed to God, and it cannot be contrary to the fidelity that is just and due to temporal princes; since Christ himself taught that to give the things that are Caesar's to Caesar is not repugnant to giving the things that are God's to God. But that this is the principal intention and artifice of such laws can easily be understood from the things that Sander relates about Elizabeth's time, bk.3 p.469, where he says of the holy confessors: "Although the rest of the fabricated charges they had easily in court rebutted, next their more secret thoughts and future deeds become inquiry through certain captious interrogations about the declaratory Bulls of Pius V; namely, whether they judge that sentence legitimate? Whether they think there is power in the Pope to de-authorize kings and to make their subjects free of obedience to them? What their future deeds will be and what they will prescribe in conscience to others if war is waged by anyone on account of religion? and others of this kind; wherein, if they said anything on behalf of pontifical power, even with the most prudent moderation of the ancients, they were immediately decreed guilty of lèse majesté and not of religion." And afterwards he confirms the same at length by the confession of one John Nicolas and by diverse and illustrious examples; and finally he proves it by laws contained in a certain edict of the queen, chiefly up to p.484. But we can prove that very thing from King James' edict for the oath of his fidelity, or rather of denial of pontifical power, made at proclamation or petition of Parliament in the seventh year of his reign, whose tenor, omitting the preface, is: "By these presents we strictly prescribe and command that the lords and the rest of our more secret council, archbishops, bishops, presidents, and guardians of the peace...to whom this business has regard, that they administer this oath to all persons, and chiefly to those to whom it can and should be administered according to the statute made in the third year of our reign, and that they note those who refuse, according to our laws respectively. And although we will be able, from our love toward all our subjects (over whom we are, by the providence of God, in the place of father), to wish that there be none found within the limits of our domains who will have refused it, nevertheless, if anyone has so alienated his heart from their most serene prince so that it, or any part of it, they have subjected to a foreign power in derogation of our crown and dignity, we will make clear the severity and justice of our laws due to him; just as, on the contrary, our favor and kindness will be due to our well-deserving subjects. Nevertheless, because this alienation from us and from our crown is a certain preparation for a further and more dangerous defection, and tends for that reason to the crime of lèse majesté, we have determined to reserve to ourselves and to our use all ordination, power, and disposition concerning this case as also concerning the punishments of the same." From which words is clear enough that these punishments are not in truth inflicted save for confession of the primacy of the Pontiff, or for non-denial of his power, which is manifestly cause of religion; but, in order to obscure the glory of the martyrs, the true cause is covered by the fictitious veil of the crime of lèse majesté, while the severity and injustice of the punishments are hidden under the flattering words of clemency and paternal providence, wherein the King of England imitates other emperors who have defected from the Church. For thus about Constantius does Hilary report in his book against him, because he was persecuting Catholics partly by flatteries, partly by terrors and afflictions "without envy (he says) of their glorious deaths." Hence in this way does he cry out against Constantius: "You fight against God, you rage against the Church, you persecute the saints, you hate the preachers of Christ, you take away religion, tyrant now not of human beings but of divine.” And later: “You creep up under a flattering name, you kill in the appearance of religion, you accomplish impiety, you, a false preacher of Christ, destroy the faith of Christ.”

Likewise Julian the Apostate “cleverly and artfully” (as Nazianzen says, orat.3 and elsewhere against him) moved war against Christians, “putting clemency round tyranny like meat round a hook, so that he might cover force with persuasion and flattering words.” And Nazianzen subjoins: “Since, as he envied the athletes in other things so he envied them in the honor with which martyrs are wont to be treated. And accordingly he undertook this labor, that he himself indeed might both bring force to bear and not seem in the meantime to be doing so.” Which he pursues there at length. And he repeats similar things in orat.4, which is the second one against the same. But in orat.32, after he has spoken about Julian, he subjoins about Valens: “The second was in no way more humane than the former; nay, even bitterer than he, because, bearing the name of Christ, he was a false Christ, and a disgrace and shame to Christians, for whom to do was impious and to suffer inglorious, so that they might not seem indeed to be receiving injury, nor the illustrious name of martyr be added to their tortures, but that this too might be a dye to hide the truth, so that those who were suffering as Christians might be afflicted with torment as impious.” There is no reason, then, that Catholics should doubt of the martyrdom of those saints; for, according to the rule of Augustine bk.20 De Unitate Eccles., since they are certain that they died in the unity of the Church for the same unity and obedience, they cannot doubt but that they have been crowned as martyrs, and that their killers are to be judged as persecutors of the martyrs. “Let no one, therefore,” as Cyprian said bk. De Lapsis, “defame the dignity of the martyrs, let no one destroy their glories and crowns. The strength of their incorrupt faith remains unimpaired, nor can he say or do anything against Christ whose hope, and faith, and strength, and glory are all in Christ.”

14. We can, finally, add to the consolation of the faithful that Catholics so long vexed for the faith, although they have not died violently for the faith, if they persevere in that tribulation constant unto death, if either as wandering in flight in mountains and wastes, or as afflicted with bonds and prisons, or as sojourning in voluntary or coerced exile, or as hiding in caves and caverns of the earth, or as undergoing in other ways and in need many troubles with patience, they have arrived at the end of life, they will not have to be deprived of the glory or reward of martyrdom. Of which truth for me is sufficient witness Cyprian epist.5 & 6 to the people of Thibaris, whom he exhorts to martyrdom and says: “If a thief has oppressed someone fleeing in the wastes or the mountains, if fierce famine or thirst has seized him, or cold afflicted him, or if hurrying through the seas in a precipitate voyage, tempest or storm has submerged him – Christ everywhere sees his soldier fighting, and renders to him, dying because of persecution for the honor of his name, the reward he promised he would in persecution give. Nor is the glory of martyrdom less for not perishing publicly and among many, since the cause of perishing was perishing for Christ. Sufficient witness for testimony of his martyrdom is he who proves and crowns the martyrs.” And thus did the same Cyprian speak epist.18 to Pope Lucius: “Martyrdoms deferred in the confessors of Christ do not diminish the merit of confession, but show the mighty deeds of the divine protection.”

15. For these toleratings of afflictions and punishments up to death can happen in two ways; in one way with so great violence and infirmity of body from the afflictions themselves, or arising from the occasion of them, that death in large part comes therefrom, or is much hastened, as happens in long incarceration, or in exile to unhealthy places, in long and perilous voyages, or in so great penury of things that the body is weakened by grave and continuous troubles until it is extinguished. And in these cases martyrdom is in all propriety and truth perfected; and thus is the Church wont to venerate those who in this way die for Christ as true martyrs, and to celebrate their deeds. But in another way can it be done, so that although someone sustains bonds or exiles or other like afflictions until death for Christ, nevertheless those afflictions are not the cause of death, but it comes in its own natural course; and then, although there be doubt among theologians whether that testimony of faith rendered unto death suffice for obtaining the name and special halo of martyrdom, nevertheless it is certain that there cannot be lacking to him the plentiful glory and reward of martyrdom. For he who has thus persevered has in truth fulfilled the condition demanded by Christ: "Whosoever shall confess me before men;" hence it is necessary that Christ himself too fulfill his own promise: "him will I confess before my Father."

And in these, because they thus suffer, has most place what Augustine says in serm.46 De Tempore: "Not mere spilling of blood consummates martyrdom, nor does merely the burning of flames give the palm. Not by death alone but also by contempt of the flesh is the crown reached." And serm.232: "Whoever has given testimony for the truth, to him will the lord compute for martyrdom the whole of what he has borne for the testimony of truth and justice," namely, by persevering in that confession unto death. And thus too in these confessors is very much completed what the holy Fathers often say, that martyrdom is not lacking where the will is not lacking, just as Chrysostom said on Psalms 95: "Martyrdom is not reckoned only by the event but also by the purpose." And Cyprian epist.11: "Let none of you be sad as if he were less than those who having before you suffered torments, having conquered and trodden the world under foot, came by a glorious journey to the Lord. The Lord is searcher of the reins, and he examines the secrets of the hearts, and gazes upon what is hidden. There suffices for meriting the crown of God the testimony alone of him who will judge."

Chapter 12: Response to what the king objects against the second Pontifical Brief and against the letter of Cardinal Bellarmine.

Summary: 1. The king's refutation of the brevity of Cardinal Bellarmine. 2. The chief strength of the second Brief of Paul V. 3. Since the king does not have anything to object against the second Brief of the Pontiff, he uses exaggeration of words. 4. By what spirit the form of swearing the oath was contrived. 5. Response to the final inference of the king. 6. The king's objections against the letter of Cardinal Bellarmine are refuted. 7. The illustrious martyrdoms of Thomas More and of Rochester are vindicated from calumny. 8. The final objection of the king against Bellarmine.

1. Among the other arrogant signs that the king in his Preface enumerates and reproves from the Apology and from the response of Bellarmine, one is that the same brevity that the king had held to in writing Bellarmine himself wanted to follow in replying; and he adds: "The same brevity I used in refuting the second Brief of the Pontiff he wished to use against me and, on my example, he confines himself within the narrowness of one page.” So that I may, then, avoid a like rebuke, and might flee all shadow of occasion for it, I have desired to give on this point, as hitherto I have done in the rest, a plenteous rebuke to the most serene king. But neither in the Brief itself have I found anything that is in need of a new defense and proof, nor in the attack of the king anything that might require a special response; therefore I have thought it more satisfactory to fall into the same offense and rebuke of the king than either to repeat things already said or weigh down the page with superfluous and idle words. And therefore I will next briefly explain the decree of the Pontiff and its reasoning, then I will with the same brevity show that nothing difficult is objected by the king against it; lastly in a similar way I will run through the refutation about the letter of Bellarmine.

2. The Pontiff, then, in this second Brief imposed no new burden or obligation on English Catholics, but again confirmed the first Brief and more distinctly explained that in it two things were done. One is to make clear that it was not licit in conscience to give this oath of fidelity; the other is to prohibit it also by his own precept, so that all occasion of turning aside or of doubt might be taken away. In addition he also makes clear that the first Brief was written, not only on his own initiative and from sure knowledge, but also after application of long and grave deliberation about all the things contained in the oath, and that therefore the Brief must be absolutely kept, with rejection of every interpretation persuading otherwise. But the reason or necessity for this new declaration or confirmation was that, as the Pontiff himself reports, some, whether subjects or seducers of the king, had sown a rumor in England that the Brief was either false or not legitimately and with sure knowledge got ready but by some secret deception; on which pretext some, contemning the Brief, were not refusing the oath. Which fraud and resistance the same Pontiff kindly and prudently attributed to the craftiness of the adversary of human salvation, in order to excuse the frailty of the weaker among the faithful.

3. The King of England, however, since he had nothing, whether taken from authority or reason, that he might object to the most true declaration of the Pontiff and his necessary prohibition, erupted into exaggeration of words, and snatched at the words of the Pontiff himself which we have just adduced, and turns them against him saying that by no fraud could the demon have in a thousand years so harmed the Catholics of England as the Pope has harmed them by the ready issuance of this Brief. Because from it this great harm, of course, will follow, that even many priests who had admitted the oath will be compelled to abjure it, and so it will come about that they would perjure two oaths of fidelity given to their king. One is that which everyone born in the kingdom tacitly swears, the other that which they later admitted. “Hence it follows,” he says, “that no one can in England profess the Roman religion, nor care for the salvation of his soul, who has not cast off and perjured his own acknowledged and sworn fidelity toward the prince.” And nothing else does he object against this second Brief.

4. But it is not difficult in the present point “to try the spirits” and to show whether the intent of the oath and its exaction rather than its rejection and prohibition were from the spirit of Satan, for these can “from their fruits” or their effects be discerned. For the end of the oath is to turn the faithful from ecclesiastical obedience under color of civil obedience, by inducing them to deny pontifical power under pretext of swearing fidelity to the king. Hence the fruits of such an oath, if it is taken, will be profession, confirmation, and increase of schism, denial of the faith, and the complete ruin of the kingdom in spiritual things, and the loss of souls. It is clear, then, that the oath was by the adversary of human salvation thought up and put into the hearts of the Protestants who advise the king; and that from the same spirit proceed all the words and means whereby such oath is defended. Contrariwise, however, that the rejection and prohibition of the same oath has been inspired by the contrary or divine spirit; both because it is the proper work of the spirit of God to destroy the works of the devil, and also because those who have received the prohibition in full faith and constant obedience are both consulting their consciences and resisting schism and infidelity with hope of great fruit and reward. But those who, whether from frailty of spirit or by error and deception, have, as the king affirms, admitted such oath, recognizing their fall and their error through the cry of their Pastor, will break the bands of impiety and abjure an unjust oath. For this is not only, as the same king infers, not unfitting but rather necessary for salvation, and should be counted among the chief effects of this Brief.

Nor for that reason does the second part follow that the king includes, namely that an oath of obedience and fidelity to the king, which is congenital with the subjects themselves, is abjured. For whether by this oath he understand the obligation that comes as it were by hereditary right to all subjects and to their sons from the fidelity sworn by their parents and ancestors to princes, or whether too he speak of an express oath, licit and honorable, made by subjects about political fidelity due to the king, in neither way does it follow that the natural bond or oath of civil obedience, because of retraction of the oath devised by the king and by some admitted, has been abjured. Because in it, as we showed, there is not promised to the king a civil obedience that is just and honorable, but there is directly denied obedience and power to the Pontiff; and therefore, when it is retracted, the denial is abjured, so to say, and return is made to his obedience. But to the king is only denied the obedience that was contrary to obedience to the Pontiff and to God, which that it is not contrary to civil obedience and is not naturally due has been very often declared and proved.

5. Hence we have now responded to the final inference of the king. For if the king speak of an obedience, as he himself desires, which recognizes no obedience above it, either directly in spiritual matters or indirectly in temporal ones, he infers rightly that no one can in England hold and keep the Catholic faith by swearing such obedience to the king, or by not retracting such an oath if he has once given it. Nor would the king have doubt on this point if he believed, as he is bound to, that outside the one Catholic and Apostolic Church there can be neither salvation nor faith; because where there is not union with the head, there is there schism and division and separation from the Church; and so it cannot happen that he who has admitted the oath and has persisted in it should exist in the state of salvation. However, if the king were speaking of pure and legitimate civil obedience, the inference would be of no moment, because this civil obedience does not conflict with ecclesiastical, and in other Catholic kingdoms subjects keep the Roman religion and consult their own salvation and yet they do not cast off nor abjure the fidelity due to their king, nay they observe it with fuller faith and with greater peace and security for their kings.

6. After impugning the pontifical decrees, the king inveighs against the epistle of Cardinal Bellarmine, to whom in this regard I have not thought it worthwhile to reply; both because the most learned Cardinal wrote it very fully with his accustomed erudition, and also because the king has touched on almost nothing pertaining to the cause that has not above been satisfied. So that this might be evident to all, I will very briefly make it clear singly and by parts.

For, first, he attributes to Bellarmine that he has confounded the oath of fidelity with the oath of primacy. But this objection the Cardinal himself sufficiently refutes. And for that reason we put forward at the beginning of this book the formula for each oath, so that no place of turning aside or ambiguity might be left.

Second, in the passage “And that justice etc.,” he has set forth fourteen assertions, all or at least some of which he affirms follow from attacking the oath. But enough was said about these in chapter 6.

Third, in the section “And that more clearly,” the king makes transition to prove the justice of the oath of fidelity from the authority of the Councils. But, as I noted in chapter 2 of this book, those Councils speak of an oath that is far different. Hence not unjustly can we turn back against the king the error that he himself, at the beginning of this attack, attributes to Bellarmine, namely, that for proving an oath which is altogether foreign to the question he is piling up unnecessary proofs, as in the said place I more extensively declared.

Fourth, in the section “But now” which is found at p.65, he digresses for many pages attacking and blaming Bellarmine with injurious words or abuses and insults; but in none of them do I find anything pertaining to the cause or to doctrine or worthy of discussion; however, of whatever sort they are, they are learnedly refuted by the same Bellarmine, although they could not unjustly have been condemned.

Fifth, on p.84, the section “Now, however,” he is (he says) returning “whence he had made digression,” but he is by something else immediately diverted to convict Bellarmine of another contradiction, to effect which he assumes as a thing to be proved that the emperors were by the Pontiffs much ill-treated, troubled, and persecuted to death. And he brings in various examples of emperors and kings whom the Pontiffs deposed. But among them are many false ones mixed in with the true, as Bellarmine eruditely shows. Whereon, those that are true confirm the Catholic truth, as by referring to them in book 3 we diligently considered, weighing the circumstances of them individually; but those that are false are to be condemned, for they refute rather the arguer. And so neither of them show that Pontiffs plotted the slaughters of kings by assassins and traps, which thing Bellarmine had denied, for falsehoods prove nothing; but the true histories prove only that when a legitimate cause intervened, and a just cause required, the Pontiffs rather often proceeded, by keeping the order of right, against unjust princes, up to sentence of deposition.

Sixth, on p.90 the passage “For since it is clear etc.,” the king comes more nearly to treating of the cause about the malice or honesty of the oath; however, he does not much persevere with it, for at once he is distracted by the likenesses or examples adduced by Bellarmine into looking for differences in them as if for knots in a bulrush. But nothing does he adduce in defense of the oath or for showing its honesty, besides the general principle that an oath of civil fidelity given to a king is holy. Although, however, the difficulty turns on the application of that very true principle to this oath that the controversy is about, by demonstration that it is a pure oath of civil obedience and contains nothing contrary to the Catholic religion, he indeed often supposes and repeats this but never proves it nor defends it, except by denying the power of the Pontiff. And therefore we have judged we must stand on this point alone; for the other likenesses or examples, which are brought in for exhortation rather than for proof, suppose the Catholic doctrine; and they are, on that stance, very good, nor are they refuted by the king except by denial of Catholic doctrine, as the same Bellarmine rightly noted when defending and confirming all the parts and examples of his epistle. But because certain words of the Pontiffs Gregory and Leo, which the king extensively attacks from p.106 up to p.116, pertained to the cause of primacy, we dealt with them extensively in book 3. But in the second book we refuted the things that on p.117 he repeats against communion under both species and against private masses.

Seventh, on p.117 up to p.126, he again inveighs against Bellarmine and Sander, and then against Thomas More and Rochester; and although none of the things he touches on pertains to the point of the cause, yet because they in some way touch upon the doctrine of the faith, we have thought it necessary to say something briefly about them one by one. For first he blames, not Bellarmine, but the Church because it does not, in the words of the consecration of the Body, add the words “which is given for you,” “against,” he says, “Luke and Paul.” He also adds that he holds Bellarmine, who confesses that they cannot be reconciled, for an adversary and an enemy. But who ever said that there is opposition between persons speaking about the same thing one of whom tells the thing completely, the other of whom reports part without discrepancy but about part keeps silent? If this is a contradiction or opposition, there are infinite oppositions among the Evangelists that will not be able to be reconciled. Nay, on this same point Luke and Paul are opposed by Matthew and Mark, who were silent about the phrase “which is given for you” that Luke and Paul set down. Nay, even Luke and Paul will be in some way opposed to each other, because they did not use the same word, but one said [Luke 22.19] “which is given for you,” the other [I Corinthians 11.24] “which is broken [alt. delivered] for you.” Which I have pleased to advert to so that he who reads will notice under what pretexts Protestants leave the Catholic Church and dare to blame its Apostolic rites. For it is clearly known that there is no opposition there, because to keep silent is not to contradict, and Paul and Luke did not say all the words that are necessary for consecrating the Eucharist, and it is not likely that Matthew and Mark omitted something substantial for this sacrament; but it is blasphemous and heretical to think that Peter handed over a mutilated and insufficient form of the Eucharist to the Roman and Catholic Church; on which matter we have elsewhere expressly disputed.

7. Of the person of Sander the king says that “he deserved ill of his fatherland,” which he proves from the man’s opinions or assertions, and he reviews eight which here it is not necessary to transcribe; for they can easily be seen in his books. But from them is plainly collected that for no other reason is Sander said to have deserved ill of his fatherland than that he taught the Catholic truth; or that he did not adhere to or flatter schismatic kings; or finally that, for the constancy of his faith, he died an exile from his fatherland. Of Thomas More and Rochester, signal men and most illustrious martyrs, although the king was not able to deny that they were killed because they refused to assent to the decree about the primacy of the King of England in spiritual matters, he adds that not for this cause alone were they killed, but also because they refused to approve the second marriage of the king. Which he says specifically of More, but understands the same of Rochester, for the histories report thus about both. Now the king subjoins “which in my judgment was a very carnal cause for martyrdom.” But I judge that this judgment of the king sufficiently shows how potent is an error once imbibed for perverting prudent judgment even in things that are clearer than the noonday sun. For what can be more detestable than to say that bad is good? Or what more grave than to approve the false as true, especially in things of morals and that concern eternal salvation? Since, therefore, the second nuptials of King Henry were so detestable that they were without validity and effect contracted against all divine and human right, the refusal to approve them, even if no other cause for death had intervened in addition, would without doubt have been enough for martyrdom. For although adultery and polygamy, while the first and true spouse is living, are carnal, yet to condemn them is a work of virtue and very spiritual, and resolutely to bear death because of resoluteness in such a deed is an excellent cause for martyrdom. For thus was the death of John the Baptist, as the Church thinks, an illustrious martyrdom, although John was killed rather from hatred of a concubine than of a wife, because he preached to the king “it is not lawful for you to have her;” because that cause, although it was on the part of the king and Herodias carnal enough, nevertheless on the part of John it was spiritual, namely testimony of the truth, for which he was killed. Thus therefore does it happen to More and Rochester; and so on this head their martyrdom is not obscured but made more illustrious. But the rest that the king says in detraction of these holy men pertains to the calumnies of the heretics, in whom he himself has faith; and therefore he also opposes to Rochester the writers and assemblies of the heretics of England, against the authority and consent of the whole world, which is very frivolous, as Bellarmine excellently describes in detail.

8. Eighth in the section “Finally that etc.,” he advances to prove the royal dignity and power from the Scripture of the Old and New Testaments; but he labors in vain, because no one denies the legitimate dignity and power of a temporal king; but the spiritual power of a king, or his exemption from obedience to the prelates of the Church, are not proved by those testimonies, and by other very certain testimonies are they condemned, as was shown in book 3, where we spoke copiously about the testimonies that the king here piles up. And hence is it sufficiently clear how frivolous the oppositions are that the king fabricates between the modes of speaking of Scripture and of Bellarmine about the dignity and power of temporal kings, whereto Bellarmine himself satisfactorily replies. Just as he also refutes what the king afterwards subjoins against the titles ‘Greatest Pontiff’ or ‘Head of Faith’ with which the Pope is wont to be honored; about which, and about many other things too we have spoken in book 3. And therefore, as I said, I judge that there is in this whole part of the Apology nothing further to be delayed over.

Conclusion of the work and peroration to the King of England.

With what gravity and moderation of words one must speak or dispute in controversies of the faith we are, with both example and sentence splendid and most grave, taught by that Gregory who has by antonomasia obtained the name of Theologian, when he says in *orat.*32: “Not without skill do we teach, nor do we with abuses and insults advance against adversaries, as many do, fighting not against the speech but against the speaker, and concealing the while with curses the infirmity of their reasons and arguments in no other wise than they say the octopus vomits out black ink before itself to escape the fishers or snatch from them its view. But that we wage war for Christ we make plain with this argument, that we do battle according to Christ, who was mild and peaceful and carried our infirmities. For neither do we study peace to the detriment of true doctrine when we in some measure hold back in contentions for minds in order to acquire reputation for easiness and gentleness (for we are not wickedly lying in wait for what is good); and we again cultivate peace when we fight legitimately and hold ourselves within our limits and the rule of the spirit. And of these things indeed I do in such wise think, and for all stewards of souls and judges of right doctrine do I lay down as law, that neither by hardness should they exasperate the minds of men, nor by submission make them proud and insolent, but behave themselves prudently and advisedly in cause of faith, and not in either of these exceed the mean.”

To this rule of writing I have desired so to conform this whole disputation that, if it be possible, I should not in the least depart therefrom. For that this is due to the royal majesty and belongs to my office and is most necessary to attain the end for which I have undertaken this work, of whatever sort it is, I have been always convinced. For I have not for the praise of victory or the display of genius or doctrine desired conquest, but I have had most in my prayers that truth itself might conquer, and that errors’ darkness might be dispelled, and that Christ in all things might reign. Wherefore, most Serene King, if anything in my response and disputation has seemed more sharply said than I am wont, or more freely than is just, may you understand it to have been said, not against the person that you bear, but against the doctrine both new and also ignominious to the Vicar of Christ; and may you in tranquil heart consider that a corrupt and pernicious doctrine, which a Catholic man abhors, a doctor turns from, a religious man takes indignantly, is a thing most difficult to reprehend in sharpness without something seeming to redound against the followers of such doctrine. For these are so conjoined that scarce might they in disputation and admonition be separated. Which in Paul was sometime noted by Chrysostom, hom.4 on Romans 1, when he says: “He wanted to speak with preservation of gravity and reverence, and at times to strike down his hearer with cuts; but these were not given together, but one was impediment to the other. For if anything you say reverently, you could in no way restrain your hearer; but if again you wish to restrain him vehemently, you must point to the thing plainly and in undressed speech. Yet the prudence,” he says, “of Paul provided both in exactness, increasing the rebuke in the very name of nature, and making use thereof for a sort of curtain over the shame of his narration.” This prudence of Paul I have certainly held before my eyes, and have studied to imitate it with what diligence I could, always treating, as far as could be, of the thing itself, not of the person, or, where necessity compelled, directing my speech not to the king but to the Protestants his deceivers.

It remains, then, most Serene King, that, with what kindness of mind you are endowed, and what greatness of genius, about which I have always had much confidence, you disdain not to receive with good will this work, and leaf through it at times with pure love of truth, and that you consider at the same time that it is mark of a generous mind and of the greatest judgment to put aside a false opinion when the falsehood has been uncovered, and to embrace the understood truth with the mind and profess it in word, and to guard against the impending perils of eternity. For in stubbornness there is no glory, but in docility of intelligence there is supreme prudence, and in pious conversion to God providence, whereby the interests, not of yourself alone, but of your once most flourishing fatherland, now indeed placed in supreme crisis, you may, insofar as from the magnitude of your office you are debtor, consult. But if you have heard the voice of God calling you and have determined to obey him, what he himself by calling has begun, he will by aiding perfect, and there will be nothing that, supported on the divine protection, you will not be able to conquer and overcome. Hence there is no reason that you should fear the contradiction of the enemies of truth, whose word creepeth as doth a canker, for God will protect you from the contradiction of tongues. “Many tongues contradict,” says Augustine on Psalms 30, “diverse heresies, diverse schisms make loud noise, many tongues contradict the true doctrine; run you to the tabernacle of God, hold the Catholic Church, do not from the rule of truth depart, and you will in the tabernacle be from the contradiction of tongues protected.” The Henry that was first named defender of the faith first wrote excellently against the contradicting tongues, afterwards in folly, and badly consulting the interests of himself and his fatherland, he left an example to be deplored both to England and to the whole world. Why may not James too, although he have first, by seducers deceived, written against the tabernacle of God, namely the Catholic Church, afterwards, understanding the truth, stand forth a most sharp defender of the same Church, and restorer of English honor? For so shall it be that the illustrious title of defender of the Catholic faith, which not without cause you show you value much, you may, not in words only, but in deed and truth, with immortal praise deserve.

But if perhaps, most Serene King, we have by our disputations not yet made satisfaction to your desire, and your greatness of mind and sharp intelligence, and if for other things a fuller response or greater proof be desired, or if to you or to your ministers new objections against Catholic doctrine occur which it be necessary to satisfy, my wish were that they should with all sincerity and for the sake of understanding the truth alone be set forth, and you will always find me ready, as much as will in me be, to give account for the faith that is in us, whether in writing or in speech, if occasion offer, and to make response, according to my strength, to all things that are proposed, confiding, not in myself, but in the divine help and in truth. This only do I earnestly of your Majesty ask with all submission of heart, that if, against those things which in these disputations I have treated, it seem good to write something in reply, there be abstention from all vain contention of words; and that diverse digressions about things which, from time to time, either escape by chance or are touched on by the by, and which matter nothing to the cause of faith, may be avoided, and that in sole love of truth the thing itself be treated and the truth of the faith be inquired into. For if I obtain this from you, I shall, roused by hope of some public utility, spare no labor but most gladly spend and be myself spent for your soul.
