BOOK ONE

HOW MUCH ANGLICANISM IS AT VARIANCE WITH CATHOLIC DOCTRINE

Preface

Summary: Aim of the author and twofold manner of showing the error of Anglicanism

Chapter 1: On the progress of the Catholic Faith and the state of the English people from its first conversion up to the present time.

Summary: 1. The Catholic Faith began in England at the birth of the Gospel. Baronius, for year 35, n.5, from a manuscript history of England, which is contained in the Vatican, 4.colum., at the beginning. 2. The history of that people, Baronius for the year 183, from the book of the Martyrology of the Roman Pontiffs and others. 3. The Catholic Faith advanced in the time of Pope Eleutherius. At the time of Gregory it was restored. 4. It endured up to the time of Henry. 5. Surius in his history of our time. Cochleus in his history of Luther. Maurice Canneus in his history of the Martyrdom of the Carthusians. Fall of Henry VIII. 6. Under Edward the Zwinglian sect was introduced. 7. Under Mary the Faith was restored. 8. Elizabeth imports the Calvinist sect into the kingdom. 9. The state of England under James.

Chapter 2: The Anglican sect has departed from the true faith.

Summary: 1. An unavoidable dilemma is posed. First part of the dilemma. 2. Someone who denies any part of the faith subverts the whole faith. 3. Confirmation of the second part of the dilemma. A certain Calvinist in his bk.2 on the Marriage of Henry, London 1573. A very stupid statement by the heretic. 4. The testimony of Henry VIII shows that before him England retained the Catholic Faith. 5. Second proof of the same point. 6. King James seems to think the faith preached in England by Augustine was not Catholic. When Augustine began to preach in England. 7. The faith preached by Eleutherius was true. 8. The same conclusion is drawn about the faith preached by Augustine. First from authority. 9. Second from comparison of both preachings. 10. Third from the sanctity and miracles of Augustine and his colleagues. 11. Finally from reason.

Chapter 3: That the Church of Christ cannot lose the true faith is shown, and confirmation of the reason given.

Summary: 1. Presentation of the error of heretics who assert that the faith can fail in the whole Church. 2. This error was familiar to the old heretics. Lucifer in the work of Jerome. The Donatists on the evidence of Augustine. 3. From the testimonies of Sacred Scripture it is proved that the faith will never be lacking in the Church. A first supposition is that the Church is one. 4. The perpetual endurance of the unity of the Church is established. 5. Testimony first from Matthew 16 and the expositions of the Fathers. In Sacred Scripture the presence of God imports the idea of help. 6. Distinction between the comings of Christ and of the Holy Spirit. 7. The conclusion to the truth proposed is drawn. The Church would cease to exist were the faith lost. 8. Two objections by heretics. The response of St. Augustine. 9. That the faith did not fail in the whole Synagogue is demonstrated; satisfaction is made to the first objection. 10. That at the time of Antichrist the faith will endure in the Church is demonstrated; satisfaction is made to the second objection.

Chapter 4: That it is not possible for the Catholic Church to err even through ignorance in matters of faith.

Summary: 1. An evasion to the above argument. 2. The Church cannot even err through ignorance. 3. The same truth is proved by reason; an evasion is excluded. 4. Response by heretics. The response is rejected, and the above conclusion is confirmed by the authority of the Fathers.

Chapter 5: That the Roman Church has the same firmness of faith as the Catholic Church is demonstrated, and an evasion of the sectaries is met.

Summary: 1. Distinction made by sectaries between the Roman and the Catholic Church. 2. This sort of distinction was invented by the more ancient heretics. 3. Foundations of the error. 4. Distinction of the Roman Church into universal and particular. 5. The place in Luke 22 is shown to be to our account. 6. First confirmation. 7. Second confirmation.

Chapter 6: The firmness of the Faith and of the Roman Church is shown by tradition.

Summary: 1. Testimonies from the ancient fathers are examined that assert the Faith of the Roman and of the Catholic Church coincide. The first testimony. 2. The second from Augustine and Jerome. 3. The third from Ambrose. 4. The fourth from Cyprian. 5. The fifth from Irenaeus. 6. The sixth from Athanasius and the bishops of Egypt. 7. The seventh from the bishops of the province of Tarragona. 8. Evasion. Response. 9. Instance. It is refuted. 10. An authority and a conjecture are added. 11. Heretics object that some pontiffs fell into heresy. 12. No Pontiff as head of the Church can lose the faith. 13. Nor can a Pontiff err in things pertaining to the Universal Church.

Chapter 7: Exclusion of a third evasion by the heretics, which they invent through a distinction between the visible and the invisible Church.

Summary: 1. Presentation of a third evasion by heretics about the invisible Church. 2. Foundation of the aforesaid error. 3. Visibility of the Church shown from Isaiah 2. 4. Twofold exposition. 5. A response on behalf of the opinion of the heretics is refuted. 6. The visibility of the Church will endure perpetually. 7. Confirmation from the office of teaching. 8. Confirmation from the visible succession of Pontiffs. 9. The Church always perseveres by reason of visible succession. 10. Confirmation lastly from Ephesians ch. 4.

Chapter 8: The objections of the adversaries are met, and the sense in which the Church is visible is explained.

Summary: 1. Final evasion on behalf of the opinion of the heretics, that the Church is an object of belief for the intellect but is not known to the senses. 2. How the true Church is to be believed. 3. Proof of the first part. 4. Confirmation of the second part. 5. How the Church is visible to sense. 6. Response of the heretics. 7. That the Church is visible to sense through signs is shown. 8. Signs of the Catholic Church. 9. Another sign received from the Fathers: the antiquity and firmness of the Church. 10. This sign squares with none of the conventicles of the heretics. 11. First evasion of the heretics; refutation. 12. Second evasion; response. 13. Solution of the arguments. 14. Explanation from the Fathers. 15. Explanation of the author.

Chapter 9: The king of England, since he does not admit the complete Scripture nor the unwritten word of God, is shown not to be defender of the truly Christian Faith.

Summary: 1. Faith signifies both the matter and the act of belief. 2. The king of England does not accept the integral Christian Faith. 3. Foundation of the faith of the king of England. 4. The sacred books of both the first and the second order are canonical. Scripture alone is not the integral and proximate foundation of faith. The unwritten word of God is to be received with the same faith as the written. 5. The traditions are confirmed by reason. 6. The evasion of heretics is refuted. 7. From the words of the king himself the same truth is established. 8. An authority to which the Holy Spirit gives his special assistance is necessary in the Church. 9. The Church pays attention to the unwritten word of God with the same certainty as to the written. 10. By the authority of the Fathers are the traditions made firm. 11. The truth is confirmed lastly with examples. 12. Certain of the Fathers, who seem not much to favor the traditions, are explained.

Chapter 10: From the foundation and reason for belief of the king of England he is shown not to be defender of the faith truly Christian.

Summary: 1. The king of England lays down as foundation for belief his own opinion. 2. It is temerity to arrogate this intelligence to oneself. 3. The sacred page cannot be genuinely expounded without a teacher. 4. An effective dilemma against the sure science assumed by the king. 5. How dangerous it is to locate the foundation of faith in private spirit.

Chapter 11: The foundation of true faith cannot be placed in private spirit.

Summary: 1. That in controversies of faith the rule of the Church is to be held to is proved from Scripture. 2. That in things of faith private spirit is to be avoided is shown by Scripture. A genuine interpretation of the words of the Apostle. 3. That private spirit is not the rule of faith is shown from the Fathers. First reason for establishing the same truth. 4. Second reason. 5. The infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit has not been promised to individual believers. 6. How the Holy Spirit teaches everyone. 7. The Holy Spirit on occasion assists some by special privilege. 8. Third reason. 9. Fourth reason. Private spirit is the root of heresies. 10. Fifth reason. 11. Sixth reason. 12. The king of England, when he lays down the aforesaid rule of faith, is in conflict with himself. The exhortation of the same king to the sectaries about unity of faith involves inconsistency. 13. Objections to the opposite opinion. 14. Twofold interpretation of Scripture, one authentic and one doctrinal. 15. Authentic interpretation cannot issue from a private spirit.

Chapter 12: From the name 'Catholic' the Anglican sect is shown not to be the Catholic Faith.

Summary: 1. The name of 'Catholic' is applied to the Faith and to the Church. 2. England affects to the name of Catholic. 3. This name has been introduced for the Church to distinguish it from heretical conventicles. 4. The conclusion is drawn that the true Church is that which truly deserves this name. 5. What it is for the Church to deserve the name of Catholic. 6. The inference is drawn that the name 'Catholic' is owed to the Roman Church. 7. First proof of the assertion. 8. Second proof of the assertion. 9. Finally the proposed assertion is confirmed from the words of King James. 10. The conclusion is drawn that the name cannot be applied to the Anglican sect. First reason. Second reason. 11. Third reason. A sect that has its proper name from its master is not Catholic. 12. Why each heresy is named from its inventor. 13. Not only the ancient heretics but the new as well are named from their heresiarchs.

Chapter 13: Objections against the doctrine of the previous chapter are met.

Summary: 1. First objection. Catholics used to be called Homoousians, now Papists, etc. Second objection. 2. Solution to the first part of the objection. 3. The names which heretics impose on the Catholics do not indicate novelty of doctrine. 4. Solution to the second part of the objection.

Chapter 14: From the idea of the Catholic name the discussion of the preceding chapter is confirmed.

Summary: 1. 'Catholic' in Greek is the same as 'universal'. 2. The faith is said, first, to be universal by reason of matter. 3. It is said, second, to be universal from the universal or common rule of believing. 4. The Anglican sect lacks the universal rule of believing that is most necessary for true faith. 5. The faith is said, third, to be universal as to all ranks of persons. 6. The Church is universal as to ranks and duties. 7. The aforesaid conditions of the Church are shown to be lacking in the Anglican sect. 8. An evasion is met. 9. England retains not an ecclesiastical but a political hierarchy.

Chapter 15: The Church is shown to be called Catholic because it is diffused throughout the whole world, and resistance is made to heretics.

Summary: 1. Etymology of the word 'Catholic'. 2. The Anglican sect is concluded not to have the true faith. 3. Evasion. It is refuted. Extent of place does not of itself constitute a Church as Catholic. 4. The response of the king is in another way rejected.

Chapter 16: How it is true that the Catholic Church is diffused through the whole globe.

Summary: 1. Reason for doubt. 2. Confirmation. 3. Response to the reason for doubt. 4. In two ways can the Church be diffused through the whole globe. 5. The Church is said to be universal with the universality of right and of fact. 6. The extent of the Church through the world can undergo various vicissitudes. 7. The promises about the preaching of the Gospel through the world have not yet been integrally fulfilled. 8. A universality sufficient for Catholicism was long ago attained by the Church. 9. The Church probably began to have the aforesaid universality from the time of Constantine. 10. For the Catholicism of the Church there is no need that it exceed the other sects in universality. 11. Satisfaction to the last part of the objection. 12. The Catholic Church even in the middle of persecutions has retained its splendor. 13. No sect can be so diffused through the world that it be judged likely Catholic. 14. First reason. 15. Second reason. 16. Third reason. 17. Heretics do not have the spirit of propagating the faith. 18. A concern to restore heretics is necessary to the Church. A certain objection is dissolved.

Chapter 17: The Apostolic Faith does not exist in the Anglican Schism.

Summary: 1. The faith is said to be apostolic from the apostles. 2. What is required for a doctrine to be called apostolic. 3. The best rule for recognizing the faith. 4. From the aforesaid conditions is collected that the Anglican faith is not apostolic. 5. The things that the Anglican sect has in common with the Roman Church pertain to the apostolic faith. 6. The doctrine of the Creeds, as far as the king interprets it, cannot contain the certitude of the apostolic faith. 7. The same is proved by examples. 8. Apostolic writings without the apostolic sense do not suffice for faith. 9. The Anglican sect according to its own dogmas seems repugnant to the apostolic faith.

10. The response of the king is attacked from his deeds.

Chapter 18: An objection against the doctrine of the previous chapter is met.

Summary: 1. An objection of the heretics. What is rejected by the king of England as new. 2. The king tries to preclude the way to a Catholic response. 3. The Roman Church can receive no dogma contrary to the apostles; but the Anglican sect receives many that are contrary to them. 4. The Church can propose some things distinctly to be believed that were not thus believed before. 5. What novelty is repugnant to antiquity of faith. 6. The first way of declaring dogmas of the faith. 7. Second way. 8. In things pertaining to morals, not only addition but also change can be made. 9. Through additions made by the Church the apostolic doctrine is not changed but made more plain. 10. Satisfaction is made to the examples given at the beginning.

Chapter 19: The Anglican sect is shown to be adorned by the blood of no ancient martyr but rather to be condemned thereby.

Summary: 1. The words of the king are weighed. 2. King James asserts that the Anglican faith has been adorned by the blood of the martyrs. 3. The Anglican sect is shown to be attacked by the blood of the martyrs. 4. The ancient martyrs greatly extol the Roman Faith. The evasion of heretics is refuted. 5. The martyrs confirm the faith for any time. The assertion is understood also of articles recently declared. 6. The martyrs were killed for the defense of articles that England disavows. 7. Conclusion against the assertion of the king of England. 8. A repugnance in the words of the king is shown. 9. Evasion. 10. It is rejected and the conclusion is drawn that the aforesaid martyrs did not err in any dogma of faith. 11. Cyprian is vindicated from calumny.

Chapter 20: The true martyrs of our times have made illustrious not the Anglican sect but the Roman Faith.

Summary: 1. The sectaries are not truly martyrs. 2. Declaration by reason from the side of the one inflicting death. 3. An objection is dissolved. The truth of martyrdom is not diagnosed from death alone. 4. On the part of the one accepting death. 5. Although heretics suffer for defending some truth of the faith, they are not truly martyrs. 6. First reason. 7. Second reason. 8. A heretic who has died even for confession of Christ does not obtain martyrdom, nor does he make the faith illustrious. 9. Many Catholics of this time are shown to have made the apostolic faith illustrious by martyrdom. 10. The martyrdom of Catholics is proved from manner of suffering.

Chapter 21: The Anglican sect is hateful even for the sole ugliness of schism.

Summary: 1. King James studies to vindicate himself from the note of heresy. 2. That the Anglican fall was a very grave schism is shown from the etymology of the word. 3. Two kinds of schism are handed down: schism and para-synagogue. What they are. 4. By separation from the Church, even without defection from the faith, schism is committed. Heresy necessary includes schism but not vice versa. The temples of the orthodox faithful retain the name 'Catholic'. 5. The schism of the Donatists. 6. Henry VIII is concluded to have been a schismatic. 7. From the stain of schism the king little studies to free himself. 8. What Chrysostom thinks about schism. 9. King James cannot rightly evade the name of schismatic.

Chapter 22: The Anglican schism has passed over into manifest heresy and apostate doctrine.

Summary: 1. That the Anglican sect has broken out into several heresies is shown by the authority of the Fathers. By experience the same truth is strengthened. 2. A double reason for the aforesaid fact of experience is assigned. 3. Schism is opposed of itself to charity, and by long duration pours darkness on the mind. 4. That the Anglican schism has already arrived at heresy is concluded from what has been said. To defend the schism Henry VIII thought up a new heresy for himself. 5. It is refuted. No Catholic asserts that the Pontiff can take kingdoms away at pleasure. 6. That the Pontiff is usurping to himself a third part of the goods of citizens is fabricated by the heretics against all right and truth of fact. 7. Catholics are vindicated from some impositions of the king. 8. Many heresies seized on England after Henry VIII. 9. From the signs of heresies handed on by the Fathers the Calvinist sect is shown to be a heresy. First and second sign. 10. Third sign. 11. Fourth sign. 12. Fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth sign. 13. Ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sign.

Chapter 23: Those who obstinately follow the Anglican schism can be excused neither from heresy nor from the note of heresy.

Summary: 1. The reasons are proposed whereby the king tries to free himself from the note of heresy. The first. 2. Of the various acceptations of heresy two are preferred. Among Christians heresy is always taken in the bad sense. 3. A doctrine contrary to the faith is aptly called an heretical proposition, but the assent to such doctrine is heresy. What an heretical proposition is. 4. The true rule of faith is established. 5. A proposition which is proposed by the Church as to believed de fide is de fide. 6. Definition of heresy. Explanation. 7. Proper definition of heresy. Proof from Augustine. 8. Proof from the Fathers that one dogma contrary to the faith is sufficient to constitute heresy. Proof by reason.

Chapter 24: The reasons are refuted by which the king studies to escape the stain of a heretic.

Summary: 1. Twofold excuse in the first reason of the king of England. 2. King James was at some time in the Catholic Church. A catechumen rightly baptized by a heretic is truly made a member of the Church. 3. Someone can be a heretic even if he was never in the Catholic Church. 4. The second reason of the king is refuted. 5. His final reason is dissolved. 6. The Creeds, when believed without their Catholic sense, do not suffice for true confession of faith. 7. All the authentic Councils are to be received with equal certitude. 8. A certain evasion of the king is excluded. 9. The reason of the king is shown to be insufficient.

Chapter 25: The Anglican sect wrongly limits its faith and the authority of the Church to the five hundred years after Christ.

Summary: 1. The general rule or limit or boundary for belief which the king of England prescribes to his credulity. 2. Conjectures whereby the king could have been led to lay down the aforesaid rule of belief. 3. Solution to conjectures of this sort. An evasion is met. 4. Solution to the second conjecture. 5. Evasion of the king. Solution. 6. The third conjecture is dissolved. 7. The conclusion is drawn that it is against the faith to attribute false articles to the Roman Church. 8. Second reason. Nothing can come from the Roman Church without at the same time coming from the Catholic Church. The articles reprehended by the king contain the true and Catholic doctrine.

Sum and conclusion of the whole book with an address to the king of England.

To the most Serene Kings and Princes, Defenders and Sons of the Roman and Catholic Church, Temporal and Eternal Happiness

Francisco Suarez, of the Society of Jesus.

In a recently published book, the Most Serene JAMES, of Great Britain king, has, as if with friendly trumpet call, summoned Catholic kings and princes to the communion of his own religion, so that those whom Christ, the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, has armed with supreme power for the defense of the Roman Church, which he purchased with his own blood, might be incited by the communication of King James' counsel to the offense of that Church. With vain attempt, however, has the most serene king exercised his pen. For neither shall the gates of hell prevail against her nor could they themselves, founded on the Roman rock and bound to each other with the most firm tie of true piety by Christ the corner stone, be driven therefrom by the frigid gale of the North Wind. Would that King James, following in the footsteps of his ancestors, the most unconquered kings, were to conspire instead with us to adorn the majesty of the Catholic Church, so that he might in zeal for piety not be inferior to those with whom he is in power and empire equal, and should wish rather to be numbered among those kings whom divine authority has constituted as the Church's guardians, than among those whom the rage of impiety has inflamed against the Lord and against Christ.

Since therefore, when he published the index of his own religion, he made war against the Catholic Church neither by means of the royal majesty wherewith he shines, nor by the tumult of arms and by power (which the priest of Christ and a man of religion cannot stand against), but only by the sharpness of his human genius and his pen, I have considered it proper to my office and instruction to go forth into the battle line, not so as to check the name and splendor of so great a king, which I am neither able nor wish to do, but so that the fogs exhaled by the stinking pits of the innovators, wherewith he strives to obscure the Catholic truth, might be dispelled by the rays of true wisdom and disappear into air and vapor; which office, so that I may complete, I have from God the father of lights strenuously prayed for that light, namely the knowledge of sincere truth, which has been handed on by Christ the Lord through the apostles and been expounded in the waking vigils of the holy Fathers, and which he who desires to hold the true way of living and believing ought to seek. May this undertaking be inspired by the sacred influence in whose hand are the hearts of kings. And you, kings and princes of the Catholic globe, who with brotherly affection desire the most serene James to be such as you are, receive under your patronage this work of ours, such as it is, for defense by your authority; for yours is that saying and decree: "We make that our own to which we impart our authority;" your work, therefore, it is so that, defended and adorned with the royal brilliance of your patronage, it might go forth secure to the public, and might appear illustrious to the world and not be deemed unworthy of royal eyes. For not otherwise than under your name can this our work, in which we uphold the cause of God, oppose the book of the most serene king. For this one thought has impelled me, that I might dedicate this our labor with dutiful submission of mind to you, who as heirs of the empire and piety of your ancestors have religiously taken up and constantly attend the protection of the Catholic Church.

As to others, this our labor can serve as antidote; but you have no need of the antidote (which is the supreme piety of God) against the rage of the Innovators, whose poisons, drawn from the stygian streams, cannot do you harm who, being subject and fastened in the unity of the true and Catholic Faith to Christ the Lord and to his Roman Vicar on earth and Supreme Pontiff as most fine members of his body to the head, are preserved in the virtue of God. In whom, as long as your supreme power is made firm, may it to greater glory of empire increase and advance to an eternal felicity.

DEFENSE OF THE CATHOLIC FAITH
AGAINST THE ERRORS OF THE ANGLICAN SECT

With a Response to the Apology for the Oath of Allegiance And to the Letter to Christian Princes of The Most Serene James King of England

Preface of the Author.

Summary: 1. Mind of the author. 2. Collection of the assertions by the most serene James. 3. The order in which these assertions are to be attacked. 4. The method to be followed.

1. I would indeed prefer, as in a not dissimilar cause Ambrose said, Preface to bk.1 De Fide, “to undertake the burden of exhorting to the faith than to undertake the burden of disputing about the faith.” But since the very right itself of nature requires, and all laws as well divine as human demand, that the son for the parent, the priest for the Church, the theologian for religion, the religious for things sacred, and lastly the member, however lowly, for the head, should fight in defense, as far as possible, against every injury, therefore I am compelled not to belittle this new kind of writing. For James, the most serene king of Great Britain, in his Apology and his monitory Preface to all Christian princes of the world, tries to inflict violence on all the above when he imposes on his sect the name of Catholic and primitive faith but on our religion the dishonor of defector; and when he arrogates to himself the name of defender of the Catholic faith, but he brands the Pontiff, the highest Pastor of all the faithful and, under Christ, the supreme head, with the mark of tyranny and Antichristian apostasy; and when he attacks as many as possible of the other mysteries and sacraments of our faith and shakes with his attack the hearts of the pious. And me, after other most learned men, although in erudition and eloquence very unequal, he has induced to advance on this work and forced to descend into a wrestling school to me unaccustomed. Nor does the majesty of the royal dignity frighten me, but rather the truth thereby impugned does the more greatly excite me, lest perhaps the splendor of so great a name confuse the eyes of the weaker; above all because in this cause he seems to have put off the royal splendor, acting the part of doctor rather than of king, when he strives to defend the supreme authority in ecclesiastical things that he has usurped to himself. In Ambrose I remember to have read, bk.2 epist.27 to Theodosius: “Nor belongs it to an emperor to deny freedom of speaking, nor to a priest to refrain from saying what he thinks. Nothing in kings is as lovable as to love freedom even in those who are subject in obedience to them, nothing in a priest as dangerous with God, as base with men, as not to proclaim freely what he thinks. Since it is written, Psalm 118 [119].46: ‘I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings, and will not be ashamed.’” Much moved, then, by these divine and sacred words, though diffident of my own genius yet confident in the cause and supported by the truth, I do not fear to speak for it freely. Those things only, however, will I try to bring forward which could not offend the high spirit of the king, unless the light itself should, by displaying the truth, offend eyes badly affected. For I have decreed to elucidate and guard Catholic truth; not to dispute with his Majesty but rather to serve him, as is my wish, in demonstrating the true and Catholic faith.

2. With the breath of divine favor, then, I will advance to show, in respect of some chief things touched on by the most serene James, the truth of the faith taught by Christ the Lord, handed on by the Apostles, and preserved integrally and unwaveringly by the holy Fathers. But, so that a more open way may be laid out for what needs to be said and so that everything may the more easily be perceived, I will first put before the reader's eyes the aim and intention of the king, and then the order we must follow in making response. For, upon examining attentively and carefully the royal work, I readily judged that the author was directing it chiefly toward upholding with all his efforts the oath of fidelity which he has very recently instructed his subjects to swear to him. And for that reason he has tried to attack the Pontifical rescripts as well as the letters of the most illustrious Cardinal Bellarmine to the Archbishop. But afterwards, when he had received a reply on all these things, the king, being provoked, joined to his Apology a Preface to all the princes of the Christian world, wherein he strives to stir them up against the Supreme Pontiff as if against a common enemy and usurper of royal right and power, and to move them to general defection from the Roman Church, both by enticing them with hope of greater liberty and more excellent power, and also by instilling in them the fear lest, while they allow, with overmuch and indulgent mildness (as he says), the Pontifical dignity to grow immense, the royal splendor might either be altogether destroyed or at any rate be more obscured than is right. And to prevent it being thought that he is launching this war against the Vicar of Christ, he has progressed to the point of laboring to give persuasion that the Pontiff is not the defender of Christ but the Antichrist himself. Further, lest the sons of the true Church, astonished at the striking novelty, should hold it in detestation, he next names and professes himself defender of the Catholic faith itself, so that the sect which he defends may, for this reason, not seem to be heresy but only disagreement with the Roman Pontiff. He adds further an extended confession of his faith, whereby he strives to prove that he adheres to the primitive and ancient faith and that he denies only (as he says) the novel and recent articles of the faith invented by the Roman Church.

3. In order, then, to proceed in a due order of doctrine that may be of service for both the clarity and the utility we intend in this work, we will divide it into six parts, which will respond to the said points, though in changed order. For in the first place I will show that the schism, which the king himself does not repudiate in his book, can in no way be excused from heresy and from an infidelity absolutely opposed to the faith truly Catholic, and that, thereby, the title of defender of the Catholic faith usurped by the most serene king is not only assumed without foundation but is also plainly contrary to the thing he professes. We have taken the beginning of our discussion from this title, not only because, as affixed to the frontispiece of the royal work, it immediately seizes the admiration, but also because it will give us a handle for establishing certain principles from which the conclusion may easily be drawn that the Anglican sect does not have the foundations of the true faith of Christ; and to this we will devote the first book. In the second, however, we will prove that all the articles of the Roman faith, which the king attacks, are ancient and Catholic and that their opposites cannot be defended without open heresy. The third book will follow next whose purpose is to uphold, according to our strength, the right and primacy of the Supreme Pontiff. Not that I judge everything which could be said of his excellent dignity to be in need of defense (for thus would the book grow immense), but I aim only to show that the Roman Pontiff has not usurped the power of temporal kings but has vindicated "only the dignity of the supreme priest on which (as Jerome says, Contra Luciferianos) the salvation of the Church depends,” and has preserved that right of his against which the gates of hell have never prevailed nor ever shall prevail. Since also the king in his Preface complains much about the exemption of clerics from temporal power and from lay jurisdiction, and laments that a third part (as he says) of subjects has been taken away from temporal kings, we will therefore add a fourth book in which we will demonstrate the right to immunity of ecclesiastical persons. Next, in the fifth book, we will try irrefutably to prove, not only that all the conjectures he has proposed about the Antichrist are very flimsy, but also that the Antichrist will labor mightily for the destruction of the Apostolic See, and that thus this name agrees rather with those who thus painstakingly anticipate the office of the Antichrist. For, as Jerome said to Damasus, epist.5: “Whoever does not collect with you, scatters, that is, he who is not of Christ is of Antichrist, etc.” and as Bernard says, epist.124 to Hildebert, bishop of Tours, speaking of Pope Innocent, “Those who are of God are gladly joined to him, but he who stands in opposition is either Antichrist or of Antichrist.” Lastly, in the sixth book, we will, as regard the oath of fidelity, show briefly what there is of injustice and injury in the king’s demand against the Apostolic See, and we will diligently explain what there is of perjury and infidelity involved in the subjects who swear it.

4. Lastly, as to my manner of proceeding and disputing, I will not lay aside the style and scholastic method that are familiar to me and, by very custom, made as it were connatural, even if to men who dissent from us in the faith it be wont to be the less pleasing, perhaps because it is most apt for bringing the truth out of darkness and most effective in attacking errors. For that reason too, although we must chiefly make use of the testimonies of the divine Scriptures, of the Councils, and of the Fathers, nevertheless we will weigh the force of reasonings and will, as much as in us lies, urge their force and effectiveness; we will collect them, not only from the aforesaid foundations of the faith, but also from the light of nature itself, as far as occasion may require. Not that the mysteries of our sacrosanct religion need these reasonings for their defense, but because by them can be not obscurely shown how far they depart from all prudence and from very reason who do not fear, in matters pertaining to the faith, to dissent from the Catholic and Roman Church and to take themselves out of it.

BOOK ONE

HOW MUCH ANGLICANISM IS AT VARIANCE WITH CATHOLIC DOCTRINE

Preface

Summary: Aim of the author and twofold manner of showing the error of Anglicanism.

I have proposed to show that the title of Defender of the Catholic Faith, which the most serene James arrogates to himself, is contrary to his deeds. For I have thought this necessary both because of the Catholics who dwell under his sway, lest it perhaps happen that they be deceived by that fair-seeming title, and because of others who are of the same opinion along with him, so that they may be warned and, if it may be, convicted of that heresy wherein they manifestly dwell. For this is the aim of our work, and if, with God's help, we can attain it, then the fact that this title is certainly vain, and that the head and protector of this schism is an adversary of the Catholic Faith and no defender, will become clear. But we can in a twofold way demonstrate the error of that sect; first generally by showing that there is not in it the foundation of the true Faith and a certain and infallible rule of belief, then by pointing out with the clearest arguments its individual errors, which the king himself professes, and by refuting them with the most certain testimonies. In this book, then, we will initiate the first way, wherein we cannot take a more apt beginning than by at once putting before the eyes of the English the happy state of the true and Catholic Faith which, before the schism arose, they enjoyed. And for that reason I have, in the first chapter of this book, thought it worthwhile to premise a few things about the progress of the kingdom of England in the Christian Religion from the time when it received the light of it up to the present day.

For, just as in moral matters, knowledge of the fact (as the jurists say) is wont to be first necessary for judging of the right, so in the present case knowledge of the more ancient faith is, we judge, necessary both for understanding the cause and origin of error and also for observing how it is repugnant and opposed to the Catholic Faith. For this reasoning indeed is, on the witness of Cyprian epist. 74, a speedy one for removing error among plain and religious minds and for finding and teaching the truth: "For if we make return to the head and origin of the divine tradition, human error ceases and whatever was lying hid under the gloom and cloud of darkness is exposed, once the reason of the heavenly sacraments is seen, to the light of truth. If the channel conducting the water which was before flowing copiously and in abundance suddenly fail, surely one proceeds to the fount of it so that the reason for the failure may from there be known – whether the stream, its veins withering, has dried up in the head, or whether, after flowing thence complete and full, it has come to a stop in mid journey?" Which advice of Cyprian is very much praised by Augustine, bk. 5, De Bapt., ch. 29, who concludes: "it is the best advice and should without doubt be followed." Treading, therefore, in the steps of such great Fathers, let us begin the task.

Chapter 1: On the progress of the Catholic Faith and the state of the English people from its first conversion up to the present time.

Summary: 1. The Catholic Faith began in England at the birth of the Gospel. Baronius, for year

35, n.5, from a manuscript history of England, which is contained in the Vatican, 4.colum., at the beginning. 2. The history of that people, Baronius for the year 183, from the book of the Martyrology of the Roman Pontiffs and others. 3. The Catholic Faith advanced in the time of Pope Eleutherius. At the time of Gregory it was restored. 4. It endured up to the time of Henry. 5. Surius in his history of our time. Cochleus in his history of Luther. Maurice Canneus in his history of the Martyrdom of the Carthusians. Fall of Henry VIII. 6. Under Edward the Zwinglian sect was introduced. 7. Under Mary the Faith was restored. 8. Elizabeth imports the Calvinist sect into the kingdom. 9. The state of England under James.

1. Gildas, surnamed the Wise, (whom Polydore Virgil, Bede, and others follow), testifies in De Excidio Britanniae that Britain had already received the Christian Religion from the very beginning of the birth of the Gospel; which matter Polydore, bk.2 Hist. Anglicanae, describes as having happened in this manner: “When that Joseph, who, on the testimony of the Evangelist Matthew, was by origin from the city of Arimathea and who buried the body of Christ, came, whether by chance or design, God so wishing, to Britain with no small company, when both he and his colleagues were there preaching about the Gospel and carefully teaching the dogma of Christ, many people were drawn over by it to the truth of piety and were with saving fruit baptized.”

2. The same island was afterwards confirmed, or again first returned to the faith, by the Roman Pontiff Eleutherius, twelfth from Peter, on the testimony of Bede, bk.1, ch.4: “Lucius king of the Britons sent the Pope a letter beseeching him to make him a Christian by his mandate, and he soon obtained the effect of his pious petition, and the Britons kept inviolate the faith they had received up the times of prince Diocletian.” For then (on the testimony of Gildas and from him of Polydore above), “because of the brutality of the persecution, the religion grew so cold that it was almost extinguished.”

3. At length, however (by the inspiration of divine grace), in the year of Christ our Lord 590, in the second year of the emperor Maurice, Pope Gregory the First sent Augustine and Melitus to Britain, and Ethelbert king of Kent, being converted by their preaching and cleansed in the saving font of baptism, brought the same island, which was in the service of idols, back to Christ. Of this last conversion, originating from the Roman See, the cause, manner, order, and progress are expansively pursued by Gregory himself, bk.5, epist.10, 58, and 50; bk.7, epist.112, indict.2; by Bede, above ch.23; by John the Deacon, in his Vita Gregorii, bk.2, ch.34; by Baronius, for the year of Christ 596, nos.9-14; and by others, although there is some discordance in the calculation of years which, for the present purpose, is of no relevance.

4. But from the aforesaid time up to the year of our Lord 1534, and about the 25th year of king Henry, 8th of that name, no other religion for around one thousand years, as is proven by the annals of the English, flourished among them save that which up to the present day they commonly call “ancient”, “Catholic”, I say, and “Roman”. In addition even Henry VIII himself was up to this time so devoted to the Apostolic See that in its defense and in defense of the Roman Faith he composed against Luther, then raving against the See of Peter, a just book, which he sent to Leo X, then Vicar of Christ on earth (as is contained in the very constit.45 of the same Pontiff to the still same king Henry), for purpose of examination and approval by Apostolic authority. In this book, while asserting the seven sacraments, artic.2, he endeavors to do battle in defense of the authority of the Roman See thus: “Luther cannot deny that the holy Roman See is recognized and venerated as mother and primate by every church of the faithful, at least by all that are neither by distance of place nor intervening danger prohibited of access; although, if they say true who come hither also from India, even the Indians themselves, separated by the expanse of so many lands, so many seas, so many wastes, yet submit themselves to the Roman Pontiff. Therefore, if so great and so widely diffused a power has been acquired by the Pontiff neither by the command of God nor by the will of men, but he has claimed it for himself by his own force, when, would Luther please say, did he burst forth into possession of so great sway? For the beginning of such immense power cannot be obscure, especially if its birth was within the memory of men.”

5. These things wrote the king at the time he was most attached to the Roman Church. But afterwards, burning with too great love for Anne Boleyn, and not obtaining from the Apostolic See the license he had often sought, and repudiating his legitimate wife, Catherine, daughter of the Catholic kings of Spain, he took the said Anne, while all right cried in protest, to be his wife. And, so that (as it thereupon seemed) he might act with the more impunity, he constituted himself head of the Anglican Church, decreeing that all were to hold and call him so, and denied authority to the true Vicar of Christ on earth. This is the basis, this the foundation and origin of the new Gospel that was born in England. Nor do the Protestants themselves disavow or blush at the fact, as it is well known from the histories of that time.

6. But to the head of such a church, sprung from the basest principles, there succeeded in the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1546 another head, no less firm and apt for ecclesiastical governance (a boy, I mean, of nine years old, Edward), to rule both bodies, the spiritual and the temporal, although he was himself in need of governance by another. And albeit his father had ordered him to be educated in the Catholic Faith (the title only of primacy of the Church being taken out of it), yet the mandate of king Henry was spurned and Edward embraced the Zwinglian sect, to Henry the most hateful of all, and exercised pontifical authority, because (as is read in one of his rescripts) “all authority for decreeing justice and even jurisdiction of every kind, as well the one called ecclesiastical as the secular, flows from the royal power as if from the supreme head.” Now although many innovations were made over a period of some seven years, yet at last the royal youth, on the eve of the Nones of July, in the 16th year of his age but the 7th of his reign, departed the living, and with his extinction was the Zwinglian sect likewise too almost extinguished from England.

7. For thereupon followed that most happy reign of Mary, the most choice as equally the most religious woman of all, who, having won a victory by heavenly aid unexpected of her enemies, was prompted by her piety and religion alone to spit out the title of primate usurped by her father and brother and had it deleted from the royal style, and the ancient Catholic Religion, which she had always professed, she restored throughout her whole kingdom, with the marvelous cooperation of the divine power and the interposition of the authority of the Pontiff. But England, on account of her father's or her subjects' sins, was by the death of this most illustrious queen after five years and four months deprived of so great a good, the public profession of the Roman Faith.

8. To Mary succeeded in the kingdom, though not in piety and religion, Elizabeth, third offspring of Henry. For she at once introduced, in place of the Catholic Religion, a form of the Calvinist sect into the kingdom. And although it did not seem, in her first Parliament, that she would be called head of the Church, because that name in her father had displeased Calvin, yet the name of supreme governess of the Anglican Church (which comes to the same) she assumed to herself, and she compelled her subjects by solemn oath to confirm it, and by many laws published in various assemblies she wished, decreed, and declared power of every sort in spiritual things to be attached to the royal scepter. And England persisted in this state and profession of religion as long as she lived.

9. However, upon her death, the most serene James, son of Mary Queen of Scotland and heir to her kingdom, obtained also the scepter of the English kingdom and, not contented with this right, together with it usurped the primacy and supreme spiritual power over the whole of Britain, although he professes either the Calvinist sect or one a little diverse from it, and with all his efforts he studies to have it accepted and observed by his subjects. Even so he professes himself to be not only Catholic but even defender and promoter of the Faith truly Christian, Catholic, and Apostolic. But how much this title departs from the truth, and how much his deeds are contrary to his words, remains to be seen.

Chapter 2: The Anglican sect has departed from the true faith.

Summary: 1. An unavoidable dilemma is posed. First part of the dilemma. 2. Someone who denies any part of the faith subverts the whole faith. 3. Confirmation of the second part of the dilemma. A certain Calvinist in his bk.2 on the Marriage of Henry, London 1573. A very stupid statement by the heretic. 4. The testimony of Henry VIII shows that before him England retained the Catholic Faith. 5. Second proof of the same point. 6. King James seems to think the faith preached in England by Augustine was not Catholic. When Augustine began to preach in England. 7. The faith preached by Eleutherius was true. 8. The same conclusion is drawn about the faith preached by Augustine. First from authority. 9. Second from comparison of both preachings. 10. Third from the sanctity and miracles of Augustine and his colleagues. 11. Finally from reason.

1. The assertion here, presented in the previous chapter by evident deduction from the narrative of what happened and the way things changed, I conclude to as follows. For I ask, was the faith that England received through Augustine and other ministers of the word of God sent by Gregory, and that was retained up to Henry VIII, true or not? For whichever of these two be chosen, we will, as I reckon, easily prove that what the king of England now professes is not truly the Christian Faith. The argument derives, it seems to me, from Augustine, bk.2, Contra Epistol. Gaudentii, ch.7, when he presses the Donatist as follows: “Tell me, did the Church, at the time when, according to you, it was receiving culprits of every crime, perish by contact with the wicked or not perish?” And later: “Reply, has the Church perished or not perished? Choose the one you suppose. If it had already then perished, which Church gave birth to Donatus? On the other hand if, after so many were brought into it without baptism (namely without second baptism), it could not perish, reply, I ask, what madness persuaded the party of Donatus to separate itself therefrom by avoiding communion with the wicked?” For we in like manner raise the question whether the Church had perished at the time of Gregory or had not perished. If it had perished what church begat the Anglican Church? If it had not perished, what madness persuaded England under Henry to separate itself from it, or how can that church be Catholic which perseveres in the separation effected by Henry? For, to begin with, if the ancient faith was true, defection from it is repugnant to and opposes the true faith, and the sect which by contrast England now professes is nothing other than a kind of defection from or rebellion against that faith. How then can it be called or accounted the true faith? “For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?” I Corinthians 6.14-15. For contraries cannot be joined together in the same thing; but defection from the true faith is contrary to the very Christian Faith, therefore a sect introduced by defection from the Christian Faith cannot usurp the name of that faith, still less of the truth. For divine faith, such as the Christian is, cannot change or suffer inconstancy; for God, on whose truth it rests, cannot deny himself or (which is the same) cannot retract what he has once said; therefore a sect which was introduced by defection from the divine and Catholic Faith cannot be the divine faith, but is a human invention and a vain opinion.

And this discourse is strikingly confirmed by Paul's rebuke, which no less fits the English than the Galatians, 1.6-7: "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another Gospel; which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the Gospel of Christ," that is (on the exposition of Chrysostom): "there are some that trouble the vision of your mind with their opinions, and wish to subvert the Gospel of Christ: which is single, and beside it there can be no other." Therefore all doctrines which fail of that single Gospel are human opinion and a sect contrary to divine truth. For by the name of 'Gospel', as Augustine expounds bk.3, Cont. Liter. Petil., ch.6, Paul comprehends the whole Catholic doctrine, about which he subjoins, v.8: "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Which again he immediately repeats, "so that," as Jerome says, "he might magnify the firmness and stability of the Catholic Faith. Because if it might happen that Apostles and Angels change, yet there should be no withdrawing from that which has been once received." And more extensively by St. Vincent of Lerins, in the whole of ch.12, where among other things he says: "Terrible strictness: to assert the tenacity of the first faith he spared neither himself nor the rest of his fellow apostles. It is too little, even if an angel, etc." Therefore if the first doctrine preached to the English, and by them faithfully accepted, was divine, defection from it could not be transfer to another true faith, but is rather perversion and troubling of the faith.

2. Also Jerome elegantly notes (and it is very much to be considered for the doctrine following) that these things were said by Paul about those who believed in the same God and had the same Scriptures and yet were interpreting them by their own spirit and so were trying to introduce a new Gospel, or to change it, reject it, and convert it to another one. "But they were not able," says Jerome, "because its nature was of the sort that it could not be other than the true one." And he subjoins: "Everyone who interprets the Gospel in another spirit and mind than has been written troubles the believers and overturns the Gospel of Christ so that what is in front is behind and what is behind is in front." Finally Chrysostom, being moved, as appears, by a spirit indeed divine, and gazing at the cause, as if present, of the schism and the state of the Anglican Church, bids us take note, saying: "Let them hear what Paul says, namely that they subverted the Church who brought in some very few things. For, to show that something trifling wrongly admixed corrupts the whole, he said that the Gospel was subverted. For as he who from a royal coin has cut off a little of the imprinted image has adulterated the coin, so whoever subverts even the smallest part of sound faith is corrupted in the whole of it, proceeding always from this beginning to what is worse. Where, then, are those who condemn us as contentious because we have quarrel with heretics, and who keep on saying that there is no difference between us and them, and that the discord proceeds from ambition for principality?" Such, then, is the way that the most serene king of England, or others who profess his schism and sect, corrupt the Catholic Faith that was flourishing before in the kingdom – lest they should say it is in small things, or few things, or in very little things that they have fallen away, or lest they should plead in excuse that the discord is a human one about ambition for principality. For by whatever cause, in however small a thing, they have parted from the doctrine of the faith, they have troubled and lost the whole Catholic Faith. All the more so because it is not in few things, nor in very little things, but in the greatest foundations of the Faith, as will soon be made clear, that they have deviated. Let it therefore be a thing fixed and manifest that, if the English Faith up to the defection of Henry VIII was Catholic, the sect which from that time it professes is not the true faith but is a troubling and corruption of the Catholic Faith. And these things seem to be enough for the first horn [sc. of the dilemma], for the thing is both per se sufficiently clear and evident and, as far as I can conjecture from the words of the king, both he and other Protestants think the other part is to be preferred.

3. They plead, then, this striking reason as excuse for their defection. Before the king's times, that is Henry's, 8th of that name, England had lost the Catholic Faith and hence did not, on account of the change made by Henry, err at all in the Faith but rather then returned to it; and Henry's offense was the salvation of the English because through it, or on occasion of it, they were enlightened and rescued from the darkness in which they were dwelling. For neither was there lacking one of those false prophets (from a Calvinist, in a book on Henry's marriage published in London, 1573) who after this manner exclaimed: "O true marriage, union gained not without divine approval, and heavenly birth and offspring, by which the fatherland was rescued and freed from a slavery and gloom worse than the Egyptian, and recalled to the true cult of Christ." For so great is the infirmity of the human mind that, once abandoned by God and handed over to its own desires, it calls darkness light and light darkness and persuades itself that the light of Gospel truth shone forth among the basest pleasures, and (what is most absurd) attributes an unspeakable marriage to a peculiar divine providence. For in those words are all these errors contained. And one may besides conjecture from the same words that there had already by then been introduced among many in England this opinion about their ancient Faith, that it was false and not Catholic.

4. However this error can be refuted in the first place by the testimony of the same Henry VIII, which testimony must possess authority with the king of England if he wishes to speak consistently and defend with any authority the primacy which he is usurping. For Henry himself, when already dying, wanted and commanded his son Edward, whom he left as his heir, to be educated in the Catholic Faith, with the one exception of the article about the primacy. But by the Catholic Faith he undoubtedly understood the faith which he himself and his kingdom had, along with the Roman Church, before professed. For he always called this Catholic, nor could his words be referred to another faith. That king declared, therefore, and confirmed by his own confession, that the faith which in former times England professed was the Catholic one. Why then does the king of England in the article about primacy so freely and stubbornly follow his predecessor, and in the remaining articles, in which Henry confessed Catholic truth, refuse to imitate him? But if perhaps he reply that he received his sect from his educators from the cradle, at least let him confess that it must be new and recent; from which fact is also easily concluded that it cannot be Catholic but is rather a defection from the Catholic Faith. However, we will pursue this topic more at large in what follows; now let it suffice to have shown that those who give their trust to Henry in the article about the primacy, but detest and refuse his confession of the Catholic Faith, have adopted their opinions without foundation and without consistency.

5. But let us see further in what sense they fashion the idea that the English Faith before Henry VIII was not Catholic. For it can be thought of in two ways. One is that at the beginning indeed the Catholic Faith was preached in England and at the time of Gregory was also received, but that it was afterwards corrupted and lost; the other way, however, if anyone think it, will be that, in the very preaching by Augustine of the faith, a doctrine of faith was delivered to the English that was already corrupted and far different from the Catholic and Apostolic Faith; but we will show that each of this ways is unbelievable. And, to begin with, if England was Catholic already in the time of Gregory, he who says that it changed before Henry must show at what time the change took place, under which king and which Roman Pontiff, or under what English prelates; and again in what things or articles change was made; but nothing of this has with any mark of truth or probability hitherto been shown or can be shown; by this very fact, then, such an assertion must be rejected as willful and rash and injurious to the kingdom.

Next, if that be attentively considered which Bede and other English histories relate, no schism or heresy will be found which, after Gregory, took hold of the whole race. Nay, no change or variety is read of in all those things which the new heretics now detest. For, as will be clear from what is to be said, there was the same religion of the sacraments, the same faith and veneration of the sacred Eucharist, the same cult of the Saints and use of sacred images, and, what is chief, the same obedience and subjection to the Apostolic See; what defection, therefore, from the Catholic Faith can be contrived which through all that time existed in England? Lastly, since England from that time had always professed the same faith as the Roman Church (for no one can deny this who has read the ecclesiastical histories), the same island could not have lost the Catholic Faith without the Roman Church also having lost it; for each had the same faith. But we will show a little later that the Roman Church did not defect after Gregory from the Catholic Faith, nay it could not at all defect from it; therefore neither was there in the English Church a change then made in the Catholic Faith.

6. It remains for them to say, then, that although England did not change the faith from the time of Gregory up to Henry VIII nevertheless it was not at that time Catholic, because the faith preached by Augustine and other ministers of Gregory was not Catholic. From this it follows that, before Henry VIII, the Catholic Faith was never in England, at least in that part of Britain which did not receive the light of the Gospel until Gregory. Which conviction indeed, as far as I can conjecture, is not abhorrent from the faith, or opinion, of King James, for he lays down in his Preface principles and foundations with which this opinion seems to be very much consonant. For there the whole doctrine of the faith, which the Roman Church embraced after the five hundredth year from Christ, he thinks and tries to persuade others was uncertain and suspect. For, on page 43, he says: "Whatever in the four hundred years after Christ the Fathers established by unanimous consent as necessary for eternal salvation, I either think the same along with them or at any rate, with modest silence, I hold my peace; certainly I do not dare to reprehend them." In which words, while on the Fathers of the first four hundred years only does he bestow something of authority, the whole more recent doctrine he holds as suspect, and (which is something to be wondered at) he does not accommodate his faith even to those most ancient Fathers when they speak with unanimous consent but only dares not to reprehend them; all the others, therefore, who flourished in later centuries, even if they establish with unanimous consent something about a matter necessary for salvation, he will dare to reprehend, not to say doubt, their faith. Then, on page 47, he adds that not everything the Roman Church taught before the five hundredth year from Christ as to be de fide believed is to be held for the faith. Hence arises, therefore, a strong suspicion that James will not find it difficult to admit that the faith sown by Augustine in England was not pure and Catholic, but that it was with some deformities, nay with things which he calls recent and new, admixed. For since he himself thinks that from the five hundredth year from Christ the Roman Faith began to become defective and to be mingled with false dogmas, and since the preaching of Augustine in England began in the five hundredth and eighty second year after Christ, according to Bede, bk.1 of his History, ch.23, what wonder if he concede or reply that the faith preached by Augustine was neither pure nor altogether Catholic?

7. But how many and how pernicious are the dogmas contained in this manner of response or evasion we will try to demonstrate from higher principles of faith in what follows, but now, continuing the discourse begun, we must show that that response is alien to all reason, and contrary to the most received histories, and shameful and injurious to the English people themselves, and finally that it is a most grave imposture on Gregory and Augustine. But first let us suppose that the aforesaid faith was altogether true, pure, and Catholic in the other part of Britain long before the times of Gregory, and that it persevered there for many years. Which I do not think either the king of England or any of his ministers will deny. Because from the time of Eleutherius [175-89AD] and up the four hundredth or five hundredth year of Christ, even the king himself thinks that in the Roman Church the true faith of Christ was preserved pure and unwavering. Since, therefore, that part of Britain received the faith through Eleutherius, was in communion always with the Roman Church in the faith, and resisted the heresies that rose up against it, especially the Arian and Pelagian, as the same Bede relates in several chapters, it is most evident that the British faith in that part and at that time was Catholic. And of this truth we have, besides Gildas, Bede, and other historiographers, very ancient witnesses: Tertullian, close in time to Eleutherius, who in his book Contra Iudaeos, ch.7, places among the provinces of the Catholic Church and among kingdoms professing the true faith of Christ “the places of the Britons not reached by the Romans but subject to Christ;” and Chrysostom, who in vol.5, In Demonstratione Contra Gentiles, ‘Quod Christus sit Deus’, column 14, when he too is describing the extent of the Catholic Church, says: “For the British Isles too, situated beyond this sea [sc. the Mediterranean] and which are in the Ocean itself, have felt the virtue of the word, for even there churches are founded and altars erected,” and vol. 3, in his sermon for Pentecost, Hodie Nobis, etc. Likewise, describing the sanctity of the Catholic Church, he numbers Britain among other provinces and says: “But in Britain before this they as often feasted on human flesh, and now they mortify their souls with fasting.”

8. On this basis, therefore, I draw the following conclusion: the faith preached in England under Gregory was neither contrary to nor diverse from that which was preached to the British under Eleutherius; just as the first, then, was Catholic so also was the later, because in truth it was not in itself first or later but one and the same, which more quickly or more slowly came to occupy the diverse parts of that island. Of which thing the fullest witness is Bede, in the said bk.1, Hist. Anglicanae, ch.22, when, referring to the corrupt morals of the British faithful, he says among other things: “Moreover, among other deeds of unmentionable crimes which their historian Gildas describes in his tearful sermon, he also adds this, that they never committed to preaching the word of faith to the race of Saxons or Angles inhabiting Britain along with them. But yet divine piety did not desert his people whom he foreknew, but rather he arranged more worthy heralds of the truth for the afore mentioned race through whom it might believe.” And immediately, ch.23, he starts to narrate the providence of Gregory in sending Augustine with his colleagues to preach the faith to the Angles, and in ch.26 he asserts that those preachers not only taught the apostolic doctrine but also imitated their life. “They began,” he says, “to imitate the life of the primitive Church, namely by serving with constant prayers, vigils, and fastings, and by preaching the word of life to whom they could, and by spurning all things of this world as though alien, etc.” And later: “Many believed and were baptized, marveling at the simplicity of innocent life and the sweetness of heavenly doctrine.” And later he subjoins that many began daily to flock together to hear the word and, abandoning their gentile rites, “joined themselves by accepting the faith to the unity of the holy Church of Christ.” From this narration of Bede, therefore, one should confess that the same Catholic Faith was preached to the Angles as had first been delivered to the British, and that thus the island was joined in oneness of faith both with itself and with other Christian peoples to the unity of the Church.

9. Besides, from the things about the manner of the Christian religion in each race, place, and time that are related in the same histories or that are per se manifest, it is plain that there was between both preachings no diversity of doctrine. For, in the first place, it is held as a thing proven that the dogmas of the faith, which the Protestants themselves and the king of England along with them call ancient, which were contained in the three creeds and were explained and defined in the four first Councils, were preached with complete faith and truth by Augustine and his companions, for Gregory decreed at that same time that the four General Councils, just like the four books of the Gospels, were to be received and venerated, to which Councils he also adds the Fifth, in bk.1 Epistolarum, epist.24. Nor do the English Protestants themselves, who glory in this ancient faith and profess that they retain it (which, how true it be, we shall afterwards see), possess it from anywhere else than from Gregory and his minister Augustine, through the tradition and continuous succession of their faithful predecessors; so about these dogmas there is, as far as concerns the present, no controversy.

But as to the other dogmas that they themselves now find fault with in the Roman Catholic Church, as the sacrifice of the Mass, altars, churches built in honor of the Saints, veneration of relics, invocation of the Saints, use of holy images, obedience and subjection to the Roman Church, we as gladly admit that these dogmas were believed and observed in England from the times of Gregory as they themselves are unable to deny that they were believed and observed in Britain from the times of Eleutherius; therefore either let them deny that the faith originally preached in England was Catholic or let them cease to accuse or repudiate as less Catholic the faith introduced by Augustine. The proof for this proposed equivalence is, in the first place, that Bede, in the said ch.26, reports that there was a church built in honor of St. Martin in England in ancient times while the Romans were still inhabiting Britain, namely before the preaching of Augustine, and after that he subjoins: "In this church, therefore, the Britons first themselves began to meet, sing psalms, pray, have masses, preach, and baptize until, when the king had been converted to the faith, they received a greater license for preaching everywhere and for building and restoring churches." And in ch.33 he relates that Augustine dedicated and consecrated a certain church previously built there by the efforts of the ancient Roman faithful, and that, on the encouragement of the same Augustine, a church was built to the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, which his successor Laurentius consecrated.

Now Gildas likewise seems to have described the ancient faith and Christian religion of Britain in his history and his little work De Excidio Britanniae, where in column 4, speaking of the time after the death of Diocletian, he thus writes: "They renew churches that had been destroyed to the ground, they found, construct, and complete basilicas to the holy martyrs and everywhere stake them out like signs of victory, they celebrate feast days, they offer sacrifices with pure heart and lips, they all exult as sons in the common bosom of the Church as in the bosom of a mother." And later, column 8, speaking of the time of a certain persecution, he says: "The result was that by massed battering rams all the colonies and all the inhabitants, along with the chiefs of the Church and the people, ... were strewn on the ground." And later: "And the sacred altars seemed to be dismembered corpses covered in scabs of purple blood as if mixed in a certain horrible wine press." And a little later he again makes mention of the "sacred altar" which he calls "the seat of the heavenly sacrifice." And later he deplores the fact that at the time of the persecution there were not heard the praises of God, "the songs of the novices of Christ with sweetly singing voice, nor the church melodies;" and a little later, column 13, he makes mention of marriages, which he calls “illicit” because they were “made after monastic vow.” And finally at the end of that book he numbers in the ecclesiastical order “bishops, priests, and other clerics,” whom indeed in another work, about the correction of ecclesiastics, he gravely rebukes for their morals, although he very greatly honors their state; and among the rebukes he lists, “rarely sacrificing, and rarely with pure heart standing at the altars.” And later he distinguishes various ecclesiastical grades, especially of bishops and priests, and gravely rebukes them, “who do not have their priesthood from the apostles or the successors of the apostles but buy it from tyrants.” All which things agree with the words that I referred to above from Chrysostom, wherein he relates that in his time there were in Britain churches founded and altars erected. All of this makes manifest how the faith and religion of that time were consonant with what existed at the time of Gregory and which now we observe in the Roman Church; and, conversely, how discrepant from it is the religion which now exists in England – not a reformed religion (as they themselves say), but rather in truth a deformed one, which does not have the heavenly sacrifice or does not receive it in faith, destroys altars, detests priests, and does not admit of temples dedicated in honor of the Saints. Therefore this religion is new and a human invention; but the faith preached in England as well under Gregory as under Eleutherius was true and Catholic, and always persisted up to the aforesaid fall of king Henry.

10. We can confirm this additionally from how that faith was delivered and made convincing to England by Augustine and his companions. For, in the first place, the life of those preachers was as much like the apostolic life as it was different from the new sectaries and their morals; for the first followed a religious life which the latter detest; they celebrated masses and sacrifices, these flee them as a demonic pretense; they served with constant vigils and fastings and spurned all things of this world, as Bede says, but these, given over to the pleasures of the body, seek nothing other than human honor. Bede then says: “They came endowed not with demonic but with divine virtue, bearing a silver cross for banner before them, an image of the Lord Savior painted on a panel, singing litanies for their own eternal salvation and for the salvation of those to whom they came, making supplication unto the Lord.” And with these divine arms, rather than with human ones, in a brief time they brought the king, along with his kingdom, to the unity of the Church and the obedience of the Apostolic See.

Next Bede adds that this was not perfected without many miracles; for he speaks in ch.26 thus: “And when the king was delighted with the most pure life of the saints and with their most sweet promises, which they confirmed to be true with display also of many miracles, he believed and was baptized...” And in ch.31 he relates that so many and so great were the signs performed by Augustine, “that the Pontiff Gregory, lest through the abundance of miracles Augustine run into the danger of pride, exhorted him by a special letter he sent to him.” This letter is 58, bk.9, indict.4, where, among other things, Gregory adds these, which make very much to our purpose: “I know that Almighty God has through your love shown great miracles among the people whom he wished to be his elect, hence may you in the same divine gift rejoice in fear and fear in rejoicing.” Again, bk.2, ch.2, Bede relates that Augustine, in confirmation of the faith, restored sight to a blind man, and later in ch.7 about Melitus, third archbishop of Canterbury after Augustine, added the remarkable miracle of extinguishing a furious fire; and Polydore, bk.4, records about the same archbishop (whom he calls Miletus) that: “when he had well shown many miracles and had begun to be archbishop for the fourth year, he passed from this life to heaven.” Whose thinking, then, could it come into that a faith approved by the sanctity of an apostolic life, and approved by remarkable and not a few miracles, and preached with so much fruit and efficacy of speech, was not Catholic? Or who would dare think, much less say, that all Christians, religious and apostolic men, and even kings, who were sometimes famed for miracles (as about Edward II Polydore relates, bk.8, not far from the end), who, I say, could believe that all these lacked the Catholic Faith and thence did not attain eternal salvation? Because entry to eternal glory is opened to no one without true faith; but a faith which is not Catholic is not true. Or who could presume with any prudence to put the sect invented by Luther, Calvin, and similar men, which was confirmed by no signs or miracles nor graced by probity of life, before the ancient faith and, by comparison with it, call it Catholic? Let king James, therefore, see what reason he will give for his faith when that faith has been strictly examined, whether he is a defender of the Catholic Faith or rather an attacker of it.

11. Finally in the last place I will not omit another reason that I will use to confirm the same things and to show that the faith introduced in England by the preaching of Augustine was true and Catholic. For if it was not Catholic, there was surely no Catholic Faith at that time in the world, or at least there was not then a faith about which one could be certain whether it was Catholic or not. Hence it turns out as a result that there was not then in the world a doctrine which men who wished to be saved could with full certitude of mind and with firm deliberation choose, embrace, and retain as divine and as delivered entire by Christ the Lord. But all these assertions have the ring of such impiety and bear before them such absurdity that, if they be admitted, the doctrine from which such dogmas follow needs no other assault; for in these assertions it sufficiently betrays its error and impiety. What remains, then, is for us to prove the consequence, which will not be difficult for anyone who considers that there was not then in the world any doctrine of faith in which as many testimonies and signs of truth, of antiquity, and of perpetual succession from the preaching of the apostles concurred as in that which Augustine preached in England. For his faith was none other than the Roman Faith, which was published throughout the whole world, and, having been received in it, was then still enduring; therefore if that faith was not Catholic, there was assuredly no Catholic Faith in the world. And lastly, this very fact is directly proved from the confession of the king himself, because he glories in his sect as if in the Catholic Faith. For he must as a result confess that no other faith, diverse from his sect, is Catholic, because the true and Catholic Faith is a single one only, as Paul testifies, Ephesians, ch.4. Therefore the faith that existed before Henry VIII cannot be deemed Catholic by the sectaries, because at that time the present sect of England, which they proclaim to be Catholic and hence true and sole, did not exist in the world. Now this most weighty reason brings, indeed, to the fore the foundation of our faith; but because it is mocked especially by the adversaries in two ways, therefore was there need with an extended defense to make it firm and fortified against the subterfuges of the heretics.

Chapter 3: That the Church of Christ cannot lose the true faith is shown, and confirmation of the reason given.

Summary: 1. Presentation of the error of the heretics who assert that the faith can fail in the whole Church. 2. This error was familiar to the old heretics. Lucifer in the work of Jerome. The Donatists on the evidence of Augustine. 3. From the testimonies of Sacred Scripture it is proved that the faith will never be lacking in the Church. A first supposition is that the Church is one. 4. The perpetual endurance of the unity of the Church is established. 5. Testimony first from Matthew 16 and the expositions of the Fathers. In Sacred Scripture the presence of God imports the idea of help. 6. Distinction between the comings of Christ and of the Holy Spirit. 7. The conclusion to the truth proposed is drawn. The Church would cease to exist were the faith lost. 8. Two objections by heretics. The response of St. Augustine. 9. That the faith did not fail in the whole Synagogue is demonstrated; satisfaction is made to the first objection. 10. That at the time of Antichrist the faith will endure in the Church is demonstrated; satisfaction is made to the second objection.

1. In the previous chapter we reached the result by course of reasoning that either the Anglican sect is not the Catholic Faith but a defection from it, or conversely that before that sect arose the Catholic Faith must necessarily be agreed to have failed in the world; and hence that King James is compelled either to give up the title of Defender of the Catholic Faith or to affirm that from the five hundredth year of Christ, or some other similar year, up to the rise of Luther, Calvin, or someone or other of that sort, the world lacked the Catholic Faith. The authors of the new dogmas, therefore, seeing the force of the aforesaid discourse, have not been afraid to say that before them the true and pure faith did fail in the Universal Church of God, and that they were in an extraordinary way sent by God to restore the destroyed faith. So is it related by Luther in his Latina Colloquia, vol.2, ch. on the Fathers, and Calvin, bk.4, Instit., chs.2 & 3, Melancthon, Bullinger, and others.

And, so far as I can gather from the book of King James, he is himself not averse to this opinion and puts his faith in those innovators, or some of them, or certainly in himself as a new evangelist. For in his Preface p.33, before he relates some private facts about certain of his predecessors, he begins with these words: "So that it may hence be clear to all that even in those centuries, when a grosser and blinder ignorance brooded over the world, the kings of England not only did not bear the ambitioned and swelling tyranny of the Pontiffs but also mightily resisted it." Which words, as far as they have regard to the question of the Primacy, will be expounded in the third book; now I will only consider that part of it in which he professes that, before his new gospel, the world was blind in knowledge of the truth. From which principle he later infers, page 47, that the doctors of the Roman Church (for about them he is undoubtedly speaking) "corrupted theology with a new rationale of disputing and philosophizing." But in another place of the same Preface, addressing Christian princes, he subjoins: "With Paul I wish that you all become in this one thing such as I also am, in the first place that you should wish to peruse the Scriptures, to seek from them the norm of faith, and to position, not on the uncertain opinions of others, but on your own sure knowledge of them, the foundations of faith." In which words he plainly sets up his very self as the living rule of his own faith; for although he attributes something to the body, so to say, of Scripture or to its letter, yet the sense, which is its soul, he reserves to himself and to his private intelligence, which he calls sure knowledge. And therefore I said that he puts his faith in himself as a new evangelist, holding in contempt and repudiating as false the doctrine of the Roman Church.

2. It is, to be sure, not a new thing for men who defect from the Catholic Faith to wish to cover or excuse their lapse with accusations against the Universal Church. St. Jerome in his dialogue against the Luciferians reports that Lucifer asserted "the whole world is the devil's" and that it was a familiar thing with him to say that "a brothel has been made of the Church." Augustine too, in epist.48 and his book De Unit. Eccles., chs.12 & 13 and very often, reprehends this fault in the Donatists, and in heretics more generally on Psalms 101, sermon 2, saying: "But there exist those who say, 'This has already happened;' the Church in all the nations replies thereto, 'all nations have believed in it.' 'But that Church, which was composed of all nations, no longer exists; it has perished.' Such do those assert," says Augustine, "who are not in it. O impudent voice: it exists not because you are not in it! Look lest you for that reason do not exist, for it will exist even if you do not. This abominable and detestable voice, full of presumption and falsity, supported on no truth, illuminated by no wisdom, flavored with no salt, vain, rash, hasty, pernicious, was foreseen by the Spirit of God, and against them as it were, when that Spirit announced the unity of peoples and kingdoms in coming together into one to serve the Lord, etc.” In like manner Tertullian, bk. De Praescriptionibus Adversus Haereticos, ch.7, notes this pretext of heretics too, and attacks it, and among other things laughs at it thus, ch.29: “Whatever be the error, as long as heresy does not err, so long certainly will error reign. Truth, needing to be set free, was waiting for some Marcionists and Valentinians (Lutherans, I add, or Calvinists); meanwhile the Gospel was preached wrongly, it was believed wrongly, so many thousands of thousands were baptized wrongly, so many works of faith were administered wrongly, so many virtues, so many charisms, were performed wrongly, so many priesthoods, so many ministries, were fulfilled wrongly, so many martyrdoms, finally, were crowned wrongly?” Nothing surely could be more aptly said for confounding the preachers of the new Gospel; yet it will not suffice, unless they be refuted also by the divine word.

3. In order, then, to refute this error from Sacred Scripture, as that Scripture was understood by the ancient Fathers, we suppose, to begin with, that the discussion is about the Universal Church of Christ, which Christ himself promised to found in a special way, and much more excellently than the way the Church was before his coming, Matthew 16.18: “Upon this rock I will build my Church,” and afterwards he fulfilled his promise, gathering it together little by little and later acquiring it by his blood, Acts 20.28, and finally commending it to Peter in these words: “Feed my sheep,” John 21.15-17, and giving command to the apostles that they should gather it together from all nations, saying: “Teach all nations, baptizing them, etc.” Matthew 28.19. But this Church is only one; for only one was promised by Christ, when he said “my Church,” because although the sheep are many, yet the flock is one, and one is the fold, and one the pastor, namely Christ in heaven and Peter and his See on earth, to whom Christ commended all his sheep, although there be many bishops as co-helpers, “whom the Holy Spirit has placed for ruling [alt. feeding] the Church,” namely the one Church, Acts 20.28. And therefore does the Apostle commend this unity, Ephesians 4.3: “Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; One Lord, one faith, one baptism.” And later he says that all the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and doctors of the Church have, v.12, been given “for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ.” Which is no other than the Church, as the same Paul expounds in chapter 1 of the same epistle, saying v.22: “and gave him to be the head over all things to the Church, which is his body,” and Colossians 1.18: “And he is the head of the body, the Church.” And later, v.24: “for his body’s sake, which is the Church,” and in 1 Corinthians 12 he most elegantly describes the way this body is composed from its various members, and finally he concludes, v.27: “Now ye are the body of Christ, and members from member,” as the Latins expound it, that is, members connected together and ordered, just as in one body one member is adapted to another, or, as the Greeks read, “members in particular,” that is, you are not a complete body (for he was speaking to a particular church), and for that reason you are not all the members, but in particular or in part. Hence Augustine writes most correctly, De Unit. Ecclesiae, ch.2: “The Church is one, which our ancestors named Catholic, so as to indicate it from its very name, because it exists throughout the whole.” And later: “The whole totality that is asserted of Christ is head and body; the head is himself, the only-begotten Jesus Christ, Son of the Living God; his body is the Church, of which it is said [Ephesians 5.27] ‘that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, etc.’” Jerome too, against the Luciferians, makes this unity of the Church plain through Noah’s Ark, which was a type of the Church, as is taken from 1 Peter. Nor do we on this point, as I reckon, have any controversy with the sectaries, and therefore we believe that, as far as is required by what follows, what has been said is sufficient for us to make this supposition; for an exact explication of this unity and of all the members of the Church, in which explication the heretics are wont to disagree with Catholics, demands a longer treatment, but such a treatment is not necessary for our present intention.

4. I lay down, as a second point, that this Church will endure in its unity right up to the Day of Judgment. For we are speaking of the Church Militant, since of the Church Triumphant no place for doubt or controversy remains. And this assertion could easily be proved of the Church as it was from the beginning of the world up to Moses, and of the Synagogue as it was from Moses up to Christ; but these things are not necessary for our intention, and therefore as to what is said about the duration of the Synagogue, and also the testimonies of the Old Testament, we pass them over. I am speaking, then, of the Church of Christ as I have shown it to have been founded in the New Testament by him. And thus what remains is to prove this property of the Church from the promises made by the same Christ in the New Testament.

5. Now there are of this sort chiefly three promises. The first is Matthew 16.18: "Upon this rock I will build my Church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." For in these words Christ promised to his Church stability and firmness, against which neither tyrants, nor heretics, nor any other enemies of Christ could prevail. For these are all understood by the Fathers in 'the gates of hell'. But Jerome in particular on that place: "Vices and sins, and the doctrines of heretics he understood by those 'gates';" the same also on Isaiah 26, and almost the same is said by Ambrose, in his book De Bono Mortis, ch.12: "It is given to Peter that the gates of hell will not prevail against him; those gates of hell are earthly gates;" and later: "They are the gates of crimes." But Epiphanius, in Anchorato, whom Eutymius follows on Matthew, understands the blasphemies of heretics and their persecutions against the Church; Chrysostom, on Isaiah ch.2, and homil.4, on ch.6, and homil. De Expulsione Sua, and in the other one cited above, De Festo Pentecostes, and In Demonstratione, 'Quod Christus sit Deus,' always expounds it of tyrants and infidel emperors attacking the Church through their power. But the same, on Psalms 147, at the end, rightly explains it of the whole power of hell, and of all ministers that the devil uses to attack the Church. And this sense is without doubt the truest, because the words are absolute, and under 'gates' is comprehended, as if by metonymy, everything that hell contains. Hence Damascene says very well in orat. De Transfigur. Domini: "Against it the gates of hell, the mouths of heretics, the instruments of demons, will indeed launch attack, but they will not prevail." And later: "For we are totally confident that never will it happen that it should be overthrown, since Christ affirmed it." And for the same opinion, Eusebius, bk.1, De Praeparat. Evangelica, ch.3, asserts: "The Church, endowed with this name by Christ, planted roots, and, glorified to the stars by the prayers of saints, shines with the light and brightness of the orthodox faith, nor does it turn its back to enemies, nor does it yield to the doors themselves of death, because of those few words which he pronounced: 'Upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it'." In a like way Ambrose, in orat. Unum esse, Christum, having set forth the words of Christ cited, says: "Faithful is the speech, the promise unfailing, the Church a thing unconquered, even if hell itself be stirred up, and if those who are in hell make the princes of the world a tumult of darkness." Lastly Augustine, bk.1, De Symbolo, ch.6, explaining the article 'holy Church' says that the Church is the temple of God, of which the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 3.17: "For the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are," and he subjoins: "It is the holy Church, the one Church, the true Church, the Catholic Church, fighting against all heresies. It is able to fight; it is not able to be defeated. All heresies die out of it as useless twigs from a pruned vine; but it remains in its root, in its vine, in its charity. The gates of hell will not overcome it.” Nay, adds Hilary, canon.16 on Matthew, by these words not only is it promised to the Church that it cannot be conquered, but also “that it should destroy the infernal laws, and the gates of tartarus, and all the bars of death;” so that the gates of hell not only cannot stand against the Church so as to defeat it, but they are not even sufficient to stand against it. For as the same Fathers frequently note, the Church is by the persecutions of tyrants enlarged in number of persons and in merit of sanctity, and by the contradiction of heretics it increases in knowledge, and is more enlightened in recognition of truths.

The second promise of Christ the Lord was Matthew 28.20: “And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.” About which Jerome rightly noted: “He who promises his presence unto the end of the world shows also that they will always be victorious and that he will never depart from among believers.” It is clear, therefore, that the promise was not made only to the apostles present, or to the disciples, but to the perpetually enduring temple of the Church, of which Paul said: “which temple ye are.” Hence wisely did Augustine say, bk.6, De Gen. ad Litteram, ch.8: “He spoke to all those whom he saw would be his own: ‘Lo, I am with you.’” Therefore perpetuity for the Church is either supposed in those words or also promised to it. For, in order that we might be secure, Christ promised his presence, that is, his help and protection, as Jerome also explains about Isaiah 41 and Zechariah 2; and Augustine, tract.50 on John, says: “According to his majesty, according to his providence, according to his ineffable and invisible grace, what was said by him said is fulfilled: ‘Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.’” And Pope Leo, epist.31: “Divine protection will not leave his Church, says the Lord: ‘Lo, I am with you, etc.,’” and epist.92 at the beginning: “Confirming the preachers of the Gospel and the ministers of the sacraments, he says: ‘Lo, I am with you.’” And in the same way was this place understood by Chrysostom, homil.91 on Matthew, by Bede, and by other expositors on that place, and by Prosper, bk.2 De Vocatione Gentium, ch.2. And it is a customary locution in the Scriptures that by the presence of God is signified protection and singular help, Acts 7.9: “And God was with him,” alluding to that verse of Wisdom 10.14: “He descended with him into the pit;” and of Jeremiah 1.8: “Be not afraid of their faces: for I am with thee.”

6. The third promise, finally, is like the preceding two, for as there he promised his peculiar favor, even according to his humanity, so in John 14 he promises the peculiar presence of the Holy Spirit and of the Father along with his own, saying, v.16-17: “And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth.” In which words is this among other things much to be noted, that the promise was not made only to the apostles. For although one could also undersand that the Holy Spirit remained perpetually in the persons of the apostles after they had received him, yet Christ does not there promise this only, but also that the Holy Spirit was to be sent to console, teach, and protect the faithful, so that he would not depart anymore from the Church for ever, that is, as long as the world will last (for this is the usual significance of that word in Scripture). Hence he tacitly points to a difference between his advent and the advent of the Holy Spirit, because he came to found the Church, which he was going to acquire with his blood, being after his death to depart from it; but the Holy Spirit was given to the Church so as to remain always in it. Which fact seems to be noted by Chrysostom, homil.74, on John, when he says: “This signifies that neither does he depart after death.” And so was this promise understood by Cyril, bk.9, on John, ch.45, when he says: “Although the Lord ascended to the heavens after he rose from the dead so as, according to Paul, to be present with God for us, yet he promises to be present with the faithful always through his Spirit.” And Tertullian in the same way, in Praescriptionibus, ch.38.

Nay, that the gift of the Holy Spirit was thus fulfilled is taught openly by Paul, Ephesians 4, where he first says, v.8, that Christ, ascending on high, gave gifts to men, but afterwards adds, v.11-13: “And he gave some apostles; and some prophets; and some evangelists; and some pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.” In which testimony are accurately expounded the words, “till we all come.” For in them Paul openly teaches that the Church is built into the body of Christ and is governed by various ministries and graces of the Holy Spirit, and is to remain up to the general resurrection and the perfecting of the saints. On account of these testimonies all the ancient Fathers agree in this dogma of the faith, as is clearly proved by those mentioned, to whom can be added Martialis, epist. Ad Burdegal., ch.11, and Cyprian, epist.55, Ad Cornel. Athanasius says in orat. Quod unus sit Christus: “The Church is a thing unconquered, even if hell itself be stirred up.” Lastly, Augustine, expounding about the Church the words of Psalms 47 [48].8: “God will establish it for ever,” says: “But perhaps that city which holds up the world will sometime be overthrown. God forbid. God has established it forever. If therefore God has established it forever, why do you fear lest the firm foundation fall?”

7. We can proceed from these last words of Augustine to conclude, on the basis of the foundations stated, to the chief assertion and to demonstrate the truth we intended, namely that the Catholic and Universal Church cannot defect from the true and divine faith. For the firm foundation and the form, as it were, that joins together the members of this Church, both with themselves and with Christ, is the faith; if therefore God has established the Church forever, who may fear that the faith of it could fail in the whole of it? For if the whole Church were to lose the faith, it would by that very fact cease to be the Church, and would start being the Synagogue of Satan. Just as the gentiles are outside the Church, because they did not accept the faith, heretics too, by the very fact that they lose the faith, cease to be in the Church, and for that reason they are compared in this respect to the gentiles by Jerome, Dial. contra Luciferian., at the beginning. Finally this truth is sufficiently confirmed by the Apostles’ and Nicean Creeds, in which the king of England professes to put his faith. For these creeds teach that the Church must be believed to be one, holy, and Catholic; but it cannot be one without unity of faith, nor holy without true and divine faith (in the absence of which it is impossible to please God), nor Catholic without universal faith, because it embraces all true dogmas. Since therefore the Church cannot cease to exist as long as the world lasts, and since it cannot exist without at the same time being faithful and holy, neither can it chance to defect from the true faith.

8. But adversaries are wont to object many things against the stability of the Catholic Church in the faith, and to take in review various lapses or defections of the Church. They do so both because at the time of the Old Law the whole Church defected from the faith when the Synagogue adored the calf, Exodus 32, and also because the Church will be utterly overthrown when the persecution of Antichrist is waxing strong, as Paul says, 2 Thessalonians, 2.3: “Except there come a falling away first, etc.,” and Christ, Luke 18.8: “When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?” From which the heretics wish to collect that it could then fail, because then the Antichrist has come. To whom we will with Augustine respond in one word: “I believe those things that are read in the Sacred Scriptures; I do not believe those things that are said by vain heretics.” For so he responded to the Donatists, bk. De Unitate Ecclesiae, ch.13, who were saying that in their time the whole world was apostate, and that in them alone did the true faith remain; and they used various examples twisted from Scripture which Augustine meets by saying that he believes those things that are read in the Scriptures, not those things that heretics try to prove by their contentions, and he concludes: “They, therefore, acting either without skill or deceitfully, collect from the Scriptures such things as they find said either about the bad, who are mixed in with the good up to the end, or about the devastation of the earlier people of the Jews, and they wish to turn them against the Church of God so that it may seem as if it has failed and perished from the whole world.”

9. Of this sort certainly are the things that the sectaries of the present day object. For the sin of the Jewish people pertains to the corrupt morals and hardness of that people, not to the defection of the Church; both because the Synagogue was not the Church of Christ, about which we are treating; and also because what was then in the world was not the Universal Church, for in the uncircumcision there could also then be some faithful and just; and most of all because it is false that then everyone among that people lost the faith. For in the first place Moses and Joshua were altogether free of the guilt, and second, although Aaron gravely sinned by cooperating with the people in the sin of idolatry, yet it is far more likely that in the faith he did not err. For never did Moses rebuke him for this sin but only of another, as is clear from the words, Exodus 32.21: “What did this people unto thee, that thou has brought so great a sin upon them?” And the same is openly supposed by Augustine, q. 141 on Exodus, when he says: “The fact that Aaron bids them take off the earrings from the ears of their wives and daughters, out of which he was to make gods for them, is not absurdly taken to mean that he wished to prescribe difficult things so that he might in this way call them back from their intention.” For, if this is so, it beomes plain that Aaron did not sin from infidelity but because he did not bravely resist the people and, from too much human fear, yielded to them. Finally, that many of the people persisted in the faith is clear from the words of Moses, v.26: “Who is on the Lord’s side? Let him come unto me;” for only he is on the Lord’s side who believes in him; but there were many found of this sort, who came to Moses to avenge the injury done to God.

10. Likewise, it is a thing plainly false and full of error that the Church will perish at some point, or altogether defect at the time of Antichrist. For although there will then be that great tribulation predicted by Christ, Matthew 24, which will trouble many and throw them from the faith of Christ, which defection Paul signified in advance with the word “falling away”, nevertheless the Church of Christ will not be altogether destroyed, nor will all its members lose the faith, as Christ sufficiently indicates in Matthew 24.22, when he says: “And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect’s sake those days shall be shortened.” And later, pressing the point more fully, he adds, v.24: “Inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect.” There will, then, always be some elect and faithful in whom the Church may remain, nay at that time there will be most illustrious martyrs and most brave confessors of the Catholic Faith. As to what is further touched on at the end of the objection, that now the Antichrist has come, the adversaries object it because of the primacy of the Pontiff; but how false this is, nay ridiculous too, we will see in book five. Finally as to the other difficulty, which lies beneath this objection and response, namely how the Catholic Church could persevere in a few believers and take refuge as it were in a corner, it will be made clear in ch.6.

Chapter 4: That it is not possible for the Catholic Church to err even through ignorance in matters of faith.

Summary: 1. An evasion to the above argument. 2. The Church cannot err even through ignorance. 3. The same truth is proved by reason; an evasion is excluded. 4. Response by heretics. The response is rejected, and the above conclusion is confirmed by the authority of the Fathers.

1. Some ignorant person or heretic might weaken the discussion of the previous chapter by saying that it does rightly prove that the Church cannot fall into a heresy by which the faith is lost; but this is not enough, nor does it stop the Church from being able to exist among many errors, at least through ignorance, which would excuse it of the guilt of heresy, the result being that, although it err in that way, it would not cease to be faithful and holy and so it would not be destroyed. But if this idea is conceded, the heretics or schismatics will have some excuse for dissenting from the Church in certain things where they contend it is in error. For if they understand it to err by ignorance alone and without heresy, they do not seem to speak so manifestly against the promise of Christ. However, I say that this could be proposed by a Catholic rather than by a heretic, because heretics do not act with the Church of Christ in so moderate a way, but impudently attribute to it lapses and errors contrary to Scripture that cannot be excused of heresy, and therefore some of them, with the same impudence, plead in excuse of their heresy that the Church has lost the true faith and hence that, contrary to Christ's promise, it has perished from the world.

2. Wherefore one must further say that not only can the Church not fall into heresy, but that it also cannot err, whether by ignorance or in any other way, in any dogma wherein, as in a truth revealed by God and to be believed by all the faithful, the Universal Church is united and which it teaches and proposes. For this too is contained in the promises made to the Church, and therefore no Catholic can be in doubt about the truth of this dogma. The fact is made plain, in the first place, by the words of Paul, 1 Timothy, 3.15: "That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth." For the Church is compared to a column as to something that, by stability and firmness, preserves the truth sincere and pure and secures all the faithful in the truth against all oppressors of it whatever. But if the Church could err, how, I ask, could the faith of believers, or the truth of things to be believed, depend on it? But that this is the opinion and sense of Paul seems so clear from the words that it scarce needs any exposition or persuasion, but only the reading of an unperturbed mind. Hence all authors as well ancient as more recent declare that the Church is said to be the pillar of truth on account of its being immovable in the truth. But it is called the ground, either because it has the truth made firm by prodigies and virtues which could be done by no other than by God himself, as Ambrose expounds, or because by it all believers are made firm in the truth, as is rightly taught by St. Thomas, and as is indicated by Chrysostom when he says: "The pillar of the world is the Church, which contains the faith to be preached; indeed the truth of the Church is the pillar and ground." And more clearly Theodoret says: "He called the Church the assembly of believers, whom he said were the pillar and ground of the truth, because, as founded on Peter, they remain fixed and immovable; and they preach the truth of the dogmas by the very realities." And Jerome also adds on the same place: "The Church is called the pillar, on which now alone the truth stands firm, which alone holds up the building." Next Augustine, cont.1 on Psalms 110, treating of the words, "He has founded the earth on its firmness," interpreting by 'earth' the Church, he expounds: "It will not be caused to fall for ages of ages, because it is predestined to be the column and ground of the truth." Therefore, because it cannot decline from the truth in those things that it believes firmly and holds to be revealed by God, it is for that reason the pillar and ground.

Besides, this truth is confirmed by the promise of Christ treated of above, John 14.16: "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter [Paraclete]...even the Spirit of truth." For not without cause did he there specially call him the Spirit of truth, making sufficiently thereby that he is promising the Paraclete as Teacher of truth, as Christ himself seems to make plain, John 16.13: "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come he will guide you into all truth." But we showed above that the promise of the Holy Spirit was made to the Church, that he should remain with it for ever, as Christ himself said; therefore the Church always has the Holy Spirit as guide and teacher, by whom it is specially guided and illumined, and hence it cannot happen that the same Church should err about the truth, and therefore Cyril, bk.10, on John, last chapter, said: "When he predicted that the Paraclete would come to them, he named him the Spirit of truth (for he himself is truth), so that the disciples might understand that he would send a virtue not foreign to himself." And later: "This Spirit of truth therefore will lead into all truth, for he knows the truth exactly, whose Spirit he is, and reveals it not in part but completely. For although we know in part in this life, as Paul says, yet it is not a truth mutilated but a truth complete that shines on in this limited knowledge." Which last words are much to be noted, for from them is understood the necessity of this Spirit of truth in the Church, as I will immediately make plain. Next Tertullian, bk. De Praescriptionibus, ch.28, as if mocking those who attribute to the Universal Church error about the faith, says for the same reason: "Will the Holy Spirit not have regard for the Church, he who was sent for this purpose by Christ to lead it into truth, who was for this purpose asked for from the Father, that he might be Teacher of truth? Will God's administrator, Christ's vicar (that is, filling his function and supplying for his absence in the office of teaching), neglect his duty and in the meantime allow the Church to understand otherwise, to believe otherwise, than he himself preached through his apostles?" As if he were to say that this is incredible and alien to the promise of Christ and to the providence and goodness of the Holy Spirit.

3. Next, besides the promise of Christ and the very express testimonies of Scripture, we can prove this truth by reason deduced from the principles of the faith. Because if the Universal Church could err in any way in the dogmas of the faith, it could not in any of them be the pillar and ground of the truth, nay it could not believe anything either as altogether certain that could not have falsity beneath, because it could always be in doubt and fear that it was being deceived through ignorance. Someone will perhaps reply that the Church could and should firmly believe the things that are contained in Scripture even if it could err in other things. But this does not remove the difficulty; both because the Church could have doubts about the books of Scripture themselves, whether it was erring by ignorance in believing that some book was canonical which was not, because the authority of the Church is not greater in approving one book than in approving another; and also because, if it could err in some dogma, it could also err in understanding the Scriptures, and therefore it could always doubt whether it was following the true sense of the Spirit, and hence it could believe nothing from the Scripture with certainty; besides too, because the Church needs to be certain, not only about the things contained in the Scripture, but also about other unwritten dogmas, as the most ancient Fathers always taught, a few of whom I will immediately point out; for in the present we are only touching on this by the by. Therefore, in order for the dogmas that the Universal Church believes to be certain, it must not be able to err in any of them. Hence rightly did Gregory Nazianzen say, orat.37, near the end: "One thing coheres with another, and from them a certain truly golden and salutary chain is made;" and therefore, if even one is taken away or rendered uncertain, the whole chain will be broken and become useless, as even Ambrose said, on Luke 9, bk.6, at the end: "If you remove one of these, you have removed your salvation, for even the heretics seem to themselves to have Christ; for none denies the name of Christ; but he who does not confess everything which is Christ's denies Christ." So therefore, he who imputes error to the Church in any dogma whatever destroys the whole faith of the Church.

4. Perhaps, however, the adversaries will easily concede all this, and will not think it inconsistent to admit that the Church, by erring and handing on false dogmas as truths of the faith, can come to that state in which it believes nothing by divine and wholly certain faith but everything by its own opinion. But this response, in the first place, returns to the previous error, that the true Church of Christ can perish; for when it is constituted in that state it would not have true and supernatural faith; therefore it would not be the true Church. And so this response, as to this first part of it, is sufficiently assailed by the things we said in the preceding chapter, and by the foundation which confirmed them and by the testimonies for that foundation. Next, if the Universal Church could reach the state in which it believes nothing by divine faith but only by human opinion, where then will faith be found on the earth? Surely nowhere, because if the true faith is anywhere it has come from the Catholic Church. Therefore if in the Church itself the faith is not certain and supernatural, much less could it be so outside it. Wherefore those who make this reply and think in this way about the Church show, while making it unfaithful, that they themselves lack the faith. For whence will they have the faith if they do not have it through the Church, since God is teaching men now not through himself but through the Church, as is clearly taken from Paul, Romans 10?

Finally, those who thus respond, err for this reason that they do not distinguish in the Church between human authority and the authority of the Holy Spirit who rules it, or speaks through it, as often as it as a whole believes dogmas of the faith, or teaches it, according to the promise of Christ just referred to, and according to the mind of the apostles when they hand on a dogma of the faith with these words, Acts 15.28: "For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us."

And in this way did the most ancient Fathers think about the authority of the Church. Irenaeus, bk.3, Contra Haereses, ch.3, says: "There is no need still to seek among others for the truth which it is easy to obtain from the Church, since the apostles most fully brought into it, like a rich man into his store house, everything which is of the truth, so that everyone who wishes may obtain from it the drink of life; for this is the entrance of life, but all the rest are thieves and robbers, wherefore they must indeed be avoided." Ambrose, bk.3, epist.25, Ad Verselenses, says: "No one stands who does not stand in the faith, who does not stand fixed in the opinion of his heart. We also elsewhere read, 'but you stand here by me;' both things were said to Moses by the Lord, 'whereon you stand is holy ground,' and 'Here, stand by me,' that is, you stand with me if you stand in the Church; for he himself is the holy place, the very earth fertile with holiness and rich with the harvests of virtues. Stand therefore in the Church, stand where I have appeared to you, there I am with you. Where the Church is, there is the firm station of your mind, there is the ground of your spirit." And the same Ambrose, bk.3 De Fide, ch., says: "We will keep the precepts of our ancestors, and will not violate the seals of our inheritance with the rashness of a wild daring."

And Augustine, De Utilitate Credendi, ch.8, speaking of a man longing and laboring to find the truth: "If you wish," he says, "to put an end to labors of this sort, follow the way of Catholic discipline, which has flowed down to us from Christ himself through the apostles, and will henceforth flow to our posterity." For Augustine thought that the faith would never fail, and that it would not otherwise come to posterity than through the tradition and succession in the Catholic Church. Hence in ch.17, after he said that great is the help of the faith that is believed and preached by the common consensus of the peoples, he subjoins: “This was done by divine providence through the predictions of the prophets, by the humanity and doctrine of Christ, by the journeys of the apostles, by the insults, crosses, blood, deaths suffered by the martyrs, by the praiseworthy life of the saints, and, among all these, miracles worthy of such great things and virtues, according to the opportunity of the times. Since therefore we see God’s so great help and so much fruit and progress, shall we doubt to hide ourselves in the bosom of his Church, which, starting from the Apostolic See through the succession of bishops, has obtained, according to the confession of the human race, the peak of authority, with the heretics meanwhile barking around it in vain and damned partly by the judgment of the people itself, partly by the gravity of Councils, partly even by the majesty of miracles? Not to wish to give the Church the first place is surely the mark either of the highest impiety or of precipitous arrogance. For if there is no sure way to wisdom and safety for souls except when faith before reason cherishes them, what else is ingratitude to the divine help and assistance than to want with so much labor to resist the authority aforesaid?” So far Augustine. With these words he has so splendidly and wisely confirmed the discussion we have given that nothing seems capable of being added to it. And therefore does the same Augustine defer so much to the authority of the Church that, in his book Contra Epistolam Fundamenti, ch.5, he did not doubt to affirm: “I would not believe the Gospel unless the authority of the Catholic Church prompted me.”

Finally, Jerome Contra Luciferianos about the middle, says: “What sort of thing is this, that you carry over the laws of the Church into heresy?” And later: “If Christ does not have the Church that is diffused through the whole world, or if he only has it in Sardinia, he has become too poor by far.” And lastly, after he has brought many things forward about the Church, he adds thus at the end: “I could spend a whole day on this sort of talk and dry up all the streams of your propositions with the one sun of the Church; but because we have already talked much, I will pronounce for you a brief and open opinion of my mind, that one must remain in that Church which, founded by the apostles, endures up to the present day.” And many like things are found in the ancient Fathers which, in the interests of brevity, I dismiss, and I more gladly say that he who has not listened to these Fathers, even though many have been referred to, will not believe, but will always think up vain subterfuges.

Chapter 5: That the Roman Church has the same firmness of faith as the Catholic Church is demonstrated, and an evasion of the sectaries is met.

Summary: 1. Distinction made by sectaries between the Roman and the Catholic Church. 2. This sort of distinction was invented by the more ancient heretics. 3. Foundations of the error. 4. Distinction of the Roman Church into universal and particular. 5. The place in Luke 22 is shown to be to our account. 6. First confirmation. 7. Second confirmation.

1. The things in the previous chapter from the divine Scriptures, adduced to show that the Catholic Church has been immoveable and has had the singular protection of God in preserving and continually retaining the true faith, are so clear and open that not even the enemies of the Church itself dare entirely to fight in an open warfare against the Catholic Church. So they distinguish between the Catholic Church and the Roman Church and do not dare to say openly about the Catholic Church that it has defected from or lost the true faith, which however they are not afraid to assert boldly against the Roman Church. And in this way they seem to escape all the testimonies of Scripture and the promises of Christ, because these were made about the Catholic Church and not the Roman Church.

And, to pass over other Protestants, King James does not seem averse to this opinion or distinction. For although in his book he does not expressly propose it, yet from his words it is not unclearly gathered; for he professes himself a defender of the Catholic Faith which, he says, is the faith of the old and primitive Church; wherein he indicates that the Catholic and primitive Church has not perished but persists, for where the Catholic Faith is the Catholic Church too cannot fail to be. But afterwards, in his Preface p.40, he did not fear to confess that he neither is nor ever was in our Church, that is, in the Roman Church; and on p.47 he plainly damns articles of the faith “which,” he says, “were fashioned in the workshop of the Roman Church, unheard of before the five hundredth year of Christ;” and on p.48, he has these words: “Although they say I am a schismatic and have defected from the Roman Church, certainly I can in no way be a heretic.” Therefore he makes a distinction between defection from the Roman Church and defection from the Catholic Faith, or from the Catholic Church, for it amounts to the same. Again, on p.54, after these words, he subjoins many like ones: “We have not yet touched on the citadel of the Roman religion, that is the head of the Church, and the primacy of Peter, for those who deny this article deny, in the opinion of Bellarmine, the Catholic Faith.” With these and the like words, therefore, King James sufficiently insinuates that the faith of the Roman Church has failed, while the Catholic Faith endures and perseveres.

2. Nor is this error a new one, for Wycliffe in his article 37, which was condemned at the Council of Constance, session 8, said that the Roman Church is the Synagogue of Satan; which remark I do not find said by him about the Catholic Church, nor perhaps would he say it, lest he should seem to put himself either in the Synagogue of Satan or outside the Catholic Church; which danger, indeed, is common to all heretics. In fact the Paupers of Lyons, otherwise the Waldensians, were before in the same error, who asserted that no one in the faith of the Roman Church, which defected at the time of Sylvester, could be saved, as is related by Antoninus 4, p. ‘Theologali’, tit. II, ch.7, sect.2, and by Aeneas Silvius, De Origine Bohemorum, ch.33. But, first, all of them were founded on private opinions or their own errors, and since they could not deny that these opinions were contrary to the Roman Faith, they were compelled at length to babble that the Roman Faith was not true and hence that the Roman Church had defected from the Catholic Church.

3. Or certainly, second, what moved them was that they believe nothing excellent or universal about the Roman Church, but they consider it only as a particular church or diocese and its bishop as one among others possessed of no power outside that diocese. From which principle they inferred that, just as other particular churches and their pastors, even if they were primates or patriarchs, could fail in matters of the faith and did in fact often defect, so too could it happen in the Roman Church and has in fact rather often happened. And in this way these two errors are very closely joined together, as they were joined together by Wycliffe when he said: “The Roman Church is the Synagogue of Satan, and the Pope is not the immediate and proximate Vicar of Christ.” And for this reason the king of England seems to have said that the citadel of the Roman Faith is the article about the primacy of Peter, because we believe that the Roman Faith is founded on that primacy in the way that Christ promised to found his Church on a rock, and therefore the king himself, by denying the primacy, is compelled to deny the Roman Faith, and to persuade himself and his fellows of its failure.

4. Therefore, in order to base on this foundation the beginning of our attack on this error, we must distinguish a double function or a double pastoral in the Roman Bishop. One is particular and proper to the diocese of Rome, of which the Pontiff is the immediate bishop. The other is the universal care of the whole Church of Christ, of which he is universal Pastor and supreme Bishop in the case of all particular churches, although he is not immediate bishop of them individually. And indeed about the first power and office there is no controversy between us and Protestants. But the second universal power and its supreme even universal jurisdiction over the Universal Church are denied by the adversaries, but we now assume it and constantly assert that the article about it pertains to the Catholic Faith; however the proof of it we reserve for book 3, lest we be compelled to overturn our proposed order and bring confusion into what we are now treating of. But these two functions, although they can according to the way they are distinct in themselves be divided in the persons just as they are separated in other episcopacies, nevertheless, from the fact that the functions were joined together in Peter, they are never found to be separate and they will, by divine ordinance, perhaps never be separated; which thing we are not now dealing with because it is not relevant to the present purpose, but in the third book we will touch on it, at least in passing. Up to this point, then, the Roman Bishop has always been the same as the Bishop of the Catholic Church, the way that he is often named by the ancient Fathers.

From this fact we understand that by the name of the Roman Church two things can be signified, first that particular church which is confined within the limits of its diocese and has its own merely particular bishop, precisely considered, so that he may exercise immediate jurisdiction over it. And of the Roman Church taken in this sense we are not speaking, because it is clear that it is not the Catholic Church but a member of it. And therefore about this church, as so considered, we cannot say that it has Christ's promise of never defecting from the Catholic Faith, because nowhere is such a promise found; nor is it necessarily included in the promises made to the Universal Church, because the Universal Church could remain in the true faith, in obedience to and union with the Supreme Pontiff, as he is Pontiff and Universal Pastor, even if that particular church should defect from the faith and throw off its bishop from itself by violence – which we say for the sake of explaining the thing, though we piously believe that God will never permit it.

But in another way the Church which retains the True Faith of Christ is wont to be called the Roman Church because it obeys the Roman Bishop, although it is not united to him as to a private bishop but as to the Universal Pontiff; and so too it is said to be the Roman Faith and the Roman Religion, which is preserved, confirmed, defined, or approved by the Roman Pontiff as the Vicar of Christ. And in this way too the particular Roman Church, as conjoined to its bishop not only as to a particular ruler but also as to the universal Doctor of the whole Church, is placed together with the Catholic Church in the privilege of not erring nor defecting from the faith as long as it remains in that union with its head; for this is also possessed by any other particular church when considered under the same reason and union. And this follows from the general principle, namely that Peter and the Faith of Peter are the immovable foundation of the Church, on which, as long as a church, although a particular one, be founded, it never errs from the true faith. However, there is this difference between the Universal Church and particular churches which one can consider, that any particular church can be disjoined from this rock of Peter and fall; but the Universal Church cannot, because about it alone is it written: "The gates of hell will not prevail against it."

When the meaning of the words, then, is made plain and understood in this fashion, we say that the faith of the Roman Church is the Catholic Faith, and the Roman Church has not defected and could not defect therefrom, because of the Chair of Peter present in it. This assertion we propose as certain and necessary in the Catholic Faith, and we collect it from the divine Scripture as follows: the faith of Peter was Catholic and could not defect; but the faith of the Roman Church is the faith of Peter; therefore the faith of the Roman Church is the Catholic Faith, from which that See can never defect. The argumentation is legitimate, but the individual propositions assumed in it need to be proved. The first part, then, is known of itself, namely that the faith of Peter was Catholic; for, if it is understood of the person of Peter, it is not brought into doubt even by heretics; for the faith of Peter was what has been preached to the whole world from the beginning; and it most of all is apostolic and primitive. But if it be understood of the See of Peter, even the Protestants themselves confess that for many years the same Catholic Faith endured in the same See of Peter, and Jerome and Augustine sufficiently testify to the fact up to their own times, the former in his epistle to Damasus about the name ‘hypostasis’, and the latter in his book Contra Epistolam Fundamenti, ch.4, where, among the four things that were most justly keeping him in the bosom of the Catholic Church, he numbers this one: “From the See itself of Peter the apostle, to whom the Lord after his resurrection commended the feeding of his sheep, the succession of priests up to the present bishop.” Where he openly supposes that the Catholic Church was then the one which was conjoined with the See of Peter and which contained the sheep commended to Peter, and hence that the Catholic Faith had persisted in that See up to his time, which will be confirmed in the point following by many testimonies and reasons.

5. It remains, therefore, for us to prove the second part assumed in the proposition, namely that this faith could not defect in Peter, not only as to his person but also as to his see, and consequently not only for some definite time but simply as long as the Church of Christ will last. Now the proof is chiefly from the words of Christ, Luke 22.31-32: “Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat: But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.” For rightly did Tertullian say, bk. De Fuga in Persecut., ch.22, that Christ had there asked that the devil not be permitted so much that Peter’s faith should be in peril. Which prayer was efficacious and obtained what was asked for, as is sufficiently proved by the excellence of Christ himself, for he was heard for his reverence in those things which he requested absolutely, as is made plain in the present case by the words: “I have prayed for thee;” and it is made more plain, or rather the granting of the prayer and its infallible effect is supposed in those last words: “And when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.” And therefore does Pope Leo IX well ask: “Will there be anyone of such great madness as to dare to think that his prayer, in whom to will is to be able, is in any respect vain?” So there is in this part almost no controversy or difficulty. But there could be difficulty in another point, namely whether that prayer was made only for the person of Peter, and therefore whether its effect ended with him or rather was made for the See of Peter in his person and will thus last as long as the See lasts; therefore what remains is for us to prove that it must be understood in the second way.

We prove it in the first place from the authority of many Supreme Pontiffs, who, recognizing this prerogative of their dignity and of their See, proved it from these words of Christ, and though they seem to speak in their own cause yet they are most worthy of trust, both because they are very old and taught this as by continuous tradition, and also because many of them are saints and martyrs who sealed the true and Catholic Faith with their blood, and finally because the most ancient Fathers bestowed the same honor on the Roman See and Faith. So, the above testimony is used to confirm this truth by Pope Lucius in his epistle to the bishops of Gaul and Spain, near the end, where he says that his See holds unerring the norm of the apostolic faith as it received it from its own authors, the princes of the apostles of Christ, according to the divine promise of our Savior, and he refers to the words cited. Like things are contained in Pope Marcus' epistle to Athanasius, which is in vol.1 of the Epistles, although it is not referred to in the volumes of the Councils, and in Felix I's epistle 3 to Benignus, and in Pope Agatho's epistle to the emperor Constantine, which was read in act.4 of the Sixth Synod, and was approved in act.8, and in Nicholas I's epistle to the emperor Michael, after the middle, and in Leo IX's epistle to Michael, ch.7, and in Innocent III, ch. 'Maiores', De Baptismo. But more fully than by the others is this point made plain by Pope Leo, in serm.2, In Natali Petri et Pauli, ch.3, where, after having set down the words of the Gospel, he subjoins: "The danger was common to all the apostles from their trial by fear, and they had equal need of the help of divine protection, since the devil desired to attack them all, to destroy them all; and yet a special care is taken up by Christ for Peter, and he prays in particular for Peter's faith, as if the state of the others would be surer if the mind of the Prince were not conquered. In Peter, therefore, the courage of all is fortified, and the help of divine grace is so ordered that the firmness, which is bestowed through Christ on Peter, is through Peter conferred on the apostles. For after his resurrection too the Lord, after the keys of the kingdom, said three times with mystical insinuation to the blessed apostle Peter to each of his three professions of eternal love: 'Feed my sheep;' which duty even now the pious pastor without doubt does, and performs the mandate of the Lord, confirming us with exhortations and not ceasing to pray for us, that we not be overcome by any temptation." Which words are repeated by the same Pontiff in sermon 3 De Assumptione Sua, and he adds: "Justly do we rejoice in the merits and dignity of our leader, giving thanks to the eternal Redeemer King, our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave so much power to him whom he made prince of the whole Church, that if anything even in our times is rightly done through us, it is to be assigned to his work, to his governance, to whom it was said: 'And when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.'"

6. From these words are other reasons collected by which this sense is confirmed. One is taken from a change in Christ's words; for first he spoke to all the apostles, predicting that almost all were to be tempted; but afterwards he says especially to Peter: "I have prayed for thee;" therefore he also obtained something special for him. But personal perseverance was not unique to Peter, for Christ prayed for the others too, saying, John 17.11: "Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me." And although at the time, when he prayed for Peter, he had not yet offered that universal prayer, nevertheless there would have been no peculiar favor for Peter unless he had requested some more special privilege for him. But Christ, in that singular way of calling Peter so that he would pay heed, "Simon, Simon," (for such is what the Greek has), and of praying for him, wished without doubt to signify a greater prerogative. Nay, if the thing is attentively considered, in each place Christ the Lord prayed for Peter and for all the apostles and for the Universal Church present and future, but yet in a diverse way; for in the writing of John he first expressly prayed for all the apostles, of whom Peter was one and special, and in them was the Church virtually contained, for whose sake was that prayer especially made which a little later Christ completed when he said, v.20-21: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word: That they all may be one," namely with the unity of the Faith and of the Catholic Church. In the writing of Luke, however, Christ directly and expressly prayed for Peter alone, but indirectly and by a certain consequence he prayed also for the other apostles, as he indicated in the subjoined words: "And when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." "So that the firmness which is bestowed through Christ on Peter is through Peter conferred on the apostles," as we related a little above from Pope Leo. And hence that prayer is extended to the whole Church, which is also comprehended under the name of brothers, as Theophylact indicated on that place, saying: “The sense is plain: Because I have you as Prince of the disciples, when, having denied me, you have wept and come to repentance, confirm the rest. For this befits you, who after me are the rock and foundation of the Church.” Hence Pope Agatho above said: “The Lord promised that Peter’s faith would not fail, and he admonished him to confirm his brothers, which that the Apostolic Pontiffs, predecessors to my littleness, always confidently did, is acknowledged by all.” And Leo IX above indicated the same sense when he said: “From the See of the Prince of the apostles, that is from the Roman Church, as well through Peter himself as through his successors, the inventions of all the heretics have been rebuked, convicted, conquered, and the hearts of the brothers in the faith of Peter, which hitherto has not failed nor will it ever fail, are strengthened.”

7. Hence, from these last words the sense of the first promise is made more open, and another very fine reason for the aforesaid interpretation is given. For thus is Peter here commanded to confirm his brothers as he is ordered in John 21 to feed Christ’s sheep; for they who are here called brothers and there sheep are the same; but there they are called sheep on account of the mildness and obedience of subjects, but here they are called brothers so as to show that the duty of an ecclesiastical pastor is not to dominate but to confirm as brothers those who are weaker, “of a ready mind...being ensamples to the flock,” as the same Peter said, 1 Peter 5.2-3. Just as, therefore, “feed my sheep,” was said, not to Simon for his person alone but to Peter for the office which was conferred on him, that it might endure in his successors, so when it is said to him, “strengthen thy brethren,” a certain chief part of that office is signified in advance, which is to strengthen and as it were sustain the brothers and the Church in the true faith; for although this is done principally by divine virtue, yet this virtue uses man as instrument, so that it might govern men in the way that is fitted to men. And although others, pastors and doctors of the Church, cooperate therein by teaching and preaching, nevertheless to supply it by legitimate and ordinary power, and by an authority that is certain, discriminating the false from the true, condemning heresies, and defining Catholic doctrine, is proper to him to whom it was said: “Strengthen thy brethren.” Hence, just as this office is necessary in the Church for the preservation of the true faith, so those words were said to Peter by reason of a pastoral office that was going to flow perpetually into the Church and to endure there always; therefore too the first promise, “that thy faith fail not,” was made, not merely to the person, but to the office and See of Peter. For that is why Christ specially prayed for him and gained that privilege for him, because the office of strengthening the brethren required that help on the part of God; therefore, as the office was going to be perpetual in the See of Peter, so also the privilege. And all this is signified by Leo I in those words: “He prays in particular for Peter’s faith, as if the state of the others would be surer if the mind of the Prince is not conquered,” and in the other authors whom we referred to above. And more openly Theophylact, after he has said: “because I have you as Prince of the disciples...confirm the rest,” adds: “But one may understand that it was said not only about the apostles, that they were confirmed by Peter, but about all who will be the faithful up to the end of the age.” Which although he seems afterwards to expound it by way of example, because in the person of Peter it preceded his weeping for his offense and remains perpetually in the memories of men, yet Christ did not speak of example but of confirmation by the word of faith, and therefore the better understanding is that this is done perpetually through the see of Peter.

And this truth and interpretation of the promise can be made more fully firm by comparison of this place with the others on which the primacy of Peter is founded. Which is also signified by Leo I in the cited words when he compares these words, “Strengthen thy brethren,” with those, “Feed my sheep;” which comparison we have already clarified. Hence although this promise be not so clear, we would collect sufficiently from the sole office of feeding the sheep of Christ in the doctrine of the faith that this privilege in the See of Peter is necessary. Because if in that See the faith could waver, the faith could be in danger in the whole Church of Christ, both because the Church is bound to obey Peter and his successors when they teach from his chair (as is collected from the words of Christ mentioned, because the first and most necessary food of the faithful is the true doctrine of faith), and also because otherwise there would not be a sure reason for discriminating true doctrine from false in the Church, and thus the faithful could not be confirmed, let alone confirmed unshaken in the Catholic Faith. Which reason we will urge more in what follows. And this truth is similarly confirmed by the other promise of Christ: “Upon this rock I will build my Church,” for that rock is Peter and his successors, as we will show below. But he is called rock because of his firmness in holding up the building, and therefore, as the building of the Church is going to be perpetual, so the rock is too, that it might be suited for holding up the building. Wherefore, just as the Church could not be perpetual unless its faith could not fail, so neither would the rock be suited, nor have the firmness, for holding up the building if it could fail in the faith. And therefore rightly did Origen say, tract.1, on Matthew: “Neither against the rock, on which Christ builds his Church, nor against the Church itself, will the gates of hell prevail.” And Cyril in Thesaurus (as cited in the Catena of St. Thomas on Matthew 16) said: “According to this promise of the Lord, the Apostolic Church of Peter (that is the Roman Church) remains immaculate from all seduction and heretical trickery, over all leaders, and bishops, and over all primates of the churches and of the peoples, in its Pontiffs, in the fullness of faith and authority of Peter. And although other churches may be put to shame by the error of certain people, it reigns alone unshaken, etc.” Which words, though they are not now found in Cyril’s Thesaurus, are very trustworthy on the basis of the authority of St. Thomas.

Chapter 6: The firmness of the Faith and of the Roman Church is shown by tradition.

Summary: 1. Testimonies from the ancient fathers are examined that assert the Faith of the Roman and of the Catholic Church coincide. The first testimony. 2. The second from Augustine and Jerome. 3. The third from Ambrose. 4. The fourth from Cyprian. 5. The fifth from Irenaeus. 6. The sixth from Athanasius and the bishops of Egypt. 7. The seventh from the bishops of the province of Tarragona. 8. Evasion. Response. 9. Instance. It is refuted. 10. An authority and a conjecture are added. 11. Heretics object that some pontiffs fell into heresy. 12. No Pontiff as head of the Church can lose the faith. 13. Nor can a Pontiff err in things pertaining to the Universal Church.

1. From what has been said in the preceding chapter the proof stands that the faith of the Roman Church is the faith of Peter and hence is the Catholic Faith, from which that See can never defect. But we can confirm the same truth and promise from the very way things have turned out and from tradition. For if the Apostolic See did not have in this matter a special privilege it would at some time have failed in the faith, even when teaching ex cathedra, or it would have approved some heresy, as we see to have happened in other churches, including those begun by the apostles; for such is the human condition and weakness that in so great variety and multitude of persons error may easily happen unless there be assistance from the Holy Spirit. But that this has never occurred in the Roman Church is testified to by the Pontiffs cited and also by Pope Eusebius, epist.3 to the bishops of Tuscany and Campania, when he says: “Salvation is first to guard the rules of right faith and in no way to deviate from what has been established by the Fathers. Nor can the sentence of Jesus Christ our Lord be passed over, when he said: 'Thou art Peter and upon this rock I shall build my Church.' And the things he said are proved by what has in fact happened, because in the Apostolic See the Catholic Religion has always been preserved without stain." And Pope Gelasius in his epistle to the Augustus Anastasius: "This," he says, "is what the Apostolic See most guards against, that it be stained by no mark of depravity, no infection whatever, since the glorious confession of the Apostle is the root of the world. For if (which may God forbid, because we are confident it cannot happen) any such thing should happen, whence might we dare to resist any error, or whence might we request correction for the erring?"

2. Nor was it the Roman Pontiffs alone who had this thinking about the Roman Church or the See of Peter, but the other Fathers did too, as well Latin as Greek. I have already referred to Augustine, Contra Epistolam Fundamenti, ch.4, where, when he posits as sign of the Catholic Church the succession of the Roman Pontiffs, he makes it plain with sufficient clarity that the Catholic Church is not disjoined from the Roman Pontiff, and thus that the Roman and the Catholic Faith are one and the same. Hence the same Augustine, bk.2 De Gratia Christi et Peccato Originali, ch.8, says about Pelagius: "He was not at all able to deceive the Roman Church; for the most blessed Pope Zosimus recalled to mind what his predecessor, worthy of imitation, had thought about his doings. He paid attention also to what the faith of the Romans, praiseworthy in the Lord, thought about him, whose harmonious eagerness he saw to be aflame in concord against his error." And in bk.2, Contra Duas Epist. Pelagianor., ch.4, he says: "Since in the letters of the venerable Innocent the antiquity of the Roman Church was clearly displayed, he who departed from the sentence of the Roman Church would certainly be a sinner against it," where (as often elsewhere) he accepts and venerates the faith of the Roman See as the Catholic faith. Second, Jerome's epist.57 to Damasus, 'Quoniam vetusto...' has the words: "I am joined in communion to the Chair of Peter; on this rock I know the Church to be built; whoever eats the lamb outside this house is profane." Where openly he judges the Catholic Church to be the same as the Roman. From which fact also, in bk.1 Apologia contra Ruffinum, col.3, he draws this conclusion: "Which Faith does he call his own? That with which the Roman Church prevails? Or that which is contained in the volumes of Origen? If he responds 'the Roman', then we are Catholics;" where too he eloquently teaches that the Catholic Faith is the same as the Roman. But that this faith is immaculate too he testifies in the third book of the same Apology, a little before the middle, as follows: "Know that the Roman Faith, praised by the apostolic voice, does not receive deceptions of the sort, even if an Angel should preach otherwise than has been once preached." And in the introduction to his second book on Galatians, he praises the faith and religion of the Romans with the conclusion: "Not because the Romans have another faith save the one which all the churches of Christ have, but because in them devotion is greater, etc."

3. Let the third witness be St. Ambrose, who in his book De Obitu Satyri Fratris says towards the end, referring to the prudence and caution of his brother: "He called a bishop to himself; and he did not think any grace true save the grace of the true faith; and he asked of him whether he was in union with the Catholic bishops, that is, with the Roman Church." In which words too he thinks that union with the Roman Church and with the Catholic Church is one and the same. Hence, bk.1, epist.4, he writes thus to the emperors: "Your clemency will have to be on guard that the head of the whole Roman world, the Roman Church and the sacrosanct faith of the apostles, not be disturbed, for from it the rights of reverend communion flow to all." And in epist.7 of the same to Pope Siricius, he writes: "Let the Creed of the apostles be believed, which the Roman Church always guards and preserves undefiled;" and serm.2 De Sanctis, which is about the Chair of Peter, and serm.11, which is the second about Peter and Paul, he declares in a way strikingly in support of our point how the Church is founded on Peter and has therefrom continual firmness of faith.

4. Let the fourth be Cyprian who venerated the Roman Church in exactly the same way, but especially in epist.55 to Cornelius, col.12, when he says about certain heretics: "They dare to have recourse to Peter's Chair and to the Principal Church, whence springs sacerdotal unity, and do not dare to ponder that those are Romans, whose faith is praised by the preaching of the apostle, to whom faithlessness can have no access." Hence the same Cyprian, epist.52, at the beginning, says: "You have written to me to transmit a copy of the same letters to Cornelius our colleague, so that, having set all care aside, he may now know that you are in communion with him, that is, with the Catholic Church." Where he openly thinks that it is the same thing to be in communion with the Roman Church and with the Catholic Church. And epist.76 to Magnus, he says: "The Church is one, which cannot but be one both within and without." Whence he infers: "If it is with Novatian, it was not with Cornelius; but if it was with Cornelius, who succeeded to Fabian by legitimate ordination, Novatian is not in the Church." Where too he supposes the Catholic Church to be one with the Roman Church. The same in epist.40, near the middle: "One Church and one Chair founded on Peter by the voice of the Lord." And later: "Whoever gathers elsewhere, scatters." He repeats almost the same in his book De Unit. Eccl., not far from the beginning, and among many other things he says: "Does he who forsakes the Chair of Peter, on which the Church is founded, have confidence that he is in the Church?"

5. The fifth is Irenaeus who, in bk.2 Contra Haereses, ch.3, says: "Since it is a long task to count the successions of all the churches, we point to the tradition of the greatest and the most ancient Church, the one known to all to have been founded and established by the two most glorious apostles Peter and Paul at Rome, to the tradition which it has from the apostles, and the faith announced to men, which has reached up to ourselves through the successions of bishops; and we confound all those who, whether through their evil pleasure, or their vain glory, or their blindness and evil opinion, in any way gather where they ought not. For every church, that is, those who are everywhere the faithful, must agree with this Church, because of its more powerful principality, where those who are everywhere have always preserved the tradition which is from the apostles."

6. Sixth we can add Athanasius and the bishops of Egypt in their epistle to Pope Marcus, in which they ask for copies of the Council of Nicea, where they say among other things: "We beg that from the authority of the holy See of the Church, which is mother and head of all churches, we may deserve to secure them through the present legates for the correction and restoration of the orthodox faithful, so that, supported on your authority and strengthened by your prayers, we may both escape ourselves unharmed from the afore-mentioned rivals of the holy Church of God and be able to pluck back from them those who have been committed to us." In these words he manifestly supposes that the sound and complete faith then existed in the Roman Pontiff, and that there also existed in him authority for correcting heretics and for confirming the faithful in the true faith.

7. Seventh, we can here adduce the testimony of the bishops of the province of Tarragona, in epist.2 to Pope Hilary, where they first recognize the privilege that the Roman Church has from the primacy of the Vicar of Christ, then they subjoin: "Therefore, to begin with, we adore God in you, whom you serve without complaint, and we have recourse to the faith praised by the mouth of the apostle, seeking responses from the place where nothing with error, nothing with presumption, but all with pontifical deliberation is prescribed." And along with these can be counted Ruffinus in his exposition of the Creed, at the beginning, where he says: "In diverse churches some things are found added to these words, but in the Church of the city of Rome this deed has not been detected, which I think is for this reason, that no heresy has from there taken its beginning, and that there the ancient custom is preserved." The words also from Cyril cited above sufficiently confirm this truth, which Gennadius, in addition to citing St. Thomas, the Archbishop of Constantinople, also refers to in his defense of the Council of Florence, ch.5, sect.12, but in a slightly different way, namely: "We should, as members, follow the head, that is the Roman Pontiff and the Apostolic See, whence we must seek what we should believe and think and hold, because to it alone does it belong to check, refute, confirm, order, loose, and bind." Next Theodoret in his epistle to the Roman priest Renatus is usually alleged, where he says: "That holy See holds the reins of government for ruling the churches of the whole world, both for other reasons and because it has always remained free of heretical foulness." But because I was not able to take a look at this epistle, I add that its opinion is very much consonant with what the same Theodoret passes on in his epistle to Pope Leo, which is contained in the second volume of the Councils, where he extols the Roman Church with the greatest praises. But in particular he says: "Faith is conspicuous in adorning it, as well as that witness, worthy of faith, the divine apostle, who exclaims 'your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world.'" And about the Roman See itself he says: "To you it is fitting to be first in all things, for your See is of all the greatest and most illustrious, and it presides over the whole earth." And later: "But it has the tombs also of the common Fathers, the teachers of truth Peter and Paul, which illumine the souls of the faithful." And later: "But the apostles' God has now also made the apostles' See illustrious and distinguished, since he has placed Your Holiness thereon, who shines forth with the rays of the orthodox Faith."

8. Perhaps someone will say that these things were said by the Fathers, not because of some singular privilege of the Roman Bishop in keeping the faith intact, but only because of the conspicuous piety and sincere faith of the Roman people, which greatly flourished at the beginning of the Church. For it is only this that is signified by Paul in the words of Romans 1.8: "First I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world." Just as too in 1 Thessalonians 1.6-7 he praises the faith of the Thessalonians, saying: "Having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Spirit: So that ye were ensamples to all that believe, etc." In reply I say that there is no doubt that the apostle in the said words commends the faith of the Roman people, and some of the words of the holy Fathers recall the same praise; yet, nevertheless, they praise the Roman Church more frequently because it always guarded intact and immaculate the faith once received, as is sufficiently clear from the words cited.

9. But the adversaries will instance that these things were said by these Fathers about the Roman Church before the six hundredth year of Christ, during which time they themselves also confess that the true and pure Catholic Faith endured in the Roman Church and See; yet this fact does not prevent it from thereafter having fallen slowly little by little and from have lost the purity of the faith, as the story has it that they themselves invent. But, in the first place, this does not weaken the testimony of the said ancient Fathers, because they not only record the fact but also point out that the right (if I may so say) or the foundation of the fact is perpetual; so they not only teach that the Roman Faith was in their time Catholic but also that it has this by a proper privilege and prerogative that would endure continually in that See. This is evident first from those who found this right on the promise of Christ: "That thy faith fail not," as has already been explained. Next, the reason is the same for those who draw this conclusion "because the Church is built on this rock,” as Jerome said. Again from the fact that they set down union with the Roman Church to be a sure sign of the Catholic Church, as is clear from Jerome and Ambrose, and most of all from Augustine. For when he set down among the signs of the Catholic Church the succession of the Roman Bishops, he without doubt signified two things above all. The first is that the series and succession of bishops in that episcopacy among so many persecutions, without support of human power, with the same excellence of dignity and power, is chiefly not from human providence but from divine, and from the promise of Christ that “The gates of hell shall not prevail against it,” but it always endures, as the same Augustine in his psalm against the party of Donatus openly declares, saying: “We are grieved when we see you thus lying prostrate. Number the priests, even from the See itself of Peter, and see who in the order of Fathers succeeded to whom. It is the rock which the proud gates of hell will not conquer.” The second thing is that the Catholic Church is infallibly conjoined with the See of Peter, and hence that the faith is the same for both of them; for if this be not supposed the sign is of almost no moment. Finally the conclusion is drawn that this was the mind of the said Fathers, because they attribute this privilege to the Apostolic See as being necessary for carrying out the office committed to it, namely to confirm the subjects in the true faith, and to remove the authors of heresies and of false doctrine from the Church, and to cut back all the rotting members that have already died off. Which reason indeed many of the cited Pontiffs point to.

But if the English Protestants, besides these ancient testimonies, want newer ones, let them, in the first place, listen to their own most grave historian Bede, in bk.3 of Histor. Anglican., ch.25 at the end, or to a certain wise priest therein by the name of Wilfrid, who, having cited the decrees of the Roman Church for defining a certain controversy about Easter, thus concludes: “If, having heard the decrees of the Apostolic See, nay of the Universal Church, and these confirmed by sacred letters, you disdain to follow them, without all doubt you sin. For even if your fathers were holy, is that single littleness of theirs, from a corner of a distant island, to be preferred to the universal Church of Christ which is throughout the world?” To these I add the testimonies of Gregory, who was occupant of the See up to the six hundred and fourth year of Christ, and testifies about the integrity of the faith of his See in bk.3 of epistles, indict.12, epist.32, and often elsewhere. And so in epist.41 to Boniface he speaks thus: “I exhort you, while there is still time left in life, that your soul not be found separated from the Church of the same blessed Peter, to whom the keys of the heavenly kingdom were committed, and to whom the power of binding and loosing was assigned, lest, if his kindness here is despised, entry there into life will be closed.” And bk.4, indict.13, ch.77, ep.32, he inveighs against John the bishop of Constantinople, who had dared to usurp the name of Universal Bishop, and uses first of all the words and promises of Christ. “For to all who know the Gospel,” he says, “it is a thing established that the care of the whole Church was committed by the holy voice of the Lord to the apostle Peter, prince of all the apostles; yes, to Peter it is said, “Feed my sheep;” to him it is said, “I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren;” to him it is said, “Thou art Peter and upon this rock I shall build my Church.” From which words Gregory intends to conclude that only the Roman Bishop is in truth Universal, although because of modesty he is not accustomed to be called so. But then he adds that the bishop of Constantinople could not be Universal, since many patriarchs there have been authors of heresies, which God forbid should happen to the Universal Bishop (as he indicates), “because the whole Church collapses when he who is called Universal falls.” In which he clearly thinks that it pertains to the stability of the Church that the supreme and universal See be immutable in the faith. Which he openly confirms in bk.6, indict.5, ch.201, otherwise ep.37, saying: “Who does not know that the holy Church is made firm on the solid base of the Prince of the apostles, because this Prince brings firmness of mind in his name, so that he is called Peter from petra (rock), to whom it is said by the voice of truth: ‘I will give thee the keys...,’ to whom it is again said, ‘Strengthen thy brethren.’” To these can be added the opinion of Leo IX, in epist.1, ch.7, when he says: “By the See of the Prince of the apostles, that is, by the Roman Church, both through Peter himself and through his successors, the lies of all the heretics have been condemned, refuted, and defeated, and the hearts of the brethren have been confirmed in the faith of Peter, which has not failed hitherto nor ever will fail.” Which things this Pontiff wrote after the one thousand and fiftieth year, and he founded them on the promise of Christ as regard future time, but as to past time he assumes them by evidence of the fact, which is known to the whole world.

In addition we can, for confirmation of the same truth, adduce Isidore in his last epistle to Eugene, bishop of Toledo, where he first says of Peter: “He stands forth above the rest, and he first received from the very son of God and of the Virgin the honor of the pontificate in the Church of Christ;” and he confirms it with the testimonies of Matthew 15 and John 21, and then he subjoins: “Christ’s dignity of power, although it is transmitted to all the bishops of the Catholics, yet more especially does it forever remain, by a certain singular privilege, in the Roman Prelate, as in the head which is above the rest of the members. Therefore, he who does not reverently show the Roman Prelate due obedience makes himself guilty, as severed from the head, of the schism of the Headless, because the holy Church guards this as an article of the Catholic Faith, which unless each faithfully believes and firmly he cannot be saved – as the Church approves in the saying of St. Athanasius about the faith of the Holy Trinity.” Although Eugene does not in these words expressly assert that the Roman Church cannot defect from the faith, yet he supposes that up to his own times it has not defected, and he sufficiently indicates that it will always be the same when he says that its privilege will remain for ever. The same is handed on by Bernard, who, epist.109 to Innocent, implores his authority against the rising new heresy, saying: “To your Apostleship must be referred all dangers and scandals emerging in the reign of God, those especially which touch on the faith. For I think it a fitting thing that the losses of the faith are there most of all made good where the faith can experience no defect. This surely is the prerogative of your See. For to whom else was it at any time said: ‘I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not?’ Therefore from Peter’s successor is required what follows: ‘And when thou art converted, strengthen they brethren.’” In these words he sufficiently proves everything that has been said and the true understanding of the promises of Christ. Hence in bk.2 De Considerat. ad Eugenium, ch.8, he says that the Roman Pontiff is “the prince of bishops and, in power, Peter, and pastor not only of the sheep but also of all the pastors;” and many other things he says by which the same truth is established. And in a sermon about the privileges of St. John the Baptist, he says that the Roman Church is mother and mistress of all the churches, to which is said: “I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not.” Next St. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, when dedicating his book De Incarnat. to the Pontiff Urban, calls him the Supreme Pontiff of the Universal Church that is in pilgrimage on earth, and he subjoins in chapter 1: “Since divine providence has chosen Your Holiness and committed to you the guarding of the Christian life and faith and the ruling of the Church, to no other is reference more rightly made if anything against the Catholic Faith arises in the Church, so that by your authority it may be corrected,” and he pursues other things whereby he makes sufficiently plain what he thinks about the Roman Church. To these can be added two testimonies which have been given by men who were Greeks. One is from Theodore Studita, in epist.4 to Naucratus, which is number 6 in bk.2, where he says about heretics: “I am witness now before God and men that they have torn themselves away from the body of Christ and from the supreme crowning throne whereon Christ placed the keys of the faith, against which have never prevailed, nor will ever prevail up to the end, the gates of hell, that is, the mouths of heretics, as he has promised who does not lie.” And in another work De Cultu Imaginum, a fragment of which is related in bk.3 of the holy Library, speaking of the Romans he says: “So great is their faith that there too would the rock of the faith seem to be unbroken, namely, the rock founded on the word of the Lord.” Which testimony is referred to and praised by Gennadius Scholarius, ch.5, Defensio Concilii Florentini, sect.12, where he himself says, sect.17: “If the divine See does not think rightly, Christ lied when he said, ‘Heaven and earth will pass away but my words will not pass away;’ for twice he promised the Church, that he would be with it, and that the gates of hell would not prevail against it.” Where other things too he adduces from the Fathers of the Third and Fourth Synod. And other innumerable things can be reviewed from Catholic theologians, but because it would be prolix and does not seem necessary, I pass them over.

However, the Protestants perhaps, who do not accept the testimonies of the ancient Fathers for their own times or for ours, also reject the testimonies of more recent ones, because, according to the story they invent, these were written after the defection of the Church. But those who fall into so great an audacity and temerity are sufficiently refuted by their very own judgment and choice, that they are being led to destruction and are speaking against all human prudence, since they despise and weaken both all human faith and the credibility of the divine faith itself. Therefore it is enough for us to have shown according to the sacred Scriptures, as they were understood by the holy Fathers, and according to the tradition of the same Fathers, that the Roman Church, by reason of the Apostolic See and the Chair of faith, is not other than the Catholic Church, nor has it defected nor can it defect more from the faith than the Catholic Church. We add further that if, despite all these things, the adversaries contend that the Roman Church has defected, they must designate the time and year in which the defection began, and under which Pontiff, and in what matter or article the error occurred; for if they can show none of this, as in fact they cannot, they are certainly unworthy of all faith. And indeed, about the individual times, centuries, years, and Pontiffs the fact has been shown with the greatest diligence by Cardinal Baronius in his Annals; and therefore at the beginning of the seven hundredth year he very prudently speaks as follows to the reader: “Attend in your heart, and look in your memory, whether you find in the Catholic Church anything diminished of the things which you saw in all the other previous centuries.” And later: “The thing itself is witness, the facts shout out, and the writings of all the saints with remarkable agreement preach that never has the holy Catholic Church of God turned aside from the royal way, etc.”

10. But as to what regards the matter of defection or the particular errors which the heretics attribute to the Roman Church, we will say a few things later, at least about what the king of England touches on, for in this brief work we cannot expressly respond to everything, and the thing has been done by other Catholic doctors as occasion offered, and also by us according to our capacity in other books of Theology. But I will not omit to add a moral conjecture which Tertullian supplies me with in his book De Praescript. Adversus Haeretic., ch.28, where he says: “How is it likely that so many and so great churches have erred in the one faith? No event among many has a single result, and the error of doctrine ought to have varied in the churches. Besides, what is found single among many is not error but tradition. Does anyone dare say, then, that they who handed on the tradition have erred?” The conjecture is almost plain surely, and it is made sufficiently convincing by the experience of both old and new heretics; for as soon as they are separated from the Church they are divided into various and different sects. But the Roman Church has always retained unity of doctrine, while the other churches that profess the Catholic Faith agree with it; therefore the sign is evident that the Church has never deviated from the first and original faith. And therefore, as often as some church or some faction of men decline towards another faith, it becomes known at once to be separate from the Church both Catholic and Roman; but in the Roman Church, or in the See of Peter, never has a like defection or separation from the ancient faith or from other members of the Catholic Church been known; therefore the evasion and imposition of heretics is frivolous and unbelievable.

11. But heretics are wont to make particular objection about certain lapses and errors of certain Roman Pontiffs, whether in their persons or in doctrine. And in the first place they contend that some really were heretics and had lost the faith. Hence they can conclude that the words of Christ, "That thy faith fail not," are not found to be true in the caes of all the Roman Pontiffs, and thus that those words were not pronounced about them, and that to this extent they did not obtain the privilege or promise of never erring. Next, they object that some Pontiffs, who although they were not accused of heresy, handed on through human ignorance to the Church a false doctrine. But to these objections, proposed in particular and singly, a copious and erudite satisfaction has been made by the illustrious Bellarmine, bk.4, De Summo Pontifice, and by Cardinal Osius against Brentius, and by other writers of our time.

12. Briefly, then, about the first part, there is open to view a received distinction about the Pontiff qua believer, as he is a private person, or qua teacher, as he is a Pontiff. For we say that the promise of Christ pertains to him as taken in the second way; for in this way he is the rock on whose firmness depends in its kind the firmness of the Church. But in this way no trace of heresy is shown by heretics to exist in the whole succession of Supreme Pontiffs. But, when considering the person of the Pontiff in the first way, even Catholics are in controversy about whether a Pontiff could be a heretic, and the quarrel is still undecided whether some Pontiff was, not by presumption alone, but really such. But this question does not pertain to the foundations of faith, and therefore we now pass it over. And for the sake of avoiding controversy we easily grant that it is not necessary for the promise of Christ to extend to the person of the Pontiff as he is one of the individual believers. But if someone insists that the person of Peter as individual believer could, for the same reason, have defected from the faith, notwithstanding the promise of Christ, we reply first that the reason is not the same about Peter, because to him was the promise immediately made, and therefore it was made to him not only as to his office but also as to his person; but to the others it only descended by succession, and therefore it was communicated to them as successors of Peter. Next we add that Peter not only had this promise but also the other promises that were common to the apostles, by reason of which all of them had, so to say, personal confirmation, as well in grace as in faith and doctrine.

13. But to the other part, about the errors that are attributed to the Pontiffs, we say briefly that it is one thing to speak about the decrees of Pontiffs insofar as they thereby define something or approve it as to be believed or observed by the Universal Church; it is another thing to speak of the private judgments, opinions, or reasons of Pontiffs. For in the present treatise we are treating of the former decrees, and in them is found no false dogma that Pontiffs handed down by way of definition and proposed to the Church for belief, as anyone will easily understand who reads what the authors cited, and Canus in bk.6, De Locis, chs.1 & 8, pursue more at large. But in private judgments or opinions, or even in the reasons which they sometimes use, as it is not necessary that in these they have the certitude of faith, so it is not necessary that they have infallible truth in them either, because this is neither necessary for the firmness or purity of the faith of the Universal Church, nor is it even consonant with the mind and intention of the same Pontiffs. For by the very fact that they are speaking by way of opinion or human valuation, they profess that they are speaking with human reason and wisdom, not with the infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit. But if someone with prudent and pious mind even considers what they handed on in this second way, perhaps he will find nothing which they did not hand down wisely and establish on a sufficiently probable foundation.

Chapter 7: Exclusion of a third evasion by the heretics, which they invent through a distinction between the visible and the invisible Church.

Summary: 1. Presentation of a third evasion by heretics about the invisible Church. 2.

Foundation of the aforesaid error. 3. Visibility of the Church shown from Isaiah 2. 4. Twofold exposition. 5. A response on behalf of the opinion of the heretics is refuted. 6. The visibility of the Church will endure perpetually. 7. Confirmation from the office of teaching. 8. Confirmation from the visible succession of Pontiffs. 9. The Church always perseveres by reason of visible succession. 10. Confirmation lastly from Ephesians ch. 4.

1. In the book of the most serene king of England we find nothing expressly said about this evasion, or about the invisible Church, but we cannot pass it over without confronting it, both so that we might make reply to most of the heretics of this age, for we desire to satisfy all and persuade them of the truth, and also so that we may make the discourse we have begun more fully perfect and so that all vain subterfuges may be blocked. Although many of the heretics, then, because of the open testimonies of the Scriptures, do not deny that the Church of Christ or the Catholic Church will endure and remain perpetually in the true faith, yet, so that they may somehow escape the force of reason and the light of truth, they distinguish a double Church, one true and firm, the other only apparent; they say the first is invisible, the second visible, to bodily eyes. With this distinction supposed, they reply that the invisible Church is the true and Catholic Church of Christ to which the promise was made that it would never fail nor the gates of hell prevail against it. But they say that the other apparent and visible Church, although it may persevere in this external appearance, can fail in the faith, and consequently in the subsistence of the true Church, and that it has already failed in the Roman Church, whose form and appearance they thus depict.

2. Now the foundation of this opinion, insofar as it supposes the true Church to be invisible (for this only is the focus of the present disputation), is that the form constituting the true Church is invisible in itself and is not made by any sign so manifestly visible that it could be therein seen. Such form therefore is simply invisible. For whatever is visible can be seen either in itself or at least in some other thing as in a sign. If therefore the form constituting the Church can be seen in neither of these ways, surely it is altogether invisible. Therefore the true Church too, as it is such, is invisible, because although the persons from whom it is constituted may be seen materially, as it were, with respect to their bodies or their external human actions, yet as far as they constitute the Church they cannot be seen. So similarly, if the soul of man, which in itself is invisible, could not be seen through external working, surely man qua man would be invisible; and if the human body exercised no movement of life which could be sensed, surely it would qua living be invisible, even if the body itself was materially seen.

But it remains to prove that the form of the Church is invisible in both ways set down above. And, to begin with, in every opinion, including ours, it seems necessary to say that the form of the Church is in itself invisible, whether it be predestination (as some of the heretics have said), which is sufficiently invisible, or whether (as others have said) it be charity, or whether it be faith, as Catholics also teach, because not only charity but faith too is a spiritual form as regards its internal quality and so it is in itself invisible. But if there be also added the sacrament of faith, which is baptism, this too is not visible as it is a sacrament; and consequently the spiritual character too, which is also necessary, according to the opinion of Catholics, for constituting someone a member of the Church, is not seen. But further, that this form of the Church cannot be seen in signs or through visible signs is proved by the fact that there are for charity or faith no external signs which cannot be made falsely without interior faith, whether these signs be external works of divine cult, or obedience to the prelates of the Church, or acts of governance on the part of prelates themselves, or works of confession and of profession of faith. Next, the same applies even to the very works of miracles as well; for these too can be corrupted and exteriorly fabricated in such a way that they are not necessary signs of the true faith; therefore nothing visible is left whereby the true form of the Church may be visible. But merely external signs or works do not suffice for constituting the true Church; for just as a particular person, if he does not interiorly believe although he feigns outwardly to be one of the faithful, is not a true member of the Church, especially if he does not have the character of baptism, so any congregation or multitude of men, even if it congregate through external works of religion and faith, would not be the true Church if it did not have internal faith; therefore, since this faith is always invisible, both in itself and in another, the true Church is also invisible. Which foundation is particularly present in the opinion of Protestants, who reduce the faith of each person into private spirit or a revelation made proper to each person, for that private spirit is without doubt invisible.

And discussion of these things seems above all to touch both on the point of controversy and on the motive of heretics. But as to the other things which are wont to be adduced by them against external cult, so as to prove that in the Church there ought only to be a spiritual and hence an invisible cult, these are not accepted by all the heretics of this time but there is division between them on this matter, nor do they have any importance for the present case. Because although the law of grace comes into being principally in the spirit, yet it does not exclude works, which proceed from internal charity; and likewise, although the Church's adoration takes place in spirit and in truth, yet it does not exclude an external cult proceeding from the interior one, as has been shown in the proper place about the law of grace, about religion, about the sacraments, and about sacrifice. As to the other things too that are wont here to be added, about the fact that the Church sometimes lies so hidden, because of the force of persecution, that it cannot be seen, these do not pertain to the present place but to another that is to be treated of below about the universality of the Church. But in addition to the foundation here stated, heretics add on some testimonies to which response must be made. For first they object from Scripture the verse of Luke 17.20-21: "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: Neither shall they say, Lo here! Or, Lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you," for by the kingdom of God here the Church is understood, which elsewhere is called, 1 Peter 2.5, "a spiritual house" and, Hebrews 12.22, "the city of the living God," where the Church of Christ seems to be distinguished in this property from the visible Synagogue. Secondly, they bring forward the words of the Creed, "I believe in one holy Church," for if it were visible it would not be an object of belief; if therefore the Church is to be believed by faith, it cannot be seen. Lastly they add the place of Augustine, bk.20 De Civitate Dei, ch.8, where he divides the Church into the predestinate and the non-predestinate.

Nevertheless it must be said that the true Church, which Christ founded on the rock and to which he promised that the gates of hell would not prevail against it, is visible; and consequently that the adversaries' evasion is futile, because if this Church is visible and cannot defect from the true faith, and if they themselves have defected from it, as is evident of itself and as they themselves do not deny, it is manifest that they do not have the true faith but heresy. But the proposed foundation, which we believe to be a dogma of the faith, we must first simply prove from Scripture and the Fathers. Then the thing itself (that is, what this visibility of the Church consists in) we must so explain that, once the ambiguity of words and tergiversation have been removed, it can be proved by reason from the principles of the faith.

3. First, therefore, that the Church is visible is proved from the verse of Isaiah 2.2-3: "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established on the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow into it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob." In which place many of the Fathers by "the mountain of the Lord" understand Christ who, in Daniel 2.34-35, is said to be "a stone cut out without hands...[which] became a great mountain," as is clear from Augustine, tract.1 on 1 John, and oration Contra Iudaeos, chs.7 & 8, and from St. Jerome on Isaiah 2, Micah 2, Daniel 2, and from Tertullian, bk. Contra Iudaeos, ch.3. But others seem to understand by 'mountain' the Church, as Augustine, bk.4, Contra Crescon., ch.58, and Chrysostom on Isaiah 2, and Cyril, bk.1, on Isaiah 2. However, they do not disagree in the thing, for in that place the talk is about Christ and the Church as about body and head, and, according to the rule of Augustine, what is said about the body can also be understood of the head, and conversely. Hence in another place, Daniel 2, about the stone cut out that became a great mountain, it is said, v.35, "and it filled the whole earth," namely, Christ did through his Church. But since in the place from Isaiah a mountain and a house of the Lord are distinctly posited, rightly do we understand through 'mountain' Christ and through 'house' the Church. Hence it is said that "the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established," that is, of the Church with Christ its head. Therefore it is there predicted that, as Christ came visibly into the world and by his preaching, signs, and miracles was made known and illustrious to all, so the Church of Christ was going to be visible and to be so made known in the world that it could be recognized by everyone. This point is made sufficiently clear by the following words, which are of all the gentiles saying: "Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob." For men are not invited to come save to a house that can be known and seen by them.

And so does Chrysostom explain it more copiously than the rest when he says: "This thing is so clear that it needs hereafter no interpretation in speech; the very native quality of things has thus sounded out with a voice resounding more clearly than any trumpet, showing to all the glory to be gazed at and the splendor of the Church, for the sun is not resplendent with as much brightness, nor again does the light gleaming from it pour out a radiance as brilliant, as the things done by the Church. For the house of the Lord is set on the highest mountains." And later: "The power of the Church reaches up to the very skies, and as a house placed on the top of the mountains it shows itself conspicuously to all, so much so that it has become more famous yet than all else." A like opinion is advanced by Augustine, bk.3, Contra Epist. Parmeniani, where he says that the just are "throughout the whole city which cannot be hid, because it is founded on a mountain. The mountain I say of Daniel, wherein grew the stone cut out without hands and filled the whole earth." And in the cited tract.1 on 1 John, near the end, he says: "Is not the stone, which is cut out of the mountain without hands, Christ who is from the kingdom of the Jews without the work of a husband?" And a little later: "Do we point to that mountain with a finger?"

And later: “Do we thus point to the Church, my brothers? Is it not open? Is it not manifest?” And after a few intervening remarks: “And when it is said to them (namely heretics), ‘ascend,’ they say, ‘it is not a mountain,’ and more easily do they turn their face against it than seek there a habitation.” And later, having put forward the place from Isaiah, he asks: “What is as manifest as a mountain?” And immediately he objects: “But there are also unknown mountains, as Olympus, etc.” He replies; “Those mountains exist in parts, but this mountain does not so, because it filled the whole earth; who gets lost in this mountain?” And later about heretics he says: “They do not see the mountain. No wonder. Because they walk in darkness and do not have eyes, but the darkness has blinded them.”

And in the same sense do many Fathers interpret the words of Christ, Matthew 5.14: “Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid.” For that this city is the Church is taught by Augustine in the said tract.1, where he says: “Behold the city of which it is said: ‘This is the city set on a hill.’” The same in bk.3, Contra Parmenian., ch.5, and bk.2, Contra Literas Petilian., ch.32, after the verse, Psalms 19.4, “Their line is gone out through all the earth.” Later he says that for this reason is it the case that “the true Church is hidden from no one, which is why the Evangelist said, ‘A city set on a hill cannot be hid,’ and therefore the same psalm draws the connection, v.4, ‘He hath set his tabernacle in the sun,’” which he himself on the same psalm expounds, namely that “he has in manifest light placed his Church, that it may not be hid.” And later: “Why, O heretic, do you fly into the darkness?” And many like things he has in his book De Unitat. Ecclesiae, and bk.3, Contra Faustum, ch.13, where he sets down as a sure sign of the Church of Christ that “it stands out and is manifest to all, because it is the seat of his glory, Jeremiah 17, and the holy temple of God, I Corinthians 3.17,” and afterward he sets down the place from Matthew. The same in the sixth book, ch.17, and in bk.2 Contra Cresconium Grammaticum, ch.36, where he has these notable words: “The whole Church stands out and is conspicuous, a city to be sure which cannot be hid, being set on a mountain, through which Christ dominates from sea to sea and from the river to the uttermost parts of the earth.”

In the same way is that place expounded by Jerome, bk.6, on Jeremiah 30 where too he applies Jeremiah’s own words, v.18, to the Church, “the city shall be builded on her own height and the temple shall be founded in its order.” Jerome says: “More fully and more perfectly in the Lord our Savior and in the apostles are these words fulfilled, that the city is builded on its height, about which it is said that a city placed on a mountain cannot be hid, and the temple is founded in its order and its ceremonies, so that whatever is fulfilled carnally in the earlier people is fulfilled spiritually in the Church.” And he expounds the words of Amos 1.2: “The Lord will roar from Zion” about the watch tower of the Church, “because, being set on a hill (says Matthew 5.14), it cannot be hid, and from it, when the Lord has spoken out his voice through the Old and New Instruments and through the teachers of the Church and has sounded it as a clear trumpet, then the doctrine of the heretics and of the circumcision will be dried up.” And very elegantly does Chrysostom ask, incomplete homil.10 on Matthew: “What is this city?” and he replies: “It is the Church of the saints of which the Prophet said ‘Glorious things of thee are spoken, city of God;’ but the citizens of it are all the faithful of whom the Apostle says, ‘you are the citizens of the saints and the servants of God, etc.’” And later: “This city therefore is set on a hill, that is, on Christ, etc.” And then, joining them together with the other words in v.15, “Neither do men light a candle,” he says: “Through a second comparison Christ wishes to show how he himself makes his saints manifest and does not wish them to be hid.” And later he asks: “What is the candlestick?” And he replies: “The Church, which carries the word of life.” And he adduces the verse of Paul Philippians 2.15-16: “Among whom ye shine as lights in the world: Holding forth the word of life.” Next on the same sentence Rupert rightly there said: “How great, how spacious a city!” And later: “It cannot be hid; the order or reason of judgment or of divine counsel does not allow it to be hid and unknown, which for this purpose was built and for this purpose there hang from it a thousand shields, the whole armor of the strong, so that all who face danger among adversaries, who compete among Jews, pagans, and heretics for the faith, may know they should have recourse to this city and be fortified together within it.”

4. Hence we can, third, establish the same proof by reason taken from the properties that Scripture and the Fathers attribute to the Church. The first condition of the Church of Christ is that it is founded on Peter, Matthew 16; from which foundation it cannot be removed, as was shown above, and as we will say more at large in book three; but this foundation is visible, for it is set in place for governing men; therefore the Church itself too must be visible. And for that reason one of the most powerful signs for recognizing the true Church is the succession of bishops in the pontificate of Peter, as we noted above from Augustine, and from Irenaeus, bk.3, ch.1; and the same is taken from Cyprian, epist.76 to Magnus; but if the true Church were not visible it would not need a visible head nor could it be founded thereon. The second property is akin to this first one, that Christ built a Church of such sort that it could be ruled through men, according to that verse of Acts 20.28: “Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Spirit hath made you bishops, to feed [alt. rule] the Church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood.” Where without doubt the discussion is of the true Church founded by Christ; for it alone did he acquire by his own blood and provided with a fitting governance, which he committed to men and bishops; therefore such a Church must be visible, so that its rulers may look upon it and know it.

The third condition is that the Church can see perceptible actions and hear the human voice, according to the word of Christ, Matthew 18.17: “Tell it unto the Church.” For how may someone speak to a Church that he cannot see, or how will the Church hear the word of man if it is itself not visible? And for that reason too Paul says, 1 Corinthians 10.32: “Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God.” Therefore we can see the Church and take care not to offend it, according to that verse of Paul 1 Timothy 3.15: “That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God;” for how could Timothy know this if he did not know the true Church? And there are infinite like locutions which suppose a certain definite knowledge of a visible Church, as is that in 1 Corinthians 15.9: “I persecuted the Church of God,” and Acts 5.11: “And great fear came upon all the Church.” And like things can be seen in chs.8, 9, 11 and through almost the whole book; and sometimes the discussion is about the whole Church, sometimes about a part of it, or about a particular visible church; but the reasoning about the parts is the same as about the whole; for if the parts are visible, much more will the whole body be visible that consists of them.

5. Perhaps, however, the heretics, convicted by these testimonies, will confess that the primitive Church, which existed at the time of the apostles and a little thereafter, was visible, but afterwards, with the passage of time, the visible Church failed and an invisible one was made. From which response we gladly take the first part. And from it, in the first place, we prove against the heretics that the true Church can be visible, since at some time it was such. From this too incidentally is shown that the reasons of heretics to prove that the Church is invisible are futile; for if they were worth anything they would show that there was something repugnant in the Church being visible, when, however, this fact itself proves there is none. Next, just as we have shown from the Scriptures that the Church in its origin, so to say, was visible, so must they themselves show from the Scriptures that there exists an invisible Church, or that in the Scriptures it is preached that at some point such an invisible Church will exist in the future. A similar argument is urged against the Donatists by Augustine, bk. De Unit. Eccles., ch.17, when he says: "Let them read this to us from the Sacred Scriptures and we will believe; let them, I say, read this to us from the canon of the divine books that so many cities, which have up to the present day kept the baptism consigned to them by the apostles, have perished from the faith." Which argument he pursues in ch.18, taking as supposition at the beginning that the Church is known manifestly in the Sacred Scriptures; and afterwards in ch.19 he again insists: "Setting aside the snares of delays, let Donatus show that the Church has been retained in Africa alone when so many nations have been lost, or that it is from Africa to be repaired and filled in all nations, and let him show it in such a way that he not say, 'It is true because I say so', etc." For he enumerates at large all the things which heretics are wont to invent, and he adds: "Let those figments of lying men or the portents of deceiving spirits be removed;" and afterwards he concludes: "But let them show whether they possess the Church not otherwise than from the canonical books of the divine Scriptures." This argument is all the stronger against the heretics of the present time in that they themselves preach that nothing is to be believed except what is read in the Scriptures. Since therefore we have it from the Scriptures that the Church is visible, and nothing is read there about its being changed into an invisible one, nor can any trace of this be found in the Scriptures, then certainly Protestants are speaking neither consistently nor with any foundation.

6. But further, we prove from the same Scriptures and the Fathers that the second part of their response is false; for the locutions of Scripture, which prove that the Church was visible at the time of the apostles, prove the same about the true and apostolic Church at any time. First, because the promise of not failing was made to the visible Church insofar as Christ founded it on the rock, as is clear from the words: "Upon this rock I shall build my Church and the gates of hell will not prevail against it;" for the word 'it' refers to the same visible Church. Again from Paul 1 Timothy 3.15, after he said the words: "That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God," he subjoins: "which is the pillar and ground of the truth;" but we showed that the first words are understood of a visible Church wherein someone can behave; but the word 'which' refers to the same Church; therefore the visible Church is pillar and ground of the truth, and hence it is perpetual, because, as I showed above, this property can never be separated from the Church. Add that this property can never agree with the Church if the Church is at some time to be invisible; for it is the pillar and ground of the truth by always and without fail teaching the truth and correcting errors; but it could not do this with authority and efficaciously if it was invisible, for there could always be doubt whether it was the true Church speaking. Next, many of the locutions adduced from Scripture were advanced as holding of it for any time at all; therefore they prove about all time that the Church is visible. The assumption is clear, for when Christ admonished, in Matthew 18.17: "Tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican," he was instructing not only the men who were listening to him, nor the primitive Church only, but his whole Church, as enduring perpetually into the future. Therefore he was supposing that his Church was always going to be visible, so that it could be heard and could hear. And the same argument can be taken from the words of Paul just cited; for the admonishment to behave in a fitting way in the Church, or to act without offending it, is extended to all time and is to be kept at every time; therefore the Church is always such as to be able to be seen.

7. There is besides another striking property of the true Church, which continually requires this visibility, namely that outside it salvation cannot be preserved or found, as it is a certain truth of faith which is handed down by Cyprian, epist. 74, where he has the sentence: "No one can have God as Father who does not the Church as mother." Which he repeats in his book De Unit. Ecclesiae not far from the beginning, where among other things he compares the Church to Noah's Ark, saying: "If anyone who was outside Noah's Ark was able to escape, he too who is outside the Church will escape." And he speaks openly of the Church founded on the chair of Peter; and he hands on the same doctrine in many other places. Again Augustine, in bk. De Unitat. Ecclesiae, chs. 2 & 19, teaches the same thing, and he confirms it by the fact that "no one comes to salvation and eternal life except he who has Christ the head; but no one could have Christ the head except he who was in his body, which is the Church." Wherefore from this property it is rightly collected that the true Church ought at every time to be visible, because at every time it is the body of Christ, to which all must be united who wish to obtain salvation; and it is the city of refuge, to which they must have recourse who wish to be protected and defended from enemies. But it would be contrary to right order, and we have already related it from Rupert, that a Church instituted to this end should be placed in shadow and darkness; therefore, since it is preserved perpetually for the same end, it must also be perpetually conspicuous, clear, and visible. And therefore very appositely did Irenaeus say, bk. 1 Contra Haereses, ch. 2: "The Church disseminated in the whole world, as if inhabiting one house, diligently guards this faith; and likewise it believes those things as having one soul and one heart, and agreeably preaches, teaches, and hands them on as possessing one mouth." And later he subjoins: "As the sun, the creation of God, is one and the same in the whole world, so also the light, the preaching of the truth, shines everywhere and illumines all who wish to come to the knowledge of the truth." Which comparison is also imitated by Cyprian, bk. De Unit. Eccles., when he says: "The Church is one, which is extended more broadly into a multitude by the increase of fertility; as the rays of the sun are many but the light is one so take the ray of the sun from the body, its unity does not admit of division of the light." Which place is cited by Augustine, bk. 1, Contra Crescon., ch. 36, when he says: "This (namely the city of the Church) blessed Cyprian commends in such way that he says, bathed in the light of the Lord, it stretches out its rays through the whole earth, etc." And thus too Origen, tract. 3, on Matthew: "The Church is full of brightness from the East to the West, and it is full of true light, which Church is the pillar and ground of the truth." And it is signified by Augustine and others who, as we said above, adapt to it the verse of the psalm: "he has placed his tabernacle in the sun," and the verse of Jeremiah: "it itself is the seat of his glory, which stands out and is apparent to all." And therefore it is also compared by other Fathers to the candlestick that holds the candle, "so as to shine," says Chrysostom, "that is, so as to appear and illumine those who are either in the house of the Church or in the house of all the pure." Next, for this cause, the same Chrysostom says, hom. 4, on Isaiah 6, "it is easier for the sun to be extinguished than for the Church to be obscured."

8. Again in another way we can refute the aforesaid evasion of the heretics, and confirm Catholic truth, by taking the same principle conceded by the adversaries, that the Church of Christ in its origin was visible and most known, as is sufficiently proved from Scripture, and it is especially manifest from the words of Christ and of The Acts of the Apostles. For this Church is propagated and preserved in the way it was founded; therefore as it was visible at the beginning so it is perpetually preserved. And indeed the minor premise, as regards propagation, is clear from the same Acts. For the Church first put down roots in Jerusalem, afterwards it increased through Judea, then extended to Samaria, and at length spread through all nations and the whole globe, and always in all places it was visible. And it is in this way that particular churches are as it were made known and manifest, both in the said sacred history and in the apostolic letters, and they are put forward and named in the book of the Apocalypse. But as for what concerns preservation or duration, it is clear too that the Church has, so to say, in a sensible way persevered through a continuous and visible succession of Pontiffs, bishops, doctors and the other faithful and members of the Church; and from this too we can collect that it will persevere in the same way as long as the world will last, because the same reason holds for any time whatever.

In this discourse it only remains to prove that the duration of the Church was always, by reason of succession, in a visible state; but this can be proved in the first place from the doctrine of the Fathers. For Tertullian, De Praescript., ch.20, thus describes the continuous duration of the Church: “The apostles, once faith in Jesus Christ had first been witnessed to in Judea and churches there established, traveled thence over the world and preached the same doctrine of the same faith among the nations, and founded churches from which other churches borrowed and daily borrow the vine-graft of the faith, so that churches should come to exist and be thereby themselves esteemed apostolic; as offspring of the apostolic churches every kind must be counted back to its origin.” And so he concludes that from all the churches a single one coalesces. Which is true of the Church not only as it exists together at the same time, but also as it persists successively through the communication and union of the present with the past and through legitimate succession; which he explains more in ch.32, saying that the churches which profess themselves apostolic must show the order of their bishops, by taking it back to the apostles.

9. The same doctrine is handed on at large by Cyprian, bk. De Unit. Eccles., and epist.76, where among other things he says: “Nor can he be counted a bishop who, having despised the evangelical and apostolic tradition, succeeds to no one and has sprung up from himself,” and so he posits as a note of the Church the succession of Pontiffs. And in epist.69 he says that: “The bishop is in the Church and the Church in the bishop, and if anyone is not with a bishop he is not in the Church, and in vain do they flatter themselves who, not having peace with the priests, sneak up and secretly believe themselves to be with some in communion, although the Church, which is a single Catholic one, is not cut nor divided but is certainly connected and joined by the bond of priests who are in harmony with each other.” In the same way is this continuous unity of the Church declared by Irenaeus, bk.3, Contra Haereses, chs.2 & 3. And Augustine thinks the same Contra Epistolam Fundamenti, and in the other places cited, and also Vincent of Lerins and the others above mentioned. Among whom there is a common sentiment that the Church has persevered through continuous succession in the same hierarchical order in which it was founded, and hence in the same visible state in which it was known and manifest; since otherwise there could not be agreement about continuous succession and tradition.

10. And this discussion can deservedly be founded on Paul, Ephesians 4.11-13: “And he gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers; For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.” For from these words it is clear that this Church, which grows together from several members after the fashion of a single body and is preserved through their mutual work and the flowing of them into each other (as the same apostle taught, 1 Corinthians 12), will have the same form “till we all come together to the perfect man.” And hence teachers and pastors are to endure in it through continuous succession and to rule it in a perceptible way and teach it; which can in no way be made sense of unless the true Church should persevere always visible and touchable (so to explain it) in a human way, for the head cannot be visible and the body invisible, as Augustine rightly said, ep.48 to Vincentius, near the middle.

Chapter 8: The objections of the adversaries are met, and the sense in which the Church is visible is explained.

Summary: 1. Final evasion on behalf of the opinion of the heretics, that the Church is an object of belief for the intellect but is not known to the senses. 2. How the true Church is to be believed. 3. Proof of the first part. 4. Confirmation of the second part. 5. How the Church is visible to sense. 6. Response of the heretics. 7. That the Church is visible to sense through signs is shown. 8. Signs of the Catholic Church. 9. Another sign received from the Fathers: the antiquity and firmness of the Church. 10. This sign squares with none of the conventicles of the heretics. 11. First evasion of the heretics; refutation. 12. Second evasion; response. 13. Solution of the arguments. 14. Explanation from the Fathers. 15. Explanation of the author.

1. In these ways, then, as I think, has sufficient demonstration been given from the principles of the faith and from the testimonies of Sacred Scripture that the true Church ought to be cognizable or known. Someone could, however, say that the conclusion is not sufficiently drawn therefrom that the Church is visible or apparent to the external senses, but at most that it is believable, as it is proposed for belief in the Creed; and that in this way it is known to the intellect but not to sense. Hence the heretics could elude everything we have adduced by saying that their own church, which they say is invisible, is sufficiently known to those who have true faith. And the Protestant Anglicans especially (with whom there is said to endure a form of ecclesiastical hierarchy and a shadow of the episcopacy and of ministry) could say that among them the Church perseveres in that external and sensible form which it had in the times of the apostles. And yet, they say, there can be no discerning by sense that it is the true Church any more than that the Roman is, nor conversely, and therefore they call it invisible; but it is not unknowable, because they hold it to be by their own faith sufficiently known.

2. This is the final objection and evasion which I could think of on the part of the heretics, and I have not judged it should be omitted because through the solution of it every tergiversation of the Protestants will be taken away, and the efficacy of the testimonies and the reasons which we have adduced will be more understood, and the remaining objections too, that were set down at the beginning [chapter 7 §2], will the more easily be dissolved. To make an attack, then, on the thing we first take what seems to be conceded in this objection, that the true Church is known or knowable, at least by faith, as everything we have hitherto adduced sufficiently testifies. And on this point we add two things. One is that this is to be understood not of the Church as it is grasped confusedly or universally, by abstracting from this or that congregation of men existing in the world that could attribute this name to itself, but it is to be understood of the Church taken definitely and in particular, as it is in a congregation of such men professing the faith of Christ. The other is that this Church is to be in particular believed in, not by any probable or human faith, but by most certain and infallible divine faith.

3. Each of these things can be proved from the Creed of the apostles, wherein we profess that we believe the holy Catholic Church. For this is to be understood of a definite and of a singular Church. For since the true Catholic Church is only one individual and particular, that locution, which seems indefinite, is equivalent to a singular one; just as he who says he sees the sun is understood at once to be speaking of that single sun which is in the world. And in this way does Augustine expound it De Fide et Symbolo, ch.10, and Ruffinus in his exposition of the Creed, and everyone else. For by the force of that faith we are bound to believe that it is the true Church in which we are and whose faith we profess, and consequently we are bound to believe that the conventicles of the heretics are not the true Church but the synagogue of Satan, Apocalypse 2, or as Ruffinus says, the Church of the wicked; therefore, so that we may be able by means of the faith to discern the true Church from the false, that faith must concern some such congregation in particular. Next, from the reason given above about the necessity for this knowledge, the conclusion evidently follows that this faith should be about an individual such Church, because we must seek a Church in which we may be sanctified, or which we may believe, or in which we may be able to receive the true sacraments with fruit and persevere to the end and finally be saved. But no one can seek a Church in general or abstractly conceived, because the search in question is not a speculative but a practical one, necessary for the chief operations of this life; but such searching or joining must be concerned with a particular Church, because actions, as the Philosopher said, concern singulars; therefore too we can and must know a singular and individual Church, holy and apostolic.

4. Hence is the second thing we proposed also easily proved, namely, that we must believe this Church not only with human faith and opinion but most of all with divine and Christian faith. First, because we are with this certain and divine faith to believe whatever is contained in the Creed, but one of the things proposed for belief in the Creed is this particular and individual Church, as I have made plain; therefore we are to believe it with infused and altogether certain faith. Second, this is very much confirmed by Augustine, epist.28, where he says that this faith is no less founded on Scripture itself than is faith in the man Jesus Christ. "For how," he says, "are we confident that from the divine writings we have received an evident Christ but not an evident Church?" Hence he often objects there against the Donatists: "You are uncertain where the Church is;" and chiefly to this he tries to draw them, as to a great absurdity. "But we," he concludes, "are for this reason certain that no one could justly separate himself from the communion of all the nations, that none of us seeks the Church in his own justice but in the divine Scriptures, and observes it to be given as it was promised."

Third, the same is proved from the necessity declared above of knowing the true Church; for faith in the true Church is, in its order and according to God, the foundation for the rest of what is believed and for all the actions necessary for salvation; since we receive from it the Sacred Scripture, according to that widely publicized opinion of Augustine: "I would not believe the Gospel if the authority of the Church did not move me," Contra Epistolam Fundamenti, ch.5. From the same Church we receive the true sense of the Scriptures, as we will touch upon in the next chapter; from it we receive the creeds, the sacraments, the precepts, the counsels, and everything that pertains to salvation; therefore if faith about the Church itself were only human opinion, all the rest would be held only by opinion; so divine faith would perish. And, conversely, there would be no congregation of heretics that did not believe with sufficient faith that it was holy and Catholic, because each heretic believes his church to be holy and apostolic, but he believes with human faith, which is capable of being false; but in this respect he differs from a Catholic; therefore the faith which the Catholic conceives about the true Church is far higher, and therewith altogether infallible and divine.

5. Moreover, we can from these points collect and add, third, what is of the greatest service to our intention, namely, in which true sense this Church is said to be visible. For by a twofold reason is it reckoned to be of this sort: first, because the Church which we believe by faith to be true is a certain object which can be seen by sight, heard by the ears, and in some way dealt with by the hands. For this is customarily enough for some believed object to be said to be sensible, even if we believe about it some invisible mystery; thus the sacraments are called sensible although the formal reason of the sacrament or its truth are not perceived. Nay even Christ the Lord was a visible object when he walked on earth, and yet by divine faith he is believed to be true Messiah by many who could rightly say that they see the Messiah whom they were hoping for and whom they believed to be present, according to that verse of Matthew 13.17: "Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see." And after his resurrection the same Christ the Lord said to Thomas, John 20.29: "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed." Which Gregory made plain when he said: "He saw one, he believed the other;" yet about him whom he saw he believed what he did not see, and thus that faith had a sensible object. Such therefore can we say about the Church, for about it, which we see in these persons and these places, we believe that it is holy and apostolic, which fact we do not see with bodily eyes.

6. Finally the Protestants will lay down as obstacle that their own church too is in this way visible, because their congregation, which they see, they believe to be the true Church. We reply, to begin with, that on this point we have with them no contention, because we do not hesitate at all over whether their congregation is visible or not; but it was they who invented the term of the invisible Church. Yet this difference always intervenes, that they falsely believe the congregation they see to be the true Church, but we believe with certain and infallible faith that the Catholic or Roman Church, which we also see, is the true Church. Next there is another difference; for the adversaries cannot avoid saying that their own congregation, or the association of their opinion, at some time did not exist or that it was invisible, namely before they existed, because then it was seen by none, or it was not known as the object about which they were to believe that it was the true Church of Christ. Nay, it was on account of the time when they themselves did not exist that they thought up that way of speaking about the invisible Church, so that they might in some way be able to say that the true Church had never ceased to be in the world, although for many years, as for example from Pope Gregory up to Luther or Wycliffe or someone similar, it was invisible. Which they also lay down only according to their own brain and without foundation; for if the true Church was altogether unknown and invisible for all that time, on what ground can they show that it existed somewhere, or who revealed it to them? For if they only collect it from the promises and predictions about the perpetuity of the Church, they must confess that it always continued visible, that is, cognized and known in particular, because such was what was predicted and promised, as has been shown, and because it was always so believed by the Christian world, just as the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds have always endured in the world from the time they were made and have always been believed in the true Church.

7. A second reason on account of which the true Church can rightly be said to be visible, not only as to the material congregation of men but also as to the internal form and reason of the Church, although not in itself but in another, as the Scholastics are wont to say, is that it has been allotted visible or sensible signs and effects whereby it may be seen. Just as the soul of a horse or also of a man can be said to be visible, though otherwise than the body is; for the body is seen in itself and the soul not in itself but in its acts or its operations. Hence the body can be said to be visible in an animal way, that is merely sensitively; but the soul in a rational way, that is, with the aid of reason, by joining discourse to sense. As Paul said, Romans 1.20: "For the invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made;" or as Christ the Lord, when asked by John through his disciples, Matthew 11.3, "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?” replied, vv.4-5, “Go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see: The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, etc.” As if he were to say: in the signs which I do you can see that I am the Messiah, because I exhibit those things that were predicted in the prophets, Isaiah 35, 6. And for this reason the same Lord said, John 15.24: “If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin,” because, that is, by these was it made manifest that they were obliged to have faith in him.

8. We say, then, that in this way is the Church visible, that it has always exhibited the signs and, as it were, the visible rays of its truth, so that in them, or through them, it could and ought to be seen. Which, in the first place, I take from all the testimonies of the holy Fathers whereby I have proved above the visibility of the Church, for all of them explain it by its visible effects which have made it openly visible to the world. Also especially from the words of Augustine just cited: “each of us seeks the Church...in the divine Scriptures and observes it to be given as it was promised.” For a Church was promised having the sort of properties and signs in the completion of which it could be seen. This is made plain from the words of Christ, Mark 16.15: “Go into the whole world, and preach the Gospel,” as if he were to say: Plant the Church by sowing the word of the Gospel and by baptizing; for from baptized believers it is to be gathered. And at once he subjoins, v.17: “And these signs shall follow them that believe,” and he sets down five sensible signs as sure indications of his Church, which are read afterwards in Acts to have been fulfilled; for these were not given for recognizing the faith of individual believers but of recognizing the congregation of the faithful who truly believe in Christ, which is the true Church.

And in this way through these signs, understood as to the letter, and through other works of holiness that were signified through them (as was Gregory’s interpretive intention, homil.29 on the Gospels, and Bernard’s serm.1 De Ascensione), the Church was made visible at once from its beginning, and has continued afterwards in the same way, as we showed above. Not through the duration and continuation as it were of all those signs, but through a continuous succession which is also in its way visible and evident to men; and in this way in those signs is the Church seen which now is, because it is the same as that which was then, and its unity is from that very succession sufficiently recognized. Hence Augustine appositely enough says, bk. De Utilitate Credendi, ch.26: “Those things were done most opportunely so that, when by them a multitude of believers had been gathered and propagated, their useful authority would be converted into very morals.” He then makes the addition that “because those signs,” although they are not as frequent, nevertheless “lest they should become worthless by repetition,” as in the same place the same Augustine further adds, “or lest the mind should always seek visible things,” as the same says in bk.1, De Vera Relig., ch.25, have indeed not altogether ceased in the true Church of Christ but they happen at opportune times according to the disposition of divine providence, as Augustine also noted above, and bk.22, De Civit. Dei, ch.8.

9. Additionally, besides those transitory signs, as it were, which were more necessary at the beginning of the nascent Church, other signs were given which can be called permanent and, as it were, intrinsic, because they are so requisite in the Church itself that they last always along with it. Which things are said by Catholics to be the Notes of the true Church, which have been very extensively handled by many of them, but we are not now taking up that province; for some of those signs are, with a view to the present purpose, enough and it is on them we have touched. One sign, and most commended by the Fathers, is antiquity, which we have declared by the name of succession and origin, and our discussion in chapter 8 will return to this same sign. A second sign is that the Church remains founded on the same rock on which Christ founded it, and that it perseveres unmoved and faithful, and on this point are sufficient the things said in chapters 3 and 4, and which we will add in book three. Another sign, which in bk. De Unit. Eccles. and in many others is much commended by Augustine against the Donatists, is spatial extent, or (so to say) the ubiquity of the Catholic Church diffused through the whole world, and about this we will add some things in chapter 10. These, then, are all the visible signs, and through them is the Church made visible, not in an animal but in a rational way, and a way proper to faith, because, on the supposition of the promise and prediction of such signs of the true Church of Christ, when those signs are seen to be in some congregation the true Church is seen to be believable, at least in terms of general reason, according to the way of speaking of St. Thomas, Ila Ilae, q.1, a.4, ad2 and ad3, and a.5 ad1, that is, by these signs any prudent man sees that one should believe about this sort of congregation, but not about another, that it is the true Church.

10. Moreover, once the visibility of the Church is explained in this way, no follower of the new dogmas, or no defender of the Anglican sect, can say at all that his congregation is the visible and true Church; and the same I think is to be decided about any conventicle of heretics. The proof is that they do not exhibit the signs or have the notes by which the truth of the Church of Christ may so there appear that it would be believable according to prudent reason that it is the true Church which Christ established and which he promised would endure perpetually. For the congregation under that sect does not have antiquity, as is clear from the fact above referred to. Nor does it have an origin worthy of the Church of Christ, for as Tertullian, De Praescript. ch.30, said in a simile (changing the words): “Where then is Luther? Where then Calvin? For it is clear that they did not exist long ago, and clear that belief in the Roman Church was first in the Catholic faith until, under the pontificate of Leo X, they, because of ambition and restless affection of mind, disseminated the poison of their doctrines.” On which matter we will say more below in chapter 12. Next, their association does not have the foundation of the rock on which Christ founded his Church and on which he promised it would endure, as has been shown, but rather they directly profess defection from that foundation, nay they attack it with vehement hatred. In addition to these things, their association is not widely extended but lies hidden in a certain corner of the earth, and it does not even occupy the whole of that, nor does it have agreement there in doctrine but an almost infinite variety and division. I pass over the fact that it has no signs of supernatural virtue, nor of divine light or true sanctity, since it so easily abandons the ancient lights of the Catholic Church, the saints, I mean, the Fathers and the doctors, and as it were contemns them, and it laughs petulantly at the path of exceptional sanctity and perfection. What prudent man, therefore, when he has attentively considered all these things, could think, let alone confidently believe, that there is the true Church of Christ?

11. Perhaps some of the heretics will say that they do have sufficient signs of the true Church, because they have the true Scriptures, and the legitimate sense of them, and the sacraments of Christ, and a life good and honorable and in conformity with the precepts of Christ. But these are in part common to all heretics and also to the true Church of Christ, as to have Scripture, and some of the sacraments of Christ, and a show of virtue or religion, at least in appearance, and therefore from these alone the true Church cannot be made visible in the aforesaid sense. But some are false, as we believe, and are in themselves obscure, and must be believed rather than seen, and therefore they are ineptly brought forward as signs of the visible Church. Such is what they say about the true sense of Scripture; for this sense is often hidden and needs rather to be defined by the true Church. And the case is similar with what is said about the number, truth, and legitimate use of the sacraments. But as for what regards sanctity of life, although in individual persons it is hidden and uncertain, yet in the profession and state of its perfection the Anglican sect has nothing to commend it and nothing wherein to be compared with the sanctity of the Catholic Church. Wherefore the adversaries would more correctly say that in this sense their church is invisible, and they should as a consequence confess that it is not the true church; for the true Church of Christ is visible, not only because there is definite knowledge where it is and in what visible persons, but also because it exhibits itself to the senses to be evidently credible as the true Church of Christ, as has been sufficiently declared and proved.

12. I know there will not be lacking those who say that although in their sect all those signs of a visible and evidently credible Church are lacking, yet they themselves are rendered certain within by a peculiar spirit or revelation of God that the true Church is with them. But this evasion is more to be laughed at than attacked; for, as Augustine rightly said, bk. De Unit. Eccles., ch.2: “When there is a question between us and heretics where the Church is, what are we to do? Are we to make enquiry in our words or in the words of Christ? I think in the words of Christ who is truth and very well knows his own body.” Which he pursues at large, excluding not only private spirit but also the interpretation of Scripture according to the sense of heretics. Hence this evasion of a private spirit is common to all and each dogma of that sect, and therefore, as to this part, we will in the following chapter more fully bring this disputation to completion.

13. Now there only remains for us to make satisfaction to the reason for doubting and to the objections posed at the beginning, which will indeed, from what has already been said, be a very easy business. The chief foundation, therefore, on which the adversaries rest for support, only proves that the interior form of the Church, which is true faith with baptismal character, is not in itself visible or sensible. It does not however prove that there is not a visible and mystical human body about which it is certainly clear that such form exists in it. Again, it does not prove that that form is not visible in something else, or in signs, by which it is sufficiently made manifest. Because, although by these signs faith or sanctity may not be sufficiently shown in the individual members of the Church, because of the pretense that could exist in any determinate person, nevertheless these signs do sufficiently show that in this body there exists the true faith of Christ and true sanctity, because without them the true Church of Christ cannot exist. But I say ‘sufficiently show’, not because these signs make the gifts evidently manifest, for they are supernatural and hidden and are believed through faith, but because they do at least make the thing evidently credible in the sense in which we said that the Church, as regard this point, is visible in its notes and signs.

14. As for the testimony of Luke 17, the reply is that this testimony is often wont in this matter to be objected by the Fathers against the heretics who assert that the Church is hidden or secret. Thus Augustine, bk.13, Contra Faustum, ch.13, expounding the similar place in Matthew 24.23-26, says: “The Lord, seeing ahead, says that a city set on a hill cannot be hid, etc., so that they may not be listened to who bring divisions into religion, saying, Lo here is Christ, lo there, etc.” And later: “Nor are they to be listened to who under the name as it were of a secret and apocryphal truth and fewness of men say, Lo in secret chambers, lo in the desert.” And bk.1 Quaestionum Evangelicarum, q.38, by the lightning, which cometh out of the East and reacheth even unto the West, he understands the Church, which quickly captured the whole world, and he connects the places together: “After the authority, therefore, of the Church is clear and manifest through the world, he consequently admonishes the disciples and all the faithful, and those who wished to believe in him, not to believe in schismatics and heretics. For each schism and each heresy either has its place in the world, holding some part of it, or, in dark and secret conventicles, deceives the curiosity of men.” And in this sense he explains the whole of Christ’s sermon, and therefore he says that Christ warned them beforehand, “Do not believe” those who say “Lo here, lo there is Christ.” And Origen thinks the same, tract. 30 on Matthew, when he says: “They do not point to him in the Church, which is full of lightning, which is full of true light.” And the same opinion is insinuated by Jerome on Matthew 24, at the words, v.26: “If they shall say to you...,” where he says, “or in the inner chambers of heretics, who promise the secrets of God, do not believe.” And this opinion is very true and is contained virtually in the words of Christ, although it be not there principally intended.

15. So in the place, then, from Luke 17, there are two parts or two opinions of Christ to be distinguished. The first, which is referred to in the objection, is where Christ speaks of the kingdom of God where ‘kingdom of God’ without doubt does not signify the Church but Christ himself or his coming. For the Pharisees asked Christ, v.20, “when the kingdom of God should come,” that is, when it will come. Because they were not asking about the Church, but about the kingdom which they were hoping to obtain through the Messiah, and they were calling that the kingdom of God, not because they thought something heavenly or spiritual about it, but because they were hoping for it from a special gift of God through the virtue and power of the Messiah, or because they had heard Christ himself often speaking about the kingdom of God; but they themselves did not think anything about the kingdom of the Messiah save what was temporal and belonged to exterior power and majesty. And that is why Christ responded to them, vv.20-21: “The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: Neither shall they say, Lo here! or lo there!” Where he is not speaking of heretics but is excluding an expectation of the Messiah by way of the coming of a temporal king, who is wont to be expected with definite observation of time and with other signs preceding, from which it is customarily to be conjectured where he is or when he will come. And in order to take away their false thought about a future advent of the kingdom of God, as if it had not yet come, Christ adds, v.21: “For behold, the kingdom of God is within you,” because the Messiah, whom they were hoping for, they already had dwelling among them, although without the royal trappings that they were thinking of. It is also probable that the Jews had asked about the kingdom of God, which Christ was preaching, although they did not understand of what sort it was. But Christ replied that the kingdom, as far as it can in this life be obtained, is spiritual, and therefore is not something that can be hoped for at a certain time or place, because it is both within man and in the power of each to have it within himself, if he wish to receive Christ through faith and love.

The second part of the opinion of Christ is very distinct from the first, so that some think that the words were not spoken consecutively or at the same time, and at any rate it is certain from the Gospel that in the first part Christ spoke to the Pharisees by replying to them; but in the second part he spoke to his disciples and through them to all the faithful, by forestalling them and saying, vv.22-23: “The days will come... And they shall say to you, See here: or, see there.” And this part without doubt pertains to the second coming of Christ, and it contains the prediction of many who are to be transformed into false Christs and especially antichrists; against whose performance and deceptions Christ, giving warning in advance to the faithful, fortified them beforehand not to give their trust to those who point and say, “Lo here, or lo there is Christ.” And so from that place nothing is collected that is relevant to the present cause; for rather this second part is adapted very well against heretics, as I noted above. But the first part, understood about the first coming of Christ, clearly does not pertain in any way to the question about the Church. Nay too, those words do not at all exclude the first coming of Christ from being sensible and visible, so that he may be looked for in some definite place and pointed to, as the Magi inquired “where the Christ was to be born,” and rightly was the response given to them, “in Bethlehem of Judea.” Namely, through the sign of the prophet, for such signs given by the prophets were rightly being looked on for the expectation and knowledge of the Messiah, nay through such signs he himself sometimes made himself manifest. Therefore in those words he is excluding human thinking, lest he be thought to be inquired after or expected through signs and human observations and with the trappings of a royal king, etc. But if the response of Christ be understood of the spiritual kingdom of the soul, it is clear that it is spiritual and internal, and that for this reason it is not visible and is not bound to a definite place and time insofar as such a kingdom is found in individual persons. And in this way too the whole Church can be called the kingdom of God, and the city of the living God, and the spiritual house, and invisible in itself as concerns sanctity and spiritual gifts, and yet visible as to the persons in which it exists, but not through human reasonings, nor here or there, but through definite indications given by Christ and the prophets, and in any place and at any time because it is perpetual and universal, as Augustine observed.

As to the words of the Creed, we have made it sufficiently plain how the holy and apostolic Church can be seen and believed; for it is seen as to the persons from which it is made up, but it is believed as to true faith, sanctity, and the other divine gifts by which it is joined to Christ as his mystical body. Again it is seen through visible signs, but it is believed by reason of truth and supernatural object. To the place from Augustine I reply that Augustine never distinguished the Church of the predestinate and the reprobate as two Churches, nay not even as two parts of the same Church. For only at the beginning of that chapter 8, bk.20, De Civitate Dei, speaking of antichrist, he says: “Never will the Church predestinate and elect before the foundation of the world be seduced by him,” where Augustine does not distinguish the Church but names it from its more important part, just as in ch.9 he says that sometimes a whole is denominated from its part. For Augustine was showing in the said chapter that the Church was not to be seduced by antichrist, namely in its totality or as to its chief part, and for that reason he called it predestinate, not because there is some invisible church made up only of the predestinate, but to signify, as regard the chief part of it, which exists in the elect and predestinate, that it cannot be deceived, as is signified in the words of Christ, Matthew 24.24: “Insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect.”

Chapter 9: The king of England, since he does not admit the complete Scripture nor the unwritten word of God, is shown not to be defender of the truly Christian Faith.

Summary: 1. Faith signifies both the matter and the act of belief. 2. The king of England does not accept the integral Christian Faith. 3. Foundation of the faith of the king of England. 4. The sacred books of both the first and the second order are canonical. Scripture alone is not the integral and proximate foundation of faith. The unwritten word of God is to be received with the same faith as the written. 5. The traditions are confirmed by reason. 6. The evasion of heretics is refuted. 7. From the words of the king himself the same truth is established. 8. An authority to which the Holy Spirit gives his special assistance is necessary in the Church. 9. The Church pays attention to the unwritten word of God with the same certainty as to the written. 10. By the authority of the Fathers are the traditions made firm. 11. The truth is confirmed lastly with examples. 12. Certain of the Fathers, who seem not much to favor the traditions, are explained.

1. So far a demonstration has been given in general that the true faith is not in the Anglican sect, because that sect was introduced by defection from the true faith. And, taking this as occasion, we digressed to show that the faith from which it earlier defected (which was not other than the faith of the Catholic Church, Roman and visible) had always been, and was always indubitably going to be, the true faith; so that therefore it is most certainly clear that in the Anglican schism the true faith cannot exist. And although from this fact it be luminous even to the blind that the king of England, who professes himself head and protector of that schism, is not the defender of the true faith, yet, because he adorns himself with three illustrious titles and extols the faith which he defends, for he calls himself defender “of the truly Christian, Catholic, and Apostolic faith,” therefore I have thought it worthwhile to run singly through these three prerogatives of the faith, and show from the individual reasons for them that a title of this sort cannot agree with him who defends the Anglican schism.

Attacking the thing, therefore, from the truly Christian faith, I note that in two ways can the faith be denominated truly Christian, namely from the matter believed and from the reason for believing. For even the name itself of faith sometimes signifies the things believed, or the doctrine itself of the faith, as Athanasius said in his Creed: “This is the Catholic Faith, which unless each will have believed faithfully and firmly, he cannot be saved.” Sometimes, however, it designates the act or virtue of believing, as it does in Paul Hebrews 11.1: “Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.” In the former way, to be sure, that faith will be called truly Christian which was truly delivered by Christ or by the apostles in his name. But, in the latter way, assent to the same doctrine, when not conceived by human opinion or reason but is entirely divine and has so much certainty and firmness that no place is left for fear or doubt, will be labeled true faith, according to that verse of Paul, 2 Timothy 1.12: “For I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him.” Which words, although they indicate confidence, or sure hope, yet that hope is founded on the certitude of faith, and thereof the apostle speaks about it literally when he says that he is certain of the omnipotence of God, for this is the object, not of confidence, but of assent. But more evident are the words in Galatians 1.8: “Though we, or an angel from heaven, etc.” Hence clear too is that statement of Athanasius in his Creed: “which unless each will have believed faithfully and firmly, he cannot be saved.” And that of Basil, homil. De Vera ac Pia Fide: “Faith is of things that have been said, an approval giving assent without any hesitation, with complete persuasion of mind about the truth of that which has been preached by the office of God.” And that of Bernard, epist. 190: “If faith is tossed about, is not our hope vain? Our martyrs were foolish, then, when they sustained such bitter things on account of things uncertain, and when, for a doubtful prize of reward, they did not doubt to enter through a harsh death into eternal exile; but God forbid that we should think that anything in our faith or hope hangs on a doubtful judgment.”

2. About faith, then, taken as the matter or the doctrine of faith, the king of England contends that he retains the truly Christian faith, because he embraces Scripture, the creeds of the Church, and the first four General Councils, and has faith in them. But although these things are necessary for any truly Christian man, they are yet not sufficient for integral Christian faith, for it is necessary to believe these things and not to omit others; for he who offends in one becomes guilty of all. But in two things does the king of England most offend: first, because he attacks most fiercely many Catholic dogmas, and, as is proved from his Preface, he professes errors contrary to the Christian faith. But because, to demonstrate this fact, it will be necessary to bring the individual errors forward and show their falsity, therefore, lest we digress from the proposed controversy, we will defer the matter to the next book, where we will prove what we now suppose, that the Anglican sect cannot, in respect of dogmas, be said to be the truly Christian faith. Because although it agree therewith in many things which it has taken from it, yet in the understanding of the same dogmas and in the confession of them it dissents a great deal; but a faith is not said to be truly Christian unless it is in no matter, however small, discrepant with the doctrine of the true Church, which is the same as the doctrine of Christ.

3. Passing over, then, for the present the matter of faith, we will deal now with the manner and foundation of believing insofar as it is necessary for truly Christian faith. For King James in his Preface to Christian princes says near the end: "With Paul I wish you all to be such, in this one thing, as I also am: in the first place that you should wish to peruse the Scriptures, from which you should wish to seek the norm of believing and not place the foundations of faith on the uncertain opinions of others, but on your own sure knowledge." In which words the king makes plain the foundation of his own faith, and he establishes it solely on the Scriptures understood by a certain sure science of his own. From these words, then, we will take two chief foundations, so as to show that his faith is not truly Christian, and hence that he does not have wherewith he might be able to glory in the title of defender of the faith. Our first argument will be taken from the defect of integrity of faith; for a faith which is not integral cannot be the true faith; but in those words the king shows that he does not have an integral faith; and this argument we will urge in this chapter. But the other foundation we take from that particular science on which he has thrown the foundations of his faith; this sort of faith indeed can neither be divine nor certain nor Catholic, as we will describe in detail in the next chapter.

As for what concerns the first point, then, although the king in the aforesaid words does not add a phrase excluding other foundations of faith, yet, when his whole discourse is attentively considered and his various words in the said Preface, we plainly collect that this was the mind of the king. For, in the first place, a little before those words on p.156, at the beginning, he mocks traditions and says: "Not paying attention to the empty, shifting, and perverse traditions of men." For although he seem to be speaking of human traditions, yet he thinks that every unwritten tradition is human, empty, shifting, or perverse; both because he never makes mention of unwritten divine tradition, and also because a little before he indicates that the word of God is only found in Scripture. For he prays "that God might instill in us a mind to think that which we are bound in conscience, according to the prescription of the divine word, to supply for the planting and spreading of the Gospel, being submissive to our true and only pastor's command and voice, which we hear in the Scriptures." Where that phrase "which we hear in the Scriptures" is to be pondered, for it is set down to indicate that we are not bound to be submissive to the voice of God that is not contained in Scripture. And as for what he says of the "only pastor", although it might have a true sense, yet I am afraid it was set down to exclude the voice of any other pastor, even if he have been placed by the prince of pastors over his flock. And in this sense above, on p.47, he laughs at "the office of the Roman Church," and p.57 he completely denies that "there is any earthly monarch of the Church who by the infallibility of his spirit can never err in his opinions." Which he repeats on pp.61 & 62, and in this way he overturns every other rule and foundation of faith besides Scripture.

And although on pp.42-44 he seem to join together with the Scriptures the three Creeds and the first four General Councils and the unanimous consent of the Fathers who flourished in the first four hundred years after Christ, yet never does he say (which is a thing to be noted) that he believes or has faith except in the Scriptures. For about the Creeds he says that he "swears on them," and about the Councils that he "venerates them and receives them as Catholic and orthodox" or that he "adheres to them," as he says on p.62. He signifies, therefore, that he does not rest on these as on foundations of faith, but he accepts them, because he feels and judges that they do not contain error or that they have taught nothing pertaining to the faith that is not in Scripture. He therefore adheres to them judging rather (so to say) the Councils and the Creeds by his own sure science, which he has from the Scriptures, than using those Councils and Creeds as rule and norm of his judgment. Which he makes more plain about the unanimous sense of the Fathers, for he sometimes says that “he thinks along with them, or if he does not so think, he keeps silent because he does not dare to reprehend;” he subjects to his own judgment, then, the unanimous consent of the ancient Fathers even in things that “they lay down as necessary for salvation,” for thus he expressly speaks. Scripture alone, therefore, does he posit as proximate rule of faith, and that not in its completeness, nor as regard all its parts (the way the Church Roman and Catholic embraces it), but he excludes from the canon the books which he calls of second reading or order, for all those books he places among the apocryphal ones which Bellarmine (whom he cites), bk.1, De Verbo Dei, ch.4, reckoned were to be placed in second order.

4. This foundation of faith, therefore, thus received and understood, can neither be sufficient nor firm. To prove which I lay down what we are agreed on between us, that the books of Scripture which are called of first order are canonical, and also that whatever is in them is the true word of God, and hence that it is of itself the most firm foundation of the faith, provided that is that the books are believed in the proper way. But we make the addition, to begin with, that not only these books but also those called of second order, which have already been approved by the Church and are received in the canon, are the foundation of the faith, and that, in this respect, the foundation, as it is received by the king, is mutilated and insufficient. But, for proof of it sufficient for us now is the authority of the Council of Trent, which is an infallible authority of the Catholic Church, as was shown in chapters 3 and 4, and we will in the following point confirm this too. We add next that Scripture alone, as it includes also all these books, is not the integral foundation, proximate and (so to say) formal and express, of the Christian faith. For although, in a certain sense, whatever the Christian faith believes can be said to be founded on Scripture, whether proximately, because it is therein formally contained, or remotely, because an authority is approved in Scripture on which some truths are founded, whether this authority be tradition or the Church, according to the way of speaking of Augustine, bk.1, Contra Cresconium, chs.32 & 33, and of other Fathers, whom we will introduce at the end of this chapter – nevertheless, according to the true and Catholic Faith, one cannot deny that beside Scripture there is given in the Church of Christ the word of God not written in the canonical books, which is to be accepted with the same faith as the written word is. Which assertion, if it were to be dealt with of set intention, would require a prolix disputation about divine and human traditions; but because it does not regard the present intention, but we are only touching on it by the by so as to tease out the thing we do intend, therefore we will briefly confirm it as a side issue, using authority and reason alone.

The proof is first, then, that Scripture itself distinctly establishes this, for in it we are commanded to hold not only to the written word of God but also to the word handed on by speech and voice alone, which we call the divine unwritten tradition. Wherefore they are indeed seriously hallucinating who condemn or despise or think uncertain all tradition as being human. For although every tradition is guarded by men and reaches those who are later from those who are earlier by the vicissitude of times, nevertheless the word itself that was preached from the beginning, although it was not written down, can be divine or contain divine teaching when preserved in the Church through tradition. The assumption is proved from that verse of 2

Thessalonians 2.15: “Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle.” In which words two points are most to be noted, which Theophylact briefly and learnedly touched on when he said: “From here indeed it is also evident that many things were handed on even by speech without writings, that is, viva voce, not by letter only.” There is the first point. The other is: “But both these things and those are in like manner worthy of faith. Therefore too we reckon the tradition of the Church worthy of faith. It is the tradition. Seek no further.” Which he took from Chrysostom, orat.4 on the same epistle. And almost the same is contained in Theodoret on the same place, and in the rest of the expositors, nay almost all Catholic writers use this most powerful testimony to prove from sacred Scripture the unwritten traditions. But beside this one there are other testimonies of Scripture in which we are bidden by the apostles to believe and hold the things handed down, as 2 Thessalonians 3.6: “Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition he received of us.” And 1 Corinthians 11.23: “For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you,” namely by word, for he had not yet written about that mystery; and at the end he concludes, v.34: “And the rest will I set in order when I come.” And at the beginning he says, v.2: “Now I praise you, brethren, that ye remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them unto you.”

5. From these and the like places, which for the sake of brevity I pass over, we can draw out this reason, that the word of God is the same and of the same authority whether it is written or only handed on by word of mouth; therefore, if it has been retained and preserved in the Church of Christ, it is to be received with the same faith. The antecedent is not only certain but even per se evident; for the material sign (so to say) does not increase or diminish the truth of the speaker. And that is why Paul said equally: “whether by word, or our epistle.” Nay (which is a fact to be attentively considered), Christ did not command his apostles to write but to preach the Gospel to every creature, Mark 16.15; and he adds, v.16: “He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be condemned;” therefore the word only preached and not written is truly the word of God. Hence Paul 1 Thessalonians 2.13: “When ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God.” Now it is clear that “the word of God which ye heard of us” is properly and strictly the word of the voice, although it not be written down. This word, then, was the Gospel preached at the beginning and was confirmed by signs and miracles, according to what is subjoined by Mark in the same place, v.20: “And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following.” Moreover, from this word of speech was the written word rather in large part derived, as Luke at the beginning of his Gospel testifies, saying vv.1-3: “Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eyewitnesses, and ministers of the word; It seemed good to me also, etc.” Very certain it is, then, that the unwritten word is as equally divine and hence as infallible as the written, and is to be received with the same faith.

6. They will perhaps reply that this does indeed have place if it were clear that some unwritten word of God had remained in the Church, but as it is there is none which is not written. For the word of speech, which at the beginning of the preaching of the Gospel was sufficient for the faith of the hearers and was to be preserved for future believers – divine providence so disposing things – this word has been written down and nothing necessary for salvation or for full faith is left that has not been written down, and therefore now Scripture alone is the rule of faith. But, so as to make this response of some moment, the heretics must prove to us what they have put in the last place, namely that no preached word of God has been left unwritten. Nay, in order to speak consistently, they must prove it from the Scriptures, because they themselves say that nothing is to be believed except what is contained in the Scriptures. And certainly, if Scripture were necessary for belief, it would be desired most for this article, on which in large part the integrity and firmness of the faith depends and because of which all those things which the Catholic Church believes to be unwritten are with so much confidence rejected. But, assuredly, the adversaries are unable, I will not say from the Scriptures, but even from any history or testimony worthy of faith, to give proof of their contention. But we collect the opposite from the Scriptures, for John, at the end of his Gospel, says, 21.25: “And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written.” And Paul, 1 Corinthians 11.34: “And the rest will I set in order when I come,” which, however, are not read as having been written. And in Acts 20 Paul alleges a saying of Christ when he says, v.35, “ye ought...to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive,” which is not read as written anywhere. And in this way too could many other things have been omitted. Hence the most ancient Fathers recognize, besides written dogmas, also unwritten ones. For, to pass over Dionysius De Ecclesiast. Hierarch., ch.1, Origen at the beginning of Peri Archon and in tract.29 on Matthew, Tertullian in bk. De Praescript. and in bk. De Corona Militum, and Clement in his epistles, the most substantial witnesses are Irenaeus, bk.3, Contra Haereses, chs. 2 & 3, Basil, bk. De Spiritu Sancto, ch. 27, and bk. Contra Eunomium, Epiphanius, Haeresis 61, near the end, Jerome, bk. Contra Luciferianos, Augustine, epist. 118 & 119 to Januarius and 86 to Casulanus, and Cyprian, bk. De Cardinalibus Christi Operibus, ch. ‘De Ablutione Pedum’, or the author of that book.

But the adversaries could press the point further by saying that, although the unwritten word of God regarded in itself may be very potent for faith, yet because it is transitory and held to be in its nature flowing and passing away – for it can be preserved only in the memory of men, which easily fails – therefore, unless it be written down, it cannot be preserved intact and pure and cannot, in this respect, suffice for founding the faith. But this response subverts the authority of the Church too, as it supposes that the Church does not have the assistance of the Holy Spirit for preserving the unwritten word of God in its purity, and consequently it takes divine authority away even from the written word, and reduces everything to human conjecture. And, to demonstrate each point, permit me to ask the king of England whether he believes that those books, which he receives as canonical, are canonical and contain the true and pure word of God, and believes this with divine and infallible faith, or only with human faith on account of the repute these books have carried everywhere and because of the common opinion of men? If he say the latter, he is placing all this faith in human authority, which without doubt is liable to error, unless divine authority intervene at the same time; for it cannot be that he believes the things which are written in those books with greater faith than he believes that those books are canonical, that is, are the word of God, since the very word of God is the reason for believing the rest. But if he believes with sure and indubitable divine faith that in those books is the pure word of God, or that those books are canonical, we ask further why he believes it; for he cannot believe it because it is written in them, both because it will scarcely anywhere therein be found expressed with complete clarity, and also because, even if it did occur, we would ask about this word itself why he believes it to be divine, or written at the direction and with the inspiration of God. Therefore, he must confess that the rule and foundation of believing this particular truth at least, namely that those books are the divine Scripture, is not Scripture itself, and hence that there is a word of God that is not written in the canonical books, which is what we are now calling tradition.

7. Nay, from the words of the same king in his Preface, if he is pleased to speak consistently, he will be compelled to make this concession. For on p.44 he first says that he has that faith in the Scriptures which a Christian man ought to have, and at once he subjoins: "The apocryphal books themselves too I hold in the place which antiquity attributes to them." From which words I collect that tradition could, by the words of the king, have given those books the authority which in his opinion they have been allotted; for what is antiquity but a sort of tradition? Therefore, by similar reason, he cannot deny that the other books, which he thinks have greater authority, obtained that authority also from antiquity, which was, perhaps, in their case greater and more constant. But if by this conjecture alone he is led to receive in the canon these books rather than those, he does not have a sufficiently firm and unshaken foundation for that faith of his which in this way he upholds. First because, although some book, by the received and indubitable repute or judgment of men, may be held to belong to a certain author and may always, beyond human memory, have been without controversy reputed so, nevertheless all this authority does not transcend human faith, and falsehood can strictly lie beneath it; therefore the same will hold of the canonical books, unless their authority receive from elsewhere a greater certainty.

Second, because, although it may be that those books were written at the dictation of the Holy Spirit, antiquity alone cannot infallibly show that they are pure in the way the Holy Spirit put them forward and that they have not, in the course of time, been corrupted, or have not by chance, or negligence, or lack of skill, or the malice of the enemies of the faith, especially Jews and heretics, been polluted. Third, because from the various translations of the same books the same ambiguity could arise, which could not by antiquity alone and its conjectures be removed with certainty and infallibility, as experience itself sufficiently shows; for so great is the variety in readings and versions, and so great even in some very small things is the controversy whether they were in the original Scripture or not, that one can scarce by faith in antiquity alone weigh with care what is altogether more likely much less what is thoroughly certain and indubitable.

8. From this discussion, therefore, we conclude that there must be in the Church some sure authority, which the Holy Spirit especially assists, so that it can infallibly discriminate the canonical books from the non-canonical; and this authority we say is in the Catholic Church, which although it should necessarily use for this discrimination the rule of tradition, as the prior discussion sufficiently proves, yet, because tradition itself can be ambiguous and because it has descended to us proximately and immediately through the hands of men, therefore the same Holy Spirit must be present to the Church both for faithfully guarding the deposit of the Scriptures that has been committed to it, and also for approving, with the same certitude, the tradition which suffices to procure sure faith in definite books and to discriminate this faith from other faith less constant and less certain. Either, therefore, the king of England admits that this infallible spirit is in some man or congregation of men, or he denies this sort of power altogether. If he choose the latter, he reduces everything to each one's private judgment, and he violates the firmness of the faith and the unity of the Church, as I will show in the final part of this chapter. But if he choose the former, assuredly, unless he wishes to contradict Scripture itself and all prudent reasoning, he can only concede this assistance of the Holy Spirit to the Catholic Church, or to its head, both because it was promised to that Church alone, as we showed in chapters 3 and 4, and also because this assistance ought not to be through a private spirit but through a public one, and one given for the common utility, as we shall expand on more lavishly a bit later.

9. To the Church, therefore, has been committed the keeping of the Scriptures, and to it has been divinely given the preserving of them faithfully, purely, and sincerely, and the discriminating of the true from the false, the certain from the uncertain, the complete from the mutilated, and therefore Augustine, bk. Contra Epist. Fundamenti, ch.5, is not afraid to say: “I would not believe the Gospel if the authority of the Church did not move me.” From which principle we further conclude what was proposed, namely that the Church can preserve the unwritten word of God with no less authority and fidelity than the Scriptures themselves. Both because the promise made to the Church was not limited to the word of Scripture, but an announcement was made simply that the Church is “the pillar and ground of the truth,” and because Christ made a promise simply of the Holy Spirit to teach us all truth, namely all truth necessary and fitting for the Church. And also, because the conjecture about the transitory and permanent word is of little moment, once the assistance and virtue of the Holy Spirit is in place. Nay, the difference is almost nil, because although the unwritten word, when once or twice pronounced, is transitory, yet when often repeated it is easily preserved, and such is what happens in the body of the Church, through the frequent confession and celebration of the mysteries of the faith. Hence the unwritten word can be said not only to be retained in memory but also to be preserved in the oft repeated words, and deeds, and external signs of the faithful; nay too, although this word not be written down in the canonical books, yet it always remains spelled out either in the decrees of the Pontiffs and the Councils or in the memorials of the Fathers. But there would, on the other hand, have been no less difficulty and contingency in preserving the written word in its purity if it were to be done by human industry and diligence alone, because, as we said, written words can easily be corrupted or mutilated or altered a great deal on account of translations into various languages or the copying down of the originals. Therefore, in the case of both words, the assistance of the Holy Spirit is necessary and sufficient, and hence, for confirming the faith, the unwritten word of God is no less efficacious than the written, provided each is sufficiently proposed by the Church.

10. And there are very grave witnesses for this truth. To begin with Ireneaus, in the third book Contra Haereses, ch.4, concludes as follows from what he has said about traditions: “One should not be looking still among others for the truth that is easy to get from the Church, since the apostles have very fully brought into it, as if into a rich depository, everything that belongs to the truth, so that all who wish may take from it the potion of life. For this is the doorway into life, but all others are thieves and robbers.” And, declaring more fully the sufficiency of the unwritten word, he asks in this manner: “What, then, if not even the apostles had left us Scriptures? Ought we not to follow the order of tradition which they handed on to those to whom they committed the churches?” And he introduces as example the many nations of peoples who received the faith of Christ before it was written down, and who for many years retained it by tradition alone before they received the Scriptures.

With this agrees Augustine who, in the afore mentioned ch.5 Contra Epist. Fundamenti, after the cited words, at once very prudently asks: “Those I have submitted to when they say: ‘Believe the Gospel,’ why would I not submit to them when they say to me: ‘Do not believe Mani’?” Which now, with change of name, we can say: Do not believe Luther or Calvin. And then he continues: “Choose what you wish. If you say to me: ‘Believe the Catholics,’ they themselves warn me to put no faith in you. If you say: ‘Do not believe the Catholics,’ you will not do well to force me to the faith of Mani, because I have believed the Gospel itself [sc. which you use to persuade me to follow Mani] on the teaching of the Catholics.” By which argument

Augustine convicts all sectaries and their followers that either they should not believe the Gospel, namely that it is the Gospel, or they should believe the rest of what the Catholic Church teaches, because they cannot deny that they have the Gospel from the Church, and they have no reason to attribute authority to it for taking up the Gospel but not for the other things that it teaches. Hence the same Augustine subjoins: “If you say, ‘you have rightly believed those who praise the Gospel but not rightly believed those who blame Mani’ (or, which is the same, Calvin), do you think me so stupid that, without any reason given, I should believe what you wish and not believe what you do not wish?” Which point he afterwards pursues at large and elegantly. And he has a like discourse in bk. De Utilit. Credendi, ch.14.

There is also a striking place in the same Augustine, bk.1 Contra Cresconium, chs. 32 & 33, where he confirms the same truth by his own authority and with an evident example. For he deals there with the fact that there is no need to baptize those who have been duly baptized by heretics, and he teaches that it is a dogma of the faith, as indeed it is, and he says first: “We certainly follow in this matter the most certain authority even of the canonical Scriptures.” And afterwards he subjoins: “Although no example of this thing be certainly proffered from the canonical Scriptures, yet the truth of the same Scriptures, even in this matter, is held to by us when we do this because it has now pleased the Universal Church, which the authority of the Scriptures themselves commends, that since the Sacred Scripture cannot deceive anyone who fears to be deceived by the obscurity of this question should consult thereon the same Church, which the Sacred Scripture without any doubt points to.” In which words, to begin with, Augustine confirms, as I said above, that not every truth to be believed of the faith is proximately and (so to say) formally contained in Scripture, although remotely any truth could be founded on Scripture insofar as Scripture commends the authority of tradition and of the Church. Next Augustine is witness here that the Church is judge of controversies which might arise about things of faith, and that it can by its own authority confirm and make certain the tradition about which before there was doubt. Hence I collect by the by how inconsistently they are behaving who receive some books as canonical and reject others from the canon that are equally approved by the Church, on the ground that there was once doubt about them. Hence even the king of England, who speaks in this way in his Preface, is either involved in the same inconsistency or certainly he is convicted of being led by no certain and indubitable rule but by mere human conjecture in admitting these books and rejecting those from the canon, and consequently he has certain and truly Christian faith of neither set of books, nor of the contents of them, but only human conjecture and opinion.

11. Next, from the cited words of Augustine, we have the posited truth confirmed by a very good example. For that a person once duly baptized is not to be baptized again, although the first baptism was given by a heretic, is a truth to be held by Christian faith, although it is not express in sacred Scripture. We can adduce a like example which, as I reckon, not even the Protestant Anglicans reject: namely, that infants are, with respect to validity, rightly and fittingly baptized, which, since it is not found written in the canonical books, is received from tradition approved by the Church, as Augustine thinks, epist. 28, and bk.4, De Baptism., ch.24, and bk.10, De Genesi ad Literam, ch.23, and bk.3, De Peccat. Mer., ch.6, with Cyprian, epist.59, and Origen, hom.8 on Levit., and hom.14 on Luke. There is another example too about the perpetual virginity of the God-bearer, which although many of the new heretics or Protestants perhaps do not admit, yet the king does not seem to spurn it, since on p.45 of his Preface he calls her the Blessed Virgin. And, whatever others think, it is enough for us that the dogma has been handed down with unanimous consent from the Fathers. “Whom,” as Augustine said, bk.2, Contra Iulian., chs.1 & 10, “Christian peoples ought to prefer to your profane novelties, and they should choose to adhere to them rather than to you.” For, as he adds later: “what they have found in the Church they have held on to; what they have learnt they have taught; what they have received from the Fathers they have handed on to the sons.” Than which nothing more fitting could be said either for commending the authority of traditions by their origin, or for making plain how the common consent of the Fathers is conjoined with tradition. The same can also be seen in Augustine, bk.1, Contra Iulian., ch.2, Jerome, epist.50, to Pammachius on behalf of the bk. Contra Iovinian., and in bk. Contra Helvid. And these things seem, on this point, enough to prove that Scripture, although it be in its order a great foundation of faith, is yet not sufficient for us of itself without the support of tradition and of the Church, which will be made more manifest in the next chapter.

12. Against this truth from the Scriptures I find nothing from reason that needs responding to. But from the Fathers there are some things to note and expound. For Basil, homil. De Vera ac Pia Fide, says it is a very certain sign of pride “to reject any of the things that have been written, or to introduce any of the things that have not been written.” But either he is speaking of addition in Scripture itself, by adding something apocryphal to it, for he says later, that the apostle prohibited “taking away anything of what is contained in the divine letters or, which God forbid, adding anything;” or he understands some introduction that is private and done without the authority approved in Scripture itself. For it is otherwise clear that Basil himself greatly commends unwritten tradition, bk.2, De Spiritu Sancto, chs.27 & 29. And to the same sense must be referred what he says in Morali, rule 26: “Whatever we say or do ought to be confirmed by the testimony of Scripture,” namely proximately or remotely, as he himself eloquently declares in rule 1, from the summaries.

Thus too is to be understood Augustine, bk.3, Contra Litt. Petil., ch.6, when he expounds that verse of Paul, Galatians 1.8: “Though we or an angel from heaven...” and adds: “Besides what you have received in the legal and evangelical Scriptures,” that is, proximately or remotely; for he himself elsewhere expounded that what is against the Church is against the Scripture. Thus too he says, bk.2, De Peccatorum Merit., last chapter, that in an obscure matter one should hazard nothing when the sure and clear instructions of Scripture give no help. For whatever the Church teaches has the help of the sure instructions of Scripture. Besides, Augustine is treating of very obscure things that are not to be defined by human presumption; but things that are received by approved tradition cannot be said to be very obscure or to be introduced by human presumption.

In addition Jerome on Matthew 23 is customarily cited for he says of a certain opinion: “Because it does not have authority from Scripture it is contemned with the same ease as it is approved.” But there he is speaking of a certain history, namely, of the killing of Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, between the temple and the altar, which does not pertain to tradition or the definition of the Church. The heretics are also accustomed to cite Jerome on Haggai 1, where he says: “The word of the Lord pierces what is said without the authority and testimony of Scripture.” But Jerome is handling that verse, 1.11: “And I called for a drought, etc.” against the heretics, who, without the authority of the Scriptures, “of their own accord,” he says, “find and fabricate certain things as if by apostolic tradition,” where rather he tacitly admits apostolic tradition along with Scripture but blames those who fabricate it of their own accord and without foundation.

Chapter 10: From the foundation and reason for belief of the king of England he is shown not to be defender of the faith truly Christian.

Summary: 1. The king of England lays down as foundation for belief his own opinion. 2. It is temerity to arrogate this intelligence to oneself. 3. The sacred page cannot be genuinely expounded without a teacher. 4. An effective dilemma against the sure science assumed by the king. 5. How dangerous it is to locate the foundation of faith in private spirit.

1. To be treated of in this chapter is the other part of the foundation for faith relied on by the king of England, who, when he desires other Christian princes to be as he himself is, namely locating the foundation of faith in certain knowledge, which they will receive from the Scriptures by reading them over, shows that it is certain he lays for foundation of his faith the knowledge of Scripture acquired by himself. From this foundation and reason for belief in the Scriptures, then, I collect that he does not hold, much less defend, the truly Christian faith. And to begin with he is confronted at once by the admonition of Paul to Timothy, 1 Timothy 6.20-21: “O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust (that is, the deposit of faith and doctrine, as the Apostle himself declared in his second epistle to him), avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called: Which some professing have erred concerning the faith.” For, from the aforesaid words of the king, when these are compared with the words of Paul, it is at once apparent that what Paul predicted has happened to the king, namely that through “science falsely so called,” which he professes, he is straying away from the true faith. For, as Chrysostom there rightly said: “When something is produced by one’s own thoughts (especially in divine mysteries and things concerning the faith), it is not knowledge.” Deservedly, then, is it named “science falsely so called,” and an occasion for all errors, because of the great presumption which it customarily denotes. And for that reason Augustine, when explaining the same words of the Apostle, in tract.97 on John near the end, said about those who promise sure knowledge: “Nothing do they so love than to promise knowledge and to deride as ignorance the faith of true things that little children are bidden to believe. Hence be on your guard (as he most prudently premises in the same tract., near the beginning), especially you who are little children and still need milk for food, lest you give your ears to men deceived and deceiving, so as to know things unknown, since you have minds weak in discriminating things true and false.” And later he draws a comparison between the vanity of those who promise knowledge of the truth, though they are ignorant of the truth, and the foolish and clamorous woman, knowing altogether nothing, of whom Solomon said, Proverbs 9.13-16: “For she sitteth at the door of her house, on a seat in the high places of the city, To call passers by...Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither, etc.” and he pursues the comparison at length.

2. Besides one may ask what the king understands by “certain know-ledge.” For it is not likely that he is speaking of that certain knowledge in the manner of the philosophers so as to signify a clear and evident cognition of things, since it is per se plain to everyone that, from the reading of the Scriptures, evident knowledge is not obtained of the things or mysteries which are related in the same Scripture, and therefore the same Scripture itself requires faith and not vision of its truth. Nay it itself teaches that faith is of things that do not appear, Hebrews 11; and for that reason Peter, in his second letter, 1.19: “We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts.” Therefore a proper, that is, evident science cannot be promised or demanded, which might be the foundation of faith. Nor further could the king understand by certain knowledge the very faith itself, which is both certain and, insofar as it a certain excellent cognition, sometimes wont to be called by the name of knowledge (taken in a certain general meaning), as 2 Corinthians 5.1: “For we know that if our earthly house, etc.” The king could not, I say, be speaking in this sense; for he says that on this certain knowledge the foundation of faith must be placed; one thing, then, is the faith, another the foundation on which it is based. So by certain knowledge he seems to mean a certain and indubitable sense of Scripture. For two things are accurately distinguished by Augustine, bk.12 Confessions, ch.23, when he says: “I see that two kinds of disagreements can arise when something is announced through signs by truthful messengers, one about the truth of the things, another about the intention of him who does the announcing;” and ch.24 he posits an example in Moses’ words: “In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth,” when he says that he is confident in saying that God created in his word things visible and invisible, but not so confident in saying that Moses intended this by those words. But the king of England indicates, by contrast, that he has arrived by certain knowledge at what Moses or any canonical writer wished to write, and that on this knowledge he founds certain faith of the things that are contained in such Scripture. And, what is more marvelous, he invites all Christian princes to this manner of faith, and tacitly promises them a like knowledge if they read over the divine letters.

But let him listen to Augustine in the said book 12, ch.25, saying to God: “Send the rains of softening into my heart so that I may bear patiently such as tell me this, not because they are divine and have seen what they say in the heart of your servant (that is, Moses), but because they are proud and do not know the thought of Moses but love their own thought, not because it is true but because it is theirs.” And later: “That temerity is not of knowledge but of daring, nor did sight but disease give it birth.” And Vincent of Lerins, ch.14, after he had depicted the heretics with many words who say: “On our authority, on our rule, on our exposition condemn the things you used to hold and abandon the ancient faith, etc.” he subjoins: “I dread to speak, for the things are so arrogant they seem incapable even of being refuted without impiety.” Therefore sufficient for us to object against this knowledge the words of Paul when he says, Romans 12.3: “Not to think more highly than one ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith.” Treating of which place, Irenaeus, bk.5 Contra Haeres., ch.20, reads, “but to think prudently,” and he judges that contained there is an admonition and a warning against heretics, of whom he says: “They profess that they themselves have knowledge of good and evil, and they raise above God, who made them, their own impious sense. They think, therefore, above the measure of their sense.” Therefore, to think prudently, he says, is to beware of them. “Lest by eating their knowledge,” he says, “which tastes of more than it ought, we be cast forth from the paradise of life,” by which he understands the Church, of which he had said earlier: “We ought to flee to the Church and be educated in her bosom and nourished on the Scripture of the Lord, for the paradise of the Church has been planted in this world; therefore, from every tree of paradise you will eat the fruit, says the Spirit of God, that is, eat from all the divine Scriptures, but you may not eat with an over-exalted sense nor may you touch the universal quarrels of heretics.” But who has a more exalted sense than he who presumes to have acquired a sense of Sacred Scripture with sure knowledge merely by reading it over?

3. For I ask further of the king, by which doctor, by which leader, has he acquired this certain knowledge of Scripture and offers it to others to obtain? He will reply, as I opine, what someone else did in Augustine’s De Utilitate Credendi, ch.17: “When I read it by myself I know it myself,” for this the king signifies when he says: “Not to place the foundations of faith on the uncertain opinions of others but on your own sure knowledge.” But what of Augustine? He continues and says: “Is it so? Imbued with no knowledge of poetry you would dare without a master to attain to Terence Maurus?... Then you rush upon those books, which, whatever they are, yet they are holy and, by the confession of almost the whole human race, famed to be full of divine things, and you dare without a preceptor to pronounce judgment on them.” Therefore is this presumption alien to the spirit of the holy Fathers and, on the testimony of Augustine, in the same book ch.17, it has pride for mother. His words are: “If each and every discipline, however low and easy, requires, so as to be able to be learnt, a teacher and master, what is more full of rash pride than not to wish to come to know the books of the divine sacraments from the interpreters of them, or to want to condemn them unknown?” Further, this is against the ordinary prudence of the Holy Spirit. For why has the Holy Spirit provided the Church with pastors and doctors if the sense of the Scriptures is not to be gained from doctors but by one’s own genius and industry? Or how can each of the faithful, with the prudence or modesty which Paul requires, prefer not only himself to the doctors of the Church in understanding Scripture, but count even his own sense alone as certain knowledge, and leave behind whatever diverges from it as the uncertain opinion of men?

Far otherwise, indeed, did Augustine think of himself who, in bk.3 Confessions ch.5, speaks thus: “I decided to apply my mind to the Sacred Scriptures to see of what sort they were; and behold I see a thing not discovered to the proud, nor open to the view of children, but humble of entry, high in ascent, and veiled in mysteries; and I was not such that I could enter into it or lower my head to go inside.” Hence St. Basil in Regulae Breviores, no.235, asks: “Is it necessary to learn much from the Scriptures?” And in sum he replies that bishops, pastors, or doctors of the Church ought to have great care for it; but about the rest he says: “Let each be mindful of the words of the Apostle, not to be wiser than he ought to be, but to think soberly, and, according as God hath dealt measure to every man, to learn carefully and pursue what belongs to his office, nor curiously to inquire anything further.” And in the same way are the words of the Apostle expounded by Ambrose, who, among other things, says: “Not even if someone is of good life ought he from that to claim for himself prudence of doctrine.” And indeed, when all authority is lacking, natural reason itself and experience teach that it is vain for any of the faithful, including the unlettered and uneducated and those involved in secular business, to promise certain knowledge of the Scriptures merely through the simple, albeit frequent, reading of them.

More correctly, indeed, does Jerome say, epist.103 to Paulina, that Scripture is a book sealed with seven seals “which even the learned cannot open unless he who has the key of David unlock it.” And therefore he much praises the modesty of the Eunuch, Acts 8.30-31, when, upon Philip asking: “Understandest thou what thou readest?” he replied: “How can I, except some man should guide me?” And at once Jerome says with great humility of himself: “I am not holier than that eunuch, nor a more eager student.” And later he thus concludes: “These I have briefly touched on so that you might understand that you cannot enter on the Sacred Scriptures without someone going before and showing you the way.” And afterwards he greatly deplores the fact that in every art, even a very low art, none can be what he wants to be without a teacher. “Only the art of the Scriptures,” he says, “is one that everyone everywhere claims to himself; the talkative old woman, the silly old man, the wordy sophist presume upon it, mangle it, teach it before learning it.” With which words he would seem to be depicting the sectaries of our time, but in them the thing is more ominous, more dangerous, because they require the individual faithful to have that certain knowledge as foundation of their faith. For thence it necessarily turns out that faith is impossible for some people, for those who are not only unable to acquire that certain knowledge but are not even capable of a probable understanding of the Scriptures; but to others, who have less sharpness, occasion is given for destroying themselves and confusing others. And therefore very wisely does Augustine warn, De Utilitat. Credendi, ch.10, that it is necessary for faith to precede knowledge. So that “those too who are able to fly, lest it be a dangerous inducement to them, be compelled to walk a little way, which is also safe for the rest. This is the providence of true religion, this the divine command, this you have received from our ancestors, this has been preserved up to us; to wish to disturb this and overturn it, is nothing other than to seek a way to true religion that is sacrilegious. Those who do this, even if what they want is conceded to them, cannot reach where they intend; for let them exceed in any sort of talent you please, unless God be present, they crawl on the ground.”

4. Finally, to make advance upon the private spirit which the king points to, I ask about this same knowledge, which is said to be certain, of what sort its certitude is; that is, whether it be human and acquired by the sole force and sharpness of intelligence from the reading of Scripture and from the signification of the words, or whether it be divine, given by the Holy Spirit through special grace and donation? Whichever of these is said, it is repugnant to certitude and unity of faith and contains very serious disadvantages; therefore such certain knowledge cannot be the foundation of truly Christian Faith. The first part here can easily be shown. To begin with, because if that knowledge gets its certitude only from human discourse and conjecture, and if it is the foundation of faith, faith cannot be more certain, since the building cannot be firmer than the foundation. Second, because now not Sacred Scripture but human sense will be the foundation of faith; for as Jerome rightly warned, on Galatians 1: “The Gospel must not be thought to be in the words of the Scriptures but in the sense; not on the surface but in the marrow; not in the pages of the words, but in the root of reason.” Hence he infers: “Scripture is useful then for hearers when it is not spoken without Christ, when it is not put forward without Peter, when he who preaches it does not present it without the Spirit, otherwise the devil too, who speaks of the Scriptures, and all the heresies, according to Ezechiel (13.18), will therefrom ‘sew pillows and make kerchiefs on the head of every stature [to hunt souls]’.” And finally he concludes: “There is great danger to speaking in the Church, lest perchance by a perverse interpretation there be made from the Gospel of Christ a Gospel of men or, what is worse, of the devil.” The danger is much greater, therefore, if each believer place the foundation of his faith in his own interpretation and in his own human sense, for thus not only will the Gospel of God become a Gospel of men, but there will be as many Gospels of Scripture as there are heads of men. Which is thus elegantly explained by the same Jerome against the Luciferians at the end of his Dialogue, where he says: “Let them not flatter themselves if they seem to themselves to be confirming what they say from chapters of the Scriptures, since the devil too spoke certain things from the Scriptures, and since the Scriptures do not consist in reading but in understanding; otherwise, if we follow the letter, we ourselves too can also make up a new dogma for ourselves, so as to assert that they who wear shoes or have two tunics should not be accepted into the Church.”

Finally, the thing itself considered in itself even appears impossible; for how can it come about that by human discourse and conjecture alone someone might, by reading Scripture, attain very certainly to the sense intended by the Holy Spirit? For this certitude, since it does not come from divine faith, as is supposed in this member [of the dilemma], must be founded in some evidence; otherwise the certitude will not be according to reason but pertinacity and stubbornness of will. But in such matter there cannot be evidence; both because the mind and intention of the Holy Spirit is most hidden and able to be manifold; and also because there can be ambiguity in the signification of the words themselves; and finally because of innumerable other difficulties which arise in the interpretation of divine Scripture. Therefore that certain science, explained in this way, is nothing other than a certain voluntary pertinacity taken for judgment, whereby each wishes that which pleases him more to be certain, as Augustine acutely discusses and proves, bk.11, Contra Faustum, ch.2. There he speaks of heretics who admit, according to their own judgment, some part of Scripture which is on their side, while some other part, which is against them, they for that reason spit out and deny is canonical; and in this way they make themselves the rule of truth. But the point can be applied in the same way to judgment of the true sense of Scripture, in which, as I said along with Jerome, true Scripture consists.

It remains to discuss the second part of the dilemma posed above. For the sectaries seem most to mean this part when they say that judgment about the true sense of Scripture is not to be taken from the Church but from each one's proper spirit, not human but divine spirit, which moves each one to attain certainly and infallibly the sense intended by the Holy Spirit; and this spirit which they call private, they wish to be the rule of faith. But here too the error, understood in this sense, is evidently opposed not only to divine Scripture and the Fathers but also to right reason, which must be directly shown in the next chapter.

Chapter 11: The foundation of true faith cannot be placed in private spirit.

Summary: 1. That in controversies of faith the rule of the Church is to be held to is proved from Scripture. 2. That in things of faith private spirit is to be avoided is shown by Scripture. A genuine interpretation of the words of the Apostle. 3. That private spirit is not the rule of faith is shown from the Fathers. First reason for establishing the same truth. 4. Second reason. 5. The infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit has not been promised to individual believers. 6. How the Holy Spirit teaches everyone. 7. The Holy Spirit on occasion assists some by special privilege. 8. Third reason. 9. Fourth reason. Private spirit is the root of heresies. 10. Fifth reason. 11. Sixth reason. 12. The king of England, when he lays down the aforesaid rule of faith, is in conflict with himself. The exhortation of the same king to the sectaries about unity of faith involves inconsistency. 13. Objections to the opposite opinion. 14. Twofold interpretation of Scripture, one authentic and one doctrinal. 15. Authentic interpretation cannot issue from a private spirit.

1. This truth can be demonstrated by authority and at the same time by reason. For first, divine Scripture everywhere gives two warnings. One is that in controversies of faith we should consult the rule of the Church; the other is that we should fear private spirit, especially if it disagrees with the common rule. The first is clear, even in the Old Testament, Deuteronomy 17.8: "If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment...then shalt thou arise and get thee up into the place, etc." And about the priest it is said, Malachi 2.7: "For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law (of God) at his mouth." And Christ the Lord said, Matthew 23.2-3: "The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do," which without doubt he said much more for his Church, and for the Seat which he was going to set up in his Church, according to what was said above in chapter 4. And thus we see it observed by the apostles, Acts 15, where a certain question that had arisen about legal matters was entrusted for decision not to a private but to the common spirit, saying, v.28: "For it seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us." Thus Paul too, although he was not in doubt that he had the infallible direction of the Holy Spirit, went up to Jerusalem so as to communicate his Gospel with the other apostles, and especially with Peter, Galatians 2.2: "lest by any means I should run or had run in vain," that is, so that his doctrine might be approved by the whole Church through a universal rule, as Jerome noted on that very place, and epist.87, which is also 11 among the epistles of Augustine, and Tertullian, bk.4 Contra Marcionem, ch.2

2. The second is also clear from the words of 1 John 4.1: "Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God." This testimony the heretics abuse to prove that each Christian should be judge of doctrine and Scripture. Which is a sufficient example to demonstrate how much there is of danger and error in this private spirit and in making use of one's own judgment about the certain sense of Scripture; since it is so easy, with a perverse spirit, to interpret the same words against the intention of the Holy Spirit, as is made clear in this place. For the apostle John in those words warns the faithful against easily believing private movements, impulses, or thoughts without much testing and discretion. But this proving should not be through the same private spirit, for in such testing the same danger would exist; it ought therefore to be through another more known and more certain rule. And, setting aside the spirit that moves to work in practice (on which account is the discerning of spirits most of all given, about which Paul speaks in 1 Corinthians 12.10), and speaking of the testing of the spirit in the matter of doctrine, that alone is sufficient which is through the rule of the Church, of which sort is definition by the same Church. And therefore, when the private sense of Scripture is against the doctrine defined by the Church, there is it certain that it is not from the good spirit but from the bad; but when it is not against the doctrine of the Church, it will, until it is proved by the Church, not have been examined as to what sort it is, but it must be proved by other conjectures, and especially by its greater or less agreement with the doctrine of the Church. And in this way did the holy Fathers understand this place when they said that John is forearming us in these words against all the private spirits of the heretics and against doctrines contrary to the Church, as is pursued at large by Augustine, collecting it from John's subsequent words, in serm. 30 & 31, 'De Verb. Apost.' The same is urged by Pope Anacletus, epist. 1, where he joins with these words others of the same epistle, 2.24: "Let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning;" and later, v.27: "and even as it has taught you (that is, through the apostles and the Catholic Church), ye shall abide in him." The same is very well handed on by Athanasius, orat. 1 against the Arians, near the beginning, where, treating of this place among others, he says that: "the demon, father of all heresies, professes the name of the Savior, and he is clothed with the sayings of the Scriptures and indeed proposes their words, but the true meaning he steals away from them, and then, after darkening with deceits the meaning that he himself has fabricated, he makes himself the murderer of those who err."

Hence too Paul says, 2 Thessalonians 2.1-2: "We beseech you...that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, etc." Where he forestalls two deceivers, the spirit, that is, and the word of false prophets, about which he says, 2 Corinthians 11.13-15: "For such are false prophets, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness." Hence all things that are adduced in the Scriptures about avoiding false prophets, as Ezekiel 3, Deuteronomy 13, 2 Peter 2, etc., can be reckoned not undeservedly as advanced about this private spirit. For this private spirit is customarily the same as the one that speaks in false prophets when they teach or prophesy against doctrine previously revealed, who are by this rule to be rejected, as is handed down in the place from Deuteronomy 13. Next, the same is the intention of Paul, Galatians 1.8: "Though an angel from heaven preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached, let him be accursed." By which exaggeration Paul wished to signify that the private spirit, whether teaching new things or expounding Scripture against the Catholic doctrine previously received in the Church, cannot be a spirit from heaven, but is either human or diabolic or impure, according to the distinctions given by Bernard, serm. 'De Sex vel

Septem Spiritibus'; which place was so understood also by the Fathers, as I related above in chapter 2.

3. Private spirit cannot, therefore, be the rule of Catholic Faith, but rather by this rule is this spirit itself to be discerned, as the Fathers everywhere teach, especially Augustine, De Unitat. Eccles., chs.11 & 9, and very well in the preface to De Doctr. Christ., where he says that to expect to have this spirit is "to tempt God" and that such thoughts are to be avoided "as most proud and dangerous." The same is taught by Vincent of Lerins, ch.14 at large. Next, this very thing is what Jerome gestures toward, epist.152 to Minerius and Alexander, near the end, in these words, which he says are the Savior's: "Be money changers who are tried, since whatever coin is adulterated and does not have the image of Caesar nor is marked by the public mint, will be rejected; but the coin that brings to the light the face of Christ will be placed in the purse of our heart." But only the Catholic Church is discerned in clear light, as I showed above, and it alone has the public mark for indicating the true Scripture and the true sense of it. And the same opinion is followed by Damascene, bk.4, De Fide, ch.18, where, after commendation of sacred Scripture, he subjoins: "Let this be our care, that we may be honest money changers, namely accumulating true and pure gold and repudiating the adulterated." From these, then, it is sufficiently clear how this private spirit, as it is extolled by the sectaries, is alien to the spirit and sense of the holy Fathers; and the same point will also now more evidently emerge from what we will adduce in the reasons that follow.

The first reason, then, against the aforesaid error can be taken from what has just been said. For faith truly Christian is common and public; therefore the foundation of it also ought to be public and common. The antecedent is known of itself, because the Catholic Faith is proposed to all for belief, and unity and agreement in this faith are prescribed to all; it is therefore common and public. Hence rightly does Augustine say, bk.11 Confessions, ch.25: "Your truth is not mine, nor his or his, but belongs to all of us whom you publicly call to communion in it, admonishing us sternly not to want to have it privately, lest we deprived of it; for whoever claims as proper to himself what you propose to be enjoyed by all, and wants that to be his own which belongs to all, is driven off from what is common to what is his own, that is, from truth to falsehood. For he who speaks falsehood speaks from what is his own." Hence the first consequent is easily proved; both because (to speak in the manner of philosophers) the measure and the thing measured need to be homogeneous; but the foundation of the faith is the rule and measure of the faith, nor can it be adequate and commensurate to the faith if it is particular and private though faith is public and common; and also because it is not consonant with divine providence to direct and govern men through a private spirit to the choosing of a faith that ought to be common.

4. This fact is made more explicit in the second reason, because in order for this foundation of faith to be firm and infallible, there is need of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, or of his special direction and illumination in distinguishing the true sense of Scripture; but this assistance has not been promised to the individual faithful when perusing Scripture and privately judging its sense, but it has been promised to the Church or to its pastors, above all in matters that are necessary to the faith; therefore the foundation of the faith ought to be, not private judgment, but the public judgment of the Church. The major is sufficiently proved by what has been said, because, once the public assistance of the Holy Spirit has been taken away, there is left a purely human spirit which is frequently mistaken, and therefore it cannot be the foundation of certain faith. In addition the major is also proved by the words of Peter in the cited second epistle, where after he had said, 1.19: "We have a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed," he subjoins, v.20: "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation,” that is, of one’s own intelligence; which holds most true of an interpretation that is certain, because such an interpretation cannot be contrary to the true sense of the Holy Spirit. The reason for this truth is subjoined by Peter when he says, v.21: “For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.” As if he were to say that Scripture is to be interpreted by the same spirit as the one by which it was made. “For the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God.” 1 Corinthians 2.10-11.

5. But the minor proposition, as to its first part about the assistance of the Holy Spirit that has been promised to the Church and its head, has been proved by us in chapters 3 and 4, because this promise is contained in the promise about faith being perpetual and unfailing in the Church. Besides the fact that Christ too promised both his own assistance and the Holy Spirit to teach the Church all truth, namely all truth necessary and opportune for any time, to which most of all has regard the true and certain understanding of Scripture in necessary matters. But the second part, wherein we deny that this promise was made to the individual faithful, we prove to begin with by requiring some place of Scripture in which the promise was made, which request we can deservedly make of those who deny that anything is to be believed which is not written; but there is no place, not even an apparent one, that they can bring forward. For although it is said in 1 John 2.27: “The same anointing teacheth you of all things,” and in John 6.45: “It is written in the prophets, And they shall all be taught of God,” these and the like things are understood according to the manner and order that is consonant with divine providence and that is signified in the sacred Scriptures. For Paul teaches, 1 Corinthians 12, Romans 12, and Ephesians 4, that there are various gifts of the Spirit in the Church, among which are put the gift of prophecy, the interpretation of speech, the discerning of spirits; and it is added that the acts and ministry of these gifts do not belong to all, because, Romans 12.4, “all members have not the same office,” for, 1 Corinthians 12.17, “if the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing?” And likewise we can say: if all were knowers, where were the disciples? What are teachers for?

6. The Holy Spirit teaches everyone then in an ordered way, namely the common people through teachers, and the teachers themselves through Councils, and especially through the Vicar of Christ. And in this too there is preserved order and manner; see Augustine, Introduction to De Doctrina Christiana. For the Holy Spirit immediately provides everyone in some way with help for receiving or handing on supernatural doctrine, according to the office or need of each. And so he helps all the faithful and illuminates them interiorly for believing what he teaches through his preachers; for, as Paul says, Romans 10.17, “faith cometh by hearing,” because God by a common law does not teach men save through men. For that is why Paul asks there, v.14: “How shall they believe...without a preacher?” Yet because, 1 Corinthians 3.7, “neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God...,” therefore the interior grace of the Holy Spirit is necessary for conceiving faith, and in this way are “all taught of God,” as Augustine both there and everywhere expounds against the Pelagians. But pastors and doctors of the Church are by more special helps and gifts taught by the Holy Spirit, as far as is expedient for the common good of the Church; and so, for the most part, this is not done through express revelations, nor through infallible judgment, but to the extent necessary and as much as the status and duties of each require. But the Great Pontiff and legitimate Councils, when they define something, teach it through a singular assistance such that they cannot err, lest they lead the whole Church into error.

7. Nor do we deny that sometimes the Holy Spirit teaches some privately about the mysteries of faith, or about the sense of Scripture, in such a way as to render them certain about the truth of the doctrine or about the revealed sense. Yet this is a special grace which cannot be generally attributed to all the faithful, and therefore Paul, above mentioned, said about these gifts, 1 Corinthians 12.11: “The Spirit dividing to every man severally as he will;” and 1 Peter 4.10: “As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another.” And besides, such private doctrine or revelation must first be proved, according to that verse of 1 Thessalonians 5.21: “Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.” But the first and chief proof is that it not be against the ancient and received doctrine of the Church, because God cannot be contrary to himself. And next, that it be consonant with good morals and be worthy of so great a Teacher. And next, if such private revelation not be sufficiently proposed to the Church through any certain signs, while it could be useful to the recipient, it could not be valid for creating certain faith among the other faithful, as Innocent III wisely taught, because otherwise the faithful might very often be exposed to manifest danger of error. Since, therefore, the heretics can neither show from the Scriptures that private knowledge which, as they imagine, is certain for themselves from the infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit, nor can they even show it by any signs or virtues, why should they be believed, especially since the opinions they form through such knowledge are contrary to the Holy Spirit speaking through the Church? And it is surely a remarkable thing that they should wish to sell us a private infallible spirit and persuade us of it without any evidence or testimony of the Holy Spirit, when they themselves dare altogether to deny the sure assistance of the Holy Spirit to the Church’s public judgment about the doctrine of the faith, which assistance has been manifestly promised.

8. A third reason can be added, that the infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit is no less necessary and sufficient for judging the virtue of Scripture itself, that is, which books in it are canonical, by discriminating them from those that are not canonical, than for giving sure judgment about the true sense of Scripture, as was seen above. But the assistance of the Holy Spirit for first judging the legitimate books is not given to the individual faithful; nor do I reckon that hitherto there has been a heretical man so proud as to arrogate to himself a private spirit for discerning the canonical from the non-canonical books, nor so dull or rash as to say that this judgment is to be committed or permitted to individual believers for each one’s decision, or dreamy spirit. Therefore assistance as regard making this judgment is to be referred to the Church, or to him who bears the office of Christ. Therefore the same is to be said about the spirit for infallible attainment of the true sense of Scripture; for the reason and the necessity are the same. And this reason is touched on by Augustine, bk. Contra Epistolam Fundamenti, ch.5, and De Utilit. Credendi, ch.14, whose opinions I already related above, and in sum they say: “the One whom we obey and believe when he says that this book is the Gospel, the same we should believe when he says that this is the sense of the Gospel;” because neither of these is made certain except by the same spirit, because (as I have often said from Jerome) the Gospel consists more in the sense than in the parchments. Hence the providence of God for his Church would have been greatly diminished if he had given it a spirit for being certain about the sacred books but not about their sense, since the sacred books are of little use for certitude of faith unless a like certitude is had about their sense as well. Rightly then did Irenaeus say, bk.4, Contra Haereses, ch.25: “Where the charisms of God are placed, there ought one to learn the truth – from those with whom is the succession of the Church from the apostles, and with whom is evident that which is sound and irreproachable in conversation of life, and unadulterated and incorruptible in speech. For these both guard our faith and expound the Scriptures to us without danger.”

9. From these things too is taken a fourth reason, a moral one indeed, very effective, and much commended by the Fathers. For this private spirit not only cannot be the foundation of faith, but rather is it the root of heresies and a great occasion for schisms. For, as I said, this private spirit is not made proof of by others, nor is it sufficiently shown or proposed to them; therefore this knowledge which is private in each one is not useful for generating faith in others; therefore, by the force of such knowledge, the faithful cannot come together in one faith; therefore occasion is given to men for each of them to sell his own dreams and imaginations as sure faith, and thence arise heresies and schisms. This reason is touched on wisely by Tertullian, bk. De Praescriptionibus, ch.15 and following, where he teaches that one should not dispute with heretics about the Scriptures, and he subjoins a reason, ch.17, because “such heresy,” he says himself, “refuses to receive some of the Scriptures; and if it receive any, it overturns them by additions and subtractions to the disposition of its own teaching; and if it does receive them it does not receive them whole; and if it receives them whole up to a point, nevertheless, by thinking up diverse expositions, it overturns them,” that is, perverts them; and therefore he adds: “an adulterated sense disturbs the truth as much as does a corrupting pen. Their presumption in its diverse kinds necessarily has no wish to acknowledge the authority that abandons them; they rest for support on what they have falsely composed, and what took from ambiguity its beginning.” Hence he adds, ch.19: “Before coming to dispute over the Scriptures, settlement must first be made about whose the Scriptures are, from whom and by whom and when and to whom the discipline was delivered by which they became Christians, for where the truth of the faith and of Christian discipline appeared there will be the truth of the Scriptures, of the expositions, and of all the Christian traditions.”

In the same sense the same Tertullian said, bk. De Resurrectione Carnis: “There could not be heresies if the Scriptures too could not be badly understood.” And he returns to the same as Augustine said on John: “Heresies have not come to birth except when good Scriptures are not understood well, and when what in them is not understood well is also asserted rashly and boldly,” that is, as certain and infallible and dictated to them specifically by the Holy Spirit. And therefore he adds later: “Far from me too, most beloved, be vain presumption, if I want to behave sanely in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth,” where he tacitly prefers this rule to every private spirit. So too did Cyprian speak, epist.55: “Heresies do not elsewhere arise, nor are schisms elsewhere born, than from this, that the Priest of God is not obeyed, and that the one priest in the Church at the time, and the judge in the place of Christ at the time, is not thought on.” Which he repeats in epist.96, and bk. De Unitate Ecclesiae, and often elsewhere. But all heresies that fabricate a private spirit do so to escape the judgment of the Church and to make each individual himself the rule of his own faith, as Augustine indicated, bk.11, Contra Faustum, ch.2.

10. There follows in addition from this a fifth and very pressing reason, that otherwise there could be no end to controversies in questions which arise about the faith; for each heretic affirms that he has been illuminated by God and that the others are deluded. Therefore, unless someone be judge also over all private judgment, someone who has authority from God for discriminating infallibly the false from the true, it is impossible to settle quarrels of the faith or to preserve in the Church one infallible faith. The proof is that if one must believe private spirit, since it pronounces contrary things through different heretics, they cannot each be true but one or other of them is saying what is false. And there is no greater reason to believe that the spirit of God is in one of them than in another, because none of them displays any certain sign of their divine spirit; and human conjectures, albeit they can sometimes be diverse, do not suffice for certain faith. Therefore faith is in flux and is plainly split apart if the private spirit of each individual is established as the foundation of faith. And therefore rightly did Clement, 1 Epistol. 5, fiercely inveigh against those who wish to define controversies of the faith by their own judgment.

Jerome was correct too against the Luciferians: "If there be not in the Church one supreme power, there will be as many schisms as there are priests;" and Augustine, bk. 22 Contra Faustum, ch.36, when speaking to the heretics says: "You see that you are doing it to remove divine authority out of the way, and to make each individual's mind the author of what in each one thing he should accept or reject." And bk.11, ch.2, he pursues at large almost the same discourse about the particular controversy whether this book, or this part of it, is canonical or not. For if one person says it is and another that it is not, neither should be believed on the basis of his testimony alone. And although one of them try to bring for his side many witnesses and conjectures, "Even if he try to do this," says Augustine, "he will achieve nothing," and he adds: "And see in this matter what is achieved by the authority of the Catholic Church, etc." But to dispute about the true sense of Scripture is the same as to dispute about the truth of Scripture, because, as I have from Jerome often said, Scripture consists in the sense more than in the letters. Nay, the same reason as serves for this particular controversy serves for any other controversy of faith. And therefore did the same Augustine say in general, bk.7 De Baptismo, ch.35: "Safe it is for us not to go forward with any temerity of opinion in things that have not been introduced in any regional Catholic Council or defined by any plenary Council." And he concludes that whatever has been strengthened by the consent of the Universal Church is secure. And contrariwise he says in epist.18: "To dispute against that which the Universal Church thinks is a mark of the most insolent pride." And lastly, bk.4, De Trinitate, ch.6, he says with sufficient elegance: "No sober man thinks contrary to reason, no Christian contrary to Scripture, no peacemaker contrary to the Church."

11. Finally connected to these is a sixth reason; for if private spirit were the rule of one's own faith, there would be no heresy or heretic, or at least no one could be judged or condemned by men as a heretic or compelled to hold some common faith; all which things are very absurd and contrary not only to Scripture and the Fathers and reason, but also to the words and deeds of the king of England himself; therefore, etc. The consequent is proved: for there is no heretic except he who is in conflict with the rule of faith; but if private spirit is the rule of the faith, no one who says he believes in Christ or the Gospel or Scripture is in conflict with the rule of faith, because no one is in conflict with this own judgment and private spirit, as is manifest of itself. And hence it plainly follows that there is no heresy properly speaking, because there is no rule for doctrine itself considered as such, but it has its rule in each man, and there is no certain evidence which private spirit is the true rule; therefore no doctrine taken in itself can be judged heretical, at least by men. Hence the consequence a fortiori is that no man can be condemned as a heretic, both because no one departs from the rule which he is bound to follow, as has been shown, and because about no one's doctrine can it be evident that it is heretical, as was also proved. Also lastly an inference a fortiori is drawn that no one can be compelled to another faith besides the one that, from reading the Scriptures, he says he is following by his own certain knowledge and his own private spirit. The inference is proved, because if that is the foundation of faith, no one can be compelled to part from it; neither therefore to follow another faith.

Perhaps there will not be lacking heretics who easily concede all these things. For, as is reported, some have already said that each can be saved by that faith which either the Holy Spirit truly tells him interiorly, or which he himself in some certain way considers to be dictated to him by the Holy Spirit. By which principle the things we have said, as well as others no less absurd, are entailed, as that someone can without true faith be saved, contrary to clear Scriptures. The inference is manifest because an instinct that is thought to be from the Holy Spirit and is not leads to error; therefore it is not true faith; therefore if that opinion suffices for salvation, error also suffices, and true faith is not necessary. Hence further it follows that there is salvation outside the Church, which is also contrary to Scripture and contrary to all the Fathers, as I said above and as can be seen in Cyprian, bk. De Unit. Eccles., and in Augustine in his similar book, in almost the whole of it, and De Fide et Symbolo, bk.3, ch.11, and bk.4, ch.10; and in Fulgentius, De Fide ad Petrum, chs.37 & 39; and in Pacianus, epist.2 to Sempronius. The consequent is patent, because where true faith is not, neither can the true Church be, as neither, on the testimony of Paul, can the Church subsist without unity of faith; therefore if one can be saved without true faith, one can also have salvation outside the Church. Next, those who so think are speaking not only against Scripture and the Fathers but against all right reason; for they both take away certitude of faith from all believers and bestow free license on all heretics and schismatics, and lay out the broadest way for every dissension, all which things are contrary to the right order of the most wise providence of God. For in that case he would not have prescribed unity, agreement, and safety in the certitude of his faith, but he would have left the Church without a way or manner of keeping this faith certain and of preserving its unity.

It cannot, therefore, be denied that the things we have inferred in this sixth reason are very absurd, as that either there is no heresy or that no heretic is damnable; for both are contrary to Paul, for in Galatians 5.19-21 he numbers among the works of the flesh dissensions and sects, by which the Fathers have understood heresies most of all. And Titus 3.10-11: "A man that is an heretick after the first and second admonition reject; Knowing that he that is such is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself." Hence it is clear that individual spirit not only does not excuse from heresy but rather individual spirit is heresy's root; for what is individual spirit, or that certain knowledge had by each, but individual judgment? Thus rightly does Tertullian remark, bk. De Preascriptionibus, ch.6: "Therefore did Paul say that a heretic is condemned of himself, because he also chooses for himself that in which he is condemned. However, it is not licit for us to introduce anything by our own decision, and not to choose either what another has introduced by his own decision. We have the apostles of God for authors, who did not even themselves choose anything that they introduced by their own decision, but faithfully passed on with reasons the doctrine they received from Christ. Therefore even if an angel from heaven preach another Gospel, let him by us be called accursed." And in ch.7 he adds that the doctrines introduced by individual judgment "are doctrines of men, and born from the genius of the wisdom of the age by the itching ears of demons." And in the same way Augustine, epist.85, otherwise 222, and bk.2, De Nuptiis, ch.31, and other Fathers commonly say that all heresies either are born from, or are founded in, the fact that their authors either by their own passion twist the Scriptures to their own senses or by their own judgment and pride err in expounding them; therefore private spirit cannot exclude heresy; nay, to the extent it is individual, it is most apt for heresy, because heresy is introduced by one's own choice and judgment. And consequently neither is it apt for founding the faith, most of all because, although it is a spirit, it has no token of the gift of the Holy Spirit, who rests on the humble.

12. Next, the king of England himself too, when he lays down such a foundation for faith as is repugnant to the condemnation of heresy and heretics, is clearly fighting against himself. Both because he himself, in his Preface p.43, condemns all heretics whom the ancient Fathers condemned, and therefore he most contends in that place that he exempts himself from the number of heretics and purges himself from the mark of them; and on p.55 he confesses that he has labored to destroy the anarchy of the Puritans, and (as is matter of public repute) has in various ways forced his subjects into Calvinism. This thing, therefore, is in plain conflict with his foundation about sure knowledge obtained by individual judgment and spirit. For if he himself judges that this is the firm foundation of his faith, and if he exhorts all Christian princes to be like himself, why does he not concede to his subjects the same liberty of faith? Is a temporal king in this respect of better condition than his subjects? Certainly he must show that the infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit, which he denies to the Supreme Pontiff, is present to himself or has been promised to himself. Or if he has no greater privilege in this than the rest, by what right can he compel others to follow his own faith, or judge others to be heretics more than himself, since he himself points to no greater sign of the Holy Spirit than others do? Hence too I notice, by the by, that the same king is laboring in vain, since in his Preface p.157 he exhorts all sectaries or all Protestants to preserve unity of true faith among themselves and to retain the communion of the spirit in the bond of peace. For such unity and concord are plainly repugnant to the foundation of faith that he proposes to himself and others, as has been shown, and the very experience of things makes the fact sufficiently clear. Hence very well does Tertullian say, De Praescriptione, ch.42: "I lie if they do not depart among themselves from their own rules, when each by his own decision modulates the things he has received, in the same way as he who handed them on composed them by his own decision. The thing's own progress brings to reality its own nature and the character of its own origin. The same thing was permitted to Valentinians as was to Valentinus, the same to Marcionites as to Marcion: to make innovations in the faith by their own decision. Next, all heresies, when thoroughly examined, are discovered to disagree in many things with their authors. Most do not even have churches; without mother, without see, their faith an orphan, they wander, as if exiled from themselves, far and wide."

13. It remains to give satisfaction to certain testimonies that Protestants twist to favor their own error about their besieged foundation of faith; some of these testimonies, which seemed to be the chief, we removed above in passing. But they add others in which we are commanded to search the Scriptures, John 5.39, as the Thessalonians did, Acts 17.2-3. And they add that the Scriptures, especially in matters of faith and morals necessary for salvation, are clear and can be understood by everyone, as is taken from Augustine, bk.2, De Doctrina Christiana, ch.9, where he says that: "In those things that are set down openly in Scripture everything is inculcated that contains faith and morals for living." The same thought is in Chrysostom, hom.3 on 2 Thessalonians, near the end, where he says: "All things are lucid and right which are in the divine Scriptures; manifest are all things that are necessary." And similar things are contained in hom.13 on 2 Corinthians, at the end, and hom.33 on Acts, toward the end, and hom.3 'De Lazaro et Divite'. Ambrose too indicates the same on Pslam 118 [119] octave 14, about those words, v.105: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet." From this the Protestants therefore conclude that, since Scripture is clear, no other rule is necessary but only that Scripture be attentively read and understood. Especially so because to him who does what is in him and asks, intelligence and wisdom will be given, James 1.5-6; and he who wishes to do the will of God will know the teaching of Christ, as he himself promises, John 7 [v.17: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."]. Lastly they add what Christ said of himself, John 5.34: "I receive not testimony from man, etc."

However, these are thoroughly empty and futile, because if the circumstances of the particular places are attended to, they were said on occasions far different and with a far other mind and intention. For, first, who denies that the Scriptures are to be searched and read through? Or where is this done with greater diligence and fruit than in the Church Catholic and Roman? This study, then, is necessary, but it requires manner and selection and prudence. Next, no one denies either that the doctors and the wise men of the Church can by their individual industry and genius think something out for investigating the meaning of the Scriptures, and can interpret them by human wisdom. For this all the Fathers did, not by special privilege, but by an ordinary law most consonant with the Scriptures themselves and with the natural condition of man; and so is this practice observed now too by Catholic doctors.

14. But a twofold interpretation of Scripture must be distinguished, one we can call authentic, the other common or private. Which distinction the adversaries seem to conceal or to ignore, although however a similar one is very frequent among jurists in the interpretation of their civil laws. For one is authentic, that is, has the force of law, about which the laws themselves say that to him it belongs to interpret the law to whom it belongs to make the law; the other is doctrinal only which, although it not have that authority, yet it has its own utility for human governance. In this way, then, some authentic interpretation of Scripture is necessary; and not less in things which pertain to faith and morals than in others, nay the more so the more that in them a sure and indubitable sense is necessary. Nor is it significant that they are customarily clearer, because it is always possible for them to contain ambiguities from the variety of significations or senses, and chiefly because they are all wont to be perverted by heretics, as Augustine testifies, bk.2, De Nuptiis, where he speaks thus: "It is no wonder if the Pelagians try to twist our sayings into the senses they want, since they are accustomed, after the habit too of other heretics, to do it even in the case of the Sacred Scriptures, not where something is obscurely said, but where the testimonies are clear and open." For these reasons, therefore, an authentic interpretation is necessary. But besides this one a doctrinal interpretation is also necessary for the edification and utility of the Church and for resisting heretics, because: "All scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," as Paul said, 2 Timothy 3.16-17.

15. The first interpretation, then, cannot be done by a private spirit, and about this everything we have said proceeds; for this interpretation is what pertains to the foundation of faith, and therefore only by him can it be done to whom Christ specifically promised the key of knowledge; and then is testimony received, not from man, but from God through man. For Christ himself promised to his Church both his own assistance and the magisterium of the Holy Spirit. But the second interpretation of Scripture, since it does not of itself have infallible authority, can be human and be done by private authority, provided it not be done rashly and at will, but in such a way that it not be repugnant either to other places of Scripture, or to definitions of the Church, or to the common sense of the Fathers. Nor, however, is even this sort of interpretation permitted to everyone, but to the doctors of the Church who have been called to this office; but to others, although the reading of Scripture can sometimes be useful according to the capacity of the reader, yet not for interpreting it, but for understanding it simply, in the way it is expounded commonly in the Church. Nor too is Scripture to be read for examining the faith by one's own knowledge, but rather to be read by faith for drawing out of it other advantages and fruits; and in this sense do the Fathers speak in the places cited, and Basil too can be looked at, in serm. 'De Vera et Pia Fide', and in Regulae Breviores, interrogat.95, where he teaches this very well, albeit briefly.

Summary: 1. The name of 'Catholic' is applied to the Faith and to the Church. 2. England affects to the name of Catholic. 3. This name has been introduced for the Church to distinguish it from heretical conventicles. 4. The conclusion is drawn that the true Church is that which truly deserves this name. 5. What it is for the Church to deserve the name of Catholic. 6. The inference is drawn that the name 'Catholic' is owed to the Roman Church. 7. First proof of the assertion. 8. Second proof of the assertion. 9. Finally the proposed assertion is confirmed from the words of King James. 10. The conclusion is drawn that the name cannot be applied to the Anglican sect. First reason. Second reason. 11. Third reason. A sect that has its proper name from its master is not Catholic. 12. Why each heresy is named from its inventor. 13. Not only the ancient heretics but the new as well are named from their heresiarchs.

1. Since the appellation 'Catholic' has always distinguished the Church of Christ from the Synagogue of Satan, and the true faith from heresy, as the symbols of the faith sufficiently prove as well as the tradition of the Fathers (some of whom we have referred to and we will refer to more in this chapter), for that reason the king of England, desiring to avoid the note of heresy as he showed in his Preface, assumes the title of defender of the Catholic Faith, whereby he professes to believe and to hold the Catholic Faith. But since it has been established that he is defender and champion of the particular sect of Anglicanism, if we show that it is not the Catholic Faith, we will also prove that he is not defender of the Catholic Faith; and he will become such a defender at the time when, after coming to know the truth, he has returned with piety and sincerity to the bosom and obedience of the Catholic Church (which may God accomplish). But although, from what has been said so far, it has become sufficiently clear that a sect that does not have a firm foundation of faith can in no way be the true Church or profess the Catholic Faith, nevertheless, to make the fact more evidently clear, we have deemed it worthwhile to show the same thing through the most ancient tradition of the Church by a plain deduction of the very appellation of 'the Catholic Faith'. But in this attribute two things can be considered, namely both the name itself, or the denominations taken from it, and the things or the property signified by the name, and from these two things diverse arguments are customarily adopted by the Fathers for recognizing the true faith or Church; and therefore we will speak first about the name and afterwards about the reason for the name.

Now we suppose first of all that this name 'Catholic' is accustomed to be attributed both to the Church and to the Faith; for in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds we confess one Catholic Church, and the Athanasian Creed says about the collection itself of the articles of the faith: "This is the Catholic Faith, which unless each faithfully and firmly believe, he cannot be saved." But on which of these, namely the Church or the Faith, this name was first imposed I confess I have not discovered; for the Church could be called Catholic because it professes the Catholic Faith, and contrariwise the Faith could be called Catholic because it is held and handed on by the Catholic Church, or to be sure this name could be attributed to each considered in itself, because the reason for it, or every property which is indicated by it, is found per se both in the true Church and in the true Faith, as we will make clear in the following chapter. But one thing is certain, namely that these two are so connected that they cannot be separated, because neither can the Catholic Faith exist outside the true Church, nor the Catholic Church exist without the true Faith; for where the Catholic Church is, there also will the Catholic Faith be, and contrariwise, and therefore we will speak always about them indifferently.

2. Secondly, we must establish that this name is very ancient, although there were not lacking even ancient heretics who dared to murmur against it, as is reported of Sympronianus Novitianus by Pacianus, epist.1 & 2 Contra Parmen. And perhaps there may not be lacking some of the innovators of this time who spurn it because it is not found written down in the canonical books. However, as far as I conjecture from the words of the king of England, the Anglican sect does not reject it, nay it affects the name of ‘Catholicism’ as the name of the true faith, religion, and Church, and desires to attribute it to itself, as in the very title of Defender of the Catholic Faith the king himself sufficiently shows. For the reason that this term is found approved in the cited Creeds, such that under its denomination we are commanded to recognize and confess one Catholic Church and Faith, therefore the king of England, who professes to admit the said Creeds, cannot deny the name or the thing signified by the name. Next, reverend antiquity and the agreement of the Fathers from all ages shows that this name was not introduced into the Church without the divine will. “Certainly,” says Pacianus in the said epistle 1, “what has for so many centuries not failed has not been borrowed from man: the term ‘Catholic’ does not bespeak Marcion, or Apelles, or Montanus, or heretical authors. Many things have been taught us by the Holy Spirit, whom God sent from heaven as Paraclete and master for the apostles. Much by reason, as Paul says, and by axiom and (as he says) by nature itself. What? Does the authority of apostolic men, of the first priests, prevail little with us?” And later: “Come, if those [heretical] authors were not able to usurp this name, will we be adequate to deny it? And will the Fathers follow rather our authority, and will the antiquity of the Saints give way as needing emendation, and will the times now rotting with vices scrape away the white hairs of apostolic antiquity?” Which things this very grave Father wrote one thousand and three hundred years ago, testifying then that this name was very ancient, and deservedly so. For it is clear from the Apostles’ Creed that it was approved by them, for in it we profess “the holy and Catholic Church”. These words in the Creed are not less ancient than the rest, and they are thus read and explained by all the ancients, by Cyril, Ruffinus, Augustine. Therefore the Church from the time of the apostles has always, along with the Creed itself, preserved also the name of ‘Catholic’. Hence Pacianus even wonders at the name “because for so long time it had not failed.” Therefore worthy of much greater wonder is that it has been preserved up to our own times and has been attributed to the same Church. So now greater evidence shows that this name was not given or preserved without the special providence of God, and that it has always truly indicated, and continues to indicate, what its meaning signifies and because of which it was imposed.

3. Third, then, we must suppose that this name has been attributed to the Church and Faith of Christ to distinguish it from the doctrines and conventicles of heretics. The same Pacianus in the same epistle 1 is witness: “Since, after the apostles, heresies had appeared and were struggling under diverse names to mangle and tear apart God’s dove and queen, was not the apostolic populace demanding its own name whereby to mark out the unity of the uncorrupted people, lest the undefiled Virgin of God should be mangled in its members by the error of some? Was it not fitting for the principal head to be sealed with its own name?” Which necessity he makes plain using an example, when he says: “If perhaps I have entered a populous city and found Marcionists, Novatians, and the rest of that sort who call themselves Christians, by what name might I recognize the congregation of my own populace except it be called Catholic?” Hence he later concludes; “Christian is my name, but Catholic my surname; the former names me, the latter shows me; by this I am proved, by that I am pointed out.” The same cause and necessity for this name is established and acutely explained, as is his habit, by Augustine, bk. Contra Epistol. Fundamenti, ch.1, where he numbers among the ties that hold him in the Church “the name itself of Catholic, which not without cause has the Church alone thus obtained among so many heresies, so that, while all heretics wish to be called Catholics, yet when some stranger asks where to go to visit the Catholic Church, none of the heretics would dare to point to his own hall or house.” He teaches the same in bk. De Vera Relig., ch.7, whose words I will afterward refer to.

The same reason for this term is handed on to us by Cyril of Jerusalem, Cateches. 48. For because the name of ‘Church’, absolutely taken, can signify both the ancient synagogue and any congregation, even of the malicious too, that is, of heretics, “for that reason,” he says, “the confirming faith has now handed down that you should say ‘and in one, holy, Catholic Church’, so that you may flee the filthy conventicles of those men, and persevere in the Catholic Church wherein you have been reborn.” Where he calls confirming faith the Creed which he expounds. And at once he warns us not to seek where the Church is but where the Catholic Church is. “For this,” he says, “is the proper name of this holy Church and mother of us all, who is the spouse of our Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God.” And the same reason is pointed to by Hilary, canon 10 on Matthew, for when he explains the words of Christ, 10.11: “And into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, inquire who in it is worthy; and there abide, etc.” he interprets worthy house as the Church which, he says, “is called Catholic.” Because there were going to be many of the Jews who, although they believed in Christ, yet lingered in the works of the law; others who would by pretense pass from the law to the Gospel; but many who would be brought over into heresy and tell the lie that Catholic truth was with them. “Therefore he admonishes them,” he says, “that they must look for someone worthy to dwell with; that is, they must carefully and diligently frequent the Church which is called Catholic. And hence the usage also of the Church and of all the Fathers has made sure that the true faithful are distinguished from heretics by this name of Catholics, as we read everywhere in the Fathers and as we see approved by use; and we have experienced it not only among Catholics but also among heretics themselves, as will become more fully evident from what must yet be said.

4. Fourth, we infer from this and establish as certain that that Church is true, and in it is the true and Catholic Faith, which rightly and deservedly, that is, according to the primitive imposition of this name, is called Catholic. This manifestly follows from what has been said, because it has been shown that this name was imposed by the Apostles’ Creed to denote the Church of Christ which they founded; therefore it is held as a thing tested in the faith that at that time the true Church was signified by that name, and consequently that the Church founded by the apostles had the properties which are required in the true Church and which are indicated by that name, as will be more clearly evident in the things to be put forward below. For it is clear that the apostles were not ignorant of the true Church and of its properties, and that they had authority for imposing on it a name adapted to truth and the use thereof. And hence further it happens that the Church founded by the apostles, insofar as it has always endured through true succession (as we saw above), has also always deserved the name of ‘Catholic’, nor has it ever lost it. The proof is, first, that it is always one and the same, not by likeness of kind alone, but also by numerical moral identity (to speak with the philosophers), on account of continuous legitimate succession; therefore truth and the property signified by the name always belong to it; therefore the name itself also belongs. Second, that this Church has always professed the faith of the Creed in which it is itself called Catholic, although however it cannot err in the faith, as stands already proved above with sufficient clarity. Third, that it has not lost the name through any change in reality, because it would have lost the property signified by the term; for, if it had lost it, it would not, as is supposed, be the same Church; nor has it lost it by removal or change of the name alone, because the Church itself has not deprived itself of that name or changed the name’s signification, as from usage and the symbol of the faith is sufficiently clear. Nor is there outside it on earth a power that could deprive it of such name, neither in right, because it does not have a superior, nor in fact, because the gates of hell cannot prevail against it in this respect either, as we will prove more at large below.

Hence, finally, the conclusion is drawn that the Church on which rightly and deservedly this name is bestowed is the true Church of Christ and preserves in itself the Catholic Faith, and that as a result no congregation which is divided and separated from the Church, even one brought together under the name and confession of Christ, can in any way make rightful claim to this name for itself. Each part is clear from what has been said. The first part, indeed, because such a Church is the same numerically with that which from the beginning and always had that name; the second part, however, for the contrary reason, that the true Church is only one and that this name is attributed to a single and true Church only. Every church, therefore, which is not the one and true Church, or a part of it, cannot be called Catholic. A clear confirmation of the same comes from the reason for imposing such a name. For it was invented for always distinguishing the true Church from false ones, and therefore it was not imposed as a common name, but as a proper and singular name, for signifying this individual mystical body to which such properties have been allotted; therefore this body will rightly be called by that name in any and every place where it is, but it is otherwise with any other made up body divided from it.

5. Hence it is clear too, by the by, what it means to deserve such a name, and clear that the true Church claims it for itself as by its own right; for this claim is nothing other than to have a true and indubitable succession from the primitive Church to which the name was first given; for since a claim is made, through that succession, to all the ancient goods and rights (so to say) of the Church, the proper name is thought necessarily also to belong with them in the same way. And a clarification can be given by example from human things, for each family's name, whereby its nobility and antiquity are pointed out, does not thus by force of first imposition pass otherwise to anyone save by reason of origin and succession; and it is then made clear who deservedly and as by his own right makes claim to that name when he demonstrates direct and legitimate succession from such a root. One must hold the same, therefore, and in a much higher way and with more certitude, about the Church as regard the appellation 'Catholic'. Indeed in a more excellent way, because the succession of the Church, although it is by multiplication of diverse natural persons (so to say), is nevertheless by preservation of numerically the same mystical body, of which all the persons succeeding each other in turn are members. And therefrom follows also a greater certitude, because the name is not per se first imposed on the individual members or persons, but on the whole body, which, since it is always the same, retains and perpetually keeps with more tenacity and firmness the name of its own dignity. Most of all, finally, is this certitude taken from the continual profession of faith whereby the Church itself always confesses that it is Catholic. For since falsehood cannot lie beneath this faith, it is altogether very certain that the true Church of Christ rightly claims this name to itself, which no heretic, even if he give faith to the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, can deny, at any rate in a general way, about the true Church of Christ, insofar as we have hitherto been speaking of it.

6. Next we add, fifth, that the Church which now obeys the Roman Pontiff (which, to speak distinctly, we now call Roman) rightly and deservedly claims to itself the name of Catholic, and its faith, for the same reason, is to be judged and called Catholic. This assertion follows evidently from what has just been said, with the addition of what was treated of in chapter 4. But there we drew attention to the fact that the name of Roman Church is sometimes received for the Universal Church, which obeys the Roman Pontiff as the universal Vicar of Christ, and sometimes for a particular diocese, which is also subject to the same Pontiff as to a particular and proximate bishop. In the present, indeed, we are speaking about the Roman Church in the former way, because the name of Catholic is imposed primarily on the Universal Church. Also, although particular churches are customarily called Catholic, as is clear from the way of speaking of Augustine, Pacianus, and Cyril above, and from common usage, just as any one of the faithful is called Catholic, either by profession of the Catholic Faith or because he is part of the Catholic Church, so any particular church possessed of both reasons can much more be called Catholic, and thus too the particular Roman Church is most of all Catholic, which will be clear a fortiori if it is proved of the universal.

7. First, then, the assertion can be proved in the same way as the ancient Fathers, cited above, proved that the Church that existed at their time was Catholic, because it was the one that the apostles founded and on which they had imposed this name; and from the same Fathers and from others it is clear that they were also speaking of the Church which we now call Roman, because they were speaking of a Church united to the Roman Pontiff as to its head and to the Vicar of Christ; as is clear from Augustine, who for this reason conjoins the succession of Roman Pontiffs together with the name ‘Catholic’ among the signs of the true Church, and from Cyril, who says that: “the holy Christian Church is the one of which the Savior said to Peter: ‘Thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my Church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.’” Pacianus finally, although he does not declare it with such lucidity, yet uses the authority of Cyril for establishing his opinion about the Catholic Church; but Cyprian himself, certainly in epistle 75 to Cornelius, calls the Roman Church the root and matrix of the Catholic Church; each of them understood, then, by the Catholic Church the one that was serving under the Roman Pontiff. Many other things from the same Cyprian, Irenaeus, Jerome, and Ambrose we reported above in chapters 3 and 4; and other things can be read in Augustine, epist. 165, and everywhere in his books against the Donatists, and in Optatus, bk. 2, Contra Parmenianum, where he says that a Church is shown to be Catholic from union with the chair of Peter. Finally, Tertullian, in Praescriptionibus, ch. 30, says that: “Catholic doctrine is in the Roman Church;” which is the same as to say that that Church is Catholic. But it was shown by us above that the Roman Church is the same now as it was in early times; therefore to this Church alone does the name ‘Catholic’ by right belong.

8. In addition, now too has place the proof which the same Fathers are accustomed to take from the agreement of the whole world. For just as in the time of Augustine, for example, so also now, and in all the years between, all men, as well faithful as infidels, when using the phrase ‘Catholic Church’ and when speaking simply and without special affection or malice, understand and signify by that term the Church which is now in communion with the Roman Pontiff; therefore here is a sign that this Church alone is the one to which by proper right this name is due. Thus does Augustine argue, bk. De Vera Religione, ch. 7, when he says: “The Christian religion is what we must hold to, and communion with the Church which is Catholic and is named Catholic, not only by its own members, but also by all its enemies. For heretics themselves too, and the alumni of schisms, whether they will or no, when they are speaking, not with their own members, but with strangers, call nothing else Catholic than the Catholic Church. For they cannot be understood unless they distinguish it by this name, by which it is by all the world called.” And the proof is the same as the one Cyril says, that where there is a diversity of sects mixed in the same place with the true Church, one must not ask, lest one be deceived in the inquiry, for the Church alone, but for the Catholic Church; for by that name everyone understands the one which retains the ancient faith. And that this fact persists up to present times in the same way is clear from evident experience, as I noted above; for everywhere he who wishes to show he professes the Roman Faith names himself Catholic; and so also the heretics themselves, when they speak sincerely and in the common way, are accustomed to designate and mark the same faithful with the glorious title of Catholics. Therefore, etc.

9. Moreover the king of England has confirmed this for us by his royal authority; for in his Apology, guided as it were by custom and not adverting to the contradiction in his words, he calls those whom he very fiercely pursues and attacks over and over again Catholics, although he is bound to defend them if he is to call himself, by a true and not fictive title, defender of the Catholic Faith. From the same title there also occurs another argument (which they call ad hominem), whereby the king of England can be convinced that the Roman Church must be admitted by himself to be Catholic; for he himself wishes to rejoice as by hereditary right in the title of defender of the Catholic Faith, which was by the very great Pontiff Leo X conceded to his predecessor, Henry VIII; therefore he tacitly admits and approves both the concession and the title in the sense in which it was given by the Pontiff; therefore, whether he will or no, he confesses that the Roman Church and its faith at the time of Leo X, and when Henry VIII defended it against Luther by a book written on the Sacraments, was by true and legitimate right called Catholic, and that beside it no other church could rightly be named Catholic, save insofar as it is conjoined with it; because the integral Catholic Church, so to say, cannot be but one. Yet certainly the Roman Catholic Church did not cease to be because King Henry separated himself from it, but rather he ceased to be Catholic; for heretics or schismatics, when they go out of the Church, divide and change themselves, but they cause no other change in the Church beyond a certain diminution or division of a member; therefore this Church always by right retains the name of 'Catholic', for no change in faith has been made in it; nay that no change can be made was shown above.

10. Sixth and last among all these I conclude to what was proposed, namely that the Anglican sect or congregation, or whatever church at all which that sect professes, cannot by right be called, and thus cannot either be, Catholic.

The proof is first that this name is not due, nor can by right be attributed, save to one Church, and to that which is the true Church of Christ; for thus do we all confess in the Creed that there is one Church true and holy and Catholic; but it has been shown that the Roman Church is Catholic; therefore the Anglican is not Catholic. The proof of the consequence is that the Anglican Church is neither Roman nor united to it but altogether divided from it, both in faith and dogmas and also in obedience and the bond of charity.

Secondly, the same can easily be shown from deficiency of succession and of origin from the primitive Church which was the first to be called Catholic. For the Anglican Church does not have this succession; therefore neither can it secure the name of 'Catholic' by hereditary right, as they say. The consequence is evident from what has been said. But the antecedent has been proved at large in the whole discourse of the first and second chapters, and it will again occur necessarily in the next chapter; and here is a brief declaration. Because the Anglican sect, as to what is most proper to it and is as it were the difference that distinguishes it, not only from the Catholic Church, but also from every church of the wicked, namely, as to its recognition of the temporal king in respect of supreme head in matters ecclesiastical and spiritual, began from Henry VIII seventy four or seventy five years ago, and no mention was before made of it in the world; nor does that kind of republic or of spiritual head derive its origin from the primitive Church, because it has no foundation in Scripture or in the preaching of the apostles, as we will show at large in book 3; therefore it lacks, as to this part, the said succession. But as to the second part, which can be viewed in the other dogmas wherein it departs from the Roman Church, it had its beginning from Calvin, and in part too from Luther, who assuredly does not have succession in doctrine from the apostles or the Catholic Church. For if it were from it, it would have remained in it; but it has gone out from it, because it has thought up new errors contrary to apostolic doctrine, as has very often been proved by other Catholic authors and is clearer than the noonday light; therefore, as to this part too, the Anglican sect lacks succession. This fact will also become more evident in book 2, when we expound the confession of faith of the king of England; therefore that sect has no true or apparent title by which it could be labeled Catholic.

11. Third, we can use an argument or sign which the most ancient Fathers used for recognizing a congregation or sect that was not Catholic, and for distinguishing it from the Catholic. For, as often as some sect has a proper name from the master or teacher of such doctrine, and his followers take their name from the same teacher, this is a sign that neither the doctrine nor the persons nor their congregation are Catholic. Which sign is explained at large by Athanasius, orat.2, Contra Arianos, near the beginning, when he says: "Never has the Christian people received its name from its bishops, but from the Lord in whom it has believed, nor from the apostles, nor from the teachers and ministers of the Gospel... But they who trace the origin of their faith from elsewhere deservedly bear before them the name of their authors." And then he shows the fact by running through all the heretics up to the Arians, saying: "When blessed Alexander was throwing out Arius, those who adhered to Alexander remained Christians; those who went away together with Arius, abandoning the name of our Savior to Alexander and those with him, were from then on called Arians." And he adds that from then on even after the death of Arius the same name was kept; and he says among other things: "All who were of the same opinion with Arius, having from him his notes and marks, are called Arians; which in truth is a great and outstanding argument. For those who come from the nations into the Church do not transfer to themselves the name of those who catechize them or who hand on the rudiments of the faith, but the name of the Savior, and begin to be called Christians before the gentiles. But they who from this class go off to those fellows, and make transition from the Church to heresy, abandon the name of Christ and take on the title of Arians, as being they who retain no more the faith of Christ but are considered to be comrades of the Arian madness." Which he pursues at large, concluding therefrom that those who are so named are not only not of the number of the Catholic Church, but are also not even Christians, because they have already deserted the apostolic faith.

Next Chrysostom, homil.33, on Acts, near the end, when he poses the question of a gentile who wants to become a Christian and who finds, among those who profess this name, divisions in dogmas, and is therefore in doubt which party to choose; and among other pieces of instruction which he posits for discerning the true and Catholic Faith or Church, one is: "They (that is, the heretics) have certain people from whom they are named, for as the name of heresiarch is, so also is the sect called; but to us our name was given by no man but by the faith itself," signifying by this last term that from the Catholic Faith are the Catholic faithful, or also the very Catholic Church, called. And thus he concludes the same question: "Are we cut off from the Church, do we have heresiarchs, do we have our names from men, do we have some leader as he has Marcion, he Mani, he Arius? Yet if we have been allotted someone's appellation, yet not as from princes of heresies, but as from those who are set over us and govern the Church. We do not have teachers on earth; God forbid; we have one in the heavens. And as for them," he says, "they have made the same pretext. But their name is present to accuse them, etc."

The same sign is handed on by Lactantius, bk.4, De Vera Sapientia, last chapter, where he says that many have fallen away from the doctrine of God by believing false prophets and leaving the true tradition, and he subjoins: “But they, entangled in demonic frauds which they should have foreseen and avoided, have lost through imprudence the divine name and cult; for since the others are named Marcionites, Arians (add, Lutherans, Calvinists), or whatever, they have ceased to be Christians, who, having lost the name of Christ, have put on human and external titles; only that Church then is Catholic which retains the true cult; here is the fount of truth, etc.” With this doctrine St. Jerome also agrees in his Dialogus Contra Luciferanos, ch.9, elsewhere last column, where he hands on this rule: “If anywhere you see those are said to be Christians named not from the Lord Jesus Christ but from someone else, as Marcionites, Valentinians, etc., know that it is not the Church of Christ but the Synagogue of Antichrist; for from this very fact, that they were established afterwards, they indicate that they are those whom the Apostle warned in advance would exist.” Thus too Optatus, bk.3, Contra Parmenian., column 4, greatly reproves Donatus with this argument, saying: “When, before the time of his pride, all who believed in Christ were called Christians, he has dared to divide up the people with God, so that those who follow him are not now called Christians but Donatists.” Which he pursues at large. Next the same is taken from Augustine, the cited book, Contra Epist. Fundamenti, ch.4, and the book, Contra Serm. Arianorum, ch.36, where he says: “The antiquity of Catholic truth is such that all heretics impose diverse names on it, although they themselves, in the way everyone labels them, obtain each their own name.”

12. But the cause and reason for this sign can be given from the nature of the thing, because every heresy thinks up some novelty against the ancient faith, but, when new things exist, new names are necessary for signifying them and for discriminating them from others. For this reason, then, as the schools of the philosophers have received their name from their authors or first teachers, so also the sects of the heretics have received their names from their masters too, by whom they are distinguished. And so did Irenaeus say, bk.1, ch.20, near the end, on the sectaries of Simon: “They also have both a title and a name, being from Simon, the prince of their most impious opinion, called Simonians;” and Justin Martyr, in his Dialogus cum Tryphone, page 26, said in general about heretics: “From novelties they spring up with the appellation of the men from whom each teaching and opinion had its origin.” And later: “And some of them indeed are called Marcians, others Valentinians, others by another name; each one is named from the prince of their opinion and teaching, just as also in the case of those who think something to philosophize about for themselves each of them thinks that he should impose for himself a name of the philosophy he studies from the parent of his teaching.” Thus, then, has it been observed to be in heresies as if by a moral necessity and as a consequence from the nature of things. But yet the Catholic Church always observes antiquity and admits no novelty contrary to prior faith, and therefore it does not need a new name but always retains the ancient one, as it also retains the religion originally instituted by Christ.

13. But this very thing which the ancient Fathers taught about the ancient heretics we see also to be observed in the new ones; for, when Luther rose up, his followers were from him called Lutherans, from Calvin Calvinists, from Zwingli Zwinglians, and thus about the others, as is made plain from the common habit of speaking of the whole Christian world and of all the writers of this time. Nay, as to the sectaries of Luther, it is clear that he himself called them Lutherans in the Augsburg Confession, not far from the beginning. So reports Stapleton, bk.1, Controv. 4. Since, therefore, the Anglican sect is in fact not other than the Calvinist sect, it no less shares the same name, and what it is is pointed out by that mark, that is, not as Catholic but rather as defecting from the Catholic. Which, if perhaps it is not so called by most people, because Calvin did not approve of its first foundation, can certainly be called Henrician, because, since King Henry was the first author of that error, his followers can receive their name no less from him than other heretics have from their leaders borne away their names. Perhaps, however, this name is not received in use, either because Henry, although he introduced the above dogma, wished the Catholic religion in other things to be preserved in his kingdom, as we noted above; or certainly because not by his own authority alone but by celebrated act of his Parliament was it established that the king should be adopted as supreme head of his Church. So Maurice Canneus, chapter 9 above. But this does not prevent the sect being especially from this fact too titled Anglican, because by special choice of the kingdom or Parliament not only has that article been defined but also a mode of religion is to be observed that is mixed up with various new errors; therefore, however things may be, the sect always needed a new name, so that it might be known and discerned, and it shares in that name from its proximate inventor or founder; therefore the said indication has place in the Anglican church too, and consequently, from the testimony of all the Fathers who gave the sign, it is not Catholic.

Chapter 13: Objections against the doctrine of the previous chapter are met.

Summary: 1. First objection. Catholics used to be called Homoousians, now Papists, etc. Second objection. 2. Solution to the first part of the objection. 3. The names which heretics impose on the Catholics do not indicate novelty of doctrine. 4. Solution to the second part of the objection.

1. Against the discussion given in the previous chapter the Protestants can make two objections. One is that even Catholics are wont to be called by new names when controversies about doctrine arise, and so either the title is no indication or from it should even be inferred that the faithful are not Catholics. The assumption is plain because, at the time of Arius, those who dissented from him and defended the Council of Nicea were called 'Homoousians'. Nay, at that time the faithful were called Romans, as is taken from Victor of Utica, bk.1, De Persecutione Vandalica, near the end, where he relates that when Theodoric had ordered the faithful Armogastes to have his head cut off, the priest Iocundus advised that he rather be killed by different afflictions. "For if you kill him with the sword," he said, "the Romans will begin to proclaim him martyr." Which remark Gregory of Tours expounds in bk.1, De Gloria Martyrum, ch.25 and says: "For they call Romans men of our religion." Next, now as well those whom we call Catholics the king in his Preface calls Pontificians and the crowd calls Papists, and likewise the Church that we call Catholic the king calls the Roman religion. A second objection is that just as we claim to ourselves the name of Catholics, so too do the heretics contend that their religion is Catholic, and consequently they even call themselves Catholics. And if other names imposed by others do not harm us, so too may they themselves say that from the other names imposed on them no presumption of false sect is taken against them, but rather is by those names indicated the reformed religion, as the king too says, or the pure and true Gospel, as the Puritans and Evangelicals contend.

2. To the first part, to begin with, I say in general with Augustine in his book Contra Sermon. Arianor., ch.36, that the antiquity of Catholic truth is disposed in such a way "that all heretics impose diverse names on it, although they themselves acquire their own individual names as they are by everyone called." By which words he indicates the difference, that, as often as such names are imposed on Catholics, they are only imposed by heretics and are not received by others, because they are not necessary with respect to others but the heretics themselves invent them, either to the injury and dishonor of Catholics or so as to sell themselves as Catholics. On the contrary, however, the peculiar names of heretical sects are, as by the nature of the thing, born along with them, as I said, and so they immediately come into use with everyone, even the sectaries themselves, who call themselves by the same names. And in this way, Augustine, in the said ch.36, Contra Serm. Arianor., says about the name of ‘Homooousians’: “Arians and Eunomians, not other heretics, call us Homousians, because by the Greek word ‘Homooousion’ we defend against their error the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit.” Never, therefore, was that the name of Catholics but it was invented by heretics, and not by all but by those to whom the name ‘Homooosion’ was dangerous, because by it their error was uncovered and their tergiversations evaded. And the same can be observed in the heretics of this time; for because the Vicar of Christ, whom we call Pope and Supreme Pontiff and Roman bishop, is attacked by them with hatred, therefore, to the ignominy of those who obey that See and to inflame envy of the same See, they call Catholics Papists, Pontificians, and Romanists. But just as the Arians could not introduce against the Church the name they invented, but they alone abused it, so also these names invented by the heretics circulate only among them, but Catholics neither use them nor are they worried by them, because they can do them no harm.

3. In which fact is also very much to be noted that these names which heretics impose on Catholics are such that they do not even indicate any separation from the Catholic Church, nor any novelty or singularity in doctrine. Which also about the name of Homooousians was indicated above by Augustine when he says that by that very name they are shown by the heretics to be defenders of the true Trinity, because there could not be true Father and Son unless these were of the same nature. Hence he rightly concludes: “Behold those who, as if by the stain of a new name, call us Homooosians, and who do not consider that they themselves, when they think that stuff, are insane.” This very thing has also happened to the new heretics; for when they call us Papists or Pontificians they do not bestow on us anything new but what was common at all times to all Catholics, and so, whether they will or no, they are calling us by the same names Catholics. For the names both of Romans and Romanists we showed a little before already once signified Catholics; just as we also showed above from Jerome, Ambrose, and others, that the Catholic Church was once called Roman or was reputed for the same. That, therefore, our faith be called by the king of England the Roman religion can be heard without offense, if it is said with a right mind, because the Roman religion is neither new nor private but is the same as the Catholic, and both names are a mark of antiquity, not of novelty. Thus also can be accepted what Chrysostom, in the said hom.33 on Acts propounded, that “it is not unfitting for the faithful sometimes to accept a name from those who preside over and govern the Church,” namely, when by such names nothing else is signified but due order and the ancient institution of ecclesiastical hierarchy and monarchy. But we see the opposite happening in the case of the proper names of heretics, for all of them denote either new invention of doctrine, especially those that are taken from the names of heresiarchs, or division and separation, as is in general the name of ‘sectaries’, or in particular the name of ‘Anglican sect’, or another like one.

4. To the second part of the objection I respond that it is no new thing that “heretics tell the lie that with them is Catholic truth;” for Hilary already once noted it about the Arians too, canon.10 on Matthew; and Augustine, bk.15, Contra Faustum, ch.3, said: “The impudence is remarkable when the sacrilegious and impure society of the Manichees doubts not to boast it is the chaste bride of Christ; wherein what does it accomplish against the chaste members of the holy, true, Catholic Church? etc.” And later: “Do not (he says to the Church) be deceived by the name of truth; this alone you have in your milk and in your bread; but in that (namely the congregation of the Manichees) there is only the name of it (namely the usurped name of truth), not it itself.” About the Donatists too Augustine often reports the same, and specifically does Optatus, bk.1, Contra Parmenian., near the end. There is no marvel, then, that today too the Protestants usurp the name of Catholics, so that they may not be seen at once to be confessing their own heretical doctrine, just as Satan too transfigures himself into an angel of light so that he can hide and deceive. But so great is the force of truth that even the heretics themselves have not dared, except timidly and with blushing, to arrogate to themselves the name of Catholics, as in bk.2 De Schismate Anglicano, Sander noted in Edward VI. Hence it happens that, although some do so force themselves, they are not thus named by others and by the world as a whole, nor are they known by that name. Which is observed to be far otherwise in true Catholics; for they do not assume to themselves the name of Catholics, but receive it, as if by hereditary right, from the ancient faith itself that they profess; and so they are everywhere called by that name, and through it they are known by all as to what religion they are of, namely the Roman and Apostolic; and by the heretics too themselves they are so called, when these are speaking frankly without disguise and in the common way. The fact, then, that the same heretics in some peculiar way abuse that name in no way prevents the attribute being absolutely, and when considered in itself, a certain sign of the true and orthodox faith.

Chapter 14: From the idea of the Catholic name the discussion of the preceding chapter is confirmed.

Summary: 1. ‘Catholic’ in Greek is the same as ‘universal’. 2. The faith is said, first, to be universal by reason of matter. 3. It is said, second, to be universal from the universal or common rule of believing. 4. The Anglican sect lacks the universal rule of believing that is most necessary for true faith. 5. The faith is said, third, to be universal as to all ranks of persons. 6. The Church is universal as to ranks and duties. 7. The aforesaid conditions of the Church are shown to be lacking in the Anglican sect. 8. An evasion is met. 9. England retains not an ecclesiastical but a political hierarchy.

1. In the preceding chapter we distinguished two things in this name of Catholic, to wit, the denomination or designation that the word itself takes, and the reason for the name, or the property signified by it; since, therefore, we have shown that the first appellation points to the true Faith and Church, the fact will now become more evident as we explain the reason for the word. We will show, then, that the properties signified by this word are not found in the Anglican schism, and that therefore the Catholic Faith or Church cannot exist in a schism of this sort. But for proof of this we suppose that the word ‘catholic’, according to the etymology taken from the Greek, signifies the same as universal or common, as all the Fathers immediately to be cited in this matter suppose, and it is so common and accepted that there can be no controversy on the point. The whole controversy, then, can be located in the explanation of which universality is by the force of that name required in the Church or the Faith. For there can in the faith (for with the faith we are now principally dealing, although it be almost the same as dealing with the Church because of the likeness of reason and the connection, as I said above) – there can, I say, in the Catholic Faith be considered a multiple universality. And although, as Augustine in this matter adverts, epist.48, col.10, there should be no dispute about the name, nevertheless it cannot be doubted but that the faith, which is universal according to every reason consonant with the Scriptures and the Fathers, is most and properly the Catholic.

2. First, then, the Faith can be said to be universal on the part of the matter, because, namely, it embraces all the dogmas pertaining to the true faith of God without diminution or division. Which etymology seems to have been indicated by the Donatists, who, as Augustine above relates, did not wish “the name of Catholic to be understood from communion with the whole world, but from observation of all the divine precepts and sacraments.” Whose opinion, although Augustine reprehends it as to its first negative part, as we will see a little later, he only says of the second derivation of the word that “if it be perhaps from this called Catholic, that it truthfully keeps the whole, of whose truth some bits are found even in the diverse heresies,” nothing stands in the way of it, nay it even redounds to the favor of the Catholic Church, because it is the only Church that retains the truth intact, and preserves all the divine sacraments instituted by Christ, and teaches and believes in accord with his spirit. It can also be said to observe all the divine commands, both in order to the faith, because those things too are numbered among the dogmas of the faith that are revealed by the faith; and also in order to obedience and charity, because since the true Church is said and believed in the Apostles’ Creed to be holy, and since there cannot be true holiness without observation of the commands, the Catholic Church cannot exist without observation of all the commands. For true holiness is not possible without charity, 1 Corinthians 13, Galatians 5, Romans 5; and charity brings with it observation of all the commands, John 14 & 15. Therefore, just like holiness, so universal observation of the precepts too is necessary in the body itself of the Catholic Church, although in its individual persons, so that they may be called and truly be Catholics, this observing of all the commands is not necessary as far as concerns the will, because they can retain without it an integral faith even about the precepts themselves; which fact must be shown elsewhere, for to the present business it seems to contribute little.

If, therefore, we wish, from this property, to name the faith Catholic, it is surely manifest that in the Anglican sect the Catholic Faith is not found, because it does not have integral truth. But this must be shown later in book 2 by demonstration and designation of the errors in which it is involved, and by refutation of them, as far as the brevity of this work will permit. But we can prove it now in general from the discussion given at the beginning of this book, because that sect began through defection from the true faith; therefore, although it admit some part of the doctrine of the faith, it does not retain it intact and inviolate; therefore its faith, that is, the matter of its faith (for this is what we are now calling faith), is not universal and hence not Catholic either, according to the said etymology. Next, the Roman Faith also in this sense is Catholic, as what was said in chapters 4 and 5, where we showed that the Roman See could not defect from the true faith, continues sufficiently to prove. But the Anglican sect is in many things pertaining to the faith, and chiefly in the point about the Primacy (which that it has regard to the faith, I will show below in book 3), at variance with the Roman Church; therefore as to universality of matter it is not Catholic.

3. Secondly, there is required in the true faith universality or community on the part of the reason for believing, and on the part of the rule by which it may be distinguished with certainty from the false; hence, on this head too, the Christian faith could be called Catholic. For although the Fathers do not expressly touch on this etymology of the word, yet it is not to be disapproved of, because it is not contrary to the other properties or universalities that they consider in that word, nay it is virtually contained therein; for the faith cannot be universal either as to matter, persons, places, and times unless it also be allotted a reason and rule of believing that is universal and common and public. Hence, whatever may hold of the etymology of the word, about the thing itself there can be no doubt that the Christian faith requires, first of all, such reason for believing as is universal and the same in every matter proposed for belief. Which reason, as the theologians say, is divine truth itself, or (which is the same) the word of God wherewith he himself gives testimony of the truth, according to the verse of Paul, 1 Thessalonians 2.13: “For this cause thank we God...because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God;” and that of 1 John 5.9: “If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater.” This testimony, therefore, should be the same in all matters for belief, and thus there is said to be a universal reason with respect to Christian faith, otherwise it would not be equally certain in all of them, nay there could not either be certain faith in anything, if it should in any way disagree with that universal reason. Some rule also is necessary which may infallibly propose to us as revealed by God the things to be believed, which in chapter 6 was shown had to be public and general; because there could not be faith that is uniform, so to say, or the same in all the faithful, unless all agree in the same common rule of belief; therefore, so that the faith can be Catholic, there is need that it be universal also in rule and reason for believing.

4. Now it can easily be seen from what has been said that in the Anglican sect this property cannot be found; therefore on this head too that sect cannot be reputed the Catholic Faith. The assumption is plain, first, because that sect admits some of the truths revealed by God, and in its own way believes them, but it denies others, as we will from the very confession of the king show below. For although he does not concede that what he denies has been revealed by God, yet he shows by that very fact that he has, not divine testimony, but his own decision and conjecture for ultimate and primary reason of belief; for if he were really to rely on divine testimony in believing, he would believe everything equally that has been confirmed by the same divine testimony. But this defect in reason for believing comes from defect of a universal rule, which might with certitude and infallibly propose what has, and what has not, been revealed by God. For in that sect there is no universal and public rule of this sort, but each is a rule to himself, as we saw above; therefore such faith cannot be Catholic, or (to explain the thing more clearly) such a way of believing cannot be Catholic, that is, suitable for Catholic Faith. Nay, the fact that many of those who believe in this way agree in some matter of faith does not come from reason, or from a rule of belief, but either from some human custom, or from human fear, or from some other like reason. Hence also it happens that, in order for there to be agreement in any way in that sect, the greater part of the men who adhere to it must abandon the rule of belief proper to the sect, which is each one’s proper judgment as it seems certain to him, and follow the judgment of others, whether the king, or Parliament, or the ministers. For how otherwise could the crowd believe? Therefore such faith, by the force of its rule and its reason for belief, is not only not Catholic but is also not even in any way universal, that is, one and common to many; and, so as to become in some way common, it becomes a faith purely human, that is, founded on the private judgment of some man or some particular human community; therefore it is, by this reason especially, very far distant from the property of Catholic Faith.

5. Third, faith or the Church can be said to be Catholic because it is universal as to all ranks and orders of persons, which Cyril of Jerusalem taught us in these words, Catechesis 18: “The Church was before sterile, but now it is the parent of many children. For after the first one was extinguished, God, as Paul said, placed in this second Catholic Church first indeed apostles, next prophets, third doctors, next virtues, then graces of cures, helps, governments, and every kind of virtue, I mean wisdom, and intellect, temperance, and humanity, and irreproachable patience in persecutions, which through the arms, triumphing and opposing, of justice, through glory and ignominy, first indeed in persecutions and tribulations crowned martyrs and Saints with diverse and much flourishing crowns of patience, by which the Church itself is adorned, but now, in times of peace, by the grace of Christ, it has due honor from kings, and the great, and every class of men.” In these words he indicates the various ways by which the Church can be said to be Catholic, because it embraces every class and rank of persons. One of these ways, both more known and easier, is that it is useful to all men of whatever nation, province, tongue, quality, or condition, nay necessary to them for salvation as well, and therefore it calls all to itself, whether Jews or gentiles, etc., according to that verse of Paul Colossians 3.11: “Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all.” This way is also indicated by Augustine, on the words of Psalms 65 [66].1: “Make a joyful noise unto God, all ye lands,” where he says: “Not only the land of Judea, then. You see, brothers, how the universality of the Church, diffused through the whole world, is commended, and do not grieve only for the Jews, who envy the gentiles this grace, but lament more for the heretics; for if they are to be grieved for who have not been gathered, how much more those who, having been gathered, are separated off?” However, this universality, explained in this way, differs little (as is proved by these words of Augustine) from universality of place, and it will immediately be more explained along therewith.

6. A second way is indicated by Cyril, that the Catholic Church ought to consist of all the members and ranks, graces and gifts, with which the Apostle Paul depicts it. Hence Augustine says, bk.1, De Doctrina Christiana, ch.16: “The Catholic Church is the body of Christ, as the apostolic doctrine commends, and it is even called his spouse. His body, therefore, with its many members bearing diverse offices, he ties together with the bond of unity and charity as if with the bond of health.” So, since the Church is Christ’s bride which he presented to himself, Ephesians 5.27, “a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish,” that is, abounding in all kinds of virtues and graces, to its beauty pertains that it be whole and consist of every variety of members and of all graces, ministries, operations, and virtues of which Christ wished to make it consist. About which Optatus writes thus, bk.2, Contra Parmenian., not far from the beginning: “The Church has its own definite members, bishops, priests, deacons, ministers, and the multitude of the faithful.” But of the variety of these members, and of the duties of each, and of how they are always necessary to the Church, is not here the place to say, for it requires a whole work about the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Let it therefore be enough for us that in the mystical body of Christ, from the opinion of Paul, the said variety of members is required, which is going to endure in it up to the consummation of the saints. And so, according to the opinion of Cyril, the Church could, from this universality of members and variety of gifts, rightly be called Catholic. And, as I have already said, whatever may hold of the imposition of the name, there can in the very thing be no denying that this integrity and variety has regard to the splendor and majesty of the Catholic Church, and is not only useful but also necessary for its preservation and perfection; and therefore a Church cannot be reputed Catholic which is destitute of this excellence and integrity.

7. Now it is not difficult to show that this perfection of the Church is not found in the Anglican schism. First, indeed, and chiefly, because it does not have a pastor and bishop to whom to adhere, which, according to the teaching of Christ, is most necessary for the truth of the Church, as from Matthew 16 and John 21 is not obscurely gathered. Therefore Cyprian too, epistle.69, thus defines the Church: “The Church is a people united to its priest, and a flock adhering to its pastor.” But the Anglican congregation is united, not to the priest, but to the king, nor does it adhere to its pastor, for there is no pastor of the flock of Christ save him whom he constituted, and he did not constitute the king so but Peter and his successors. “Hence,” says Cyprian, “you ought to know that the bishop is in the Church and the Church is in the bishop, and if anyone is not with the bishop he is not in the Church, and that he flatters in vain those who, not having part with the bishops of God, sneak up and with some in secret believe themselves in communion, although the Church, which is One Catholic Church, is not split nor divided but certainly is connected and joined with the glue of the priests who with each other together cohere.” With these words he graphically depicts all the conventicles of the heretics, and especially the Anglican conventicle, which (taken in a universal way especially) is not in the bishop, nor the bishop in it, nor does it have priests with whose glue to be joined, unless perhaps they say that the ministers are priests or the king a bishop, which would be ridiculous enough. They do not even say it themselves, because they do not believe there are priests in the Church, just as they also deny there is a sacrifice, nor can the thing even be thought about those ministers, since they have not been legitimately ordained.

8. But if perhaps the ministers contend that England does not lack its bishops to which individual groups of people adhere, we reply, in the first place, with the same Cyprian, epist.76, that they are not true bishops but only in name. Because “he cannot be counted a bishop who, despising the evangelical and apostolic tradition, is successor to no one and has sprung up from himself;” nor he either who has not been ordained according to the legitimate rite of the Church. Next, I reply that Cyprian spoke not only about particular individual churches, but also about the Universal Catholic Church, for he teaches that is one in such a way that it ought also to be conjoined to one common bishop. For thus, epist.76, he said that the Church is one “which was with Cornelius, who succeeded by legitimate ordination to Fabian.” And epist.55, to the same Cornelius, “Not from elsewhere,” he says, “have heresies arisen, or schisms been born, than from here, that the priest of God was not obeyed, and that it was not thought on that there is one priest at a time in the Church and one judge at a time in the place of Christ, whom if, according to the divine teachings, the universal brotherhood obeyed, no one would move anything against the college of priests.” Where he openly speaks of one bishop supreme, and calls him, as by antonomasia, “priest of God” and “judge in the place of Christ” and “one priest whom the whole brotherhood obeys.” And in his book, De Unit. Eccles., he at large teaches the same, and in his epistles he thus expounds time and time again the unity of the Catholic Church. Therefore, a congregation of men which does not adhere to one bishop but to one temporal king, and does not have either true bishops or true priests, bears before it no appearance, much less the truth, of the Catholic Church.

9. Nor is anything conferred on King James that in his Preface he often repeats that he has restored the ecclesiastical hierarchy everywhere in his kingdom, and that he has defended it against the Puritans; for he has not retained and defended the true ecclesiastical hierarchy, which Christ instituted, but a human and political one, which he himself, led by a certain evident conjecture, wished to be imitated. For this is what he himself frankly confesses when, on page 54, he says: “And the eagerness with which I have always applied myself to the defense of the bishops and of the ecclesiastical hierarchy (for the sake only of political order), with that same eagerness I have attacked the confused anarchy and equality of the Puritans.” And again, on page 56, he repeats that he allows of some difference between bishops and the institution of patriarchs; but he adds: “for the sake of order and differentiation,” and, a little after page 57, he inculcates the same a third time, adding: “For it is thus I wish to be understood.” Far different, therefore, is that shadow of a hierarchy from the truth instituted by Christ and handed down by the Fathers.

For Christ did not place bishops in the Church merely because of political order, but, Acts 20.28, “to rule [alt. feed] the Church of God which he hath purchased with his own blood,” and to carry the care of it, not only an external and political care, but most of all one that is spiritual and procures the salvation of souls, according to Hebrews 13.17: “Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account.” For which reason Cyprian, epist.55, calls the power of bishops for governing the Church “sublime and divine.” And deservedly, indeed, because it was given by Christ, God and man, and with admirable power for remitting and retaining sins, and for loosing and binding on earth what is to be held ratified in heaven. For the Church of Christ is not a merely political body, but a mystical one, and in a way divine, and therefore it needs a hierarchy, not for political order only, but for a spiritual end, “for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ,” as Paul said, Ephesians 4.12. And therefore, a diversity of these members and ranks does not consist in external endowments or temporal goods, but in diverse gifts “differing according to the grace that is given to us,” as Paul pursues in Romans 12 [v.6] and 1 Corinthians 12. In these gifts and graces the Catholic Church has always abounded, and up to the present day we see the same excellence and variety of gifts in the Roman Church. But how far from this perfection and splendor of grace are the conventicles of the Protestants is rather to be deplored than described, and too well known by the whole world to need our proof, especially because sufficient proof of the thing can be taken from the very confession of the king. For, from what we have noted in his Preface, two things are collected. One is that in things that concern the faith his own private spirit is the rule. Hence let it be a consequence, since interior conscience depends on faith, that there is no other rule both for doctrine and for conscience necessary in the Church than each one’s private spirit. The other is that the difference of ministries, if there is any in the Church which he himself is building up, has only for external policy and order been constituted; for which end no one doubts that a certain human prudence is sufficient; therefore all reason for diverse gifts and graces of the divine Spirit there ceases. Nor is it wonderful, since the faith too, which is the foundation of all graces, is there lacking, which happens necessarily to those who, as Cyprian says in bk. De Unitat. Ecclesiae, “having despised the tradition of God, seek after strange doctrines, and introduce magistracies of human institution,” as remains testified elsewhere by Cyprian.

Chapter 15: The Church is shown to be called Catholic because it is diffused throughout the whole world, and resistance is made to heretics.

Summary: 1. Etymology of the word ‘Catholic’. 2. The Anglican sect is concluded not to have the true faith. 3. Evasion. It is refuted. Extent of place does not of itself constitute a Church as Catholic. 4. The response of the king is in another way rejected.

1. The chief and most received etymology of the word ‘Catholic’ is the one taken from universality of places, which the Fathers frequently use against heretics, especially Augustine when disputing in many places against the Donatists, and expressly in the whole book De Unit. Ecclesiae, where he runs through almost the whole Scripture proving that the Church of Christ is the one that is diffused over the whole world, and supposing that it is thence called Catholic; and in bk.2, Contra Epistol. Gaudentii, ch.2, since Gaudentius had dared to affirm, and on the testimony of Cyprian, De Unit. Eccl., to confirm, that the party of Donatus was the Catholic Church, he says against him: “Attend to which Church he [Cyprian] said was Catholic. The Church, he said, bathed in the light of the Lord spreads its rays through the whole world, extends its branches with abundance of fertility upon the whole earth. Yet there is one head and one origin and one mother, abundant in successions of fertility. Come, therefore; you are deceiving even yourselves, and you wish to deceive others with your impudent lies; if your Church by the testimony of this martyr is Catholic, show it spreading its rays through the whole world, show it extending its branches with abundance of fertility over the whole earth; for from this is it even by the Greek word named Catholic.” He pursues the same at large in epist. 48 & 170, and bk.2, Contra Literas Petilianis.

The same etymology is handed on by Optatus of Milevis, bk.1, Contra Parmenian., where at the end he relates that two bishops were sent to Africa to proclaim in Carthage where the Catholic Church was. “And the latest opinion of the bishops Eunomius and Olympius is said to be of the sort that they said the Catholic Church was the one which was diffused over the whole world, and the opinion of nineteen bishops already given a little while ago...could not be dissolved;” and bk.2 at the beginning, arguing against the Donatists, he says: “The property of the Catholic name, because it is rendered ‘reasonable’ and ‘everywhere diffused’, where then will it be?” Also about this truth is the whole third chapter in Vincent of Lerins: “In the Catholic Church itself we must take the greatest care to hold thus what has been by all believed, for this is truly and properly Catholic (which the very force and reason of the name, that comprehends truly everything universally, makes plain); but this only so happens if we follow universality, antiquity, agreement.” Of which words, antiquity pertains to perpetuity of time, about which we will speak in the next chapter, but agreement can pertain to other reasons and etymologies fetched from Augustine and Cyril, although these two words, as they are made plain by Vincent, seem to be referred by him to antiquity and agreement of traditions. Universality, therefore, as concerns the present, is what he himself expounds: “But we will in this way follow universality if we confess this one faith to be true, which the whole Church through all the world confesses.” Next, Cyril of Jerusalem, teasing out the same word in the said Catechesis 8, concludes thus: “The power of kings indeed has at certain places and nations its bounds, but the power of the Catholic Church is without borders through the whole world.” And Pope Felix I, epist.1, at the beginning, elegantly made the contribution that the Church was built on the four sides of the world.

In this way too do the rest of the ancient Fathers speak about the extent of the Catholic Church, although they do not always explain the word ‘Catholic’, as Jerome on Isaiah 54, on the verse, v.3 “and thy seed shall the Gentiles inherit,” says that the seed is what Christ went out to sow, Matthew 13. “Which seed will also ‘make the desolate cities to be inhabited’, so that the Churches of the nations may rise up in the whole world.” And later: “This is about the greatness of the Churches, which, instead of the one place of Judea, and it a very narrow one, will broaden out their boundaries over the whole world.” The same on Isaiah 60: “The Church,” he says, “which was first congregated from the people of the circumcision, marvels that the multitude of the nations in the whole earth flies toward it.” And on Psalms 66 [67], at the beginning, he says that the dove (on which Song of Songs 6.9) is the Church diffused in the whole world. The same on Matthew 26, on the words, v.13, “this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world.” Likewise Ambrose, on Psalms 39 [40], treating of the words, v.9: “I have preached righteousness in the great congregation,” says, “Why is it that he added, ‘great’, except because before it was not great? What is great except that which is congregated from the parts of the whole globe of the earth, when from East and West, from North and South, the peoples of the nations are called?” And in the same place about the same Church he understands that verse of Psalms 34 [35].18: “I will give thee thanks in the great congregation: I will praise thee among a grave [alt. much] people,” and he adds: “There is the Church great, then, where the people are grave, that is, not a restless and fickle people who sit down to eat and drink and get up to play. A people is grave who keep faith in their God and who are not moved by any levity, nor waver or fluctuate,” and there he pursues copiously the other properties of the Church. In the same way is the same ‘great Church' expounded by Chrysostom on the said Psalms 39 [40], where he says: "Blessed David promises that he will to the great Church, collected in the whole earth by divine grace, preach the justice of God and the truth of his prophecy, both his greatly expected salvation and his immense mercy." Also on Psalms 106 [107], he says that through the words, v.2: "Let the redeemed of the Lord say," the voice of the gentiles is declared who are from every region of the earth collected by the Savior and snatched from the jaws of the devil into his holy Church. And so too does he expound what follows in the same psalm, v.3: "And he gathered them out of the lands, from the East, and from the West, from the North, and from the South," and says: "We accept that this has indeed happened to the Jews in this way (for they too live spread over the whole world); but yet he himself has summoned and gathered the gentile Church in all parts of the globe, both Eastern and Western, both Southern and Northern. Moreover one may see assemblies of this sort in all parts of land and sea."

Lastly Tertullian, bk. Contra Judaeos, ch.7, adducing the prophecies and promises about the kingdom of Christ, and especially that of Isaiah 45.1: "Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden," he adds: "Which very thing we see fulfilled. For whose right hand does God the Father hold save Christ's his Son? Whom all the nations heard, that is, whom all the nations believed in, whose preachers too, the apostles, are displayed in the psalms of David; into the whole earth, he says, Psalms 18 [19].4, their sound has gone out, and their words to the ends of the earth. For in whom else have all the nations believed if not in Christ, who has already come? For in him did also other nations believe, Parthians, Medes, etc.," and he continues by enumerating the innumerable provinces of the Church in which Christ reigns, and then he therewith joins: "For who could rule over all if not Christ the Son of God, who was announced to be ruler of all the gentiles for ever?" And reviewing afterwards the very many kingdoms of the world, each one of which in any part of the globe was always contained within fixed boundaries, he finally concludes: "But the kingdom of Christ and his name is spread everywhere, is everywhere believed, cultivated by all the nations above enumerated, etc." Where, although Tertullian does not speak of it under the name of the Catholic Church, yet he was not ignorant that it was the kingdom of Christ; what, therefore, he says of the kingdom of Christ, he understands of the Catholic Church. In this way too do the Fathers, especially Augustine, interpret all the similar prophecies about the kingdom or inheritance of Christ, as in Psalms 2.8: "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession," and the like.

2. It is clear, then, from the Sacred Scriptures as thus understood by the ancient Fathers, that it is a property of the Church of Christ that it be diffused through the whole world; and from the confession of the same Fathers it is plain that this property is signified by the name 'Catholic'. From which principle is rightly collected that the sect which is not only contained within the limits of one kingdom, and not diffused through the whole world, but even condemns the Church that is diffused through the whole world and is therefrom separated, cannot be Catholic. But the Anglican sect does not pass beyond the limits of Britain ("which," as Tertullian above said, "is enclosed within the circuit of Ocean"), and it condemns the Roman Church, from which it has separated itself, as is from the fact narrated earlier known to all; therefore it cannot be the Catholic Church nor can it retain the Catholic Faith. With this argument the Fathers always attacked the heretics; and with it the African bishops, chiefly Augustine, harassed and conquered the Donatists; but it is no less effective against all the Protestants, since the cause is very much similar, and since it was shown that the Church Roman and Catholic is the same now as the one that flourished in the time of the aforesaid Fathers.

3. But this reason King James seems to have wanted tacitly to resist when at the end of his Preface, page 156, he said: “We are, by the kindness of God, not so despised either in number or dignity that we cannot by good example surpass our neighbors; since of the Christian world and of all the orders in it, from kings and free princes down to men of the lowest condition, nearly a half part has now come to agreement in our religion.” However, although this be true to the extent it is asserted by the king, it does not suffice for such a sect existing in all that multitude of men to be capable of being called Catholic; for all that multitude has defected from the true and Catholic Church, as I will a little later explain with the employment of examples. But the reason is that, although amplitude and multitude of peoples be one of the properties of the Catholic Church, yet it is not sufficient for constituting it Catholic; for none of the Fathers said this, and some of them openly thought that it was constituted Catholic not only from mere universality of places but from the other properties too which are conjoined with it. For Vincent of Lerins says that he is Catholic “if he follow universality, antiquity, agreement.” Optatus proclaimed that the property of the name Catholic is that it be “reasonable and everywhere diffused.” Cyprian, with whom Augustine agreed, requires in addition to multitude “one head, and one origin, and one mother suffused with divine light,” the rays of whose light are spread over the whole globe. Cyril again comprehends many other things under the name Catholic, as we saw. I add Bede, on Song of Songs 6, where he says that the Church is called Catholic “because through all parts of the world it is built up in one peace and one fear of the Lord.”

4. But we give now another response to the king, since it is one thing to agree in religion, another to agree in a common reason for schism and withdrawal from the Catholic Church, as is evident of itself; for from the one way many turn aside, who for some reason, conceived rather in the mind than subsisting in the thing, agree in turning aside and in erring from the way, but do not agree in one way, nor in one end toward which they tend. Thus therefore must we distinguish in the present case. Perhaps in fact it is true (though I do not affirm it) that, when all the sects of schismatics and heretics are considered who have defected from the Roman Church and are now over the whole globe as well to the East as to the West dispersed, a multitude is made up of all them that is nearly a half part of the whole Christian world. But that multitude is not one body politic, as is clear of itself, nor mystical nor ecclesiastical, because they do not agree either in the same faith, or in the same ecclesiastical governance, or in the same rule of believing; therefore neither can that whole multitude of peoples or of sects be called the Catholic Church, since it is not one Church, nor can any particular sect among them be called Catholic, since it neither is part of anything of the Catholic Church nor does it by itself alone suffice to constitute the Catholic Church, as the principal reason given proves.

There is need, then, for the king to speak of agreement in one religion, that is, in one way of salvation, and in one faith; but in this sense we do not believe that the Anglican sect has occupied, not merely a half part of the Christian globe, but also not even perhaps a third part of the British kingdom. The first part we prove from the words of the same king. For, when speaking to schismatic princes and schismatic, he inserts these words: “Although among you there is not yet a good agreement on some details or other I know not what.” Therefore he thinks that they have not yet agreed in doctrine, and so a little later he exhorts them to unity and concord. And although, veiling that discord, he says it is in certain details, or in matters “indifferent,” as he says a little later and often says elsewhere, yet in truth of fact there is disagreement in the gravest matters, having the greatest regard both to the substance of the faith and the salvation of the faithful, such as in the doctrine of the Sacraments and especially in the truth and real presence of Christ the Lord in the most holy Eucharist, and in the manner of man’s justification by faith, and in the necessity of works, and in obedience to the commandments, and in many other things which must later be weighed in the balance each one; in which things the Calvinists do not agree with the Lutherans, nor the Zwinglians and others similar with these.

Add that paying obedience to the Church is so necessary for salvation that Christ said, Matthew 18.17: “If he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican;” and, nevertheless, those sectaries, when explaining the governance of the Church on which this obedience depends, are at variance no less among themselves than with us; the disagreement, then, is not in matters indifferent but in things most necessary; nor does it concern details only, which are wont to be placed by jurists in subtle points that serve principally for speculation, but in things that are held in our hands and are necessary for right living. And, as to what most touches the present cause, there is so much disagreement even in the article about the royal primacy that only the Anglican sect approves it and seems to uphold it. From which head alone, and viewed in itself, a sufficient reason is taken that the Anglican congregation cannot be esteemed the Catholic Church. Because the opinion about the primacy limits and restricts that sect to the bounds of that temporal kingdom, and, as far as it itself goes, divides the Church of Christ into as many parts as there are temporal kingdoms in the world; nor is there left to it the true unity of the one fold that Christ wished there to be in his Church, but at most a sort of concord or likeness, so to say, which King James longs for. But it could never obtain even that, as I said above, because since all agree in following their own judgment, they must disagree in reason of opinion and government.

Moreover, from here easily we give account of the second part, wherein we conjecture that the Anglican sect has not seized even a third part of the island of Britain. For, to pass over the fact that in all parts of that island there are very many faithful who do not subject faith to his judgment but bring their understanding to the obedience of Christ and are not separated from the Roman Church in spirit and mind at least, even among those who have defected from it there is no agreement in religion and faith. For as the king himself supposes in his Preface, there are many Puritans under his sway, whom he himself persecutes, and thus the whole kingdom has at a minimum been divided into three parts, namely, Catholics, Puritans, and semi Calvinists; and if trust is to be given to report, many even among these are Lutherans, others Zwinglians, or belonging to other sects. Nay, among the very semi Calvinists too there is believed to be no agreement in faith, however it may be with the external form of religion. Therefore, speaking in the sense that makes for the present cause, in no way can what the king says stand, that nearly a half part of the Christian globe has agreed in his religion.

Wherefore, Luther, Calvin, and the other heresiarchs of the present time freely, not to say impudently, respond that often what is good is approved by rather few, and thus that it is not a note of the true Church or Faith that it be in a multitude of nations and in an approved agreement of peoples, for thus Luther is said to have written in his bk. De Notis Eccles. that the devil has, next to the Church, built a far bigger and ampler shrine; and Calvin in the Preface to his Institutes excused in this way the paucity of his congregation, because scarcely ever have human things been so well disposed that more people should be pleased by what is better. Like things are held too by the Magdeburgians, Centuriae 1. However (which in all the controversies of this is a thing most to be considered) those new heretics in all their sayings and replies imitate the ancient heretics, which is a great sign of their error; hence I think they should be met in no other way than by the words of the Fathers who confuted the ancient heretics. Augustine, in his book De Unit. Eccles., ch.2, has the following: “Between us and the heretics the question is where the Church is; what therefore are we to do? Are we to seek for it in our words or in the words of its head, our Lord Jesus Christ? I think we should seek for it in his words, who is truth and very well knows his own body.” And in ch.3: “Let us not hear: ‘I say this, you say that;’ but lest us hear, the Lord says this; books of our Lord certainly exist, there let us seek for the Church, there let us plead our cause.” As if he were to say that in the divine Scripture the Church of Christ diffused through the whole globe is preached, and therefore the blasphemies of the heretics are to be despised who dare to call it the Church of the demon. And in ch.9 he relates that the Donatists said they were convinced that the Church of Christ was in the whole world at the beginning, but afterwards it perished because of the free and corrupt wills of men. To whom Augustine responds: “But as if the Spirit of God did not know the future wills of men, which utter madman said this? Why then did he not rather proclaim that this would be the case, because he knew the future about the wills of men? etc.” And in ch.13 he thus writes: “They say, ‘we believe those things and we confess they were completed, but afterwards the whole world apostatized and only the communion of the Donatists was left’ (or, with change of name, only the Anglican or Calvinist sect). Let them read these things to us,” says Augustine, “and we will in no way resist. But if they do not read them in the Sacred Scriptures but try to prove them by their own contentions, I believe the things that are read in the Scriptures, not that stuff which is said by vain heretics.” And in ch.15 he refutes in similar words “the cunning of heretics wanting to turn the words of God from the truth in which the words are to the perversity in which they themselves are.” And next he responds to certain Scriptures which the heretics were making to fit their own conventicles. Also finally, in ch.19, he concludes: “Setting aside the snares of delay, let him show that the Church has been retained in Africa alone when so many nations have been lost, or that it is from Africa to be repaired and filled in all nations, and let him show it in such a way that he not say, ‘It is true because I say so’, or because that colleague of mind said it, or they did, etc.”

The same reply will we give to Luther when he says that the Church exists in his sectaries, that he show it to us; for we do not believe him, nor is it in any way credible that God has built a Church against the Church which he founded and to which he promised perpetual protection, especially since indication not of the divine Spirit but of human ambition and liberty has appeared in the author of that synagogue. From Calvin too we require proof of the things he vainly says, and we add besides that he sufficiently shows his pride when he rashly dares to prefer his own judgment to the multitude and authority of so many Fathers illustrious for wisdom and sanctity. Hence, finally, we say that, although, by the crowd’s comparison, sometimes the better things are approved by the fewer people, nevertheless those things that are approved as better by the many wise are by any prudent man to be judged such and the contrary rejected. Which judgment is far more certain when such approval is not only made firm by human authority but also by divine. Yet in Sacred Scripture in this way and by the holy Fathers has the Catholic Church been approved that is diffused throughout the whole globe, from which the conventicles of the heretics are very far distant; and therefore they cannot be nor be named Catholic.

Chapter 16: How it is true that the Catholic Church is diffused through the whole globe.

Summary: 1. Reason for doubt. 2. Confirmation. 3. Response to the reason for doubt. 4. In two ways can the Church be diffused through the whole globe. 5. The Church is said to be universal with the universality of right and of fact. 6. The extent of the Church through the world can undergo various vicissitudes. 7. The promises about the preaching of the Gospel through the world have not yet been integrally fulfilled. 8. A universality sufficient for Catholicism was long ago attained by the Church. 9. The Church probably began to have the aforesaid universality from the time of Constantine. 10. For the Catholicism of the Church there is no need that it exceed the other sects in universality. 11. Satisfaction to the last part of the objection. 12. The Catholic Church even in the middle of persecutions has retained its splendor. 13. No sect can be so diffused through the world that it be judged likely Catholic. 14. First reason. 15. Second reason. 16. Third reason. 17. Heretics do not have the spirit of propagating the faith. 18. A concern to restore heretics is necessary to the Church. A certain objection is dissolved.

1. So as also to make satisfaction especially to Catholics themselves, another objection is not to be omitted here, which Augustine touched on in epist.48, that the Catholic or Roman Christian world is a moderate part of the whole world; how then can this Church be named Catholic from the fact that it occupies the universal world? The assumption can very easily be demonstrated; for a little above we thought it necessary to concede that the multitude of schismatics and heretics occupies nearly a half part of the Christian world; but, in addition to these, there are in the world Mohammedans who alone perhaps possess as many areas of the world as those who profess faith, whether false or true, under the name of Christ. Next the gentiles too and the idolaters occupy many and great provinces of the world; the Jews as well are wandering over innumerable other parts of the world; therefore there can be no doubt but that, with respect to the whole world, the extent of the Church of Christ is very limited and restricted; therefore it cannot by the title of universality be named Catholic.

2. The difficulty is also increased because it is not against the truth of the Church that it be so oppressed by persecutions and schisms that the true faith will at some time persist in a lesser part of those who confess Christ. A suitable example is from the time when the Church was so afflicted by the Arian heresy that Arianism had truly occupied the universal Christian globe, as is clear from Hilary in his book Contra Auxentium, and from Jerome in his book Contra Luciferianos, where, in column 13, he says: "Then was the name of 'ousia' abolished, then was the condemnation of the Nicene faith shouted aloud. The whole world groaned and marveled to see itself Arian." Hence Gregory Nazianzen, orat.25 to the Arians, who were glorying of their multitude, spoke thus: "Where finally are those who reproach us with our poverty, and insolently boast of their own might, who define the Church by multitude and scorn the little flock?" In which words he seems both to concede that there was at that time a small number of faithful facing a multitude of heretics agreeing even in the same error, and consequently he seems to deny that multitude pertains to the notes of the Church, as Billi also there notes. Nay he seems to allude to the words of Christ, Luke 12.32: "Fear not, little flock;" and from those words to collect that a small flock suffices for the true Church, which the heretics of this time gladly accept, so that they may glory of their fewness, adding that verse of Matthew 7.13: "Enter ye in at the strait gate;" and later: "Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

3. To the former part can be replied, first, that the name of 'Catholic' has not been imposed on the Church to distinguish it from gentileism or paganism or Judaism, for it is sufficiently distinguished from all these under the name of Christians or the Christian Church; but this name was imposed on it to discriminate it from the sects of the heretics. For although heretics are not Christians as to truth of faith, yet, because they do not altogether deny Christ but worship and confess him in their own way, for that reason they have under the Christian name their own mode of infidelity, and so (as we have noted from the Fathers) there has been added to the truly Christian faith the cognomen of Catholic, whereby it is distinguished from the sects of the heretics. Moreover, thence it comes about that, from the force of such name and its reason, there is no necessity that the extent of the Church surpass the multitude of all the faithful, but enough that it be in its own way dispersed through the universal globe and that therein it exceed any sect of heretics whatever.

4. Next, to explain this further, we note that in two ways can the Church of Christ be understood as needing to be diffused through the whole globe, namely, either by right and by institution and power, or by fact and, so to say, actual possession. In the first way it is manifest that the Church of Christ, from when it was instituted, was Catholic and Universal; both because it was instituted for the whole world and not, like the Synagogue, for a certain nation; and also because from then on it received the right to preach the faith of Christ through the whole world, according to the verse of Mark 16.15: "Preach the Gospel to every creature;" and Acts 1.8: "Ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." Next too, because it has power on earth for governing the whole globe in those things that have regard to the salvation of the soul, or that are referred to it, according to Matthew 18.17: "If he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican;" and John 21.16: "Feed my sheep." This universality of the Church then, which we can call of right or of sufficiency, could be enough for it to be called truly Catholic. Nay, Augustine, bk.2, Contra Petilianum, ch.38, since Petilianus had objected: "If you say you have the Catholic Church, 'Catholic' is that which in Greek means singular or whole. Behold, you are not in the whole who have yielded in a part." Augustine replied that 'Catholic' signifies the same as 'according to the whole', hence, "it received the name of 'Catholic' when the Lord himself said, 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me', etc." and he concludes: "Behold whence it is called Catholic." Wherefore it seems that the Church received this name from the apostles before the faith had been effectively disseminated through the whole world, for the apostles constructed their Creed before they were distributed through diverse parts of the world.

5. Nevertheless, not only on account of right, but also on account of fact and possession, so to say, did the Church receive that name. For the apostles knew that the promise of Christ was infallible and was to be fulfilled not long afterwards; and therefore they made establishment of it in such way as if had already in fact occupied the world, because in morals what is little distant seems to be nothing distant, and especially among those who by faith were reckoning a future thing to be already done. But, after their preaching, the extent of the Catholic Church began in very reality to be such that it could be seen as it were with the eyes. Hence Augustine in the place just cited, after the words, "Behold whence it is called Catholic," subjoins: "But, having closed your eyes, you are bumping into the mountain which, according to the prophet Daniel, grew from a little stone and filled the whole earth." Augustine, therefore, thinks, and the other Fathers above mentioned think, that the prophecies about the Church of Christ going to be diffused through the universal globe, and the promises made by Christ about founding and making firm the same Church, have already long ago been fulfilled. But at what time that began to be so, and by what certitude one can be certain of it, is not easy to explain.

6. Therefore we must further note that this diffusion of the Catholic Church through the universal globe can, as to greater or lesser increase, be allotted various states in amplitude of the Church; and that it is not certain among the holy Fathers and expositors of Scripture whether the prophecy and promises about this universality of the Church have already been in every respect fulfilled, or whether something remains to be fulfilled, which may to the end of the world, or near to it, be left to be consummated. For as to what Christ the Lord said, Matthew 24.14: "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come,” Jerome and Bede understand them of the consummation of the world, and they signify that that preaching has not yet been fulfilled. Nay, Jerome indicates that the completion of it will be a sign of the approaching judgment, and accordingly that an increase to such a degree in the extent of the Church is not to be fulfilled until the end of the world, or the time close to it.

Toward which opinion Augustine too inclines, bk. De Unit. Eccles., ch.17, where, treating of the same words of Christ, he says: “The faith itself of all nations has not yet been fulfilled,” and later, adapting the parable of the “man which sowed good seed in his field,” Matthew 13.24, connects with it: “This field is the world, in which the word of God bears fruit and increases,” as is said in Colossians 1.10, “up to the harvest, that is, up to the end of the world.” But the same Augustine, epist.78 to Hesychius, interprets the above words of Christ in a negative way alone, namely, “and then the end shall come,” that is, “before the Gospel is preached in the whole world, it will not come.” But how long after the completion of preaching the Gospel in the whole world, “is,” he says, “uncertain.” Hence it is uncertain too at what time is integrally to be fulfilled the promise about the diffusion of the Gospel, and of the faith or the Church, through the whole world. But Augustine in the same place holds it for certain that, at his own time, the promise has not yet been fulfilled, when he says: “If therefore the servants of God take up this labor so that, having traveled the whole earth as much as they could, they collect what remains of the nations where the Gospel has not yet been preached, we might hence be able somehow or other to note how far this time is from the end of the world.” Which also he confirms more at large in epist.80, near the end, because in his own time, “there were,” he says, “innumerable nations to whom the Gospel had not yet been preached.”

7. This argument also proves that up till now those promises have not been integrally completed, because in our age the new world, as they say, and very large provinces, where the Gospel was not preached, have been found, for converting which to the faith we see inaccessible places being traveled by the servants of God and churches established in them anew. Hence, therefore, rightly is it concluded that the Catholic Church is not said to be diffused through the whole globe for the reason that that diffusion of the Church has already in the whole universe and in all provinces been reached. Nay, Augustine adds in the said epist.80: “Although in all the nations where the Church is not yet it needs must sometime be; yet there is not need that all who are there should believe, because all nations are promised, not all men of all nations, for the faith is not of everyone.” From all these things, therefore, it is left very uncertain when the Church began to have in fact, and not only in hope, the universality which the name of Catholic denotes. Again, it is uncertain how much extension of the Church and multiplication of churches in the various provinces of the world will be necessary for the same effect. Finally, it is much more uncertain how numerous a multitude of men the same property requires for it to exist in very fact.

8. Nevertheless, it should be certain from the common sense of all the Fathers who so understand the Scriptures, that the Catholic Church has obtained, not only in our times, but also in many centuries into the past, a state (so to say) of sufficient universality that it may be said to be diffused through the whole globe. For, besides the predictions of the prophets and the promises of Christ, Paul already in his time said of the preaching of the apostles, Romans 10.18: “Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.” Which although Augustine interpret to be a prophecy about the future that is put forward, on account of its certainly, by a verb in the past tense, yet Jerome understands that it has now been in some way fulfilled, and he is agreeable to Paul’s context in the same place and in others; for, in Colossians 1.6, Paul says about the Gospel: “Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you.” Next, it is certain that the Church so increased up to the times of Augustine and other Fathers that it could simply be said to be diffused through the whole globe, as they themselves say; therefore, at least at that time it already had the said state, as they themselves preach. But it also retained it, or rather increased in it up to Gregory, as is collected from what was said above and from the epistles of the same Gregory to the bishops of the East and of the various provinces of the West. Now from that time up to our own age it has not lost the same state, but rather we see that it has increased over more and new provinces, although in certain others it has diminished; therefore it is simply true and certain that the Catholic Church is diffused through the whole globe. And although we may not be able to designate with certitude the time in which it began to have this state of universality complete, it matters not; for enough that there be certain clarity that it was from the beginning established for this end, and that within a few years it sufficiently obtained it, as according to the order of divine providence was expedient.

For the same reason too, although the limits of this extent cannot be designated with certainty, nevertheless we can say that, after sufficient preaching of the Gospel, there was need for the Catholic Church to have in the world a certain universal splendor, whereby its dignity and majesty could be recognized and discriminated from the crowds of heretics. For this pertained, to begin with, to the excellence of the kingdom of Christ, which was promised not only in heaven but also on earth, although on the earth itself it will not be an earthly or temporal kingdom but a heavenly and spiritual one. Next, because the Church was instituted by Christ for the salvation of men, so that much more universally and abundantly than before it might be communicated to both Jews and gentiles; and so there was need for the Church to grow at once, such that within a brief time it should be established in the aforesaid state, wherein, as far as it can, it could be to the advantage of all the regions of the world, or at any rate to the greater and more principal part of them. But for this end there was need that it should at once, or as soon as was morally possible, become known to the whole world. For as Augustine, epist. 48, column 10, urges: “How are we confident from the divine letters that we have received a manifest Christ if we have not thence received also a manifest Church?” so also do we assert that Christ could not reign in the world unless the faith of believers was diffused through the whole world.

9. Now it can be said with great probability that the Church began to have this state at least from the time of the emperor Constantine, when, after public peace had been conceded to the Church, even temples and churches began to be publicly built, and the Apostolic See began to have befitting honor and splendor, and General Councils could be convened, and the Church began in all other things that have regard to the majesty of the Church of Christ to be publicly recognized by the universal globe that was then known, so that one mystical body and one spiritual republic was instituted for the universal care and salvation of souls. Moreover, this conjecture of ours seems to have been insinuated by Augustine, conc. 2, on Psalms 103 [104], where, expounding the words, v. 6: “The waters stood above the mountains,” he interprets them of the flood of persecutions of the nascent Church and says: “For there was, before too long, a time when the land of God, the Church of God, was covered over with the waters of persecutions; and they so covered it that not even the great ones themselves, who are the mountains, appeared. For when they were in flight everywhere, how did they not appear less?” And later: “The waters covered them and stood above them, and they said, ‘Press down, press down,’ and they were prevailing over the martyrs, and Christians were fleeing everywhere, and by a sort of flight the apostles were concealed.” But afterwards he asks: “But for how long?” He replies: "Hear what follows, v.7, 'At thy rebuke they fled,' and this was done, brothers; from the rebuke of God the waters fled, that is, from the pressure of the mountains they receded. Now the mountains themselves are visible, Peter and Paul. How do they stand out? Those who before were pressed down by persecutors are venerated now by emperors. For the waters fled at the rebuke of God, because the heart of kings in the hand of God turns whither he wished, he commanded that through them peace be given to Christians, he shone forth, and the apostolic authority stood out. When the waters were above them, did the greatness of the mountains cease? But yet, so that all may see the eminence of the mountains, by which mountains there was salvation to the human race (because I lifted up my eyes to the mountains, whence cometh my help), at the rebuke of God the waters fled, from the voice of his thunder they will fear, who is now not afraid of the voice of God? Through the apostles, through the Scriptures, through his clouds, the sea was still, the waters feared, the mountains are bare, the emperor has given command. But would he have given command if God had not thundered? Because God wished, they commanded, and it was done." These are the very elegant and wise words of Augustine, by which he sufficiently makes plain at what time the Catholic Church began to have the state agreeable to its name. And it should, by the by, be noted that he does not attribute this state of the Church to the emperor as to the author of it, but only as to the remover of the impediments, and as attributing peace; nay, that neither does he number the emperor among the mountains of the Church, but the apostles, that is, in their successors, and he says specifically, "Peter and Paul are visible," through which two he without doubt understands the Apostolic See, and to the same See pertains the question: "How do they stand out?" because on that See the Church is founded, which then began, as he said, to have the state agreeable to its name.

10. Further, satisfaction is hence made to the first part of the objection; for we concede that it does not pertain to the universality of the Church explained by the name 'Catholic' that in it there should be a greater multitude of men than in the false sects, for this was nowhere promised to it and depends on the most high counsel of God in his predestination. And, as far as we can collect from the Scriptures, by the divine counsel is it rather permitted that there are more bad in the world than good, infidels than faithful, nay perhaps even within the Church itself there are more sinners than just. Hence Augustine in the said epistle 48, columns 13 & 14, says in a similar difficulty: "The Church is that of whose fewness it is said: 'narrow is the way which leadeth unto life;' and few there are that walk therein, and again it is that about whose multitude it is said, 'Thus will your seed be as the stars of heaven,' namely the same holy faithful and the good, and in comparison with the many bad they are few, and in themselves they are many, who come from East and from the West, etc." And later: "Therefore is the whole world placed in the evil one because of the tares which are in the whole world, and Christ is the propitiator of our sins and those of the whole world, because of the wheat which is in the whole world." And later he declares it with the comparison of the threshing floor, where the grain is little in comparison with the chaff; yet they are many in themselves, and are gathered "from the four winds, from the summits of the heavens to the ends thereof, etc." (Matthew 24.31, Mark 13.27). He delivers the same in bk.13, Contra Faustum, ch.16, and very well in bk.20, whose last words are these: "That fewness is to be acknowledged which the Lord chiefly commends in the huge and innumerable multitude diffused in the world; which fewness is called fewness as of the grains in comparison with the multitude of the chaff, but he makes it in itself so great a mass of grain that it surpasses by an incomparable multitude all your good and bad whom the truth condemns equally." For he compares the Church with one particular sect of heretics, and says that not only is the Church more extensive, but that even the just alone of the Church surpass incomparably all the heretics of such a sect; which to me is a thing very probable when with any heresy a similar comparison is made, although it not be necessary for the present cause.

Therefore it does not matter that there are fewer faithful in the Church than there are infidels in all the sects of the gentiles, pagans, Jews, and heretics; because about this comparison nothing has been revealed or promised, nor does it pertain to the universality of the Catholic Church that it should in number either of persons or peoples, provinces or kingdoms, exceed the infidels, but only that it should in itself be most ample and diffused through the whole globe. Hence Augustine against Petilianus, who wanted the fewness of the Donatists to suffice for a Catholic Church, responds, in bk.2 against him. ch.45: “You were afraid of the multitude of the world when compared to your multitude, and you yourself wished to compare yourself to the praise of the fewness that walks along the narrow way. Would that you had compared yourself not to the praise of the way but to the way itself! Surely you would have seen that the same fewness is in the Church of all the nations, but few are called just in comparison to the many wicked, just as in comparison with the chaff a few grains can be said to be a very rich crop, which grains yet by themselves, when reduced to a mass, fill the storehouse.” And in almost a like way in epist.48, column 9, when Vincentius says that in comparison with the whole world the amount of Christians is small, he replies to him: “You do not wish to notice, or you make pretence of knowing, how many barbarous nations in so short a time the Gospel has already come to, etc.”

11. From what has been said it is also easy to reply to the second part of the objection made, for now it has with Augustine been made plain what fewness is commended in the flock of Christ. Although by other titles and reasons too the flock of Christ could be called tiny by comparison with the infidels – either if, that is, the talk be of the predestinate compared with the reprobate, or because of the “devotion of humility”, as Bede said, bk.4, on Luke, ch.54, or because of the abjectness of condition of the disciples, who listened then to Christ because they were poor or of the lowest condition, or because of voluntary poverty or of denial of the world’s glory – the servants of Christ in the world are reputed worthless. Still it is clear that the narrow and strait way is not repugnant to the extent of the Church, because Christ proposed that strait way to the whole world, and thus his Church, although it be diffused through the whole globe, strives to enter through that narrow gate, and although there be few who try to enter in comparison with the infidels, yet are they simply many, called from the diverse provinces of the whole world; and similarly, although they be fewer who enter than who try to enter, yet even those fewer are sufficiently many, and are called from the whole globe. Besides, too, not of them only does the Church of Christ consist, which has in it not only the predestinate but also the rejected, not only the good but also the bad.

12. Next, it is also clear from what has been said that it is not unfitting for the Catholic Church to be sometimes much repressed, or even diminished, because of insurgent heresies and other persecutions. Because not only is it not repugnant to the predictions or promises made to the Church of Christ, but rather was that very thing often predicted by Christ, and it pertains to the narrow way that leads to life. Hence Bede, expounding that verse of Mark 6.47: “the ship was in the midst of the sea, etc.,” says that by that ship the labors of the holy Church are designated, “because sometimes the Church is not only afflicted but polluted by so great pressures from the gentiles that, were it possible, its redeemer would seem to have for a time deserted it.” But one must add that, from when the Catholic Church began to be diffused through the whole world, never has it, because of persecutions or insurgent heresies, so lost its splendor and as it were possession that it ceased to be sufficiently illustrious and diffused through the whole earth. This was signified by Augustine, epist.48, column 12, when he said: "It is sometimes obscured and as it were clouded over with a multitude of scandals, when sinners bend the bow to shoot arrows under a darkened moon at the righteous of heart, but still then it stands out in the firmest of its own." And this could easily be shown from the promises of Christ, and from the perpetual tradition and succession of the Church Catholic and Roman, if it had not been sufficiently demonstrated in chapter 5 about the visible Church.

Moreover, on this foundation Augustine responds to the example adduced of the time of the Arian heresy, when he says: "For then was the time of which Hilary wrote, etc." And later: "For who does not know that at that time many of little sense were deluded by obscure words, while others yielded to fear and agreed under pretence?" And later: "Although they too, who then were most firm and could understand the insidious words of the heretics, were few indeed in comparison with the rest, but yet even they themselves went some boldly into exile, some lay low over the whole globe. And thus the Church, which grows in all nations, is preserved by the instruments of the Lord, and it will be preserved up to the end, until it altogether holds all the nations, even the barbarous ones." In which words Augustine seems to concede that the faithful were at that time in a smaller number than were the Arian heretics, and that nevertheless the Church was preserved in its universality through the whole world. Which, from the hypothesis, is very true because of all that has been said above, and because also now the Catholic Church remains founded most firm on the rock, and possessed of universal power and of Catholics subject to it dispersed through the whole globe; for it matters not that they be sometimes fewer, especially for a brief time. Most especially so because the Church has always retained the authority of the Nicene Council and continuity with the ancient Church, whose splendor, as being the same with it, it participates.

This same response also has place in the time of the persecution of Antichrist, nay at that time it seems more necessary, because all that hiding and lessening of the Church seems to be predicted by Christ the Lord. But of the time of the Arian heresy I judge it more likely that the heretics never, even in numbers, surpassed the Catholics. For although in the little council of Rimini a greater part of the bishops were deceived by the Arians, and therefore Jerome said that the whole earth groaned and marveled that it was Arian, nevertheless that error was not with heretical spirit, as the same Jerome and Augustine signify, and Ambrose, bk.3, De Fide, last chapter. And so almost all, when they understood the fraud, at once began to profess and clearly teach the true faith. Next, although perhaps in the East the multitude of heretics was greater, yet it was not in the West, nor simply in the whole world. For Basil openly testifies to the fact, epist.72 to the Evaisenenses, when he writes: "Stand in the faith, look at the world itself, and see how small is that portion which labors with this sickness, but the rest of the Church, which has from one end of the world to the other received the Gospel, follows this sane and right doctrine." Athanasius too, in the Synodical epistle to the emperor Jovinian, which Theodoret reports in bk.4, Hist., ch.3, speaking of the faith defined at the Council of Nicea, says: "To this all churches everywhere have assented, as the Spanish, the British, the Gallic, the Italian, of the whole etc." And after enumerating many others he adds: "the Churches finally of the East, a few excepted that favor the Arian sect; for of all of them we have in very truth a known tested judgment, and we have received letters from them, and, most holy Augustus, we know it for certain; but no prejudice thence can arise against the whole earth." For that reason too Hilary above calls blessed and glorious the bishops of Gaul and Britain, who retained perfectly the apostolic faith, and by their example brought many Eastern bishops back to a saner mind. Hence at that time too the true faithful retained the name of 'Catholics'.

Moreover, in this way can be understood what Nazianzen says about heretics wanting to measure the Catholic Faith by the multitude of believers; for perhaps in his own city or bishopric there were more Arians than Catholics, and from that multitude clearly the Catholic Faith was not be collected, just as, though perhaps now there are in England more heretics than Catholics, no sign thence of Catholic Faith may be taken; especially because, although it might happen that a heresy is much diffused, it would, because of defect of other conditions, never have the sign of the Catholic Church, as I said above and as there Billi notes.

13. Hence I conclude lastly that never could any heresy be so diffused through the universe, or so under such circumstances increase in number of followers, that thence one could likely judge that it was the Catholic Faith; but rather always the opposite can with sufficient certainty be evident, from the defect of mode of universality promised to the Catholic Faith. This might be sufficiently proved by the examples of all the heresies that there have hitherto been, for what happened to all the sects of heretics in past times will, it must be believed, happen in other times; for the same reason of limitation, so to say, or of determination to a limited place, or nation, or paucity of followers, is found in them all.

14. Now the first reason is that every heresy is introduced through defection from the Catholic Faith, and consequently it deviates from the certain rule of believing, and therefore never can it be made universally persuasive as the true and indubitable faith. This is elegantly indicated by Augustine in his book, De Pastoribus, ch.8, where, after he had said that there are various heresies in various provinces which do not recognize each other, but that the Catholic Church is everywhere with them all and knows them all, because it is diffused over all, he subjoins: "It (that is, the Catholic Church), increasing like a vine, is everywhere diffused; they are like useless twigs cut off by the scythe of the farmer as desert for their sterility, so that the vine may be deemed vine and not cut. So those twigs, where they are cut off, there they remain, but the vine, increasing through all parts, knows its own twigs, those that have remained in it, and, next to it, those that have been cut off from it; yet from there it calls back the erring." These words are very much to be noted; for they rightly make plain both the difference between the Catholic Faith and any particular sect whatever, and the reason proposed. The same reason is contained in almost the same words in Augustine's, bk.4, Contra Crescon., ch.60, where he refers to Cyprian's book De Unitate Eccles., saying that the Church extends its branches through the whole world. But about heresies Cyprian adds: "We did not leave them, but they left us; and when heresies and schisms have afterward been born, while they are establishing diverse conventicles for themselves, they have left the head and origin of truth." Hence he rightly collects that they cannot be assembled in the name of Christ, or come together in universal fraternity.

15. Hence too arises a second reason, which in the same place Cyprian touches on, saying: "Heresies are made, and come to be, when a perverse mind does not keep peace, when a discordant faithlessness does not keep unity." For hence it happens that those who abandon concord with the Church are not in concord with themselves; which also, as I said above, proceeds from defect of foundation, because, since they do not in their believing rely on the rule handed down by God, but on their judgment and opinion, they must, if they endure a little while or are multiplied, split up at once into various sects; "since the visions of their heart frustrate them," as the same Cyprian said in the same place; and therefore they do not persevere nor are extended with that unanimity which the Catholic Faith requires. Which is very well declared by Augustine, bk. De Pastoribus, ch.8, where he adapts to heretics the words of Ezekiel, 34.6: "My flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth;" and he adds: "Not, all the heretics upon all the face of the earth; but yet there are heretics upon all the face of the earth, some here, some there, yet nowhere are they lacking. They do not know themselves. One sect in Africa, one heresy in the East, one in Egypt, one in Mesopotamia, for example. In diverse places they are diverse, but one mother, pride, has given birth to them all, just as one mother, our Catholic mother, has given birth to all the faithful Christians diffused in the whole globe. No wonder, then, if pride bring forth dissension, charity union.” Hence the same Augustine, epist.48, adapts to heresy also that verse of Song of Songs 1.8: “If thou know not...go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock[s], and feed thy kids,” and he thus expounds: “If you do not know yourself, go you out; I do not eject you, but go out, so that it may be said of you: they went out from us but they were not of us; go you out by the footsteps of the flocks, and not of one flock, but of diverse flocks, and wandering flocks. And feed thy kids, not as Peter does, to whom it was said, ‘Feed my sheep,’ but ‘feed thy kids beside the shepherds’ tents’, not in the tent of the shepherd, where there is one flock and one shepherd.”

16. We can add next a third reason, that in the sect of heretics there is not found a spirit of propagation, so to say, of the faith, without which the Catholic Faith itself would never have grown nor have been diffused through the whole world, “because faith is from hearing, but hearing through the word of Christ” [Romans 10.17]. And therefore in the Church of Christ, so that it might be Catholic, there was necessary first a universal power of preaching the Gospel through the whole globe, which Christ gave to it together with the precept to preach his faith in the whole world, Matthew 28, Mark 16, Acts 1. And in this way does Paul assert, Galatians 1, that the Gospel of the uncircumcision had been entrusted to him as of the circumcision to Peter, and 2 Corinthians 5.19-20: “God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself...and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us.” There was necessary next a spirit of propagating the faith conformed to this power, both for effectiveness of preaching, and for conceiving an affection and care for drawing men to Christ, and therefore the Lord himself commanded the apostles to stay in the city until they should be endued with virtue from on high, Luke 24, Acts 1. Which spirit Paul shows very much in his epistles, and he describes his various gifts given for this goal of the Church, Ephesians 4, and 1 Corinthians 12.

17. Now that the heretics do not have this spirit can be made plain in this way. Because two things chiefly pertain to this propagation of the Church. One is to convert to Christ the heathen who do not in any way believe in him; the other is to call those who err in the profession of the faith of Christ, and have gone out from his Church, back to him and to illuminate them in the true faith. But neither of these duties have any heretics anywhere exercised, not even the Protestant Anglicans, however much they boast of it and contend for it. For, as to the first, never have heretics been seen preaching the faith to new nations, or converting the heathen to the faith. The witness is Tertullian, bk.1, De Praescrip., ch.42, saying: “About the administration of the word, what should I say? Since their business is not to convert the heathen but to overturn our own.” And the reason is that in them there is not the true word of God, and therefore neither can they have the efficacy of the word. Again, they are not led by the spirit of Christ, but by their own, and so “they rather cause the ruin of standing buildings than the building of fallen ruins,” as Tertullian said in the same place. Finally, since they are outside the Church, they cannot have the power of preaching the faith of Christ, because this power, as I said, was given to the Church in the apostles, and it has remained in their successors, and from them should preachers of the true Gospel be sent, according to that verse, Romans 10.15: “How shall they preach, except they be sent?” And thus is it observed in the ecclesiastical histories that the Church has not been diffused among the nations except by Catholic preachers sent by the apostles or by the Apostolic See, which also about the English themselves was shown above.

18. But besides this care of propagating the faith among the heathen, there is necessary in the Catholic Church a care for preserving it and of bringing back to it all who, while not altogether denying Christ, deviate from the Church. For this is very much necessary for its pastoral care and universal propagation. Hence Augustine, in the said ch.8, De Pastorib., says: “Our Catholic mother, and the pastor within her, everywhere seeks the erring, comforts the infirm, cures the weak, binds up the broken, some broken by these (namely by these heretics), some by those, who do not have knowledge of each other.” But how could this care be found in an heretical sect? For since it has spread by defection from the true faith and stamped thereon with its foot, how could it bring other wanderers back to the way of salvation? You will say, it will at any rate have care to snatch other believers in Christ into its own opinion, and in this way at least it could grow. I reply, even if this should happen, God permitting it because of men’s sins, yet in no way thence could it be prejudicial to the splendor and extent of the Catholic Church, because the gates of hell will not prevail against it, as I have already declared. I add that, considering the nature and condition of heresy, morally it cannot be nor can it ordinarily be feared; both because, since heresy is repugnant to God and the truth and is a merely human business, it cannot prevail against the light of the Church wholly and for very long; and because, as I said, the heretics themselves disagree easily with each other, and so they lose their force when spreading the same sect over various regions; and because, for the most part, they do not fall into a sect of this sort unless led by a spirit of pride, or ambition, or liberty; and, therefore, they care for the propagation of their sect no more than is of service to this end or to some human contention.

Of which thing the reader will not make a light conjecture if he reread the words of the king of England at the end of his Preface, where, speaking generally to Christian princes, he shows himself solicitous of propagating the faith, and prays “That God instill into himself and into other princes a mind of seriously thinking what they are held to supply for the planting and propagation of the Gospel.” Whereby he tacitly tries to persuade temporal princes to arrogate to themselves and to usurp the pastoral office that was, as we saw, committed to the apostles alone and to their successors; but at once he shows by what spirit he is being carried when he says: “Next, so that we may maturely and prudently consult for the security of our scepters, and not suffer the Babylonian monarch to snake about more widely.” And other things there are which he pursues and which I now omit, because they are to be treated of in the third book. But, through the ones I have indicated, he makes sufficiently plain that his only study is “to conjoin spiritual liberty with temporal, and to obtain temporal quiet and security” in his own schism, for these more or less are his words. From everything that has been said, then, the conclusion is sufficiently drawn that nothing Catholic or nothing universal is discovered in the Anglican sect.

Chapter 17: The Apostolic Faith does not exist in the Anglican Schism.

Summary: 1. The faith is said to be apostolic from the apostles. 2. What is required for a doctrine to be called apostolic. 3. The best rule for recognizing the faith. 4. From the aforesaid conditions is collected that the Anglican faith is not apostolic. 5. The things that the Anglican sect has in common with the Roman Church pertain to the apostolic faith. 6. The doctrine of the Creeds, as far as the king interprets it, cannot contain the certitude of the apostolic faith. 7. The same is proved by examples. 8. Apostolic writings without the apostolic sense do not suffice for faith. 9. The Anglican sect according to its own dogmas seems repugnant to the apostolic faith.

1. It is a thing tried among all those who treat of sacred doctrine that that is the true and Catholic Faith, namely doctrine to be believed by faith, which the apostles handed down; and that is why it is called the apostolic Faith, just as the Universal Church is also called apostolic in the Nicene Creed. For this cause, therefore, the king of England profess that he is not only defender of the Catholic but also of the apostolic Faith, and as a consequence he wants the Anglican sect, which alone he really guards, to be the apostolic faith. But although from his words one can easily be understand that a sect which is not Catholic cannot be apostolic, and that what is new and recent is cannot arrogate to itself the antiquity of apostolic doctrine, nevertheless, so as more openly and distinctly to demonstrate the thing, and make satisfaction to everything that could arise, it has seemed worthwhile to refute specifically this attribute too of the royal title.

2. But first of all must be laid down that two things are necessary for faith or doctrine to be apostolic; one is that it have taken its origin in some way from the preaching of the apostles and from their words or writings; the other is that it have come to us through legitimate tradition or succession. The first is indicated by Paul, Ephesians 2.19-20, when he says: "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets." Which Augustine touches on, and about these foundations he understands that verse of Psalms 86 [87].1: "His foundation is in the holy mountains," and he asks: "Why the foundations of the apostles and prophets?" He replies: "Because their authority carries our infirmity," that is, because on the prediction of the prophets and the preaching of the apostles we in believing most closely rely. For the apostles preached what the prophets predicted; and, says Ambrose on Ephesians 2, "the prophets disposed the foundations, the apostles laid them," which foundations are nothing but the dogmas and doctrine by them predicted. Hence very gravely does Irenaeus say, bk.3, ch.1: "We do not recognize the disposition of our salvation through others than through them through whom the Gospel came to us; which indeed they then preached, but which afterwards, by the will of God, they handed on to us in the Scriptures, the future ground and pillar of our faith." The reason is that a faith or doctrine is not denominated apostolic except because it was handed down by the apostles, in the way in which a doctrine or law is wont to be denominated from its author; with this difference observed, however, that other human doctrines are wont to take their own fitting names for themselves from men as from the principal authors, but the faith did not thus receive its name from the apostles; but just as the Old Law is said to be Mosaic from Moses, not as author, but as promulgator, so the Christian faith is said to be apostolic from the apostles, not as authors, and as it first preachers and promulgators. And therefore, after Paul said in the cited place, "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets," he added, vv.20-21: "Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord." For he himself is the principal foundation, and basis of all foundations which are built on him, and we ought to look unto him as "the author and finisher of our faith," Hebrews 12.2.

The second thing, which I proposed about legitimate succession, is very frequent in the Fathers, whom in great part I referred to in chapters 3 and 6; but it is especially made plain by Irenaeus, bk.3, ch.3, when he says: "To examine the tradition of the apostles is present to hand in every Church, whoever wishes to hear the truth, and we are able to count those who by the apostles were instituted bishops in the churches, and their successors up to ourselves." And bk.4, ch.43: “One ought to obey the priests who are in the church, those who have succession from the apostles, who together with the succession of the episcopacy have received the sure charism of the truth according to the pleasure of the Father.” The same condition for discerning apostolic from foreign doctrine is extensively handed on by Tertullian, bk., De Praescriptionibus, where, among other things, he has these, that all apostolic churches exhibit some Apostle constituted bishop there, or an apostolic man ordained there by one of the apostles, from succession of which apostolic seed he has the transplanted shoots. But he calls apostolic men those who conversed with the very apostles, and received doctrine from them and ordination and power, as Titus, Polycarp, Clement, and the like. But since many churches were instituted after those ancient times, he adds about these: “however, they conspire in the same faith and are deputed, for consanguinity of doctrine, no less apostolic.” They conspire, then, in the same doctrine also by legitimate succession, because, although such churches were taught neither by the apostles, nor by apostolic men, that is, men sent or ordained immediately by the apostles, they did at least have a beginning through someone sent by another who had power, to whom came, along with it, the doctrine of the apostles, as the English church began through men sent by Gregory, the German by bishop Boniface sent by Gregory II, and thus about others. For those who do not enter through this door are without doubt thieves and robbers. “To whom (as Tertullian elegantly says) it is deservedly said: Who are you? When and whence did you come? What are you doing in me who are not mine? (he speaks in the name of the Church). Mine is the possession, I have firm origins from the apostles themselves, whose the thing was, I am heir to the apostles; as they stipulated in their testament, as they committed to faith, as they swore on oath, so I hold.”

3. The same foundation is used by other Fathers for the same end of separating true doctrine from false errors, as Vincent of Lerins does extensively in his book against the profane novelties of heretics, and Optatus uses it in bk.2, Contra Parmenian, and Jerome Contra Luciferianos, at the end, where he says one must adhere to that Church “which, founded by the apostles, endures to this day,” and he indicates the same in epist.65 to Pammachius and Oceanus, where he urges even the new comers of our time, as also the old ones of his age, with this question: “Why do you bring forward what Peter and Paul refused to present?” Again Ambrose, on 1 Corinthians 4, at the beginning, says that someone is known to be a false prophet when he hands on something that is discordant with apostolic tradition. Thus too did Augustine speak of the Church, bk.1, De Symbolo ad Catechumen., ch.6: “All heresies have come from it as useless twigs from a pruned vine, but it itself remains in its root, in its vine,” that is, in the same origin that it had from the beginning. But as to how it remains in that root, the same Augustine makes plain, bk.28, Contra Faustum, ch.2, when he says: “Brought down by certain succession from the sees of the apostles up to the present bishops,” and later he adds that that Gospel is to be believed which from the time of the apostles “with an uninterrupted series of times the Church by sure succession of connection has brought down to our times.” He has like things in bk.1, Contra Adversarium Legis, et Prophetarum, ch.20, and bk., De Utilitate Credendi, ch.17. Lastly a very good rule is handed on by Origen in the Preface to his book, Peri Archon: “Since there are many who suppose themselves to think what is Christ’s, and some of them think things diverse from prior ones, let the ecclesiastical preaching be preserved that is handed on by order of succession from the apostles and remains in the churches up to the present; that truth alone is to be believed which is discordant in nothing with ecclesiastical tradition.”

Again we can by reason easily make this plain, because the apostolic faith is that only which was preached or written by the apostles; but we did not hear the apostles preaching nor see them writing; therefore we cannot know for certain that any doctrine was preached or written by the apostles except by the hands and mouths of those who either heard or saw them, or who received the same doctrine, through more or fewer successions according to the antiquity of times, from those who heard the apostles; therefore, so as to make it certainly clear that such doctrine endures altogether pure and the same, it is necessary that that succession be continuous and uninterrupted. Nay, as I said above in chapter 6, the singular protection of God is necessary in order that, in so long a repeated succession of times and generations, the doctrine may be kept intact and unfailing and with the highest authority; but this divine protection was not promised except to the Church which, through legitimate succession of Pontiffs and the faithful, has always remained the same; therefore without such a series and succession no faith could be judged apostolic.

4. From this necessary foundation, then, we conclude thus: that faith now is to be deemed apostolic which, having been preached by the apostles, has been derived through legitimate succession down to us; but the Anglican sect was neither preached by the apostles nor has from their doctrine or tradition been legitimately derived; therefore it is not the apostolic faith. About the first proposition enough has been said; the second remains to be declared and proved, for the king of England will strongly deny it. Since for this cause, perhaps, in his Preface pages 42, 43, & 44, in order to show himself Catholico-Christian (as he himself says), he professes to believe, admit, or venerate the Scriptures as to the books of first order, the three symbols of the faith, and first four General Councils, thinking that the apostolic faith is sufficiently contained in these sources. But what he says about himself, we think is said about the whole Anglican sect or congregation, which recognizes the primacy of the king himself. Thus therefore he will reply, to the reason given by us, that the apostolic doctrine has, through the said books of Scripture, the Creeds, and the Councils, sufficiently come down to him and his, and that there can be no more certain or more legitimate way of receiving the apostolic faith by, as it were, hereditary succession than through the Scriptures, Creeds, and the said Councils, and that every other doctrine, which is not contained in these, he holds suspect and refutes as if recent, or at any rate he does not accept it in the canon of the faith.

5. But this halved confession of faith does not undo the force of the reason given, as now briefly in general, but more extensively in book 2 in particular, I will show. Therefore in the Anglican sect, or (which we repute now to be the same) in this profession of the king, a distinction must be made between what it has in common with the Catholic and Roman Faith and what is proper to it or diverse. For England retains many things from what it before believed as Catholic, and these we must say it has in common with the apostolic faith; but there are others wherein it has defected from the Roman Church, which we call proper to it. As to what concerns the former, then, we concede that that part pertains to the apostolic faith, but that yet, not from the Anglican congregation, or credulity, but from the Roman Church has it testimony for this antiquity. For whence did England have those books which prevail in authority with the king save from the Roman Church? Or how could they obtain that degree of authority unless they had through legitimate tradition reached the Catholic Church and had been approved by the same? What am I to say about the true and sure sense of such books? Certainly only from the same origin, tradition, and approval could it be clear what was the mind and opinion of the apostles in such writings; never could the apostolic faith be dug out with certainty, much less proved, from the same books, because the doctrine does not consist in the words or the books but in the meaning, as in a similar case I demonstrated above from Jerome. Which point is to be understood not only about the books of Scripture, but also about the Creeds and Councils, since the same reason holds of them all, as appears manifest of itself.

Wherefore, although the doctrine of such books, considered in itself, is the Catholic Faith, or rather part of it, as I will now say, nevertheless, as it is retained by the sectaries, it is either not apostolic or cannot be believed with certainty to be such. The first indeed, because the sectaries cannot be certain that those books of Scripture, which they admit, are apostolic, since it is by their own decision that they admit some, and deny others, and admit some as to some of their parts and not as to others. For, by this liberty of discriminating between the books of Scripture, their whole doctrine, as far as they are concerned, is rendered uncertain and as if human, because it could only be believed by human opinion or faith and not by divine. Which reason could also be applied to the Councils, because by no certain authority or reason do they admit some of them, reject others, although these have the same weight of authority, or in them is seen the gravity of the judges, or the assistance of the Holy Spirit. Besides, too, there is another reason both about the Creeds and about the Councils; for the doctrine in them is not admitted by these sectaries for the reason that there it is handed down or defined, but that it is in their judgment contained in Scripture, and in this way the Creeds or Councils are not for them a foundation for certitude that the doctrine is apostolic, but only their own judgment is, as I deduced extensively in chapters 6 and 7. Thence is taken a second general reason, because doctrine does not consist in the letter but in the sense; thus, for a doctrine to be apostolic, there is need that not only the books but that their sense have an origin and certain descent from the apostles themselves; but for the sectaries the sense does not have this, because they are led by their own decision, or the private spirit that they invent; therefore, either their doctrine is, even in the thing itself, not apostolic, because they err in the sense of Scripture; or, although by chance it happen that it is in itself apostolic, it does not with them have that sort of certitude, because they measure it by the same measure.

6. Wherefore it helps not that King James, on page 42, says that he “interprets the three Creeds in that sense which the Fathers wanted for them and the Councils by which they were made and described.” For I ask, whence does he know this will of the Fathers and the Councils? He will say, perhaps, that he knows it from their words. But what if the words have from varying signification or the interpretation of men various senses? Whence does he discern that the will of the Fathers and Councils was that this sense was in those words and not another? He will say, I believe, that “by his own certain knowledge” he knows it and believes it. For since he says that about the Scriptures, he will more easily affirm it about the Creeds and the Councils. But that certain science is altogether null, as I showed in chapter 7 from the Scriptures, the Fathers, and manifest reason; therefore the king cannot prove to us that he is interpreting the Creeds in the sense which the Fathers wanted for them, but by chance will it happen that sometimes it is so, and often it will not be so, and therefore such a doctrine thus believed cannot have the certitude of apostolic doctrine.

7. We may prove this further by examples. One of the articles of the Apostles’ Creed is “He descended into hell,” which words are not further explained by Athanasius. But the Church, taught by the Fathers, understands those words properly of a true, and real, and local descent of Christ, in his soul separated from the body, to the subterranean places of hell. But Calvin and others understand it of the pains of hell, which they imagine that Christ suffered in the garden and on the cross. If the king, therefore, believes those words of the Creed accepted in this second sense (which we presume of the king, since he professes the sect of Calvin), let him show to us who revealed to him that that sense was intended by the apostles, especially since it is outside the proper and ordinary signification of the words, and is against the understanding of all the old Fathers when in any way interpreting the Scriptures about that article, as has been shown by us elsewhere; therefore he does not in this retain the apostolic doctrine, however much he may boast that he accepts the Creeds. And the same argument can be made in other articles of the Creed, as in that wherein we confess that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, or that he will come to judge the living and the dead by their deeds, as we confess in the Creed of Athanasius, or wherein we profess one Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the remission of sins. For all these things are understood in far different sense by the Protestants than was handed down by the apostles or Councils, as could easily be shown if the brevity of this work would permit. Therefore in vain does the king, who protects Protestants, say that he interprets the creeds in the sense which the authors wanted; for he cannot show from them a sense of this sort, and therefore that doctrine cannot be shown to be apostolic, and consequently, as concerns him and his followers, there is nothing in the Creeds that could with certainty be reputed apostolic doctrine.

8. We conclude then that it is not enough to retain the apostolic words or writings, unless “they also be understood apostolically,” as Gregory Nazianzen says, orat.52, elsewhere epist.2 to Cledonius. But what it is to be understood apostolically or not apostolically he makes plain when he says: “Because the same words, if rightly understood, are conjoined with piety; if badly expounded, do not lack impiety.” And before he had said it is the practice of heretics “that when they see themselves refuted and overwhelmed by the common opinions that the Scriptures exhibit, they confess indeed the pious words and build around them a lying sense.” But he signifies that an indication of non-apostolic understanding of this sort is novelty contrary to the ancient tradition of the Church, saying: “O huge absurdity! They announce to us a wisdom hidden since Christ; a thing that is surely worthy of tears. For if the faith had its beginning no more than thirty years ago, although almost four hundred years have already flowed by from when Christ was manifested, vain to be sure was the Gospel for so long time, vain also our faith, in vain did the martyrs perform their martyrdoms and in vain did such and so many priests have charge of the people.” Therefore to the apostolic doctrine must be joined the apostolic sense; but the sense will be apostolic if it has taken its origin from the apostles, which the perpetual agreement and preaching of the Church makes manifest. Since, therefore, the king of England, although he receive the Apostles’ Creed and the rest, yet does not retain unfailing their apostolic sense, he cannot be said, even as to this part, to profess the apostolic faith.

9. I come to the second part of the aforesaid doctrine proper to the Protestants, and to almost all the sectaries of this time, which the king too along with them accepts and prefers to the faith of the Roman Church. About this part, then, we can show in two ways that it is not apostolic. First in general from the principles hitherto discussed; for all the things that are proper to that sect are contrary to the ancient faith of the Universal Church, because they were introduced through defection from it, as was shown in chapters 2 and 3; therefore they cannot be from apostolic doctrine, but from the empty novelty of men thought up in their own brain. The consequence is proved from the foundation posited, that the beginning of apostolic doctrine is to be traced back through a sure series to the times of the apostles and their preaching; therefore those dogmas, which began a few years ago, and whose beginning is known to have been by defection from the ancient faith, cannot be apostolic doctrine or faith. For this argument is implicitly used by Gregory Nazianzen in the place just cited, and the same is used by Athanasius in Theodoret, bk.4, Histor., ch.3, when he says to the emperor Jovinian about faith in the divinity of the Divine Word: “May you know for certain, Augustus, that this same thing has from all memory of the ages been preached.” This rule is also used by the emperor Theodosius in Sozomen, bk.7, Histor., ch.12, for getting rid of the insurgent heretics, namely, by making examination of doctrine through that which holy and apostolic men always handed on, so that what was in agreement with it was received as apostolic, but what in disagreement was repulsed; and other Fathers frequently use the same rule of antiquity, and it is greatly commended by Vincent of Lerins in his golden book against profane novelties of words.

A second way of showing that the Anglican sect, as to the things that are proper to it, or in which it adheres to Calvin, Luther, Zwingli, or other Protestants, is not the apostolic faith, can be by descending to individual dogmas, and showing their novelty and degree of error. But because we are not taking up the province of disputing about all the dogmas which have in these times been brought into controversy by the heretics, and because it would be overly long and laborious, we will not at present pursue this mode of proof. But we will in the following book not omit to weigh individual points foreign to the Roman Faith which King James touches on in his own confession of faith, and we will reply to him with the utmost brevity according to opportunity of space.

We think it now enough, for the sake of example, to propose the article about the primacy, which seems to be most proper to the Anglican sect. For the Anglican sect proposes this article to its sectaries for belief, namely, that the temporal king is in his kingdom the supreme head in spiritual matters, whom all bishops and priests, or (as the sectaries say) ministers, are held to obey. We ask, therefore, which of the apostles taught this, or left it written in the Church of Christ, or how could a dogma be derived from the apostles which before Henry VIII was not heard in the Church of Christ? But that this be so, we do prove now in no other way than that we never read in the Gospel that the Church was committed to kings, but to Peter, the apostles, and bishops, Matthew 16, 18, 28, John 21, Acts 20; nor do we read in the apostolic letters that the faithful were commanded to give obedience to kings in things that pertain to the salvation of the soul, but to overseers who will give account of the souls committed to them, Hebrew 13; nor do we read in the histories that any Christian and Catholic king arrogated such power to himself or exercised it in the Church. All which things we will expressly deal with in book 3, and therefore it suffices now to have insinuated them, so that we may therefrom conclude that the sect which took its beginning from this dogma and is in some way founded on it (for on its account chiefly has it separated itself from the Roman Church), can in no way be reputed the Apostolic faith.

10. Perhaps the king may say that the article is not counted by himself, or by his ministers, among those that are to be held by Catholic Faith. For he seems to have used this correction on page 62 of his Preface, when he said: "But I frankly pledge that as often as any chapter of the religion which I profess is shown not to be ancient, Catholic, and apostolic but new and recent (in things, that is, that have regard to faith), I will at once depart therefrom." However, if under that limitation or correction he comprehends his own article about the primacy, and does not number it among the things that have regard to the faith, certainly he is very unjustly compelling his subjects to acknowledge such power of dignity in himself. For how could they justly be compelled if they themselves are not held in conscience to acknowledge such dignity in a temporal king? Or how can they be held to acknowledge it if they are not held to believe it? Or by what right can they be held to believe that article if it is not to be believed according to the Catholic Faith? A reply could be that it is to be believed by political faith, so to say, or royal faith, that is, founded in the authority, precept, of testimony of the king or his council. But this is very absurd, and alien to all reason even human, because the dignity and power of governing the Church in spiritual things is not a thing found out by human reason, but ought to be given by Christ, according to that verse of Paul, 2 Corinthians 10.8: "For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction;" and therefore Christ himself said, Luke 10.16: "He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me;” therefore as to that dignity and power which is in the king, it cannot stand by mere natural reason, nor could the king, if it has not been given to him, by his own will usurp it. Therefore, if this has not been revealed, as it in fact has not been, and therefore the English are not held to believe this article by faith (as is supposed in the said response), then certainly there is no human authority which could justly compel them to believe it, since it is about a thing which surpasses human power and knowledge, which is not had through revelation – to omit the fact that it is contrary to the things that have been revealed, as I will afterwards show. Therefore if the king wishes to speak consistently with the things he is doing, he must place among the articles of his faith this one about his primacy, and so, from that alone, we conclude that his faith is not apostolic.

Chapter 18: An objection against the doctrine of the previous chapter is met.

Summary: 1. An objection of the heretics. What is rejected by the king of England as new. 2. The king tries to preclude the way to a Catholic response. 3. The Roman Church can receive no dogma contrary to the apostles; but the Anglican sect receives many that are contrary to them. 4. The Church can propose some things distinctly to be believed that were not thus believed before. 5. What novelty is repugnant to antiquity of faith. 6. The first way of declaring dogmas of the faith. 7. Second way. 8. In things pertaining to morals, not only addition but also change can be made. 9. Through additions made by the Church the apostolic doctrine is not changed but made more plain. 10. Satisfaction is made to the examples given at the beginning.

1. Against the discussion of the previous chapter the adversaries could object to us that the Roman Pontiffs too propose many things to be believed de fide that neither were preached by the apostles nor are so ancient that they could be derived through a continued series from the apostles; therefore the Roman Faith too cannot be, or be called, Catholic. This inference has a foundation in the things which we have just brought forward against the adversaries. For, so that a doctrine may be apostolic, it is not enough that some part of it was preached by or derived from the apostles, for even the Anglican sect has this, nay and any heretical sect, which always mixes true with false. If therefore the Roman Church too has new things mixed with old, its doctrine cannot be judged simply apostolic, especially as regards things wherein it is at variance with other sects of men professing Christ, because in these dogmas too it is new just as are the other sects introduced under the name of Christ. The assumed proposition can be proved, to begin with, by the examples which the king in his Preface relates and calls novel and recent, as the invocation of the Blessed Virgin and other saints, and the cult of relics, and the veneration and adoration of images, and other things that we will run through later.

2. Nor will we satisfy him by saying that these cannot be called new since they may be shown to have been observed by the Church a thousand and more years ago; for he himself recognizes only as sufficiently ancient what “the whole Catholic Church already thence from the times of the apostles without intermission for many centuries afterwards constantly taught and believed,” as he says on page 72 and as he confirms with the testimony of Vincent of Lerins. And dogmas that may be found of this sort (so as to show himself a follower of apostolic doctrine) he confirms that he will never refuse, although he wishes this too to be understood of a dogma of the faith not simply but with a limitation, “as far as it be necessary for salvation.” Next we can add examples of certain things which the Roman Church now believes de fide, which are confessedly held not to have been taught by the apostles, as that the Blessed Virgin never committed venial sin, that the books of the Maccabees are canonical, and such like, which for the sake of brevity I set aside.

3. To this objection we say, in the first place, that it is one thing to believe something repugnant to the dogmas and doctrines preached by the apostles, but another thing to believe something by way of addition to doctrine preached by the apostles that may not have been by them expressly declared, or that at any rate may not be clear that it was. The first kind of credulity or doctrine is repugnant to apostolic doctrine, because this doctrine is altogether immutable, as God and his word are immutable, as Paul signified, Galatians 1.8 by the exaggeration: "Though an angel from heaven..." and therefore he said, 2.18: "If I should build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor;" and 2 Corinthians 1.18-19: "But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay...but in him was yea." And so it is an evident sign of non-apostolic but rather apostate doctrine to hand on even the least thing contrary to the words or writings of the apostles; for that is sufficient, not only for showing the falsity of such dogma, but also for overturning the faith of such doctrine as regard certainty, as I have already explained. But in the doctrine of the Roman Church no dogma of this sort is or can be found, according to the promises of Christ treated above, and we will easily show it by responding later to all the examples which the king adduces. However, in the sect of the king of England are numbered many things which are plainly repugnant to the doctrine of the apostles, even doctrine written down by them, as is: to deny the unwritten traditions, to resist in dogmas the Universal Church, which is the pillar and ground of the truth. Again: to deny every rule of faith besides private spirit, or at any rate so to establish it that everything is necessarily called into doubt; again: to preach that a temporal king is free and permitted not to obey any bishop or pastor of the Church, even the supreme one, and other like things that are connected with these, to pass over other more special ones that are born from these general ones, as: to deny the truth of the body and blood of the Lord in the Eucharist, and the other things that we will afterwards treat of.

4. But truly it is not repugnant to apostolic doctrine that, according to passage of time, some things which were preached before may be more distinctly and expressly handed on; yea rather, in this way can some things be added for belief in one time that were before not expressly and, so to say, formally preached, provided they are not repugnant to more ancient ones and are proposed by legitimate power, that is, are defined by the Church. The objection made proves this, as well as the custom of the Catholic Church, which has arisen by a certain necessity of the human condition and has so manifest and cogent a reason that it is not likely God left his Church without this sort of power, or without sufficient providence and help for using it without danger of departing from apostolic doctrine. The proof and declaration is that the custom of the Holy Spirit was always not to teach the Church at once about everything that pertains to supernatural doctrine, but by the opportunity of times according to his most hidden providence. One may see this in ancient times; for, to pass over the times of natural law, in the Synagogue itself sacred doctrine grew in the course of time, as God at various times sent prophets. Next, because, notwithstanding Scripture, doubtful or ambiguous things could sometimes arise, God established a priestly place and tribunal through which that people could be more and more illumined in things. Besides too, in the primitive Church itself the Holy Spirit did not teach the apostles everything at the same time, but about the calling of the gentiles Peter was instructed afterwards, Acts 10, and about the cessation of the legal prescriptions the Church was in the apostolic Council made more certain than it was before. Thus, therefore, after the times of the apostles the Church could be illumined in many things that could in a later time be necessary but not before, either because of doubts newly arisen, especially when heretics rose up or other rash men perversely expounding obscure things of the faith, or also because this is the natural condition of man, that he should advance in knowledge little by little, which even God wished to be observed in his Church, according to that verse of Proverbs 4.18: “The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.”

5. Therefore Paul too, 1 Timothy 6.20, said that not only novelties but “profane and vain babblings” should be avoided, because, as St. Thomas there notes, not all novelty is to reprehended, since the Lord said, John 13.34: “A new commandment I give unto you,” but profane novelty, that is, contrary to divine and sacred things. Which was the opinion of Augustine before in tract.97 on John, near the end, and almost the same is contained in Vincent of Lerins, ch.37, when he says: “What is meant by ‘profane things’? Things that have nothing of the sacred, nothing of the religious, that have things altogether estranged from the inner chambers of the Church, which is the temple of God. Profane babblings, he says, that is, novelties of dogmas, things, opinions, which are contrary to age, to antiquity.” Wherefore things that are not contrary, but serve rather for better understanding the things that are ancient, cannot be called profane novelties; nay, nor altogether novelties, because they are contained in the more ancient things, were virtually or, as they say, implicitly believed, and therefore, when they are afterwards more explicitly handed on, they are called not so much new things as old things newly proposed. Which, that it is most useful in the Church and often necessary, is clear of itself, and is very well taught by the same Lerins ch.27, and Chrysostom, hom.71, on John, giving exposition that the command of mutual love is called new, although it be ancient, because of the manner.

6. We can also declare this more fully by distinguishing in the matter of the faith what pertains only to knowledge of the truth, and what has regard to morals and observances and ceremonies, for in both some addition or explication can be made, but not in the same way. For, in things that have regard to knowledge, it happens in two ways. First, by defining no truth newly, but by retaining an ancient truth and, where there is need, newly explaining it, as in the Council of Nicea the divinity of the Word was defined, and in the Council of Ephesus the substantial union of two natures in the person of Christ, and in the Lateran Councils and the Councils of Florence and of Trent the real presence of Christ the Lord in the Eucharist. And sometimes it happens in declarations of mysteries of this sort that new names are thought up by the Church, by which the truth defined is more explained and the calumnies and tergiversations of heretics avoided and uncovered; and there is in these words not profane novelty, but prudent and faithful necessity. So the word ‘homoousion’, or ‘consubstantial’, which the Arians, because it uncovered their errors, were reprehending as new, was always approved by the Fathers defenders of the faith, as is plain from Ambrose, bk.1, and bk.3 De Fide, last chapter, and from Athanasius often in his orations against the Arians, and from Augustine, tract.97, on John, where he says: “The Fathers constructed against the impiety of the Arians the new name ‘homoousion’, but they did not signify a new thing by such a name, for that is called ‘homoousion’ which is ‘I and the Father are one,’ namely of one and the same substance.” Similarly, because of Nestorius, who denied that the Virgin was Mother of God, the Council of Ephesus decreed that she should be called ‘Theotokos’, in Latin ‘Deipara’ (‘God-bearer’); speaking of which word Cyril, epist.1 to Presbyter. etc, says: “I marvel if there are any who doubt whether the Blessed Virgin is or is not called God-bearer anywhere; for if our Lord Jesus Christ is God, how is the Virgin, who bore him, not God-bearer? This faith the divine disciples handed on to us, and although they made no mention of this word, we are taught by the holy Fathers that so they thought.” And the same holds, proportionally, about the word ‘transubstantiation’ for explaining the sacrosanct mystery of the Eucharist. And the same of like words, about which Augustine said generally in the said tract.97, that “there are some novelties of words that are fitting to the doctrine of religion.”

7. In a second way, new explication of the faith can be made through the Church by adding and defining a new proposition or truth to be believed de fide, because this is often necessary when new controversies or heresies arise. An example is found in the truth defined in the sixth synod against the Monothelites about the two natural wills of Christ, which under those terms was not before handed down as de fide. Another and clearer one is about not re-baptizing those rightly baptized by heretics. For this truth before was so doubtful that Cyprian along with many bishops thought the contrary, and nevertheless afterwards, in the Council of Carthage and others, it was defined by the Church, which without doubt sufficed for certitude of faith, as Augustine rightly taught, bk.1, Contra Crescon., ch.32. But although these seem to be new, nevertheless the doctrine is apostolic, because it is virtually contained in it, and by the apostles themselves was not ignored. For they received the gift of the Holy Spirit, who expounded everything to them, as Epiphanius said, Haeres., 66, and more extensively Tertullian in Praescriptionibus. Which, however, is not to be understood of the day of Pentecost alone, for also afterwards at opportune times they could be more taught or illumined about certain things. Yet it was not possible, or certainly not necessary, that the whole theological doctrine, so to say, which the apostles were taught by the Holy Spirit, they should in the same way hand on to the Church, or teach others, but what was for that time most fitting; and so it was not necessary that all truths or conclusions be distinctly handed on or declared. Or, perhaps, many of the things that pertain to the greater explanation or more subtle knowledge of the articles of faith were taught verbally, which afterwards were called into doubt, either because of some heresy, or sometimes because of ignorance, as is in fact clear from Cyprian’s epistle 74 and others. Which ignorance notwithstanding, the truth about not repeating baptism pertains to apostolic tradition, as Augustine asserted when treating the same place of Cyprian, bk.5, De Baptismo, ch.26.

8. On the other hand, however, in things that have regard to morals and the practice of the Church, not only is addition but also change easier. Because, as Epiphanius said, Contra Aerium Haeres., 75, near the beginning: “The apostles could not at once establish everything, but the Church received a fullness of dispensation for occasion of places and times; for individual things do not have everything from the beginning, but by progress of time those things required for perfection were supplied.” Which point he pursues at large. The reason too is clear, because things that pertain to external morals, and especially what depends on human institution, are of themselves more subject to variation, and the same things do not agree to all times, and therefore cannot for every time be immutably fixed. Neither too could everything be determined by the apostles, because the Church did not at that time have the same state which it afterwards acquired, or which now it has obtained. Nay, even in their own time not everything was disposed all at once by the apostles; for Paul, 1 Corinthians 11 recalls that he had before handed on to the Corinthians the use of the divine sacrament, and yet afterward there he taught many of the things that were to be watched over in it, and at the end he subjoins, v.34: “And the rest will I set in order when I come;” and in ch.14, and often in other epistles he handed on other practical lessons little by little. And, conversely, Acts 15, the apostles handed on some precepts opportune for that time which they knew were not to be kept perpetually in the Church, as about abstaining from things strangled and from blood.

9. But in all these additions, or changes, it is to be observed that the doctrine is always the same and consonant with apostolic doctrine. For, to begin with, nothing is introduced in this sort of thing which is repugnant to divine positive or natural right, because the Universal Church cannot err in faith or morals, as was shown above. Next, whatever there may be in this class, it is derived from the legitimate power given by Christ to his vicars and to the pastors of the Church for governing it, about which we will speak in book 3. Therefore, although in things that pertain to morals or external cult, there is sometimes variety, there is no reprehensible novelty, nor does it introduce change or variation in the doctrine of the faith, nay nor addition of anything which was not virtually contained in evangelical and apostolic doctrine. Finally, to this whole illustration of the Church can rightly be applied the elegant sentence of Vincent of Lerins, who in ch.28 thus objects: "Perhaps someone will say: Will there then be no progress of religion in the Church of Christ? Plainly there may be, and a great deal. For who is that man so envious of men or so hating God who would try to prevent it? Yet in such way that it truly be progress, not change, of faith. Accordingly, it pertains to progress that each thing should be increased in itself; but it pertains to change that something is transformed from one thing into another. There must, then, be growth and much and strong progress, by degrees of age and of centuries, in the intelligence, knowledge, and wisdom both of individuals and of all, both of one man and of the whole Church; but only of that kind, namely in the same dogma, the same sense, and the same judgment."

10. From these, then, abundant satisfaction is made to the difficulty posed; and as to the examples which the king objects, we will make response in particular in book 2. Now in general, both to these examples and to those we add, we easily, from what has been said, make reply that they all have a foundation either in Scripture, or in apostolic tradition, or in other principles of faith. And because they were either not sufficiently declared, or obscured by passage of time, or called into doubt, they could be declared by the Church and defined anew; for the Church has power for this, and has at the same time along with it the assistance of the Holy Spirit promised by Christ; and thus always has it been observed in the Church of Christ when necessity required. And therefore the Catholic Church is not in these things to be compared with the synagogues of the heretics, whose novelties are contrary to the ancient dogmas and are therefore profane; but the new definitions of the Church not only do not conflict with the ancient ones but rather are derived from them through legitimate power, and therefore, if new things need to be said, they are not profane but holy; or certainly they are not dogmas simply new but ancient and apostolic, whether they have been declared or defined many years ago or fewer years ago. And it matters little that the king of England requires a certain time of antiquity, and a certain mode of necessity, for believing or not rejecting something. For by this is proved that the Catholic Faith, whose pillar and ground is the Catholic Church, does not confess that in believing it has no certain and universal rule of faith handed on by the apostles, or that therefore it does not profess the apostolic faith or cannot defend it.

Summary: 1. The words of the king are weighed. 2. King James asserts that the Anglican faith has been adorned by the blood of the martyrs. 3. The Anglican sect is shown to be attacked by the blood of the martyrs. 4. The ancient martyrs greatly extol the Roman Faith. The evasion of heretics is refuted. 5. The martyrs confirm the faith for any time. The assertion is understood also of articles recently declared. 6. The martyrs were killed for the defense of articles that England disavows. 7. Conclusion against the assertion of the king of England. 8. A repugnance in the words of the king is shown. 9. Evasion. 10. It is rejected and the conclusion is drawn that the aforesaid martyrs did not err in any dogma of faith. 11. Cyprian is vindicated from calumny.

1. The king of England adds in his title of defender of the faith two other prerogatives, or praises of the faith, or rather sect, which he defends. One is that it is the faith of the old and primitive Church, about which nothing further needs to be said because that property, rightly understood, is not other than an attribute of the apostolic faith. For the primitive Church is not other than the true and Catholic Church which exists now, but it is the same according to the state it had at the beginning of its planting, which was the time of the preaching of the apostles; and so, for a faith to be of the primitive Church is nothing other than for it to be the one which the apostles handed on to the Church. But when to this term ‘faith’ in that title there is added ‘of the old and primitive Church,’ the virus of error seems to lurk within the words. For the indication is that the faith of the old and primitive Church has failed in the Universal and visible Church, and that it was restored by the innovators and that, as so innovated, it is defended by the king. For although the words do not themselves manifestly assert this, we can, from other principles and doctrines of the Protestants, be not unjustly afraid that the king puts himself forward as protector in this sense of the faith of the old Church. But, whatever the sense be in which the thing was asserted, it is sufficiently attacked by what has been said. For, in the first place, it was shown that that sect is not, in what it has proper to itself, the apostolic faith; therefore neither can it be the faith of the primitive Church, since that was most of all apostolic. Next, although in things as regard which it agrees with the Roman Faith it retains in some part the faith of the primitive Church, however in many it errs from the true sense of the primitive Church, and the true things it retains it preserves rather by chance and human opinion than by the true spirit of the primitive faith. Therefore, as to this part, we think sufficient what we have said about the attribute of apostolic faith.

2. As second praise and ultimate prerogative of his faith, the king of England posits that “it is illustrious with the blood of several bishops and faithful martyrs,” which I could even rightly omit, first because this praise is proper to true, Catholic, and apostolic faith, as even the king himself in the words of his title seems to think; since, therefore, it has been demonstrated that that sect is neither the true faith nor apostolic or Catholic, there remains sufficient proof that it is not worthy of such praise. Second too, because the testimony of martyrs does not make faith true, but rather true faith makes the martyrdom true that was undertaken for it; for, as Cyprian elegantly says, epist.23, “martyrs do not make the Gospel, but through the Gospel true martyrs are made.” And therefore too Augustine says, De Verb. Apost., ser.14: “Martyrs for this reason, because faithful.” Therefore, the blood of martyrs, although it give glory to the true faith, yet does not of itself show it but supposes it. Yet because, as many relate, the Protestants glory much of the testimony of martyrs, and because from the very words and confession of the king we can take up no light argument to repress that presumption and convict the error, therefore about this point too it has seemed good to subjoin a few things.

3. But I think it necessary first to ask two questions of the most serene king. One is whether he understands that a part of his faith or the whole of it was made illustrious by the blood of the martyrs; the second is which martyrs he is speaking about, whether about the ancient ones who preceded Calvin, Luther, and other heresiarchs of our times, or also about the new ones who were consumed after the rise of the Anglican schism. For it is very important to discriminate these things accurately, so that one may without ambiguity understand which faith was by which blood rendered truly and not fictively illustrious.

We can, therefore, as I have touched on in the previous chapter, speak of the faith of England as to the part of the ancient faith which it retains and has in common with the Roman Church from which it learnt it, or as to the dogmas wherein change and defection have by the new sectaries been made. Speaking, then, about the first part, or about the ancient faith, and consequently also about the ancient martyrs, it is very true that that faith was made very illustrious by the blood of the holy martyrs. But this in no way helps the Anglican cause; nay it plainly condemns it. Because those martyrs gave testimony, not to the Anglican, but to the Catholic and apostolic Faith, and in this way they made it illustrious with their blood. The witnesses are the most ancient Fathers who very often assert that the Church of Christ was by the persecutions of the tyrants who killed the martyrs made more illustrious, and was not only not diminished but rather miraculously increased, according to the celebrated opinion of Pope Leo, serm.1, 'In Natali Petri et Pauli': "The Church was not diminished by the persecutions but increased; and always the Lord's field was clothed with richer grain; when grains which are individual fall, they are born multiplied."

Nor is the opinion of Augustine dissimilar in his book De Catechizandis Rudibus, ch.24: "That vine, which through the whole earth, as was prophesied about it and announced before by the Lord himself, was spreading fruitful branches, it sent them forth the more fully the richer the blood of the martyrs by which it was watered, to whom, dying innumerable in all lands for the truth of God, even the persecuting kingdoms themselves yielded, were converted to the acknowledgment and veneration of Christ, their neck of pride broken." Like things he writes in his Preface to Psalm 40 [41], where he says that the Jews killed Christ in himself but the pagans wanted to kill him in his body; and he subjoins: "The martyrs were killed, the outpoured holy blood prevailed to multiply the Church, Christians were more and more multiplied, and what his enemies said is not fulfilled [v.5], 'when shall he die and his name perish?'" And elegantly does Tertullian, in Apologetico Extremo, say to the tyrants: "Inflict torment, torture, for your iniquity is proof of our innocence. We become more as often as we are by you cut down; the blood of Christians is seed." And many things are contained in his book Ad Martyres, and Justin Martyr, Contra Tryphonem, and Cyprian, epist.11: "O our blessed Church, which the honor of divine esteem thus illumines, which in our times the glorious blood of the martyrs makes illustrious; before she was white with the works of the brothers, now she is made red with the gore of martyrs." But these Fathers are speaking, as is clear from their writings, of the Universal or Roman Church, or if sometimes they are speaking about some particular church (as Cyprian about the African), it amounts to the same, because he speaks about it as a part of the Catholic Church and as conjoined through the same faith with the Roman See, as from other writings of his mentioned above is manifest. Since, therefore, it has been shown that the Roman and Catholic Church, which now is, is the same as the one that existed in the time of the apostles and the said doctors, clearly the universal glory of the ancient martyrs redounds to this Universal Church which exists now.

4. Hence can also further be concluded that the whole faith of this Catholic Church is confirmed and made illustrious by the same blood of the ancient martyrs. The proof is that the faith of the primitive Church, and which existed at the time of Cyprian, Augustine, and other Fathers, endures the same through legitimate succession in the present Catholic Church, as was also demonstrated; therefore the blood of the martyrs, which gave testimony to the ancient faith of the Church, provides the same for the faith of the present Church. Therefore it is the Roman faith which was made illustrious by the blood of the said martyrs. They will say, perhaps, that this is true only as to those dogmas of the faith which were believed at that time in the Church, but not as to other new ones which were afterwards, as the Protestants misrepresent, imported in the Church through men. But this is very easily refuted, because the faith of the Church is always one, nor does it vary because of accidental increase or diminution as to the greater or lesser declaration of things, or as to other circumstances which depend on the succession of times. Which fact is so true that Augustine, tract.45 on John, said also about the Synagogue and the Church of Christ: "Times have changed, not the faith." Which he affirms also bk.18, De Civitate Dei, ch.47, and bk.19, Contra Faustum, ch.14, and it is taken from that verse of 2 Corinthians 4.13: "Having the same spirit of faith." By which words (as Chrysostom there notes, hom.9) the Apostle shows that: "the same Spirit is he who exercise his power in both Testaments." With much greater reason, then, since the Church of Christ is at all times ruled by the same Holy Spirit, it always retains the same faith, even if it is, as regard some things, made more plain by the same Church at one time than at another.

5. Wherefore the martyrs, who at one time made the Catholic Faith illustrious with their blood, confirmed the whole faith and the faith at any time existing equally, and greatly adorned it, because the things which were made plain in a later time were contained virtually in more ancient times, and all things are so connected with each other that one of them could not be made illustrious or confirmed by the testimony of the martyrs without all of them being equally made illustrious. Just as, contrariwise, one of them cannot be denied without all the rest losing their certitude and therefore being virtually denied. I declare the thing with an example: for many martyrs died for confession of the Trinity in the Church before the Church had declared and defined that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, and nevertheless the faith of this article is not less sealed by the blood of those martyrs than the faith of the rest of the articles which were then expressly confessed. By which reason too, he who dies for the faith expressly confessing one article, if he believes it by Catholic Faith, confesses virtually the whole faith of the Catholic Church, and seals it with his blood. Thus, therefore, by the blood of this sort of true martyr, at whatever time it was shed, the whole Catholic Faith, in whatever state of time it be considered, was made illustrious.

patience, and all edification pertaining to our Lord.” We can also add the glorious Irenaeus, both bishop and martyr, who most openly teaches the primacy and ecclesiastical traditions of the Roman Church, bk.3, Contra Haereses from the beginning over many chapters, and the truth of the body and blood of the Lord in the Eucharist, bk.4, ch.34, in which principles the whole Roman Faith is virtually contained; this holy martyr, therefore, also gave testimony to it. In the same way we can adduce Justin professing faith in the truth of the Eucharist, and innumerable Roman Pontiffs who most constantly defended the primacy of their See, and with the same constancy confirmed their whole faith with blood.

7. From which things we finally conclude on this point that, if the king of England strives to commend his faith from the splendor and clarity that the true Christian faith has from the blood of the ancient martyrs, the blood of the same martyrs, whether he will or no to be convinced, condemns his sect as to all those things wherein it has from the Roman Faith defected. The inference is proved. For it has been proved that by that blood was made illustrious the whole Catholic Faith which today persists in the Roman Church, not only as to the things that Protestants have wished to retain from it, but also as to everything that they have chosen should be abandoned, many things indeed which were already then explicitly believed in the Church, but others which were in these, and in the infallible authority of the Church, at least virtually contained. Hence between this title of the king and his confession of faith I consider there to be a repugnance that he himself perhaps has not noticed; for in the title he confesses that the apostolic and primitive faith was made illustrious by the blood of the martyrs, but afterwards, in the confession of his particular faith, he overturns the ancient faith, because he denies many dogmas of the faith, not only novelties, as he himself says, but ones that are equal or prior in antiquity to the martyrs, and he introduces new ones by which the testimony of the martyrs must necessarily be nullified. For in this way the ancient Fathers used to rise up against the innovators of their own times.

8. In particular there is Nazianzen, epist.2 to Cledonius, saying: “O huge absurdity! They announce to us a wisdom hidden since Christ; a thing that is surely worthy of tears. For if the faith had its beginning no more than thirty years ago, although almost four hundred years have already flowed by from when Christ was manifested, vain to be sure was the Gospel for so long time, vain also our faith, in vain did the martyrs perform their martyrdoms and such and so many priests have charge of the people; and their grace is that of verses not of faith.” A like opinion is contained in Tertullian, Praescriptionibus, ch.20, where, as if mocking the same heretics, he infers: “Error will surely reign as long as heresies do not err. The truth was waiting for the Marcionites to be liberated (let us say Calvinists), meanwhile it was being wrongly believed.” And much later: “So many martyrdoms, finally, crowned wrongly.” To this too has regard the opinion of St. Ambrose, bk.3, De Fide, ch.7, where he says, speaking of the Council of Nicea: “Who of us would dare to reopen the priestly book sealed by the confessors and already consecrated by the martyrdom of many? Those who were compelled to reopen it (that is, in the Council of Rimini), afterwards however, when the fraud was condemned, sealed it; those who did not dare to violate it stood out as confessors and martyrs.” Which very grave opinion we rightly apply to all the legitimate Councils and definitions of the faith approved by the Church, since in them was sealed the priestly book written under the governance of the same Holy Spirit. But our intention is especially confirmed by the word that Ambrose subjoins: “How can we deny the faith of those whose victory we preach?”

9. Perhaps the adversaries will dare to say that the ancient holy Pontiffs and martyrs did not err in the confession of Christ or of the Trinity or of other mysteries for the defense of which they shed their blood; but that they could have erred and did err in other things wherein they oppose the adversaries' own opinions, nor is it necessary that they confirmed with their blood whatever they believed but only that for which they did not doubt to meet death. For thus the martyr Cyprian made illustrious the faith of Catholics by his death, although he believed through human ignorance that those baptized by heretics should be re-baptized, since he in no way confirmed this opinion with his blood nor died to defend it.

10. This evasion, however, contains great impiety and temerity. Because, to begin with, it cannot be thought that Ignatius, Polycarp, and the like very holy martyrs erred in dogmas of the faith through heresy or pertinacity, otherwise they would not have been true martyrs, because there cannot be true martyrdom in heresy, as I will immediately infer below, and so they would not have made the Christian Faith illustrious with their blood. But to think this is very impious and contrary to the perpetual and universal tradition of the Church, and is altogether rashly thought up against all the faith of history and without any foundation. Next, neither can error through ignorance be presumed in these Fathers in dogmas of the faith; for if the ignorance was culpable, it would certainly be repugnant to their sanctity; if invincible, it is so contrary to their wisdom and office that it cannot fall under suspicion. Both because many of them received the doctrine of the faith from the apostles themselves, while others did so from apostolic men and disciples of the apostles. And also because the dogmas, about which we are speaking, were very necessary for the common faith of the Church in which they themselves were very grave pastors and doctors, as about the Eucharist, the traditions, the Church, its spiritual power and infallible faith, and the like. And therefore they were teaching these things not as doubtful but as certain, not in a corner but in sight of the whole Church, not with the contradiction of either other bishops or the Roman Church, but with the common consent of all; therefore without any doubt they taught, not from ignorance or opinion, but from certain faith, and accordingly they comprehended in that faith, for which they died, all those things.

11. Wherefore the case of Cyprian is far different. For to pass over the fact that Augustine (epist.48 towards the end) sometimes insinuates that he retracted that opinion before his death, the matter did not then pertain to dogmas necessary to the faith, nor was it commonly by the Church received, and the Supreme Pontiffs (though not yet by definition) contradicted it, and therefore neither did Cyprian himself so adhere to it that he reputed it among the dogmas of his faith. Nay, I dare rather say that the contrary dogma, which was afterwards defined by the Church, Cyprian always virtually believed. For though he then thought it by private and human opinion, he believed much more firmly that the Church could not err, and he was ready to relinquish his own opinion if the Church defined the contrary; as is taken from Augustine (bk.1 De Baptismo, ch.18) in the aforesaid epistle saying about him: "The unity of the whole earth and of all nations he held with his love and defended with his disputation." And explaining this more later he says: "Either he did not hold altogether what you recite that he thought, or afterwards he corrected it in the rule of truth, or this mole as it were on his most white heart was covered with the breast of his charity, while the unity of the Church, growing in the whole globe, he most copiously defended, and he most perseveringly held the bond of peace." As if he were to say that whatever Cyprian thought by private opinion, he was always subject in his mind to the rule of the Church; and in this way we say that he himself simply confirmed with his blood the faith of the Christian Church.

In these things, therefore, which the most ancient Pontiffs and holy doctors handed on as of certain faith to the Church without dissension, nay, with the common acceptance of the Church, there cannot be thought to be ignorance, otherwise the whole of their doctrine would waver, and therefore, when they shed their blood for their faith, they made illustrious by the same blood everything that they taught of this kind, or left written. And for this reason did Vincent of Lerins gravely warn in advance that novelties contrary to such antiquity were to be guarded against, ch.33: “For if,” he said, “these are received, the faith of the blessed Fathers must either wholly or in great part be violated, all the faithful of all ages, all the saints, all the virgins, all the priests, so many thousands of confessors, so great an army of martyrs, so great a crowd and multitude of peoples, the whole body, lastly, in almost the whole word incorporated through the Catholic Faith already in the head of Christ, must be pronounced to have in so long a tract of centuries been ignorant of, erred about, blasphemed, did not know, what they believed.”

Chapter 20: The true martyrs of our times have made illustrious not the Anglican sect but the Roman Faith.

Summary: 1. The sectaries are not truly martyrs. 2. Declaration by reason from the side of the one inflicting death. 3. An objection is dissolved. The truth of martyrdom is not diagnosed from death alone. 4. On the part of the one accepting death. 5. Although heretics suffer for defending some truth of the faith, they are not truly martyrs. 6. First reason. 7. Second reason. 8. A heretic who has died even for confession of Christ does not obtain martyrdom, nor does he make the faith illustrious. 9. Many Catholics of this time are shown to have made the apostolic faith illustrious by martyrdom. 10. The martyrdom of Catholics is proved from manner of suffering.

1. I come to the second part about the new martyrs, who after the rise of the Anglican schism in the Church endured suffering, so that if perhaps the king of England wishes to speak about these, let us defend the Catholic opinion in this part too. For whom, I ask, does he call martyrs? Those who in his sect or for it were killed? Or those rather who for the faith of the Roman Church were killed by the defenders of that sect? But about these latter he cannot speak, for they made illustrious, not the Anglican sect, but the Roman Faith contrary to it, because they died in execration of that sect. Nay, although they were killed by gentiles or pagans only for Christ and for those articles of faith which England receives, their glory redounds to the Catholic and Roman Church and to its faith in which they died, and consequently they condemn all heretical depravity contrary to it. But if the king speak of sectaries punished for their pertinacity, he undeservedly calls them martyrs; for in fact they are not martyrs, but malefactors justly chastised. First, indeed, because, as Cyprian rightly said, bk., De Unit. Ecclesiae: “That death is not the crown of faith but the punishment of faithlessness.” Second, because “not the punishment but the cause makes the martyr,” as Gregory reports from Cyprian, bk.2, Reg., epist.36, and as Augustine hands on, serm.50, De Sanctis, which is the sixth about the martyrs, and more extensively in cont.2, on Psalm 34 [35], explaining the words, v.23: “Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment, even unto my cause, my God and my Lord,” Augustine says: “Not unto my punishment but unto my cause, not unto that which the thief has in common with me, but unto that which the blessed do, who suffer persecution for righteousness’ sake; for this cause is distinct, while the punishment is alike for the good and the bad. Therefore not the punishment but the cause makes the martyr.” Those, therefore, who are killed because of heresy or schism are not martyrs, otherwise thieves and malefactors should all be called martyrs, as extensively pursues Augustine in the same place, and in epist.50, and bk.4, De Baptism., ch.17, and in other places, which we will at once introduce; but specifically in serm.2, De Sanct. Vincent., he gives a reason: “Because they endure pains with stubbornness, not constancy, with vice, not with virtue, with perverse error, nor with right reason, with the devil holding them not pursuing them.”

Which reason is also very well pursued by Chrysostom, orat.1, Contra Iudaeos.

2. We can in addition prove with a moral reason that this death, undertaken for false error, is not martyrdom, whether it be considered on the part of the cause, or on the part of those inflicting it, or on the part of those accepting it in defense of error. Not indeed on the part of the cause, as was said, because that death is not for Christ. "But that shed blood alone makes a martyr which is shed for the name of Christ," said Jerome in epsit. to Philemon, at the beginning, and he declares it more generally on Galatians 5, at the end. Nor on the part either of the one punishing, because he who thus punishes the pertinacious does not do it in hatred of the truth, but in defense of it, and not by unjustly persecuting the person but by justly avenging the offense and the stubbornness in him.

3. You will say that this is what the controversy is between us and the heretics, namely, whether the sectaries, who die for their sect, are dying for error or for truth. We reply that this controversy cannot be defined merely from the fact of suffering of death; for as I just said from Augustine, many died for the defense of error. And it is clear that often two men die for contrary doctrines, one of which must be false, and consequently one suffers for error and one for truth; therefore, by the suffering alone, truth cannot be discerned from error. Hence it is an ancient thing in the Church that heretics glory in their martyrs, as Eusebius reports about the Montanists, bk.5, Histor., ch.18, and Augustine about the Donatists, epist.50 & 68. Epiphanius too reports that certain heretics were called 'martyrians', because they gloried greatly of the number of their martyrs. Nor heretics only, but heathens too and philosophers obstinately underwent death, either for their false religions or for the republic or for some other human cause, and especially for the glory of men; therefore a death bravely borne does not discriminate the cause, and it is from the cause to be judged (see Tertullian in Apologetico, ch.5). And for the same reason, death is not of itself a sign of error or truth. Therefore the controversy must be settled on other principles. But this we did in the preceding chapters; for we showed that the Anglican schism errs from the truth in all those things in which it has defected from the ancient Catholic and Roman Faith; therefore death inflicted for such defection, and pertinacity therein, is not persecution of the truth but correction and just punishment of error.

4. Besides, if this punishment be considered on the part of those receiving it, never could it be reputed martyrdom. Because either they suffer recognizing their error and confessing their offense, and then are they giving testimony rather to truth than to error, not however through martyrdom but through pious and just confession and penance. Or they die denying the offense and confessing the faith with deceiving mouth, hiding the error which they retain in their heart, and in this way too they are not martyrs for the true faith, which they do not believe, nor do they die for it, nor are they witnesses of the error which with their mouth they do not confess but deny. Or finally they die because of pertinacity in their error, preferring rather to die than to retract it, and this sort of death too cannot be martyrdom, because it does not proceed from the pious and right will which true martyrdom requires. Hence the saints and true martyrs underwent death for their faith with great reason and prudence, because they could, even in a human and moral way, be certain that only that faith was credible according to right reason; but those sectaries, on the other hand, die most imprudently and altogether rashly for their private sects and opinions. For what reason or prudence allows one, in matters the gravest and pertaining to religion, to relinquish, on the persuasion of one or another man, sometimes a vicious and very bad man, the ancient faith received by the consent of the Church, through the whole globe diffused, and reinforced by divine signs and miracles, and made illustrious, finally, by the blood of very wise holy men? Certainly it is morally evident that to undergo death voluntarily for such a cause is very imprudent and plainly rash, and accordingly it is not fortitude of mind, nor does it proceed from affection of divine charity, because charity always operates prudently. It is therefore pertinacity of mind, not martyrdom, because, as right theology teaches, martyrdom is a virtuous and prudent act, proceeding from the charity that bids fortitude. Let Optatus in a like cause be read, bk.3, Contra Parmen., towards the end.

5. Further, there is a demonstration that in men of this sort, separated from the Catholic Church, not only death when undergone for their errors, but also death when undergone for some truth which they retain, is not martyrdom. For the doctrine of Augustine is to be noted, bk. De Patientia, chs.26 & 27, where he tacitly distinguishes two ways in which a heretic or a schismatic can suffer for his faith, namely, either so as not to deny his error, or so as not to deny Christ or some other thing which he has retained from the Catholic Faith. We have hitherto spoken about the first way of suffering, because the evidence is greater there that it is not only not martyrdom, but also that it is not an act in any way good, but is the most imprudent rashness. But of the second way the same Augustine indeed says that the patience is laudable, because not to deny Christ is less evil, even if the belief in him is not held with perfect faith. Nay, he also adds that the fortitude is a gift from God, although it not be of those gifts which are proper to sons, but of those which are communicated to slaves. Hence, therefore, we say that that death is not martyrdom, because martyrdom is a gift of the just and infallibly leads to glory, according to Matthew 10.32: "Whoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven;" but that death does not lead to glory, "for without faith it is impossible to please God," Hebrews 11.6. And because he who lacks faith does not have charity; but about that Paul said, 1 Corinthians 13.2: "And though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." Which reason Augustine touched on, bk.4, De Baptism., ch.7, and Cyprian, De Unit. Eccles., saying that: "the taint of heresy is not washed away even by blood;" and again: "An unatoneable guilt is not purged even by suffering." And epist.73, towards the end: "Not even the baptism of public confession and of blood can profit a heretic for salvation." To which opinions of Cyprian Chrysostom seems to allude, homil.11, to the Ephesians, in the moral part at the beginning, saying: "But a certain saint said something which carries great audacity before it but yet he uttered it. What is it then? He said that not even the blood of martyrdom can wipe out this sin," that is, the sin of dividing the Church by schism or heresy. But Chrysostom himself adds in confirmation of the same opinion: "For tell me, for what cause are you a martyr? Is it not for the glory of Christ? You who have given up your life for Christ, why do you ravage his Church, for which Christ poured out his life?"

6. Again, there is a general reason, that outside the Church there is no salvation, as was said above, and as is a common axiom of the holy Fathers; but martyrdom is not separate from salvation; therefore outside the Church there cannot be true martyrdom. Thus more or less does Fulgentius conclude, De Fide ad Petrum, chs. 37, 38, & 39, and Augustine, epist.204, saying: "Established away from the Church, and separated from the tie of unity and the bond of charity, you will be punished with eternal suffering, even if you were burnt alive for the name of Christ." The same is very well said by Pacianus, epist.2 to Sempronianus, where he compares the passion of Donatus the pseudo-martyr with the martyrdom of Cyprian, in accord with the doctrine of the same Cyprian. And he, speaking in epist.52, about the middle, of the one who goes over from the Church to heretics and schismatics, says: "And if he is a little later killed for the name (that is, of Christ), after having been established outside the Church and divided from unity and charity, he cannot be crowned with death." Where he openly speaks of the manner of passion about which we are now treating. And he repeats the same at the end of the epistle, and in epist.54 where he also rightly says: "He cannot be suited for martyrdom who is not armed by the Church for battle; and the mind fails that is not roused and set on fire by receiving the Eucharist." And in his exposition of the Lord's Prayer he indicates another reason, saying: "Nor does God accept the sacrifice of the dissident," and he adduces that verse of Matthew 5.24: "Go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother;" and later he indicates another with these words: "He cannot be with Christ who preferred to be an imitator of Judas than of Christ."

7. Another reason is introduced by Augustine, bk.1, De Sermone Domini in Monte, ch.5. Because Christ did not say absolutely that they are blessed "which are persecuted," but he added, "for righteousness' sake," Matthew 5.10. "Now," says Augustine, "where sound faith is not, there cannot be justice, because the just man lives by faith." Which reason proceeds of every heretic, whether he die for error, or in error for some truth. It can also be thus explained. Because he who errs obstinately in one thing, though he believe something, but not as he ought, does not believe with Christian faith; and so his faith does not pertain to justice, and therefore, though he suffer for the truth, as it is believed by him, or rather chosen for him by his own judgment, he does not suffer persecution for righteousness' sake. This too seems to me to have been signified by Augustine in tract.6 on John, near the end, where he introduces Donatus boasting: "Behold we suffer many evils;" to whom he responds: "If you were to suffer this for Christ, not for your honor. They suffer troubles, but for Donatus, not for Christ. See how you suffer, for if you suffer for Donatus, you suffer for the proud." Which words, although they very much agree with the one who suffers for his error, or for the master of his heresy, nevertheless they are also true in whatever way a heretic suffers for his faith; because, although it happen that it be a true and otherwise Catholic dogma for which he suffers, yet, if he is a heretical Calvinist, he suffers not for Christ but for Calvin, for though he believe Christ, he does not believe in Christ, but in Calvin, or certainly in himself, if by his own judgment he chooses what he is to believe.

8. Moreover I seem to take this also from the same Augustine in sermon 117, De Diversis, where he poses a doubt how that sentence "every man a liar" stands with the sure testimony of the martyrs, who were men. "For martyrs," he says, "were truthful, because they died for the truth; for that is why they are martyrs, because they suffered for the truth;" therefore if they were truthful, not every man is a liar. He replies that man is a liar when he speaks from what is his own; but the martyrs did not speak from what was their own, but from the Spirit of God, and therefore it was not so much they as the Spirit of God that spoke in them, according to the verse of Matthew 10.20: "For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you;" and hence their testimony possesses what makes it certain. To which we can add that, as often as a heretic speaks, although by chance he speak true, he is always speaking from his own, because he is led by his own spirit, and he defends or professes his private opinion, and therefore we say that his testimony is by its nature deceitful, although in one or other dogma it happen to be true. And accordingly although a heretic die for confession of Christ, his testimony neither makes illustrious nor confirms the faith of Christ; so death for such a confession is neither martyrdom nor merits the name of martyrdom. As to what the king of England says, then, that he defends the faith illustrious with the blood of the martyrs, if he be understood of those pseudo-martyrs whom the Protestants call martyrs, it can in no way stand, whether it be referred to the true faith of Christ or to the Anglican sect.

9. There have been, to be sure, in our age many holy and Catholic men, both in other places and chiefly in England, who contended most constantly for their faith, about whom it is most truly said that they made illustrious the Catholic and apostolic faith with their blood, because far different from the Protestants is their condition, cause, life, and way of dying for Christ. For as they are in all these things very far distant from those men, so they most splendidly imitated the ancient martyrs, and therefore they were true martyrs, and with their blood they made illustrious the Roman Faith. For, in the first place, they always retained the Catholic and apostolic Faith, and they suffered within the Church, to which they were conjoined in peace and obedience. Next, they suffered persecution for the same Church, and for its faith and obedience, and thus far for righteousness' sake. Nor for any other cause (even if the adversaries, to hide the glory of the martyrs, make up other temporal and human ones) did they suffer imprisonments, torments, and the bitterest deaths. Of which thing here is no light sign (which in a similar case Eusebius considered, bk.3, Histor., ch.9), because although they had offended the republic in no other thing, nay rather sometimes they were distinguished for manners and innocence of life, the one confession of the Roman Faith and obedience to the Pope so inflamed the minds of the persecutors that they punished them more violently than others the most criminal. When however (as we have heard from those worthy of faith), if it happen that someone defects in that confession, and consents to his judges in false religion, even if he be worthy of death for other offenses, they easily condone and release him.

10. Lastly, as to what has regard to manner of suffering, our martyrs cannot be accused of any inconstancy or imprudence, because they are led, not by their own judgment, but by the public judgment of the whole world, and they retain the ancient faith, and they follow the steps of the old saints and martyrs, and many among them are found distinguished in life, sanctity, maturity of judgment, erudition and prudence, and are found ready to give an account of their faith, but since they make no impression on minds obdurate and inflexible against the Catholic Faith, they undergo torments and death with alacrity and patience. These martyrs, then, although new, truly made the ancient faith illustrious, but the new Anglican sect, on the contrary, they refuted and confounded; and therefore not on account of these martyrs either could the king of England propose those words in his title, since he defends, not the ancient faith, but the Anglican sect.

Chapter 21: The Anglican sect is hateful even for the sole ugliness of schism.

Summary: 1. King James studies to vindicate himself from the note of heresy. 2. That the Anglican fall was a very grave schism is shown from the etymology of the word. 3. Two kinds of schism are handed down: schism and para-synagogue. What they are. 4. By separation from the Church, even without defection from the faith, schism is committed. Heresy necessary includes schism but not vice versa. The temples of the orthodox faithful retain the name 'Catholic'. 5. The schism of the Donatists. 6. Henry VIII is concluded to have been a schismatic. 7. From the stain of schism the king little studies to free himself. 8. What Chrysostom thinks about schism. 9. King James cannot rightly evade the name of schismatic.

1. After the king of England, at the beginning of his Preface, proposed at large the reason and occasion for his work, and after interposing many things that do not pertain to this place, he tries with all his strength to excuse himself from the stain and note of heresy, either to avoid the infamy of so great a crime or to guard his name as defender of the Catholic Faith. I however, lest I seem to want to contend with the king or to offend his person, will speak of the cause itself, and by treating of it in general I will show, to begin with, that the beginning of the Anglican defection and separation from the Church was the crime of schism in its most proper and gravest sense. But I will show next that, through long duration and pertinacity, it passed over into manifest heresy. From which it will easily be clear that no Christian or baptized man, of whatever condition or state he be, who obstinately adheres to that sect and its errors is incapable not only of obtaining salvation but also of being excused from the crime of heresy. And since the king at the same time complains of the name of apostate, I will also in the following say what should be thought on this point as regard the name and guilt of apostasy.

2. As for what regards the first point, then, there will not be need of much proof. For he who has considered the fact itself and the beginning of the Anglican fall, as we related it in chapter 1, and is not ignorant of the common doctrine about the guilt of schism, and the difference that, handed on by the Fathers and theologians, it has from heresy, will easily understand that the Anglican lapse began through a very grave schism. For schism in its general signification, according to the etymology of the word, indicates dissension and a certain moral division, but by antonomasia it now properly signifies division of the Catholic Church through voluntary separation from it, by gathering together under the Christian name a particular congregation or conventicle outside the unity, communion, and obedience of the Church. Such more or less is how St. Thomas defines schism, IIa IIae, q.39, a.1, and the Theologians, nay the Jurists as well; it was the opinion too of the ancient Fathers, whom I will immediately report, and it has a foundation in Scripture. For in Scripture schism is wont to signify division of judgments, as John 9.16, where, when some were saying: "This man is not of God," but others: "How can a man that is a sinner do such things?" it is added: "and there was a division [schism] among them." But this diversity of judgments is wont to be, as it were, the beginning of schism, which is consummated in the division of minds and of concord. When it is also in matter of religion, then is it most called schism. Thus is the word used by Paul, 1 Corinthians 1.9: "God is faithful," he says, "by whom ye were called into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord." And immediately, as if exhorting them to keep the unity of this fellowship, he says, v.10: "Now I beseech you brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions [schisms] among you." Which he further made plain about division against the unity of the Church, saying 12.25: "That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another." Where, although he speak of the natural body of a man, yet he adduces it to declare what is to be preserved in the body of the Church, whereof he concludes, v.27: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular [or: members of member]."

3. There can, however, be distinguished in the Church two classes of schism, according to the doctrine of Basil, epist.1 to Amphilochus, can.2, who is also followed by Theodore Studites in epist.4 to Naucracion, where they distinguish three members: heresy, schism, para-synagogue. "Heresies," he says, "are what are completely broken off and alienated from the very faith; schisms are dissensions among those who disagree among themselves over certain ecclesiastical causes and questions that are curable; para-synagogues are congregations that arise from insolent priests, bishops, peoples who refuse to obey." But, with the first member now set aside, the other two indicate two classes of dissension among members of the Church, one private and the second more public; the first stands on private contentions and enmities, but the second proceeds as far as to make public conventicles and as it were diverse churches. The first dissensions then are called schisms by the Fathers, but the second para-synagogues. Now, however, the first discords have retained the general name of dissensions, and the name of schism is used to signify the other kind of division of the Church through private conventicles, and so is it taken in the present case, the word para-synagogue being set aside because it is not now in use.

4. Thus, therefore, is it manifest that schism is committed by separation from the unity of the Church, contrary to its charity, even if in dogmas dissension not yet intervene. So Jerome on those word in Titus 3.10: “A man that is an heretick after the first and second admonition reject,” said: “Between heresy and schism we think there to be this difference, that heresy has perverse dogma, but schism, because of Episcopal dissension, separates equally from the Church, which indeed at the beginning can in some respect be understood as diverse from heresy.” Now as to why he says “at the beginning” we will make plain in the next point. But he says “in some respect” because heresy necessarily involves schism, for it most divides the Church, because when faith is divided, the unity of charity cannot fail to be cut, just as, when faith is lost, charity cannot fail to be lost; but conversely, on the other hand, schism can be separated from heresy, just as charity can be lost without loss of faith. Just as once Meletius was a schismatic and not a heretic; for, as Epiphanius, Secta 68, relates, always “was he of right faith. For his faith did not change at any time from the holy Catholic Church.” But because he made his own congregation against Peter, bishop of Alexandria and his superior, and divided the Church, he was held to be a schismatic. It can also be observed, by the by, that when the Meletians built their own churches and the successors of Peter possessed the old ones, the old churches always retained the name of Catholic Church, but the others were called churches of the martyrs.

5. It was similar at the beginning of the schism of the Donatists, because of the ordination of Caecilian as bishop in the church of Carthage against the will of Donatus, as is taken from Augustine, bk. De Haeresib., heresy 69. Hence the same Augustine, bk.2, Contra Cresconium, ch.7, speaks thus: “Although between schism and heresy I endorse the distinction whereby schism is said to be a recent dissension in a congregation because of some diversity of opinions, for never can a schism happen unless those who make it are following something diverse; while a heresy is an inveterate schism; yet, since your definitions are of help to me, I would more gladly call you schismatics than heretics.” For Cresconius recognized schism but denied heresy, because there was no diversity, as he said, in doctrine, which Augustine easily accepts, though afterwards he also shows that the schism had passed over into heresy. But as to his statement that there is no schism without diversity of opinions, it must be understood in a general way, because dissension of minds is not without diversity of opinions. But it is not to be taken about diverse opinions in dogmas of the Catholic Faith, as is manifest from other places of Augustine. For bk.1, De Fide et Symbolo, ch.10, he says: “Heretics and schismatics call their congregations churches, but heretics, by thinking false things about God, violate the faith itself, while schismatics, by unjust divisions, part from fraternal charity, although they believe the things that we believe.” And bk., Quaestionum Evangelicor., from Matthew, q.11, he says: “The question is wont to be posed how schismatics differ from heretics, and this answer is wont to be found, that schismatics are made not by diverse faith but by a break up in society of communion.” And it is treated extensively by Optatus, bk., Contra Parmenianum.

6. From this sure principle, then, and from the fact above narrated about the Anglican fall, the conclusion is openly drawn that Henry VIII was a schismatic. For that he was himself a heretic even at the beginning is not clear to us, because it was not on account of deception of mind, but for some other ugly and shameful occasion, that he denied obedience to the Supreme Pontiff and separated both himself and his kingdom, as far as he could, from the unity of the Roman Church. But whether he was also a heretic we will touch on below, for now it is not necessary. For whatever he thought in his mind, it is sufficient that indeed for mere concupiscence he erred in practice and split the Church, so that he became a schismatic, nay author of a very grave schism, in that, by authority and example first, then most by fear and violence, he compelled many others to go along. In this way, then, this vice began to seize on the English nation and was derived in this way from parents to sons, so that it perseveres up to the present day.

7. Wherefore King James too himself has not studied to purge himself of this crime; nay he seems as it were to despise and hold it for nought, when, on page 58, he says: "Although they say I am a schismatic and have defected from the Roman Church, certainly I can in no way be a heretic." But we say, conversely, that, although he deny he is a heretic (which point now we are not treating of), he cannot deny that he is a schismatic, since he both confesses in his own Preface that he is baptized and not only preserves knowingly, and with eyes open, the schism that was begun, but studies also with great contention and all the strength of his power to propagate it. But he should consider that in the eyes of God schism is not far distant from heresy, for Augustine, bk.1, De Sermone Domini in Monte, ch.5, puts the two on a level, saying: "Many heretics, who deceive souls with the Christian name, suffer many such things but for this reason are they excluded from the reward, because it was not said merely: 'Blessed are they which are persecuted,' but it was added, 'for righteousness' sake;' but where sound faith is not, righteousness cannot be. Nor may schismatics promise themselves anything of that reward, because, in like manner, where charity is not, righteousness cannot be. For love of neighbor does not work evil. Which, if they had, they would not shred the body of Christ, which is the Church." And what is more serious, in bk. De Vera Religione, ch.6, he numbers schismatics not only with heretics but also with pagans and Jews, saying: "Neither in the confusion of the pagans, nor in the rubbish of the heretics, nor in the languor of the schismatics, nor in the genealogy seeking of the Jews does religion exist, but among those alone who are called Catholic or Orthodox Christians, that is, lovers of integrity and followers of what is right."

8. Let here be added St. John Chrysostom, who so magnifies the offense of schism that he compares it with the sin of the crucifiers of Christ, saying: "Nothing angers God in like degree as that his Church is divided, even if we do innumerable good works; no lesser punishment than those pay who rend his body will we pay who rend the full ecclesiastical assembly." But he is speaking in the first part about the true body of Christ. Hence he subjoins: "For that indeed was done to the profit of the whole world, although not with that intent; but this has no utility anywhere, but by that very fact it is in loss greatest." And he adds words that should be considered by the king and his advisers as well as by his subjects. "These things are said, not only to those who wield magistracies, but also to those who are ruled by them." And afterwards he signifies that this crime is more dangerous than heresy, perhaps because it is wont to be the beginning of heresies, and therefore it is most necessary to beware of it at the beginning, and put the axe to it as to the root. He says therefore: "These things have been said by me about them who give themselves indiscriminately to those who rend the Church, for if they do indeed have contrary dogmas, was it for this very thing especially that it was unfitting to mix with them? But if they think the same, much more so. Why? Because it is the sickness of ambition, and of love of command, and of bearing magistracy." Next, Optatus of Milevis, bk.1, Contra Parmenianum, calls schism "an enormous outrage;" and later he says: "Schism is the height of evil, and you will be least able to deny it." He is speaking in fact to the Donatists; but let the Anglicans understand it said also to them, since they can adduce neither a diverse reason nor a likely excuse.

9. But perhaps King James will deny that he is a schismatic, for also he does not say in these words, "although I am a schismatic" but, "although they say I am a schismatic," and that not simply, but with an addition, because he attaches, "and that I have defected from the Roman Church." But I ask whether, at any rate with this addition, he be truly or falsely said to be a schismatic from the Roman Church. Certainly he cannot affirm that this statement is false, because it has been evidently proved by the public and notorious fact itself. But if he does not dare to deny a thing so clear, let him know that the addition does not lessen the offense but increase it, or, so to say, constitutes it at a higher grade of schism. For if what Jerome said is true, that a schism is constituted through separation from the Church “because of Episcopal dissension,” then a schism that is constituted because of dissension from the Supreme Pontiff, the Pastor of all bishops, will deservedly be called not only schism simply but even the greatest of its kind. For, as Bede rightly said in his homily De Sanctis Petro et Paulo: “Blessed Peter, who confessed Christ with true faith, followed him with true love, specifically received the keys of the kingdom of heaven and the principate of judiciary power, so that all believers throughout the world may understand that, whoever from the unity of the faith or from its society in any way separate themselves, such can neither be loosed from the chains of sin nor enter the gate of the heavenly kingdom.” Where, by the name of Peter, he without doubt understands his See, and calls “its society” either the Church or union with the See of Peter; therefore, he judges being separated from this society enough to constitute schism. The same, if he be rightly weighed, is thought by Optatus of Milevis, bk.1, Contra Parmenian., column 5, where, to prove that Parmenian, not Caecilian, was a schismatic, he thus speaks: “For Caecilian did not depart from Maiorinus your uncle, but Maiorinus from Caecilian; nor did Caecilian withdraw from the See of Peter or of Cyprian, but Maiorinus, in whose chair you sit, which had no origin before Maiorinus.” He supposes him, then, to be a schismatic who withdraws from the See of Peter; but he adds, “or of Cyprian,” because sometimes a schism can happen by separation from the nearest bishop, by introducing a new chair without origin. And he adds (which is of greatest service for the present purpose): “Since it is manifestly clear that these things have been done, it evidently appears that you are heirs of traitors and of schismatics.” Thus, therefore, we evidently conclude, from the Anglican fact, that Henry VIII, who deserted the See of Peter and erected a new one without origin, was a schismatic, and that his heirs continue in imitating him in the same schism.

Besides, it was shown above that the Roman and the Catholic Church are the same, and that by those names only diverse properties or relations of the same Church are signified; for it is called the Catholic Church of Christ insofar as it is universal, but called Roman insofar as it is founded on the See of Peter, with which it is always conjoined; therefore a schism from the Catholic Church is the same as a schism from the Roman Church; therefore, if the king cannot deny that the separation of England is a schism from the Roman Church, he cannot escape its being also a very grave schism from the Catholic Church. And, to be sure, he who has considered the fall of Henry and his division from the Church, and compares him with the schismatic Donatus and other ancient schismatics, he will find in him altogether the same or greater reason of schism from the Catholic Church, nor will he be able to think of a likely reason of difference, except perhaps by imagining, with the heretics, that the Universal Church, which once was Catholic, had already collapsed and was extinct at the time of Henry. But this vain and willful refuge was sufficiently refuted above from the Sacred Scriptures and the common sense of the ancient Fathers. Let the king, then, indubitably know that he is separated from the Catholic Church, since he can with no color deny or hide it, and let him greatly fear the sentence of Augustine saying: “Whoever is separated from this Catholic Church, in however praiseworthy a way he suppose himself to be living, by this wickedness alone, that he is disjoined from the unity of Christ, he will not have life, but the wrath of God remains upon him.”

Chapter 22: The Anglican schism has passed over into manifest heresy and apostate doctrine.

Summary: 1. That the Anglican sect has broken out into several heresies is shown by the authority of the Fathers. By experience the same truth is strengthened. 2. A double reason for the aforesaid fact of experience is assigned. 3. Schism is opposed of itself to charity, and by long duration pours darkness on the mind. 4. That the Anglican schism has already arrived at heresy is concluded from what has been said. To defend the schism Henry VIII thought up a new heresy for himself. 5. It is refuted. No Catholic asserts that the Pontiff can take kingdoms away at pleasure. 6. That the Pontiff is usurping to himself a third part of the goods of citizens is fabricated by the heretics against all right and truth of fact. 7. Catholics are vindicated from some impositions of the king. 8. Many heresies seized on England after Henry VIII. 9. From the signs of heresies handed on by the Fathers the Calvinist sect is shown to be a heresy. First and second sign. 10. Third sign. 11. Fourth sign. 12. Fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth sign. 13. Ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sign.

1. Since the king of England seems to abhor the name of heresy rather than that of schism, we must further show that the Anglican schism has at last reached the point that it has broken out not only into one but into several and manifest heresies. We prove this in the first place from a certain most true doctrine of the holy Fathers, who say that long lasting schism passes over into heresy. Thus Jerome, on the said place from Titus 3, said that at the beginning schism could in some respect be understood as diverse from heresy. “Besides,” he adds, “no schism fails to fabricate some heresy for itself, so that it may seem to have rightly withdrawn from the Church.” And therefore Augustine said, bk.2, Contra Cresconium, ch.7, “heresy is an inveterate schism,” because, as I said, heretics are wont at the beginning to be separated from the Church as to obedience and union because of some controversy, or indignation, or unfulfilled greed, or unobtained ambition; but afterwards, so as to be able to persevere in schism, they pass over to heresy. Which might easily be shown, with examples begged from the antiquity, as by a sort of induction, the way we read everywhere about Novatus in Cyprian and Augustine, who, in epist.164 to Emeritus, says to them: “Nor do we make objection against you except the crime of schism, which you have also made into heresy by your evil persistence.” Thus too, about the sect of Meletius, the same Augustine reports, bk. De Haeres., that it passed over at length to the Arians, although at the beginning it was only a schism; which thing has happened also to the English. For at the beginning, when Henry followed neither Luther nor Calvin, they were made schismatics by him, but after not much time they passed over to the Calvinists.

2. But a twofold reason for this fact of experience can be given. One, which Jerome touched on, that those who persevere in their schism at once desire (as is natural) to give honor to and defend their deed and audacity, and therefore they descend into a heresy by which to give it honor, whether by praising as good what is corrupt, or (which reduces to the same) by denying that what has been handed on by the Catholic Church is commanded. In all which ways and others heresy is involved. Because although to do evil, which the law of Christ prohibits, is not heresy, yet to think with pertinacity that what the faith teaches to be prohibited is not evil, is plainly to be deemed heretical. The second reason is that, although schism can be in strict rigor distinguished or prescinded from heresy, it is however so akin and near to it that, if it persevere, it is easily transmuted into it. Hence Ambrose, bk., De Obitu Satyri, when narrating that Satyrus, after his shipwreck, looked for a Church in which to give God thanks for his liberation, and called a bishop to him, and asked him “Whether he was in agreement with the Catholic bishops, that is, with the Roman Church,” he later subjoins that, after Satyrus learnt that the bishop was a schismatic, he did not wish to give thanks there nor to communicate with him, because, although the bishop was heir to the Luciferian schism and not an heretical one (as he signifies), nevertheless (he says): “he did not however think that there was faith in schism. For although they had faith toward God, yet they did not have it toward the Church of God, whose limbs and members, as it were, they were allowing to be lacerated. For since Christ suffered for the Church, and the Church is Christ's body, they by whom Christ's passion is nullified, and his body torn apart, do not seem to be showing faith to Christ." Which I thus interpret, namely that a schismatic at the beginning acts against the faith, which he owes to the Church, in practice or in very deed, or he certainly acts against the faith, that is, the fidelity and obedience that he owes to the Church; but afterwards, so as to persevere in his schism, he also denies to the Church the faith which consists in believing that the Church itself is the unique spouse of Christ, the pillar and ground of the truth. Which transition is very easy; for if Paul wrote to Timothy that those who put away a good conscience have made shipwreck concerning the faith, 1 Timothy 1.19, how much more easily must it be believed to happen in an obstinate schism against the Church of Christ? Therefore Satyrus feared, or did not think, that there was faith in schism.

3. Add that schism arises proximately from some hatred of one's neighbors. For, although it be wont to arise from some contention, or ambition, or inordinate greed, or envy, as the Fathers hand on and as experience teaches, yet properly and of itself it is opposed to the charity which is owed to the Church of Christ, and so it includes hatred of one's neighbor; but this hatred is nourished and increased by perseverance in schism, and it easily leads in this way to blindness of mind and to heresy, according to the mind of Augustine on that verse of 1 John 2.11: "He that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes." Which words about schismatics are interpreted by Augustine there in tract.1, when he says that those who are so blinded from hatred of the true Church that they do not see it, also "knock their head against it more easily than seek there a habitation." Thus too did Optatus says, bk.1, Contra Parmenian.: "Schism, with the bond of peace thrown away, feelings destroyed, is born from spite, nourished on rivalry, and strengthened by quarrels; so that, with their Catholic mother abandoned, the impious sons, as they withdraw and separate themselves from the root of mother Church, cut off by the scythes of envy, they depart in their error as rebels." In which words another reason is also indicated. For schismatics, since they are cut off from the Church and gather together a synagogue outside it, disdain by that very fact to follow the Church, especially when they continue obdurate in schism, and therefore they begin to lack the rule of truth, from which it follows, by a sort of necessity, that they lapse into errors and heresies, either by inventing a new one or by adhering to one already invented, so that they may seem to have something distinct from the Church they have left. For if they were to persevere in the same faith, "they could not do something new, or anything save what they learnt long ago with their mother," as Optatus above said. For which cause Cyprian often affirms that: "schisms and heresies rise from this, that the priest of God is not obeyed, nor is there thought to be one judge at a time in the place of Christ," as he says, epist.55. And in epist.69 he adds that: "a congregation persevering in schism lacks, within a short time, true bishops and pastors, because true succession and ordination ceases." Thence, finally, the consequence is that it also lacks true doctrine and holiness; for, so as to conserve the Church in the unity of the faith and in the sanctity of life for the perfecting of the elect, God has given it pastors and doctors, as Paul testifies, Ephesians 4.11-12.

4. Now the reasons proposed evidently hold of the Anglican schism. For clearly it is sufficiently long lasting, for it has endured for 70 years or more, and although it was interrupted for a brief time in the reign of Mary, it immediately went back to it, and it has thereafter endured for more than 50 continuous years. Next, since it began through separation from the Chair of Peter, and by denying obedience to the Supreme Pontiff, although at the beginning the attempt was only in fact, from inordinate love of luxury, afterwards it erred about the right itself, and the doctrine was introduced whereby it began to be preached in England that the Church of Christ does not have one spiritual head, nor is the Roman Pontiff to be recognized as such head, but in each kingdom or republic supreme in temporal matters there is a proper head that is supreme in spiritual matters and that it is none other than the temporal king or prince or senate, respectively. All which doctrine is heretical and contrary to Sacred Scripture and to the perpetual sense of the same Church and to the tradition of the Fathers, as we will expressly show in book 3. In this way, therefore (which touches on the first reason), there was fulfilled in Henry VIII to the letter what Jerome said, for “he constructed this heresy for himself so he might seem rightly to have withdrawn from the Church.” For royal majesty, or rather human presumption, could not so stubbornly persevere in a very grave crime except by falling into another more grave by which to defend the first and contend that it was rightly done. Which error so adhered to Henry’s mind that not only did he not doubt to die in it, but he also confirmed it with a new command about educating his son in the same error, the faith being retained in other matters. Or, certainly, if he did not believe it in his mind, he very greatly showed therein (which has regard to the second reason) how great a hatred he had conceived against the Roman Church; since against his mind and with the eternal death of his soul he wished to die in the same schism and to guard it exteriorly by way of dogma or doctrine and make it perpetually firm in his son and in his kingdom. Since England, therefore, on this point tried to usurp not only the fact but also the right, and to defend the doctrine, it is manifest indeed from this alone that that sect is not only schismatic but also heretical.

Now after the death of Henry the schismatic English kingdom embraced the Calvinist sect, although perhaps not in its purity but mixed with the Lutheran and with others; and in this way too what we said in the second reason, about long lasting schism, we see fulfilled in that sect and from the same causes or roots and with the same effects and heretical signs. For, to begin with, hatred against the Roman See has increased from day to day in a remarkable way, and as it gets stronger every day and gets rooted in the minds of all, the result, by the industry of the demon, is that parents and masters impress from infancy on the minds of their children such a conception or apprehension about the Pope that simple and common men, when they hear the name of the Pope, conceive him a cruel monster, a horrendous idolater, and finally a sort of monster rather than a man. And no wonder if the common people dwell in so great error, since the king himself in his Preface, page 14, dares to affirm: “The Pontiffs have unjustly usurped for themselves by ambitious tyranny authority over the rights of temporal kings.” And again, page 22: “This power over kings unjustly usurped by the Pontiffs.” Again on page 23, that Catholics have also built up an empire for the Pontiff so “huge and unbounded that he can bestow and take away kingdoms at pleasure.” For this he attributes to Cardinal Bellarmine. Again on page 24: “That great pastor can at his whim lead you like sheep to the slaughter.” Page 27: “Although anciently clerics desired nothing beyond the tithes and were content to live on them, now the Pope, head of the clerics, only rests in receiving a third part of citizens and goods and estates in all provinces and kingdoms.” Further, page 61, he numbers among the chief articles of the Catholic Faith “a secular dictatorship of the Pontiff over kings.” He is speaking about Cardinal Bellarmine, and he understands by that secular dictatorship an absolute power of domination. And elsewhere, page 62 in the same sense, among the many things he relates or rather mocks as usurped by the Pontiffs he puts this: “endowed with all power both spiritual and temporal.” And later: “Who worship the Pope as God and hold him such as if he were Scripture speaking.” But afterwards, about the same Catholics, he says, page 128, that: “they attribute to the Pontiff supreme power in temporal things over kings and princes, that is, in the sense declared by myself in other places.”

5. These and the like are the colors wherewith the king depicts the Supreme Pontiff and his governance, in which however there is nothing that is not made up by seducers or badly or rashly interpreted and believed and written by the king through ignorance of the truth; so that it is no wonder that the uncultured people are deceived by these fabulous exaggerations, since the seducers have been able even to trick and deceive the king. For, in the first place, that the Pontiff does not usurp the power of kings is known to the whole world, and the Pontiffs themselves have wished it in their common right to be testified of them. For Alexander III is speaking of the king of the English when he says: “We, paying attention to the fact that it pertains to the king not to the Church to judge of such possessions, lest we should seem to detract from the right of the king of the English, we give command, as to our leaving judgment of possession to the king, etc.” And of the king of Gaul Innocent III said: “Let not anyone think that we intend to disturb or lessen the jurisdiction of the illustrious king of the French.” And elsewhere the same Pontiff affirmed that “a king does not recognize a superior in temporal affairs.” It is clear, therefore, that Pontiffs do not usurp the rights of kings. Hence it is by far most certain and most known that none of the Catholic doctors affirmed that the Pontiff “can bestow and take away kingdoms at pleasure”. For those who do not wish even in one judgment to disturb royal jurisdiction, how will they disturb very kingdoms at their pleasure? But it is much more intolerable to think, much less to write, that this pastor can “at his whim” kill the sheep or exercise a tyranny like that indicated in this exaggeration. Nay rather, to place in him not only the power but even the use is the very grave and impious slander of those who, by deceiving the king, have wished to make him angry. But this fact will be more evidently clear from what we will show about the Pontiff’s legitimate power over Christian kings in book 3, where we will also explain the just use of it; for perhaps the sectaries are making this stuff up not only from malice but also from ignorance and defect of theological doctrine.

6. Next, as to what is asserted about the Pontiff, that now he “only rests in receiving a third part of citizens and goods and estates in all provinces and kingdoms,” it is contrary to all canon right, as we showed in our work on tithes; nor is it less contrary to use, as is very well known in all Catholic kingdoms and provinces. But if perhaps the talk is about estates and goods voluntarily donated to the Church, the observance in the Church has always been that goods of this sort do not lessen the rights of tithes, nor are they computed among them, but are along with them conserved for pious ecclesiastical uses. Besides that, even with all those counted in, the assertion is made without foundation that it is a third part of the goods of the Catholic world, and the fiction is much more willful that that portion or measure is exacted and that without the least part of it the Pontiff does not rest.

7. Lastly, as to the king’s remark that Catholics worship the Pontiff as God, and hold his words as sacred Scripture, it is understood easily to have been said by exaggeration to generate, in men who do not know how to distinguish terms, the same reputation we have stated about the Pontiff. For how is it likely that the king believed that some Catholics attribute to the Pontiff the worship due solely to the true God? But if, by the name of God, only he is signified who, in a singular way, either represents God or shares his excellence, according to the phrase of Scripture and the explanation of Christ when he says, John 10.35: “If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came;” why are Catholics reprehended because they cultivate and venerate with due honor the Vicar of God? Again, it is not likely that it came into the mind of the king that every word of the Pontiff is reputed by Catholics as Sacred Scripture, since he ought not to be ignorant that the holy theologians deny that even the very definitions of Councils and Pontiffs are Sacred Scripture. Although they as constantly as most truly teach that these are equal in certitude of truth; but not about all the words of the Pontiff, but about those which he defines when teaching the Universal Church ex cathedra. About which point something was touched on above, and in book 3 we will make some addition. These things, then, are said by the by, so that it may be understood how stubborn is the hatred and how inveterate the madness against the Roman Pontiff that has, through the long duration of the schism, taken possession of English breasts.

8. Now from this hatred has followed that blindness of mind which Augustine described, whereby it comes about that the Anglican sect does not see the very high and very clear mountain of the Church but rather knocks its head against it. Hence also has it happened that England, destitute of the rule and direction of the Catholic Church, has turned aside to the synagogues of the heretics. For not even was it necessary to build a new heresy, because at that time innumerable heresies had become to occupy the North and they were spreading like a cancer and omitting no occasion for introducing the enemies of the faith. Moreover, thus was it related in chapter 1 that, after the death of Henry, contrary to his declared will, there prevailed in the kingdom at the time of King Edward the Zwinglian heresy. But afterward, in the time of Elizabeth, Calvinism was introduced, and has continued the same up to the present day, either altogether or in greater part; for perfect stability or conformity cannot last in sects of this sort, as was proved above. But it is undoubted that Calvin was a great heresiarch and that his sect is heresy; therefore there can be no doubt that the Anglican sect, which is Calvinist, whether pure or mixed with other errors, is a heresy, and that all who obstinately follow it are heretics. There remains only the proof that the Calvinist sect is heresy; but this we will show in what follows in two ways, both by responding to what King James in his Preface adduces in excuse for his fall into heresy, and by refuting what he objects in accusation of the Catholic Church; for he proposes as many articles of accusation as there are errors of his sect.

9. But, first, I have wanted, in the end of this chapter, to show the same by briefly indicating in the universal sect of the Protestants all the signs of heresy which are handed on by the Fathers. The first sign is an origin infected either by pride, “for one mother, pride, has given birth to all heresies,” as Augustine said, bk. De Pastoribus, ch.8; or “by envy,” which (as Chrysostom wrote, hom.7, on Romans, in the moral part) has brought forth all heresies; or “by greed of piling up money” (as Basil said on Isaiah 5); or by other vices, which Paul extensively enumerates 2 Timothy 3.2-8, from “Men shall be lovers of their own selves,” up to, “men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith.” For that Luther was such (Echius writes in his Actis Lutheri, Surius in his Compendio, Sander in Visib. Mon., bk.7), and that by ambition and envy he defected from the faith, is known and can be read in the histories of that time. But that Calvin excelled in similar haughtiness and wickedness of morals, there are many witnesses, whom Prateolus, bk.3, on the word ‘Calvin’, mentions. The second sign was touched on above about discord and separation from obedience to the Roman See, which Cyprian often notes in his epistles, as I related a little before. And Augustine bk.2, Contra Litt. Petiliani, chs.51 & 72, most reprehends the Donatists because they blasphemed against the Roman and Apostolic Chair, wherein the new sectaries most imitate them and surpass them.

10. The third sign is inconstancy and division of doctrine, for nothing is more contrary to certitude and truth of faith. On which matter enough was said above. But now I will adjoin the excellent words of Basil on Isaiah 5 where, when he had said that heretics seem wise to themselves and to be superior to others, he subjoins: “Therefore is everything stuffed with opinions that fight among themselves and with those who hand on dogmas crying out against their own authors; when each individual insists more obstinately on guarding his own dogma, and they violently smash through the things that please the diverse parties, and overthrow and refute them with the most bitter wrangling.” And epist.82, at the end: “Never do they firmly persist content with the same words.” The same thing is dealt with at large by Athanasius, epist. De Decret. contra Arian. Haeresim, at the beginning, and orat.1 Contra Arian., near the beginning, where he says among other things: “While they are always writing, themselves changing their own ideas, they display their unsure faith, or rather their sure infidelity and madness.” With which agree the words of Hilary, bk.3, De Trinit., near the beginning: “Heretics come against the Church, but while all the heretics conquer themselves in turn, yet they do not conquer anything for themselves.” Likewise and very well speaks the author of the incomplete homil.20 on Matthew, and Tertullian in Praescriptionibus, ch.40. And that this inconstancy is found most in Luther, Calvin, and their followers has been often noted by Catholic doctors, especially by Cardinal Bellarmine in his Controversiae, and extensively by Coccius, bringing together very many things, bk.8, Thesaurus art.7, 8, 9, & 10; and Salmer, vol.1, In Epist. Pauli, in the Prolegomena, disp.6, reports that the duke of Saxony was wont to say that he did indeed know what his people believed in the present year, but what they would believe the next year he did not know. Moreover, it is credible that this mutation is found in the Protestants of England, but, because I have not searched the thing out, I do not affirm it nor is it necessary; for it is enough that they adhere to a doctrine that began with that instability, for in the true faith there is not ‘yea’ and ‘nay’ but there is only ‘yea’, as Paul said, 2 Corinthians 1.18-20.

11. The fourth sign, and perhaps among Protestants the greatest, is to throw about the word of God, corrupting and mutilating it, about which too we have said much. But the singular boasting of heretics about the word of God is described by Vincent of Lerins, chs.35 & 37. But their elevation and deception in expounding it is blamed by Basil, just cited, and Athanasius, orat.1 & 2 Contra Arian., and orat. on that verse “All things have been given to me by my father” near the end, Nazianzen orat.51 or epist.1 to Cledonius, again epist.46 to Nectarius. Again orat.36, otherwise 2 De Filio, and 4 De Theolog., at the beginning, and next in orat.37 after the middle, and best in orat.42 he indicates the way in which heretics are wont to cite the word of God unfaithfully or incompletely, saying: “You proffer indeed the things which you lessen and diminish; but what they express you pass over; you ponder what he suffered, but what he voluntarily did you do not add.” Much is in Augustine, bk.7, De Genesi ad Litteram, ch.9, and De Unitat. Eccles., chs.12 & 13, and bk.2, Contra Litter. Petil., ch.61. Hilary is very good, bk.2, De Trinit., at the beginning, and Jerome on Isaiah 4 and Galatians 1. But about the mutilation of the Scriptures Augustine often mocks them, Contra Donatistas, and very well and generally Tertullian, De Praescriptionibus, ch.17.

12. A fifth sign, most evident of all and involving open heresy, is to despise the Catholic Church and to attribute error to it, denying it is Catholic and attributing that term to oneself. About which can be seen Lerins, ch.26, and Augustine, De Unit. Eccles.; many things were also said above and it was shown at the same time how this is proper to Protestants and to the Anglican sect. A sixth sign is consequent on it, not to acquiesce in the Councils, from Athanasius, orat.1, Contra Arianos, a little from the beginning. And it is, I think, the same as to admit of one’s own accord some councils but to reject others, because they do not acquiesce in the Councils but rather discriminate between them and approve or disapprove them by their own decision. A seventh is akin to it, to despise the authority of the Fathers, wherein Calvin was very free, who even dared to compare the Fathers to the Pharisees, as once the Donatists did, in Augustine bk.2, Contra Litter. Petil., ch.61. An eighth sign is consonant with the preceding ones, to be led by one's own spirit, whether human or the satanic spirit of an angel of darkness transfiguring itself into an angle of light. Hence appositely does Hilary say, bk.1, De Trinitate, that heretics "are arbiters of religion for themselves, although the work of religion is in the duty of obedience alone;" where he seems to allude to the verse of Paul, 2 Corinthians 10.5: "bringing into captivity every thought, etc." And in bk.2 at the beginning, he says about the same people: "They interpret the words of God according to the sense of their own will." And many like things are contained in bk.3, a little from the beginning, and often Tertullian, De Praescriptionibus. We also adduced many things above.

13. A ninth sign of heretical rashness is colored eloquence, with precipitation and too much liberty of speaking. About which Nazianzen, orat.33, at the beginning, speaks thus: "But these men, would that, as they have a tongue fluid and sharp and vehement for attacking the nobler and more approved words, so would they also put at least some or even equal effort into action. Which, if they would do, they would at least be cavilers less, and would not conduct themselves in words as absurdly and insolently as in a game of dice." But, about their precipitation in speaking, Gregory can be read, bk.7, on Job 2. A tenth sign can be novelty, contrary to ancient doctrine, or by defection from the ancient faith; about which we spoke above, and Chrysostom can be seen, hom.47, on Matthew, Tertullian, De Praescriptionibus, ch.3, and other Fathers expounding that verse of 1 John 2.19: "They went out from us." Let the eleventh be loss of the Catholic name and a new denomination from their author, about which and the like things much was said above. But I will add here a twelfth and last sign handed down by Tertullian, De Praescriptionibus, ch.41, of the behavior of the heretics themselves, which he himself there extensively describes, and he says it is "futile and earthly." But among other words these are most to be noted: "Their ordinations are rash, light, inconstant; now they put neophytes in place, then those bound to secular life, now our apostates, so as to oblige them with glory because they cannot do so with truth. Never advancing more easily than into the camps of rebels, where the very being there is deserving of merit. Thus today one man is bishop, tomorrow another, today a deacon who was yesterday a lector, today a priest who was yesterday a layman, for they enjoin even on laymen priestly offices." These signs, therefore, I have briefly reviewed, so that they can be compared with the morals of the Protestants and the state of Anglicanism; for if the comparison be done with prudent consideration, no one could doubt that that sect is open heresy and hence that those who profess it are heretics.

Chapter 23: Those who obstinately follow the Anglican schism can be excused neither from heresy nor from the note of heresy.

Summary: 1. The reasons are proposed whereby the king tries to free himself from the note of heresy. The first. 2. Of the various acceptations of heresy two are preferred. Among Christians heresy is always taken in the bad sense. 3. A doctrine contrary to the faith is aptly called an heretical proposition, but the assent to such doctrine is heresy. What an heretical proposition is. 4. The true rule of faith is established. 5. A proposition which is proposed by the Church as to believed de fide is de fide. 6. Definition of heresy. Explanation. 7. Proper definition of heresy. Proof from Augustine. 8. Proof from the Fathers that one dogma contrary to the faith is sufficient to constitute heresy. Proof by reason.

1. What has been said in the previous chapter can be argued against by the reasons with which the king contends in his Preface that he is purging himself of the crime of heresy; therefore, how much weight these reasons have must be carefully examined. And first at any rate he denies, on pages 39 & 40, that he is an apostate; next he contends that he cannot be called a heretic either; but these claims will be better treated by us in reverse order. That he cannot, then, properly be called a heretic “even by the rules of the Catholics,” he proves in the first place more or less in these words: “Since I had a father and paternal grandfather who thought the same about the faith [sc. as the king thinks now], and since I was never in the Church of the Catholics, I cannot, even by their own rules, properly be called a heretic.” Secondly, he argues in effect in this way: although I was baptized in the rites of the Catholics and although I dissent from them in religion, I cannot be called a heretic because there is between us no quarrel about the substance of baptism, nor any controversy on this head of doctrine, since we are all baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. The third and strongest reason, which he himself proposes at large, we collect summarily thus: the king of England puts faith in the Sacred Scriptures, which is due from a Christian man, and “gladly swears to the three symbols of the faith,” and he venerates and receives the first four General Councils as Catholic and orthodox; and, whatever the Fathers have in the four hundred years since Christ established with unanimous consent as necessary for salvation, he does not dare to reprehend but either thinks the same or keeps silent; therefore he cannot rightly be deemed a heretic, except perhaps (he says) by those “who worship the Pope as God and hold him such as if he were Scripture speaking, so that also they do not define heresy otherwise than as any opinion whatever in causes of the faith contrary to papal decision.”

These things are what the king adduces in his defense, and although he places the whole weight of his excuse on the last reason and touches on the others by the by, nevertheless we think none should be passed over, so that we may make satisfaction more fully both to the king himself and to every reader, and so that we may seem to leave nothing untouched. But first, because of the final words of the king, two things need to be made clear. First, what heresy is, or what suffices for constituting it; second, who is properly a heretic and when consent to some error makes a man a heretic. Both of these questions are touched on by Augustine; the first in his epistle ‘ad Quod vult Deum’, preamble to his bk. De Haeresib., and the second in the preface to the same book, and he says that both are difficult to define and promises to ask in the second part of the work how heretic should be defined; however he did not write that part, and so he left in that work both points undecided. It is necessary from other places of the same doctor, and from the doctrine of other Fathers and theologians, to explain what must be thought and held for certain in this matter, so that the dispute can, without ambiguity of words, rest on some firm foundation.

2. The name of heresy, therefore, has received various significations, even in the use of theologians, but two in the present context are most to be distinguished, since, because of them, heresy is defined variously by theologians. But the two can be explained by comparison with faith; for heresy is opposed to faith, and therefore, just as sometimes the doctrine revealed by God is called faith but the assent, whereby such doctrine is believed, is more often called faith, so heresy is sometimes said to concern the heretical doctrine itself, sometimes also the assent voluntarily afforded to such doctrine. For these two are without doubt very diverse, no less in false doctrine or faith than in true; and the use of the term makes sufficiently clear that the name of heresy is taken to signify both. For when Paul said, Acts 24.14: “But this I confess unto thee, that after the sect which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers [alt. so worship I my Father and my God],” he was speaking of the doctrine of the Gospel. Hence the Syriac version has ‘doctrine’ for ‘sect’, and the Greek term signifies ‘after the way’, which is wont properly to be said of the whole reason of some doctrine, which also the term ‘sect’ very well indicates. But Paul did not wish to call the doctrine of the Gospel heresy (as Theophylact notes very well), because it was not according to men's choice, from which is taken the name heresy [Nb. 'haireisis' in Greek means choice] (as is noted by Tertullian, De Praescriptionibus, ch.6, Jerome, on Galatians 5 and Titus 3, and Isidore, bk.8, Etymologiae, ch.3), but according to the will and revelation of God. And therefore, in the Gospel law and among Christians, the name of heresy is taken in a bad sense, and signifies a doctrine which some man chooses for himself that is repugnant to the doctrine of God. And hence, as a result, such choice of doctrine by assent to it is called heresy; for the two are so conjoined that the passage from one to the other is easy. In this way too does Paul in Galatians 5 put, among vices of the flesh, 'heresies', as Jerome translates and notes according to the Greek term, although the Latin Vulgate translates as 'sects'; and in Titus 3 Paul says that a heretic is condemned by his own proper judgment; but it is clear that a heretic is condemned for heresy; Paul indicates, therefore, that that proper judgment is heresy, where also Jerome thinks the same and more clearly Tertullian, in the said ch.6.

3. In order more distinctly, then, to define each part, we will call the first an heretical proposition and the second heresy; for it is likely that, by ecclesiastical use and custom, the sin which is committed by choosing a false doctrine so as to believe it or committed by voluntary and free assent to such doctrine, was called heresy, for this is more what is indicated by the true etymology of the word. Therefore an heretical proposition is one that departs from the rule of Catholic truth and opposes it or contradicts it. Thus does Augustine teach, bk. De Vera Religione, chs.5 & 6, where he calls it "a corrupt doctrine averse from the rule of truth;" and in ch.7 he says: "It is a corrupt opinion deviating from the rule and communion of the Catholic Church;" and orat. Contra Iudaeos, Paganos, et Arianos ch.20., he calls it "an error of heretics against the true faith of the Catholic Church." Likewise Tertullian, De Praescriptionibus ch.6, says it is "an adulterous doctrine which someone by his own decision and choice introduces or, when introduced by another, embraces." But when he calls it 'adulterous' he means against Christ or the Church, just as, ch.37, he says that "heretics do not have from Christ what of their own choice they follow." And in the same sense he says of heretics, ch.44, that "they have defiled with heretical adultery the Virgin faith handed down by Christ." Finally, the use of that word is common in the said signification and there is no difference on the point between us and Protestants. But because a proposition is established or defined as heretical by departure from the rule, and because it is opposed, by way of privation, to a proposition or truth of the faith, therefore, to comprehend the formal reason of an heretical proposition, one must set first the rule of believing and explain what is necessary for some proposition to be deemed de fide; for, once this is put in place, it will be easy to see that an assertion contrary to it is heretical.

Moreover, this point is touched on by the king in the last words cited above, and he mocks Catholics who define heresy as "any opinion in causes of the faith that is contrary to papal decision." But he should, since this definition displeases him, provide another, whereby to explain to us what he understands by heresy, so that he may in this way show that he is free of the stain of heresy. But, without doubt, he can in no way explain it, unless he fall altogether into an inextricable labyrinth by assigning, for rule of faith, Scripture alone, and it as understood by his own and private sure knowledge. Which doctrine, as I showed above, not only spreads out a very broad way for all errors, but also hands down for rule of Catholic Faith what Paul assigned for rule of heresy, that is, the believer's own judgment. For Paul says about a heretic, Titus 3.11: "He that is such is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned by his own judgment [alt. condemned of himself]." Because "he chooses for himself wherein he is condemned," as Tertullian adds, "therefore is he also named heretic." The rule, then, of heresy is one's own proper judgment, that is, contrary to the judgment of the Church. But those who reduce to their own proper spirit the certitude of faith and the true sense of Scripture establish nothing else for rule of faith than their own proper judgment. For what is proper spirit save proper judgment? Or how is that spirit discerned by those who trust in it save by their own decision? They confound, therefore, the rule of faith with the foundation of heresy; and so it is no wonder that they hold heresy for faith and reject faith as heresy. Besides which, as I was saying above, they can rightly condemn no one as a heretic, since no one is bound to follow in things of faith another's proper judgment or private spirit; no one, then, will be a heretic, by disagreeing with the rule of faith that they establish.

4. Solid and Catholic doctrine, therefore, says that Sacred Scripture is the rule of faith, not on its own, nor understood in a private sense, but along with other rules which are commended in it and preserve and discern and interpret it, I mean tradition and the Church itself, which is the living rule, through which the Holy Spirit speaks and which he rules and makes to be the pillar and ground of the truth. And therefore, although Scripture and tradition contain the pure and true word of God, which is the primary rule of faith, nevertheless, because the Church is what infallibly explains and proposes to us the Scriptures, the traditions, and their sense, therefore the Church is wont by the Fathers to be stated as the sufficient rule of faith. Hence Irenaeus, bk.3 Contra Haereses ch.4: "There is no need to seek among others for the truth which is easily received from the Church;" and, ch.11 at the end, he puts the spirit of the Church before every private spirit, and bk.4 chs.43 & 45, he says that in the Church alone is there true tradition and true understanding of Scripture. Cyprian, epist.73, says that the doctrine of the Church is to be firmly held and taught, and in epist.76 extensively. Augustine too everywhere uses this sole rule of the Church for confirming truths of the faith, as is clear from the places just mentioned, and from bk. De Haeresibus at the end, where he says that, for some doctrine to be received by none who is faithful, it is enough to know that the thinking of the Church is against it as foreign to the faith. The same very well in bk.1 Contra Cresconium chs.32 & 33, and epist.48, and in other books against the Donatists; again epist.99, and in epist.118 ch.5, he says: "to dispute against a doctrine of the Universal Church is a mark of the most insolent madness." He posits the same for rule of faith and of true doctrine, De Vera Religione chs.5, 6, & 7, bk.1 De Moribus Ecclesiae Catholicae ch.30, bk.3 De Libero Arbitrio ch.23, and very gravely in bk. De Utilitate Credendi ch.17, where he says of the Church: "It has obtained the height of authority, and not to want to give the primacy to it is a mark either of the truly greatest impiety or of precipitate ignorance." Many other things too we have adduced above, both from the holy and ancient Fathers and from the very Scripture.

5. From which we briefly infer that that proposition is de fide which the authority of the Catholic Church proposes to us as to be believed de fide; for in this rule is contained everything that has been defined either in Scripture or in the approved Councils. Hence, on the other hand, that proposition is heretical which is contrary to a definition of the Church, or to any proposition defined by the Church in the way explained. But about the Church we have been speaking and about its definitions in order now to abstain from the question of the power of the Roman Pontiff for defining truths of the faith, which power the king seems to have wanted to involve in his words, lest we be diverted from our aim and intention. For although it is very true that the definition of a Pontiff speaking ex cathedra contains infallible truth, and that all the faithful are held to believe it firmly, yet this is not diverse from what we have said; for when a Pontiff defines, the Church is speaking through its head, and the body is not separate from the head nor the head from the body; but because it is more limited, for the Church can in other ways too propose truths of the faith, the Pontiff also approving, as by General Councils and by the universal consent of the Church, and therefore, so as to comprehend everything and avoid controversies, we have spoken in a rather general way. For definitions ought, as far as possible, to be common and beyond controversy. In this way, then, does sufficient explained seem to have been given, according to opportunity of place, about what heresy is as to its matter, or what an heretical proposition is.

6. Now, from what has been said about an heretical proposition, a definition can easily be given of what, as it is the work or vice of men, heresy is. Heresy, therefore, is deliberate assent to, or credulity in, some heretical proposition. And it reverts to what the scholastics say, that it is false opinion about the things of faith. Therefore, both a doctrine of the faith and a doctrine contrary to it can be said to be the matter that heresy is concerned with, though in a diverse way: a doctrine of the faith by falling away from it or judging it false, but a contrary doctrine by choosing it as true and giving faith to it. Now we say that heresy is voluntary assent, both because heresy according to its name proceeds from a proper and voluntary choice, and also because heresy is taken in the bad sense; such that it involves, not only a false assent of the mind, but also guilt and lapse of the will; and therefore, as we will soon say, although someone may err by assenting to a proposition contrary to the faith, he does not fall into heresy proper, that is, his assent is not deemed heretical or heresy proper unless he recognizes its repugnance to the Catholic Faith and, that fact notwithstanding, chooses and believes such doctrine as true. For this reason, in fact, Paul said, Titus 3.10: "A man that is an heretick after the first and second admonition reject." For although Paul does not hand on the reason or substance of heresy but teaches the way of avoiding heresy, he insinuates nevertheless that heresy is not committed until someone knows, and sufficiently adverts to, what the doctrine is that he is choosing.

This condition, therefore, on the part of the one giving assent is necessary, but on the part of the matter we say in general that heresy is assent about something contrary to the faith. For the matter of faith is multiple, because there are in it dogmas pertaining to God one and three and to his attributes, others to the humanity of Christ and his hypostatic union with the Word, and in general things having regard to the redemption of men, and with these are connected those that have regard to the institution and hierarchy of the Catholic Church, to its sacraments, morals, and ceremonies, also to true remission of sins, and true justice, and the reward and punishment of human deeds; when, therefore, we put indefinitely the matter of faith in the definition of heresy, we are embracing all the aforesaid dogmas. For true and proper heresy is committed in any dogma at all of faith. For if a thing has been revealed by God, it is to be believed with the same certitude of faith, whatever the matter dealt with. Hence also it happens that for true heresy, which destroys the whole faith, voluntary assent contrary to one dogma alone of the faith is sufficient in any matter at all. Because a single lie, even in the least thing pertaining to the faith, would destroy the supreme authority of God, and any false assertion, if it could be found among the dogmas of the faith, would render all the rest uncertain and ambiguous, and accordingly any assent at all contrary to any dogma of the faith at all is heresy, totally destroying the faith. Hence Paul, writing to the Galatians, who wanted to choose an opinion false and contrary to the Gospel about the observance of legal rituals, although they were not erring in other mysteries of the faith, says, 5.4: "Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law." And later, v.7-9: "Ye did run well; who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth? This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you. A little leaven leaveneth [alt. corrupteth] the whole lump." By these words he indicates that that error (if they were obstinate in it) was enough to make of no effect and to corrupt the whole of their faith. For thus did the schism of the Donatists pass over into heresy, their obstinate mind adhering to one or another error in the matter of baptism or the Church, even if in other things of the faith they were not in error, as I have often related from Cyprian and Augustine, and as I will confirm again in the following point.

7. Finally, from what has been said is collected who properly and in strictness is called a heretic; for, from Origen on Titus 3.10: "A man that is an heretick, etc.," in Pamphilus on the Apologia, he is one "who professes that he believes in Christ and tries to change or subvert some dogma received in the ecclesiastical order." It is taken in fact from Paul, in the said place of Titus, joined with the exposition of the Fathers, and the common consent of the doctors, and the received use of that term in the Church. For the name of heretic is not attributed to all infidels, but only to those who, while confessing Christ, deny his faith in part, for the other infidels are called rather Jews, pagans, or gentiles. A heretic, then, is he who under the Christian name (for he says he believes Christ) corrupts the truth of the faith of Christ by thinking something against it. But there is need that he do it by his own choice, and with sufficient knowledge and judgment; for if the error happen through ignorance, or lack of knowledge, it does not constitute a heretic, because he is not condemned by his own judgment and he does not commit heresy proper. By this reason too does Augustine distinguish between a heretic and one who believes heretics. For the book De Utilitate Credendi begins thus: "If, O Honoratus, I thought one and the same man to be a heretic and a believer in heretics, I would think that in this cause both my tongue and my pen should rest. But, as it is, there is between these two a very great difference, since a heretic, as my opinion says, is he who, for the sake of some temporal advantage, and especially for his own glory and supremacy, generates and follows false or new opinions (that is, in matter of faith); but he who believes a man of this sort is a man fooled by some image of truth and piety." For Augustine wished, in the first member, to signify that, in order to constitute a man erring in the faith a heretic properly and simply, he must by his own choice and while seeing that he is dissenting from the Universal Church throw himself into error; and because this does not morally happen save for a human vice or motive, Augustine therefore posited in the definition of a heretic the other particulars, which declare more the occasion or cause of voluntary error than the intrinsic condition of heresy. But in the other member he teaches that error caused by ignorance does not, although it be contrary to faith and the Church, constitute a man a heretic. But the fact will be far more certain if such ignorance is probable (as they say) or invincible; but if it is by grave negligence and too much facility it will not excuse guilt altogether, yet it will excuse that degree and magnitude of guilt which, according to the common usage of the wise and of the whole Church, suffices simply to constitute or denominate a heretic.

The same doctrine is also contained in epist. 16, at the beginning, of the same Augustine, where he says: "They who defend their own opinion, although a false and perverse one, without pertinacity or animosity, especially an opinion which they did not by the audacity of their own presumption give birth to but received from parents who were misled and fell into error, and yet seek the truth with careful solicitude, ready to be corrected when they have found it, these are in no way to be counted among heretics." On the contrary, however, in bk. 18 De Civitate Dei ch. 51, he speaks thus: "Those who in the Church of Christ think something unwholesome and corrupt, if, when censured to think what is sane and correct, they stubbornly resist and refuse to emend their pestilential and deadly dogmas but persist in defending them, they are heretics and are to be held, when they go outside, among practiced enemies." Finally, bk. 4 De Baptismo ch. 16, with the use of an example, he declares both members, saying: "Let us constitute two sorts, one of whom thinks about Christ what Photinus thought, and is baptized in his heresy outside the communion of the Church; while the other thinks the same but is baptized in the Catholic Church thinking that it is the Catholic Faith. This latter I do not yet say is a heretic, unless, once the doctrine of the Catholic Faith has been made manifest to him, he prefers to resist and to choose what he held before; but before this happens, manifestly he who was baptized outside is worse.” Which testimonies I report for this reason, that many things can be noted in them which have great weight in the present cause, as I will also immediately indicate.

Therefore, on the evidence of Augustine, there must be pertinacity in heresy for him who chooses it to be held a heretic. And this pertinacity we have signified by the word ‘choosing’, along with Jerome on Titus 3, and Tertullian in the said ch.6 De Praescriptionibus, who for that reason, in book 1 Contra Marcion. ch.1, signifies that he is most a heretic who draws back from his earlier faith, “and, the light of his faith extinct, loses the God whom he had found, so that from this already he can be marked out as a heretic, who, having deserted what was before, has afterwards chosen for himself what formerly he was not. For what was introduced afterwards will as much be reckoned heresy as what was handed on formerly and at the beginning will be held so.”

8. Now, in the description, I spoke in the singular of dogma or assent contrary to the faith, so as to point out that to constitute a heretic it is enough that he voluntarily dissent even in only one thing from the doctrine of the Catholic Church. Which, from what has been said, is sufficiently clear of itself; and it is extensively handed on by Origen, in the cited place on Titus 3, in his review of many special dogmas that pertain in great part to the present cause, when he adds that one of them is sufficient to constitute a man a heretic. Augustine too, in the places mentioned, although he speaks sometimes in the plural of him who generates false or new opinions, more often speaks in the singular about him who defends obstinately a perverse opinion or something unwholesome. Hence, in his book De Haeresibus at the end, he distinguishes two classes of heretics in these words: “There are heretics, it must be confessed, who in a single dogma, or not many more, attack the rule of truth, as the Macedonians or Photinians and whoever else are like this. But others, story-tellers (to call them so), namely those who weave together empty stories, and these long and involved ones, are full of so many false dogmas that even they themselves cannot count them, or only with very great difficulty.” And certainly Luther, Calvin, and the like are to be put in this second order; for they have multiplied so many errors and passed them on in such a confused and inconsistent way in their controversies about the Church, about justifying faith, about the necessity of works, freedom of choice, the sacraments, and the like that they can scarcely number or perceive them. Again, Henry VIII, king of England, if he believed in his mind that he could do in right what in fact he took, will have to be numbered among heretics of the first order, since in one dogma at least he chose to think contrary to the Catholic Church. For the fact that one dogma suffices is readily clear from what has been said. Since a heretic is denominated from heresy, because he embraces it or commits it, but one false dogma, or voluntary assent to it, suffices for heresy, therefore it suffices also for constituting a heretic. Again, one false dogma destroys the whole faith, and voluntary assent to it, even if it be only one and in a single matter, destroys the whole divine faith in such a man; therefore it constitutes him truly a heretic. Lastly, it constitutes him an infidel and not of some other sort, as is clear; therefore it constitutes him a heretic.

From these principles, then, which are very certain, and King James cannot deny them if he wishes to be wise, let him himself pass judgment about himself whether he is by his own self condemned, to speak in the manner of Tertullian, De Praescriptione ch.6, and of Cyprian ep.55 at the end. For we very greatly desire that the king is not a heretic, and we flee from naming him so, for we know that Augustine, when disputing with the Pelagians, serm. De Verb. Apost. last chapter, said: “We could perhaps, if we wished, call them heretics, but we do not call them so.” However, he did not, for that reason, omit to show them the truth and summon their conscience and in all ways convince them, so that they might be rebuked and return to a better mind. He also gives a very good reason: “Because, in things not yet made firm by the full authority of the Church, error must be borne, but it must not progress to trying also to shake the foundation itself of the Church. It is not expedient. So far, perhaps, patience is not to be reprehended, but we should be afraid lest there also be blame for negligence.” Since, therefore, we are contending with King James in that cause in which he strives to shake the foundation of the Church, we with like affection too, though with less genius or authority, study to point out his state, not so as to call him heretic, but so that he may come to his senses and see lest he be what he refuses to be rightly called. For assuredly his excuses will, even to the king, appear of no moment as he carefully weighs them. For no other excuse (without any doubt) can be thought up to escape the reasons and proofs adduced.

Chapter 24: The reasons are refuted by which the king studies to escape the stain of a heretic.

Summary: 1. Twofold excuse in the first reason of the king of England. 2. King James was at some time in the Catholic Church. A catechumen rightly baptized by a heretic is truly made a member of the Church. 3. Someone can be a heretic even if he was never in the Catholic Church. 4. The second reason of the king is refuted. 5. His final reason is dissolved. 6. The Creeds, when believed without their Catholic sense, do not suffice for true confession of faith. 7. All the authentic Councils are to be received with equal certitude. 8. A certain evasion of the king is excluded. 9. The reason of the king is shown to be insufficient.

1. In his first reason, then, the king indicates two heads of excuse: one, that he had a father and paternal grandfather of the same sect as he now professes; the other, that he was never in the Catholic Church. In the previous chapter I deemed it necessary to omit what pertains to the truth of history, because many either deny it or call it into doubt. For since the king never knew his father or his grandfather, whom he lost before the use of reason, and since he was educated by heretics and always dwelt among them, he could have easily been deceived in this matter, so that they might lead him more easily into their own error. Nevertheless, whatever his grandfather or father thought about the faith, their lapse will not excuse his own heresy if, after sufficient warning and instruction, he has not corrected it. Let him, I beseech, re-read the opinion of Augustine cited a little above from epistle 162, where, speaking specifically of those who believe a false and perverse doctrine which they did not by their own audacity give birth to but received from parents who had been seduced and fallen into error, he only then does not assign them among heretics when they do not defend such doctrine with pertinacious mind but are solicitous for the truth and ready to correct their error. But, contrariwise, in other places he condemns without any distinction as a heretic he who is obstinate in error, whether he invented it himself or learnt it from a false doctor or parent. Which fact is also manifestly shown by reason itself, for the error of a parent, when it can now be discerned by the offspring, does not excuse, nay it rather accuses, the offspring's guilt.

2. But as to what the king adds, that he was never in the Church along with the Catholics, it can, in the first place, be from his confession rightly denied, when a true principle of theology is added to it. For he himself confesses that he was baptized in the Catholic rite, since he was still under the care and power of the most serene king and of his Catholic mother; but from these principles is manifestly concluded that he himself was begotten spiritually in the Catholic Church, not in the synagogue of heretics, because baptism too, by which he was reborn, is the Catholic Church's own proper gift, although it be sometimes possessed and administered by heretics, as Augustine says, bk.1 De Baptismo ch.10; and the king was then under the power of his most serene mother, who was united to the Catholic Church as a member of it by the faith which she professed; therefore he is also a regenerated son of the Church as a member of the same. Nay, even if none of his parents was Catholic, he was by baptism alone, rightly ministered and not unworthily received, made a member of the Catholic Church, because he received through baptism the true justice and faith of Christ along with Christ's character; therefore he was conjoined to the Church through the sacrament of faith and through the faith of the sacrament, which is altogether enough for him to be a member of it. For just as a catechumen is truly faithful and a Catholic, if he was baptized out of necessity by a heretic, since with true faith and fitting disposition he is fully sanctified and united to Christ as the head and to the Catholic Church as his body, according to the doctrine of Augustine, bk.1 De Baptismo ch.2; therefore the same must be thought about an infant, even if he be baptized by an heretical minister and under heretical parents. Because although the ministers or the parents were in private error, nevertheless he was baptized in the faith of the true Church, and by the same infused faith which he received in baptism he was made a member of it, even if he be detained under the power of those who are foreign and enemy to the Church. Therefore, as long as the king of England did not lose baptismal justice and faith, he was in the Catholic Church; for he was regenerated by it, according to the doctrine of Augustine, bk.1 De Baptismo ch.10, and from the same he had the character and faith which conjoined him to it. For at that age, when he was not capable of an act of faith, the habit suffices for the aforesaid union, since it also suffices for union with Christ; therefore he cannot, under that head, be excused of having defected from the Church when he lost the faith by his own act of heresy.

3. Also although these things be very true, there can be added besides that one is able to be truly and properly a heretic even if one has never been in the Catholic Church. For if someone was from the beginning instructed by heretics not rightly baptized, and if later, after sufficient censure, he remain obstinately in the error once conceived, he is truly a heretic, because he begins to be an infidel under the Christian name, and yet he was never in the Church, because he had neither baptism nor true faith, whether in habit or in act. And in this way do the Councils and Fathers sometimes teach, that heretics not rightly baptized are, when they come to the Church, to be received through baptism, as the Council of Nicea canon 19 determined about the Paulianists. Therefore they were heretics, although they were never before in the Catholic Church. But the reason is that being rightly baptized does not belong to the idea of heretic, but sufficient is that, although he confess Christ, he obstinately thinks in his own faith against the Catholic Church. Nay rather, although someone not only be not truly baptized but even never a Catholic, he can be a heretic if, recognizing and confessing Christ, he does not profess Christ's true faith in its integrity. For this is enough for the infidelity of heresy, even if the person so erring had never before professed the Catholic Faith and afterwards left it; for this is necessary for the circumstance of apostasy but not for the proper stain of heresy, which can be found without that circumstance according to the doctrine of St. Thomas, IIa IIae qq.11 & 12. But we are speaking of the heretic as to guilt, not as to punishments of the Church, because in order to incur those he will need to have the character of baptism, speaking properly, as is more at large treated of in the said place about infidelity. This therefore is now enough to show that the excuse of the king has a foundation neither in what he assumes nor in what he infers.

4. In his second excuse too the king does not conclude correctly, for although someone be rightly baptized and maintain no error about baptism nor any controversy in that matter with Catholics, nevertheless, because of errors obstinately conceived in other articles of faith, he can be a heretic. Otherwise neither Arius nor Luther nor others like them would have been heretics; for they were rightly baptized and they did not stir up controversies about baptism or its rite, but they became heretics because of other heresies. Therefore it matters little for the present cause that the king was rightly baptized and that he has no controversy with us about baptism, but what must be considered is whether in other matters of the faith he dissents from the Catholic Church. For as Augustine said, epist.48 (dealing with another matter): “It is not Christian sacraments that make you a heretic but corrupt dissension.” He is in fact addressing the Donatists, about whom he a little afterwards says: “You are with us in baptism, in the Creed, in the other sacraments of the Lord, but in the spirit of unity and the bound of peace, lastly in the Catholic Church itself, you are not with us.” Any dissension at all, then, from the Catholic Church in a doctrine of the faith makes a heretic of him who professes to believe in Christ although he neither lack baptism nor be in error about baptism.

5. There remains the final reason wherein the king enumerates the things he believes so as thence to prove himself to be a Catholic. But certainly he does not rightly conclude, because he neither sufficiently believes what he enumerates nor sufficiently enumerates what a Catholic ought to believe. He first says, then, that he puts faith in the Sacred Scriptures; but in which ones? Not in all those that the Catholic Church approves, but he chooses for himself which to believe. Therefore the faith he puts in the Scriptures is not Catholic; for the Catholic Faith is universal, and from nowhere else than from the Catholic Church, as Augustine testifies, does it receive the Scriptures. Next, what sense of the Sacred Scriptures does he with his faith believe? That sense, surely, which he believes he has found by his own sure knowledge. He does not then believe the Scriptures with Catholic Faith; for the Catholic Faith in no way rests for support on private judgment and private spirit, but it holds the rule of the Catholic Church in expounding the Scriptures. But these things were treated of extensively above.

6. Second, the king enumerates the symbols of the Faith to which he says he swears. But about these, as I also noted above, he must be asked whether in everything he receives the symbols in the sense in which the Catholic Church receives them; for if he does not dare affirm this (because in truth it is not so), the fact that he holds to or swears to the letter of the symbol is not enough to show him a Catholic. There is the sentence of Cyprian, epist.76 ad Magnum, where, after he has said that schismatics, that is heretics, are equivalent to gentiles, he subjoins: “But if someone opposes this and says that Novatian holds the same law as the Catholic Church holds, baptizes with the same symbol as we also baptize with, recognizes the same God the Father, the same Son, the same Holy Spirit, and that on this account he can usurp the power of baptizing, because he seems not to disagree with us in the baptismal interrogations; let whoever thinks he should make this opposition know that, first, we and the schismatics do not have one law of the symbol, nor the same interrogation. For when they say, ‘Do you believe in the remission of sins and life eternal through the Holy Church?’ there is a lie in their questioning since they do not have the Church, etc.” In this sentence of Cyprian I only consider that to receive the words of the symbol, or to swear to them, is not enough for profession and true confession of faith unless they are believed in the Catholic sense, and that (as Cyprian also subjoins) to confess the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, even in the Catholic sense is not enough if the other articles, about the remission of sins and about one, holy, and Catholic Church, are held in a perverse sense, as it is clear the Protestants understand them. For it is manifestly proven, from what was said above about the Church, how much they all err in the article about the Church, which is sufficient now for us, since here is not the place to dispute about the other articles.

7. Third, the king enumerates the first four General Councils and says that he venerates them as Catholic and orthodox. Where also a question occurs that must immediately be asked: why does he receive these rather than the fifth, or the sixth, or the other authentic Councils up to the Council of Trent? For if we consider external appearance or solemnity, so to say, there was not less in the later General Councils than in the first four; for they were confirmed and convened by the same pontifical authority, and the convoking was equally universal, and the attendance was equally numerous or sometimes greater; or if it was sometimes less it matters little; the same happened indeed in the first four Councils and it is altogether accidental to the unanimity of the Council; and I say the same proportionally about the wisdom and sanctity of the persons coming to the Councils and celebrating them. But if we consider in the Councils their internal and primary virtue, which is the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and the king believes this and recognizes the fact in the first four Councils, and for that reason venerates them, why does he not believe and recognize the same in later Councils and receive them with equal veneration? Certainly I do not see what he could respond, save either that, after the times of the first four Councils, the Catholic Church had already perished and defected from the true faith and therefore its Councils, however general, were not now true Councils but congregations of the faithless; or that he and his are able, through their own private spirit, to discern between the true and the false Councils, and to approve through it the first four and not the rest. But about these and the like responses, how vain and willful they are, and how incredible in themselves to any prudent man, and lastly how erroneous and contrary, not only to the holy Fathers, but also to the Sacred Scriptures, has been sufficiently demonstrated by us above.

8. Perhaps the king had another counsel for venerating those Councils rather than others, not because he believes that the assistance of the Holy Spirit was promised to true Councils, nor even because he believed they could not err, but because he judges that in fact they did not err but taught in conformity to the Sacred Scriptures, which he does not judge about the other Councils. But if thus he thinks about the Councils, this is not to believe in a General Council as a rule of faith but to approve or reject a Council by one's own judgment; but to receive Councils in this way pertains rather to human opinion than to faith. And hence also the result seems to follow that Protestants do not venerate those Councils by receiving them fully and in their totality, but only in that part of doctrine which does not contradict themselves, though not in the other decrees, especially the moral ones, nor in the manner of teaching the truth from the traditions of the Church and the consent of the Fathers, nor in the recognition of the Apostolic Roman See, to which the Councils always granted primacy, as was eruditely noted in his Apologia by the most learned Cardinal Bellarmine, ch.7, and as we will, according as occasion occur, declare in what follows.

Fourth, finally, the king mentions the unanimous consent of the Fathers, namely of those who existed in the four or five hundred years after Christ. Where the same objection immediately occurs, because he discerns gratuitously and by his own judgment alone between the Fathers of greater and lesser antiquity, since many, unequal in time, were not inferior in either sanctity or wisdom, and (which is chief) they did not, in things pertaining to faith and salvation, depart from the steps of the more ancient ones, as Gregory the Great, Gregory of Tours, Isidore, John Damascene, the Venerable Bede, Remigius, Peter Damian, Anselm, Bernard, Thomas, Bonaventure, Laurentius Justinianus, and others similar. Next, among those ancient Fathers are rightly numbered Dionysius and Ignatius, whom some Protestants not only do not admit but even load down with insults. Next, they defer almost not at all to Leo I and Innocent I and other holy Pontiffs of those times merely because they were Pontiffs, although they wrote with no less wisdom. Next, they readily reject even other Fathers, as often as they begin to perceive them contrary to themselves, whether by denying that the writings are theirs, although these circulate under their names, or by attributing error to them. Hence in this point too the king does not profess that he believes everything that those Fathers taught with unanimous consent, even about things that pertain to salvation, but only that he does not reprehend them, or at least keeps silent, which is little and less for integral confession of faith, because from unanimous consent of this sort in such matter ecclesiastical tradition arises, which, always unbroken in the Catholic Church, suffices for rule of faith, as was proved above.

9. Wherefore, although we might concede to the king that what he professes in that reason, about the faith which he puts in the Creeds and the four Councils, is simply true, yet his reason does not rightly or sufficiently conclude; otherwise we will have to deny that many of those condemned as heretics by the Church were heretics. For Helivadius, and those who by Epiphanius, Haeres. 78, are called Antidicomarianitae, are numbered among the heretics by Augustine, Haeres. 56 & 84, although they put faith in the Scriptures, the Creeds, and the Councils, because they contended only that the most blessed Mary had by Joseph other sons after Christ; although that is not expressly against Scripture, the Creeds, or the four Councils, yet it is against the ecclesiastical tradition received by all Catholics. Next, we have a very good example in the Donatists, about whom Cyprian above said that, by persevering at the beginning in the same faith and religion and use of the sacraments, they made a schism by splitting the Church and usurping the chair and the primacy. But Augustine adds, bk. De Haeresibus on 69: "When obstinate defense was made firm, they turned a schism into a heresy," and so they became heretics. But, when explaining how they first became heretics, he adds: "As if the Church of Christ, because of the crimes of Caecilian, whether true or, as appeared more to the judges, false, perished from the whole earth where it was promised it was going to be, and remained in Africa in the party of Donatus, being extinguished in the other parts of the earth as by the contagion of communion." In which words Augustine not obscurely insinuated that the Donatists were made heretics by thinking badly of the Church, from which by schism they had separated. And yet the Donatists said that they believed the Scriptures and the Apostles' Creed for the other Creeds and the four General Councils had not yet come about when Donatus began; but afterwards they did hold a definite faith in them (as far as we collect from Cyprian and Augustine), and yet solely for the error by which they began to think badly of the Church they became heretics. But if someone were to consider rightly, he will find the same to have happened with the Protestants, and especially with the Anglican sect, which began through schism and the usurpation of the primacy and, afterwards, proceeded to the point that because of communion with the Roman Pontiff, on whom they have imposed crimes and errors, they pronounce that the visible Universal Church has defected.

Augustine adds besides about the Donatists: "They even dare to re-baptize Catholics, where they have further confirmed themselves to be heretics, although it has pleased the whole Catholic Church not to annul common baptism even in heretics themselves." But he says that through this is it further confirmed that they are heretics, because they have added a new heresy; which notwithstanding, Donatus might say that he admitted Scripture and the Creed and a single true baptism, which he contended was in his Church. But all this, if not in the same matter of baptism, one may in many other like things see in the Anglican sect. For after it began to think badly about the Church, it received and taught many things against the Church's universal sense and definition, by which it was further confirmed in heresy, as Augustine said a little above. We can besides bring as example all the heretics who have private and individual errors, and are reputed heretics by the Universal Church, although they say they believe, by badly interpreting them all, the Scriptures, the Creeds, and the four General Councils, or those Councils that had in their times been completed. Thus from these things is collected what is related by Origen (on Titus 3 in Pamphilus on the Apologia) about the various errors whose individual instances are enough to constitute a man a heretic. Again from these things is collected what Augustine, Epiphanius, and others relate about the Pelagians, Anabaptists, Monothelites, Jovinianists, and others, whom it is manifest were heretics; and the Protestants themselves do not doubt so to call many of them. Therefore the excuse is not sufficient when, notwithstanding, many things are believed against the Church, either by interpreting Scripture or the Creeds otherwise than the Church itself thinks or by condemning many things that have been approved and defined by the authority of the same Church. But that such is his faith the king of England not only does not deny, but even expressly affirms, by accusing the Catholic Church of various errors, for he objects to as many errors in it as he concedes he finds heresies in his own sect, and as many times does he teach that the Universal Church can err in faith and morals, which is heretical.

Summary: 1. The general rule or limit or boundary for belief which the king of England prescribes to his credulity. 2. Conjectures whereby the king could have been led to lay down the aforesaid rule of belief. 3. Solution to conjectures of this sort. An evasion is met. 4. Solution to the second conjecture. 5. Evasion of the king. Solution. 6. The third conjecture is dissolved. 7. The conclusion is drawn that it is against the faith to attribute false articles to the Roman Church. 8. Second reason. Nothing can come from the Roman Church without at the same time coming from the Catholic Church. The articles reprehended by the king contain the true and Catholic doctrine.

1. Before we refute the errors of the Anglican schism one by one in the next book, I have thought it worthwhile in the present chapter to propose and diligently examine certain words of the king, by which he prescribes certain boundaries, so to say, to his credulity and his agreement with the Catholic Church. Now the words are of this sort: "But if the workshop of the Roman Church has recently fashioned articles unheard of and unseen before the five hundredth year of Christ, I am not, I believe, to be condemned for a heretic if I do not accede to these novelties and recent inventions."

2. These words certainly contain a sort of general rule for belief, or a certain limit, measure, or boundary which the king prescribes to his credulity, namely, that it not stretch into articles of the faith propositions which were defined in the Church after the five hundredth year of Christ; but he seems to take as supposition that he believes everything which in the first five centuries the Church believed as de fide necessary. Nevertheless, he does not put this second affirmative part as expressly as the other negative one. For although a little later he seem also to profess it, yet the words are changed and more confused and ambiguous, lest perhaps he be constrained by them, as I will consider later by urging and requiring a certain solemn promise of the king's. Therefore now, about the other part, in which the king runs away from believing anything defined in the Church after the five hundredth year, I judge it necessary to demand of the most serene king a reason for this rule of belief or rather of non-belief. For it is not likely that he himself by his own decision has established the boundary of that time for himself, otherwise his whole faith will not only be merely human but will even lack prudent reason, because how much repugnance it has to the Christian faith is perspicuous to all; for giving a reason for which faith we should be ready, according to the warning of 1 Peter 3.15, which Augustine, epist.222, explained of giving a reason leading to belief. The king could, therefore, have been moved to thus limiting his faith, either because he decreed that he was to believe nothing except what by his sure knowledge he understands to be written in those canonical books which he admits; or because he believes that the Catholic Church was governed by the Holy Spirit in preserving the faith pure through five hundred years and no more; or because he is not speaking of the Catholic Church but of the Roman Church and says that at that time it erred. But these things are not sufficient to excuse the error of the limitation; nay, each and every one of them proves that the limitation is both against faith and against reason, as will be clear from examining the three said parts.

3. For the first reason is easily refuted from what was said above. Both because we showed that it is against faith and against reason to admit some books approved by the Church and to repudiate others, since none could possess the faith of the canon except through the authority of the Church, and this authority is the same in all of them, and, accordingly, if it is found false in one it becomes uncertain in all. Also because it would be against the principles of the faith and against natural reason to reduce faith to private spirit and preach it as certain and necessary for everyone. Besides there occurs here a special reason, that that private spirit can even suggest something to be believed about Scripture in a way other than it was believed in the first five centuries; and conversely, someone can approve some sense of Scripture which was also by some private spirit thought out after five hundred years of Christ, although it be contrary to the dogmas received in the five prior centuries; for there is no greater reason about one time than about another, when once someone persuades himself that faith is to be given to this private spirit. But if perhaps the king say that the spirit declares to him that, in the first five centuries, no error was made by the Church in understanding the Scriptures, and that afterwards there was error, certainly he cannot show where he reads this, so that, through his sure knowledge, he understands it to have been authentically and canonically written; and thus it is clear that that discrimination or limitation of times has without foundation been by the king himself prescribed. But if the king be led by human conjectures alone, we will at once show that none of them are of any weight or moment, hence he wrongly puts them before certain and indubitable faith.

4. I come to the second reason, and I ask in a like way whence it is evident that the Catholic Church was for the first five hundred years governed and preserved in the true and pure faith by the Holy Spirit. Certainly, from nowhere else than the promises of Christ, otherwise the thing is propounded willfully and without foundation. But Christ the Lord, as is proved from the Scriptures, did not make a period of five hundred years the fixed limit of his promise. Without foundation, therefore, in the Christian Faith, is a boundary of this sort made fixed. Nay truly, it is contrary to the foundation of the faith, because the promises of Christ are indefinite and, so to say, unbounded; therefore it is against the faith to prescribe them a boundary. Rather in fact in these promises the Lord often added about the promise of the Spirit, John 14.16, "that he may abide with you for ever," and about his own protection, Matthew 28.20, "to the end of the world." Therefore if, from the five hundredth year of Christ, the Church ceased to be protected by Christ and governed by the Holy Spirit, the promise has, for the greater part of the time, been false and faithless, and thus without cause is it believed that it was fulfilled in those earlier times; or conversely, if the faith of the Catholic Church is for this reason believed to be pure in the first five centuries, by the same faith must it be believed that it has lasted pure through the eleven following centuries.

5. Perhaps the king will say that in the first five centuries the Church preserved the true faith, not because it could not err, but because in fact it did not err, but it did err afterwards. But if he thus thinks of the primitive and ancient Church up to the five hundredth year, assuredly he does not believe by divine faith that the Church in all that time did not err, because nowhere is this revealed nor is it written in the canonical books, except insofar as the said promises are found in them and the testimony of Paul calling the Church the pillar and ground of the truth; which words are both without limitation of time and, because of the infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit, are pronounced so as never to be in error. If therefore they be not accepted in this sense, the king does have whence to believe by faith that the Catholic Church did not err in the first five centuries, or did not err in the Council of Nicea, or in the other three; nor even can he believe with certain faith the very Creed of the Councils of Nicea and Constantinople, at least as to the additions made in them and especially as to the article about the Catholic Church as it was enduring at those times. Therefore the king is led by human conjectures alone or histories or his own proper judgment in believing that in those centuries the Church did not err; and he could believe the same about the not much dissimilar nor unequal later centuries, if he had not from false teachers imbibed the contrary error from his cradle. Therefore, the limitation and distinction of times shows at once that such faith cannot be Catholic, nor founded on the divine word.

6. The third reason, indeed, or excuse (if the king really asserts that he is not speaking of the Catholic Church but of the Roman) was more than sufficiently rejected in chapter 5, because neither was the Roman Church ever separated from the Catholic, nor was the Catholic Church, once it had been founded in the Roman, ever divided from it. Besides, if the king is speaking of the Roman Church after the five hundredth year of Christ, he should go on also proclaiming the same things about the same Church for the five previous centuries; both because he only speaks of the “workshop of the Roman Church” in that whole opinion, and also because his opinion would otherwise not be sufficiently consistent with itself or firm. Therefore, he must concede that in those five hundred years the Roman Church did not err, and that a false article did not proceed from its workshop; for those articles, which he reprehends as novelties and recent, he confesses himself were unheard of in the first five centuries; therefore he confesses that he has nothing to reprehend the Roman Church for in those first five centuries, and that accordingly, at least for the same centuries, it did not err. But, with this posited, we will confirm, by going over, the discussion just completed. For the Roman Church is either believed not to have erred in those first five centuries because, on account of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, it could not err, or because in fact, and as if by chance, it did not err. The first member, though it be very true, I know the king must not admit, lest he attribute so great a prerogative and signal privilege to the Roman Church for even a brief time, especially because, if he wishes to speak consistently and he recognizes it before one time, he can in no way refuse it for another time. Because, for whatever time it be admitted, it must be founded on the promise of Christ, but the words of Christ, “I will pray for thee, etc.,” and these, “the gates of hell shall not prevail against it,” do not have any limitation of time but, being proffered indefinitely, comprehend all future times.

The king will therefore deny, as I believe, that the Roman Church ever had this privilege, and he will the more choose the other member, namely, that by the fact itself it so happened that in those five hundred years the Roman Church did not err, although it did not have the privilege of not erring, and consequently he believes, not with certain faith, but with human conjecture and free opinion, that in those five centuries the Roman Church did not err. Hence, further, it follows that the same must be asserted about the Catholic Church; which, that it is absurd, was already made plain and remains so. But the consequence is plain; because in all those five hundred years the Catholic Church was believing what the Roman Church believed, and those articles which proceeded from the workshop of the Roman Church proceeded from the workshop of the Catholic Church. For its Pontiff was, in the four General Councils of those times (which Councils can most be said to be the workshop of the Catholic Church), head and presider, and from his confirmation and approval they had the strongest firmness, as by the acts of the same Councils is clearly manifest, and as will on a more suitable occasion be said below; therefore, there cannot be a greater certitude about the purity of the faith of the Catholic Church for that time than about the firmness of the faith of the Roman Church. Hence, if this is reduced to human opinion, their whole faith will totter, and the authority of the first four Councils will be merely human, and the Athanasian Creed will have no authority other than human. Because the greatest authority it has it received from the Roman Church, and we inferred above the same about the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Creed. Add, finally, that the Fathers of that time always attributed, not to human industry, but to the assistance of the divine Spirit, the firmness and purity of the faith of the Roman See, and attributed the perpetual succession of its bishops as if to the miracle of divine protection, as we have recently testified from Cyprian, Augustine, and others; and it is very clear from the decrees and epistles of the Pontiffs of the same See and of those times, but about all of these supposition was made in the discussion that they had preserved the faith pure, and among them were many very holy martyrs and very close to the apostles, as Clement, Anacletus, and the like. But others were very wise and holy confessors, as Leo I, Innocent, and others.

7. From which, finally, we conclude that it is against all faith to attribute to the Roman Church its being, after the five hundredth year of Christ, the workshop of false articles of the faith. First, because it was shown that the purity of the faith, which it had in the first five centuries, was preserved, not by human counsel alone, but by divine privilege; but this privilege was not taken away nor lost in the five hundredth year of Christ; both because this is neither proved nor can be proved, and there is, against the most ancient privilege, granted from the lips of Christ himself, no presumption unless it is be proved; and because most of all the perpetuity of that privilege is sufficiently proved from the Scriptures and from the common tradition of the Fathers, as was done above, and we will perhaps add something in book 3.

8. Second, because, even after the first five centuries, the workshop of the Roman Church cannot be separated from the workshop of the Catholic Church; but to affirm that from the workshop of the Catholic Church false articles of the faith have ever proceeded is plainly heretical, because it is nothing other than to say that the Church of Christ has lost the Catholic Faith, and hence that it has perished; therefore one no less errs by thinking in this way of the Roman Church. The first proposition will be made clear with one or other example. For the fifth or sixth General Synod was not less the workshop of the Catholic and at the same time Roman Church than was the third or the fourth; therefore if the Roman Church could err, or did err, after those five hundred years, the same can be thought of the whole Catholic Church. From which opinion King James seems to be not far distant, for on account of that cause he does not receive the General Councils celebrated after the five hundredth year of Christ. But far otherwise did Gregory the apostle of England think of the fifth synod, bk.1 Register epist.24 at the end, where, when he had said that he receives and venerates the first four Councils just like the four books of the holy Gospel, he subjoins: "The fifth Council too I venerate equally." And later he speaks about all five when he says: “All the persons, indeed, whom the aforesaid venerable Councils reject, I reject; whom they venerate, I embrace; because, as long as they were by universal consent established, he destroys himself and not them whoever presumes either to loose what they bind, or to bind what they loose; whoever, therefore, is of other mind, let him be anathema. But whoever receives the faith of those synods, peace be upon him, etc.” Let the king of England, then, fear the anathema pronounced by the most holy Gregory, and let him ponder there his reason, “as long as they were by universal consent established;” for Gregory evidently concludes that it is against all reason, where the same cause of sure authority is so manifest in the Councils, to recognize it in some and not in others merely because of the difference of times. Which reason is expounded excellently by Bellarmine when comparing the sixth synod with the third, in the said ch.7, to which nothing can be added.

And in the same way all following times can be run through, for always the Roman Church and the Catholic were conjoined, or rather were one, and therefore never did anything proceed from the workshop of the Roman Church which did not emanate from the Catholic Church. Neither, then, can anyone attribute the blot of falsity to the workshop of the Roman Church without attributing the same to the Catholic Church, or without saying that for so many centuries there was no Catholic Church in the world, or at any rate without affirming that after the five hundredth year of Christ it lay hidden and was made invisible, which are portents and monstrosities in themselves incredible and contrary, not only to the divine Scriptures, but also to reason, nay to sense too, as was sufficiently discussed above.

But if anyone perhaps feigns that it has, from these things, at most been proved that from the General Councils, and hence from the workshop of the Catholic Church, there have not proceeded false articles, yet others were invented by the Roman Pontiffs without the said Councils, about which the king of England could have been speaking, and that in this way the Roman Church is, in his opinion, separated from the Catholic; let him notice that this response begs another question, namely whether the Pope might define a matter of faith without a General Council, which now we do not need; both because the king without doubt is not speaking in this sense, because he also does not admit the later Councils, and many of the articles which he reprehends were approved in General Councils, as we will see; and also because, though we grant that some of the said articles were not in the beginning introduced by General Councils, nevertheless they were received and approved by the universal assent of the Catholic Church, and so are not separated from the consent of the whole Catholic Church; and finally because, by running through the individual articles that the king touches on, we will show openly that they are reprehended without cause, nay rather that they contain the true faith, whether they were legitimately defined by General Councils or by the authority of the Supreme Pontiffs. Hence it could, on the contrary, rather be shown, by the by and as by a certain induction, that the Roman See, which has hitherto not erred in its definitions, in no way can err, whether the definition be made with a General Council or by the Pontiff alone speaking ex cathedra. About which point we will touch on some things in book 3, although a proper consideration and disputation about it is neither necessary nor, as I said, opportune in this place.

Sum and conclusion of the whole book with an address to the king of England.

A correct, full, and secure way and reason of finding the truth and the Catholic Faith we have, for our little measure, tried to show and, with signs sure and founded on the Word of God, to make clear; and since neither has the Catholic Faith ever strayed, or can stray, outside the true Church of Christ, nor has this unique spouse of Christ ever strayed, or can stray, from the sincere truth of the faith, to this unique mistress thereof we have, like to the sun shining in the world, pointed as with a finger; and, that it is not other than the one founded on the See of Peter, we have, partly with the written partly with the unwritten word of God, provided proof. Hence it was as a consequence necessary that we should give conviction that the error of the Anglican sect cannot be excused from the note of heresy; which, with the liberty that becomes a Catholic doctor, and with the modesty that is due to the royal majesty, we have not doubted to do, mindful of that most prudent opinion of the Pontiff Gelasius to the emperor Anastasius: "Far be it, I beg, from a Roman, or a Christian, prince that a truth made evident to his senses he should judge to be an injury."

It remains for the most serene King James (which I humbly and earnestly ask) not to become obdurate when hearing the word of God, but, all human affection set aside, to perpend, according to the sharpness of his genius wherewith he is endowed, the antiquity of our Catholic Roman Church but the novelty of the sect which he embraces, the firmness of that, the instability of this, to take up the doctors of that, most wise and for sanctity and antiquity venerable, to dread the obscure and novel impostors of this, for so may it happen, as I desire, that he should upon the truth of that, but the pretense of this, look with a clearness greater than light, and should with Hilary begin to say: "Finally has the age now of this world brought forth for us these most impious doctors; the faith which thou, O God, hast taught had aged masters. Therefore let me, those ones all unheard, so believe in thee that from henceforth I should be always thine." And thus may it happen, most prudent king, that the title of defender of the Catholic Faith, in which you rightly glory, may be by you deserved and, with a true and just title, possessed; for our kind Mother the Church does not envy you this name (which you are not ignorant was given by pontifical donation) but longs for it to be unconquered; if, however, to those things, which we have hitherto said, you turn your mind, surely you will understand that, not by resisting the Roman Church, but rather by humbly obeying it, will you obtain that title. For if you persist in attacking the Church you necessarily waste away your strength; for as Chrysostom said: "If you make war on a man, perhaps you will conquer, or perchance you will be conquered; the Church no force can conquer, for heaven and earth will pass away but the words of Christ will not pass away." But if you begin to embrace the sincere faith of the holy Church, and to love dearly its glory and purity, and if you retain it constantly, then you will obtain eternal the true title of defender of the Catholic Faith. And, so that this happen, we urgently implore the divine majesty; and we have before your majesty gladly laid this our work, whatever sort it be, and we proceed, drawn by this hope, to show the other things, wherein your ministers have imposed on you.

BOOK TWO

CONTENTS

BOOK 2: ON THE PARTICULAR ERRORS IN THE MATTER OF CATHOLIC FAITH WHICH THE KING OF ENGLAND PROFESSES

Preface

Chapter 1: On the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrosanct sacrament of the Eucharist.
Summary: 1. Five errors of the king of England about the sacrosanct sacrament of the Eucharist. 2. First conclusion. 3. The assertion is shown from the ancient fathers. 4. An evasion of the heretics is met. What Ambrose understands by the figure of the body. 5. To represent is the same as to make re-present. 6. Augustine is vindicated from an improper interpretation. 7. By figurative signification Augustine understands mode of sacramental eating. Places in which Augustine teaches the Catholic truth simply. 8. The same is shown from the Greek Fathers.

Chapter 2: The substance of bread and wine does not remain under the consecrated appearances.
Summary: 1. From the Fathers it is shown that this truth was believed in the first five centuries. 2. An evasion of heretics is rejected.

Chapter 3: On the truth of transubstantiation.
Summary: 1. Transubstantiation is shown to have been held in all centuries. 2. The name of transubstantiation is ancient and was also introduced by the greatest authority. The Council of Florence, in place of transubstantiation, used its definition.

Chapter 4: The Eucharist is with the adoration of worship (latria) suitably adored and elevated for this purpose and borne round in procession.
Summary: 1. It is shown that Christ the Lord is to be adored with the cult of worship. 2. This article is shown from the Fathers to be wrongly reckoned among the recent ones by the king. 3. The elevation of the Eucharist is very laudable and ancient. 4. The bearing round of the Eucharist in supplications is shown not to be blameworthy but rather very laudable. Reason taken from the end. 5. An evasion of heretics is refuted. The Church is able to establish whatever is suitable to the greater cult of God. 6. In the beginning of the Church this bearing round was not useful.

Chapter 5: On the communion of the laity under the appearances of bread alone.
Summary: 1. The king wrongly finds fault with the communion of the laity under one kind. Objection of the heretics. 2. Solution. In the use of the Eucharist under one kind two things are to be considered. To the sacrificing priest communion under one kind is not permitted. 3. Communion in the appearances of bread alone was in use from the beginning of the Church. Serapio as an old man received the Eucharist in the appearances of bread alone. 4. Ambrose similarly. 5. To take the Eucharist home with them was once permitted to the faithful. 6. This mode of communicating was not forbidden by Christ. 7. Christ the Lord communicates the whole effect of the sacrament under any kind. 8. There is no precept given about communicating under both kinds. Evasion of heretics. The evasion is rejected and the true sense of the precept about performing the Eucharist is stated. 9. A place in Luke 22 is brought forward as objection. It is explained. 10. A place in John 6 is brought forward as objection. It is explained. 11. The exposition handed down is confirmed. 12. The same is confirmed from the Fathers. 13. The same sense is proved by the custom of the Church. 14. The very ancient custom of the infirm communicating under the appearances of bread has also the same sense. 15. To a sick person, unable to swallow, a host dipped in unconsecrated wine was administered. 16. To receive in sacrifice, or from superstition, the body without the blood is forbidden. 17. The established truth is confirmed by reason.

Chapter 6: On Private Masses.
Summary: 1. The king abhors private masses. The mass, even if it is done in secret, is a true sacrifice and of itself a public act. 2. The mass as to its substance is always a public action. 3. Various ways in which a mass can be said to be private. First from defect of an assembly of people. 4. A mass private in this way is altogether reprehensible. 5. No ecclesiastical precept obliges to sacrificing in the presence of many persons. 6. Secondly, a mass is said to be private because only the priest communicates in it. 7. Thirdly a mass is said to be private from circumstances of time and place. These circumstances do not render it illicit. 8. The custom of celebrating in private places is confirmed by miracles. 9. The custom of celebrating mass at any opportune time is confirmed by examples.

Chapter 7: On the errors about the cult and invocation of the Blessed Virgin noted in the king's Preface.

Summary: 1. What the difference is between the words 'honoring', 'adoring', and 'venerating'. 2. Several kinds of adoration. Worship (latria). Service (dulia). With what adoration the Blessed Virgin is to be adored. 3. What the king argues against in the veneration due to the Blessed Virgin, and his objection. The objection gathered from the words of the king. Satisfaction is made to the objection. The true sense of Nazianzen is reported. 4. King James argues against the invocation of the Blessed Virgin. Foundation of King James. His triple objection against the mode of invoking the Blessed Virgin. 5. This mode of invoking the Blessed Virgin is very ancient in the Church. 6. Response to the words of the king. The beatific vision consists very well with knowledge and love of creatures. The Blessed Virgin can intercede for us without losing her felicity. 7. The first objection against the mode of invoking the Blessed Virgin is dissolved. The Church does not attribute to the Blessed Virgin command over Christ the Lord. 8. The second objection is solved. 9. Satisfaction is made to the third objection; and declaration is given of how the Blessed Virgin repels demons. 10. How the Blessed Virgin destroys heresies.

Chapter 8: On the things noted in the king's Preface about the cult of the saints.

Summary: 1. Scripture and the Fathers testify that there should be a cult of the saints. 2. King James recoils from the word 'adore'. 3. King James seems to embellish the saints with civil honor rather than religious. The Catholic Church venerates the saints with a holy and religious cult. 4. Proof from the Fathers that the custom of honoring the saints with a holy cult is very ancient. 5. Tacit objection of the king. 6. Satisfaction is made to the king's objection, and it is shown that there should be a cult of all the saints approved by the Church. 7. The custom of celebrating the feast days of the martyrs draws its origin from the apostles. 8. On what authority the Church rests in the cult of the saints.

Chapter 9: On the invocation of saints.

Summary: 1. By what conjectures King James looks down on the invocation of saints. 2. The antiquity of the custom of invoking saints is deduced from the Fathers. 3. Augustine makes satisfaction to the objection of heretics. 4. Other testimonies from the Greek Fathers. 5. Before the Lord's advent the saints were not invoked, and for what cause. 6. The prayer of one person for another is pleasing to God. 7. To ask another to pray on one's behalf is a holy thing. 8. By parity of reasoning the conclusion is drawn that it is licit to pray to saints who have finished life. 9. The invocation of saints is neither bad nor prohibited. 10. The objection of the king against this doctrine. Solution. Christ the Lord is invoked as Redeemer, but the saints as mediators to him. 11. A second objection from the letter of St. Paul to the Colossians. Solution. 12. The sense of Paul. 13. Third objection. 14. Response. 15. Someone who thinks badly of the invocation of saints is not benefited by invoking God through Christ. 16. The invocation of some saint can sometimes be necessary for salvation. 17. The invocation of saints is safer and more useful. 18. An evasion of heretics is excluded.

Chapter 10: On the custody and veneration of holy relics.

Summary: 1. What cult King James attributes to the relics of saints. 2. That the relics of saints are adored by Catholics with the cult of worship is falsely invented by Protestants. 3. The calumny of heretics is refuted from the Fathers. 4. Catholics venerate saints and their relics with the same cult. 5. The relics of saints are to be approached with a higher than civil cult. 6. The veneration of relics is pleasing to God. 7. The same truth is confirmed by miracles. 8. By the relics of saints demons are put to flight. 9. The public display of parts of relics is ancient and holy. 10. Relics, although not parts of saints, claim for themselves the same veneration.

Chapter 11: On the true veneration or adoration of holy images.

Summary: 1. England is stirring up the heresy of the iconoclasts. 2. The faithful never pray to images. To pray before an image and to supplicate an image are very different from each other. 3. Catholics recognize in images no intrinsic sanctity. 4. Images are said to be holy from something extrinsic. 5. To give the cult of worship [latria] to images is prohibited. 6. The adoration of images had its beginning from the apostles. 7. An evasion is refuted. 8. The end of images. Prayer in no way tends to the image, but adoration can deal proximately with it. 9. Only intellectual creatures receive on their own account the honor of cult. 10. The veneration of images is concluded to be as ancient as the use of them. 11. The veneration of sacred images is approved by miracles. 12. Insulting images is a very grave sacrilege. 13. Natural reason commends the veneration of images.

Chapter 12: Satisfaction is made to the objections of the king against the veneration of images.

Summary: 1. King James' words of astonishment against the veneration of images. 2. First, second, and third objection. 3. Satisfaction is made to the first objection. The veneration of images is not prohibited by any positive divine precept. 4. There is no natural precept to prohibit the veneration of images. From the places in Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5 it is shown that no conclusion follows. 5. Satisfaction is made to the second objection. The veneration of images is very far distant from idolatry. 6. For what reason an idol is said to be nothing. 7. The adoration of some creature is consonant with Scripture. 8. The third objection is met. 9. Satisfaction is made to the second example.

Chapter 13: On the images of God as God

Summary: 1. Objection of the king against adoration of the image of God. The image of God is double. 2. The proper and formal image of God cannot be described. 3. A description of the metaphorical image of God is not evil and not prohibited. 4. Exposition of the places of Scripture speaking about the images of God. 5. Instance of the king. Explanation.

Chapter 14: On the adoration of the cross of Christ.

Summary: 1. Objections of King James against the adoration of the cross. 2. Dilemma of the king attacking the adoration of Christ's cross. First, second, and third confirmation. 3. No power of accomplishing miracles has from contact with the body of Christ on the cross been derived. 4. The Catholic doctrine about the adoration of the cross of Christ is explained. 5. The dilemma of the king is met. 6. Response to the first, to the second, and to the third confirmation.

Chapter 15: On the error about purgatory.

Summary: 1. King James mocks purgatory. First and second foundation. 2. The error of Protestants about the redemption of Christ and about the justification of the impious. 3. The application of the merits of Christ to men is not done through the non-imputation of sins. 4. Some sins also exist in just men, which do not take away grace. 5. Not any sin at all cuts off friendship with God. 6. It is shown from the Fathers that the article about purgatory is very ancient. 7. After the day of judgment there will remain no place for purgatory. 8. Indulgences on account of the merits of Christ are lavished on the Church by God.

Chapter 16: On errors about the rites and benedictions of the Church.

Summary: 1. The blessing of bells and other like benedictions seem trivialities to Protestants. 2. The institution and use of bells. 3. Use of this sort was introduced in the Church over one thousand years ago. 4. It is shown that nothing can be faulted in the blessing of bells. 5. The objection of heretics is solved. 6. Instance.

Sum and conclusion of the whole book with an address to the king of England.

Preface

Hitherto we have spoken of the true foundations of our faith on which the whole Catholic doctrine is, under God, supported. On these the rest can easily be built, if indeed he who hears the Church also hears God, but he who spurns the Scripture, as handed on and explained by the Church, spurns its authority also. For the Church is the pillar and ground of the truth, and, as Paul Orosius very gravely says, bk.7 ch.33, “he who attacks it is an enemy; and he who is not joined to it is an alien.” But because the most serene king of England strives greatly to shatter the things that have been built on this foundation, we will try, to the best of our ability and our grasp, to defend and confirm them; and therefore not all the dogmas of the faith must be treated, but those that from page 44 of his Preface the king attacks in his confession; nor will we touch on all of these but those that seem to be chief and have bearing on the cause. The order will not be his but that of doctrine and we will begin from what is chief; the other things we will pursue in the due order that I have said. Only those things that pertain to the primacy and to Ecclesiastical monarchy, to the exemption of clerics, and to the Antichrist, will we remit to subsequent books, because they demand their own and more extended disputation.

Chapter 1: On the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrosanct sacrament of the Eucharist.

Summary: 1. Five errors of the king of England about the sacrosanct sacrament of the Eucharist. 2. First conclusion. 3. The assertion is shown from the ancient fathers. 4. An evasion of the heretics is met. What Ambrose understands by the figure of the body. 5. To represent is the same as to make re-present. 6. Augustine is vindicated from an improper interpretation. 7. By figurative signification Augustine understands mode of sacramental eating. Places in which Augustine teaches the Catholic truth simply. 8. The same is shown from the Greek Fathers.

1. The most serene king of England, desiring to show that the title of defender of the faith, in which he desires to glory, is true and has a foundation in reality itself, has put forward a confession of his faith whereby is evidently proved how much he errs from the truth of the Catholic Faith. For after what he had said in general about the foundations of the faith, he numbers one by one several articles of the Roman Faith and rebuts them as recent and novel, nay as pernicious too. And having reviewed several things, to which we will afterwards return, he in this way subjoins: “Among these articles I number private Masses in which the sacrificing priest bears the person of the people and of the priest at the same time. Among these too there is mutilation of the sacrament, whereby a half part of it has been taken away from the laity; transubstantiation; elevation for the purpose of adoration; processions carrying around the sacrament during supplications.” In these words five errors are contained, which I will review in different order so that we may begin from the foundation. The first is that in the consecration of the Eucharist transubstantiation does not take place; the second is that the Eucharist is not to be adored and that therefore it is a corrupt custom to elevate it, for the sake of adoration, in the sacrifice; the third is that the usage of carrying round the sacrament during supplications is an abuse; the fourth is that the custom of the laity communicating only in the appearances of the bread is to be condemned as against divine right; the fifth is that private Masses are not to be admitted. The first of these errors supposes two others, one of them indeed the chief in this matter and the foundation of the rest. It is that Christ the Lord is not really and substantially present under the sacramental appearances of the Eucharist; as I reasonably believe this to be the opinion of the king, who is said to profess, in chief part, the sect of Calvin; but it seems that the king has been made ashamed of that man's infamy and therefore has blushed to confess in express words an error already long ago condemned. The second error is included in the denial of transubstantiation, namely that after the consecration the substance of bread and wine remain; for if the substance of bread and wine were to remain there, even if the flesh and blood of Christ the Lord were to become present under the same appearances, the assertion of transubstantiation would without any doubt be false.

2. So as to lay down, then, the first and chief foundation of this mystery, we assert that according to the Catholic Faith the body and blood of Christ the Lord must be believed to be truly and really contained under the legitimately consecrated appearances of bread and wine. This faith cannot be said by the king to be novel and recent, nor to have come from human or unwritten tradition alone; for it is founded on the express words of Christ related by the three Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and by Paul, namely: "This is my body," and "This is my blood," or, which is the same, "This is the cup of my blood" or "in my blood." Nor need we delay in reporting and refuting the tropes, figures, and metaphors wherewith the Protestants have tried to corrupt these very clear words; both because, as I said, I have not assumed the province of refuting these controversies on set purpose; and also because, as Tertullian warned, to dispute from the words alone and from private spirit about the sense of some Scripture with heretics, who revere neither the Church nor the Fathers, is useless. Although they could most from this place be convinced how vain the private spirit is they are led by in expounding the Scriptures so as not to contradict their own opinions. For in these words, considered in themselves, there is no trace of figurative speech; nor does the occasion of establishing the new testament, on which Christ pronounced them, permit metaphor; for the prudent are on like occasions not wont, especially without sufficient explication, to speak metaphorically and obscurely. Add that Christ the Lord added rather words that are sufficiently able to exclude metaphor; for he says: "This is my body which is given for you," and "This is my blood which is shed for many." Paul too says, 1 Corinthians 11.27: "Whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." And later, v.29: "[he] eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body." Lastly, the concord and conformity of these words of Christ with the promise he made, John 6, and with his preaching and the figures of this mystery and with other words of Paul, 1 Corinthians 10, greatly confirm and illustrate the same sense.

3. But passing over, as I said, disputation about the Scriptures alone, enough now is it for us to reply to the king that this faith is not new, nor was the aforesaid sense of Christ's words discovered after the five hundredth year of Christ, but has been handed on by all the Fathers of the first five centuries who touched on the words of Christ or explained the mystery. Of which truth we will bring forward, not all the witnesses who could be adduced, but those who are sufficient; for he who does not hear them would not even believe if a thousand were brought forward. The first witness, then, is Hilary, bk.8 De Trinitate, where he first prefaces: "We must in the things of God not speak in human or secular sense, etc." And after having adduced the words of Christ in John 6 he concludes: "About the truth of the flesh and blood there has no place been left for ambiguity, for now, by both the profession of the Lord himself and by our faith, it is truly flesh and truly blood, and when taken and drunk they make us to be in Christ and Christ to be in us. Can it be that this is not the truth? Let it not be true, to be sure, for those who deny that Christ Jesus is true God." Calvin, then, for whom this is not true, has no less impiously than ignorantly denied the truth and consequently the divinity of Christ.

4. A second very grave and rich witness is Ambrose, bk.4 De Sacramentis ch.4, where, among other things, he says: "This bread is bread before the words of the sacraments; when consecration is added, from the bread the flesh of Christ comes to be." And next, so as to take away astonishment, and to dissolve with a single word the ratiocinations of infidels fetched from vain philosophy, he subjoins: "When the time comes to accomplish the venerable sacrament, the priest does not use now his own words but the words of Christ; therefore the word of Christ accomplishes the sacrament. Which word of Christ? Surely the one whereby all things were made, etc." And afterwards, in ch.6, he so explains the words of Christ and concludes: "Ought we then to have doubt about his faith and testimony?" But perhaps there will not be lacking a heretic to try to inflict violence on the very clear words of Ambrose, because at the beginning of his fifth chapter he relates that the priest in the Mass says the following words: "Make this offering consecrated, reasonable, acceptable, because it is made into the figure of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ." For, because he said "into the figure," an impudent man may turn all the other things to a figure, though it be in open conflict with them. But the true and clear sense is that, through consecration, the body of Christ is truly made to be under the appearances, whereby also the appearances are made to be a sign of the body and blood which they contain under them, and this Ambrose called being made into the figure, that is, into the sacrament of the body and blood lying hid there but truly and really existing. And this fact is to be noted by the by to explain the rather obscure words, if they sometimes turn up, of the Fathers, which words are to be explained from places of theirs that are clear and contain the full doctrine, and not, conversely, the full doctrine satisfactorily explained elsewhere to be obfuscated because of one obscure word. And the same sense and the whole truth of the mystery are explained by the same Ambrose in his book De Initiandis ch.9. But the Catholic Church, to avoid the calumny, does not use that mode of speaking in the canon of the Mass, "made into the figure etc.," but it says: "so that it may become for us the body and blood of your most dear Son, Our Lord Jesus Christ."

5. Let the third witness be Jerome expounding the words of Christ in Matthew 26, where he thus speaks: "After the Passover in type was completed and he had eaten the flesh of the lamb with his disciples, he took bread, which strengthens the heart of man, and moved on to the true sacrament of Passover, so that, as in his figure Melchizedek, the priest of the Most High God, had made an offering of bread and wine, he himself too might represent the truth of his body and blood." Where also perhaps a heretic will spring up to interpret the word 'represent' into some fiction or metaphor. But the force of the word and the mind of Jerome are clear; for to represent is the same as to make a thing present, especially a thing that was before promised or was predicted as future or was longed for. Which fact we can expound from the words of Seneca, epist.95 at the beginning: "You seek from me that, what I had said I must do on your day, I should represent and write to you etc.," that is, that I should fulfill by writing etc. Sufficiently suited to the thing are also the words of Cicero, Philippic 5: "I would gladly have offered my body if freedom could, by my death, be represented to the city," that is, restored or made to be present. In this way, then, did Jerome say that Christ, by representing, that is, by making present, the truth of his body and blood, and by offering it thus present to the Father, he had fulfilled what, in the offering of bread and wine by Melchizedek and in the immolation of the Paschal lamb, had been prefigured. And this true sense is more explained by the same Jerome, in epist.150 to Hedibias question 2, saying: "Let us hear that the bread, which the Lord broke and gave to his disciples, is the body of the Lord, since he himself says to them: 'Take, and eat, this is my body.'" And later: "Moses did not give us the true bread, but the Lord Jesus did, himself the guest and the banquet, himself eating and the one eaten; we drink his blood and without him we cannot drink, and every day in his sacrifices we tread out the red wine from the fruit of the true vine." "Than which words," says Marianus Victor, "nothing more lucid and more clear could be said about the truth of the body and blood of Christ." But it is further confirmed by the same Jerome when he says in other places that the priests make the body of Christ with their holy mouth, epist.1 to Heliodorus, epist.85 to Evagrius, and almost the same on Malachi 1, and on Galatians 5 he says: "I know moreover that the wine is consecrated into the blood of Christ." And best on the words of Titus 1.8: "But a lover of hospitality etc.," he says: "There is as much difference between the shew-bread and the body of Christ as there is between a shadow and bodies, between image and reality, between patterns of future things and the things themselves which are figured by the patterns."

6. Let the fourth witness be St. Augustine, who in innumerable places teaches this truth. But he seems to me to be perspicuous, and to admit of no tergiversation, in Contio 1 on Psalms 33 [34], where, after a very extensive discussion of the sacrifice of the Lord's body and blood "which the faithful and those who have read the Gospel know, and which is now diffused through the whole world," he says that, "in it Christ has changed his face from his humility," that is, "because the word, which is the bread of angels, is made flesh, is become the bread of men, because in his body and blood he wished our salvation to be." After these, I say, which he pursues in many words when explaining the truth of this mystery, he at last adapts to this mystery the words of 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 21, as he himself reads them, v.4, "He was borne in his own hands," and he says: "Who is carried in his own hands? In the hands of others a man can be carried, but no one is carried in his own hands; how it may be understood of David himself according to the letter we do not find, but in Christ we find it. For Christ is borne in his own hands when, commending his own very body, he says: 'This is my body;' for he was bearing that body in his own hands; humility itself belongs to Our Lord Jesus Christ, humility itself is much commended to men." Where greatly to be weighed is what he says, that in this mystery and in Christ alone is it fulfilled, according to the letter, that he carried himself in his own hands; for when he says 'according to the letter', he excludes figure and trope. For to carry himself in his own hands in figure or image is no miracle, nor a great work, nor proper to Christ; for David could carry himself in his hands in his own image. Neither too would by such a work the humility of Christ be much commended, but his humility was very great because the Word made flesh became also the bread of life so that it might truly and really be eaten by men. And so rightly does Guitmund urge this place, bk.3 De Sacramento at the beginning. But one must note too that Augustine in Contio 2 on the same psalm added this phrase, “in a certain way,” when he says, “he took into his own hands what the faithful know, and he himself carried himself in a certain way, when he said: ‘This is my body.’” Which phrase some man perhaps among those who live in shadows might maliciously seize on and overturn the whole truth. But there could scarcely be a blindness so great as to suppose Augustine said contrary things in so brief a discussion, or that he added something which would destroy the whole mystery he had explained. Therefore by that phrase ‘in a certain way’ (which in my judgment is better read in separation and with the force of a substantive than as a combined phrase and adverbially) Augustine only wished to signify that Christ did not carry himself in his own hands in a bodily, that is, a visible way, and by feeling and holding in his own hands the weight of his body, but in a mystical way, yet in a true and a real and a so singular way as could not be saved by mere figure or image. And this is very much to be observed in the doctrine of Augustine, that he often conjoins those two things, namely the truth of the body with the sacramental and mystical mode, and therefore the one is not to be excluded, or badly explained, because of the other.

And thus there is a very good testimony of the same Augustine in tract. De Cataclysmo, where he first says that, “blood and water, which flowed from the side of Christ, are the twin sacraments of Mother Church.” Which he expounds by adding: “This blood inebriates the mind so that I forget the love of the world, etc.” And more clearly later, when expounding the words, Exodus 16.19 “Let no man leave of it till the morning,” he says: “This now is done, for the lamb is eaten in the night of this age, so that, when the morning has come which will not have evening, the sacrifice of the image of the lamb may no longer be offered, but that the lamb himself, whom we daily immolate, eat, and whose blood we drink, we may find there to be him, the perfect priest, who, it is clear, was slain here for our salvation.” Which place can also suffer cavil because of the words, “the sacrifice of the image of the lamb.” To obviate this difficulty someone might perhaps understand those words of the sacrifice of the type, the paschal lamb, for the following words are expressly about our sacrifice, “the lamb himself, whom we daily immolate, eat.” But the exposition does not square with the context. For Augustine had said: “This now is done, for the lamb is eaten in the night of this age.” Where he openly embraces the time too of the law of grace, for he also adds that this age endures up to that morning which will not have evening, that is, to that state of glory where we will find (as he subjoins) the lamb, the perfect priest, “who, it is clear, was killed here for our salvation.” And on that morning, he says, there is no longer to be offered the sacrifice “of the image of the lamb,” because, namely, during this age it is always being offered. Therefore the sacrifice of the Eucharist too he calls the sacrifice of the image of the lamb. But by this he does not exclude the truth of the presence of the lamb whom he affirms is daily immolated and eaten, but because this sacrifice is not bloody but mystical, and because in this way it is the offering of an invisible lamb under a visible appearance, so that it may also be a remembrance of the same lamb visibly immolated, therefore he calls this mystical sacrifice the sacrifice of the image of the lamb, that is, a sacrifice representing the lamb slain for us, according to the words of the same Lamb, 1 Corinthians 11.25: “This do ye, as oft as ye do it, in remembrance of me.”

7. When a like observation is applied, there is a sufficiently open testimony of the same Augustine, in bk.2 Contra Adversarium Legis et Prophetarum ch.9, where he says: "The Mediator of God and men, Jesus Christ, giving us his flesh to eat and his blood to drink, we receive with faithful heart and mouth, though it seem more horrible to eat human flesh than to destroy it, to drink human blood than to shed it." These words are very express. But he adds at once a certain general rule, which the Calvinists can abuse, when he says: "In all the Sacred Scriptures, according to the rule of sound faith, if anything said or done is expounded figuratively about things or words of any sort which are contained in the sacred pages, let that exposition not be taken contemptuously but heard wisely." But let them pay attention to and understand the words, "according to the rule of sound faith," which is the Catholic Church, the unanimous consent of the Fathers, and agreement with other Scriptures and mysteries of the faith, the propriety of the words being retained where it can be done without unsuitability. And thus, in the aforesaid words of "eating the body and drinking the blood of the Lord," Augustine admits the figurative and mystical signification as to the mode of eating and drinking, namely the sacramental mode, whereby the horror that there could have been in such eating and drinking is taken away; for this figurative signification is according to the rule of faith and necessary for the truth of the mystery. Yet Augustine does not admit a figurative signification as to the, so to say, substantial eating of Christ, and therefore he adds: "whom we receive with faithful heart and mouth," because such a figure is neither necessary nor according to the rule of faith, rather it is contrary to it. And according to this rule Augustine, in tract. 26 & 27 on John, expounds at large the words of Christ, 6.53: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," together with the words, v.63: "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." But in many other places the same holy doctor simply affirms that Christ has given us his body to eat and his blood to drink, as in his exposition on Psalms 33 [34] near the end, and Contio 1 on Psalms 48 [49] near the beginning, and Enarratio on Psalms 65 [66] before the middle, and his exposition of Psalms 93 near the beginning, and Sermo 2 'De Verbis Apostoli' ch.1, and bk.50 Homiliarum the final one, elsewhere bk. De Utilitat. Poenitent. ch.4, and bk.2 Contra Litteras Petiliani ch.37, and bk.1 De Peccatorum Meritis ch.24, where he says: "Without baptism and the body and blood of the Lord, salvation and eternal life are to be hoped for by no one." And therefore he says that the Christians in Carthage were wont to call baptism salvation and the Eucharist life; and sometimes he adds, to make it more plain, that we drink the blood whereby we are redeemed, as in bk.12 Contra Faustum ch.10 he very well says: "The blood of Christ has a loud voice on earth, when, after it has been received, all the nations reply, 'Amen.' This is the clear voice of the blood to which the blood itself gives expression in the mouth of the faithful, who are by the same blood redeemed." Finally in bk.20, against the same Faustus, ch.13, he says: "Let the bread and the cup, not any at all, but the one with sure consecration made mystical, be for us the body of Christ. Accordingly, what is not made so, although it be bread and cup, is food for refreshment, not a sacrament of religion, except in that we give blessing to the Lord and do him thanks in each of his offices." And thus too in bk.2 De Peccatorum Meritis ch.26, he says about blessed bread, or the bread of catechumens, that it is holy, and holier than common foods, "since it is a sacrament," that is, a sacred sign, "although," he says, "it is not the body of Christ," because, that is, the body is in a far higher way the very sacrament of the Eucharist.

Let the fifth witness be Cyprian, who, in his sermon De Coena Domini, broadly thus explains this divine mystery, and, among other things, says: "The Master sets inconsumable food before the disciples." And later: "A food of immortality is given that differs from common food." And much later: "That common bread, changed into flesh and blood, procures life and increase for bodies, and therefore, the infirmity of our faith, aided by the accustomed effect of things, is taught by a sensible argument that in visible sacraments there is the effect of eternal life, and that we are united to Christ not so much by a corporeal as by a spiritual transition." And later: "That bread, which the Lord handed to the disciples, becomes, when changed not in appearance but in nature, the omnipotent flesh of the Word." Which he immediately explains with the example of divinity lying hid under humanity, and adduces very good reasons for so great a mystery. And, after interposing a few things, he says: "The Universal Church is invited to this feast, an equal portion is given to all, it is handed out whole, etc." By all which things he gives evident witness of the presence of the Lord in this Sacrament. But if anyone should call into doubt whether the work be Cyprian's, we reply, to begin with, that it has by almost all the graver theologians and expert authors been attributed to Cyprian, because the style, phrasing, and doctrine sufficiently point to him. Next, if perhaps it not be Cyprian's, no one surely can doubt that it is of some very grave Father of the same period. And lastly, in very many undoubted places the same Saint, though in fewer words, shows the same faith of the same Sacrament, as in epist. 11 he expounds the Eucharist, that is, "the holy body of the Lord," and more broadly in epist. 63 he says: "Christ offered a sacrifice to God the Father, and offered this very thing which Melchizedek had offered, that is bread and wine, namely his own body and blood," which he pursues through almost the whole letter. The same in epist. 54, 56, & 75, and bk. De Lapsis at the beginning and often elsewhere.

A sixth and very grave witness is Pope Leo in Sermo 6 'De Ieiunio Septimi Mensis,' who writes: "Since the Lord says, 'except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you,' you ought so to communicate in the sacred table that you doubt naught in any way about the truth of the body and blood of Christ; for that is taken up in the mouth which is by faith believed, and in vain is 'Amen' said in reply by those who dispute against what is received." He hands on the same in Sermo 4, 'Quadragesimae,' and Sermo 7, 'De Passione.' And in epistle 23, to the clergy and people of Constantinople, he says, against the heretics who deny the truth of our flesh in Christ: "In what darkness of ignorance, in what torpor of indolence do those fellows lie, that they neither learn by hearing nor recognize by reading what in the Church of God is so unanimous in the mouth of all that not even by the tongues of infants is the truth of the body and blood of Christ left unmentioned among the sacraments of the common faith." Very good too is the opinion of Optatus, bk. 6 Contra Parmenianum: "What is the altar save the seat of the body and blood of Christ?" and this: "You have broken the cups that carry the blood of Christ." Many things can also be read in Tertullian, who is older than those reported above, bk. De Resurrectione Carnis ch. 8, and bk. De Pudicitia ch. 9, and bk. 3 Contra Marcion ch. 19, and bk. 4 ch. 40, where n. 662 of Pamelius collects many other places of his and joins Lactantius to him, and defends both from the calumnies of heretics, up to n. 668. There are also testimonies grave and altogether to be noted in Gaudentius, tract. 2 on Exodus, and in Paulinus, epist. 3 to Senerus near the end, and epist.4 to the same a little from the middle, who are equally ancient with the former. Nor must Gregory be omitted, bk.4 Dialogorum ch.58, and bk.2 on 1 Kings not far from the beginning, nor Bede, bk. De Mysteriis; for although these Fathers lived after the five hundredth year of Christ, they only teach what they have received from earlier Fathers. Which continuous tradition is later shown by Paschasius, in his book De Corpore et Sanguine Domini, and by those next who rose up against Berengarius, especially Lanfranc, Guitmund, and Alger, with whom must be numbered Anselm too, bk. De Corpore Christi, and Bernard, in epist.190 at the end, and St. Thomas, Bonaventure, and others. For from all of them can be made evidently clear the universal and perpetual sense of the Catholic Church, as far as Latin writers are concerned.

8. There remains for us to skim a few things from the Greek Fathers, a rather few words from whom, in the interest of brevity, I will report, for many are very clear and sufficiently obvious. But I will in particular keep quiet about the older Fathers, Dionysius the Areopagite, Ignatius, and Martial, because their writings, although sufficiently received and mentioned by the most ancient Fathers, are called into doubt by heretics. Therefore let Chrysostom be the first, in Homilia 60 to the people, and 45 on John, wherein these very choice things, among others, are contained: "So that we might not only through charity become this (that is, one body with Christ) but might also in very reality be mingled with that flesh, this is effected through the food which he has bestowed upon us, wishing to show the longing which he has in our regard. Wherefore he mingled his very self with us and mixed his body into us." And later: "Parents indeed hand their sons over to others to be nourished; I however, he says, do not so, but I nourish with my own flesh and set my very self before you." And again: "I wanted to be your brother, I assumed for your sake flesh and blood, to you my very flesh and blood in turn, by which I am made your kindred brother, I hand over." Which opinions, indeed, if they are carefully weighed one by one, will furnish individual and very good reasons for the institution of this marvelous Sacrament, which, through the effects of this Sacrament, he copiously declares. Next, he confirms the same truth from the virtue of the institutor, both there and in Homilia 83 on Matthew, where he says: "Not of human virtue are the works put forward; he who then did them in that supper, the same does them also now. We hold the place of ministers; but he who sanctifies and makes the change is himself." And later: "Let us hear, and let us dread; he has given us to be filled with his holy flesh; he sets himself immolated before us." Many like things are contained in the Homilia 'De Proditione Judae' at the end, vol.3, and Homilia 'Ad Neophyt.' Vol.5, and Homiliae 24 & 27 on 1 Corinthians, and Homilia 3 on Ephesians 1, and many things in bk. De Sacerdotio at the beginning, especially from the words: "O miracle, O kindness of God, he who sits above with the Father is, in that moment of time, felt by the hands of all, and gives himself over to those who wish to receive and embrace him, etc."

Second, there is a striking testimony from St. Cyril in epist.10 to Nestorius: "We complete an unbloody cult in the Church, and in this way do we come to the mystical blessings, and are sanctified, made partakers of the holy flesh and of the precious blood of the Savior of all of us, Jesus Christ; nor do we receive it as common flesh, God forbid!, nor as flesh of a man sanctified and conjoined to the Word by a unity of dignity, or as possessing a divine habitation, but as truly vivifying and made proper to the Word himself." And in this way he at once explains the verse of John 6.53, "except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man." Now this letter is referred to in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, and in the ancient Councils it is inscribed as the letter of the Council of Ephesus to Nestorius, and therefore Lanfranc and Guitmund mention this testimony under the authority of the Council of Ephesus. But in the complete Council of Ephesus found by the efforts of Theodore Peltan and given by him in Latin, vol.1, ch.14, the same letter is referred to under the name of Cyril and of the Synod of Alexandria, which seems to have happened before that of Ephesus. But afterwards in the same Council of Ephesus, vol.2, ch.5, the same epistle of Cyril to Nestorius was read and although, as Peltan notes at the place, the Fathers are not read there to have acclaimed it as they did the other epistle of Cyril to Nestorius, ch.3, yet there can be no doubt that the epistle was approved in the same way by the whole Council. Hence in the Council of Chalcedon we often read that the doctrine of Cyril was approved in the Council of Ephesus and, at the end of the whole Act of the Council, his two epistles are said to have been approved, and the twelve anathemas are specifically confirmed that are contained at the end of the same epistle to Nestorius. Therefore this testimony has greater force from the authority of the Council of Ephesus, which is one of the four first Councils that the king admits.

But further, the same Cyril, in his book to Euoptius, responding to Theodoret on behalf of his anathemas, he refers, in defense of the eleventh, to the words of Nestorius, that we eat the flesh of Christ, which remark Cyril approves, understanding the words of Christ literally. But he reprehends Nestorius insofar as he separated the body of Christ from his divinity; but he himself teaches that, “for this reason we receive vivifying flesh and food remaining unto eternal life, because we receive flesh united to the Word of God.” Which he also repeats in bk. De Fide ad Reginas, under the title ‘That Christ is the life, from the Gospel of John,’ and it too is referred to in the Council of Ephesus, vol.1. He says the same at large and very well, bk.4 on John 12: “The Lord gave his body for the life of all, and through it he again causes life within us, and in what way I will say briefly according to my strength, for, since the vivifying Son of God lived in the flesh, he refashioned it into his own goodness, that is, into life, and, joined to it in his totality, so to say, by an ineffable mode of union, he made it vivifying, because his nature is vivifying, and therefore this flesh vivifies those who partake of it.” Which point he pursues at length through the following chapters up to ch.17. But especially to be noted is the thirteenth chapter, where he reprehends the heretics who imitate those of Capharnaum when they demur, John 6.52: “How can this man give us his flesh to eat?” He says: “For they cry with great impiety against God, nor does it come into their mind that nothing is impossible with God, etc.” But in chapter 17 he admirably describes how Christ remains in us, and we in him, when we eat him, with the example of liquefied wax into which another is poured so that the one is with the other mixed all through; for by that example he is striving to make clear that we eat Christ, not by faith alone, but truly and really and corporeally.

This very thing too is what Cyril of Jerusalem, in Catechesis 4, connects together with the words put forward by Christ: “Since Christ himself thus affirms and says of the bread: ‘This is my body,’ who may thereafter dare to doubt? And when the same confirms and says: ‘This is my blood,’ who may doubt and say that it is not his blood?” And later: “Wherefore, with all certitude, let us take up the body and blood of Christ, that we may be made joint partakers of his body and blood and become Christo-phers, that is, Christ-bearers, since we will have received his body and blood into our members.” Which he pursues extensively. And in Cathechesis 5 he says: “So that the tasters are bidden, not to taste bread and wine, but that which is under the appearances, that is, of bread and wine, the body and blood of the Lord.” And in like manner are the words of Christ expounded by Epiphanius in his Ancoratum. “And there is no one,” he says, “who does not have faith in the word, for he who does not believe that it is truly he, as he himself said, that man has fallen from grace and salvation.” Next, the same truth is confirmed by Athanasius, in bk. De Incarn. Christi at the end, where he says: “We are admitted into the communion of the body of the Lord, as he himself said, John 6.51: ‘The bread that I will give is my flesh for the life of the world;’ for the vivifying spirit is the flesh of the Lord, since it was conceived from the vivifying spirit.” Gregory Nazianzen also, Orat. 3, which is the first against Julian, and Orat. 4, which is the second on the holy Passover, towards the end: “Without shame,” he says, “and without doubt, eat the body, drink the blood, provided you are held by desire for life, etc.”

The same thought is in Gregory of Nyssa, in bk. De Vita Moysis, or on the perfect life, about the middle, when he says: “We are to take up the heavenly food, which no action by arts of agriculture has produced for us, but bread without plowing, without any human work, is prepared for us. Flowing down from above it is found on earth, for the bread which descends from heaven, which is true food, which is through manna obscurely signified, is a certain incorporeal thing; for by what manner does an incorporeal thing become food for the body, yet a thing, which is not incorporeal, is wholly body?” And later: “That miraculous bread, therefore, without agriculture, changes its virtue by variety of quality to the condition of those who receive it.” By which words he sufficiently indicates how highly and exaltedly he thought of that food. Also many other things are contained in Basil, in his Exhortatione ad Baptismum, where he calls the Eucharist “living bread,” saying: “Nor would Israel ever have drunk from that spiritual rock if they had not been baptized in a figure, nor will anyone provide you with true drink unless you are truly baptized. They received the bread of angels after baptism, and you, how will you eat the living bread if this sacrament has not been received?” And in his book De Baptismo in its third part, wherein he shows that, “he who is regenerated through baptism ought thereafter to be nourished with participation in the divine mysteries,” he understands Christ’s words, both of the promise in John and of the institution in the other Evangelists, literally and simply. And like things are contained in Regulis Moralibus rule 21. Justin Martyr too, in his second Apologia pro Christianis at the end, teaches this truth very openly, and confirms it from the very ancient tradition and custom of the Church. Next the same is contained in Irenaeus, bk.2 Contra Haereses ch.34, some of whose words I will refer to immediately, and bk.5 ch.2, refuting those who deny the truth of the flesh and blood in Christ the Lord and his assumed nature, he says: “And thus, in accord therewith, clearly neither has the Lord redeemed us with his blood, nor is the cup of the Eucharist a communion of his blood, nor is the bread, which we break, a communion of his body.” In these words the equivalence is very much to be noted. For this holy martyr judged it equally absurd and contrary to the true faith to deny that the true body and blood of Christ is communicated to us in the sacrament of the Eucharist as to deny that we are redeemed by the true blood of Christ. And he gestures toward a proof, that just as the Apostle says we have redemption through his blood, “so Christ has firmly made the cup to be his blood, which is shed, and the bread, which is from the creature, to be his body.” Hence he concludes: “When therefore the mixed cup and the broken bread receive the word of God, they become the Eucharist of the body and blood of Christ.” By these evident testimonies, then, it is sufficiently proved that the most ancient faith of the Church, and the genuine sense of the words of Christ, were that Christ himself is truly and really present in the Eucharist.

Chapter 2: The substance of bread and wine does not remain under the consecrated appearances.

Summary: 1. From the Fathers it is shown that this truth was believed in the first five centuries. 2. An evasion of heretics is rejected.

1. A second truth is, in the assertion of transubstantiation, included in the Eucharist, that, after the consecration, the substance of bread and wine do not persist, which is embraced as de fide certain by the Church Roman and Catholic, founded too on the words of Christ and perpetual tradition, as the Council of Trent, in session 3 ch.4 can.4, recently declared, and many other Councils before it, which now do not need to be referred to since they are not admitted by the king. Therefore we will put forward only the testimonies of the ancient Fathers, so that it may by them be clear that this sense of Christ’s words and this faith is not new or recent, but was believed in the first five hundred years in the Catholic Church and was accordingly handed on by the apostles. All the Fathers, then, who teach that through consecration the bread is changed, converted, or crossed over into the body of Christ, likewise openly contend that the common bread does not remain after consecration. Because what crosses over or is converted into another does not remain in its own essence, which it had before, as is evident of itself; and many of the same Fathers made it plain in express words. Justin especially, in the said Apologia 2 Pro Christianis, when he says, speaking of the Eucharist: “For neither do we take common and ordinary bread or ordinary drink, but in like manner as the Word of God became the man Jesus Christ our Savior and possessed flesh and blood for our salvation, so too have we received that the food, which is consecrated by the prayers of the speech we have received from him and by communion in which our blood and flesh are fed, is the flesh and blood of Jesus Christ, of him who was made man;” and immediately he adduces the words of Christ and gives manifest witness that they were in this sense handed on by the apostles.

In the same way Irenaeus, bk.4 ch.34, says: “In like manner as the bread from earth, when receiving the invocation of God, is not now common but the Eucharist, consisting of two things, an earthly and a heavenly (that is, the appearances of bread and the body of Christ), so too our bodies, when receiving the Eucharist, are not now corruptible, having hope of resurrection.” In which words he openly denies that common bread remains under the consecrated appearances, but a celestial one does, made of the flesh of Christ and the appearances of bread. In the same sense too did Cyril of Jerusalem speak, Catechesis 3, ‘mystagogica’: “The bread of the Eucharist, after the invocation of the Holy Spirit, is no more common bread, but it is the body of Christ.” And in Catechesis 4 he says: “At one time he changed water into wine, which is close to blood, by his mere will; and he in whom we believe, will he not be worthy to have changed wine into blood? Just as, therefore, after the transmutation of water done in Cana of Galilee, the substance of water did not remain, so neither does the substance of the wine remain in the chalice after it is changed into the blood of Christ.” Hence he later concludes: “Let my soul exult in the Lord, knowing this and holding it for certain, that this bread, which is seen by us, is not bread, even if taste perceive it to be bread, but is the body of Christ.” And almost in the same way speak Chrysostom, Gregory of Nyssa, and Eusebius of Emesa, whom I referred to elsewhere. And there are some very good words of Epiphanius wherein he insinuates the same truth, Sermo ‘On the Praises of the Virgin’, to whom he thus speaks: “Hail, most holy Virgin, who, like an intellectual bush, hold the fire of divinity without burning. Intellectual offering, which brought fire and the hot bread of life for the world to eat, about which Christ, the Savior of the world, says: ‘Take, eat, this is my body, which is broken for you for remission of sins.’” Which words he so understands that he believes and professes the bread to be nothing but the bread of life.

But among the Latins this is very wisely explained by Ambrose in bk.4 De Sacrament. ch.4, where he thus writes: “You say, perhaps, my bread is ordinary. But that bread is bread before the words of the Sacraments; when consecration has arrived, from the bread the flesh of Christ comes to be.” And later: “If there is so great force in the word of the Lord Jesus that things which were not should begin to be, by so much more effective is it to make things that were change into another.” And later: “Therefore, that I might respond to you, it was not the body of Christ before consecration; but after consecration, I say to you, that it is now the body of Christ; he himself said, and it was done; he himself commanded, and it was created.” Which he repeats again later. And in ch.5 he confirms the same from the principle, “that the word of Christ is able to change a whole universe of things.” And in his book De Initiandis ch.9 he says: “We use so many examples to prove that it is not what nature formed but what blessing consecrated, and that there is greater force in blessing than in nature, because by blessing is nature too itself changed.” And later: “But if human blessing is strong enough to change nature, what do we say of divine consecration itself when the very words of the Lord Savior are operating?” which he pursues more extensively in the same place. It is also signified by Augustine, bk.20 Contra Faustum ch.13, when he says: “The bread and cup, not any at all but with sure consecration, are made for us the mystical body of Christ, not born.” This final word Alger, in bk.1 De Sacramentis ch.6, accurately thus considers: “Since mystical bread is not born, nor is it in this divine sacrament of grace created by any origin or condition of earthly nature, but it so becomes the body of Christ that it ceases to be bread, how is Christ said to be em-breaded in bread which no longer exists?” Lastly Cyprian, in his sermon De Coena Domini, speaks in the same way, saying: “The nourishment of immortality is given, different from common food, retaining the appearances of corporeal substance, but proving by invisible effect the presence of divine virtue.” And later: “That common bread, changed into flesh and blood, procures life and increase for the body.” And later: “That bread, which the Lord handed to the disciples, changed not in appearance but in nature, is, by the omnipotence of God, made flesh.” And several like things in what follows he hands on, whereby he confirms the same truth.

2. In the same sense too did Tertullian speak, bk.4 Contra Marcionem ch.40: “The bread taken and distributed to the disciples he made to be his own body saying, ‘this is my body.’” He appears, the Protestants will say, to destroy the sentence when he adds, “it is the figure of my body.” But without doubt he did not understand the words in the sense in which the adversaries take it; otherwise, in the same context too, he would say conflicting things and he would be contrary to himself in many other places. Either then, he understood that, not the bread now consecrated, but the bread offered long ago or in some way sanctified was the figure of the body of Christ, as in the offering of Melchizedek or in the shew-bread, because Christ was to be given to us as food under the appearances of bread; because of which too body is by Jeremiah called by the name of bread when he says, 11.19: “Come, let us put wood on his bread” [alt.: “let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof”], which place is there mentioned by Tertullian, and from it and from other words the same Tertullian calls it there “the old figure.” And this sense is extensively confirmed by Pamelius along with Gagneus and others. Or, to be sure, if Tertullian called consecrated bread the figure of the body of Christ, by figure he understood nothing other than the sacrament; for although the body of Christ is truly in the consecrated host, nevertheless it is at the same time a sign of the body of Christ there contained; and in this way Tertullian wished to explain that the consecrated bread was not true or material bread, because only the appearances of it are there containing, and thus figuring, the body of Christ, because for that reason was it also once called bread and by bread was it prefigured in former times. And this sense he confirms when he adds: “But it would not have been figure if it was of a truth not body.” Again: “Or if for that reason he feigned bread to be his body, because it lacked the truth of body, then it was bread he should have delivered for us.” For by these words he explains that Christ not fictively but really made the bread his body, not merely by imposing it for sign thereof, nor by uniting it to himself by way of the body, but by converting the same into his very own true body. This then was the opinion of Tertullian, which in bk. De Orat. ch.6, and bk.2 Ad Uxorem ch.5, he confirms, where is this remark: “And if he know, he believes it not to be the bread which is spoken of.” And like things are contained in bk. De Pudicitia, and bk. De Resurrectione Carnis, and other similar ones. In addition also to the aforesaid more ancient Fathers, everyone who flourished after the five hundredth year of Christ embraced the same truth: Damascene, Theophylact, Gregory, Bede, Remigius, Paschasius, Alger, Lanfranc, Anselm, Bernard, Bonaventure, and others whose testimonies are obvious, and so I point to their names only through the window, so that, from the continuous consent in diverse times of the Fathers, it may be clear that the sense of the Church has always been the same, and that no novelty has been introduced in this mystery by more recent Pontiffs.

Chapter 3: On the truth of transubstantiation.

Summary: 1. Transubstantiation is shown to have been held in all centuries. 2. The name of transubstantiation is ancient and was also introduced by the greatest authority. The Council of Florence, in place of transubstantiation, used its definition.

1. Finally, from these two Catholic and very ancient principles, that, under the consecrated appearances, the substance of Christ’s body is present and that the substance of bread is absent, the truth of transubstantiation, which the king wrongly mentions among recent novelties, evidently follows. For since he carps at transubstantiation, is he, I ask, running from the thing itself or is he only avoiding the name? If the question is about the thing, the testimonies of all the Fathers of the first five centuries prove overwhelmingly that transubstantiation is not new, but was the tradition in all centuries. For by transubstantiation the Church understands nothing other than the conversion or transition of the bread into the body of Christ, or (which is the same) the departure of the bread not simply into nothing but the body of Christ succeeding in its place. Or, conversely, transubstantiation is nothing other than a marvelous action whereby the body of Christ is constituted under the appearances of bread, and the substance of bread is expelled. But, certainly, the conversion of bread to body is even in these words confessed by the ancient Fathers mentioned, and they often use in the same sense the name of transmutation of bread to body, or they assert that the bread becomes body, or finally they distinctly deny that after consecration the natural bread remains, and they testify that it is the mystical, heavenly, and true body of Christ; therefore they teach, in the thing itself, nothing other than transubstantiation; therefore the thing transubstantiation is not new but very ancient and Catholic truth.

2. But if the king finds novelty in the word of transubstantiation alone, he is without doubt wrong to be offended, because although it does not have the antiquity which he wants, the Church used it over four hundred years ago, and approved it with the greatest agreement and authority in the Lateran Council under Innocent III [1213 AD], at which were present almost 480 Greek and Latin patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, and many other abbots and prelates, and the legates of the emperors of Rome and of the East, and of the kings of Spain, Gaul, England, and others, along with the Supreme Pontiff and the cardinals. But in its first chapter there is thus written: "Truly there is one Universal Church of the faithful, outside which no one at all is saved. In which the same Jesus Christ himself is priest and sacrifice, whose body and blood in the Sacrament of the altar is truly contained under the appearances of bread and wine, bread being transubstantiated, by divine power, into body and wine into blood, so that, for perfecting the mystery of unity, we ourselves from his should take what he himself took from ours." Nor must one think that the word was invented by the said Council, for we find before that time that Gaufred, a Cistercian monk, used it in an epistle to Cardinal Atanensis, as Baronius reports for the year 1188 n.18, where he also indicates that it was then received in common use by theologians. And we find the same word in a certain authentic history which the same Baronius reports for the year 1192, at the end. The beginning, then, of the custom of using this word for the mystery of the Eucharist is unknown. But yet it was, before the Lateran Council, not confirmed by public authority, but there the Universal Church did consent to the use of the word 'transubstantiation' for explaining this mystery. And later, the Council of Florence, though it did not use the word, put in place of it its definition or description, saying: "The substance of the bread is converted into the body of Christ and the substance of the wine into his blood." For nothing else did the Lateran Council mean by the word 'transubstantiation' than the conversion of the whole substance into another complete substance, since indeed this conversion's kind was very well signified and expressed by that word. For it both prescind from the word 'mutation', which, in physical strictness, is wont to require a subject, and excludes any error asserting that there remains, under the appearances of bread, either the complete nature of bread, or a part of it as matter or form, or anything of it, as the very being or subsistence of the bread. And therefore rightly did the Council of Trent, session 13 ch.4 and canon 2, assert that the conversion of the whole substance of bread into the body, and of the whole substance of wine into the blood, of Christ "is agreeably, properly, and most aptly called by the holy Catholic Church transubstantiation."

Finally, in the previous book it was shown that the Church devises new words, especially in ecumenical Councils, to declare and defend ancient mysteries of the faith against insurgent heretics and their new opinions, tergiversations, and calumnies; why then could not the Councils of the Lateran and of Trent, with a like institution or approval of terms, imitate the ancient Councils of Nicea I and Ephesus I? What then does the king have to complain of in the word ‘transubstantiation’, since he cannot deny the thing if he wishes to be Catholic not only in name but, which we greatly wish, in truth as well? Or how can he deny that transubstantiation is very ancient by the fact that the word itself is less ancient, since in not dissimilar cases similar tergiversations by heretics were very gravely reprehended by Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria, and other Fathers their equals? And let this, according to the convenience of the present place, be enough about the substance and truth of this mystery, and let us pass on to the other errors mentioned.

Chapter 4: The Eucharist is with the adoration of worship (latría) suitably adored and elevated for this purpose and borne round in procession.

Summary: 1. It is shown that Christ the Lord is to be adored with the cult of worship. 2. This article is shown from the Fathers to be wrongly reckoned among the recent ones by the king. 3. The elevation of the Eucharist is very laudable and ancient. 4. The bearing round of the Eucharist in supplications is shown not to be blameworthy but rather very laudable. Reason taken from the end. 5. An evasion of heretics is refuted. The Church is able to establish whatever is suitable to the greater cult of God. 6. In the beginning of the Church this bearing round was not useful.

1. It is not difficult to draw this truth clearly from the principle of faith laid down, and to refute with sufficient evidence the other error of the Protestants, whereby they tax or deny the adoration of the sacrosanct Eucharist. For that Christ the Lord, the true God man, is to be adored with the singular and perfect adoration of worship is expressly taught by Cyril along with the Council of Alexandria in his epistle to Nestorius about excommunication, when he says: “Since we confess that the Word is united to the flesh by way of hypostasis, we adore the one Son and Lord Jesus Christ.” And in anathema 8 he condemns this way of speaking, “the man assumed together with God the Word is to be adored and glorified;” and he pronounces anathema on him “who no more with one adoration honors Emmanuel or adapts to him one glorification in the way the Word was made flesh.” Which doctrine was approved by the 1st Council of Ephesus and by the Council of Chalcedon, as I related above, and was received by the Church; nor can it be denied by the king of England, who professes to venerate the first four Councils. Especially because we often read in the Gospel that this sort of adoration was given not rarely to Christ the Lord, and was not refused by him but rather approved, as is clear from John 9 in the blind man by Christ enlightened who, when now believing, v.38, “fell down and worshipped him;” and 20.28 in Thomas saying, “My Lord and my God.” And Paul, Philippians 2.10, speaks of adoration when he says: “at the name of Jesus every knee should bow.” And in Romans 14.11 he interprets of Christ the verse of Isaiah 45.23, “every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God.” It is therefore de fide most certain that Christ the Lord in his visible appearance is to be adored with the most perfect cult. Since, therefore, it has been shown that the same Christ, God man, is truly and really present in the Eucharist, no one who really believes the mystery of the Incarnation and the Eucharist can deny that the Eucharist is to be adored.

Or perhaps, because Christ does not exist there in a natural and visible way and is hidden under the sacramental appearances, is he then, at last, not to be adored as if he were an object for bodily eyes? But this only happens to those who for faith use merely their senses, who, to be sure, would not adore Christ in visible appearance because they do not see the divinity of the same. He then who is led by true faith in his religion and his adoration, just as he adores the invisible Word along with the flesh under which he is hidden, so he adores the Word made flesh although hidden in sacramental appearances. Hence, just as Christ the Lord said to Thomas, John 20.29: "Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed," for, by seeing Christ's body and his wounds, he believed him to be God and as such adored him, so any Catholic giving faith to the words of Christ and seeing the appearances consecrated by the words of the same, looks by faith upon God under them, and thus he adores the sacrament.

2. For which cause this religion and adoration of the Eucharist is also very ancient in the Church, which no one can deny who has read the ancient Fathers; whom I will briefly call to mind so that by this reason too it may be clear that the king of England does not rightly count this article among those that are new and recent. And, to begin with, Ambrose, bk.3 De Spiritu Sancto ch.12, first says about the angels that they worship not only the divinity of Christ but also "his footstool," which he understands of the mystery of the Incarnation, and he interprets footstool as "that earth which the Lord Jesus took up in his assumption of the flesh," and thus does he expound the words of Psalms 98[99].5: "Worship at his footstool," when he says: "By footstool is understood earth, but by earth the flesh of Christ, which today also in the mysteries we adore, and which the apostles adored, as we said above, in the Lord Jesus, for Christ is not divided but one." Where he openly speaks of the perfect adoration of worship, and he makes this adoration of him lying hid in sacramental appearances equivalent to the adoration of Christ existing in his proper appearance. And in the same way are the aforesaid words of Psalms 98[99] expounded by Augustine on that place, when he moves the same question, in what way we are commanded to adore the footstool of God, which is said to be earth [stone] in Matthew 1.3, and he replies: "Being tossed about I turn myself to Christ." And later: "For from the earth he took earth, for flesh is from the earth, and from the flesh of Mary he took flesh, and because in this flesh he walked here, and gave his very flesh to us to eat for salvation; but no one eats that flesh unless he has first adored; the discovery is made of how such a footstool of God is adored, and how we do not sin in adoring but sin in not adoring." Which I would that the king of England would attentively read and consider. In like manner does Augustine, in Contio 1 on Psalms 21[22], understand about this sacrament the words, v.29: "And they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship," which he expounds in the same way in epist. 120 ch.7, and in epist. 118 ch.3, when, comparing him who comes frequently to the Eucharist with him who for reverence' sake abstains, he says: "Let each do what according to his faith he piously believes should be done; for neither of them dishonors the body and blood of the Lord, if they contend earnestly to honor the most salutary sacrament."

In addition, Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechesis 5 'mystagogica', where he generally describes the rite of the liturgy, he first teaches, when he treats of communion, with how much reverence the body of the Lord is to be received, and next, after communion of the body of Christ, he says: "Come also to the cup of his blood, not extending your hand, but bowing forward by way of adoration and veneration." Many things does Chrysostom pass on in Homilia 24 on 1 Corinthians, especially at the end, where he says: "This body was also revered, when lying in the manger, by the Magi, and adored by them with great fear and trembling; let us, then, citizens of heaven, imitate even the barbarians.” And later: “Not only do you see this body as they did, but you know his virtue and dispensation;” later still: “Let us therefore stir up ourselves, and let us fear, and let us show a reverence greater by far than those barbarians.” Where also is to be considered the equivalence between the adoration of the visible Christ in his proper appearance and in the sacrament. In addition, Homilia 3 ‘De Incomprehensibili Dei Natura’ near the end: “The angels too,” he says, “bow the knee to the Lord in this sacrament, interceding for men and saying: ‘for them we supplicate for whom you lavished your blood, for them we pray for whom you sacrificed this body.’” He also adds there that, “the deacon in the Mass is wont at the time of the consecration to bring the ‘energoumenoi’,” whom he calls the ‘afflicted’, that is by the demon, “and he commands them,” he says, “to bow their head.” Gregory of Nazianzen can also be looked at, Orat. 11 ‘De Sancta Gorgonia,’ and Origen, Homilia 6 on Joshua, and Eusebius of Emesa, Homilia 5 on Easter, Theodoret, Dialogus 2 & 3, and John Climacus, who in Gradus 23, ‘Dominum’, says, “receiving the heavenly thing I adore;” and Damascene, bk.4 De Fide ch.13. Nor does the king adduce anything against this truth, nor could anything, I am easily able to conjecture, be brought against it.

3. From which foundation that is overthrown, without any trouble indeed, which the king adduces on this point about the elevation of the Eucharist, for the sake of adoration, after the consecration. For this cannot be reprehended as bad, just as not as new either; the first point is plain from what has been said, that if it is thought holy to adore the Eucharist, to bring it forward and display it to the people for adoration cannot be bad; therefore to elevate the same sacrament for the same end cannot be reprehensible but is rather very laudable. For what in the substance of that act or in its mode can be thought of as worthy of blame? But that the custom is not new is clear from Dionysius 3 ch. ‘De Ecclesiast. Hierarch.’ p.3, where he says about the consecrating priest: “And thus he consummates the most reverend mysteries, and in signs holily displayed he exposes it to the eyes,” and Basil, bk. De Spiritu Sancto ch.27, places this among the apostolic traditions, although he calls it, not elevation, but “display of the divine body and of the holy cup.”

And although the thing not be so old, nothing prevents it being received with all faith and reverence once the Church approves it. And therefore rightly did the Council of Vienne condemn, among other errors of the Beguardi and Beguinae, this error “that they ought not to rise at the elevation of the body of Jesus Christ nor do reverence to the same.” Which, however, they asserted not of all the faithful but of certain very perfect ones, because they said it was a mark of imperfection to descend from the highest contemplation to the ministry of the Eucharist, which error was a ridiculous mockery by demons. And for that reason too it is a very laudable custom of the Church that, at the time when the body of the Lord is elevated, the bell is rung, whereby those standing around are stirred up to adore the Lord. Nor likewise is this so new but that it was approved more than four hundred years ago by Gregory IX, on the evidence of Naucerus, Generat. 42. And Ivo of Chartres more than five hundred years ago gave thanks to the queen of the English for the bells which she had donated as a gift to the church of Chartres, indicating that they were wont to be rung at the time of the consecration. Customs of this sort, then, since they are ordered to the best end and contain in them nothing improper or unfitting to the divine cult, are, whether they possess little or much antiquity, to be held as altogether laudable.

4. Now hence there is response also to the third article noted by the king, namely about the usage of bearing round the divine sacrament in supplications, which Protestants are wont to condemn as superstitious, because new and invented by human ingenuity and introduced for the cult of the Eucharist. To which we will briefly reply confessing, to begin with, that it is not a very old custom, although neither is it altogether very recent; since it was introduced more than three hundred and fifty years ago by the authority of the Supreme Pontiffs Urban IV and Clement V along with the General Council of Vienne, as is contained in Clement's single 'De Reliquis et Venerat. Sanctorum.' And it was by universal consent of the whole Church and with marvelous acclamation and profit immediately taken up, and was confirmed and has increased day by day. Which that it was done not without the special providence and thoroughly divine approval of the Holy Spirit can be doubted by no one who has given faith to the promises of Christ, whereby he promised that he and the Holy Spirit would be present as perpetual governor and protector of his Church. Next, in this point too has place the reason given, that an institution of this sort, and the solemn bearing round of the Eucharist, has the best end, and in the action itself there is no shadow of superstition, but rather great utility and very great aptness for the end proposed to it. For the end of that solemnity is to excite, by remembrance of so great a benefit, the Christian people to the giving of thanks, and to move them to perceive more richly the grace and fruit of so great a sacrament, as the aforesaid Pontiffs in the exordium and discussion of that chapter with the greatest piety made plain. But the action is of itself indifferent, hence, when done for a good end and with due faith and reverence, it becomes very honorable and religious, as we read in figure about the bearing round of the Ark in Numbers 14 and especially in 2 Kings (2 Samuel) 6, and 1 Chronicles 15.

5. What, then, the adversaries find fault with in this solemn rite I know not. Perhaps they will say that the Church could not introduce a new rite of this sort. But this is asserted by them without Scripture, without reason, without any foundation at all, nay contrary to Scripture and reason. For Scripture has never prohibited this; nay everywhere it signifies that things which pertain to the cult, to the ceremonies, and to the rites of this sacrament have been committed to the providence and disposition of the Church, according to that verse of 1 Corinthians 11.34: "And the rest will I set in order when I come." Next, in the Old Law there was a power of instituting some new feast, as is clear from 2 Maccabees 4 and Esther and Judith last chapter; and accordingly does this power much more exist in the Church, and thus the Church has from the beginning been accustomed to institute feast days for praising God in his saints; therefore, with greater reason it could institute a special day in honor of the Saint of saints and in remembrance of so great a benefit, as Clement V above virtually argued. Then, the natural condition of human nature requires variation and change in these things, hence it is incredible that Christ left his Church, congregated from men, without power of this sort.

6. At the beginning, then, of the nascent Church this celebration could not only not be necessary but also not even useful, because Christians, living among infidels and subject to them, could not without danger honor this sacrament with so public and solemn a rite. But afterwards, although it could have been done, yet for a long time this sort of solemnity was not judged necessary, because this mystery was with pure and sincere faith held by all those who professed Christ, and every day, or at least on individual Sundays and feast days the remembrance of it was recalled with great devotion and fruit. But afterwards, when advancing errors against the truth of this sacrament were multiplied, and the charity too and devotion of the faithful seemed to be abating, very prudently indeed was a solemnity of the sort instituted, so as to confirm the minds of the faithful more in the faith of so great a sacrament, and to excite them to more ardent gratitude and love. Wherefore rightly did the Council of Trent pronounce an anathema on those who asserted that this sacrament was not to be adored, and who altogether denied that it was to be venerated in a special festive celebration and solemnly borne around in supplications. For in all these things either there was supposition of error in opposition to the contrary truth of the presence of Christ in this sacrament, or at any rate other errors were included not less in opposition to the true faith, as that the Universal Church could err in morals, or could not command save what was found commanded in Scripture, or, which follows therefrom, that all the ceremonies instituted by the Church are superstitious, and the like things, which have in other places been sufficiently refuted, and which will, in what follows, rather often arise to be confronted.

Chapter 5: On the communion of the laity under the appearances of bread alone.

Summary: 1. The king wrongly finds fault with the communion of the laity under one kind. Objection of the heretics. 2. Solution. In the use of the Eucharist under one kind two things are to be considered. To the sacrificing priest communion under one kind is not permitted. 3. Communion in the appearances of bread alone was in use from the beginning of the Church. Serapio as an old man received the Eucharist in the appearances of bread alone. 4. Ambrose similarly. 5. To take the Eucharist home with them was once permitted to the faithful. 6. This mode of communicating was not forbidden by Christ. 7. Christ the Lord communicates the whole effect of the sacrament under any kind. 8. There is no precept given about communicating under both kinds. Evasion of heretics. The evasion is rejected and the true sense of the precept about performing the Eucharist is stated. 9. A place in Luke 22 is brought forward as objection. It is explained. 10. A place in John 6 is brought forward as objection. It is explained. 11. The exposition handed down is confirmed. 12. The same is confirmed from the Fathers. 13. The same sense is proved by the custom of the Church. 14. The very ancient custom of the infirm communicating under the appearances of bread has also the same sense. 15. To a sick person, unable to swallow, a host dipped in unconsecrated wine was administered. 16. To receive in sacrifice, or from superstition, the body without the blood is forbidden. 17. The established truth is confirmed by reason.

1. When the king in his fourth article accuses the Catholic Church of novelty in that it presents the Eucharist to the laity in the appearances only of bread, he seems to be stuck in the same rut; for he relies on the fact that in its usage and rites the Church cannot add or subtract anything, which taken universally and without limitation has been shown by us to be contrary to reason and Scripture. For although the Church is not able to change things which are of the substance of the sacraments and were instituted by Christ, nevertheless things which pertain to the accidentals of the rite and to the manners of the users are capable of variation and can be changed by the authority of the Church according to the opportunity of times. But in the present article the adversaries are wont to say and urge that this change was contrary to Christ's institution and precept. For Christ prescribed to all the reception of both kinds in the words of John 6.53: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.” That these words were thus understood at the beginning of the Church seems to be proved by the ancient usage of all the faithful communicating. Add too that the mutilating of the sacrament seems to be contrary to its institution, and hence, on the supposition of such institution, to be intrinsically evil.

2. But in these objections too the heretics do not leave behind the proud presumption whereby they prefer their own judgment to the authority of the Catholic Church, and they dare to say that, in expounding the true sense of Scripture and of Christ, it can err, nay has in fact erred. Because, therefore, they must, in this article, be chiefly proved wrong from the contrary foundation, and because that was sufficiently confirmed above, therefore we will, for the present, give satisfaction to the said objections in brief, and we will at the same time show that the custom of the Church is neither new nor foreign to the words of Christ. But, so that we may proceed more clearly, two things in the Church’s usage of one kind only must be distinguished. One is whether it is licit sometimes to eat the body separately from the use of the chalice, or whether this is always and, as it were, intrinsically bad; the other is whether it is licit to deprive the faithful of the use of the chalice for the whole of their life, because, although we posit that it is possible sometimes licitly to receive one kind without the other, nevertheless a question can remain whether it is licit never to receive both, for it might sometimes, or in the course of one’s life, be necessary to receive both even if it is sometimes licit to receive one kind only. Next, one must distinguish between the offering of the Eucharist as it is a sacrifice, and participation in it as it is a sacrament. For, as often as this sacrament is performed, a sacrifice is offered to God, as the Catholic Church teaches (whatever heretics think, which is not now to be treated of), and because this unbloody sacrifice is an image of the bloody sacrifice offered on the cross, which Christ the Lord wished to be represented by the consecration of each kind being done separately, therefore the Church never permits either the sacrament to be performed in one kind only or the sacrificing priest to consume in one kind only. And thus, about the mutilation of the sacrifice, or of the priestly or sacrificial communion (so to express the thing), there is no question, for we confess that it is never licit; and it is probable, although not de fide certain, that it is forbidden by divine right, or perhaps that, on the supposition of the institution, it is intrinsically evil. But these things we leave to the theologians; for we are only dealing now with lay communion or participation in the sacrament outside the sacrifice.

3. On the usage then of communicating in the appearances of bread alone from what has already been consecrated, we say, to begin with, that it is neither evil in itself nor was it ever forbidden in the Church, nay neither is it new but was from the beginning of the Church in use therein. And since from this usage the rest is sufficiently proved, and sine the king most reprehends novelty of this sort, we will make chiefly the usage clear. First, from the ancient usage of reserving the Eucharist under the appearances of bread alone and of ministering it to the infirm, and of carrying it home or on a journey, that is, for consumption at an opportune and necessary time. Now we collect this custom first from what Eusebius, bk.6 Histor. ch.36, narrates from Dionysius of Alexandria about the old man Serapio, who, since he had done penance, having being deprived a long time of communion on the ground he had sacrificed to idols, being finally on the point of death, bade a priest to be called to him; but since the priest, being troubled too by sickness, could not come to Serapio, “he gave a very small particle of the Eucharist to a messenger, bidding him to put it moistened into the old man’s mouth,” which, when it was done, the old man departed happily from among the living. From which history is clearly bequeathed that the particle was of consecrated bread, and was reserved for time of necessity, and was given without wine or blood in place of full communion, and that communion had been waited for not without miracle or singular grace from God by the holy old man, and it was accordingly pleasing to God, as is indeed proved by the holy death of the old man immediately following.

4. Not dissimilar is what Paulinus writes about Ambrose conducting his soul at the end of his life, that Honoratus, a priest of the church of Vercelli, heard, while lying on his bed, a voice three times saying to him: “‘Arise, hurry, because he is soon going to depart.’ Who, going down (Paulinus says), offered to the saint the body of the Lord, which, when he received, he gave up the spirit, carrying a good viaticum away with him.” Where there is no mention of blood. Besides, the same custom of the Church is shown by a history that the same Ambrose reports of his brother Satyrus, in his funeral oration for him, namely, that he carried with him from the ship the body of Lord, by whose virtue he was saved from shipwreck, as we have already twice touched on above. Again Gregory of Tours, in bk. De Sancta Patrum Vita ch.3, reports of the bishop St. Gallus, since he had received a revelation of his approaching death and that he would depart after three days [or: after the Triduum (of Easter)], “called the people together, and having broken bread for them all, shared out communion with holy and pious will.” This is also confirmed by the ancient custom of conserving the Eucharist for the infirm, which is taken from the 2nd Council of Tours under Pope John III, celebrated in the year 570, and from the Council of Macon a little later under Pelagius IV canon 6, and from Bede, bk.4 Histor. Anglor. ch.24. For it is not likely that the Eucharist was ever reserved under the appearances of wine, since it would easily in a brief time turn sour and be corrupted; it was reserved, then, only in the appearances of bread, as is done even now.

5. There was also another ancient custom whereby it was free for the body of the Lord (which men received in their hands, women in clean linen cloths, from Augustine, Sermo 252 ‘De Tempore’) either to be consumed by the faithful in Church or to be taken home with them for private communion at an opportune time; which communion happened without doubt in the appearances of bread alone. And thus is it taken from Tertullian, bk.2 Ad Uxorem ch.5, where he says: “Let not your husband know what you taste in secret before all food; and if he knows, he believes it not to be the bread that is so called.” And in the same sense can be understood the words of the same, in bk. De Orat. final chapter: “Having received the body of the Lord and having reserved it, each is saved, both participation in the sacrifice and execution of the office;” although these words might best be understood of the prior reservation for the infirm. The said custom is also collected from the words of Cyprian, bk. De Lapsis not far from the end, where he relates about a certain woman, “since she tried with unworthy hands to open her pyx, wherein was the holy thing of the Lord, she was frightened off from daring to touch it by fire flaring up therefrom;” which he reports among miracles of the Eucharist. That holy thing, then, closed up in her private pyx was nothing other than the body of the Lord carried to her own home according to the aforesaid custom, which he also mentions in his book De Lapsis when he says: “Sent forth and still bearing, as was his wont, the Eucharist with him.” Which custom seems to have lasted only in the first five hundred years. For in the Council of Saragossa, in the year 518, ch.3, he is anathematized who is proved “not to have consumed the received grace of the Eucharist in Church.”

6. It is manifest, then, that the usage of communicating only in the appearances of bread was very ancient in the Church; therefore it cannot be blamed as a novelty by the king of England, since it is proved to have existed in the first five centuries. And for the same reason it cannot be blamed because of abuse or some disorder, since even the heretics themselves confess that in those former centuries the customs of the Church were pure and in agreement with the word of God. Now the theological and Catholic reason is that Christ the Lord never forbade the taking of one kind without the other, nor is it perverse by force of institution and from mere consideration of the nature of the thing. The first part we sufficiently prove against adversaries by seeking from them a place of Scripture where the prohibition is written down. For since they cannot show it, they are sufficiently refuted in their own principles that no such prohibition was specially laid down by Christ. But we add that it cannot be had even from the tradition of the Church, but rather the opposite, as we will see. Nay, if the opinion is true of those who say that Christ after his resurrection gave consecrated bread to the two disciples, Luke 24, we have thence by the example of Christ that this sort of communion in one kind is approved; and certainly Augustine plainly supposes it, bk.3 De Consensu Evangelistarum ch.25, and Sermo 140 ‘De Tempore’, and Bede and Theophylact on that place.

7. But the second part, besides its being sufficiently approved by the authority of the Church, can also be shown from the principles of the faith, because Christ the Lord, who is as if the substance of this sacrament, exists whole under the individual appearances, and is able to give life to the receiver under each of them even when separately received; therefore the taking of the bread alone suffices for receiving Christ, and for receiving the effect of the sacrament, and for the sacramental signification which is found in the usage of the Church, insofar as it is a sacrament. For in whatever way this sacrament is taken, it always signifies a perfect banquet sufficient for restoration of the soul because of the excellence of the heavenly bread contained and signified under the appearances of earthly bread. Just as this sacrament too, as it is the bread of angels, was sufficiently signified by the manna or by the shew-bread without the addition of drink or wine, although, when it was prefigured under the idea of sacrifice and oblation, both appearances intervened, as in the oblation of Melchizedek when he offered bread and wine.

8. What remains is that we connect together, at least cursorily, some things about the proposed second part, namely about the continual removal or separation of the non-consecrating faithful from the use of the chalice. On this point we say briefly that Christ never prescribed to the pastors of the Church that they should at any time communicate their subjects under both appearances, nor did he establish this sort of communion for the faithful themselves under necessity of law or salvation. We prove the first part, to begin with, because such a precept is not found written down, for this is enough for the adversaries, as I have already said. Perhaps they will say that this precept was given by Christ to the pastors of the Church when he said to his apostles on the night of the Supper: “Do this in remembrance of me.” By which words he commanded them to do what he himself had done; but he himself “took, blessed” and “gave” both kinds to them as they reclined; therefore he wished and prescribed the same to be done by his ministers. But, to begin with, since Protestants do not wish, against the universal sense of the Church, either the substantial rite of this sacrament nor the offering of sacrifice to be proved by these words, assuredly they can by no likely reason collect thence a precept of communicating under both kinds; especially because there is not even contained in those words a precept of communicating as often as one assists at the sacrifice of the Mass, as we showed elsewhere, and as we will touch on below from the ancient Councils. Therefore, by those words Christ did not prescribe that deed to be imitated as to all the circumstances which he then observed according to the opportunity of time and occasion, otherwise it would be necessary to communicate always at night and after supper, nay after the washing of feet too. Again it would be necessary by divine right to carry it out with unleavened bread, as Christ did. Again, as often as the sacrament is carried out, it would necessarily have to be bestowed to others, and for the same reason the priest would have to distribute all the bread which he had consecrated, and it would have to be received from that priest alone who carried out the sacred act, and as soon as he had finished the consecration, and then it would be necessary to distribute it before the consecration of the chalice; for thus did Christ the Lord do; but all these things are incredible and against the abiding custom of the Church. Therefore, only the substantial rite of this sacrifice and sacrament is prescribed in those words, as the Council of Trent taught, session 22 ch.1; for the rest, which is accidental, the Lord committed to the disposition of the Church, as I said already, and as Augustine, epist.118, affirmed.

9. But there are not lacking among the adversaries those who would collect this precept from other words of Christ the Lord in Luke 22 [Matthew 26.27]: “Drink ye all of it,” which they plead are understood not only of those who were then present but also of all the future faithful; and they say that not without mystery and as it were prophetic spirit was that word added in the distribution of the blood rather than of the body, so as to warn in advance and prohibit the future custom in the Roman Church of excluding the faithful from participation in the chalice. But this weighty thinking is frivolous; for although we concede that the words comprehend men in the future, they ought in no way to be understood about all the faithful, but at most about all priests, because only the apostles were there, who were then ordained priests, as the Council of Trent sufficiently indicated, session 22 ch.1 and canon 2, saying that Christ consecrated the apostles priests at the Supper; saying to them, and to their successors in them, “Do this, etc.,” where, although he does not expressly make the consecration exclusive, yet by naming only the apostles he sufficiently signified that they alone were there present at it. And the same is collected from Matthew 26 and John 13 and the other evangelists. For he names only the disciples, and Matthew expressly added the number twelve (26.20), and those whom he names in particular were all the apostles. And next, it is the common sense of the Church that Christ washed the feet, not of all the disciples, but only of the twelve apostles; therefore he only had them present at the Supper, and to them alone he said: “Do this;” therefore only to them did he say: “Drink ye all of it.” Next, it is silly to refer the word ‘all’ to the future faithful, since Christ spoke to those present alone, and about the chalice alone, which he offered to them, which could not be divided except among those present. And thus did Mark expound that what Christ prescribed was immediately there fulfilled, when he says, 14.23: “and they all drank of it.” Neither is there in that word or sign any mystery found, but because Christ first broke the bread and divided it into twelve pieces and handed his bread to each one, it was not necessary to say: “Take ye all and eat;” but because he offered one chalice for them all to drink of, therefore he expressed that fact in his words. Which is expressed in other words, and without that distributive, by Luke when he says, 22.17: "Take this, and divide it among yourselves;" where the word 'yourselves' designates only those present and not people in the future.

10. Now the second part, about the necessity imposed on the faithful of communicating at some point under both kinds, is wont especially to be founded on the words of Christ in John 6.53: "Except ye eat of the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." But this place cannot be urged by Calvinists, since they themselves commonly deny that Christ the Lord was in the whole of that chapter of John speaking of the sacrament of the Eucharist. Next, many Catholics too have denied that the words are to be understood of the sacramental eating of the body and blood of the Lord, whose opinion the Church has not hitherto condemned, nor has it declared the sure sense of those words, but has only excluded the one thing as false that heretics now approve. Hence the Council of Trent, session 21 ch.2, said that, "from the speech of the Lord is not collected that communion under both kinds was prescribed by the Lord, in whatever way it be according to the various interpretations of the holy Fathers and doctors understood." But the more probable exposition seems to be that there indeed is imposed on the faithful the necessity of communion in Christ in the Eucharist, but that there is no obligation imposed on the faithful all and singly of communion in both kinds, but only of receiving the flesh and blood of Christ, whether it be taken in one act or in many. Because the whole necessity is placed on union with Christ through reception of this sacrament, which suffices for salvation and life; but for life the eating of the whole Christ suffices, as we will confirm immediately by eliciting it from his words. Just as belief in Christ is sufficient for salvation, and that is to believe his flesh and his blood, although these not be believed in individual or distinct acts, so, because the whole Christ is contained under the individual appearances, the reception of the Eucharistic bread alone suffices for salvation, because in it the whole Christ is received, and (so to say) his blood is in very fact drunk, though it not be received by way of drink. Hence it happens that he wholly fulfills the precept who receives the body of the Lord; and, contrariwise, it follows that he alone violates the precept, and incurs the threat of Christ, who abstains from the body and blood of the Lord, as is rightly expounded by Fulbert of Chartres, epist.1 to Deodatus at the end. And Christ's words do admirably contain this sense, such that the negation included in the word 'except' falls on the whole of the following sentence: 'if ye do not eat of the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.' And thus does Ambrose read it, bk. De Commun. Essentia Patris etc.: "He who does not eat my flesh or drink my blood will not have eternal life." And in the same sense does Augustine expound it, tract.26 on John, whose words I will relate a little later.

11. By those words, then, the Lord wished only to show how necessary it was for the faithful to receive the very Christ into themselves through this sacrament. But he wanted distinctly to explain the receiving of his body and blood, not because it was necessary to receiving them in distinct acts, but either so as distinctly to put this sacrament forward, or to signify his passion, in whose remembrance this Sacrament is always to be celebrated, or because in the future it would be necessary in the Church for his flesh and blood to be received under diverse appearances, although this necessity was not to be imposed on all but on those who do the sacrifice. But that this intention of Christ the Lord in the words mentioned is the one we said is proved from the mind of the Council of Trent in this way. For Christ the Lord himself said that the eating of the heavenly bread suffices for salvation; therefore he did not establish as necessary the receiving of wine in its proper kind and as distinct from the receiving of the bread. The consequence is evident because one kind cannot be sufficient if both are necessary. But the assumption is clear from many words of Christ the Lord in John 6, namely, v.50: "This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die." And later, v.51: "if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." And later, after the aforesaid words in which he taught the necessity of flesh and blood, he adds, v.56: "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." Where the word 'and' is indeed taken as copulative, not however conjunctively but disjunctively (as the dialecticians say), according to the property of the word and the requirements of the matter, and according also to the common usage of Scripture. For when it is said in Exodus 2, according to the Hebrew reading, v.15: "He that smitteth his father and his mother shall be surely put to death," the sense is not conjunctive, that whoever kills both parents together, but disjunctive, that as well he who kills his father as he who kills his mother shall die. Thus, therefore, in the present case the sense of the said words of Christ is: "He that eateth my flesh dwelleth in me and I in him, and he who drinks my blood dwelleth in me and I in him;" therefore the receiving of either kind suffices for salvation. And the reason is indicated by Christ in the following words, v.57: "he that eateth me, even he shall live by me;" as if he were to say, whether someone eats my flesh or whether he drinks my blood, he receives me whole, and therefore because of me he lives. Hence again he subjoins, v.58: "he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever."

12. In addition, the ancient Fathers understood there to be no other precept under those words than that we should receive Christ sacramentally and spiritually; nor do they put the force on his being received under one or both kinds but only on our being united to him by eating or receiving him. Thus does Cyril of Alexandria, bk.4 on John 14, render the reasoning of those words in these words: "Nor can they be sharers in faith along with sanctification in blessed life who have not received Jesus through mystical benediction." And later: "Because the body of Christ is able to make alive and to renew what is corrupt with its touch alone, how may we not live who taste and eat that flesh? For those who share in him he will altogether remake to his immortality." Where the word of exclusion placed in the antecedent is to be noted; for by the force of the inference its sense is carried over also to the consequent. The same too in Chrysostom, Homilia 46 on John, where he thinks that by these words, as well as by the following ones, Christ wanted to teach nothing other than that what others thought impossible was necessary, and to persuade them that he was the true food which saves the soul: "So that they might not think he was speaking obscurely in parables but might know that it was altogether necessary for them to eat his body." And Theophylact has almost the same on that place.

In addition, Augustine, tractat.26 on John, expounds the aforesaid words of Christ, "Except ye eat etc." by those that follow, v.54, "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life," when he says: "This life he then does not have who does not eat the bread nor drink the blood." And later: "He who does not eat his flesh and drink his blood does not have life in himself." He is only deprived of life then if he receive neither kind; but, contrariwise, both "he who eats his flesh and he who drinks his blood has life," as the same saint adds. And tract.27 he says generally that Christ gave his body to eat on account of eternal life, and "the sign," he says, "that someone eats and drinks is this, if he remains and is remained in, if he abides and is abided in.” But Christ remains in him who eats only the bread and he in Christ, as Christ himself testified; therefore, on the testimony of Augustine, he eats and drinks sufficiently because he receives the whole Christ and is perfectly restored, which is most of all signified by that distinction of words, as is taken from the same Augustine, Sermo 1 ‘De Verbis Apostoli’, and from Eusebius of Nicea, Homilia 5 ‘De Paschate’, and Cyprian, in Sermo ‘De Coena Domini’, who says among other things: “Drink and food pertain to the same idea: just as by these the corporeal substance is nourished and lives and is preserved safe, so is the life of the spirit nourished by this proper food, etc.”

13. Nor is the ancient custom of the Church foreign to this sense of the words of Christ, but rather confirms it. For although it is true that in the primitive Church the use of both kinds was frequent and common to the faithful, nevertheless it is certain too that the other use of eating in one kind was begun from that time. For what Luke reports in Acts 2.46 about the use of the breaking of bread is referred by many to communion under one kind. And indeed from the force of the words nothing else can be collected. Hence, although it is certain that all the faithful then communicated in the breaking of bread, it is not certain, nor can it be proved, that all communicated under the appearances of wine; nay, it is more likely that not all were compelled to this. For (to keep silent about the rest for the present) those who were converted to the Faith from among the Nazareans were not then prohibited from observing the legal prescriptions; therefore it is not likely that they were compelled to receive the chalice, since, by their special profession, they abstained from wine. The same can also be thought about the many abstinent, who either never used wine or had a horror of it. Although, therefore, the use of the chalice was then in use, that it was of necessity imposed on all, either always or sometimes, cannot be shown by any sufficient testimony nor by any sufficient conjecture. Nay rather, that the use of the bread alone was general and common to all is indicated by the aforesaid words of Luke and confirmed by those of Paul, 1 Corinthians 10.17: “For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread.”

And likewise the ancient Fathers, although they sometimes make mention of the use of both kinds, more often speak of the eating of the body of Christ alone, because that use was more general and was judged sufficient. As is clear from Ignatius, epist.13 to the Ephesians, where he first says: “Take care to congregate frequently for the Eucharist, and the glory of God.” And at the end he subjoins: “Obedient to the bishop and priest, breaking one bread with unbroken mind, which is the medicine of immortality, the antidote to death, procuring life in God through Jesus Christ, the remedy that purges vices and repels all evils.” The same is taken from Jerome, epist.50 to Pammachius, which is an apology for his books Contra Jovinianum, near the end: “Let each prove himself, and thus come to the body of Christ, not because communion put off for one or two days makes one a holier Christian, as because today I was not worthy I will be worthy tomorrow or the day after, but because, while I grieve that I did not communicate in the body of Christ, I may abstain a little from the embrace of my wife, so that I may put love of Christ before love of spouse.” And bk.2 Contra Jovinianum: “As if we too do not equally receive the body of Christ.” Like things are read in his dialogue Contra Luciferianos. Again in Augustine epist.180 to Honoratus, where he says that the devil often persuaded apostasy on the faithful “who were absent from the daily ministry of the Lord’s body.” Hence later he exhorts the pastors of the Church with these words: “Let us more fear that the members of Christ, deprived of spiritual nourishment, be killed than that the members of our body, crushed by enemy assault, be tortured.” Finally the same is signified by Tertullian, bk. De Orat. last chapter, where he says: “One’s station is to be quitted after receiving the body of the Lord.” And later: “After the body of the Lord is received, and reserved.” Which words are clearer about the body alone, because the blood under the appearances of wine could never be suitably reserved.

14. Hence this custom is very greatly confirmed from the communion which was always handed to the infirm by way of viaticum. For if at any time the Eucharist is necessary by divine right, it is most of all so at the moment of death, as is the common opinion, very agreeable to reason, of theologians, because affirmative precepts then most strongly oblige when necessity is also most urgent, and when the time suitable for fulfilling the precept is coming to an end. But at that moment the Church was not accustomed to give both kinds but only the body of the Lord; it is a sign then that the Church always thought that communion under one kind was sufficient for salvation. For that the custom was very ancient is collected from Ambrose, from Gregory of Tours, and from the others adduced on the preceding point, and more clearly so from the Council of Nicea, ch.12 point 14, otherwise chs.13 & 18, for in chs.12 & 13 it is said about those who are departing the body: “The rule of the ancient law will be observed even now, that they not be cheated of the final and necessary viaticum of their life.” But in ch.14 a deacon is prohibited “from handing the body of the Lord to others,” and there is added: “But if there be no bishop or priest in attendance, let the deacons proffer it, and let them eat.” And like words are in the Gelasius’ epist.6 to the bishops of Lucania: “in the distribution of the sacred body he does not, in the presence of a bishop or a priest, have the right of exercise,” that is, a deacon does not. In which places mention is not without cause made of the body alone of the Lord, because a deacon, since he cannot consecrate, cannot give the Eucharist except from preconsecrated and reserved elements, but the body of Christ was only reserved under the appearances of bread. And the like, as reported by Gratian in ch. ‘Pervenit’ De Consecratione dist.2, is the fact that in the Council of Rheims ch.2 priests are reprehended “who hand over to a layman or a woman the sacred body of the Lord for carrying off to the infirm.” Where too there is mention of the body alone, because it had to be reserved from a consecration done before, and only the body was reserved. Since, therefore, this sacrament was reserved chiefly as viaticum for the infirm, it was always judged sufficient to be given as viaticum under the appearances of bread. Therefore it was also judged sufficient for fulfilling the divine precept about communion in this Sacrament.

On which point can be noted a history reported by Bede, bk.4 Anglicanae Historiae ch.14, about a certain monk to whom, when ill, Peter and Paul appeared and revealed to him his approaching death. “But first,” they said, “you must wait until the Masses are celebrated and thus, when you have received the viaticum of the body and blood of the Lord, you may be raised up, loosed from illness and death together, to eternal joys in heaven.” And yet later there is added about the prelate of the monastery, “He ordered Masses to be said and all to communicate in the accustomed way, and at the same time a particle from the same sacrifice of the Lord’s oblation to be carried off to the sick boy.” Where I weigh the word ‘particle’, which signifies only some small part of consecrated bread, and the fact that it was given for viaticum of the Lord’s body and blood, because through it the whole sacrifice was participated, and in it each kind was contained; I weigh also that he says that all communicated in the accustomed way. But the same Bede reports, in bk.2 of the same history ch.5, that the custom in England then was “to give the Eucharist to the people under the appearances of bread which, when the barbarians saw, they called it shining bread,” and they begged it from the priest, who replied to them: “If you wish to be washed in the saving font, you can be sharers in the holy bread.”

15. On behalf of the same custom can also be noted a decree of the 2nd Council of Toledo ch.11, where a canon of the 1st Council of Toledo is referred to, which says: “That if anyone not take the Eucharist received from the Priest let him be expelled as sacrilegious.” Which canon the later Council explains must be understood if someone does it by will and not if it happen by impediment of infirmity. For many of the infirm, as is said there, reject the Eucharist offered to them, not from disbelief, but because “apart from the drinking of the Lord’s cup they cannot swallow down the Eucharist handed to them.” In which words is sufficiently indicated that the ordinary custom was of giving the infirm the Eucharist without drinking from the cup, and a second canon of the older Council seems to understand it in the same sense. But some collect thence that to the infirm who could not swallow the host viaticum was to be given in the appearances of wine alone; but that it is indeed not repugnant to divine right is however not there said. It might be more collected from the 4th Council of Carthage ch.76, where about the infirm in a like case it is said: “If the dying man has constant belief, let the Eucharist be infused in his mouth;” for infusion is of something liquid. But nevertheless it could be understood of a particle of the host which, when placed in a cup with unconsecrated wine, can properly be said to be infused in the mouth of the infirm. And, if one pays attention to the present custom of the Church, such an infirm person should receive communion rather in this last way than under the appearances of consecrated wine, because it both has less of danger and is more in accord with the custom of the Church; for the use of the cup outside the sacrifice is generally forbidden, and there is no necessity that compels to the use of equity, since the other mode of communicating, which is not per se forbidden, is sufficient. For although, in the 3rd Council of Braga ch.1, that mode of communicating seems to be prohibited, as the Gloss seems to have understood, on ch. ‘Is qui’ 26 q.6, because it is said there that “intincted Eucharist” is not to be given to the people; nevertheless that prohibition is either not extended to a case of necessity or (which I consider truer) is not laid down in that sense but is against certain people “who were handing intincted Eucharist to the people as complement to communion.” For they were immersing it in consecrated wine, or they were moistening the Eucharist and giving it as complement to communion, which was superstitious because communion is sufficiently complete in the appearances of bread alone administered without any intinction, and when both kinds were to be received, as they sometimes could be, they were administered separately, in the same way that Christ the Lord offered them.

16. Nor is it an obstacle to this custom that sometimes the taking of the body without the taking of wine was prohibited, as Gratian reports from Pope Gelasius on ch. ‘Comperimus’, De Consecrat. dist.2, which others attribute to Leo; but I find in neither of them the epistle to Maioricus and John from which it is cited. But whosoever was the prohibition, it is not an obstacle, either because it is referred to the sacrificing priests, as there Gratian along with the Gloss intended and which some of the scholastics follow, for such a prohibition was laid down in this way in the 12th Council of Toledo ch.5, or

(which is more in agreement with the text and with history) what was prohibited there was only doing it from superstition, as is said in the text, “since they learn the obligation from some superstition or other,” that is, judging the taking of wine not to be licit. Which seems to have been the error of the Manicheans; for as Pope Leo relates in Sermo 4 ‘Quadragesima’ ch.5, since they felt that in Christ there was no true flesh, so as to hide their infidelity, they did not dare to be present at our mysteries. “But,” he says, “in order more safely to escape detection, they moderate themselves in the communion of the sacraments in this way: they receive the body of Christ with unworthy mouth but the blood of our redemption they altogether refuse to drink.” To abstain from the cup in this spirit and error, then, was not only prohibited but was always per se evil and sacrilegious. But this same fraud and hypocrisy of those heretics shows that communion in the body without the cup was then usual among the faithful, and that the custom was reckoned holy and religious, otherwise the Manicheans would not have dared to introduce that usage, if it was new, to hide their error. Hence then too the Pontiff might prescribe that the body not be taken without the blood, where it would be necessary to avoid that scandal, for although it is not clear to me that it was done, nevertheless the power was not lacking. And yet therefrom it cannot be collected that Christ prohibited the receiving of one kind without the other, but the inference only is that the Church could prescribe or prohibit something which Christ did not prescribe or prohibit, which is very likely; and from the same principle we conclude that the Church, when occasion of time and general reason demanded it, could have prohibited the use of the cup to the laity, although Christ did not prohibit it but gave it without precept.

17. Hence this truth may, lastly, be made convincing with reasons, whereby it can be shown, in the first place, that it was not fitting for Christ to prescribe and establish under necessity of salvation the use of the cup for the faithful all and singly. Both because the whole Christ was going to be under the individual appearances and can bestow all the necessary and fitting effect of this sacrament to those who receive him under any kind; and also because it could scarcely be done without great disadvantage and danger against the reverence due to this sacrament, which, either because of the multitude of communicants or because of their variety, both in conditions and affections of body as in prudence and caution of soul, or lastly because of the carelessness of the ministers, could in no way, according to the human condition, be avoided. Next, it might by the contrary reasons be proved that the Church acted most prudently in introducing and approving this custom of the laity communicating under the appearances of bread alone, because there came thence to them no spiritual disadvantage that might pertain to the effect of this sacrament; nay, this mode of communicating might be more useful to the same, both for exercising their faith more perfectly toward this sacrament, namely by seeing with the eyes of faith that Christ was in the whole sacrament and that the same Lord was whole in the individual parts of the sacrament; and also for greater observance and purer worship of the same sacrament, as has been sufficiently explained. For it is not worthwhile to delay over explaining these and other reasons, because we have provided it fully, according to our ability, in our theological commentaries, to which these reasons more belong than to a disputation about the foundations of the faith.

Chapter 6: On Private Masses.

Summary: 1. The king abhors private masses. The mass, even if it is done in secret, is a true sacrifice and of itself a public act. 2. The mass as to its substance is always a public action. 3. Various ways in which a mass can be said to be private. First from defect of an assembly of people. 4. A mass private in this way is altogether reprehensible. 5. No ecclesiastical precept obliges to sacrificing in the presence of many persons. 6. Secondly, a mass is said to be private because only the priest communicates in it. 7. Thirdly a mass is said to be private from circumstances of time and place. These circumstances do not render it illicit. 8. The custom of celebrating in private places is confirmed by miracles. 9. The custom of celebrating mass at any opportune time is confirmed by examples.

1. I come to the last point touched on by the king concerning the divine mystery of the Eucharist, about private masses, whose use he places among novel and recent rites and finds fault therewith. But the words of the king must be noted when he says: "I number among these articles those private masses, in which the sacrificer assumes the person of the people and of the priest at the same time." For in those words the king seems to speak about the mass as about a true sacrifice, otherwise he is wrong to insert the nouns of 'sacrificer' and 'priest', and to suppose that the priest in the mass intercedes for the people and so needs to be distinguished from them. For this reason I am in doubt whether, in those words, he is speaking from his own opinion, believing what it supposes about the sacrifice of the mass, since Luther, Calvin, and other Protestants deny it, or whether instead he only intends to refute Catholics from their own principles. We, however, presuppose the Catholic doctrine about the truth and propriety of this sacrifice and say, to begin with, that the mass, whether it be done publicly or in secret, is always a true sacrifice, and accordingly that it is never so private that it is not in itself a public action, for it is done by the priest as by a public minister constituted by the authority of Christ and in the name of the Church for things relating to God, so that he may offer sacrifice to God for the whole Christian people. And therefore rightly did the Council of Trent say, session 22 ch.6, that: "masses, although none communicate in them, must be considered truly common, partly because in them the people communicate spiritually, but partly because they are celebrated by a public minister, not for himself alone, but for all the faithful who pertain to the body of Christ."

2. According to this Catholic doctrine, then, there is no mass which (so to explain the thing) is per se and substantially private; for as to the one principally offering, who is Christ, and as to the minister, who is the priest, and as to the thing offered, which is the flesh and blood of Christ, and as to God, to whom the offering is made, and as to the Catholic Church, for which the offering is made, the mass is common; but these are the things that most pertain to its substance, and can be said to be per se appropriate to it. Some masses, therefore, can only be called private from the conditions or circumstances which are found in the celebration thereof. But since these circumstances can be multiple, they must be discussed and considered one by one whether in any sense the blame or rather calumny of Protestants against the Catholic Church might have any likely foundation.

3. And first indeed a mass can be said to be private which is celebrated without an assembly of the people. Which sense is indicated by the king when he affirms that he calls masses private "in which the sacrificer assumes the person of the people and of the priest at the same time." But this, if it be carefully considered, can be neither necessary nor strictly true unless it be supposed that the priest is altogether alone when he sacrifices; for if he have ministers, or at least a minister, the latter will assume the person of the people and not the priest alone. But such private masses, wherein no one ministers to the priest, are not permitted nor have ever been permitted by the Church; for the Church forbids mass to be said by a priest without a minister. For in the Council of Mainz under Leo III ch.43 it is said that no priest can rightly perform mass alone, and thus is it observed by the universal custom of the Church and taught by all Catholic doctors. But this is enough for the priest not to be said to assume alone the person of the people and of the priest at the same time; for the minister, whether on his own or together with the person of the priest, assumes the persons of the people. For since Paul says in Hebrews 5 that the Pontiff [high priest] is created to make offering, as for the people, so also for himself, there is nothing inappropriate in at least the priest himself assuming, together with the minister, the person of the people. Nay rather, if we consider the general idea of sacrifice on its own, no necessity is, from the force of it, collected for any minister or any people standing by; for it is clear that Abel, Abraham, and other patriarchs in the law of nature sometimes offered sacrifice alone without other ministers or assistants, because although the priest was alone he could, in the name of the people, make offering both for himself and for all of them at the same time. Hence, that now someone is required to minister to the priest is by special institution, which seems to be more ecclesiastical than divine, because it is required more on account of accidental ceremonies than the essential rite of consecration.

4. Hence, therefore, it happens that no likely cause can be given for being able to blame a private mass for this circumstance, that is, which has no one assisting at it besides a single minister, because in such a mode of offering nothing is done either against natural law or against precept or custom of the Church. The first point is clear from what was said, and it is manifest of itself, because neither the common idea of sacrifice nor the special mode or dignity of the Eucharistic sacrifice requires the presence of many, for it can with due reverence, devotion, and completeness of rite be done by a priest along with one minister alone. Again, no precept of Christ can be pointed to, because neither his action on the night of the Supper nor the words which he then spoke to the apostles contain such a precept, as can, by a likeness of reasoning, be collected from what we delivered on the previous point. Again from what Cyprian hands down, epist.62 to Caecilius towards the end, and Augustine, epist.118 ch.6, who say that Christ did not prescribe the observance to us, when we perform this mystery, of all the circumstances which he observed, but those which pertain to the substantial rite. Thus, therefore, although he celebrated it in the presence of many, he did not for that reason prescribe it always to be done so. Otherwise at least twelve people assisting would always be necessary, or also no more should be permitted, because Christ did not call all the disciples but only the twelve apostles to the Supper, and for similar reason this sacrifice ought not to be offered in the sight of women but only of men. Next, the multitude of assistants or of the number of them necessary for the performance of this sacrifice cannot be designated; therefore neither was precept given that it should be done absolutely in the presence of many; because it cannot be shown to have been written or handed down more in one way than in another.

5. Now by ecclesiastical precept it can seem to have once been established that masses not be said except in the presence of at least two witnesses, as is contained in the Council of Nantes ch.30, and others report it from Anacletus, in epist.1, where he says generally about priests: "Let them not sacrifice alone but let there be witnesses with them;" but afterwards more are required among bishops. However, this right either was not generally introduced in the Church by way of rigorous precept or was abrogated by the contrary custom, because in things which are accidental there can be variety in the Church, as reason or occasion of time requires. And so, where priests were multiplied, it could have been judged either necessary or more convenient for one minister to suffice, lest on account of the mere paucity or penury of assistants the divine cult should be lessened in the Church and priests themselves be deprived of the fruits of the sacrifices.

6. In a second way a mass can be said to be private wherein only the priest consumes the sacrament and communicates; and against this Protestants bring much violence, feigning that it is not only contrary to the ancient custom of the Church but also against divine right. But they are led only by the spirit of contradicting and calumniating the Roman Church, because they feign such a precept without foundation, as can easily be shown by what has often been discussed. For from the deed or words of Christ no divine precept about this thing can be collected, as the testimonies adduced and reason prove, because the mere deed of Christ does not induce a precept, nor is it by any words of Christ sufficiently indicated. Next, although it be true that at the beginning of the Church there was more frequent observance of the faithful who assisted at the breaking of bread participating therein, yet that this was done by obligation of a precept especially divine can be shown by no indication, and it is more likely that it came from the devotion and fervor of the faithful at that time. Especially since Paul says, 1 Corinthians 11.28: "But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread," for there could even then be many present at the sacrifice who, when examining themselves, found they were not disposed for communicating, and therefore it was also always easier in the Church to hear mass than to communicate in it; which would not be so if, as often as mass is heard, it was necessary to communicate, because there is not the same examination of conscience and the same state of justice required for each. Next, a little after the departure of the apostles from this life, times began to be designated at which alone the faithful were obliged to communicate, although however outside those times, and at least on Sundays, they were bound to hear masses. Rightly, then, did the Council of Trent condemn those who say that masses are illicit at which only the priest communicates. On which point we discussed many things in our scholastic disputations.

7. Third, a mass can be said to be private from other circumstances, as from the place, because it is said in a private house and not in a public temple deputed to the whole people; or from the time, namely because it is not at the accustomed hour at which the people are wont to come to sacrifice, but at some other hour convenient for the one sacrificing; or from the mode, because it is not done with singing or other like solemnities. And about all these ways it is certain that a private mass is not made illicit unless something is done against a special prohibition of the Church, or against the reverence due to the sacrament. The general reason is that in these accidental rites there is nothing defined by divine positive right, and therefore whatever is not per se evil, or prohibited by the Church, is indifferent. Hence, as far as regards the place, the only per se necessity is that the place be approved by the pastors of the Church, according to the ancient canons very gravely commended and renewed by the Council of Trent. But I say 'per se' because it was always customary in the Church that, for prudent cause or necessity, masses in private places or houses might be said according as time and opportune occasion was offered.

8. That this custom has also been confirmed by miracles is revealed by ancient histories. For Paulinus in his life of Ambrose reports that, when he was once at Rome, he offered sacrifice in the house of a certain noble matron, and a paralytic lying on a bed was miraculously cured. And Augustine, bk.22 De Civitate Dei ch.8, reports that a certain priest offered his sacrifice of the body of Christ in a certain private house that was suffering the noxious violence of demons, and that by his prayers the inhabitants of that house were freed from the vexation of the demon. Theodoret too, in Historia Religiosa ch.20, tells about himself that he offered the mystical sacrifice in the private house of a certain man called Mar (Sea) for his consolation. Finally the Supreme Pontiff Pius I, in his epist.1 to Justus bishop of Verona, has: "Euprepia has assigned to the poor the title to her house, where we now staying performed mass along with our poor." Which masses indeed, as regard their mode at least, seem to have been private, but as to place there can be doubt, because by titles are signified houses transferred to the divine cult, as Baronius notes for the year 112 n.4. But because Pius does not say that the house had been dedicated to the divine cult but that it was assigned to the poor by Euprepia and that she still lived in it with the poor, it is likely enough that it was not a Church dedicated to public divine office, but was a house intended for the habitation of the poor wherein masses were said privately. And this was very much wont to happen at the time of persecution by tyrants or heretics, as is taken from many things mentioned by Victor, bk.3 De Persecutione Vandalica, and Sozomen, bk.7 Historiae ch.5, and Augustine, in Breviculo Collation. Ch.17. Again, at that time masses were said in crypts. Hence Pope Cornelius, stressing to Lupicinus bishop of Vienne the violence of the persecution, says: "Nor in the better known crypts is it licit for Christians to perform mass;" where I weigh that word 'better known', for it signifies that masses could be said privately and secretly in more hidden ones. Next, masses were then said in prisons, as Cyprian testifies in epist.5, in whom must be noted the prudent warning: "In such a way that the priests too, who there make offering among confessors, alternate in turn one by one with the deacons;" by which words he also signifies that those masses were private as to mode and as to assembly of persons.

9. Wherefore, by these examples can easily be proved that it was by custom received that masses might be said at any opportune time, because it was neither necessary nor morally possible to observe in so great a variety of occasions and places a definite hour for celebrating. Add that it was always licit for priests to celebrate daily, if they wished, as we read said of the apostle Andrew: "I immolate daily to the Almighty God not the flesh of bulls nor the blood of goats but the immaculate Lamb on the altar." Jerome too, in epist.150 to Hebidias q.2, says of himself: "Daily in his sacrifices we tread the red wine from the fruit of the true vine." Which must necessarily be understood of private masses which were said by him daily. For about the same Jerome Epiphanius says, epist. to John of Jerusalem, which is number 60 among the epistles of Jerome, that he was not accustomed to celebrate public masses. About Cassius too, bishop of Narni, Gregory reports, in Homilia 37 on the Gospels, that it was his custom "to offer daily hosts to God, so that hardly any day of his life went by on which he did not immolate the host of reconciliation to God." And like things are frequently found in the histories of the lives and doings of the saints, from which can manifestly be collected that they did not observe a certain day of the week or a public and definite hour of the day for celebrating, but according to their own devotion or convenience chose an hour within the time of day permitted by the Church. And hence it is a fortiori clear that masses private as to intention of offering or other circumstances were in the same way always licit and in use; both because there is about them the same reason, and also because masses could not otherwise be so frequently celebrated. And this suffices for the present point, wherein I find no reason for doubt or difficulty which pertains to the dogmas of the faith; but other things, which have regard to the sacrifice of the mass, are not touched on by the king, and have been elsewhere, namely vol.3 p.3 disp.73ff., expressly treated of by us.

Chapter 7: On the errors about the cult and invocation of the Blessed Virgin noted in the king's Preface.

Summary: 1. What the difference is between the words 'honoring', 'adoring', and 'venerating'. 2. Several kinds of adoration. Worship (latria). Service (dulia). With what adoration the Blessed Virgin is to be adored. 3. What the king argues against in the veneration due to the Blessed Virgin, and his objection. The objection gathered from the words of the king. Satisfaction is made to the objection. The true sense of Nazianzen is reported. 4. King James argues against the invocation of the Blessed Virgin. Foundation of King James. His triple objection against the mode of invoking the Blessed Virgin. 5. This mode of invoking the Blessed Virgin is very ancient in the Church. 6. Response to the words of the king. The beatific vision consists very well with knowledge and love of creatures. The Blessed Virgin can intercede for us without losing her felicity. 7. The first objection against the mode of invoking the Blessed Virgin is dissolved. The Church does not attribute to the Blessed Virgin command over Christ the Lord. 8. The second objection is solved. 9. Satisfaction is made to the third objection; and declaration is given of how the Blessed Virgin repels demons. 10. How the Blessed Virgin destroys heresies.

1. Among other things that King James, in giving reason for his faith, writes in his Preface, he makes confession of some things that he has taken from Catholic Doctrine, with which, however, he in other things disagrees, and these latter we must briefly consider and show that they are not less certain than the former ones. First, then, when he calls Mary the most holy Blessed Virgin, he seems to think about her perpetual virginity rightly, for she who kept her virginity at some time cannot be called simply Virgin if she afterwards lost it. Next, he recognizes that she was true Mother of God from the fact that it pleased our Savior to take from her a human body for himself, and that in Christ human nature could not be separated from divinity; which is said rightly, as being borrowed from the 1st Council of Ephesus along with Leo the Great and Cyril of Alexandria. In addition, he says that "he piously and frankly confesses and constantly contends that the Virgin has been raised to a heavenly glory above all orders of blessed men and spirits, with the exception of her son at once God and man." In which confession I praise and embrace the truth; yet I ask for the sure faith of it and require its foundation. For if the king, when he says that he piously and frankly confesses that truth and constantly contends for it, means to signify that he has only a certain pious credulity and constant opinion of that truth, he does not satisfy confession of Catholic Faith. For the very ancient tradition sprung from the apostles and delivered right up to us by the unanimous consent of the Fathers, and received from the Universal Church without any dissent or hesitation, is what for Catholics makes certain faith in that truth. But if the most serene king wished to indicate this truth by his words, he must necessarily confess that something is to be firmly believed which is not expressly written down in the canonical books. Nevertheless, because we agree in truth of doctrine as to this part of it, and enough was said above about the mode and rule of believing, therefore I do not delay over confirming this truth and remit the reader to what we wrote elsewhere.

Next, the king professes to venerate the most Blessed Virgin, which we also read and admit gladly. Nor do we move question about the word ‘venerate’ or ‘adore’, although perhaps the king was purposely eager to admit first but later to be cautious; for this too we do not doubt could be done without blame, if it was done with sound mind and in a legitimate sense. For the Council of Trent, session 25, in the decree on the invocation and veneration of saints, observed this way of speaking when it said: “let us adore Christ and venerate the saints.” Epiphanius, Contra Haeresim 78, although he teaches that the Virgin is to be presented with honor and veneration, denies that she is to be adored, that is, with the adoration of worship or with divine cult, of which he there treats, and which by antonomasia is wont to be signified by the word ‘adore’ stated simply.

For greater clarity, therefore, and to explain purely and sincerely the sense of this dogma without ambiguity of words, there are three words to be noted, namely, ‘honor’, ‘adore’, and ‘venerate’; for the two first are distinguished by Augustine, Contra Sermonem Arianorum ch.23: “For,” he says, “everyone who adores honors; but not everyone who honors adores;” for we honor not only those superior to us but also equals; nay inferiors too, moreover a king sometimes honors a subject, as is said in Esther 6. But adoration seems to be shown only to one more powerful and superior, as a sign of dignity and excellence. Honor, therefore, is a testimony of virtue absolutely considered, in whatever way it be compared to the one honoring. But adoration too is witness of virtue, with, however, recognition of superior dignity and excellence, and therefore he who honors does not at once adore; but contrariwise, he who adores necessarily also honors. But the word ‘venerate’, although it seem to come closer to the propriety of adoring, because it indicates the showing of reverence and observance, is sometimes however wont to be taken for the word ‘honor’ and with the same signification, as is clear from English [Latin] propriety and use. In the present case, therefore, care must be taken lest we take the word ‘venerate’ only in this last signification; for to honor the Virgin is too little, unless it be done with due submission of mind and due estimation of her excellent virtue and dignity. But honor shown in this way is properly veneration and reverence, and can also be called a kind of adoration.

2. For the word adoration itself too is general and has various grades or kinds; for a certain kind is shown as sign of supreme and uncreated excellence which is called ‘worship’ (latría), and it is sometimes wont to be signified by the word ‘adoration’ stated simply; but there is another kind, which is shown for indicating a lesser excellence, in which signification the word ‘adore’ is sometimes taken in Scripture, as in 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 24 & 25 and 3 Kings [1 Kings] 1, and often elsewhere. And in the same way theologians make a distinction between an inferior adoration (which they call ‘service’ [dulia] by an accommodation of words) and the supreme adoration of worship, and under the first member they establish, with a certain singular excellence and perfection, the observance due to the Virgin and call it hyper-service [hyperdulia]. Which words will perhaps not please the king, but we will not dispute over them provided the thing is not displeasing, and provided by the word ‘venerate’ we signify not any honor but that which is shown to the Virgin with due estimation and submission of mind as sign of her singular excellence and sanctity. For rightly did Augustine say, bk. De Genesi ad Litteram ch.4: “Provided that what needs to be understood is understood, there is no great need to care about what it is called.” We therefore in this mind confess that the Blessed Virgin is to be venerated and we refrain from the word ‘adore’ lest it offend anyone weak in the faith. Nor does the king seem foreign to this sense; for he immediately confesses that the Virgin is the true Mother of God, which no prudent man can deny to be a singular excellence; and he adds in addition that the Virgin is placed in heavenly glory above all orders of blessed spirits; therefore he must, when he says he venerates her, be showing her honor with recognition of the excellence of the same and in witness and signification of it.

3. But these things notwithstanding, the king murmurs something in protest or finds some fault in the cult and veneration which we Catholics bestow on the Blessed Virgin when he says: “But I would not dare have her in derision nor pronounce impious words against God, attributing to her not only the name ‘divine’ but the name ‘Goddess’ too.” To which he adds other things which properly pertain to invocation, and therefore they will more agreeably be handled later. But this blame seems to contain this objection more or less: for cult or adoration is exhibited not only in deeds but also in words signifying divinity; therefore since those words signify divinity in the Virgin, they contain adoration simply, or adoration of worship; therefore they have regard not to honorable and due observance but to the disgrace of idolatry. But this objection has no foundation nor is of any importance. I deny it has a foundation because never has the Church Roman or Catholic used those words in praising or invoking the Blessed Virgin, and therefore if anything of this sort is found in some private doctor it is wrongly bestowed on her. I add too that similar words are very rarely found in Fathers or learned theologians who are of some authority with us. I remember only to have read the word ‘Goddess’ in Gregory Nazianzen in a tragedy about the suffering Christ, at the end, where he thus speaks: “O venerable Virgin, chaste, most happy, blessed now in the celestial vault of the blessed, your human seat having put off whatever decay it had, adorned with the cloak of eternity, held as a Goddess immune from old age.” But from these sorts of words or similar ones a frivolous occasion, I say, is taken for blame or objection, because it is clear from the faith and wisdom of the writer as well as from the preceding and following words that it was not used for signifying true Deity by essence but by a certain excellent participation therein. Hence we can reply to the king with the words of Christ the Lord, John 10.35: “If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, etc.” Since, therefore, Scripture calls just men, princes, and judges gods because of a certain participation, what wonder that Gregory Nazianzen, for signifying, among all created things, the excellence, dignity, and nearness (so to say) of the Virgin to God, used the name of Goddess? For that reason indeed most of all, that he did not assert simply she was Goddess but was held as a Goddess, for the word ‘as’ diminishes and names only a certain participation and imitation. Just as Christ the Lord said, Matthew 5.48: “Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father is perfect;” and John 17.22: “That they may be one, even as we are one.” Lastly we can add that Nazianzen, by using as it were poetic license and being compelled by necessity of sung verse, faithfully inserted that word beyond accustomed practice, not fearing any danger, as in fact there was none, that he would lead readers into any error. And these things now are enough for what the king touches on about the veneration of the Virgin.

4. Now against the invocation of the same Virgin the king inveighs more seriously, for he blames both the substance, so to say, and the mode. For he denies, to begin with, that we should pray to the Virgin, and he indicates the egregious foundation of the dogma and marvelous reason, or rather conjecture, when he says: “Not even that fact do I bring into my mind, that she is living so idly in heaven that she is open to the absurd prayers of any stupid man whatever, and involves herself in his affairs and business.” And later: “In heaven, in the eternal refuge of holy souls, is she placed in eternal felicity, never called away from such great joys by any care or worry about earthly things.” From which things this reason seems to be summarily collected: the Blessed Virgin cannot have care for our affairs or attend to our prayers except by being called away from her felicity; but this cannot happen; therefore we must neither do nor try it. Next, in the manner of interrupting the Virgin, he taxes three things most strongly. First, that we pray to her, so that she acts not only by prayers but also by command along with her son, and that she has command over him and dominates him. Second, that we hold her in ridicule when we feign that she descends to earth for the kisses and embraces of priests. Third, that we similarly believe that she contends on our behalf with the demons in sharp and stubborn altercation. Others lastly add that we make her omnipotent by attributing to her that she alone destroys all heresies in the whole world, and by asking her to make us blessed by showing us her son, and finally by calling her our hope, which is proper to God, and our mediatrix and advocate, which is proper to Christ.

5. However, as to what concerns the first part, Protestants have therein followed Constantine Copronimus, about whom the Suda thus transmits to memory: “The most impure of all mortals dared to prescribe that no one should make imploring intercession to Mary.” See Baronius vol.9 for the year 767 n.27. Which error the Church at once held in detestation, and the authors who report the error show sufficiently that the custom of invoking the Virgin was very ancient in the Church. For thus says Theophanes, that if anyone falling or grieving uttered the wonted cry of Christians and said: “Mother of God, help,” he was condemned as an enemy of the emperor. And Theosterictus, a writer of that time speaks, in Nicetas, thus: “She whom Christ chose for his domicile, I mean his most glorious Mother, superior to all created things, the safety of all men, the protection of the world, who, because of the excellence of her virginity, stands next to God, her venerable name, I say, he strove in every way to expel from the Church; yes intercessions to her, whereby the world stands, he wished not even to be named, since he said that she was unable to help anyone.” Against which error it will be enough now to display this way of invoking the most holy Virgin from the holy and more ancient Fathers as from witnesses of apostolic tradition.

Let the first, then, be Ambrose, in prayer 2 in preparation for mass, where, after he had prayed to God to obtain charity, he subjoins: “And so that this prayer of mine may be efficacious, I seek the support of the Blessed Virgin Mary, whom you made to be of such great merit that she first among women should offer the new gift and none beside her should receive it so new.” To this I adjoin Augustine, who in his bk. Meditationum ch.35, after a long prayer to Christ the Lord, concludes thus: “Because of your goodness, receive the prayers of your servant, and give me the effect of my petition and my desire, with the intercession and prayer and effective request of the glorious Virgin, your bearer

Mary, my Lady, together with all your saints. Amen.” And in ch.40 he thus prays the Virgin: “Holy and immaculate Virgin, Mary bearer of God and Mother of our Lord Jesus Christ, deign to intercede for me with him whose temple you deserved to be made.” And in sermon 18 about the saints, he has an outstanding prayer to the Virgin, from which the Church has taken the words, “Holy Mary, succor of the wretched, etc.” Now it is to be noted that in the Antwerp edition that sermon is by some attributed to Fulgentius; but I do not find it among his works, and therefore rightly have the theologians of Louvain placed it, not in the appendix, but among the true works of Augustine. But Fulgentius himself in his sermon ‘De Laudibus Mariae ex Partu Salvatoris’ says: “Come, virgins, to the Virgin, come, mothers, to the Mother;” and after many like things he concludes: “Therefore every course of nature did the Virgin Mary in our Lord Jesus Christ receive, so that she might come to the aid of all women who flee to her, etc.”

To these may be added Gregory Nazianzen, who in Orat. 18 relates about Saint Cyprian that blessed Justina, when harried by the demon, fled to God, and afterwards he adds: “And praying as a suppliant to the Virgin Mary, that she might bring help to a virgin in danger, she fortified herself with fasting and sleeping on the ground, etc.” And in the cited tragedy near the end he adds this: “Immune from old age, from the highest ether, be present, kind to my wishes, accept my prayers, O renowned Virgin, when to you, parent of the Word, but beyond measure and law, alone among all this honor belongs.” Which prayer he most piously and elegantly pursues to the end, and concludes it with these three verses: “Queen, Mistress, boon of the human race, be always Friend to mortals, and Greatest safety in every place for me.” With the same faith and piety Chrysostom, in his preface to Psalms 118 [119] station 3 at the end, says: “These, brothers, are the monuments and teachings of the Fathers, drawing from which we have, with the attention it was right to use, imparted to you the commandments, that is, of God which may be to your profit, so that, according to your sincere faith and religion, your actions too may be honest. In which the Lord God will confirm you, giving to you his rich mercies, and through the intercessions of our undefiled Lady, the God-bearer and ever Virgin, etc.” I omit Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, and others, whom I mentioned when disputing of this matter elsewhere, vol.2 p.3 disp.23. It pleases to add here Basil, archbishop of Seleucia, who was present at the Synod of Constantinople, although also in the Council of Chalcedon action 1, at the end, it is said he was deposed, not however because of the faith, and was a little after restored, as is collected from action 5. He therefore in his Orat. 1 ‘De Annuntiatione Deiparae’, among the many other things that he says about the praises and intercession of the Virgin, finally concludes with this prayer: “O thrice sacrosanct Virgin, look on us from heaven with propitious eye, and now indeed lead us hence with peace; and at the throne of the judge make us stand free of confusion, and make us at last partakers of the place at your right hand, etc.”

To these can be added many things from Damascene, Orat. 1 ‘De Nativitate Mariae’ at the end, and Orat. 1 ‘De Dormitione’ of the same, and Epiphanius, in his Sermo ‘De Laudibus Virginis,’ and Ephrem ‘De Laudibus’ of the same, Bede in a like homily ‘De Sancta Virgine’, Anselm in his book De Excellentia Beatae Virginis, especially the last chapter, and Bernard in his homilies on ‘Missus Est,’ and his sermons ‘De Assumptione’, and Ildephonsus in his bk. De Virginitate Mariae, Laurentius Justinianus, and very many other Fathers, whether more ancient or more recent. For in all of them will frequently be found most devout prayers to the Blessed Virgin, along with great reverence, praises, and encomia about her excellence, and exhortations to the faithful to pray for the Virgin's intercession with great confidence. And from all these we collect evidently that this custom is not new but very old, and did not even at any time grow old or change, but was preserved always in the hearts and mouth of the faithful. Wrongly therefore does the king seem to place it among the customs which he calls recent and novel.

6. Now the reason which he objects to it seems truly to be unworthy of the royal genius, and appears rather to belong to another man little versed in the mysteries of the faith and things theological. For those who know how to contemplate the felicity of the saints are not ignorant that the vision of divinity, which makes men and angels blessed, does not prevent them from being able to know and care for what is done among us. For that beatific vision is a certain eminent participation in the divine knowledge whereby God comprehends himself, and therefore just as the contemplation which God has of himself does not prevent him from considering our affairs and from very exactly providing for all, so the contemplation of the blessed in its own grade and proportion does not necessarily exclude knowledge of our affairs; nay rather it confers it on each according to the grade and status of his felicity. Hence also it happens that, without diminution or interruption of their felicity, the blessed might love us and intercede for us according to the grade of their charity. For thus about the holy angels did Christ say, Matthew 18.10 that they "do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven;" and nevertheless he calls them angels of men, saying "their angels," that is, guardians, according to that verse of Psalms 90 [91]: 11 "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." If therefore the blessed angels can guard men and are not by this care and concern for earthly things called away from the eternal joys of their felicity, who can think that the Blessed Virgin cannot hear our prayers and intercede for us without being distracted from her felicity?

But if this seem rather difficult to someone, because he believes the Blessed Virgin to be far more felicitous and more intent on eternal joys, he is manifestly deceived; for along with that very felicity and its joy there also increases both the power of considering human things together with divine ones and the affection of charity for taking up care for them, according to the nature of her status, and for the greater glory of God. Hence Christ too himself, although from the beginning of his conception he was happier by far in his soul than is now the Blessed Virgin, nevertheless he always had the highest care and concern for our salvation, and he interceded for us and now also hears our prayers and has care for us; nor on that account is he called away from such great joys of his eternal felicity.

However, as to what the king says that he cannot bring into his mind that the Virgin is living so idly in heaven that she is open to the absurd prayers of any stupid man whatever, I ask what he understands by absurd prayers, or in what sense does he say that the Virgin is open to them? For prayers can be said to be absurd whereby something absurd or indecent is asked of the Virgin, and the Virgin hears these prayers but does not comply with them. Nor is it foreign to the perfection of the Virgin or to her outstanding felicity that she has a leisure wherein she can hear these prayers; for God himself has leisure that he too is open to prayers of this sort, and sees them, not so as to receive them, but so as rather to punish them. Because that leisure is not vain or vicious, but is the leisure of contemplation, free indeed of all labor, but not destitute of knowledge and of very deep providence for all things; that leisure then the Blessed Virgin in her own grade participates. But if the king calls absurd all those prayers that are made by low and mean men, or even by great sinners, this does not at all stand in the way of their finding an entrance open to the Virgin, if they are made faithfully and honorably, and they are not only known by her but also accepted, as far as she judges it expedient according to the order of divine providence, which is common also to the other saints, as we will say in the following chapter.

7. But to the first objection against the mode of invoking the Virgin, founded on the word ‘command’, we give the same response which we presented above about the name ‘Goddess’. For the Church was not accustomed to ask of the Virgin that she give command to her son; nor to teach that the Virgin has this power or that she was sometimes accustomed to use it. But yet Augustine, bk.2 De Symbolo ad Catechumenos ch.5, signifies that the Blessed Virgin, when she said to Christ, John 2.3: “‘They have no wine’, made trial that she could command her son as mother,” but for that reason Christ replied, v.4: “‘Woman, what have I to do with thee?’ so as to distinguish between God and man,” and to signify that the virtue of doing miracles was from divinity, according to which he was not subject to his mother. Hence Augustine tacitly blames those who say that the Blessed Virgin can make requests of her son by command. But neither must it be thought that the Virgin spoke to her son at the marriage in this way, but by humbly asking and from charity requesting, as we have with Hilary, Ambrose, Cyril, and other Fathers reported elsewhere. Nor also is it likely to us that this was suspected by Augustine of the Virgin, since there is, in his words, no foundation or trace of such suspicion. Augustine, therefore, only seems to indicate that Christ responded thus so as to take away the suspicion from everyone. Or certainly Augustine used the word ‘command’ in a wider sense for a word of asking with maternal confidence, hence he says at the same time: “she made trial to command as mistress who recognized herself to be handmaid.” She could not then ask from proper command if she recognized herself to be handmaid. Thus, therefore, the Church never requests of the Virgin that she order or command. And I have only found Peter Damian, Sermo 1 ‘De Nativitate Mariae’, saying: “She came not only asking but also commanding, Mistress not handmaid;” not for that reason, however, does the Church approve that way of speaking; nay, she neither permits it to the faithful, if they should wish commonly to use it. And nevertheless Christian piety teaches that the words, which are said by way of trope and exaggeration, are interpreted with sound mind. For in Joshua 10.12, at the voice of Gedeon, “Sun, stand thou still,” it is said that the sun stood still, v.14, “the Lord hearkened [alt. obeyed] unto the voice of a man;” but if God obeyed, man commanded. But the locution is metaphorical, to exaggerate the efficacy of the prayer of a man with God. Thus therefore did Peter Damian speak, by exaggerating how great is maternal confidence with a son.

8. To the second objection we reply that it is founded on a false calumny perhaps made up by some Protestants; for in the books of Catholics I do not reckon anything of the like is found. For although it often be said, and is pious and likely, that the Blessed Virgin sometimes, at their supplication, appears for their spiritual consolation and speaks, whether of herself or through the ministry of angels, never however have I read that something unbecoming or something not most modest has happened in apparitions of this sort. Or certainly if something has been read anywhere of this sort, which may not receive a pious and prudent interpretation, one must believe either that it was the work of the demon transforming himself into an angel of light, or (which often happens) that they are deceptions of malicious men who, to escape the authority of revelations or to stamp a note of ignominy or infamy on these celestial visitations, do not fear to make up fables of like sort.

9. To the third objection, about putting demons to flight, we reply that this effect often happens through the prayer of the Virgin, and therefore it is often attributed to her by the Fathers; for Cyril of Alexandria, Homilia 6 against Nestorius in the said Council of Ephesus, among many other things that he preaches about the excellence and efficacy of the Virgin, says: “Hail, through whom heaven exults, through whom angels and archangels are made glad, through whom demons are put to flight.” And Laurentius Justinianus, in his sermon ‘De Annuntiatione’ calls her, among other things, “she who puts demons to flight.” The Church too prays to the Virgin: “Mary, Mother of grace, do thou protect us from the enemy.” And Surius reports that St. Richard, the English Cistercian bishop, at the moment of his death always had those words in his hear and voice together, and commanded them to his chaplains, so that they might not cease to pronounce them in his ears. Finally, Christ said about his faithful, Mark 16.17: “In my name shall they cast out devils.” What marvel is there, then, that the most blessed Mother of Christ should be powerful in putting demons to flight? But, as to what is said in the objection about the stubborn and sharp altercation of the Virgin with the demon, it smacks of the novelty of innovators, and is a way of speaking invented by them for mocking the piety and devotion of the faithful; for it was never asserted by Catholic doctors that the Virgin had altercation with the demon, but either that she gave command to him or (which is more frequent) secured his flight by prayer to her son.

10. Moreover, in this way too the Virgin is said to conquer all heresies, namely through Christ, who is the true light that lightens every man who does not wish to be condemned by his own judgment. And thus too many other effects of grace are attributed to the Virgin, not because she effects them of herself, but either because she bore for us Christ the author of all graces, or because she achieves them for us through him and from him. And thus too is the Virgin said to be our hope, either because through her we obtained Christ who is our hope, as Epiphanius expounded in his sermon ‘De Laudibus Virginis,’ or for explaining the great confidence with which we have recourse to her. And in this way can easily be understood very many other locutions of the saints, wherein things which, according to their excellence, are proper to Christ, are through singular participation attributed by them to the Virgin, by imitating the phraseology and mode of speaking in Scripture. Which sense is so well known to the faithful and is per se patent that it may suffer no calumny nor does it need greater interpretation or persuasion. Which response Canisius, bk.5 De Beata Virgine ch.10ff, and other Catholic writers have copiously and eruditely made; and we too in other places have touched somewhat on it, vol.1 p.3 q.26 a.1 in com., and vol.2 disp.23 sects.2 & 3, and vol.2 De Religione tract.1 bk.3 ch.9 n.4ff. But about the name of Advocate or Mediatrix we will speak generally in chapter 9, about the saints.

Chapter 8: On the things noted in the king’s Preface about the cult of the saints.

Summary: 1. Scripture and the Fathers testify that there should be a cult of the saints. 2. King James recoils from the word ‘adore’. 3. King James seems to embellish the saints with civil honor rather than religious. The Catholic Church venerates the saints with a holy and religious cult. 4. Proof from the Fathers that the custom of honoring the saints with a holy cult is very ancient. 5. Tacit objection of the king. 6. Satisfaction is made to the king's objection, and it is shown that there should be a cult of all the saints approved by the Church. 7. The custom of celebrating the feast days of the martyrs draws its origin from the apostles. 8. On what authority the Church rests in the cult of the saints.

1. There are many things that the king, in his Preface and his profession of faith, objects against the true doctrine which the Catholic Church believes and professes about the saints who have finished their life; and they can be reduced to four heads, namely to the cult and the invocation of saints, the adoration of relics and of images, which we will pursue in brief because we do not intend to give a full disputation but only a sufficient response, showing by the by that what the Church observes in these matters is not only not recent or new, but rather that those cannot be excused of pernicious novelty and rash error who have dared to find fault therewith.

About the cult, then, of the saints the king has been thus pleased to state in his Preface: "I cultivate indeed their memory, for honoring which our Church has therefore publicly instituted as many solemn days as by the authority of Scripture we read are reported in the register of the saints. But I do not suffer my credulity to be deluded by the great number of trifles written down in the acts and legends of the more recent saints." From which words we accept the royal confession in respect of the part which he at least in general contends for, that holy men reigning with Christ are by us to be cultivated as worthy of honor and veneration. For that is taught not only by Scripture and the holy Fathers and the tradition of the Church, but by natural reason too, as those words of Psalms 138 [139].17: "But greatly honored are your friends to me, God [alt. How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God]." that is, I think thus that the friends of God are greatly to be cultivated and honored, or your friends, God, I cultivate greatly and venerate. Which testimony was used for confirming this truth by Jeremias of Constantinople in his response to the Protestants ch.15, and so also is it expounded by Basil when he says in his scholium: "You knew me beforehand, he says, even when I yet was not, you led me, and I give payment in turn, so that I may escort with honor those who love you." Where much to be noted is what Basil indicates and what he collects from the words of David, that so pleasing is it to God to honor his friends that it might be offered as service in gratitude for the benefits received from him. For as Ambrose rightly says, in Sermo 1 'De Sanctis': "Whoever honors the martyrs honors Christ too, and he who spurns the saints spurns the Lord too, since he himself says to his saints, he who honors you honors me, and he who spurns you spurns me." Thus too Jerome, epist.53 to Riparius: "We honor the servants so that their honor might redound to the Lord who said: He who receives you receives me." Which is also in this way explained by Athanasius, bk. De Virginitate near the end. Other things I purposely omit because we have frequently and elsewhere treated of them (vol.1 p.3 disp.52), and because, as I said, the king of England professes that he too cultivates the memory of the saints.

2. But I will not omit to notice that here too the king has abstained from the word 'adore' and has used the word 'honor'. But we, according to what we noted in the previous chapter, avoiding questions of words, do not insist on them provided their sense be true and Catholic. Therefore, if the word 'adore' by antonomasia signify the cult of worship [latria], all Catholics know that in this sense the saints are not to be adored, in which sense Jerome above asserted that the saints are honored by us, not adored; for rather, by honoring them, we adore God; and bk.1 Contra Vigil., when he said: “Who has adored the martyr?”, adds in explanation of it: “Who has thought a man to be God?” And in the same way speak Justin, Epiphanius, Damascene, and often Augustine. And nevertheless, when the word ‘adore’ is taken in more ample signification, the same Augustine did not doubt to say, in Sermo 25 about the saints: “The most blessed Peter, the fisherman, now the multitude of believers adores on bended knee, through our Lord Jesus Christ.” Contrariwise, however, when the word ‘cult’ is taken in a stricter way, the same Augustine said, epist.44 to Maximus the Grammarian: “Lest it escape your notice and draw you imprudently into sacrilegious abuse, know that none of the dead receives cult from Catholic Christians;” yet in explanation of it he subjoins that: “Nothing finally is adored as divine which is made or fashioned by God.” For by adding the word ‘divine’ he declares that he is speaking about the cult and adoration of worship.

3. Besides this ambiguity of the word ‘cult’ and ‘adore’, there is also another that one must beware of, because the words of the king are slippery and redolent in this part too of Calvinism. For Calvin conceded that civil honor and cult was to be paid to the saints who have finished their life; but he denied that sacred and religious cult could be given them without idolatry. But the king’s words are such that they could easily be understood of civil cult, for the solemn days too, which he says have been instituted in his pseudo-church for honoring the memory of the saints, are said to have been instituted only on account of civil honor, in the way that these are also wont sometimes to be instituted for the birthdays of secular kings and princes. But if the king is only in this sense speaking of the cult of the saints, wrongly does he limit these solemnities of his only to those who are reported by the authority of Scripture in the register of the saints; for we can cultivate dead benefactors and illustrious men with civil cult, even if we are not certain about their felicity, provided at least that it not be certain they are damned. But the Catholic Church judges that not only civil but also sacred and religious cult is to be bestowed on the saints; although it not be the cult of worship but of an inferior nature, for the signification of which theologians have adapted the name of ‘service’ [dulia], as we explained in the cult of the Blessed Virgin, for the reason is the same in the other saints in their degree. For we venerate them because of a certain excellence superior to every civil dignity, and we acknowledge that they are established in the height of eternal felicity, as in their mode superior to us and singularly excellent in that order; rightly, therefore, do we profess that they are to be adored with a cult that is sacred and more excellent and distinct from the civil.

4. That this doctrine indeed is not recent but very ancient we can easily prove by the testimonies of the holy Fathers. For Ambrose in the said Sermo 1 ‘De Sanctis’, which is for the feast of St. Luke, concludes thus about the treasure hidden in a field: “Therefore, brothers, as often as we celebrate the memory of the martyrs, we should, leaving aside all other secular acts, come together without any delay to render honor to them who brought forth salvation for us with the pouring out of their blood, who were with so sacral a victim offered for our propitiation to the Lord.” The honor of the saints, then, on the testimony of Ambrose, is not only civil; for that is wont to be shown to secular acts, but this one is to be bestowed for actions that are religious and sacred, in conformity with faith and the sacred cause for which it is given. Hence Damascene said, in bk.4 De Fide ch.16: “The things that God is honored by are the same that his servants take delight in, wherefore we honor the saints with psalms, hymns, and spiritual canticles.” Therefore this cult, which is presented for spiritual actions, is in its own way spiritual; nor is it for that reason equal with the divine, because always the spirit and intention in adoring is far different. But this cult is most conjoint with the divine cult, and it redounds wholly to the supreme reverence of God, as Athanasius, Jerome, and Ambrose above note, and Basil in Orat. for the forty martyrs. Therefore too the Church is wont to honor the saints with almost the same things that God is honored with, as fasts, vigils, prayers, and other like actions, as is taken from the 3rd Council of Toledo ch.23, from Jerome Contra Vigilantium, from Cyprian epist.34 & 37, and from Augustine bk.20 Contra Faustum ch.21. Hence rightly does Eusebius of Caesarea, in bk.13 De Praeparat. Evangelica ch.7, thus say: “Honoring the soldiers of true piety as friends of God, we come also to their monuments, and we make our vows to them as to holy men, by whose intercession to God we profess to be not a little aided.”

5. Nor are Protestants wont to object against this mode of veneration and cult of saints anything that seems to be of any moment; and of whatever sort it is, we have replied to it elsewhere. In the present case, however, the king tacitly objects that the Catholic Church is wrong to venerate publicly any man who has finished this life whose eternal felicity is not clear from the authority of Sacred Scripture, and therefore he says that his Church (which he does not dare to name Catholic, nay he distinguishes it, willy nilly, from the Catholic) keeps the solemnities only of those who are said to be saints by the authority of Scripture. And he virtually confirms it, in that otherwise the faithful are exposed to the danger that their credulity may be deluded by adoring a damned man as a saint, which seems to be a great absurdity, contrary to a prudent way of operating. But, to persuade of this danger, he adds that “in the acts and legends of the saints are very many trifles written down.”

6. However, the king is always stuck in the error that nothing can or should be believed for certain except what can by the authority of Scripture be immediately (so to say) or proximately proved; but that this is contrary to the same Scripture and contrary to the authority of the Church confirmed in the same Scripture was shown above abundantly enough. And in the present it can be sufficiently proved by the example of the Innocents killed by Herod, who can by no authority of Scripture indeed be proved to have been sanctified by death and to be reigning now with Christ; and nevertheless, resting on the authority of the Church, we have a cult to them without danger or falsity. As Augustine rightly hands on, bk.3 De Libero Arbitrio ch.23, and bk.2 De Symbolo ad Catechumenos ch.5, and bk.3 ch.4, and in his sermons on the Innocents, which are numbers 8 & 9 on the saints; and Origen, Homilia 3 on diverse persons near the end, speaking about the same Innocents says: “Always, as is proper, their memory is celebrated in churches in accord with the full order of saints.” And later: “Therefore well and according to the will of God have the holy Fathers commanded their eternal memory to be celebrated in churches, either as dying for the Lord, or for Jews and gentiles who were going to believe, or even for their own parents, so that the intercession of their sons should be of the greatest benefit to them.” And many things can be seen in Cyprian, Sermo ‘De Stella, Magis, et Innocentibus’.

7. In addition, it has clearly been a custom of the Church from the time of the apostles to make in sacrifice memorial for some of the martyrs in particular, and to note the day of martyrdom so that it might be solemnly celebrated from year to year, as is taken from Cyprian, epist.34 & 37, from Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechesis 5 ‘mystagogica’, from Eusebius, bk.4 Histor. ch.14, elsewhere ch.15, where he makes special mention of the martyr Poycarp, and from Tertullian, bk. De Corona Militis ch.3, where he puts this among the written traditions, which has the highest authority in the Church, and it is confirmed by Pope Clement, bk.8 Constitut. ch.39. It is not a new thing, then, in the Church to have a cult of some of the saints, although their sanctity and felicity cannot be proved by the authority of Scripture. The thing is excellently confirmed by the words of the bishops of Europe in their epistle to Leo, and it is testified by the speeches, or addresses, or homilies of the ancient Fathers given in the honor and cult of many saints in particular, wherein they often speak excellently of the honor due to saints. There is in Gregory Nazianzen, for instance, oration 18 on St. Cyprian, and orations in praise of Basil and Athanasius, and in Gregory of Nyssa there is an oration on the martyr Theodore, and there are many similar ones in Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostom, and others, as about St. Ignatius, St. Laurence, St. Gervase, St. Protasius, St. Philogonus. But especially to be noted are the words of Chrysostom in a sermon on the martyrs Iuventus and Maximus, vol.3, which he begins thus: “Yesterday blessed Babylas with three children brought us here together, but today a part of the holy soldiers in the battle line displays the army of Christ; their ages are unequal but their faith equal; those were earlier in time, these more recent. And although the Church, possessed of pearls new and old, has so great a treasure, yet of all there is one grace.” And later: “Knowing this you do not honor the old saints in one way and the more recent in another, but all of them with the same alacrity. For you do not search out the time but you search for the courage, the faith, the fervent zeal, and the virtues that the saints bear before them, for whose honor we today come together.”

Let the king, therefore, cease to despise the saints whom he calls novel, because it is not antiquity but true sanctity and felicity that makes them worthy of such cult and honor. Nor let him fear to be in error or deceived by honoring as saints those honored by the Church, which is the pillar and ground of the truth; but rather let him be afraid of the censure given by Augustine, which I think should in this our time be held before the eyes and very often repeated. For in epist.118 ch.5, when he distinguishes the morals of the Church into three orders, he puts in the first order those things “that the authority of divine Scripture prescribes,” about which he says that “it is not to be doubted but that we should do as we read.” But in the third order he puts those things “that vary by places and regions,” about which he says that in each province that is to be kept which is wont to be done neither against faith nor against honest manners. But in the middle order he puts those things “that the Church keeps in the whole world, which,” he says, “to dispute that it should not so be done is a mark of the most insolent insanity.” Not, to be sure, for any other reason than that the Catholic and Universal Church, in things that it approves and observes by common consent, is not allowed to err by the Holy Spirit whom Christ peculiarly promised to it so as to be especially ruled by him. Therefore, when the Universal Catholic Church does not doubt about the felicity of any saint and agrees on his cult, it is not licit for a Catholic and prudent man “to dispute that it should not so be done.” For since truth and purity are no less necessary in the cult and correct judgment of saints than in other moral matters, each Catholic, without any doubt, can and should say with Bernard: “What I have received from the Church, I too hold and pass on with security; what I have not received, I confess I would admit with more scruple.” He is speaking to the canons of Lyon about this very matter of honoring the saints which we are treating of.

8. Wherefore, what the king adds about the trifles written down in the acts and legends of the saints makes no difference to the cause; for whether it be true or said by exaggeration, the cult which the Church offers to some saint not canonized in Scripture is not founded on any human history, even a grave one, much less one of suspect authorship, but is founded either on ancient tradition with the universal consent of the whole Church, or in the authentic declaration of a Pontiff, which we call canonization, which is done with such great examination of morals and miracles, and with such grave inquisition and diligence, that by itself it might be able to confer a certain moral certitude and security; but when joined with the assistance and government of the Holy Spirit, which we believe to have been promised by Christ, the certitude is made far greater, and it excludes all moral danger and all prudent doubt. But without this certitude no one is compelled to honor a man who has finished life. But if one believes by one's own special opinion that someone is a saint and honors him privately, he is not to be at once condemned but warned to examine the thing prudently first, and afterwards to show due circumspection in the manner of honoring. For if these things are observed, no trifles will harm the true faithful, if perhaps there were any in the lives of the saints; because if the faithful are able to discern them they will not put faith in them, or if in anything they are perchance deceived, the error is not wont to be pernicious but about things indifferent. Nay, even in these things great care and diligence is exercised by the pastors of the Church so that, as far as may be, histories of the saints emended and purged of errors circulate in the hands of the faithful. But we have heard that there are in circulation in England certain histories about the doings of the saints that are not only of uncertain authorship but have even been for the most part made up by enemies of the faith, and we do not wish the royal credulity to be deluded by them. Therefore we warn the king, who so religiously refuses to allow his credulity to be deluded in these things, that he should with far greater care not tolerate his faith in matters that are necessary for the salvation of the soul to be corrupted, I do not say by the trifles, but by the very pernicious errors of Calvin, Luther, and Protestants.

Chapter 9: On the invocation of saints.

Summary: 1. By what conjectures King James looks down on the invocation of saints. 2. The antiquity of the custom of invoking saints is deduced from the Fathers. 3. Augustine makes satisfaction to the objection of heretics. 4. Other testimonies from the Greek Fathers. 5. Before the Lord's advent the saints were not invoked, and for what cause. 6. The prayer of one person for another is pleasing to God. 7. To ask another to pray on one's behalf is a holy thing. 8. By parity of reasoning the conclusion is drawn that it is licit to pray to saints who have finished life. 9. The invocation of saints is neither bad nor prohibited. 10. The objection of the king against this doctrine. Solution. Christ the Lord is invoked as Redeemer, but the saints as mediators to him. 11. A second objection from the letter of St. Paul to the Colossians. Solution. 12. The sense of Paul. 13. Third objection. 14. Response. 15. Someone who thinks badly of the invocation of saints is not benefited by invoking God through Christ. 16. The invocation of some saint can sometimes be necessary for salvation. 17. The invocation of saints is safer and more useful. 18. An evasion of heretics is excluded.

1. Although the king, as he himself says, numbers this invocation of saints among the novel and recent articles of the Roman Church, and although therefore he does simply neither approve it nor admit it, yet he does not sufficiently explain in what degree or for what very weighty cause he rejects it. For sometimes he signifies only that it is superfluous and that the other way of invoking God through Christ alone is safer and more efficacious for salvation, yet sometimes, by raising objection, he indicates that this invocation of saints is superstitious and prohibited. Three things, therefore, we must briefly show. First, that this custom is not new in the Roman Church but very ancient, and by perpetual tradition constant in the Catholic Church. Second, that it is not disordered but pious and religious. Third, that to make use of this invocation of saints is not less safe but more safe and more useful by far than to lack it. So we will show these things and make satisfaction to the objections that the king insinuates.

2. The antiquity, then, of this custom of praying to the saints who have finished life is shown first by the testimonies of the Fathers, whereby they hand down that the saints are to be honored; for they also teach at the same time that they are to be invoked by us and sometimes they place this very prayer as part of the cult and honor of the saints; but at other times they assign, among other causes for the cult, that, since the saints are solicitous for our salvation and pray for us, it is just that we honor them, or conversely they say that we honor them so that they may help us by their prayers, as Augustine says bk.20 Contra Faustum ch.21, and he has almost the same in bk.21 De Civitate Dei ch.27. Hence they frequently suppose, or openly teach, that the saint in heaven intercede with God for us. Which fact is handed on in general, although as if dealing with something else, by Popes Cornelius epist.1 to all the faithful, Anacletus epist.3, Leo Sermo 2 'Apost. Petrus et Paulus', and Sermo 1 & 4 'De Ieiunio Pentecost.', and Sermo 5 'De Ieiunio Septimi Mensis'. Hilary on that verse of Psalms 124 [125].2: "As the mountains are round about." Ambrose epist.39 to Horatianum, and bk.10 on Luke 21 a little from the beginning, and best in bk. De Viduis after the middle, and bk.2 De Iacob et Vita Beata ch.10, Gaudentius Sermo 'De Petro et Paulo', Augustine bk.2 Quaestionum in Exodum q.108. Again best in Psalms 85 [86] at the end: "The Lord Jesus Christ still makes request for us; all the martyrs who are with him make request for us. Their requests do not pass away unless our sighs pass away." And about St. Cyprian he said, bk.7 De Baptismo ch.1: "They help us with their prayers."

Thus too Jerome more diffusely against Vigilantius says: "If the apostles and martyrs when still constituted in the body can pray for others, when they still had to be concerned for themselves, by how much more after their crowns, and victories, and triumphs," which he pursues at large. Hence, in epist.25 to Paula on the death of her daughter Blesilla, he says: "For you the Lord makes request, and for me, as I am secure about his mind, he secures pardon for my sins." In which words of the Fathers two things are to be considered: one is that the saints not only in general but also in particular pray for us and our necessities. The other is that from the fact the saints pray for us is very well collected that they can also be very honorably prayed to by us, because when we pray to them we most seek from them that they intercede for us, for as they know our necessities, so that they may pray for them, thus also do they hear our prayers, which they present to God, and because of them they are inclined to pray for us. Hence, the same Jerome, in his life of Hilarion at the end of the whole book, mentions the devotion of a certain holy Constantia who “was accustomed to spend nights in vigil at the tomb of Hilarion, and conversed with him as if with one present to help her prayers.” Cyprian finally, in his bk. De Mortalitate at the end, speaking of our heavenly fatherland says: “A great number of dear ones wait there for us, parents, brothers, sons; for us a populous and copious crowd longs, already secure of their immortality and still solicitous for our salvation.” And in his sermon ‘De Stella, Magis, et de Innocentibus’ he says: “Translated from their cradles to heaven they are made senators and judges of the supernal capitol, obtaining pardon for many who are undeserving.” And epist.57 to Cornelius he writes: “If any of us have already gone before from here by the swiftness of the divine regard, our love perseveres with the Lord, our prayer with the mercy of the Father does not cease for our brothers and sisters.” In which words (as Pamelius excellently notes) Cyprian openly supposes that the saints reigning with Christ, just as they pursue with the same charity the living whom they knew here, so also do they pray for them. And the same faith is shown by Cyprian, in bk. De Habitu Virgin., when he says to virgins in his final words: “Be mindful then of us, when virginity begins to be honored in you.”

3. In St. Augustine there are infinite testimonies for the antiquity of this truth, some of which I will note. One is in tract.1 on 1 John 2.1 about the words: “If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ,” which heretics are wont to object to us on this matter, and Augustine himself also objects to himself, saying: “But someone says: Therefore the saints do not ask on our behalf; therefore bishops or superiors do not ask on behalf of the people.” He responds, however: “But pay attention to the Scriptures, and see that superiors too commend themselves to the people; for the Apostle says to the people, ‘praying at the same time also for us’; the Apostle prays for the people, the people prays for the Apostle, we pray for you, brothers, but you too pray for us, let all the members pray for each other in turn, let the head for the members make request,” namely in a more excellent way, as he who is alone the propitiation for our sins, and through whom all others pray, whether they intercede for themselves or for others. Nor does it matter that there Augustine seems to be speaking about saints here living, both because in truth he does not restrict his words but speaks about saints absolutely, and also because the reason he insinuates when he says, “let the members pray for each other,” is general, because wayfarers are members, not only among themselves, but also with the blessed, in the one mystical body of Christ, and finally because, excepting Christ as singular advocate, Augustine establishes a general rule about the members, that they might be intercessors for their brothers, if others are in need. Add that in Sermo 44 ‘De Tempore’ he speaks about the holy dead when he says: “Then without any doubt do the holy martyrs intercede for us when they recognize in us anything of their own virtues.” And in a certain tract about the exposition of the Creed, which was once Sermo 181 ‘De Tempore’, and is now placed 59 in the appendix, because it seemed to those in Louvain not to be Augustine’s but taken from the writings of Gregory, though to me it is redolent more of the phraseology and doctrine of Augustine than of Gregory, but however it be, certain is it at least that it is of great authority. In that place, then, ch.13, “the communion of saints” he thus explains, “that is, we are with those saints who have died in the faith which we received, bound in society and communion of hope. If therefore we wish to have communion with the saints in eternal life, let us think about imitating them; for they should recognize in us something of their own virtues, so that they may deign to supplicate the Lord on our behalf.” In which two testimonies Augustine supposes another foundation for this truth, namely that after this life the saints know our actions and are, according to the exigencies of them, moved to pray on our behalf, which moving can most be done by prayers and petitions offered to them. There are also other places wherein Augustine, not only by teaching but also by praying, displays the antiquity of this custom, as in bk.7 De Baptismo ch.1, after he said about blessed Cyprian that: “Now not by his body, which is being corrupted, weighed down, his soul gazes on truth,” he adds: “May he by his prayers help us who labor in the mortality of this flesh as in a murky cloud, so that, by the gift of the Lord, we may, as much as we can, imitate his works.” But especially in him can be seen chs.24 & 40 Meditationum, where he most devoutly prays to all the saints in general and to several in particular. And although in his words many things can be noted whereby both the reason for, and the fruit of, prayers to the saints are made plain, yet to avoid prolixity I dismiss them and I will add some few things from the Greek Fathers.

4. Among these Fathers Chrysostom very often commends the prayers for us of the saints, and he requires at the same time our cooperation through imitation of them, as in Homilia 79 to the people, at the end, and in a certain Sermo 2 ‘Contra Desperationem’, and on Psalms 48 [49].7 about the words: “A brother will not redeem, a man will redeem [alt. None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him],” where he asks, “What then? Are the prayers of the saints vacuous? By no means, but they have even great strength when you also bring help to them.” Which words someone might restrict to the saints here living; but in fact Chrysostom is speaking simply, and the reasoning is the same, as I will now say. He also speaks in the same way in Homilia 5 on Matthew. But especially to be noted is a place in Oratio 8, among the ten recently translated, near the end, where are contained these words: “We have our Lady, Holy Mary, Bearer of God, but we need the prayers of the apostles too. Let us also speak to Paul in the way that they of ancient times also did [Acts 16.9]: ‘Come over into Macedonia, and help us.’” In which words I note, by the by, that Chrysostom thinks that we can now speak with Paul in just the same way as others spoke with the same here living. And he subjoins: “Let us pray, as I said, to the holy, glorious Virgin and Bearer of God, Mary, let us pray to the saints and the splendid apostles, let us pray to the holy martyrs.” And later he elegantly teaches that we must not wait for a time of necessity to honor the saints and win them over to us, but we must anticipate them with honor and imitation. Which he also very aptly makes plain with human examples, and concludes: “Let us be, therefore, friends of the martyrs, not for necessity but for love; before the storm, when afflicted by storms, but in the storm so that we may find peace.”

Many like things can be taken from Basil, Homilia 20, which is about the forty martyrs, where among other things he says: “Help is prepared here for Christians. You have often labored to find one who prays for you; these are forty, uttering one voice of prayer, for where two or three are gathered in the name of the Lord there God is, but where there are forty, who may doubt that God is present? He who is oppressed by some difficulty, let him flee to these; he again who is glad, let him pray to these; the former to be freed from his evils, the latter to persist in his gladnesses.” Cyril of Jerusalem too, Catechesis 5 ‘mystagogica’, says: “In the unbloody sacrifice we make mention of the prophets, of the apostles, and of the martyrs, so that God by their entreaties and supplications may take up our prayers.” Again, Cyril of Alexandria, bk.12 Thesaurus ch.10, expounding that verse of 1 Timothy 2.5: “For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Jesus Christ,” says that Christ is the sole mediator naturally and substantially. “For otherwise,” he says, “how could Paul have said that Christ was the one mediator? For many of the saints have made use of the ministry of mediation.” And he adduces as example Paul and Moses, whose ministry was of another nature besides prayer; but he adds Jeremiah 18.20, saying: “Chiefly when he called to God, ‘Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them.’” And in this way too he says that other apostles and prophets were mediators. And although he seem to be speaking about those here living, yet not only; for about the same Jeremiah already dead Onias already dead also said, 2 Maccabees 15.14: “This is a lover of his brothers and of the people of Israel, this is he who prays much for the people and the whole of the sacred city, Jeremiah the prophet of God.” And about the same Onias it is said, v.12, that he was seen stretching out his hands and praying for the people. And in this way is that testimony for confirming this truth used by Eusebius, bk.12 De Praeparatione Evangelica ch.1.

5. But one must notice that although, before the advent of Christ, dead saints might pray for the living, yet it is not read that living men prayed at that time to the dead, but to God, so that he might “hear the prayer of the dead,” as is said in Baruch 3.4; because dead saints did not then see God and thus they could not know the prayers of the living, except perhaps by special privilege. But now those established in the state of felicity are rightly prayed to, because by reason of their state they know all that pertains to them. For as Gregory said: “What do they not see who see him who sees everything?” Hence Apocalypse 5 twenty four elders were offering to God the prayers of the saints, which they could in no way do if they did not know those prayers. And therefore the angels too were always able not only to pray for men but also to be prayed to by men, because they always saw God; and thus also they could always know the prayers of men, however hidden, as is taken from Tobit 12, Daniel 10, Zachariah 1, and Apocalypse 8.

This is, finally, confirmed by the ancient Fathers in their speeches, or homilies, or even in their histories of saints; for very often, while speaking or writing, they either pour out prayers to the saints whom they are praising, or exhort the people to pray to them, or sometimes write that the saints themselves while living here promised their prayers after their death. Thus may one see from the saints cited in Ambrose in his second prayer before mass, from Chrysostom in the place cited in the preceding chapter about the most Blessed Virgin, from Basil in the said homily 20, from Nyssa in his oration for the martyr Theodore, from Ephrem in the said oration about the praises of the Virgin, and from Nazianzen in oration 18 on Cyprian, 20 on Basil, and he thinks the same in oration 24 about Athanasius. There is also a very good oration in Victor of Utica ‘De Persecutione Vandalica’ bk.3: “Entreat, patriarchs; pray, holy prophets; be supporters, apostles, especially you, blessed Peter, you, holy Paul master of the gentiles, and groan universally for us, holy apostles. We prostrate ask that you spurn not us your wretched sinners.”

Eusebius too, bk.6 Historiae ch.4, elsewhere 5, about the virgin Potamiaena going to martyrdom reports that she bade a certain Basilides, one of the followers, who had treated her more humanely, to be of good heart. “For,” Eusebius says, “as soon as she departed from life she would beg from her God pardon and grace for him;” and bk.8 ch.17 about the virgin Theodosia he reports that she went up to certain holy confessors, who were sitting bound before the tribunal of the tyrant, “to implore them to remember her when they were with God,” and by that occasion she underwent martyrdom. Lastly Augustine, bk.22 De Civitate Dei ch.8, narrates about Petronia and Palladia and others that by their prayers at the tombs of the martyrs, and by the intercession of them, they miraculously obtained salvation. And like things we will touch on in the following point, and many other things are read in the ancient Fathers, which they themselves report as true and known to them, and therefore by no prudent person can they be thought frivolities but reckoned most worthy of human faith, some things from which we will refer to in the following point. Add, and this is chief, that the Fathers who report these things most certainly believed that that way of praying, obtaining, and doing miracles was very honorable and used frequently in the Catholic Church.

From these the result is manifest that faith in the intercessions of saints and the custom of invoking them to ask for their intercessions are not new things but very ancient in the Catholic Church, which is what we proposed as needing in the first place to be proved. Hence, indeed, that remains to be proved which we promised in the second place, that this rite of praying to the saints is neither superstitious nor evil but holy and pleasing to God. For who would rather believe Luther, Calvin, and the like innovators, who reject the prayers of the saints and in this respect are followers of the heretics Vigilantius, Constantinus Copronymus, and others similar, than Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, Basil, Nazianzen, Chrysostom, and other similar Fathers, who by word and example approve of this prayer; nay who also report that God has approved and confirmed it with the great miracles that Christ placed among the most powerful signs of his Church? But such is this truth that it might not only be believed by authority but also made convincing by reason among those who do not corrupt any of the foundations or principles of our faith.

6. For one of the principles, contained even in Scripture itself, is that it is holy and pleasing to God that one person intercede for another with God by prayer. For Paul, 1 Timothy 2, beseeches for prayers to be made for king, princes, etc., and Ephesians 6 he prescribes prayer for all the saints, that is, for the faithful, and James 5 says, v.16: "Pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." Which he confirms with the example of Elias, 3 Kings [1 Kings] 17. And the primitive Church teaches us the same by its own example when it prayed to God for Peter, Acts 12, nay Christ the Lord by his own example shows the same, John 17 and Luke 22 & 23. Hence therefore do we manifestly collect that it is holy and pleasing to Christ that men who are reigning with him should intercede with him for pilgrim men, because in both, namely in wayfarers and the blessed, there is need of the same integrity and religion in respect of God, and of charity in respect of those for whom prayer is made; nor can a reason be imagined on account of which this reason should be admitted in a man living in a mortal body and not admitted in a glorious spirit more pleasing to God, for this intercession is not incongruous to the state of the blessed but most decent and fitting. And therefore Sacred Scripture also commends this prayer as well in the blessed angels as in holy or glorious souls, or even souls not yet having secured glory, as we proved above from the books of the Maccabees, and the Apocalypse, Tobias, and Daniel.

7. Another principle of the faith is that it is holy and accordingly pleasing to Christ for one man to ask of another that he pray for him for something that is lawful and that has the other conditions requisite for honest prayer. This, to be sure, is evident by natural reason, because he who asks of another that he pray for him requests of him a lawful act, which both cedes of itself to the glory of God and can be useful to each, namely to the asker and to him whom he asks; why then will that prayer not be most honest? Next, the most serene James [= the apostle James, not King James?] acted rightly in admonishing the faithful to pray for each other, and in most holy way did Paul prescribe vigils in entreaty for all the saints, Ephesians 6, where he also adds, v.19: “And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, etc.” and in Colossians 4.2-3: “Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving; withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, etc.” And the like is contained in 2 Thessalonians 3; therefore it is similarly licit for any wayfarer to ask of a faithful other to pray for him, for this is not more prohibited to us than to Paul, nor can we have less need of others’ prayers than Paul.

8. From these principles, therefore, we evidently collect that it is holy and pleasing to God to ask men who have finished life, whom we believe to be holy and already blessed, to pray for us. The inference is proved, because no reason or occasion of malice or disorder can be thought of in this act more than in the petition which is made by a man living among us; for the difference that can be thought up by adversaries can only be founded on a defect of faith. For either they believe that just men departed this life do not see God nor are made blessed until the end of the world, but this is against the Catholic Faith as well as against that which for the most part is received by English Protestants. Or perhaps they fear that they to whom we pray are not just and happy, and this hesitation with respect to the saints whom the Universal Church venerates is also against the integrity of the faith, as we have shown. Or finally they fear that dead men, even if they are happy, do not hear our prayers, and this too is against sound doctrine sufficiently approved by the Church. Apart from the fact that such suspicion or fear has no likely foundation, because it is very easy for God to provide this knowledge to the saints reigning with him, and it is very conformable to the providence of God himself that he should provide it, both for fulfilling their just desire, and also because it is very conformable to their and our state that we should be able to have some spiritual communication between us, since we are members of the same body whose head is Christ, as is taken from Paul Ephesians 1 & 4.

9. From these, then, we at length thus conclude, that to pray to and invoke the saints reigning with Christ is neither bad from the nature of the thing nor even is it prohibited, hence altogether it is good and licit. The consequence is per se evident. The major has been demonstrated by running through all the circumstances of this action and by comparing it with like petition among the living. But the minor is also easily shown, because the prohibition is not of divine positive right, because it is not found in Scripture, and the tradition of the Church shows rather that divine right permits or approves this rite of praying; nor even is it prohibited by ecclesiastical right, as is known per se; for rather the contrary error has been condemned in many Councils and most recently in the Council of Trent. Hence although the Church does not wholly prescribe praying to saints, yet it prescribes to everyone to think rightly about the invocation of saints, and it counsels prayer of this sort to all, and sometimes it prescribes this prayer to some of its ministers, by instituting a special mode and rite of praying to the saints in divine and public offices, which priests and ministers of the Church are bound to observe. On every head, therefore, prayer of this sort is holy and religious.

10. Now against this Catholic doctrine the king indicates certain objections, which, although they are proposed by him cursorily and as it were timidly, must not be omitted. The first he takes from the words of Christ in Matthew 11.28: “Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.” From which words he seems to have wanted to collect that only Christ must be approached to intercede for us and to aid our necessities. However, the sense of Christ’s words is that he himself is the sole Redeemer who can take away the burden and labors and punishments contracted from sins, and the same is author of the grace of the Law of the Gospel which has freed us from the burden of the Old Law. Therefore Christ calls us to himself as to the physician and author of salvation. And in this way the exclusive proposition is true, namely that Christ so calls us to himself that he permits us to go to no other. But by this he did not prohibit us from invoking the saints as intercessors with Christ himself, or with God through himself; nor did any of the holy Fathers make an inference of this sort, or accommodate those words to the present matter, or otherwise understand them. The fact can be seen in St. Jerome on that place, in Chrysostom Homilia 39 on Matthew, in Augustine Sermo 9 & 10 ‘De Verbis Domini’, whom other expositors, Latin and Greek, imitate. And this place can be made plain from other places in which coming to Christ signifies the same as to believe in him. For in this sense he said in John 6.35: “He that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.” And again, v.37: “All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out,” that is, I will receive him into my grace, and I will communicate to him the fruit of my redemption. In this way, then, are we bidden to come to Christ alone, because, Acts 4.12, “there is none other name...given among men, whereby we must be saved.” But this does not prevent us being able to approach the saints in prayer, so that they might, from him and through him, obtain help for us, so that we should come to him, or, if we have already come, that we should not go away from him. For in this way we have, notwithstanding the sufficiency of Christ’s redemption, rightly sought from the living that they should pray for us.

11. A second objection is that Paul, in Colossians 2.18-23, “prohibited humility and religion of angels, and all cult of veneration of this sort in superstition and humility, not for sparing the body, not in any honor to the satisfying of the flesh.” In this way does the king put forward Paul’s words, and does not further declare how anything may from them be collected against the invocation of saints, although however they are for that purpose referred to by him; for otherwise wrongly and irrelevantly would he there put them forward. Yet the intention of Paul is very different, as is manifestly clear from the context and the exposition of all the Fathers. For Paul had warned the Colossians that, as they had received Jesus Christ the Lord, so should they walk in him, rooted and built up in him [vv.6-7]. Hence he later infers, v.16: “Let no man therefore judge you in meat, etc.” By which words he teaches them to beware of Jewish ceremonies and legal observance; but next he adds, v.18: “Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping [alt. religion] of angels,” by which words he does not prohibit due veneration and invocation of the holy angels, as the innovators think, for this can neither be collected from Paul’s words nor from the Fathers and expositors. Hence some conjoin the latter clause with the preceding one and understand everything of legal observances. However, the more common and more literal exposition is that the former words are said by Paul against the error of certain heretics, who said that the angels were the makers of this world and that one must go to God through them and not through Christ. Which is reported by Epiphanius, Haeresis 21, to have been the heresy of Simon

Magus; and the fact that the Apostle wanted to condemn it was taught on that place by Chrysostom, Homilia 7, whom Oecumenius and Theophylact follow, who explain that those heretics said, by a pretended humility, that one should not be brought to God through Christ because this was greater than what we could accomplish, but that it was more suitable for us to go to him through angels, and therefore they introduced a special cult and religion of angels; and this, they affirm, is what Paul prohibited.

12. But Theodoret a little differently says there that the same persons who were defending observance of the Old Law gave inducement to the cult of angels by saying that the law was given through them, and he reports that the Council of Laodicea for this reason prohibited the cult of angels. For he seems to have in this way read canon 35 of that Council which, according to the ancient version and that of Gentianus, contains thus: "One should not leave the Church of God and go away and name angels and make congregations, which things are known to be prohibited. If someone, then, will have been found in service to this idolatry, let him be anathema, because he has left our Lord Jesus Christ." But another translation does not read 'angels' but 'angles' and it condemns those who were congregating in corners to honor idols. However the first reading is more likely since Theodoret, a Greek author and close to that time, so reports the canon. Yet it is clear that not every cult of angels was there condemned, but the one which separates from the Church and from Christ, preferring the law given by angels to the law of Christ, as Theodoret intends. But in another way Tertullian, in his book De Praescriptionibus ch.33, says generally: "Simon's doctrine of magic, in the service of angels, was itself too certainly deputed among idolatries." Hence it is a likely conjecture that Paul understood by religion of angels every superstitious cult that is by the art of magic given to the bad angels. But whatever it was that is called 'religion of angels' by Paul, it is certain that it was superstitious and belonged to idolatry, as Jerome expounds epist.151 to Algasia q.10, who expounds the words of the Jews who, after the death of Christ and the abolition of the law, "whatever victims they offer, do not offer them to God but to fugitive angels and impure spirits." But Augustine epist.59 to Paulinus says generally that the words were said by Paul, "because of the superstitions of the gentiles, wishing (he says) that by angels be understood principalities which, as placed over the elements of this world, they think should be honored in these observances;" and about these observances he says that through them it happens "that the heart of man is rendered humble as if by religion with a false humility, that makes more puffed up," as he says later. Very far distant, therefore, is such superstition from the cult and invocation of the saints, whether men or angels.

Next must be pondered the words which say, vv.18-19: "Let no man beguile you...in a voluntary humility," that is, a false one, "and worshipping of angels," that is, bad angels, "things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind, and not holding the Head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God." For these words cannot fit the Catholic Church insofar as it honors and invokes the saints. Because this does not make things vainly puffed up by fleshly mind, but things taught by the examples and doctrines, founded on divine Scripture, of the holy Fathers. Nor does it depart, through this cult, from the Head, which is Christ, but rather refers to him the whole cult of the saints, for it professes that all the saints make entreaty through him and intercede to him also for us. And thus neither does it introduce a false humility nor a false religion, nor does it impede the increase of the body of Christ through the influx of grace flowing from him, but rather, though this knitting together and communication of all the members, the unity and sanctification of this whole body is better perfected. Wherefore, indeed, such words can by greater reason be turned against Protestants, and we can with these words address the most serene king: “Let no man beguile you, etc.” for Protestants are indeed beguiling the king, “puffed up by their fleshly mind,” because they do not wish to be taught either by the Church or by the Fathers, “but by the sweet name of knowledge” (as Augustine above says) “they beguile” the king “and turn him away from the light of truth, which is Christ Jesus.” Hence, although they confess Christ with their mouth, they do not in fact hold the Head, from which all the body increases in the Lord, because they cannot hold the same head who do not wish to be in his body, nor can they increase in him by joints and bands who refuse the union and communication of the saints. Next, although these fellows do not openly invent a religion of angels to worship, yet they do invent a religion of the angels by whom they are deceived, and through whom they beguile others. The said words of Paul, then, if they are considered according to their proper sense, contain a rebuke to the gentiles not to the Catholic Church. But if they are looked on according to the general doctrine which they include, they refute and convict all heretics, and especially Protestants.

13. The third objection is indicated in these words by the king: “But with what confidence or by what author recourse is had to those household or tutelary gods, courtiers and familiars, as it were, of God Greatest and Best, I for my part know not. I would leave it to them to prove who have corrupted theology with a new way of disputing and philosophizing.” Not unjustly indeed, before I respond, can I with Augustine, epist.44 to Maximus, ask: “Is something serious at issue between us, or does it please you to jest?” For I cannot believe that the king wanted to renew the memory of household and tutelary gods unless he preferred to jest rather than to raise a serious issue. But if these things seem so light to the king, we do not have leisure to jest. But if these are thought to be grave matters, it is a wonder that he wished by the absurdity or paganism of the names of household and tutelary gods to terrify the ignorant. For the king cannot be ignorant that no dead man is by Catholic Christians called God or honored or invoked as divine. “And no otherwise,” says Theodoret, bk.8 Contra Graecos, “are guardians over cities and presidents over places venerated, by use of whose prayers and intervention with God divine services are at last secured.” And a little later: “Why then do you conceive indignation against us, since none, indeed, of our men do we refer to as gods, although we pay due honors to martyrs as to witnesses of God and his most dear servants?”

14. We set aside, then, and condemn the name of gods; but that the king says he is ignorant of the confidence wherewith we have recourse to the intercession of saints is, surely, no wonder; for faith is the foundation of confidence, and therefore where true faith is not confidence cannot be. We, however, believe that the just who have finished life and reign with Christ intercede with God for men who are pilgrims in this life, and that God hears their prayers because of Christ; and with this confidence do we go to them, not doubting but that they hear our petitions, and receive them kindly with great charity. We can also ask the king whether sometimes he request of his subjects, whom he believes to be faithful, to pray to God for him. For if he condemns this he contradicts Paul who both requested prayers for himself and admonished that prayers be said for kings; but if he approves of it and does it, I ask with what confidence he does it; certainly with no other than with that founded on some faith; with similar confidence, therefore, we go to the saints who have finished life, because we believe that they can with God care neither less nor with less charity for our affairs. Hence when again the king asks with what author we dare this, we confidently reply, in the first place, that we do it with the Holy Spirit as principal author; for he is the principal author who teaches the Church of Christ, and suggests all truth to it. Next, that we do it also with Christ as author, both because he himself tells us to hear his Church; and also because he taught us through his apostles to pray for each other, and through the successors of the apostles, whom he himself gave to the Church as pastors and doctors, he has, not only by their word but also by their example, taught us to invoke also the saints who have finished life. For it is in these ways that I have hitherto shown with what faith the saints are invoked. Nor do I fear to be comprehended in the number of them whom the king, deceived by the false calumny of Protestants, calls corruptors of theology. For this is not a judgment of truth but the abuse of heretics, in which a Catholic theologian and doctor accordingly glories.

15. There remains for us to show that the invocation of the saints not only lacks superstition but is also safer and more useful, for this we proposed in the final place, since the king's words demand this of us; for he subjoins: "Enough is it for me to invoke God through Jesus Christ as we are bid, and to tread this safer and so, in things that have regard to the faith, more effective way." In which point it is necessary to separate the work from the faith, and the use from the judgment. For although it could perhaps be enough for salvation for someone to invoke God through Jesus Christ, even if he do not invoke the saints, yet invocation through Christ will not alone be enough for salvation if he think or judge badly about the invocation of saints. Because by this judgment he is established a stubborn heretic; but for an heretic man the invocation alone of Christ cannot be of benefit, because it can be neither from true and Catholic faith nor joined with charity. Next, although on a man who thinks rightly about the faith of invoking saints the use of such invocation cannot be imposed under necessity of precept, and therefore invoking God through Christ could for him be enough, yet for many people, on whom there is incumbent, by office and debt and precept, the necessity of invoking the saints, invoking God through Christ is not enough, unless, by invoking the saints, they satisfy the obligation and precept imposed on them. Because although the redemption and intervention of Christ be of itself sufficient for our salvation, yet it requires our cooperation and obedience to the precepts, and therefore, although he be invoked by some despiser of the precepts, it is not enough for salvation, nor is such invocation heard by Christ himself or by God through Christ.

16. We add besides that, although the invocation of some saint, considered absolutely and in itself, not be necessary for salvation, it can sometimes happen that by divine ordinance and marvelous providence it is necessary. But if the king do not understand or believe this, let him read Augustine in Sermo 1 & 4 'De Sanctis' when he says: "If Stephen had not thus prayed the Church would not have had Paul; but therefore was Paul raised up from the earth because Stephen bent to the earth was heard." Although, then, it could have been enough for salvation for Paul to invoke God through Christ, nevertheless, on the witness of Augustine, the intercession of Stephen was necessary for him for salvation; namely, because it was well pleasing to God to call Paul through such a medium, and not otherwise, to the knowledge and invocation of Christ. Thus, therefore, could it happen in other men and predestined persons, that the salvation of one saint be preordained through the intercession of another saint; and that the saint would not intercede for him unless he was invoked by him. In this way, then, the intercession of one man for another, and consequently the invocation, can, by reason of divine providence, be necessary for him who invokes a saint, and for whom the saint intercedes, effectively to obtain salvation. Wherefore neither securely nor piously is it said that it is more satisfactory to invoke God through Christ alone, because although the one is commanded the other is not excluded, and because there is need of divine help for invoking God through Christ as one should, which help is sometimes to be obtained through the invocation of some saint.

17. From which the conclusion is more evidently drawn that it is not only safer but also more useful to use invocation of the saints sometimes than altogether to pass it over. Safer indeed, both because he who altogether passes it over seems to despise or condemn it, which is dangerous, and although perhaps he not condemn it, he exposes himself to the danger of it, which is not safe. And most of all because in this invocation, when done from correct faith, there can be nothing of danger to salvation, since it is pious and pleasing to God; and, from another perspective, it can happen, as I said, that God has determined to save someone when he prays through this medium, or to give him the good he desires; therefore, so far from being safer, it is not sufficiently safe to abstain from imploring the patronage of the saints. The multiple utility, indeed, of this invocation is sufficiently indicated in many prayers of the Church. One is, “that what we cannot do by our own merits, we may achieve by the patronage of the saints;” another could be, that God lavishes on “a multiplication of intercessors” what perhaps he would not concede to the request of someone praying alone.

18. But the Protestants say that God is not like a man, that he should respect persons, for God is not an acceptor of persons, and therefore neither the quality of the one praying nor the multitude of those interceding confers anything on obtaining requests. But this is advanced both against reason and against Scripture. For it is one thing to accept a person and another to weigh the dignity of a person or his condition as it pertains to the business. For the acceptance of persons in common usage, and in the mentioned words of Scripture, bespeaks a vice of distribution or donation, wherein the condition of a person is taken into consideration when it is of no importance to the cause and does not render the person suitable or worthy of such offering or gift. But in the present case, to be sure, such acceptance of persons has no place; for the sanctity of the person praying or interceding is such a condition of a person as renders him more worthy of obtaining his request, and consequently a multitude too of persons entreating, insofar as in them both greater merits and some increase of sanctity are considered, renders their prayer more efficacious with God. For not without cause did James ch.5 say that the prayer of a righteous man availeth much, but because, although the prayer of a sinner sometimes obtains its request, the prayer of a righteous man is much more easily heard. Otherwise, if God does not respect the face of the one praying, and does not consider his condition, why did he say to Job’s friends, 42.8: “Go to my servant Job...and my servant Job will pray for you; for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly,” except because he was, on account of Job’s sanctity and patience, going to hear his prayer rather than theirs? And conversely, to magnify his anger, the Lord said through Ezekiel 14.13-14: “When the land sinneth... Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, etc.” As if he were to say, although they might please me most, still I will not hear them praying for such a people; because the intercession of many and very holy men is not enough if he for whom they pray does not cooperate, as Chrysostom noted, Homilia 79 to the people, where he nevertheless shows that the prayer of many is more effective; which he also pursues at large in Orat. 3 ‘De Incomprehensibili Dei Natura.’

Also much to be noted for this proposition is the prayer of Gregory of Nyssa to the martyr Theodore near the end when, after he had asked many things from the martyr, he subjoins: “But if there is need of greater support and entreaty, compel also the choir of your brother martyrs and pray together with them all; may the prayers of many just men purge the sins of multitudes and of peoples; admonish Peter, stir up Paul, John too the theologian and beloved disciple, so that they may be solicitous for the churches they established, etc.” Much more, then, are our prayers, when joined with the intercessions of the saints, made more effective and hence more useful. Nor for that reason is the cult of God or Christ diminished but increased, because while we invoke the saints we revere more the divine majesty and we recognize our own unworthiness, and through the saints we desire to honor and glorify God more, and to give him thanks for so many benefits. Because, as Ambrose rightly said, Sermo 14 ‘De Sanctis Nazario et Celso’: “His immense piety, multiple in goodness and an artisan for salvation, proposing the arduous palm of the virtues, precious to the rare seeker, sees ahead in the triumphs of the few to the advantages of the many, since indeed it wishes their merits to be our suffrage.” Which he later magnifies adding that, although some saint “be thought to be, by the privilege of his tomb, peculiar” to some place, “yet he belongs to all by the communion of suffrage, for he is not enclosed in places who is diffused in his merits. You have called on the martyr everywhere; everywhere he who is honored in his martyr will hear you.” Rightly, then, has the Catholic Church chosen and always retained the invocation of the saints as more pious and pleasing to God and as safer and more useful to itself.

Chapter 10: On the custody and veneration of holy relics.

Summary: 1. What cult King James attributes to the relics of saints. 2. That the relics of saints are adored by Catholics with the cult of worship is falsely invented by Protestants. 3. The calumny of heretics is refuted from the Fathers. 4. Catholics venerate saints and their relics with the same cult. 5. The relics of saints are to be approached with a higher than civil cult. 6. The veneration of relics is pleasing to God. 7. The same truth is confirmed by miracles. 8. By the relics of saints demons are put to flight. 9. The public display of parts of relics is ancient and holy. 10. Relics, although not parts of saints, claim for themselves the same veneration.

1. On this point the king carps most strongly at two things, namely at the veneration of relics and the practice of keeping separately small parts of the bodies of saints so that they might be seen or touched by the Christian populace. First, however, to hide his wound and so as not to seem to be thinking in company with Julian the Apostate and Constantinus Copronymus and other heretics, who detest the relics of saints, he prefaces certain words wherewith to show that he does regard with honor the relics of saints, saying: “But as to the relics of saints, if I were to have any of the sort that are clearly parts of holy bodies, I would inter them solemnly in honorable tombs.” Here I praise the zeal of the king; but I grieve that it may not be according to the faith. For in that he judges the relics of saints to be worthy of some honor he judges rightly; yet he insinuates that the relics of saints are to be buried not with religious cult but only with civil honor; but if he thinks thus, he does not think rightly, nor according to the Catholic Faith. That he did indeed speak in this sense is made sufficiently plain by the words he a little later subjoins, wherein he says that “the adoration of relics he holds for intolerable idolatry, and he abominates it.”

2. Now in these words I take note, in the first place, that although, when dealing above with the cult of the Blessed Virgin and of the saints, he did not use the word ‘adore’ but ‘venerate’ and ‘honor’, here, changing the locution, he abominates the ‘adoration’ of relics. I ask, therefore, in what sense or with what signification he accepts the name of ‘adoration’; for if he understands by the name of ‘adoration’ that perfect and absolute and highest worship which is due to God alone, rightly indeed does he abominate them who adore the bones or bodies of martyrs with the true worship due only to God; and wrongly does he attribute such mode of adoring to the Church. Which assuredly he will be convicted of doing, since the adoration of relics which he abominates he intends to number among the articles of the Roman Church.

3. Let him know, then, that this calumny is neither new nor needs other response than the one given by the ancient Fathers. For Augustine in reply to the gentile philosopher Maximus, who in epist.43 had so written to Augustine that he seemed ignorantly to brand Christians with this note of idolatry, says thus in epist.44 near the end: “In sum, however, lest this should escape you and draw you imprudently into sacrilegious abuse, know that by Catholic Christians, whose Church is established in your town too, none of the dead is honored with cult, nor finally is anything adored as a god that is made and built by God, but the one God himself, who made and built everything.” Jerome indeed against Vigilantius, who more impudently imputed the same calumny to the Church, speaks in this way in epist.53, that: “he opens his stinking mouth again and brings forth his most foul smell against the relics of the holy martyrs, and us who take them up he calls ash-warmers and idolaters because we venerate the bones of dead men.” And later: “But we honor and worship, I do not say the relics of martyrs, but not even the sun or the moon, nor angels, nor archangels, nor cherubim, nor seraphim, or any divine presence that is named, neither in the present age, nor in the age to come, lest we serve the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. But we honor the relics of the martyrs so that we may adore him of whom they are the martyrs.” In which words I note that Jerome purposely used the words ‘venerate’ and ‘honor’, so as to avoid the calumny of the heretic, and he reserved the word ‘adore’ for God. And he observes the same in another book against Vigilantius, where he calls relics “venerable bones,” which veneration Vigilantius denied, imputing the stain of idolatry to the Church because of it; against whom Jerome says: “Who, O insane head, ever at any time adored the martyrs? Who supposed a man God?” From which words too, and from those said above, an evident reason is concluded. For if the faithful do not adore in that way the martyrs themselves or their blessed spirits, as was declared above, much less will they thus adore their relics and dead bodies. Which reason does not thus proceed of relics pertaining to Christ the Lord, because to Christ is owed special adoration; but how his relics are to be venerated we will say below.

4. But if the king does not so strictly understand the name ‘adoration’, why did he not use the name ‘veneration’ to avoid the invidiousness and ambiguity of the word? Or (which comes more properly to the thing), what is it that he abominates in the adoration of relics, since he himself confesses that the relics of saints are worthy of some honor? I certainly do not see what could displease him except that relics as things sacred we also venerate with sacred and religious acts. But in this point also (if so he thinks) he contradicts the whole antiquity of the Church, and does not differ from condemned ancient heretics, Eunomius, Vigilantius, and the like. Which can in various ways briefly be shown. First, because the Fathers teach for this reason that relics should be venerated, because their honor is the veneration of the saints whose relics they are, and hence the Fathers make plain that the saints and their relics are to be honored with the same signs, actions, and things. Because the cult of relics is so conjoined with the honor of the saints that one cannot be at all separated from the other, because the reason for each is the same, namely the excellence of sanctity, which properly and, as they say, formally exists in the mind, and by a certain participation and relation redounds to the body and other relics. Which true and Catholic doctrine is in these words very eloquently declared by Ambrose, in the said Sermo 14 at the end, where at the same time he proposes and overturns the foundation of the adversaries: “But if you say to me: What do you honor in flesh already undone and used up, for which God has now no care? And where is that, most dear ones, which Truth itself speaks through the Prophet [Psalms 116.15]. Precious, he says, in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. And again [Psalms 139.17]: how precious also are thy friends [alt. thoughts] unto me, O God! We should honor the servants of God, how much more the friends of God? Of whom it is in another place said [Psalms 34.20]: the Lord, he says, keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken. I honor, therefore, in the flesh of a martyr the scars received in the name of Christ; I honor the memory of one who lives with the everlastingness of virtue; I honor the ashes made sacred by confession of the Lord; I honor in ashes the seeds of eternity; I honor the body which showed me how to love my Lord, which taught me not to fear death on account of the Lord. But why may not the faithful honor the body which even demons revere? Which they also afflicted with suffering but glorify in the grave? I honor therefore the body which Christ honored in the sword but which will reign with Christ in the heavens.”

5. By the reason, then, for honoring these relics, which is much higher than any human justice or political dignity, we rightly collect that the honor too is higher and is thus sacred, and ought to be furnished through sacred things. And thus does the same Ambrose, epist.58 to the faithful in all Italy etc., report that there was revealed to him the building of a church in the name of Gervasius and Protasius wherein to put their bodies, which without doubt pertains to sacred honor. At the end of the epistle too he places these words reported from a book found with the relics: “I, the servant of Christ, Philip, together with my son took away the holy bodies secretly at night, and in my house, God alone being my witness, I buried them in this stone coffin, believing that by their prayers the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ follows me.” He honored them, therefore, with a higher mind and faith than the bodies of the dead are wont to be treated by merely civil honor, but it is the mind and affection that constitutes and distinguishes the quality of the cult. And in the same way the same Ambrose, epist.55 at the end, to the same people of Italy about the finding of the relics of Saints Vitalis and Agricola, thus concludes: “These few things and in brief, most beloved brothers, we have cared to signify to you about the finding of the bodies of the holy martyrs, so that you may be able to make memorial of them in the churches.”

And Eusebius thinks in a like way and for the same reason about the cult of relics, bk.13 De Praeparatione Evangelica ch.7 near the beginning, where he says: “These things we do daily, we who, honoring the soldiers of true piety as friends of God, go also to their monuments and make vows to them as to holy men, by whose intercession to God we profess to be not a little aided.” How, finally, vows can and should be made to saints has been explained by us elsewhere (vol.2 De Religione tract.3 bk.1 ch.16); but it is certain that they contain sacred cult and are made properly to God in honor of the saints reigning with Christ. But Eusebius adds that they are wont specially to take place around the monuments of the saints, so that the same cult may in some way redound to the honor also of relics. And many like things are contained in Theodoret bk.8 to the Greeks, and in Gregory of Tours bk.2 De Historia Francorum ch.37, and there is collected also from these what Augustine relates in bk.20 Contra Faustum ch.3. About this sacred honor, indeed, the Fathers speak as often as they speak about the honor of relics, as can be seen in Jerome epist.7 to Laeta at the beginning. “The people pour in,” he says, “and run to the tombs of the martyrs before the half ruined shrines; if prudence does not extort faith, shame at least does so;” and epist.7 to Eustochius: “Everywhere,” he says, “we venerate the tombs of the martyrs, and putting holy ash to our eyes, if it be licit, we touch them even with our mouth.” There are like things in his life of Hilarion, and in his epitaph on Paula, and often elsewhere. Augustine too bk. De Cura pro Mortuis Agenda chs.17 & 18, Basil Homilia on the forty martyrs, Gregory of Nazianzen Orat. 18 on Cyprian, and best Chrysostom Homilia 66 to the people, where among other things are these most worthy of note: “Even he who has put on purple comes to embrace the tombs, and setting his grandeur aside he stands to make supplication to the saints;” and Homilia on Psalm 115: “Behold,” he says, “the citizens, etc.”

6. Finally, that in this kind of cult nothing is done contrary to the religion of God, nay that it is most pleasing to God, is made perspicuous by reason, and God has himself often given approval by miracles. The reason is clear from what was said, that the bones of dead saints are not given the cult of divine honor; therefore, on this side, there is nothing done in this cult against the religion due to God. Next, the bones are not honored from false estimation or superstition, as if they perceived the honor done to them, or had an excellence in themselves because of which the honor was shown; for to offer with this mind even civil honor to them would be plainly discordant and foolish. They are honored, then, from the faith whereby we believe that they are instruments and vessels which the Holy Spirit has used for good works, as Augustine wrote rather shrewdly, bk.1 De Civitate Dei ch.13. And because the whole of it redounds to the honor of holy souls, which we also believe are not ignorant and hold the service to be pleasing which is done them in their bodies by the faithful; therefore no one using right reason can accuse this cult of but the slightest disorder even against service [dulia] much less against worship [latría].

7. The multiple testimony, next, of God through miracles is referred to by the ancient holy Fathers, and Ambrose should especially be looked at in the said epist. 53 & 55 and epist.54 to his sister Marcellina, where among other things he says: “While we were transferring the bodies of the saints, a blind man was cured, etc.” Which miracle along with others he defends against the calumnies of heretics most constantly in Sermo 5 on the same saints Gervasius and Protasius, which should by all means be looked at. And the same miracles (so that in the mouth of two eye-witnesses and of very great authority this word might be indisputable) are recognized by Augustine in bk.9 Confessiones ch.7, and also in the said book De Cura pro Mortuis Agenda ch.17, and bk.22 De Civitate Dei ch.8, where he reports many other things about the relics of Stephen and other saints. And therefore in epist.103, commending Galla and Simpliciola to bishop Tincianus, he says: "They carry the relics of the most blessed and most glorious martyr Stephen, which your holiness is not ignorant how you ought suitably to honor, even as we also did." Many other things too are related by Theodoret in the said bk.8 to the Greeks.

8. The Fathers in addition frequently confirm this truth with the example of Elisha, whose bones woke up a dead man, as one may see in Clement bk.6 Constit. last chapter, in Chrysostom Orat. in praise of the martyr Ignatius, and particularly in Cyril of Jerusalem Catechesis 18. For he says it was done: "So that not only might the souls of the saints be honored, but that it might be believed that there is also in the bodies of the dead virtue or power, because they were inhabited for so many years by the just souls which used the ministry of them." Next, to this testimony has regard the efficacy of the relics of martyrs against demons, both for expelling them and for coercing them not to give responses in idols. In which class there is a beautiful story about the relics of the martyr St. Babilas, which the impious Julian ordered to be transferred out of a certain tomb, because they were impeding Apollo from giving responses in a nearby place to the gentiles; but the church of the faithful, with great faith and alacrity, runs together to transfer the coffin of the martyr, which they carried off singing psalms with loud clamors, saying in exultation: "Let all be confounded who adore graven images and confide in their statues." So is it reported in the life of Athanasius from Sozomen bk.5 Historiae chs.18 & 19; and the same is reported by other ecclesiastical histories, Ruffinus bk.2 ch.35, Theodoret bk.3 ch.9, Socrates bk.3 ch.16. So far, then, is the veneration of relics from idolatry that it is rather a most efficacious argument for confounding it.

9. But because the king of England is particularly offended and upset by the custom of separating pieces of relics or holy bodies and showing or presenting them publicly, for that reason it is necessary to give special demonstration also of the antiquity and piety of this custom. For so ancient is this religious practice toward the martyrs that Theodoret thus writes about them in the said bk.8: "The souls indeed of the triumphant martyrs lead now their life in the heavenly fatherland, placed among the choirs of angels, but their bodies are not indeed individually buried in individual monuments, but cities, towns, and convents in the country have divided them by lot among themselves, and do not cease to confess that they are beneficial for souls in trouble and diseased bodies." And the same custom and its reason is in a brief but grave and remarkable opinion explained, as is his wont, by Ambrose in the said Sermo 4 on the saints Nazarius and Celsus, where he first said: "The happy peoples of individual cities rejoice if they are fortified by the relics of at least one martyr. Behold we possess peoples of martyrs." But next he thus subjoins: "Blessed Nazarius, therefore, the martyr of Christ, although he retain with him his whole body in the holy Church of Milan, yet he has to the world too transmitted it whole in benediction." And he adds the reason, which we now give: "For this is the glory of the holy martyrs, of whom although a portion is sown in ashes throughout the whole world, yet their fullness in virtues remains complete." As if he were to say that with great prudence and piety are the relics of the martyrs communicated part by part to the faithful, since also the whole nature of veneration can be observed in them singly, so that the saints are wholly honored in them, and their whole virtue too for obtaining benefits and miracles from God through such instruments and intercessions of saints is found in them singly.

Thus too did Basil say in the said Homilia 20, on the holy forty martyrs: "These are they who, in possession of our region, furnish refuge like sorts of towers against the incursions of adversaries, nor do they shut themselves in one place but, received as guests in many places, they have adorned the fatherlands of many; nor yet separated but mixed together; they do not, if you divided them into individuals, exceed their proper number." And later: "For if these forty are one, they are also all among each." Thus again Gregory Nazianzen, in Orat. 3, which is the first against Julian, § 'Non Victimās', adds, among other praises of the martyrs: "Whose bodies even alone have the same power as their holy souls, whether they are touched or honored, whose drops of blood even alone and the tiny signs of their passion have the same power as their bodies." And in his iambic poem 18 he thus writes: "Even a speck of dust has as it were the truth of great veneration, the way even some particles of old bones, or a little hair, or clothing, or some marks of shed blood, have equal cult with the whole body." Hence in like manner Orat. 18 on Cyprian while narrating his miracles says that: "even the ashes of Cyprian performed miracles."

But Gregory of Nyssa, Orat. on the martyr St. Theodore, with greater exaggeration says that "he may permit the taking away of the dust which covers the repository where the body of the martyr rests; the dust is received as a gift and the stored earth is collected as a thing of great price. For how much touching the relics themselves is to be longed and wished for, if it happen to be licit so to do, and is the gift of the highest prayers, they know who have experienced it and have been granted their longing." But, from the words which he subjoins, we can learn the cause for which some parts of the relics of the martyrs are kept separate, so that they may be looked on with faith and piety and, if there be need, embraced for spiritual fruit. For as the same saint subjoins: "Those who gaze on them embrace a body as if living and flourishing of itself; and apply it to their eyes, mouth, ears, all the organs of the senses; next pouring out tears of duty and affection on the martyr, as if he were whole and were visible, they offer suppliant prayers so that he might intercede in prayer for them."

This is next rightly confirmed and very openly shown to be an ancient custom by Jerome against Vigilantius, not far from the beginning, where he reports him saying the words: "What need is there for you to adore it? Something or other you honor carrying around in a little vase, some dust or other surrounded by linen cloth you kiss in adoration." Against whom, after Jerome has made clear that it is not the adoration of worship or divine adoration, he subjoins: "And you dare to say that 'something or other you honor carrying around in a little vase'. What is that 'something or other'? I long to know, expound it more clearly, so that you may blaspheme with full liberty. A little bit of dust, he says, in a tiny vase surrounded by a precious veil. He is grieved that the relics of martyrs are covered with a precious veil, etc." And later: "We are sacrilegious, then, when we enter the basilicas of the apostles? All bishops are not only to be judged sacrilegious but also fatuous who have carried a thing most cheap, loose ashes in silk and a golden vase." He could not, to be sure, in clearer words, with the testimony and example of all the bishops of his time, approve the practice now of the Church. Let the king of England see whether he dare condemn them as sacrilegious and fatuous, a thing that Jerome abandoned as most absurd and thoroughly incredible.

Hence also is easily shown how frivolous and unworthy is the comparison the king proposes, as if in mockery, between this way of venerating relics and the penalty with which malefactors are wont to be punished, their heads or other parts of their corpses suspended in public and prominent places for a perpetual infamy and penance that will endure after death. For no one locates the relics of martyrs in public for infamy, except he who makes martyrs of the faithful by persecuting them and afterwards tries to obscure the glory of martyrdom by like infamy and penance. Wherefore not unjustly can we imitate Jerome and exclaim: "Is it we, who honor the saints, or is it he, who denies to those who honor them a habitation when alive, a sepulcher when dead, who demands exile for brothers (that is, the faithful)?" And a little later: "Who allows the bones of the saints and innocent ashes to be hitherto beaten with storms?" Certainly, as I said, none but he who makes martyrs of the faithful by persecuting them. But not for image of infamy, the way the king makes fun of, but for greater honor and for display of love and for exciting faith and devotion, does the Catholic Church preserve in that singular way the relics of saints and place them before the faithful for seeing and touching. Nay I add further that this very custom shows that the Church thinks in a far higher way about the relics of saints than the dead bodies of common men are wont to be regarded. Which Gregory of Nyssa in the said oration about St. Theodore explained for me in these words. For after he said that: "The body of St. Theodore, valued and concealed as a dear thing and of great worth, is kept for the time of regeneration, endowed with many singular and outstanding things, wherefore with other, bodies that are dissolved in general and common death, it is not even to be compared; that too in a similar matter of nature," he subjoins: "For other relics indeed are abominable for most men, and no one gladly passes by their tomb or, if he come on it unexpectedly opened, he runs by it. But if he come to some place like this one, where is held today our assembly, where is the memory of a just man and holy relics, first indeed he is delighted by the magnificence of the things he sees." And later: "He desires next to approach the coffin itself, believing the touching of it to be sanctification and blessing." The Church, therefore, consulting this piety of the faithful, puts sometimes publicly before them parts of relics to be seen and touched, and prudently judges that it contributes to the greater glory of saints, whatever the calumny of adversaries.

Nor will I omit on this point to add that there are many relics of saints which are not parts of their bodies, and therefore ought not to be buried with them but preserved with due honor, of which the king seems to have made no mention, because he could not adapt to them that infamy he has of images. Of such sort are the clothes of saints which, when touched by hands, sometimes expel diseases, as about the clothes of St. Gervasius and St. Protasius is affirmed by Ambrose, epist.54, and as about the napkins of St. Vitalis and St. Agricola is said by the same in epist.55, where too he puts among these relics the nails and crosses of martyrs. Many too of the Fathers referred to make mention of holy clothes, and equate them with other relics, and hold them in the same honor, as can be understood especially from Nazianzen and Augustine. Hence Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechesis 18, says: "Even the napkins and half-girdles existing outside the body, when touched by the sick, would free them from their infirmity." Now a moral reason can be taken from Augustine, bk. De Civitate Dei ch.13: "Because paternal clothing, and a ring, and anything of this sort, is so much the dearer to descendants the greater the affection toward the parents." Thus, therefore, affection and reverence for holy clothes shows love and veneration toward the saints themselves. Hence in the life of Anthony is read that Anthony in dying had thus commanded: "The sheepskin and the worn cloak, on which I lie, give to bishop Athanasius, because he himself brought it to me new.” The same Athanasius, when writing his life, thus subjoins: “Now the legatee of the blessed Anthony, who merited by his command to receive the worn cloak with the sheepskin, embraces Anthony in the gifts of Anthony, and as if enriched with a great bequest gladly remembers the vestment, the image of sanctity.”

10. And in this order of relics are to be put others which the saints in this life familiarly used, as are books and like things, for there is the same reason about all of them. And thus the chair of St. James the Apostle and first bishop of Jerusalem was preserved with great appreciation by James’ successors right up to his own time as reported by Eusebius, bk.7 Historiae ch.14 at the end, and he adds: “Hence he clearly declares how the old Fathers up to our own age both attributed and do not cease still to attribute due veneration to holy men because of their true piety toward God.” This tradition is kept by the Church holy, Catholic, and Roman, which religiously preserves not only the relics of the bodies of Peter and Paul but also Peter’s chair and chains right up to the present day, and on their proper feast days puts them before the Christian people to see, touch, and venerate.

Chapter 11: On the true veneration or adoration of holy images.

Summary: 1. England is stirring up the heresy of the iconoclasts. 2. The faithful never pray to images. To pray before an image and to supplicate an image are very different from each other. 3. Catholics recognize in images no intrinsic sanctity. 4. Images are said to be holy from something extrinsic. 5. To give the cult of worship [latría] to images is prohibited. 6. The adoration of images had its beginning from the apostles. 7. An evasion is refuted. 8. The end of images. Prayer in no way tends to the image, but adoration can deal proximately with it. 9. Only intellectual creatures receive on their own account the honor of cult. 10. The veneration of images is concluded to be as ancient as the use of them. 11. The veneration of sacred images is approved by miracles. 12. Insulting images is a very grave sacrilege. 13. Natural reason commends the veneration of images.

1. The king of England inveighs rather vehemently against sacred images, and he calls the veneration of them, as also of relics, “intolerable idolatry,” though he does not wish to be held an iconoclast; for he always avoids the name and note of heretics, whose doctrine he disdains to follow. Now he proves he is not an iconoclast, “because I do not,” he says, “blame anyone who wishes to make statues or paint images whether for public splendor or domestic uses of private men.” But this is not enough for him not to be an iconoclast, unless he also admits that sacred images are to be venerated and confesses that they are to be retained, not only for external splendor and domestic uses, but most of all for sacred uses, for the honor of God and the saints, and for the good of the soul. For the first and chief heresy of the iconoclasts was that the images of Christ and the saints were not to be venerated, and the author of it was the Persian Xenaías, who although he was a servant and not yet baptized, was made bishop by Peter Gnapheus, as Nicephorus relates bk.16 Historiae ch.28, and he subjoins: “He first (O audacious mind and impudent mouth!) vomited out the saying that the images of Christ and of those who pleased him were not to be venerated.” And, from the lector Theodore, a more ancient writer, the same story and the same origin of the heresy was held by Anastasius in the 7th Synod action 1. In the same sense too was the same heresy afterwards followed by Leo Isauricus, Constantinus Copronymus and others later.

Then was the heresy in the same sense condemned by the Church. For if it was enough for integrity of faith to confess that images are suitable for human splendor and domestic and private uses, scarcely, I believe, might a man of sound reason be found who condemned all use of images, even a human one, as if the art of painting were intrinsically evil or specifically forbidden to Christians. Or certainly, if the Manicheans or other more ancient heretics taught that error, as many wish, it would have been enough, to condemn such error, for the Church to define that not all use of images was evil or that the civil and private use of them was permitted. But because the error of the iconoclasts was hereby not sufficiently condemned, therefore a definition against them was made that sacred images are to be venerated, and that the public and sacred or ecclesiastical use of them is to be retained. If, therefore, the king of England deny this, he will be able indeed not to be a Manichean, but he cannot deny that he is an iconoclast.

Besides the chief error of the iconoclasts was to accuse and condemn the Church of idolatry on the ground that it honored or venerated the images of Christ and the saints; hence they used to call the images themselves idols, and for this reason they took them out of temples and treated them all with ignominy and eventually threw them into the fire. All which things are clear from the ancient histories, and from the 7th Synod action 1 and more broadly from the following ones, which Photius reduced to its sum in his epistle about the Seven Synods, which is prefaced before the same Synod in the third volume of Councils. But the king of England expressly says that he holds the adoration of images as intolerable idolatry and abominates it, meaning by adoration, without doubt, what the Roman Church is accustomed to give to images; and a little later he tries to prove that an image is an idol, and to give persuasion of both points he makes use of the Scripture testimonies which the iconoclasts too used to allege against ecclesiastical tradition, as is contained in the same Synod, actions 3 & 7. Therefore the king cannot deny that he himself is defending the opinion that was condemned in the iconoclasts. What then does he lack to be an iconoclast? Is it perhaps that he does not break images, treat them with ignominy, or burn them? Certainly, though this be so, it does not excuse him of the heresy of the iconoclasts, since heresy is in the mind and in stubborn opinion, even if it do not advance to exterior effects.

However, it is known about Protestants, as Sander writes, bks. 1 & 2 De Schismate Anglicano, that in violating images they were not unequal to the ancient iconoclasts, as even the English themselves sufficiently experienced, and as their own more recent histories copiously testify; therefore the king, who adheres to the same sect of Protestants and furnishes them his royal authority, approves the same insults to images, and should be considered the author of them. I think it superfluous to launch now against this heresy a new disputation, since it is not a new heresy, and it was condemned, as soon as it formerly arose, with the fullest erudition and the highest authority in the 7th General Synod. Damascene too wrote books in favor of images, which are sufficient for impugning the heresy. Besides the fact that in our times many Catholic men have disputed on this argument most fully and effectively. Yet, nevertheless, we cannot omit to weigh the individual words of the king in order to make satisfaction to the objections he indicates, for thereby will Catholic truth be confirmed.

2. First, then, he accuses the Church of novelty in these words: "That it is necessary to adore them (that is, images), to make supplication to them, to attach some opinion of sanctity to them, is indeed a thing unheard of among the ancients.” In these words one must distinguish the false from the true, or make plain the obscure and ambiguous, lest the contention be an empty one and error be thought or imagined to be where it is not. And, in the first place, by the words “to make supplication to them” is signified that there is in the Church, or approved by it, a custom of praying to images or supplicating them; but this is not so, for in no ecclesiastical decree or grave Catholic writer will that mode of speaking be found. Nay, the Council of Trent session 25, in the decree on the veneration of images, expressly says that: “images are to be possessed and retained, and due honor and veneration imparted to them, not because it is believed either that anything is to be asked of them or that confidence is to be placed in images.” But it is known that all Catholics of this sacred Council without any doubt embraced the doctrine; therefore falsely is it attributed to Catholics that they pray to images themselves and make requests of them. But perhaps he who said this erred because he believed it the same thing to pray before an image as to supplicate it, although they are however very different. For one of the faithful who prays, for example, before an image of the Virgin has his mind fixed on the Virgin and prays to her not the image, although he look on it with the eyes of his body. For he is not ignorant that only he is to be prayed to who might hear prayers and act or intercede in the way asked; he prays, however, before an image so as to be moved by sight of it to greater devotion and attention. But he would be supplicating the image if he entreated it as something having hearing and mind, which not only Catholics instructed in the faith but even rustic fellows are unable to think; and therefore, although we pray before images, yet we do not pray to the images themselves. But to pray before them was very ancient in the Church, as can be understood from the liturgy of Chrysostom, and from others, and also from the histories that we will adduce below.

3. Next, in the words: “That it is necessary to attach some opinion of sanctity to them,” is something unheard of not only among the ancients, as is there said, but also among all present-day faithful and true Catholics, and it is being falsely attributed to them by Protestants who, in this matter as in others, are perniciously imposing on the king, unless perhaps in the word ‘sanctity’ either some ignorance or some deception lies hid. For, to begin with, the same Council of Trent said equally in the place cited: “Not because it is believed that there is any divinity or virtue in them because of which they should be honored with cult.” Where, through excluding divinity from images, it principally excludes true sanctity in its essence; but while it says that they do not have any divinity, it signifies that neither is there in them any true participation in divine excellence and sanctity. And it makes this clearer when it subjoins that there is not in them any virtue, for that was the same as to say that there is not in them true sanctity even of a created kind. Therefore the opinion of sanctity attached to images is a fabrication of the Protestants who have imposed on the king, for it is foreign to the sense of Catholics, since it has been condemned in an orthodox Council.

But I said “unless in the word ‘sanctity’ something lies hid.” For according to the doctrine of Augustine, bk.2 De Peccatorum Meritis et Remissionibus ch.26, “sanctification is not of one mode,” and thus too “there are many modes to sanctity,” as the same Augustine said, Sermo 14 ‘De Verbis Apostoli’ ch.9. For even common foods were said by the Apostle, 1 Timothy 4.3-5, to be sanctified by the word of God and by prayer; and about blessed bread, which was once given to catechumens, the same Augustine says that it is holy and more holy than are common foods, even when privately blessed; and the shew-bread in the Old Law was said to be holy, and the Ark of the Covenant was deemed holy, according to the verse of Psalms 98 [99].5: “Adore his footstool, for it is holy [alt. Worship at his footstool, for he is holy];” which according to the letter is rightly understood of the Ark, which is called the footstool of the Lord 1 Chronicles 28.2. The Ark of the Covenant is also called the Ark of Sanctification, Psalms 131 [132].7-8. Feast days too are called “holy and venerable,” Exodus 12.14-17, and priestly vestments are called “holy,” Exodus 28.2. Finally the temple itself, and especially the more sacred part of it, and the sacred vessels, and other things dedicated to the divine cult were called “holy”. In all these things, then, some sanctity must be thought of, because nothing is named holy except from some holiness. But the sanctity is not true or formal or intrinsic (as they say), but a certain relation to some true sanctity, as the theologians more fully make plain.

4. When it is said, therefore, that some opinion of sanctity must be conceived about images, if it be understood not of true sanctity, which is proper to intellectual things, but of analogous and as it were metaphorical sanctity, by relation or extrinsic denomination (as they say), we admit it as true not only without blushing or fear, but we will even show that it was handed down by the Fathers and is evident by natural reason, especially once the principles of the faith have been supposed. For sacred images, by the very fact that they are formed for representing persons truly holy, and are instituted and deputed for showing some honor to the same holy persons and for the decent and religious adornment of temples, and for the spiritual advancement of souls, ought rightly to be reckoned among holy sacred things. Hence, just as places, vessels, and sacred vestments, and other things proximate to the divine cult are reckoned to share some extrinsic sanctity, as I said, and thus are they called holy in Exodus and Leviticus and other places of holy Scripture, so too images of saints are on an equal footing in kind of sanctity with these sacred things. Which the 2nd Council of Nicea often handed on, and especially in act.2. Pope Adrian in his epistle to the emperors says: “One must not doubt that everything set up in the churches of God for the praise and ornament of the building is holy and to be honored.” And it can easily be understood from likeness of reasoning, and will be clearer from the testimonies of St. Methodius, Orat. 2 ‘De Resurrect.’ and of St. Basil, bk. De Spiritu Sancto ch.18, which we will immediately report. Finally it can be made plain by human and moral reason and from the example of the royal image, which the saints on this matter often use; for the image of a king is not indeed the king, nor does it have in it the true excellence of a king; yet because it represents the king, and stands as it were vicariously for him, it is valued as something royal, and therefore it procures a special reverence for itself. Therefore, in a higher way and reason the images of the saints, as far as these represent them, participate in a certain shadow of sanctity by reason of which they are, through a certain analogy, named holy and sacred. Over these two points, then, I consider it not necessary to delay further.

5. I come to the word ‘adore’ which has regard to the substance, so to say, of the cause. Wherein again I note that the king changed the word ‘venerate’, which he began to use at the beginning of his confession, into the word ‘adore’, so as to exaggerate, or to render more apparent, the cause of his blame. But we, to take away the invidiousness and amphiboly of the word, as we did in the case of relics, thus ask here too what he wished to signify by the word 'adore'. For if he is using it to signify antonomastically the supreme and absolute cult of worship due to God alone, we confess indeed frankly that it was unheard of among the ancients that images should be adored. Nay, we add that it was not only unheard of but even very often denied, not only by the ancients but also by those Fathers whom the king himself calls more recent, even if they preceded us by over a thousand years. For Gregory, bk.7 indict.3 epist.53 to Secundinus, who had sought images from him, says, praising his desire: "I know that you do not for this reason seek an image of our Savior, that you should honor it as God, but so that by the recollection of the Son of God you may become inflamed with his love; and we indeed do not prostrate before it as before divinity, but we adore him, in his birth or suffering, through the image, but we recollect that he is seated on the throne." And later in epist.109 to Serenus, and more fully bk.9 epist.9 to the same, he blames him for breaking the images but praises his zeal since he had thought that they were not to be adored, namely as Gods or idols, wherein some were erring; but Gregory says that they ought to have been taught and instructed, but that images ought not, because of private error, to have been broken.

And in this sense the ancient Fathers often use the word 'adore', as I noted above, and in the same sense is it said in the 7th Synod action 7, in the definition of faith, that "according to our faith true worship is not shown to images." And later Tharasius in his epistle to Constantine and Irene, although he uses the word 'adore', at once explains that he does not understand it of divine adoration; and therefore he shows that the word 'adore' according to the propriety of Greek also comprehends lesser adorations. And in the same Council action 3, Constantine the bishop of Constantia, who had been an iconoclast, on abjuring the heresy thus speaks: "I embrace venerable images, but the adoration, which accords with worship, that is the cult of God, I reserve for the Trinity alone." And Pope Adrian, in his epistle to Constantine and Irene, and in a second letter to Tharasius, accurately distinguishes the mode of venerating images, and sometimes attributes the word 'adore' singularly to God, namely in comparison with images, which he says are to be honored, although sometimes too he says they are to be adored. Next the Council of Trent too said in the place cited about images, "due honor and veneration is to be imparted to them; but through them," it says, "we adore Christ and venerate the saints." Therefore, when the word 'adore' is taken in this restricted signification, wrongly does the king attribute to the Catholic Church that it adores images or teaches that they are to be adored. But it seems incredible that the king of England labors under so great an ignorance of Roman things that he has persuaded himself that the Roman Church adores images in this way, or that the Councils and the Fathers, who fought for the veneration of images, spoke in this sense. Nor is it more credible that the king wished through calumny to impose this crime on Catholics. It is therefore more likely that the king believes that any veneration whatever of images, especially under the appearance of sanctity and religion, is perverse and inseparable from idolatry, and therefore he has seized on the word 'adore' in its broader signification.

6. If the king, then, understood the word 'adore' in its general signification and about any sacred veneration at all, it is assuredly not less wonderful how he dared to say that the adoring of images or their needing to be adored was unheard of among the ancients, since the opposite is so common and evident that it could scarcely be ignored. For, to begin with, in the aforesaid 7th Synod, and by Damascene in his books De Imaginibus, and by the Pontiff Adrian I, in bk. De Imaginibus contra Libros

Pesudocarol., and by John of Orléans, and by others more recent, so many things from the ancient Fathers have been brought together for showing the antiquity of this faith and custom, that no one who reads them could doubt that this tradition had its beginning from the times of the apostles, and that it has been retained in the Church through a continual series and perpetual succession. For, first, that Christ himself sent an image of himself not made with hands to Abagarus in Edessa is related by the ancient ecclesiastical histories, Evagrius bk.4 Hist. ch.26, Nicephorus bk.2 ch.7, and Damascene bk.4 De Fide ch.17; and it is accepted by the said 2nd Council of Nicea action 5, and is defended by Pope Adrian in epist.3 to Charlemagne ch.18, and he also affirms that his predecessor Pope Stephen approved that history.

Next in the same 2nd Council of Nicea action 1, a certain Gregory, bishop of Pessinos refers to an apostolic canon about placing images in temples at the Council of Antioch, convened during the time of the apostles, which Innocent I mentions epist.18 to Alexander; and the Council's canons from the discoveries made by Pamphilus in the library of Origen is reported by Turrianus bk.1 Contra Magdeburgenses ch.25, where he reports this canon about images more fully than it is reported in the 7th Synod, and it contains thus: "Let not the saved (that is, the faithful) be deceived on account of idols, but let them, in opposition, paint the divine and human hand-made and unadulterated effigy of the true God and our Savior Jesus Christ and of his servants, against the idols and against the Jews, and let them neither err among idols nor be made like to the Jews." Where, by the by, can be noted that so far were images from being idols that they were introduced rather for the refutation of idols and as if to hold a mean between Judaism and Paganism, as I will explain below. Again, a history is known about a very ancient image of our Savior, set up in Caesarea by a woman whom the Lord set free from an issue of blood, Matthew 9.20-22, which Eusebius reports bk.7 Histor. ch.14, who adds that it is no marvel the woman did this in recognition of the benefit she received, "since we too," he says, "have beheld images of the apostles Peter and Paul and also of Christ himself portrayed in paintings with a variety of colors, and preserved." The same history about a statue erected to Christ by the aforesaid woman in memory of the benefit is reported by Nicephorus, bk.10 ch.30, and he adds that it was taken away by Julian the Apostate and contemptuously broken up, but that the Christians, as they were able, transferred it into a church and treated it with fitting cult.

In addition, the fact that Constantine, when he began to build churches, adorned them at the same time with various images and silver statues of the apostles and other saints, is delivered to memory by Damasus on the Pontiffs, on Sylvester, and by Paulinus in epist.12 and in others. Added to these things is that Augustine, bk.22 Contra Faustum ch.73, mentions that an image of Abraham sacrificing his son was depicted in many places, and in bk.1 De Consensu Evangelistarum he affirms the same about images of Christ and the apostles Peter and Paul. Ambrose too in epist.57 says that to him there appeared along with Gervasius and Protasius a grave person "who was similar to blessed Paul, whose face had been taught me by an picture," that is, an image of Paul, which he seems to have held intimately. Which is also related of blessed Chrysostom by Damascene, Orat. 1 'De Imaginibus', who says: "Now he had an effigy of the apostle Paul in an image, in a place where, because of his weakness of body, he used to rest." Gregory of Nyssa too, Orat. on the martyr Theodore, reports that the contests of the blessed martyrs and of their guardian Christ could be read in churches depicted in artificial colors as if in a certain book. And St. Basil, Homilia on St. Barlaam which is number 18, after he had depicted with his tongue the fortitude of the martyr, concludes thus: "Rise up now, O splendid painters of athletic deeds. Illustrate with your artifice the broken image of your Leader, and render with the colors of your industry the crowned athlete who has been more obscurely depicted by me. I will depart, conquered by the image you put up of the contests and victories of the martyr, I will rejoice, overcome today by your skill in such a victory." And later: "Let there be painted together on the panel also the president of the contests, Christ, to whom be glory for ages of ages."

Nazianzen, Orat. 23 near the beginning, can also be read, where he mentions that angels were wont to be painted in bodily form with white vesture, "to signify," he says, "their natural purity." And the same use of images is collected from epist. 49 of the same to Olympius, and infinite other things we could adduce from the Fathers and the histories. But if perhaps the Protestants reject the aforesaid histories as uncertain, nevertheless the writings and testimonies of the Fathers, which suppose and prove the use of images, they cannot deny. Next, although in one or another history there could be some error or defect of truth, yet where so many examples concur, confirmed by many and very grave witnesses, it would be exceedingly rash, from the mere obstinacy of one's own opinion in the absence of any proof, to charge them all with falsity. Lastly, although the Protestants may not admit these things, at least they lay down without any foundation that the cult of images was unheard of by the ancients.

7. Perhaps they will say that the use of images is indeed proved by the aforesaid histories and testimonies, but not the cult or adoration that the king in the aforesaid places speaks of. But let them note, I beg, that not any political or private use is demonstrated from the said tradition, but an ecclesiastical and sacred use, and that therewith was conjoined the veneration of images, which is often expressly shown in the same places. Which fact indeed the Fathers of the 7th Synod very diligently weighed, and therefore, after they had in action 7 defined that salutation and complimentary adoration was to be shown to images, they at once added: "For thus is it held by the best discipline of our holy Fathers and the tradition of the Catholic Church;" and at the end the holy Synod exclaimed: "We all thus believe; this is the faith of the apostles; this is the faith of the Fathers. We stand on the legislation of the ancient Church, we guard the decrees of the Fathers."

8. Now this can be made plain in this way, for images are not indeed per se and principally made so as to be adored but rather that through them the persons they represent may be treated with cult and honor, and that at the same time they may serve for the sacred cult of temples and the spiritual usefulness of the faithful. But hence has it arisen, by a certain even natural necessity in conformity with reason, that images also are to be venerated and treated with due honor. Which can happen by a twofold manner and reason. First, because in them and through them the prototypes are adored toward which the intention of the one adoring is principally carried, as the Councils of Nicea and of Trent declared. Hence it happens that he who, for instance, adores Christ in an image does it at the same time by venerating the image, performing a sign of reverence in regard to it, as kissing, greeting, etc. In which there is to be noted a distinction between prayer and adoration; for prayer, whether done in mind or voice before the image, in no way pertains to the image nor reaches it (so to explain the thing), because it can be referred only to someone who understands; but adoration, which is shown through action of the body, although it be directed to the person, can proximately be performed about the thing, distinct from the person, insofar as it is joined to the person, whether in fact, as is clothing or a throne on which a king sits, or by relation, as is an image, relics, and the like. And therefore, when these are adored as instruments of the person, the instruments or images too must in some way be adored along therewith.

9. In another way images can and should be treated with veneration as often as some action is performed about them, although then it not be proper and formal adoration of the person but the image is only regarded as a certain sacred thing, which should be treated with due veneration just as other sacred things “are approached reverently by us” as the 7th Synod said in its definition. And thus also did Gregory say, bk.7 indict.2 epist.5: “The image of the God-bearer and the cross borne aloft with the veneration that is due.” And nevertheless this respective reverence too is in relation to the image, because it is wholly performed on account of the thing represented. And thus it happens that all this veneration of images is lessened and relativized in respect of the veneration of the prototypes. And the effect consequently is that the veneration of images of any angels or men, under Christ the Lord, not only fails of true worship [latría] but also of service [dulia] proper speaking simply, which is an absolute veneration because of proper excellence. Hence the veneration too that is shown to the image of Christ, although it be conjoined with adoration of God himself, is yet not absolute worship as far as it is concerned with the image, but is respective and relative, because it wholly tends toward God and is founded on his excellence. And for this reason the Fathers sometimes say that only persons with understanding are to be venerated or adored, namely, absolutely and for themselves; but at other times they assert that even inanimate things can be adored, namely with a respective cult and because of another, as one may see in the said epistle of Adrian to Constantine and Irene, and often in other places of the same Council. And thus too did Augustine say, bk.3 De Trinitate ch.10 that: “The marvelous signs of the works of God, especially those done by divine virtue and that are permanent, possess both astonishment as marvels and honor as things religious; but those that are done by men can possess honor as religious although they do not effect astonishment.”

10. When therefore this veneration of images is so understood, the conclusion by right reason is drawn that it is in the Church as ancient as the sacred use of images is ancient, the way Nicephorus of Constantinople said in his orthodox dialogue De Imaginibus, in Turrianus above, where he says among other things: “When a heretic asks where it is written about adoring the image of Christ, one must reply that it is written there where it is written that Christ is to be adored, because the image is one with the prototype, not by nature but by relation, and therefore it has communion also both in name and in honor,” namely in the aforesaid way. Which doctrine is confirmed by the authority of Athanasius and of other Fathers. The same can in addition be collected from the ancient use itself of sacred images; for they were always placed in temples and on altars, as is clear from the testimonies cited and from epist.3 of Pope Adrian to Charlemagne; but this pertains to religious cult and veneration; because, besides, they were also placed in sacred chalices, as is clear from Tertullian, bk. De Pudicitia chs.7 & 10. Again, in sacred litanies and processions there was a custom for images of the cross and the saints to be carried; and Bede, bk.1 Historiae Anglorum ch.25 reports that Augustine and his companions entered to preach the Gospel “carrying for standard a silver cross and an image of the Lord painted on a panel.” The same is shown by the use of burning lamps before images, as is collected from Fortunatus, bk.4 De Vita Sancti Martini at the end.

11. Add that God often approved this veneration of images with miracles or marvelous signs, such as was in the image of Christ set up at Caesarea by way of statue, because at its foot a certain herb sprang up and, when it reached its edge, it received power for expelling sicknesses, as the historians and Fathers above mentioned report, and Gregory of Tours in book 1 De Gloria Martyrum ch.21, and similar divine benefits conferred through the image of Christ sent to Abagarus are reported in the histories above cited. Related to this too is that often by a single anointing of oil from lamps burning before images the infirm have been cured, as is clear from Fortunatus above and from others. Again, worthy enough of admiration is what Damascene, bk.3 De Imaginibus near the end, reports about Theophilus of Alexandria, who because of the hostilities which he waged in his life with Chrysostom was not permitted to die “until an image of Chrysostom was brought to him which when he had adored he gave up his spirit.”

12. In addition, injuries to sacred images or insults were always regarded as a very grave sacrilege against the due cult of saints and sacred things; therefore, contrariwise, it is a manifest sign that the cult due to them was always judged sacred. The consequence is certainly evident. But I collect the assumption in the first place from the words of Simeon Stylites in his epistle to the emperor Justin reported in the said 7th Synod action 1. “This wicked deed,” he says, “exceeds every blasphemy, because they have perpetrated it against God the Word made incarnate for us, and against his Mother, and against the venerable and holy cross. For since we see that your pious laws punish with the extreme and just suffering of death those who treat the image or statue of the emperor with infamy, by what penalty should they ultimately be punished who have advanced in abominable crime against the image of our Lord and his Mother?” Where he clearly thinks that this offense exceeds a civil injury redounding even against the person of the emperor. Hence sometimes the bitterness of this crime is pointed out by a heavenly sign, such as was the abundance of blood that flowed from an image of the Crucifix when pierced with a spear by a Jew, as Sigebert reports in Chronic. for the year 568, and Gregory of Tours, bk.1 De Gloria Martyrum ch.22. And something similar is reported from Athanasius in the 7th Synod action 4.

Next, the same Fathers speaking in the same places about images often call them sacred, holy, and venerable, and sometimes they use the word ‘adore’ of them, sometimes the word ‘venerate’ or ‘greet’, as is plain from those mentioned, and from Anastasius of Sinai, in Orat. de Sacra Sinaxi, when he says that, “it is not enough to enter the Church and to venerate the divine forms of holy images and the precious and venerable crosses, if the uncleanness of sins are not also washed away by confession and tears.” Which oration, turned into Latin, was offered to the Pontiff Gregory XIII by Achilles Statius the Lusitanian, as Baronius reports for the year of Christ 599 nn.9 & 10. He also reports for the year 656, from the acts and life of St. Maximus, a beautiful history and colloquy between Maximus and certain legates of the emperor who were sent to him, which is concluded in these words: “After everyone rose up with tears of happiness, they bowed also with humble reverence to each other and prayer was said. And each of them greeted the holy Gospels, and the precious cross and image of our God and Savior Jesus Christ and of his Mother our Lady the God-bearer.” These words more or less are recalled by Euthymius bishop of Sardis in the said Synod action 4. And in them too can be pondered the oath, a sacred and religious act, which was made on the Gospels and on the images as on things sacred and worthy of religious veneration.

13. It is manifest, then, from the tradition of the Fathers that the ancient Church always observed, along with the use of images, the sacred veneration of them. And certainly natural reason demonstrates the same, because the honor is of the same sort as the excellence on which it is founded; but the reason for venerating images of Christ or the saints is the same excellence or sanctity of the prototypes; therefore the veneration of them has regard to the same order or the same virtue to which pertains the honor of the persons, because it is altogether referred to them. Just as the honor to the royal image is in a way royal and injury to it is judged to pertain to the crime of lèse majesté, which example and argument, as I said, the Fathers and the Councils use.

Chapter 12: Satisfaction is made to the objections of the king against the veneration of images.

Summary: 1. King James' words of astonishment against the veneration of images. 2. First, second, and third objection. 3. Satisfaction is made to the first objection. The veneration of images is not prohibited by any positive divine precept. 4. There is no natural precept to prohibit the veneration of images. From the places in Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5 it is shown that no conclusion follows. 5. Satisfaction is made to the second objection. The veneration of images is very far distant from idolatry. 6. For what reason an idol is said to be nothing. 7. The adoration of some creature is consonant with Scripture. 8. The third objection is met. 9. Satisfaction is made to the second example.

1. But King James does not cease to marvel in his Preface, p.49: "what ingenuity of men, what so daring fraud of Satan, tried to force this fiction on the Christian Church." And he strongly doubts, ibid. p.59, "whether in the last judgment excuses of such sort, drawn from those ineptitudes of sophistry, are, since Christ reproves idolatry, to receive approval." These more or less are the words of the king, and it is harder for me to obviate them prudently and as the cause deserves than to respond to very strong and very clear reasons and testimonies. For if I do it lightly, I fear that I may seem more remiss than is proper in dealing with the cause of the Catholic Faith; but if I set myself in opposition to so great harshness of words with the same liberty of speech, I fear that the king might take thence occasion for some offense; and therefore I think it more satisfactory to pass over these sorts of words that do not contain a reason pertaining to the cause, and to give satisfaction to the objections which the king gestures to. First, however, I will not omit to advise the most serene king to consider how more secure it is simply to believe the Catholic Church, the Councils, and the ancient Fathers than to pass sentence on their opinion and authority by one's own judgment. Wherefore again and again I humbly beg that he accept for himself the advice he offers to others, and meditate very attentively on what reason or, as he himself says, defense or excuse Christ our Savior will accept in the last judgment, whether his who, in giving cult to God, the saints, and their images, follows in the footsteps of the Fathers and fits his actions to their doctrines; or his who prefers new doctors to old and does not fear to condemn by his own judgment the traditions of the Fathers.

2. Yet the king says that one must obey God rather than men, but God in the Scriptures forbids all adoration of images and the cult of a likeness of anything made by God. Next, every image is an idol, for an idol is not nothing; “for it was not nothing that God forbade cult to be given to;” therefore every image of God or of any created thing is an idol; therefore all adoration of an image is the adoration of an idol, and hence is idolatry. Finally, neither the bronze serpent nor the body of Moses were nothing, yet the former was ground down and the latter was hidden.

3. The response is that it cannot be that what is approved or prescribed by a definition and the tradition of the Catholic Church be contrary to the divine precept, since the Church is ruled by the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit cannot go against his own self. We deny, therefore, that the use and veneration of images is contrary to the divine precept. For the precept is alleged either from the New Testament or from the Old; in the New it cannot be pointed to, unless perhaps it be held included in the prohibition of idolatry, which we will immediately show is frivolous and empty. But if it is alleged from the Old Testament, I will ask in turn whether it is adduced as a positive mandate of that law or as a natural mandate. For in the prior sense we do not wish to examine whether there was or was not such a positive precept in the Old Law, because this does not pertain to the dogmas of the faith. For thence to infer, on that datum, that the veneration of images which the Church approves is contrary to the divine precept contains the Jewish error, because, if there was such a precept, it was a ceremonial one; either then the belief is that it obliges now, and this is the Jewish error; for according to the faith the ceremonial laws are dead, nay are even bringers of death; or the belief is that it has been abrogated, and thus, by reason thereof, the veneration of images cannot be regarded as contrary to the divine precept, because an abrogated precept is no longer a precept, nor can a deed contrary to it be said to be repugnant to the legislator’s will.

4. But if the precept be regarded as natural and moral, we deny that such a precept is found in the Old Testament. For it could most of all be taken from the words of Exodus 20.4 and Deuteronomy 5.8: “Thou shalt not make thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the waters beneath the earth.” But, in these words, either not all images of things are prohibited but those that are ordered to undue cult (as many believe with probability, even among the ancient Fathers), and thus indeed it was a natural precept; we deny, however, that under it are included images of the saints; for these have been instituted not for an undue but for a very honorable cult, as we have shown. Or by that precept all images simply and absolutely and instituted for any use whatever are prohibited (as others wish), and thus the precept was not natural, and so nothing from it can be inferred as obligatory in the present time, as has already been declared. And Protestants, who allege it in that sense and nevertheless affirm it to be a moral precept, certainly cannot prove it from Scripture; for this is not said there, yet with them no other prove is strong, nor are we bound to admit it. Yet even so the conjecture, because the prohibition was inserted in the promulgation of the Decalogue, is insufficient; for proposed in many words there too is the third precept about the observation of the Sabbath, which nevertheless, as regards such determination of time, was not moral but ceremonial. Next, there is none among the holy Fathers who said that the words, when understood in the said absolute sense, contain a natural moral precept and not rather a positive precept adapted to that time. Finally, by no likely reason can it be shown that the prohibition belongs to an intrinsic dictate of natural law.

Certainly too, even the king himself is compelled to concede this same thing; for he says that some use of images is not now prohibited, and consequently that it is not by natural right, and he necessarily confesses the same about the making of images; although however the word of God was absolute: "Thou shalt not make thee any graven image." Therefore either by those words not only was that prohibited which was per se evil, and thus the words contained a positive precept which has ceased; or if it be said that by them was not absolutely prohibited the making of images but the making of them for veneration, by parity of reason the words will have to be restricted to undue and superstitious veneration. For not every veneration of images is of itself evil or contrary to divine honor, as was shown above, and as will be more fully declared in the following point. And therefore those who understand the words of the absolute prohibition of images say as a result that the making and use of images and statues was so prohibited that the per se painting or making of them was not licit; but this is manifest, that it was not of natural right, though it could be of positive right, which now is not our concern because it is of no relevance to the present cause.

5. In his second part the king confounds an idol with an image, and on this he finds an objection which is accordingly of little moment; for the sacred images of Christ and the saints are not idols, and the opposite statement was condemned in the 7th Synod action 7. For although the likenesses made by the gentiles, which were idols, were in fact images, not for that reason is any image an idol, but only the one "which is the likeness of a false God," as Augustine said, bk. Quaestionum in Librum Iudic. 441. And almost the same is the opinion of Tertullian, bk. De Idolatria ch.4, who says: "idols are images of those things that human error honors with cult." Although these words are more general and comprehend every image invented or proposed for honoring what is not worthy of cult or veneration. There is therefore a difference between an idol and an image, because an idol is a false image, that is, of a thing which is not, or which is not worthy of adoration, as is the common interpretation of the Fathers when they are writing about idols; but it is called an image even if it has a true representation. But, by restricting the general idea of image to sacred and ecclesiastical images, to its idea belongs that it be of a thing true and truly holy, and accordingly truly worthy of adoration. And thus did Pope Adrian say in his epistle to Constantine and Irene, in the 7th Synod action 2, that: "images are to be painted, venerated, honored for remembrance only of the saints about whom it is clearly agreed that they are servants of God and entreat and intercede with the Deity for us." Hence also it is clear how distant the veneration of sacred images is from idolatry; for all cult of idolatry either halts at an idol as at the true God, or tends, through the likeness, to honoring him for God who is not, or to honoring as divine someone impious or a demon; but the veneration of images tends proximately either to the honor of God or at least of some person truly holy, which honor ultimately redounds to God as well.

6. Nor is it an obstacle here whether an idol is said to be something, as the king contends, or to be nothing, as he himself objects to Catholics. For no one ever denied that the idols of the gentiles, as to their bodily likenesses, were also certain material things and open to the senses, which is also common to sacred images; therefore in this sense an idol is something. And nevertheless because of the false representation it can be said to be nothing (as it is called by Paul, 1 Corinthians 8 and 10), because the thing it represents either is no true thing or has no true excellence for which it is to be honored, as Origen, Homilia 8 on Exodus, and other interpreters of Paul understood that remark of his. Although too an idol may be said to be nothing because it has no virtue or power, as was interpreted on that place by Chrysostom, Homilia 20, whom Theophylact and others follow. And thus too did Augustine assert, bk.20 Contra Faustum ch.5, that the things the gentiles honor are something, because they are idols, in which demons are adored, or are some parts of the world, because they are true bodies, yet they are not to be honored “but,” he says, “are nothing for salvation.” Just as elsewhere too the same Augustine said that a sin is nothing, not because the act of sin is nothing, but because the malice of it, whereby it is established in the nature of sin, is not a something but a privation of good. And in like manner Jerome on Hosea 7 at the end says that: “Heretics when constructing most impious heresies are turned into nothing,” according to the Septuagint translation in the same place: “Not in that they have ceased to be, but in that by comparison with God all who think against the Lord are said not to be; for if God is truth, whatever is contrary to truth is a lie and is called nothing.” And thus too does he in the same place understand the verse of Esther 14.11: “‘Give not, O Lord, thy scepter to them that are not:’ there is no doubt,” he says, “but that it signifies idols;” namely, because they are false, and a lie is, as such, nothing. An idol then is something, as it is an image and a certain material thing, and it is nothing insofar as what it represents is nothing, whether it be altogether nothing or no true thing, or whether it be nothing insofar as it represents something divine or holy which is not in fact holy. And hence idolatry has in it that it is evil and that it is idolatry, and therefore it is much different from the veneration of sacred images.

7. But responses of this sort are despised by the king as sophistical and argumentative subterfuges: “For Scripture,” he says, “forbids the honoring of a likeness of anything made by God.” But the king’s words move us not at all, both because those distinctions were not made up by us but by the Fathers, and also because they are very much in consonance with natural reason. But as for Scripture we reply, in the first place, that it must be understood according to the tradition of the Fathers and of the Church and according to right reason. Next, we deny that Scripture prohibits the veneration of any likeness of a created thing, for nowhere can this precept be pointed to, unless perhaps it is understood to be included in the prohibition on making a graven images or any likeness. And in that case we return to the response given; for either it was positive, and then it does not oblige; or if it contains a natural and moral obligation, it is understood of the making of idols, or (which is the same thing) of the making of images that are to be honored with cult as Gods or as likenesses of Gods. And this is in conformity with Scripture, which permits some adoration of the creature, or sometimes commands it. Which argument is confirmed, in the said epistle to Constantine, by Pope Adrian along with the authority of Jerome who asserts by way of example, Exodus 25, “the two golden Cherubim,” he says, “and the engraved things which Moses made.” And he says that God conceded to the Jews the worship of them. For although it is not expressly read in Scripture, yet it seems to be collected from the fact that they were sacred images, or certainly because they were parts of the mercy seat, which also was worthy of veneration, and thus in epist.17 among the epistles of Jerome, which is that of Paul and Eustochius to Marcella, and the style indicates that it was written by Jerome, it is thus said: “The Jews formerly venerated the Holy of Holies, because there were Cherubim there and the mercy seat and the ark of the covenant, the manna, the rod of Aaron, and the golden altar;” and it is added: “Does not the sepulcher of the Lord seem more venerable to you?” Which latter words make plain that the former ones too are understood of sacred veneration. About which more clearly is it said in Psalms 98 [99].5: “Adore his footstool, since it is holy [alt. Worship at his footstool, for he is holy],” where (as I said above) by ‘footstool’ is understood the ark of the covenant, and it is clear from the idea of adoration proposed that the words are about sacred veneration. And that this was the will of God is clear from the way in which he wanted the ark to be treated with reverence, Deuteronomy 10, Joshua 3, 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 6. And the idea of sanctity in the same words shows that other things too dedicated to the divine cult, which are called holy in the Scriptures, were to be treated with like veneration, as Damascene openly thinks, bk.4 De Fide ch.17. Therefore not every veneration of a created thing was prohibited in Scripture, but that only which could not be referred to the cult of the true God.

8. Next, to the examples which the king adduces about the bronze serpent and the body of Moses we reply that they are taken partly from things uncertain and partly from things not pertaining to the cause. For although it be true that king Hezekiah broke the bronze serpent because the children of Israel were burning incense to it, as is contained in 4 Kings [2 Kings] 18, yet it is not certain that there was a prohibition in the law against adoring the serpent in any way at all. Nay, many think it was permitted and that at the beginning it was done in due manner, namely by venerating in it and through it God the author of so great a benefit. Which, that it could be rightly done, is testified by Augustine, bk.3 De Trinitate ch.10, and it is not clear that it was specifically prohibited by God. But afterwards Augustine says, bk.10 De Civitate Dei ch.8: “When the erring people began to honor as an idol the serpent that was kept in memory of the event, King Hezekiah, serving God in religious power, ground it down with great praise of piety.” But when the fact is thus explained, it has no relevance to the cause about the images of the Church, because the images are not adored by the faithful as idols, nor does moral danger of this evil threaten. And when some error were to happen anywhere, it should be repelled, not by the breaking of images, but by the doctrine and light of the Gospel, and the pious use of images should be preserved, as Gregory said in the said epist.9 bk.9. But others think that the Jews never venerated the serpent, nay that it was prohibited in the Old Law, not by natural precept but by positive, and not by a special law but by the general one by which these others believe, with probability, that then the veneration of all images was prohibited, but that the people began to act against the precept and therefore Hezekiah broke the serpent to take away the occasion. When this opinion too is admitted, the example has nothing in common with the cause of images, both because that precept, if it existed, ceased in the Law of Grace, and also because the occasion for error, which there was in the time of the law, from the propensity to idolatry that came partly from the custom and example of the gentiles, partly from ignorance and weakness of faith, is not found in the time of the Law of Grace, as Damascene rightly noted, the said book 4 ch.17, and more fully in Oratio 1 ‘De Imaginibus’.

9. But in the other example of the body of Moses, we have only from Scripture that he died at the command of God and was buried by the same, and that his sepulcher was hidden from men, Deuteronomy final chapter. But for what cause God wished to hide the body of Moses Scripture does not make plain. Protestants, however, seem to think that the cause was lest the Jews take occasion of committing idolatry by venerating the body of Moses or his sepulcher. And on this the argument of the king seems to be founded, that images too should be taken away, at least for taking away the occasion. To whom we can, in the first place, reply by denying the inference and the likeness, because it has already been shown that the Church is not to be equated with the synagogue in this imperfection. Otherwise, even the sepulchers of the apostles and martyrs ought to be unknown to the faithful; nay the relics of all the saints should be burnt up, lest the faithful be induced to idolatry by the occasion, which is not only impious but even ridiculous.

Next can be replied that the argument is not founded on Scripture but more on personal conjecture, and therefore is of little moment. For the reason is indeed probable, as Abulensis weighs it, accommodating to it the contention between the Archangel and the devil over the body of Moses, which the apostle Judas makes mention of in his canonical letter, v.9. And the same reason is insinuated by Chrysostom, Homilia 5 on Matthew, although he does not say that God hid the sepulcher of Moses for that cause, but says that, "Moses did not introduce the people into the land of promise, lest the Jews attribute to him altogether all the benefits which they had received through him from God;" and he adds: "So that therefore this sort of occasion might be cut off, his very sepulcher too was hidden." And the same reason is indicated by Augustine, or the author of the work De Mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae bk.1 last chapter. But nevertheless the reason is not a necessary one. For the same author of De Mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae adds another, namely, "so that the face, which had been made to glow by consorting with God in speech, should not, when oppressed with the sorrow of death, be seen by anyone." It can also be said that it was done as if for the completing and adding up of the punishment enjoined on Moses because of his guilt of unbelief at the flowing of water from the rock; for it was for that reason he was deprived of the land of promise, Numbers 20, as Chrysostom rightly ponders, bk.4 De Sacerdotio near the beginning, and Augustine in bk.50 Homiliarum, Homilia 27, and Enarratio on Psalms 98 near the end. But it seems that God, for the greater fear of the people, wanted Moses to enter neither living nor dead into the land, and therefore he hid his sepulcher lest the Jews carry his bones with them, as they carried over the bones of Jacob and Joseph. It can be said, in addition, that God hid the body of Moses to make him to be held in greater admiration and inner reverence. For this was insinuated by Jerome on Amos 6 saying: "The Lord ascended with Moses, the place of whose sepulcher, because it had ascended into heaven, could not be found on earth." Finally it can be said, and perhaps more securely, that this is one of the things that God does according to the counsel of his own will, the causes of which we cannot find out, and which to inquire into is superfluous; which is what Chrysostom insinuated, Orat. 20 on Hebrews when he says that: "some bones of the ancient Fathers were carried over into the promised land, but the bones of Moses were sown in foreign land, and not only his, but also those of Aaron, Jeremiah, and Daniel. And likewise," he says, "of certain apostles, as Peter and Paul, we know the sepulchers, but of others we do not, the reason for which thing it is superfluous to enquire." That conjecture, then, in so grave a cause, is also superfluous.

Chapter 13: On the images of God as God

Summary: 1. Objection of the king against adoration of the image of God. The image of God is double. 2. The proper and formal image of God cannot be described. 3. A description of the metaphorical image of God is not evil and not prohibited. 4. Exposition of the places of Scripture speaking about the images of God. 5. Instance of the king.
Explanation.

1. Besides general objections about the veneration of images, two others in particular are proposed by the king, one against the image of God, that is, as he is God, the other against adoration of the cross of Christ; about this latter we will speak in the next chapter, here the first must be weighed. Therein he says: "Not only is it prohibited (namely, in the Old Testament) to adore the image of God, but also to make it, and the reason added is that God has never fallen under the appearance of anything." However, on this point a common distinction of images of God must be put first. One image is proper, as if anyone wished through a painted form to express to the life the proper form or nature of God, which can be said to be the formal image; but the other is the metaphorical image, in which, through some bodily figure, the properties of a superior thing are in some way and by analogy represented, as through the figure of a young man having a white garment angels are represented.

2. As to what regards the first class of images, then, it is de fide certain that it is not licit, nay it is very foolish, to try to depict the image of God. Because, since God lacks a body, it is impossible by a corporeal image, whether sculpted or painted, to represent God to the life. And this is what is said in Isaiah 40.18: "To whom then will ye liken God? Or what likeness will ye compare to him?" And 46.5: "To whom will ye liken me, and make me equal, and compare me, that we may be like." Which words, if they are attentively considered, do not so much contain a form of prohibition as declare that it is per se evil and impossible to form such likeness or image of God. And therefore, not only in the Old Testament but also in the New, the same thing is in almost the same way prohibited, when Paul says Acts 17.29: "We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device." About this class of image of God there is no controversy, for in this sense too the Fathers, whom it is not necessary to refer to, commonly, and the 7th Synod actions 3 & 5 and all the scholastics very constantly, teach that all these images of God are altogether to be rejected as contrary to the true understanding of God.

3. But about the second class of images of God nothing has hitherto been established by sure faith, and the Council of Trent of set purpose, when dealing with the images of Christ, of the God-bearer, and of the saints, said nothing about the images of God, and the 2nd Council of Nicea, while rejecting the former images of God, was silent about the latter, and thus there are among Catholic doctors various opinions on this point. Since therefore we are here dealing only with dogmas of the faith, we can omit this objection of the king, so that in this part he may have his own sense to the full. But because he intends to teach that the use of such images is impious and against divine precept, and we believe that it is far more probable that it is neither evil nor prohibited; nay that it is honorable and more pious, if it is done prudently, and more consonant with the use of the Church; therefore each must be briefly proved. The first, then, we more or less showed in the discussion given above, because to depict such an image of God is not prohibited in the New Testament by a special positive precept, because about the image of God there are in the New Testament only found the words of Paul cited, which openly declare a natural right alone.

4. But if it be said that this prohibition is contained in the Old Testament, we must ask about it again of what sort the prohibition was. For the thing is doubtful, both as to the sense and as to the kind of the precept. Hence, if the prohibition be said to be moral and of natural law, it will be understood of the proper image, and not of the metaphorical, because there is no likely reason to show that to give a metaphorical depiction of God is per se and intrinsically evil, as I will immediately say. And indeed in the places of Isaiah cited, in which the natural right itself is explained, the words are about proper images of God; for, as Jerome notes, on ch.40, Isaiah mocks the foolishness of the gentiles who thought that their own idols were gods, or represented the proper form of God. Hence to the words: “To whom then will ye liken God? Or what likeness will ye compare to him?” Jerome adds: “He who is spirit and is in all things, etc.” But in ch.46 the Jews who imitate the foolishness of the gentiles are blamed. Again, about this form can agreeably be understood the words of Moses in Deuteronomy 4.12: “And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude.” Although the sense could also be that they saw no form altogether or sensible person as it were, but heard only the voice of one speaking; for this is more indicated by the other words which Moses repeats later, v.15-16: “For ye saw no manner of similitude on the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire: Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image.” And thus it is probable that there, and in Exodus 20, it was prohibited to make any image of God under any pretext, because that rude people would easily suppose it was the proper form of God, and would adore very statues as gods. Now such a precept thus understood was positive and ceremonial and agreeable to that people because of their imperfection, and it has therefore now ceased; and it was also, when the state of things changed, not necessary, because the occasion or danger was taken away, as I said above. Of which thing too a sufficient sign is that, in the Church of Christ, the use of such images is permitted, not only now, but over one thousand three hundred years ago, as can be understood from various poems which Paulinus has about these images in epist.12. But the Church would not have permitted them over so many centuries if they had been prohibited by divine right.

5. But the king gives as instance that making such images is prohibited, not only because of the danger of adoration, but also because it is unseemly and useless. For “since God,” he says, “cannot be expressed to the life, it is superfluous labor and vain effort to corrupt with a false adumbration what you cannot imitate; which thing no one, I do not say no prince, but scarcely any common man would put up with tolerating in his own effigy.” But these reasons are not read in Scripture but thought up by Protestants. And in the first of them something is supposed that is false and contrary, not to say injurious, to holy Scripture. For if all metaphorical images, which cannot imitate their prototypes to the life, are said to corrupt them with false adumbration, “all parables too, and figures for signifying certain things, which must not be taken in their proper character but one thing in them is to be understood from another, will be said to be lies,” as Augustine said in simile in his book Contra Mendacium ch.10. Thus, therefore, when the Holy Spirit descends in the form of a dove, or when he is sent under the appearance of tongues as of fire, his form is corrupted by a false adumbration. And the same must be said of the image of Christ under the appearance of a lamb, although however the use of that image is very ancient in the Church. Again, the image of an angel under the appearance of a young man etc., would be a corruption of the angelic form, which is not only against the 7th Synod but also against Scripture, insofar as in it we read of images of the Cherubim, Exodus 25, 3 Kings [1 Kings].6. Nay, it is even contrary to all right reason, because we do not grasp incorporeal things except by a resemblance of corporeal things, as is rightly made plain by Dionysius, ch.2 and last chapter De Coelesti Hierarchia, and by Tertullian In Apologet. ch.29. Next, all the sensible apparitions of God or angels in Scripture would be false corruptions of their forms. Because, therefore, there is in metaphorical representation no falsity, therefore metaphorical images of God cannot be accused of falsity. Nor even can the use of them be reckoned vain or superfluous, since they can serve to lead man's intellect as if by the hand to recognize invisible things in the resemblance of visible ones, and to remember mysteries which God has under visible appearance performed.

Hence too is readily clear the response to the other conjecture, that no prince, no nor private man, would permit such deformation of his own form; for they would in the same way blame God who often appeared under visible form. Nay, they would even blame Scripture, because it often speaks of God as of a man, attributing to him pain, repentance, bodily members, and the like. For the reason is the same about the words of Scripture as about images, because (as Gregory rightly said) what scripture is for doctors that an image is for the unskilled. The conjecture, then, is a weak one, both because in those images there is no base deformation, but metaphorical signification, and also because it is not done without grave cause and necessity, arisen partly from the divine excellence, which cannot be otherwise represented, partly from the need of man, who cannot conceive spiritual things as they are in themselves, although nevertheless he needs to be stimulated through the senses to the knowledge or memory of them. And therefore the argument taken from men is neither alike nor of great moment, because a man has a sensible form capable of a proper image, and yet a man, even a prince or an emperor, does not disdain to have his excellence or fortitude represented through the metaphorical image of an eagle or a lion or something similar.

Chapter 14: On the adoration of the cross of Christ.

Summary: 1. Objections of King James against the adoration of the cross. 2. Dilemma of the king attacking the adoration of Christ's cross. First, second, and third confirmation. 3. No power of accomplishing miracles has from contact with the body of Christ on the cross been derived. 4. The Catholic doctrine about the adoration of the cross of Christ is explained. 5. The dilemma of the king is met. 6. Response to the first, to the second, and to the third confirmation.

1. Lastly the king inveighs against the adoration of the cross of Christ. But lest perhaps I should delay over this matter longer than is necessary or than is right, I will unravel this point briefly, both because the reason about the cross is almost the same as about other relics and images, and also because the king makes no objection about this except certain verbal trickeries that Claudius of Turin and Wycliffe had formerly objected and that have been reckoned empty by Catholics. There is, then, about the cross a triple consideration, as I said in vol.1 p.3 disp.56, namely about the sign of it expressed on one's own person by the finger or hand, or about the image of the cross made from lasting material, or about the very cross itself on which Christ suffered, whether whole or some part of it. About the first consideration the king touches on nothing, and I spoke about it in the place cited §3. The second consideration too the king has omitted, because there is the same reason about the image of the cross as about relics.

2. Against the cross considered in the third way, however, that it is not to be venerated, he tries to prove in many words with this brief reason. Surely if it ought to be venerated, it should be by touch most of all; for this reason is the one scholastics are chiefly wont to assign; “By reason of all contact, then, or some?” The first cannot be said, both because, although the woman who had the issue of blood, by touching the hem of Christ’s clothing, felt his virtue, not for that reason did all those who were in the press around Christ feel it, Luke 8; and also because otherwise the lips of Judas betraying Christ with a kiss, and the hands of the soldiers smiting and crucifying Christ, and the land of Canaan touched by Christ’s daily clothing, should be adored by us, which to say is impious and profane. But if not all contact but some individual case suffices for this class of adoration, one must show which it is and where Christ poured out this benediction on the wood or conceded to it the privilege. And he increases the objection in these ways. First, because to the woman who said, Luke 11.27: “Blessed is the womb that bare thee,” Christ replied, v.28: “Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God.” Second, because although Christ gave to his cross power to do miracles, it is not for that reason to be adored; for the shadow of Peter performed miracles, which cannot for that reason be adored. Third, because the prophets curse those who give cult to images, which have eyes and do not see, and ears which do not hear; therefore these words are said more harshly against those who venerate a piece of wood formed to the likeness neither of ears or eyes.

3. The king seems in his objection to suppose or to reckon that we imagine or think that the cross of Christ and the individual parts of it have, from contact with the body of Christ, drawn forth some force or virtue for doing miracles or for conferring extraordinary benefits, or that Christ himself, by special concession and will, conferred a like force or dignity on that contact. But this is foreign to the sense of the Catholic Church. For, to begin with, although it be most true, and sufficiently approved by the histories and testimonies of the Fathers, that Christ through his cross has produced many miracles, which it is not now necessary to relate, nevertheless none asserted or thought that Christ put into his cross some virtue for effecting miracles, and established by a sure law and promise the doing of signs when someone is present or in contact with it; for this can be affirmed on no foundation, nor is it held to be necessary for veneration of the cross. Neither even is it necessary to imagine that Christ, by a special will and as it were positive institution, gave the cross a special dignity because of which it is to be honored; for this invention too is not only unable to be given foundation but even to be satisfactorily understood; and for the truth and reality that we are now treating of it is superfluous and also impertinent. See Paulinus ep.11 to Severus, Evagrius bk.4 Histor. ch.25, Ruffinus bk.10 Hist. ch.3, Theodoret, bk.1 ch.17, Sulpicius Severus, bk.2 Hist. Sacrae.

4. The doctrine, then, of the Church and of Catholic theologians is that, just as the relics of saints are to be venerated, not from a superadded virtue or institution, but because, on the supposition of the true sanctity of the souls, or persons, with whom they had a special connection or a sufficient relation such that they should be reckoned to be something of them, it follows from the nature of the thing that, because of the excellence of such soul or person, they should be held in veneration; so too, for greater reason, the cross of Christ, and any part of it whatever, should be considered by true and pious Christians as precious relics of the Savior. Because it was, by bearing up Christ himself, an instrument of our redemption, and is sanctified by him. As is signified by 1 Peter 2, Paul Colossians 1 & 2, who also in Hebrews 9 indicates that it was as if the altar on which Christ offered himself for us. And accordingly, because of love and reverence for the same Christ, it is venerable. And thus is the reason for venerating the cross of Christ explained by Damascene bk.4 ch.12, who says: “This wood of great price and venerable, on which Christ offered himself for the sake of sacrifice for us, as having been sanctified by contact with the holy body and blood, is wont to be adored for the best of rights.” And later: “For if of those, with love for whom we are aflame, the house, the bed, the clothing is dear, by how much more the things that are of God and the Savior, through which salvation was gained for us.”

That this also was the mind of the ancient Church is sufficiently collected from canon 73 attributed to the 6th Synod, and from the 7th Synod, and from Jerome epist.17, from Ambrose, Orat. ‘De Obitu Theodosii’, and from Chrysostom Homilia ‘Quod Christus sit Deus’, where he says that: “the whole globe strives to have something of that wood. And those who have,” he says, “men and women, encase it in gold so as to fit it to their necks, and from it they get great honor and excellence and defense and protection.” And Gregory of Nyssa, Orat. ‘De Sancto Baptismate’ not far from the beginning: “The wood of the cross,” he says, “is salvific for everyone.” By which word he indicates the benefits which God, through these sorts of relics of the cross, is wont to confer on those who seek them with true faith and pious veneration. For although miracles alone do not contain sufficient reason for adoration, yet they do show that this sort of veneration is pleasing to God, and hence that the cross is itself worthy of veneration. The said Fathers also add, especially Damascene, that the same holds of the other relics of Christ, as are “the nails, the lance, the crib, the garments, and the life-giving sepulcher.” Damascene also adduces that verse of Psalms 131 [132].7: “We will adore in the place where his feet stood [alt. we will worship at his footstool].” And the same is confirmed by that verse of Isaiah 11.10: “His sepulcher shall be glorious [alt. his rest shall be glorious],” which is by all of them understood of the sepulcher of Christ, and rightly, because the possessive ‘his’ refers to the “root of Jesse”, which, that it is Christ, is expounded by Paul Romans 15. Now the sepulcher is said to be glorious in the future, not only at the time when the body of Christ lay in it, but also perpetually by reason thereof. And thus Jerome epist.17 says that, “it is there preached that the place of the burial of the Lord is to be honored by all.” This truth, therefore, is collected from the principles of the faith and from Scripture, and it is consonant with natural reason, and no precept can be shown whereby such veneration of the cross is prohibited. What, then, is there for Protestants to find fault with in so pious a work of religion?

5. Now to the objection of the king, and to the question asked in it, a certain venerable Englishman (Vualdensis) vol.3 ch.18, replies that not every contact with the body of Christ was sufficient reason for this veneration, “but innocent touch,” and thus he avoided the absurd inference from the kiss of Judas. But others add, for greater explication, that if the idea of contact is viewed precisely, there is not lacking in it sufficient cause for relative veneration, on account of the excellence of Christ, but that the impiety of the person impedes it, lest the adoration should redound to the impious man. And, in like way, where there is indecency or occasion for scandal, adoration will have to be avoided, notwithstanding the contact, which thing is adapted to the example of the ass on which Christ sat. But about the earth of that region, which Christ touched with his feet, if it be clear that it now remains as to the parts which Christ touched, it is to be held in the same veneration. For Augustine too, bk.22 De Civitate Dei ch.8, testifies that in his time “miracles were performed by holy earth brought from Jerusalem,” and that it was held in reverence and honor by the faithful. But at this time it is likely that the earth has so changed that that reason of contact has ceased. And nevertheless if someone with living faith and recollection of Christ and of his steps were to venerate it, he will act piously and will be worthy of no rebuke, because the whole action is referred to Christ, and that relation, so to say, has a sufficient foundation in the actions and steps of Christ.

Hence, to the dilemma of the king, we reply that contact is per se sufficient for this relative veneration, unless something according to prudent judgment impedes it. And therefore it is not necessary to show where Christ conferred this prerogative on his cross, because by his works he showed it sufficiently to those who use right faith and reason; nor is this a privilege of the cross but is a property common to all the relics of Christ. Hence the example there adduced about the woman who touched and the crowds that pressed around Christ, when the things aforesaid are rightly weighed, in no way urges that this reason for veneration, which is taken from contact, is not some miraculous work, as was that woman's health, which Christ conferred only on one in need and asking from faith, just as he wished and, by the most high counsel of his own will, disposed.

6. Of the other confirmations, the first makes nothing to the cause, because when Christ responds, "Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God," he taught indeed that the most Blessed Virgin was more blessed in believing and loving Christ than in corporeally conceiving him; he did not, however, deny that it was a great dignity of the Virgin that she carried Christ in her womb, nor did he deny that the woman truly and faithfully said: "Blessed is the womb that bare thee," although he did not explain every, nor the chief, reason for that beatification, as Bede elegantly touched on, bk.4 on Luke ch.49. But the other confirmation, about the shadow of Peter, is easily explained by denying the likeness of the example, both because a shadow is nothing and also because, as I said, the reason for this adoration is not some virtue of performing miracles. Lastly, very far from the curses of the prophets against those who adore idols are those who venerate the cross, because they do not have regard to the form or the figure of the wood, as do idolaters, but to Christ, whom they adore on the wood and, because of whom, they adore the wood.

Chapter 15: On the error about purgatory.

Summary: 1. King James mocks purgatory. First and second foundation. 2. The error of Protestants about the redemption of Christ and about the justification of the impious. 3. The application of the merits of Christ to men is not done through the non-imputation of sins. 4. Some sins also exist in just men, which do not take away grace. 5. Not any sin at all cuts off friendship with God. 6. It is shown from the Fathers that the article about purgatory is very ancient. 7. After the day of judgment there will remain no place for purgatory. 8. Indulgences on account of the merits of Christ are lavished on the Church by God.

1. Among the other dogmas of the Catholic Faith wherein the king admits that he dissents from the Roman Church he puts the article about purgatory on p.52 of his Preface; however, he touches on it so lightly that he seems to be playing rather than dealing with a cause of faith. For although he mocks and contemns the article of purgatory (which he himself calls a fiction), yet he adduces nothing solid to impugn it; nay, although he does not believe it, yet he does not absolutely deny that there is a purgatory. But “if perhaps it exists,” he says that “it is unknown to us and that it is enough for us to believe those seats for souls, which God has revealed to us in Scripture,” namely, “heaven and hell, and we should not probe further into the hidden things of divine providence.” Wherefore the chief foundation of the king is that the assertion of purgatory cannot be shown from Scripture. “Certainly,” he says, “Bellarmine could lay down no foundation for it from Scripture.” Hence he infers: “It will certainly be enough for us to recognize those seats for souls which God in his word has wished to be revealed to us.” But beside this foundation he hiddenly inserts another, dealing with it tacitly and as if of something else, saying of Christ: “He himself is the true expiation and the true purgatory for our sins;” as if implicitly inferring: therefore another purgatory is not necessary. Now in these words is hidden the root, not only of this error, but also of several others on which that one depends; and therefore we must begin from it, and the whole ulcer must be cut open, so that the full connection of errors may be uncovered, so that thence indeed the king may understand that he is not judging rightly about the things necessary for salvation, since these things “he considers unworthy of having time and effort spent on them.”

2. Protestants, therefore, for the most part at least, so judge about the redemption of Christ and the justification of the impious, or the remission of sins, that they put the whole of our justification in the remission of sins. Now this remission they teach consists only in this, that sins are, because of Christ, not imputed to us by God; not in this, that either they not exist or not come to be. They next add that sins are then not imputed when someone believes with firm faith that, because of Christ, sins are not imputed to him, whether those he did before, or those he is, along with such faith and understanding, actually in the present committing; for Christ has merited this on our behalf, by making sufficient satisfaction for our sins. And to give proof of this they twist the words of Paul and other Scriptures to their own perdition, as Peter forewarned [2 Peter 3.16].

Now from these principles they infer that, as often as anyone has faith, which suffices that sin not be imputed, sin is altogether not imputed and all its penalty is remitted. For either a sinner believes with firm faith that the justice of Christ is enough for his sin to be altogether and totally taken away and not to be imputed for any penalty, provided he so believe; or he thinks otherwise about the justice of Christ and about the non-imputation of sin through faith. If in this second way he limps in that special faith, he does not truly believe, and therefore sin is neither wholly nor in part remitted to him, or not imputed to him; but if he conceives a full faith in non-imputation, sin will be reckoned for absolutely no penalty; and thus the remission of penalty, to which mortal sin might be imputed, is always either complete or null.

Next, from these same principles they infer that in a just man there is no venial sin, but either it is mortal, which takes away justice, or there is no sin. For if a just man do any work whatever, however slight, believing it is imputed to him for some guilt, by that very fact he is an infidel and sins gravely, and he inflicts grave injury on Christ by distrusting in his merits and satisfaction; but if he does these works firmly believing that they are imputed for no even the least penalty, he does not even commit a slight sin (namely one which is imputed), for it is purged through Christ by his, so to say, prevenient purgation or non-imputation. And in this sense the king seems to have called Christ our purgatory. Therefore, if these things are true, all need for purgatory ceases, because in the just man nothing is left to be remitted, and so, if he die in that state, he does not need purgation; but if he die without justice, he will perish for ever.

These are the monsters and portents invented by the heretics so as to be able to take purgatory out of the way, so that indeed therefrom the king may see whether the assertion of purgatory is of little moment since, to overturn it, it is necessary to overthrow the strongest foundations of the faith; nay there is even need to fabricate very many things against divine justice and ordered providence, even, I add, against natural reason. The Catholic Faith, then, subsists in principles and foundations altogether the opposite, which I will indicate briefly and only through the window, so as to reach the intended aim; for if each foundation had to be expressly proved and disputed of, a proper and complete book would have been necessary. The first foundation of faith, then, is that, although Christ has of himself sufficiently and copiously redeemed all men and has made satisfaction for them all, nevertheless he does not in fact save all, as he himself teaches in Matthew 25 [24?], and as is known self-evidently in our faith, and the king of England supposes it in the cited place, when he confesses that there are two domiciles, heaven and hell, established for ever for the human race. From which foundation another openly follows, namely, that notwithstanding the redemption of Christ there is need for men, so as to obtain salvation, to do something or that something be done in them, whereby the merit and satisfaction of Christ is applied to them. The proof is that, although there exist an infinite merit and satisfaction of Christ, who wishes to save everyone, as Paul says, and therefore who offers himself for the salvation of all, nevertheless some are saved but others are destined for the eternal fires. Therefore this difference cannot come from anywhere except that, in addition to the actions and sufferings which Christ himself supplied, it is necessary for something to be done on our part whereby the infinite redemption of Christ might be applied. And this too is sufficiently recognized by King James, since he concludes that article by saying: "Let us so act that we may obtain the one and escape the other."

3. The difference, then, between Protestants and Catholics begins from this necessary application of the merits of Christ, namely, by what action, knowledge, or affection it is done. Let it be, then, according to the foundation of the faith, that this application does not happen through that special faith which the Protestants feign about one's proper justice, or the non-imputation of sins; nor are past sins through it remitted or present ones not imputed, nor does true justice, which we receive because of Christ, consist in that non-imputation. All which things are sufficiently proved against the king and Protestants in their own principles, because nowhere in Sacred Scripture do we find imposed on men the necessity of believing that sins are not imputed to them by the very fact that such non-imputation is believed; otherwise let them produce where either that credulity is prescribed, or its object, or where that non-imputation is revealed. For we hear Paul saying that, Hebrews 11.6: "Without faith it is impossible to please God;" and we hear the underlying reason: "for he that cometh to God must believe that he is and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." This faith of dogmas, then, is what is necessary for salvation, not faith about a proper justice that is nowhere required. Christ the Lord too, in the last chapter of Mark, 16.15-16, said: "Preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." And in the last chapter of Matthew, 28.20, he adds: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Faith, therefore, of the Gospel or of dogmas, and baptism along with obedience to commands, are the means or actions prescribed by Christ for participating in his redemption; but about a special faith, or faith in the non-imputation of sins, he himself neither spoke a word nor did he hand it on to us through the apostles or through his Church.

Add that it is per se incredible that sins, although they are being really committed, even by transgressing the divine and natural law, are remitted by God for the very fact that they are reputed even as nothing, because he who commits them so believes and, with that confidence, does wrong. For what is this but to give men a free license to sin? Assuredly, nothing can be thought of more contrary to the justice and most wise providence of God. Nor is it less repugnant to the redemption of Christ, for thus he would not have come to dissolve, but to foster and multiply, the works of the devil. But 1 John 3.5 says: "Ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins;" and later, v.8: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil;" and 1 Peter 2.21-22: "Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps, who did no sin, etc.;" and Paul Galatians 5.13: "Ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another." The merit of Christ is not, then, applied to men through that falsely devised special faith, but through "faith which worketh by love," Galatians 5.6. And from this faith we conceive the hope of justice, with penance for previous sins interceding, along with observance of the commands, without which true justice cannot subsist. For not he who reputes himself just but he "who doeth justice is just," as in the place above mentioned John says, 3.7. And thus too all the other things that I said are very frequent in the Scriptures, and have been expressly dealt with in their proper places.

Third, the Catholic Faith teaches, and it follows from what was said, that the fruit of the merits and satisfactions of Christ is not always applied equally to all believers and all the just; and hence it is not the case that, as often as mortal sins are remitted as to guilt, they are thus remitted as to penalty, so that they are imputed for absolutely no penalty, even temporal. Both are taught by the Council of Trent. The first in session 6 chs.7 & 10, and canon 14. Which is also taken from Paul 1 Corinthians 15 when he says, v.41-42: "For one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead;" and from the words of Christ, John 14.2: "In my Father's house are many mansions." Which are the various and unequal seats of the blessed, as all the Fathers expound, and in particular Augustine, tractat.67 on John, who says: "The many mansions signify the diverse dignities of merits in the one eternal life." Just as, therefore, there are unequal crowns in the fatherland, so in life there is inequality in grace and justice, and consequently also in participation in the merits of Christ. For all internal justice and its operation are conferred through the grace of Christ, and so is the fruit and participation in its merits; there is therefore inequality in this participation.

Now the second is taught by the same Council of Trent in the same session 6 ch.14 and canon 30, and session 14, and it follows manifestly from the first; for the reason whereby the merit of Christ is not always equally applied as to perfection of justice, by the same reason does the satisfaction of Christ not always have in us an equal effect as to remission of temporal penalty. The reason indeed is that the remission of penalty happens by the intervention of some disposition or satisfaction on the part of man; but this disposition or operation can be greater and lesser; therefore the remission of penalty too. Therefore mortal sins committed after baptism (for about baptism there is different special reason), although by penance they are remitted because of Christ, are not always remitted altogether as to temporal penalty, but according to the mode of the penance and of the disposition. And therefore David used to pray, Psalm 50 [51].2: “Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity;” and for the same cause all the Scriptures counsel penance for sins, even for sins remitted, and works of mercy and other good works for obtaining full remission of them. And the same is the common doctrine of the saints, as one may see in Augustine, bk. De Vera et Falsa Poenitentia ch.15, and Chrysostom, Homilia ‘De Poenitentia’ especially ch.5. And best Ambrose bk.7 on Luke at the end of ch.12, who says: “Just as those who pay back money return a debt, and the name of interest is not then purged until the whole quality of the total allotted sum is by some sort of payment or other paid right up to the smallest amount, thus by the compensation of charity and of other acts, or by some satisfaction or other of sin, the penalty is paid off.” He who has not made full satisfaction, then, although he be just, is debtor to some penalty.

4. To these is added another foundation of the faith, namely, that there are in men, even just men, certain sins which grace does not take away and which do not make a man an enemy of God or guilty of an eternal penalty, and are therefore called venial. So taught the Council of Trent in session 6 ch.15, and it receives sufficient proof now from that verse of Proverbs 24.16: “A just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again: but the wicked shall fall into mischief.” Those falls, then, of just men are some sorts of sin, but not such as to take away justice, otherwise the just man too would fall into mischief as often as he thus sinned. Hence Augustine rightly in Sermo 41 ‘De Sanctis’ calls these “small sins, from which in this life the saints are not immune, which do not kill the soul, though they disfigure it;” and epist.103 at the end, he calls them “light sins of the just, which are taken away by ordinary remedies.” And because of the same he asserts, bk.2 De Peccator. Merit. ch.7, that John stated, 1 John 1.8: “If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, etc.” Again, to the same sins pertains that verse of James 3.2: “For in many things we offend all,” as Bede notes on that same place, and Augustine in Enchiridion ch.78, where he posits many examples of such sins, and more in bk. De Natura et Gratia chs.36 & 38.

Natural reason also proves this, because prudent and perfect friendship is not dissolved because of some slight negligence or offense; therefore it is incredible that friendship with God is lost because of any slight defect whatever, or that some very slight defect or other renders a man worthy of divine hate and eternal punishment. But although these sins do not deserve so bitter a punishment, nevertheless, by the very fact that they are sins, they deserve some definite penalty, as is rightly noted by Augustine, bk. Octoginta Trium Quaestionum q.26; because to any guilt, according to the due order of justice and in line with its quality, there is some mode of penalty responding; but God is most just; and therefore these sins too, which detract in some way from his law, he does not allow to go unpunished, according to that verse of Matthew 5.26: “Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou has paid the uttermost farthing.” Where Jerome says: “This is what he says, you will not come out of prison until you have paid also for the smallest sins.” And almost in the same way is it expounded by Ambrose, bk.7 on Luke, at the end of ch.12. Finally, as Augustine said in the said Sermo 14, although these sins “do not kill the soul, they so disfigure it that they permit it, either scarcely or with great confusion, to come to the embrace of the heavenly Spouse.” Which is to be understood, I think, about the state of this life, and about the contemplation and love of God that can be had in this life; for if it be understood of the embrace of the Fatherland and of the blessed vision, such embrace can be had, not scarcely, but not at all, unless the disfigurement of such sins be first taken away. Because as is said in Apocalypse 21.27: “And there shall no wise enter into it any thing that defileth;” and in that state will be most fulfilled what Paul said Ephesians 5.25: “Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it.” And later, v.27: “That he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle.”

5. From these principles, therefore, the necessity of purgatory may be plainly concluded in this way. Just men, while they live in this life, have, together with justice, some guilt of temporal punishment that is due either for sins remitted or for venial sins committed afterward; but it often happens that the just die in this sort of state, either because, after many and grave sins, they did penance late or lightly or remissly, or because, although for a long time before death they are living in grace, they are frequently sinning venially, and they are negligent in applying remedies and doing works of satisfaction. Therefore it is necessary that there be, after death, a time and place of purgatory, wherein they may be able to be cleansed of these stains and pay the due penalties and enter into paradise; since indeed, according to the faith, no one is admitted to beatitude without complete remission of guilts and sins, as has been shown. Which reason suffices to confirm this dogma of faith, even if it cannot be expressly proved from Scripture, because the principles of this discussion are founded on Scripture itself, and are to some extent, as far as they depend on fact, even very well known by experience, and the inference is also necessary, and evidently known. But these things suffice, both for rendering the assertion altogether certain, and also so that it could be defined by the Church and proposed to the faithful for them to be bound to believe de fide, as was shown above. Now, that the Church has thus defined this truth is clear from the Councils of Florence and of Trent. And although so express a definition was not made, universal consent together with the very ancient tradition of the Catholic Church suffice for making the faith.

6. Hence I infer further that wrongly does King James reckon the article about purgatory among those that he calls recent and novel, since neither Augustine, nor Jerome, nor the other Fathers equal with them, who are certainly not recent, could not have ignored a truth supported on so many foundations of the faith. Which even is not difficult to show from their words. For Augustine on Psalms 37 [38] at the beginning, expounds about purgatory the words, v.1: “O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath (or as he reads) in thy indignation: neither correct me in thine anger [alt, chasten me in thy hot displeasure],” for thus he reads, and he says that: “This correcting in anger, through which the corrected are saved, will be after death, yet so as by fire.” Hence he thus expounds: “May you in this life purge me, and render me such that I should now not need the correcting fire.” In addition, bk. Octoginta Trium Quaestionum q.26, speaking of venial sins, he says that a definite punishment is due to them, both in this world and in the future one, where the particle ‘and’ he either put as a disjunctive, or he understood it under the condition that the penalty is due in the future age if it is not paid in the present one. More clearly, however, in the said Sermo 11 ‘De Sanctis’, treating of the same sins, he says: “Whatever of those sins has not been redeemed by us must be purged by that fire of which the Apostle said, I Corinthians 3.13 & 15, ‘because it shall be revealed by fire, and if any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss;’ for either, while we live in this world, we ourselves weary ourselves through penance, or certainly, by the will and permission of God, we will with many tribulations be afflicted for those sins and, if we give thanks to God, be set free.” And later: “Sins are themselves so purged in this age that in the future that purgatorial fire either does not find them or certainly finds a little of them, which it burns away. But if we neither in tribulation give thanks to God, nor redeem sins with good works, we will ourselves be delayed in that purgatorial fire for as long as the aforesaid little sins are being consumed like wood, hay, stubble.”

7. Again, in bk. De Octo Quaestionibus ad Dulcitium, although in q.1 he only says that: “Some are saved, yet so as by fire, and it is not incredible that so it happens to some after this life; but whether it is so can be inquired into;” however in q.2 he repeats the things he said, bk. De Cura pro Mortuis Agenda ch.1, which he mentions, and he teaches definitely and as certain that the suffrages of the living profit some of the dead, who were neither so evil that these cannot profit them, as are the damned, nor so good that they are not in need of them, but of a certain middle status, whom he calls “not greatly bad, because although they loved the goods that pass away, yet they were not such as those are of whom it is said that they will not possess the kingdom of God, but they are the just in need of some purgation.” And he teaches the same in Enchiridion ch.68 #96, where he says: “It is not to be denied that the souls of the dead are relieved by the piety of their own who are alive.” And therefore glorious Monica, the mother of Augustine, being well instructed in the Catholic Faith, while she was giving up her soul, asked nothing from her son and his companions but that they should keep her memory at the altar of the Lord, as he himself relates, bk.9 Confession. ch.11, and in bk.3 he commends her conspicuous faith and piety and prays for the soul of his mother, and asks others to pray. Besides, in bk.21 De Civitate Dei, ch.16, where he says, about infants dying with baptism only, that they are so disposed for beatitude that not only are they are not made ready for eternal punishments, “but they do not even suffer any purgatorial torments after death.” In which words he openly supposes that there are after this life purgatorial punishments, about which he later says: “But who may think there will be no purgatorial punishments except in the presence of that last, terrible judgment?” namely the universal one. For after it a place of purgatory will not be necessary, because before it the complete purgation of sins will happen in all the just, and therefore in that judgment all those who are to be judged are divided into only two places that will last for ever. And thus is Scripture to be understood whenever it speaks of those two ultimate ends. Also can be seen in the same Augustine (if it is his work) bk.5 Hypognosticon chs.5 & 6.

Next, in his book Quinquaginta Homiliarum, Homilia 16 near the end, the same Augustine teaches this truth very fully, some of whose words I will report, because they both confirm all the foundations posited above and sharply pierce the adversaries: “Those who have done things worthy of temporal punishments, about which the Apostle says, I Corinthians 3.15, ‘if any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire,’ they will cross through the fiery stream (which the word of the prophet mentions, Daniel 7.10) and the fords horrible with boiling and bubbling. As great as was the matter of sin, so great will be the delay in passing through; as much as guilt exacts, so great will some discipline of rational flame make claim from a man for itself.” And later: “There idle speech, and unjust or unclean thoughts, there a multitude of slight sins, which had infected the purity of noble nature, will gush forth; there the lake or leaden weight of the diverse offenses that creep in unawares, which have obscured the divine image, will be consumed; all which here could, in a brief transaction, have been separated from the soul by works of mercy and tears.” And so that the king may understand how Christ may be our purgatory, he concludes: “Behold thus does he have reason to exact of man who gave himself for man and, pierced with nails, joined himself to the law of death.” And in this Catholic sense did the same Augustine say, bk.10 De Civitate Dei ch.24, that: “The Lord Jesus Christ is the principle by whose incarnation we are purged; him indeed (that is, the devil) he contemned in his own flesh, which he assumed for the sacrifice of our purgation.” And later: “Him the Platonist did not recognize to be the principle, for then he would acknowledge purgatory.” Nothing else, then, is purgatory in Christ than to be redeemer, through whom men can in this life be most perfectly cleansed, if they wish to dispose themselves; otherwise, if in this life they have not attained it, in the future life, if they be just, they will be purged by condign punishments according to the rigor of justice, if they are not in some respect assisted by the suffrages of the living.

Besides St. Jerome elegantly affirms that there exists after this life some temporal punishment of fire, in the last chapter of Isaiah, almost in the last words, and he teaches that the works of some Christians must be tried and purged by fire, such that the purgation is temporal and ends. Also, in his bk. Contra Jovinianum, he expounds in the same way a place of Paul 1 Corinthians 5, and concludes: “If he, whose work burns and perishes and he suffers a loss of his labor, will indeed lose the reward of his labor, though he himself shall be saved, not however without the trial of fire; therefore he, whose work abides, which he hath built thereupon, shall be saved without the trial of fire, and between salvation and salvation there will be indeed some diversity.” Which words are to be noted, for they confirm the discussion given above, although in altered order. For by the diverse way of obtaining salvation, through the purgatorial fire or without it, Jerome collects from the latter a diversity of merits and rewards; but we contrariwise from the diversity of the works, whether bad or good, that dispose to justice, have deduced the necessity of purgatory. And in ch.1 Ezekiel the same Jerome thus concludes: “From which is shown that after punishments and sufferings and the purgation of sins there will be mercy, at least in those who have merited to see God in his kingdom.”

The same truth is taught by Ambrose, on ch.14 Apocalypse about the words, v.5: “For they are without fault,” saying: “The souls of the saints are without fault, because if they have contracted any uncleanness from worldly habitation, it has either through penance and tears and works of charity, or through flagellation and certainly by purgatorial fire after death, been destroyed.” And like things are contained in ch.20 on the words, v.5: “This is the first resurrection.” I know it has been called into doubt whether the work is of Ambrose; but no one doubts but that it is of some grave and sufficiently ancient Father. However, the second prayer in preparation for mass is beyond doubt of Ambrose, and yet in it he thus prays to Christ: “Remember, because you yourself who judge are my advocate. But if something still in this age too you hold in me that needs to be avenged, do not hand me to the power of demons while you are wiping away my crime with purgatorial punishment.”

To these let St. Cyprian be added, who, in epist.52 to Antonianus, says: “It is one thing to stop for pardon, another to advance to glory; one thing, having been sent to prison, not to come out thence until you have paid the uttermost farthing, another to receive at once the reward of faith and virtue; one thing to be for sins cleansed by the long pain of torments and purged much time by fire, another to have all sins purged by a passion.” The same is taken from Tertullian, bk. De Anima chs.35 & 58 at the end, where he thus expounds the said place of Matthew 5 when he says: “We understand the prison to be the infernal regions, and we interpret the uttermost farthing to be even a small fault that needs there to be paid by delay of resurrection.” Which is more or less the exposition that Athanasius has too in bk. Variarum Scripturarum Questiones q.62. And several other things from the Greek Fathers for this truth are brought together by Gennadius Scholarius, patriarch of Constantinople, in his Defensio Concilii Florentini ch3. Chief too, both in the Greeks and the Latins, are where they assert that sacrifices, prayers, and alms, and other good works of the living help the dead for some remission of punishments, if they have departed in the state in which they are capable of that help. Which places of the saints approving this very ancient tradition are so frequent that it seems superfluous to refer to them, especially when the article requires a proper disputation. But those who hand it on must have believed that some souls of the faithful are so punished after death that they could be freed from those punishments, and this is what we call purgatory. But about the dogma can be seen especially Augustine in the said book De Cura pro Mortuis Agenda, and Cyril of Jerusalem Catechesis 5 ‘Mystagogica’, Cyprian epist.66 to the clergy etc., and Ambrose Orat. ‘De Obitu Theodosii’ and Orat. 2 ‘De Obitu Fratris sui Satyri’, and Damascene Orat. ‘De Defensione Fidei’.

From these things one may in addition understand that without cause did the king of England wish to lay down that Bellarmine could not prove purgatory from the Scriptures; for as the holy Fathers did not lay it down without the Scriptures, although at the same time they teach it from apostolic tradition, so too did the most illustrious Bellarmine wisely and learnedly prove this truth from the Scriptures by understanding them as the holy Fathers interpreted them. But if this does not satisfy the king, because his sure knowledge understands them otherwise, it has already been replied that that knowledge, which differs from the sense of the Fathers and of the Catholic Church, is not true knowledge, nor is it from the spirit of God, on the ground even most of all that (as I have often said and as, along with Paulinus, Augustine in almost the same cause says, in his book De Cura pro Mortuis Agenda ch.1), although Scripture were lacking, the authority of the Church would suffice. For certainly when Scripture teaches that the Church is the pillar and ground of the truth, and that the apostolic traditions are to be believed, it virtually contains the assertion of purgatory, which both the Church and tradition teach. Next we add that this truth is sufficiently contained in those places of Scripture wherein God is said to reward each according to his deeds, according to that verse of 2 Corinthians 5.10: “We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that everyone may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.” For hence we have that no evil is left unpunished by God, and therefore, if it is not punished in this life or satisfaction made for it, it must be avenged in a future life with punishment condign and commensurate with the guilt, and hence by temporal punishment, if the person is otherwise just and pleasing to God.

Next we say that this truth is also proximately and immediately proved in the New Testament from the place often cited, 1 Corinthians 3.13: “The fire shall try every man’s work of what sort it is.” And later, v.15: “If any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.” For although we do not deny that those words are sometimes expounded otherwise by some Fathers (whose interpretation there is not leisure now to weigh), nevertheless it can in no way be rejected, because it is both very consonant with the text and sense of the Church, and is approved by many Fathers, as by Augustine and Jerome, whom we have already reported, and by Ambrose on Paul, where many others also prove it, and Origen copiously Homilia 6 on Exodus and best Paulinus in epist.9 to Severus, where he calls purgatory “wise fire”, and in the poem containing the paraphrase of Psalms 1, where he calls it “the arbiter fire”. And thus too did Gregory expound it in his chapter on 3 Kings near the end, and in bk.4 Dialog. ch.39, and Caesar of Arles Homilia 8 on the same place. The place too in Matthew 5.25-26: “Lest...thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing,” if it is pondered with right reason, does not a little help, especially since it is thus also understood by the Fathers mentioned, by Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, and Jerome, to omit the more recent ones. Next, that this is also insinuated or supposed by Christ in the words of Matthew 12.32: “It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come,” is understood by the Fathers, as Augustine bk.21 De Civitate Dei ch.13, who is imitated by Gregory in the said ch.39, and Bede on that place, and Bernard. And if the prudent way of speaking is carefully considered, no one speaks about a certain thing according to two times unless the thing is wont in either time or state to be done.

From the Old Testament too some testimonies were touched on above. Of which sort is that verse of Psalms 37 [38].1: “O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath; neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure,” according to the interpretation of Augustine reported above, which is also handed on by Gregory on the first penitential psalm. But most convincing of all are the testimonies in which is either asserted or supposed that the dead can be helped by the works of the living. Among them indeed the more known and clearer is what is contained in 2 Maccabees 12.46: “It is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from sins.” Which the king cannot escape except by denying that the book is canonical. But this is a most miserable refuge, and disputing it now would go on a long time or rather to infinity. Sufficient, then, are the things which we said in the previous book about the rule for discriminating canonical books from non-canonical, and that the Fathers commonly use the book as canonical; and that Augustine in particular, in the said book De Cura pro Mortuis Agenda ch.1, confirms therefrom this truth. Since, therefore, this truth about purgatorial punishments has been confirmed by so great a weight of authority and reason, let the king see by what spirit he is led when he dares to call it “a fiction unworthy of having effort spent on it.” Nor let him think that Catholics have a contention with heretics either about the state or the place of purgatory, or whether it is one or many, nor about the mode or quality of the punishments; for although these are soberly and prudently disputed by theologians (as that they can also be inquired into was sometimes said by Augustine mentioned above), yet if meditation on these things does not please the king, we do not contend with him about them, provided he not deny that temporal punishments after death are designed for some of the just, the imperfect.

About the things, however, that the king subjoins as consequent to purgatory, and that he calls frivolous, since they are not impugned by him, there is not now need to say much. But because in the margin of his book these things are said to be frivolous, “indulgences, jubilees, and satisfactions for the dead,” I will say briefly that only by Protestants, trifling men assuredly and very impudent, who perverted the king in his infancy, could these things be reputed frivolous. For either they are called frivolous because they have no foundation of truth, or because, although true, they are of little or no moment. This latter could not come into the mind of any man who does not lack right reason. For who would think it of little moment to be freed from the debt of the gravest punishment? Or who would think it a thing to be despised, or deny it to be a work of charity, to free one's neighbor, by prayers poured out to God and by personal afflictions and alms, from the gravest punishment? Or who would not value greatly the power almost divine of applying with effect the satisfactions of Christ and the saints in compensation for the punishments of purgatory? Certainly these and the like things are thought to be frivolous by Protestants, not because they are of little moment, but because infidels think them incredible. Let them, therefore, consider that they have no foundation of truth. But if it is true, as the king thinks, that these things are consequent to the assertion of purgatory, since it has been shown that purgatory is supported on the greatest and infallible authority, certainly the other things that follow that assertion cannot fail to be founded on a great weight of authority; therefore by this reason too they can be said to be, not frivolous, but most certain dogmas of the Catholic Faith.

8. Now if those pseudo-theologians, who have imposed on the king in this matter, were versed in sacred doctrine, they would not assert that suffrages and indulges follow on purgatory; for they are not founded on it nor do they have a necessary connection with it. For God could, if he wished to use the rigor of justice, exact the punishments of purgatory from the men who are dead and are guilty of them, without any remission or compensation. But indulgences and satisfactions are nothing other than certain remissions and compensations for the punishments of purgatory, which God, because of his infinite goodness and the outstanding merits of Christ, has conceded to his Church, both so that those punishments might through Christ be made milder and so that there might be among the members of Christ a greater and more excellent communication of mutual charity. Wherefore, although purgatory, satisfactions for the dead, and indulgences have one common matter, namely the debt of temporal punishment which in some of the just sometimes remains after this life, and therefore one of these can in some way be collected from another, nevertheless, properly speaking, one is not founded on another, but each one per se has a very grave foundation of truth. For the punishment of purgatory is founded on the order of divine justice that, by the rules of faith, is made sufficiently manifest to us and very consonant with reason, as has been shown.

Suffrages, however, on the other hand, or satisfactions are founded on the "communion of saints" which we profess in the creed. For that that communion exists, not only among mortals living here, but also with the just already dead, according to the state of each, is handed on by the authority of the Church and has a sufficient foundation in Sacred Scripture. Which has been shown in previous chapters about the communion between us and the saints reigning with Christ, insofar as we showed both that they help us by their intercessions and that we can and should request intercessions of them, and venerate and praise them and give thanks to God for their glory. But our communion with the just dead who are not yet blessed, but detained in prison for certain debts, is founded also on the perpetual tradition of the Church and on Sacred Scripture, as can be understood from what has been said in this chapter. For prayer, alms, sacrifice, and similar works offered to God for the dead, so that they may be released from sins, pertain to this communication; but Scripture and the custom of the Church teach that it is best to pray and work for the dead. Hence rightly does Augustine already mentioned collect that sufficient authority proves that this is not done without fruit; satisfaction for the dead, therefore, is not frivolous but very satisfactorily founded. Add that this kind of communication is very consonant with charity as well as with reason, and very worthy of kind divine providence; he then cannot be held for a Catholic who thinks this so Catholic truth, received by the Universal Church, is frivolous.

The concession of indulgences, indeed, to which also jubilees pertain, has two very solid foundations. One is the infinite treasure of the merit and satisfaction of Christ the Lord and the saints, which treasure, at least as to the riches of Christ and their sufficiency, I do not reckon is denied by Protestants; which now is sufficient for us, because the satisfactions of the saints are not so necessary but are added on out of abundance, which to explain further and prove does not belong to the present place. The second foundation is the supreme power of binding and loosing which Christ conceded to his Vicar, which is sufficiently founded on the Gospel, as we will show in the following book. But that the power extends to this dispensation and concession of indulgences is sufficiently shown by ecclesiastical tradition and the very ancient use of the same power by the common consent of the Church, as we have treated of more at large in our theological disputations, in vol.4 p.3 disp.48 and following.

Chapter 16: On errors about the rites and benedictions of the Church.

Summary: 1. The blessing of bells and other like benedictions seem trivialities to Protestants. 2. The institution and use of bells. 3. Use of this sort was introduced in the Church over one thousand years ago. 4. It is shown that nothing can be faulted in the blessing of bells. 5. The objection of heretics is solved. 6. Instance.

1. Among other examples that the king puts down as articles which he calls novel and recent, he adds these words on p.58 of his Preface, at the beginning: "The baptizing of bells and a thousand trivialities besides;" but what trivialities they are he neither declares himself nor expounds in the margin. Hence it seems that under these words he comprehends all similar benedictions, for Protestants are wont to make trifles of all of them. Although about this one, which he calls the baptizing of bells, the Magdeburgians have said, with great exaggeration, that it is a horrendous error and a great sacrilege against the institution of Christ. Thus does Bellarmine report, bk.4 De Pontif. cont.10 ch.6. And therefore, to complete this book, it has seemed worth the effort to say a few things about these rites by responding to his own objection from the particular example and, on occasion thereof, by touching on something about the whole class of such benedictions.

2. Two things, then, in signs of this sort, which are called bells, can be looked at, namely the use of such an instrument for agreeably exercising certain public actions, and the rites instituted by the Church for the blessing of bells; and each must be spoken of individually. At the beginning, then, it is certain that the ancient custom of the Church was that masses and other offices should happen in sacred places and temples, so that the Christian people might gather for them at definite hours or on definite days. Hence it was necessary also that there be in the Church some sign on the giving of which the people might come to the Church. For this function bells were instituted, which for that reason were wont sometimes to be signified by the name of signs absolutely, as in ch. 'Solent'

De Consecrat. d.1 and in chs.1 & 2 ‘De Offic. Custodis.’ Therefore, on consideration of this proper and, as it were, literal reason for the institution of the use of bells, no prudent man can doubt but that it was both very useful and very agreeable, because some public sign was morally necessary. Hence too in the Old Testament God said to Moses Numbers 10.2: “Make thee two trumpets of silver...that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps, etc.” And from Leviticus 23 is collected that on feast days the people was wont to be summoned or admonished by the blowing of trumpets. The same is indicated by the words of Joel 2.1: “Blow ye the trumpet in Zion.” There was, then, a moral necessity for some sign also in the Church of Christ. But the determination to the sound of bells depended on human choice, and therefore rightly and legitimate could it be done by the Church as it was done, and in a thing per se indifferent the custom of the Church was sufficient, so that no prudent and moderate man might be offended in it. Especially since the instrument is very apt for the aforesaid end, both because it can be rung easily and without great effort, and also because its sound is widely diffused, and finally because it is more durable and almost perpetual.

3. Add that this use of bells is not new in the Church. For although, as learned authors testify, it is certainly not clear at what time they began, there is yet no doubt but that their use was common in the Latin Church over a thousand years ago. For in the year 615 lived St. Lupus bishop of Sens, in whose acts it is related that at the time of a certain siege of the city of Sens “the holy bishop betook himself to the temple of the protomartyr Stephen and struck the sign to summon the people,” as is in Surius vol.5 for the first day of September. Where also he relates the marvelous works of God displayed in connection with that sign or bell. Again, in the year 665 died St. Eligius bishop of Noyon, in whose life, bk.2 ch.21, is related that when he had prohibited a priest from performing sacred acts in the church, and the priest, despising the prohibition, tried to ring the bell to summon the people, it did not make a sound, until the priest did penance and the holy bishop lifted the prohibition. Surius reports it vol.6 for the first day of December. In addition Bede, bk.4 Histor. Anglicanae ch.23, makes mention of a bell at whose sound certain women religious were wont to be summoned and stirred to prayer whenever one of them departed this world. But some conjecture that at the time of Anastasius the Persian martyr the use of bells had not yet been introduced, because in the 7th Synod acts 4 from his miracles, it is reported that on a certain solemn supplication the faithful were summoned, not by the sound of a bell, but through “the beating of sacred wooden signs.” But this is both not much of an obstacle, because that saint suffered in the twenty seventh year after the sixth century, and besides the words are said about the Greek Church where those wooden signs are believed to have lasted until the year of our Lord 865. For in that year they say (Baronius vol.1 for the year 58) that the Doge of Venice sent bells to the emperor Michael and that then their use commenced among the Greeks, the wooden signs having been abandoned, as Baronius notes for the same year at the end, although he says elsewhere that the wooden signs were not in common use for summoning the people of any church, but only among religious for summoning monks in monasteries.

But whatever may have happened here, it is certain that some signs of this sort were always deemed necessary, which (and this is not to be overlooked) were also called sacred; and among them the use of bells prevailed as more useful and more lasting. Now rightly does Walfridius Strabo note, in his book De Rebus Ecclesiasticis ch.5, that these public signs could not have been agreeably in use in the primitive Church; because the divine offices, on account of the multitude of gentiles and especially on account of the violence of persecutions, could not be so public, for rather care was taken to make them secret. And therefore the faithful were invited in other ways, as by announcing in one meeting a next future one, or by recording it on written tablets, as Strabo says in the place cited, or by individuals or a deacon privately going around and giving reminder, as Baronius, vol.1 for the year 58 n.102, conjectures from letters 11 and 13 of Ignatius. But after peace was given to the Church and after its increase, the use of public signs was necessary, and so it is likely that a little after Constantine's time the rite of bells was introduced, which was afterwards approved by perpetual tradition. On which can be seen what Coccius reports in his Thesaurus vol.2 bk.3 a.6.

4. Since therefore it is clear that there is nothing in the simple use of bells that heretics can carp at, let us see what they find fault with in the blessing and, so to say, symbolic use of them. For either they universally detest as superstitious any blessing and ceremonial consecration of sacred things instituted by the Church, or they find some particular thing worthy of blame in the blessing of bells; but we might refute both with a single word of Augustine, who says, epist.138 ch.5: "If there is anything the Church preserves throughout the whole globe, to dispute that it should not so be done is a mark of the most insolent madness." And what he says elsewhere: "One should not believe that a thing is vainly done where there is the plain authority of the whole Church." But further, the first general alternative is repugnant, not only to tradition, but also the Scripture and reason. For Paul says that every creature is sanctified by the word of God and by prayer, 1 Timothy 4. Hence we read that Christ, for multiplying the loaves, used blessing by looking up to heaven, Matthew 14. And Mark 6 adds that he blessed the fish, and in Luke 24 Christ blessed the bread by the breaking of which he wished to be made known to the disciples. Why then is it that the Church cannot either sanctify things by blessing them, or in this imitate Christ? Or what moral or natural reason can be thought of to which this is repugnant? For the Church in these sorts of blessings chiefly uses the sign of the cross and prayer, of which prayer was greatly commended by Christ the Lord, the sign of the cross, however, received great power of sanctifying from his death, for it contains a certain virtual invocation and supplication on account of Christ's death; therefore by both titles the blessings of the Church are religious and pleasing to God.

And this is also confirmed by the ancient blessings of holy water, of bread, of oil, of the paschal candle, and other like things, about which here is not the place to speak. But it is certain that they are not new but customary in the Church, as could easily be shown from the Fathers; but I omit it as foreign to this place, and I conclude this place with the illustrious testimony of Gregory Nazianzen. For in Orat. 1 against Julian the rites and sanctions of the Church (for thus he calls them) he so praises that he says that: "they most aptly harmonize with it, and are such that none of those who desire to follow in our footsteps can be jealous of; since indeed they have not more by human genius and invention than by divine force and the firmness of time acquired their strength." And we can add this rite of bells has also sometimes been confirmed by God with miracles, as can be seen in Sigebert, in his Chronicle for the year 1081, and in Baronius, vol.8 for the year 615 n.14, and in Durandus, bk.1 De Ritibus Ecclesiae ch.22.

But if we consider the peculiar rite of blessing a bell, it contains nothing besides certain prayers whereby the peculiar benefits of God are requested for the faithful through the sound of bells; in which there is nothing that is not very pious and religious.

For when first certain psalms and the common rite of blessing water have been prefaced, this prayer is interposed: "May the virtue of the Holy Spirit attend upon it, so that when this instrument prepared for inviting the sons of the holy Church has been dipped in it, whenever afterwards the ringing of it sounds, the power of those who lie in wait may depart far off, etc." And afterwards petition is made that in the Christians who hear such sign the growth of devotion may increase and that they may in the Church worthily pray and praise God; and these petitions are repeated in other prayers, and especially that "all who convene at its sound may be freed in body from all temptations of the enemy, and be purified in mind from corrupt thoughts, and always follow the teachings of the Catholic Faith, and deserve to receive the grace of thy consolation, Savior of the world, etc." All which petitions are very pious and show great faith. And from them one may collect that, although the first reason or occasion for inventing these signs was the moral necessity of summoning the Christian people, yet afterwards the Church, by faithful thought and wise institution, ordained them to spiritual effects, and assumed them, so to say, as instruments by which the faith of the faithful might be aroused, through the intervention of which they might obtain those sorts of effects from God through Christ. Wherefore, although the instruments of signs be made for a corporeal effect, so to say, namely for summoning the faithful, yet they are blessed for the spiritual effects of warding off demons and all the harms, both spiritual and corporal, which come to us through their plottings, and of exciting the faithful to the increase of faith and devotion.

But Protestants urge that this is a kind of superstition, because without a precept or divine authority it is vain to aim at spiritual fruit through the material sound of bells from the force of solely human blessing. But we easily reply that a divine precept is not necessary, for it is enough that the act is not evil of itself nor specially prohibited by God. Next, we say that the authority of God is not lacking, at any rate in its root and origin, because he himself gave authority to the pastors of the Church for ruling the Church and for making disposition of the things that pertain to the accidental rites of the Church. And in things that are approved for the Universal Church there is not lacking even the authority of the Holy Spirit teaching the Church and governing it. Finally, the confidence with which the like blessings are done is founded on the faith of Christ and of his promises, and so it is far distant from all superstition. Because the spiritual effect is only expected from God through the prayers of the Church, which are founded on the blessing; and although they seem, as regard us, to be transient and to leave no virtue in the blessed thing, they always remain in the divine knowledge. And therefore, although they do not always infallibly obtain the effects requested, they do nevertheless often procure them, when other opportune conditions occur, because this is generally promised to a just prayer, of which sort that prayer must most be thought to be which is founded on the name of the whole Church.

5. Yet the adversaries will instance that in this blessing not only do entreaties intervene but also certain actions, which can have no effect, and therefore they seem to be vain and superstitious. And Protestants especially calumniate the washing of bells, for these are commanded to be washed everywhere, within and without, with blessed water. And that is why perhaps the king calls this rite not with the name of blessing but with the name of baptizing, or perhaps because Calvin thought all use of blessed water to be a sort of profanation of baptism. But this is altogether vain, since in such use neither the intention nor the form of baptism is involved. One should not, however, care about the name, both because the Church neither in the rite of baptizing bells nor in any other decree used the word ‘baptizing’ but the word ‘blessing’ of bells; and because it contains nothing deserving fault, and it is not new but sufficiently ancient, as can be understood from what Durandus reports bk.5 De Ritibus ch.22 n.6.

6. Putting aside the term, then, we admit about these sorts of actions that they are not done for some effect which they cannot properly bring about or obtain; and nevertheless we deny that they are done vainly or superstitiously, because they are done for some agreeable signification, to excite the memory or affection of the faithful. Which reason is very much consonant with the human condition, and therefore God himself observed it both in the ancient sacraments and in the new, which the Church imitates in its own way and according to its own grasp in instituting things and rites of its own. And so, through that washing of a bell, there is signified, in the first place, a certain dedication of to a sacred use and a separation from other profane signs. Again, there is signified with how much purity and decency, internal and external, and how much integrity of faith they ought to come to Church who are summoned to the Church on the sound of such signs. But over the antiquity of this rite I do not delay; for although some attribute it to the Pontiff John XIII while others judge it to be older, the thing itself, however, is uncertain, and matters little for the truth of the doctrine. For in these things, which depend on human institution, there can be change and novelty, as I said above. For not all novelty but only profane novelty is to be detested; but there could be a pious one, prudently and by legitimate power introduced; but such is the use and rite of which we are treating, and therefore, at whatever time it began, it is irreproachable.

Sum and conclusion of the whole book with an address to the king of England.

About the mysteries of our faith, which King James touches on in his Preface, we have strictly treated those that can seem sufficient for a man ready prudently to believe, but too much for a man who will not believe. For although these divine and sacrosanct mysteries, those especially that pertain to the divine Eucharist and to the cult and invocation of the most Blessed Virgin and other saints, so exceed the limits of human reason and the bounds of nature that, for the understanding of them, nothing that might be said by a man can be deemed sufficient, yet, for persuading pure and sincere faith against the writings of the king of England, we have judged it enough and more than enough to show the antiquity of our faith and the agreement therein of the holy Fathers. And therefore it was that alone we also promised to demonstrate, and we have fulfilled the promise with what diligence, certainty, and clarity we could.

It remains, most serene king, that just as we have with the greatest fidelity produced what we promised, so we require of you too, with the humility we ought, what you also promised. For these are your words in your Preface to Christian princes: “I indeed frankly make this pledge, that as often as any head of that religion which I profess be shown not to be ancient, Catholic, and apostolic but novel (in matters, that is, that have regard to the faith), I will at once depart therefrom.” And later (he says): “I will thus conclude this place, that no dogma of the faith, which indeed is necessary for salvation, will I ever refuse to embrace that the whole Catholic Church has already right from the times of the apostles without intermission for many centuries afterwards constantly taught and believed.” Since, therefore, not one only but many very grave dogmas of the faith, namely about the truth of the body and blood of the Lord in the Eucharist, about the cult, due use, and sacred oblation of the same, about the invocation of the saints reigning with Christ and especially of the most holy Virgin, about the punishments and suffrages of the faithful souls in need of purgation, and other like things, which the Roman Church teaches and believes, we have shown manifestly to have been very ancient in the Catholic Church, and since that the king of England denies them and professes the contrary as true and Catholic is manifest, he assuredly cannot deny that the condition required by himself, by us and by other Catholics before us, has been fulfilled, and hence that he is held by his pledge, whose performance in accordance therewith we by many titles require.

First, because the promise is royal, which it is fitting should be most firm. Next, because on the supposition of the state of Anglican affairs, it was very consonant with prudence and religion. Add to these, most serene king, that unless you acquiesce in manifested truth a very great danger to your salvation threatens you; for to be ignorant of truth is human, but not to wish to acknowledge it when it has been made plain, or to attack it when acknowledged, is most dangerous, since eternity is balanced on the scales of faith. Finally, because by no honest reason, or by no pretext, can you escape the bonds of your words. Or do you require clearer light or greater testimony? Hear Chrysostom saying: "Just as always to be learning is a sign of never being able to advance; so always to ask for testimony is a sign of never being able to believe." Or are you unsure of your strength and power against the enemies of the faith? But if the promptitude of your will be not lacking, there is no reason to fear lack of power; for what prudence persuades, and what faith teaches, and religion commands, that royal power can accomplish with surely no trouble; especially because if your spirit is not lacking, God certainly will not be lacking, whose gift faith itself is and defense of the faith. Or do you fear the scandal of perverse men? Hear Augustine: "If truth gives rise to scandal, more usefully is scandal allowed to come to be than truth abandoned." Blind, therefore, are they and leaders of the blind, condemn them, they are yours, cut them off; easily will that be done which for God, for your own affairs and for theirs is done. Or, finally, you suffer something human, and you fear lest, if you are subject to the Pontiff, something may be taken from your authority? Do not be troubled; the Roman Pontiff does not seek what is yours but you; for the obedience of faith does not diminish a kingdom, but increases rather the temporal one and lays open the eternal one, whose keys have been committed to the Roman Pontiff, and therefore is he anxious for your salvation. But that you may be persuaded of the fact, the following book will shown what is your right and power and what is his.

ON THE EXCELLENCE AND POWER OF THE SUPREME PONTIFF OVER TEMPORAL KINGS

Preface

Chapter 1: Whether political principality be legitimate and from God.

Summary. 1. The error of some Jews who acknowledge no human principality. 2. First assertion: a political principality introduced in due manner is just. 3. Proof by reason. 4. For political principality one mystical head is enough. 5. Second assertion: the power of the political prince flows from God. 6. Proof by reason. 7. The foundation for the error at the beginning of this chapter is dissolved.

Chapter 2. Whether political principality is immediately from God or divine institution.

Summary. 1. King James is of the opinion that political principality is immediately from God. 2. What things are required for some power to be conceded immediately by God. 3. Supreme civil power is immediately conferred by God on a perfect society only. The first part of the assertion is proved. 4. Second proof. 5. Proof of the second part. 6. Objection. 7. How democracy is said to be by right of nature. 8. No political principality is immediately from God. 9. Confirmation from the Fathers. 10. The conclusion is proved by reason. 11. The same conclusion is shown by examples. 12. Objection. 13. Human will can in two ways intercede in the conferring of power that flows from God. First way. 14. Second way.

Chapter 3. The foundations and objections of the King of England against the doctrine of the above chapter are satisfied.

Summary. 1. First foundation of the king taken from inconvenience. 2. By refutation of the king the illustrious Bellarmine is vindicated. When a people can rise up against the king and exempt itself from his power. 3. The people cannot restrain power once it has been transferred to the king, nor abrogate his just laws. 4. Second foundation of the king. Solution. 5. It is more probable that Saul received his power from the people. 6. Matthias received his apostleship directly from God. 7. The examples which King James adduces do not prove that political principality is immediately from God. 8. Third objection. 9. Solution.

Chapter 4: Whether the civil power among Christians, which Christians are held to obey, is legitimate.

Summary. 1. Error of the ancient heretics. First foundation of this error. 2. Second foundation. 3. Rejection of the aforesaid heresy from Scriptures and the Fathers. 4. Rejection of the same heresy by a reason taken from St. Thomas. 5. The force of St. Thomas' reason is made plain. It is not licit for the faithful again to create voluntarily for themselves an infidel king. 6. A pagan king seizing a Christian city in a just war also secures true dominion over it. When subjection to a prince tends to the detriment of the faith, the faithful can exempt themselves from it. 7. When matrimony between infidels can be dissolved because of the conversion of one of them to the faith. 8. Conclusion: it is de fide certain that there are true kings and princes among Christians. 9. Evasion. It is rejected. 10. The assertion is proved by reason. 11. Response to a tacit evasion. 12. In what Christian liberty consists. 13. The first foundation of the first error is solved. 14. The place in Matt. 17 is expounded. 15. The second foundation is solved.

Chapter 5: Whether Christian kings have supreme power in civil or temporal things, and by what right.

Summary. 1. What supreme power is. 2. There is a double subjection, direct and indirect, and what each is. 3. The sense of the question is made clear. 4. First opinion for the negative. 5. First foundation. 6. The true opinion is established. 7. An emperor does not have supreme temporal power over the Church. 8. The assertion is proved from the authority of the Supreme Pontiffs. 9. The same conclusion. 10. Supreme civil power does not belong to the Supreme Pontiff by human right. 11. The same is proved of divine right. 12. Objection. It is solved. 13. Objection. First response. 14. Second solution. The response is rejected. 15. The foundations of the contrary opinion are solved.

Chapter 6: Whether there is in the Church of Christ a spiritual power of external and quasi political jurisdiction distinct from the temporal.

Summary: 1. There is an ecclesiastical power of order and one of jurisdiction. 2. Again, ecclesiastical jurisdiction is double. Sense of the question. 3. The heresy of Marsilius of Padua and the foundation for the Anglican Schism. 4. The foundation of this sort of heresy. 5. First assertion de fide. Proof from Scripture. 6. Evasion of the king of England and his reasons. 7. The evasion of the king is rejected. 8. Satisfaction made to the first proof of the king. 9. The king's second proof is dissolved. 10. The Holy Spirit cannot properly be called the Vicar of Christ. 11. Christ the Lord conferred true spiritual jurisdiction on Peter. 12. Distinction between the spiritual and temporal power. 13. The foundations of the errors referred to at the beginning of this chapter are solved.

Chapter 7: That the power of ruling the Church in spiritual or ecclesiastical matters does not exist in temporal kings or princes is proved by authority.

Summary: 1. What the disposition is of the spiritual and temporal power in their order to their subject. Error of the Anglican sect about the subject of spiritual power. 2. First conclusion: to temporal kings, as such kings, no spiritual power belongs. 3. The assertion is proved from the Supreme Pontiffs. 4. The same assertion is confirmed from the emperors.

Chapter 8: The same truth is confirmed by reasons.

Summary: 1. First reason. 2. Second reason. Evasion of the Protestants. It is rejected. 3. Another evasion is excluded, and it is shown that the supreme head of the Church ought to be one. 4. Objection. Solution. Instance. Response. 5. A certain evasion is refuted. 6. Third reason. 7. Response of the heretics. 8. The same response is refuted most from the principles of the Protestants. 9. The same response is impugned by its disadvantages. First. 10. Second. 11. Evasion. It is rejected. 12. An evasion of this sort is repugnant to King James himself.

Chapter 9: Solution to some objections against the truth proved in the previous chapters.

Summary: 1. Triple question about the power of ruling the Church. 2. First objection. 3. In the law of nature there was no power of a supernatural order. Nor any spiritual jurisdiction. 4. Objection. 5. Second objection. 6. Third objection from the New Testament. 7. Solution to the two first testimonies. 8. From the third testimony, in 1 Timothy 2, nothing against the truth established can be collected. 9. The testimony of Matthew 22 concludes to the opposite. The testimonies also of John 18 and Luke 12 and 22 confirm the doctrine handed down. 10. Fourth objection. 11. Solution. Augustine is wrongly cited for the contrary error. 12. Response to the words of Isidore. 13. Fifth objection from the Fathers. 14. Solution. The true sense of the Fathers is shown. 15. Genuine exposition of the Council of Arles.

Chapter 10: Whether Christ the Lord conferred the supreme spiritual power of the Church on Peter.

Summary: 1. The Roman Pontiff has this power. 2. Conclusion de fide. Proof from the promise of Christ. 3. The aforesaid promise was made to Peter in his own person. 4. The same truth is confirmed from the Supreme Pontiffs. 5. It is shown again from the Fathers. 6. Peter, Matthew 16, was designated the foundation of the Church. Proof from the Fathers. 7. Proof again from reason. 8. Christ conferred on Peter through the keys supreme spiritual power. 9. Confirmation from John 21. Rejection of a certain interpretation of heretics. 10. What the word 'feed' signifies in Scripture. 11. The power of Peter extends to the whole Church. 12. The exposition given of the words of Christ is confirmed from the Fathers. 13. The same truth is shown from the titles of Peter. 14. Reason for the institution of the Primacy of Peter. 15. Ecclesiastical governance ought to be monarchical.

Chapter 11: Satisfaction is made to objections against the doctrine of the previous chapter.

Summary: 1. No one can accuse the primacy of Peter of novelty. Peter cannot be said to be prince of the apostles except by reason of supreme majesty. 2. Objection of the king from Scripture against the proof of the primacy of Peter. 3. Solution to the objection. Catholics prove immediately from Scripture only the primacy of Peter in spiritual things. 4. When a Pontiff might take kingdoms away from temporal princes. 5. Second objection. 6. Response. The words of John 21: "Feed my sheep" are said to Peter alone. 7. First exposition of the words of Matthew 16: "And upon this rock, etc." Second exposition. Even the authors of the aforesaid expositions establish Peter as foundation of the Church. How the foundation of the Church on Peter and on faith agree. 8. The exposition of Augustine is expounded and explained. 9. The power of binding and loosing was in Peter perpetual and independent, but in the others by dependence on him. 10. Certain places of Augustine are expounded. 11. The exposition of the words of Augustine is also proved from the words of Christ. 12. The instance posed by the King in his Preface, p.58. It is refuted. 13. An inferior prelate could add in his censure that he is doing it by power received from the Pontiff; but to add that he is doing it in virtue of the Pope is not appropriate. 14. A final objection taken from various indications. Four indications of this sort. 15. Peter has obtained first place as head in all congresses. To the first indication. 16. To the second. 17. To the third. 18. To the fourth.

Chapter 12: Whether the primacy of Peter perpetually and by succession persists in the Church.

Summary: 1. Error of heretics. 2. Conclusion de fide. The primacy of Peter did not with his life become extinct. Proof from Matthew ch.16. 3. Proof from John ch.21. 4. Evasion. It is rejected. 5. Proof also by reason. 6. Objection. It is dissolved and turned back. 7. The Roman Bishops did not in all privileges succeed Peter in the primacy.

Chapter 13: It is shown from Scripture that it is necessary to believe that the Roman Bishop is the true successor of Peter and that Peter's power is in him preserved .

Summary: 1. First assertion. 2. First reason for the conclusion. 3. Second reason. 4. Third reason. 5. Second assertion de fide. 6. The Vicar of Christ should be visible and in a definite see. 7. Proof of the conclusion. 8. In the Roman See alone could Peter have had a successor to his primacy. 9. An evasion of certain heretics is refuted. 10. Another evasion of heretics. 11. It is refuted. The successor to Peter in the Roman episcopate has also necessarily succeeded to the primacy.

Chapter 14: That the Roman Pontiff is successor of Peter is shown by the testimonies of the holy Fathers.

Summary: 1. Proof from Irenaeus. 2. From Augustine and Optatus of Milevis. 3. From Epiphanius and Tertullian. 4. From Jerome and Cyprian.

Chapter 15: That the Roman Pontiff is in dignity, power, and primacy of the Church the successor of Peter is proved by the authority of the Pontiffs themselves.

Summary: 1. Various ways in which the Pontiffs build up their dignity. 2. Later Pontiffs too have with equal constancy guarded their primacy.

Chapter 16: Response is made to the Protestants who mock the argument taken from the tradition of the Pontiffs, and it is confirmed by the authority of the Councils.

Summary: 1. First mode of evasion. 2. Another evasion is refuted. 3. From four General Councils the tradition of the Pontiffs is fortified. 4. From other synods the same tradition is confirmed.

Chapter 17: The same tradition is confirmed by the authority of the Fathers.

Summary: 1. Authorities from the Greek Fathers confirming the same tradition. From Ignatius and Irenaeus. 2. From Athanasius. 3 From Gregory Nazianzen. 4. From Cyril of Jerusalem. 5. The same primacy is collected from the custom of referring the graver causes to the Supreme Pontiff. 6. From Theodoret. 7. From the historians Socrates and Sozomen. 8. Authorities of the Latin Fathers. Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose. 9. Jerome. 10. Augustine. 11. Prosper. 12. Isidore, Bede. 13. Anselm and Benard.

Chapter 18: Satisfaction is made to two objections against the primacy of the Pontiff taken from Scripture and the Councils.

Summary: 1. Against the spiritual power of the Pontiff many things are objected by King James. 2. First Objection. Confirmation. 3 Solution to the objection. 4. The confirmation is dissolved. 5. Instance. Response. From the Scriptures is collected not the primacy of kings but of the Pontiff. 6. Second objection. Confirmation. 7. Solution to the objection. 8. A certain instance is refuted. 9 Response to the confirmation. 10. From the Council of Sessa the primacy of the Pontiff is also confirmed. Marcellinus was not deposed by the Council. 11. An example about an heretical Pope is met. An heretical Pope is deposed by God himself, not by men. Before deposition of a Pontiff a declaratory sentence of crime must first be given.

Chapter 19: Certain places in Gregory, which the king brings in as objections, are explained, and the true titles of the Roman Bishop are defended.

Summary: 1. The testimonies of Gregory are reviewed. 2. The legitimate explanation of the testimonies of Gregory is given, and the argument of the king is turned back against him. 3. Double acceptation of the name 'Universal Bishop'. The name of 'Universal Bishop' is suitable for the Pontiff if it does not exclude the other particular bishops. 4. Why Gregory avoided this name.

Chapter 20: Response is made to the other objections taken from the deeds and conjectures of the emperors.

Summary: 1. The fourth objection of the king and the first in this chapter. 2. It is proved that the primacy of the Pontiff could not be from the emperors. 3. To Phocas. The objection is met. Phocas only protected the primacy of the Pontiff. 4. To the elder Justin. To the younger Constantine. 5. To Constantine the Great. 6. To the Council of Nicea. 7. Another objection from conjectures. 8. It is solved. Several of the Pontiffs make very perfectly satisfied the governance of the Church. 9. The accusations of heretics are refuted. 10. The primacy of the Pontiff does not display injury to Christ but his singular providence toward the Church.

Chapter 21: Whether the persons of princes or temporal kings are subject to the spiritual power of the Supreme Pontiff.

Summary: 1. Spiritual and temporal power are compared among themselves in a double way. 2. Various questions which arise from the subordination of one power to the other. 3. The error of Protestants about the subjection of kings to the Pontiffs. Foundation for this error. 4. Assertion de fide. Temporal kings are in spiritual matters subject to the Pontiff. 5. The conclusion is proved from the Council of Nicea and from the Fathers. 6. It is proved again from the deeds of the emperors. 7. Several kings of England have embraced this assertion. 8. The same subjection of kings is established by the deeds of the English. 9. Other doings of theirs are related that confirm the present institution. 10. The same subjection of kings is proved also by efficacious reason.

Chapter 22: Christian kings are subject to the power of the Pontiff not only as to their persons but also as to their royal power, that is, not only as men but also as Christian kings.

Summary: 1. First conclusion. 2. This assertion is common among Catholics. 3. Proof of the conclusion. 4. It is shown from the part of kings themselves that directive force over them exists in the Pontiff. 5. Convincing proof of the same from an efficacious dilemma. 6. By examples the same dependence of kings on the Pontiff is shown. 7. The matter of civil and canon law. 8. Civil laws making disposition about ecclesiastical matters are by right itself invalid. 9. When a Pontiff can intervene in secular judgments. 10. For defense of the Faith kings can be compelled by the Pontiff.

Chapter 23: It is shown that the Supreme Pontiff can use coercive power against kings, even up to deposing them from their kingdom if there be cause.

Summary: 1. Target of the controversy with the king of England. 2. Power for coercing unjust kings certainly exists in the Supreme Pontiff. 3. The same is proved from the Scriptures. 4. By the rod in Scripture coercive power is signified. 5. The evasions of adversaries are rejected. 6. The power of binding includes coercive power. 7. It is shown that Pontiffs can punish temporal kings even with temporal penalties. 8. The same is collected from the deed of St. Peter the Apostle. 9. The usage of the Pontiffs confirms the same truth. 10. The same is proved by reason. 11. Confirmation. 12. The power of punishing with temporal penalties is necessary for the Church. A tacit evasion is excluded. 13. Kings are not more exempt from the coercive power of the Pontiff than are others. 14. Although the Pontiff cannot punish a heathen king, yet he can free the subject faithful from his dominion.

Chapter 24. Objections to the doctrine of the previous chapters taken from Scripture are met.

Summary. 1. First objection. 2. Response is made to the testimonies of the New Testament. 3. To the testimonies of the Old Testament. 4. The prerogatives adduced by King James are weighed. The name of sons of God does not befit all kings. 5. Priests more frequently than kings are said to be anointed in Scripture. 6. This praise is especially attributed to the kings of Israel. 7. Priests are much more excellently called ministers of God than kings. 8. David was not called an angel, but he was made equal to one in a certain property. 9. Kings are nowhere called angels, but priests very much so. 10. A certain evasion is attacked. 11. From the fact that kings are called lamps no spiritual power is attributed to them. 12. Kings are nurses of the Church in temporal things, the Pontiff in spiritual ones. 13. The conclusion is drawn that the prerogatives introduced by the king bring nothing against the supreme power of the Pontiff. Solution.

Chapter 25. Satisfaction is made to the other objection taken from the deeds of kings narrated in the Old Testament.

Summary. 1. Various actions of kings are brought in as objections. Response to them individually. Kings are bound by the right of nature to take away idols. 2. Jehosaphat brought the people back to God through the priests. 3. Why Jehosaphat sent princes along with priests. 4. Jehosaphat only designated priests who had from God the power of judgment. 5. The fourth action adduced by King James is solved. 6. Another action is added by the king. 7. It belongs to kings in their own way to take away abuses. 8. David did not touch the ark of God. 9. The king brings in as objections the deeds of Solomon in 1 Chronicles ch.28 and 2 Chronicles ch.6. These deeds display no spiritual power. 10. How the dedication of the temple could have been done by Solomon. 11. Two other deeds of the same order. A deed from 2 Chronicles ch.34 is of no importance for the cause.

Chapter 26. Satisfaction is made to the argument taken from the comparison of the king and the Pontiff.

Summary. Objection of the king from the deed of Solomon. 2. The deed of Solomon indicates in him no spiritual power. 3. Even in the Old Testament the Pontiff was superior to the king. King Uzziah was punished because he tried to undertake the office of the priests. 4. The preeminence of the Pontiff is shown by reason of his greater dignity. 5. From the deed of Solomon it is not sufficiently collected even that his civil power was above the Pontiff. 6. An argument taken from the old Pontificate over to the new is nothing in the present cause. 7. Instance of heretics. Response. 8. The argument of the adversaries is turned back against them.

Chapter 27. Satisfaction is made to other objections taken from the Councils.

Summary. 1. First objection. 2. Solution. 3. Second objection from certain provincial Councils. It is solved. 4. As regard the Council of Tours. As regard the Council of Chalons. 5. As regard the Council of Mainz. 6. As regard the Council of Reims. 7. Solution.

Chapter 28. Satisfaction is made to the testimonies of the Fathers that the king objects.

Summary. 1. A first testimony from Augustine. Nothing favors the king. 2. A second from Tertullian. Which however only commends the supreme power of kings in temporal affairs. 3. A third from Justin. 4. A fourth from Ambrose. The true mind of Ambrose. 5 A fifth from Optatus. Its true sense. 6. A sixth from Gregory. 7. Response of Baronius for the year 593 nn. 14ff., and of Bellarmine in response to the king of England. 8. Other testimonies of the Fathers commending the imperial dignity, and the explication of them. 9. In the testimony of Cyril, already related in the previous paragraph, the same holy Doctor insinuates that there is another dignity superior to the regal.

Chapter 29. Satisfaction is made to objections taken from the novelty of the thing and from the deeds of emperors and kings.

Summary. 1. The king charges the primacy of the Pontiff with novelty. 2. How ancient the primacy of the Pontiff is. 3. Philip was the first Catholic emperor, and the Pontiff used his power against him. 4. The argument of the king taken from the vote of the emperor in choosing the Pontiff. 5. By what right emperors sometimes cast a vote in the election of Pontiffs. 6. A privilege conceded by one can be revoked by another who is equal. 7. The second objection of the king taken from the acts of emperors over Pontiffs. Otho did not depose the Pontiff John. 8. Of the Pontiffs mentioned, not all were legitimate. 9. The third objection from the deeds of kings. Response. 10. The king St. Louis. 11. Louis XI. 12. The error of Gerson about the power of a Council over the Pontiff.

Chapter 30. Satisfaction is made to objections taken from certain reasons.

Summary. 1. First objection. Instance. 2. Solution. 3. Second objection. 4. Solution. Distinction between baptized and non-baptized kings. 5. Final objection conflated in a threefold way. 6. Solution to the first. 7. Solution to the second. 8. Solution to the third.

Sum and conclusion of the whole book with an appeal to the king of England.

BOOK 3: ON THE EXCELLENCE AND POWER OF THE SUPREME PONTIFF OVER TEMPORAL KINGS

[NOTE: The translation below of the first five chapters is substantially that of George Albert Moore, PhD (Colonel, US Army, Ret'd.), which he published at his own expense and through his own press in a limited mimeograph edition of 60 copies, Country Dollar Press, Chevy Chase, MD, 1950: Francisco Suarez. Extracts on Politics and Government from Defense of the Faith, Laws and God the Lawgiver, Tract on Faith, Tract on Charity. His translation of those chapters I have revised and adapted, sometimes heavily. The translation of all other chapters is my own. Col. Moore died in 1971 and the press seems to have died with him. At any rate I have not been able to find out any current information about it, nor accordingly who now holds the copyright to his translation. If anyone is able to enlighten me further on the matter I will be most grateful. In the meantime, however, and in the absence of indications to the contrary, I assume that the Colonel would not be upset if at least some fruit of his labors was now made available on this website in a more accessible form and to a wider audience.]

Preface

Thus far it has been shown into what heresies and grave errors, with contempt for the fundamentals of the Catholic faith, England has at last fallen. It remains for us to discuss the origin of this whole fall, that is, the denial of the obedience due to the Supreme Pontiff, and the usurpation by a temporal king of the false name of supreme head in the spiritual matters of his own realm. For this was the beginning of the whole schism, and from this schism has come heresy, as we have above shown. But it is not necessary again to recall the wretched and base reason which provided the occasion for such great change and horrendous schism; for the truth of the story is plainly enough described in the beginning of the first book; but the evident argument, which is taken therefrom, that this Anglican change did not rise from the true God but from the prince of darkness, also remains sufficiently inculcated in the same book; and therefore, with the things pertaining to the past deed omitted, there remains to be treated in this book the right of the king and the Pontiff. And although concerning the absolute temporal power of the king no contest or controversy has been moved, but only about his subordination, dependency and due obedience to the Roman Pontiff, yet, that the whole matter may be more exactly understood and that we may more fully satisfy the king of England (who in his Preface complains that the Pope has unjustly usurped so great a power against the kings that he contends he can at will change, give, and take kingdoms away), therefore we shall first discourse of what the faith teaches about the duty and jurisdiction of temporal kings, and afterwards of what it teaches about the primacy of the Roman and Supreme Pontiff and the power which, in consideration of his duty, he has the authority to exercise over all temporal princes. Moreover after the order of doctrine, according to the opportunity of each place, has been observed, we shall advert to and at the same time refute the various errors pertaining to this point which the king here and there brings forward in his Preface and Apology, and we shall satisfy the objections that he indicates; but into the many other matters which could be said on this point we shall not digress.

Chapter 1: Whether political principality be legitimate and from God.

Summary: 1. The error of some Jews who acknowledge no human principality. 2. First assertion: a political principality introduced in due manner is just. 3. Proof by reason. 4. For political principality one mystical head is enough. 5. Second assertion: the power of the political prince flows from God. 6. Proof by reason. 7. The foundation for the error at the beginning of this chapter is dissolved.

1. The ancient error can be referred to in this place of certain Jews who were in the habit of saying that God should be recognized as a kind of prince and lord, for they seem to reject all human principality, and thence also political kingdom, as contrary to human liberty. Thus Josephus reports, Antiquities bk. 18, ch. I, where he calls the author of this error Judas Gaulanitis, for perhaps he had this name from his origin; for in ch. 2 he calls him Judas of Galilee, perhaps from his native land; but in bk.2, ch.2, De Bello Judaico, he calls him Simon of Galilee; yet in Acts 5 mention of him seems to be made under the name of Judas of Galilee, of whom it is said: “in the days of the taxing, he drew away much people after him: he also perished; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed.” Of this sedition Josephus also makes mention, loc. cit. and in bk. 7, chs. 29 & 31, De Bello Judaico, and some think that these are the Galileans “whose blood Pilate had mingled in their sacrifices,” as Luke reports in Chapter 13, and the passage is expounded by Oecumenius and Anastasius Nicaenus, q.67, on Scripture. And since Christ the Lord was a Galilean and gathered his disciples from Galilee, therefore perhaps those Judeans prepared the calumny of this error when they asked Him, “Is it lawful to give unto Caesar, or not?” as Augustine thought in interpreting those words of Psalms 118: “Princes have persecuted me without a cause,” and Jerome on Titus 3, at the beginning.

But it is not plain to me whether that Judas of Galilee was putting forward his opinion about mankind as a whole or only about Jews; for he could have thought especially about the Jews that it was not possible that they be reduced to subjection by heathen emperors, or be compelled to pay tribute, or that they should recognize them as rulers, because that people had been taken under the peculiar rule of God. And therefore perhaps afterwards also the Apostles and Christians were in the beginning suspected of this error by the pagans, as can be taken from Justin, Apology 2, and Clement of Alexandria, Stromateis, Bk.4, and as I will speak more fully in Chapter 3. But if that Judas spoke absolutely about all men and human principalities, he perhaps could have held his ground on the natural dignity of man. For man was made in the image of God, sui iuris, and created subject to God alone, and therefore it does not seem that he could be justly reduced to the service or subjection of any man; therefore one man cannot justly be compelled to recognize another as a prince and temporal lord; and therefore a political principality which usurps this dominion is neither lawful nor from God.

2. Nevertheless Catholic truth is that political principality introduced in due manner is just and lawful. I say introduced in due manner so that I may exclude power usurped through tyranny, because by that is well understood wicked violence, not true and just power, since it would lack just title of dominion; but what this just title is I shall touch upon in the following chapter. Therefore, thus explained, the said resolution is contained expressly in Holy Scripture, Proverbs 29: “The king by judgment establisheth the land,” and again, “The king that faithfully judgeth the poor, his throne shall be established for ever.” Wisdom 6: “The wise king is the stay of the people.” For in these and the like passages it is openly supposed that temporal kings are true and legitimate princes or lords. And therefore I Peter 2 teaches, “Be subject to every human creature for the Lord’s sake: whether it be to the king as supreme, etc.” Also later, “honor the king,” and Paul, Romans 13, “Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers.” Also later, “not only on account of wrath, but also for conscience’ sake”; for one is not bound to obey on account of conscience except to one having a legitimate power to command. Besides among the Fathers Clement taught this truth, bk.4, Const. ch.12, saying: “Be ye subject to every king and power in those things which please God, as to the ministers of God and judges of the impious.” Also further: “Offer to them all due fear, all tribute, every tax, etc.” And he concludes: “For this is the law of God.” Basil has the same in bk.7, ch.17 Morals, Rule 79, where also he adduces that passage of Titus 3: “put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers;” and Jerome, Epistle 4, after the middle, where he confirms it by examples taken from the brutes, saying “the mute animals and the herds of wild animals follow leaders of their own. Among bees there are princes, the cranes follow one in educated order, there is one emperor, one judge to a province, etc.” and he seems to have taken it from Cyprian, book on the Vanity of Idols.

3. From these testimonies can be gathered in the first place the reason for this truth, which is taken from the necessity for this principality and its power, and consequently from its purpose, which is the conservation of the human and civil republic. For man by his nature is inclined toward civil society, and he is especially in need of this for the convenient preservation of his life, as rightly Aristotle taught, Politics bk.1, chs. 1 & 2. That it has also been thus ordained by God for the procuring of harmony and charity among men, Chrysostom has expounded in a long discourse, homily 4, on 1 Corinthians. Moreover the community of men cannot be preserved without justice and peace, nor can justice and peace be preserved without a governor who has the power of ordering and coercing; therefore in the human commonwealth a political prince is necessary to hold it fast in its duty. Therefore it is said in Proverbs 11: “where no governor is, the people fall,” and in Ecclesiastes 10: “Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child,” because it is not sufficient to have a prince unless he be fitted to govern. And therefore God threatens punishment in Isaiah 3: “And I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them.” Since therefore human nature cannot be destitute of the means required for its own conservation, it cannot be doubted that from the nature of the matter, and with attention to right and natural justice, a political prince should exist in civil society having over it lawful and sufficient power. On this discourse one may look at Augustine, bk. Propos. on Romans, prop. 72, whom Anselm imitates, Romans 13, and ibid. Primas and Laur. Justinian De Triumphali Christi agone, ch.12.

5. The same thing can be declared by the natural example of the human body which without a head could not be preserved. For the commonwealth of men is like the manner of an individual’s body because, without its ministers and orders of persons which are like to the several members, it cannot persist. Therefore much less could it be preserved without a governor and prince whose office it is to look after the common good of the whole body. The same can be explained with examples taken from art, such as a ship for example, which will necessarily perish unless a helmsman is present. So of an army if there be no leader and so on. And the examples tend also to this point which are taken from other animate things by Cyprian and Jerome. They aim to prove with these (it must be noted) not only that there must be a prince in a republic but also that there must be only one. “For never,” said Cyprian, “did society in a realm begin without trust or cease without bloodshed.” But they speak about the supreme principality, for under it there can be several governors in the various parts of the province; however, it is necessary that they all be subordinated to one, in whom there is supreme power. For if there were several and they were not subordinated among themselves, in no way would it be possible for unity or concord and obedience to be preserved with justice, as is known sufficiently by itself. But this must be understood too of a single prince, not as to his proper person but as to his power and consequently as to his person, whether real or mystical or political; because for the rule and conservation of civil society a single monarch is not absolutely necessary (indeed, there are other kinds of rule that are sufficient, although perhaps they are not as perfect, as we will touch on below), and therefore when we speak of this one political principality we mean one tribunal, or a single power, whether it exists in one natural person, or in one council, or in a congregation of several, as in a fictive person, so that it is in one head.

5. Besides the reason taken from the purpose and necessity of this power, there is necessity to show the justice of it from its origin. Therefore we add that the political prince gets his power from God Himself. This also, absolutely speaking, is de fide; for as his reason for obedience owed to such a prince Paul expressly added, Romans 13: "For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God." And later: "For he is the minister of God"; and Proverbs 8, divine wisdom says: "Through me kings reign"; and Wisdom 6: "Hear Kings, since power has been given thee by the Lord, and virtue by the most High." And so 3 Kings 10, about King Solomon it is said: "Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighted in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel"; and Daniel ch.2 said to Nebuchadnezzar: "for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power and strength." And the same is taken from Jeremiah 27. The common doctrine of the Fathers, who expound the aforesaid places in Paul, is the same, especially Chrysostom, Hom. 23, and Origen, bk.9, on Romans, and Oecumenius on the same place, who says: "Because equality in everything is a seditious thing, therefore God adjoined power," homily on Psalms 148 about the words: "Kings of the earth, all peoples, princes, and all judges of the earth, it was the work of the providence of God to have divided the universe among those that bear magistracies and those that obey them." Nazianzen, orat. 17, and Epiphanius Contra Archontic. et haeres. 40 where, among other things, he says about the power of the prince: "Not from other sources but from God"; Isidore of Pelusium, bk.2, Epistle 206, says that command was formed and instituted by God; and Theophilus of Antioch, bk.1, to Autolycus says: "I will adore God not Caesar, knowing that Caesar was ordained by Him"; And he said later that the king or Caesar was to be honored and God to be prayed to for him; "For," he says, "the kingdom or the command and the administration of affairs has been committed or delegated to him by God." The same is widely taught by Irenaeus, bk.5, Contra Haereses, ch.24, where he expounds passages of the Scriptures in this sense, especially of Paul, and refutes other interpretations; and very excellently does Tertullian say in the book to Scapula "The Christian is the enemy of no one, much less of the emperor whom, because he knows him to be set up by his own God, he must love and revere and honor and desire the safety of." Lastly Augustine, City of God, bk.5, ch.21, says: "Let us not attribute the power of giving kingdom and command except to the true God." And the same thing is confirmed by the Fathers mentioned in the previous assertion, and by others to whom I shall refer in the following chapter.

6. The reason for this assertion much depends on the manner in which one believes God gives this sort of principality or power, and this must be dealt with in the following chapter, and so now a proof is given in brief, that first all things that are of the law of nature are from God as the Author of nature; but political principality is of the law of nature; therefore it is from God as the Author of nature. And thus this assertion is founded on the preceding; for since this principality is just and lawful, it cannot fail to be consonant with the natural law; and since it is necessary for the conservation of human society, which human nature itself seeks, it is also by this title from the natural law, which demands such power; therefore as God, who is the Author of nature, is also the Author of the natural law, so also he is the Author of this primacy and power. For, as the Philosopher said, he who gives the form gives those things that are consequent to it. Next, the same inference can be made in this way, because every good flows from God as from the prime Author, following that verse of James I: "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above" but political principality is good and honorable, as has been shown, therefore it is from God. Finally, terrestrial kings are, for this reason, called the ministers of God in Scripture, as we have seen; therefore their ministerial power is ministerial with respect to God; therefore He is the original Author of this government. Moreover it is most declared from the power which the political prince has for taking vengeance on the wicked, even depriving them of life, if it should be necessary; for this without divine approval could not have been done, since God alone is the lord of the life of man, and Paul signifies this when he says: "for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, an avenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." Thence also there is that reference of Augustine, De Natura Boni contra Manichaeos, "the power even of the guilty is only from God," and he cites the verse "By me kings reign," and the like.

7. So from this is readily apparent the response to the foundation of the contrary error which is understood in the latter sense declared above, whereby it is contrary to the proposed Catholic truth. For though man is created free, yet he is not without being able and suited to be subjected to another man for a cause that is just and consonant with reason; nay, some subjection is natural to a man, either by the supposed natural process of generation, as is the subjection of a son to his father, or under some supposed pact, as is the subjection of the wife to the husband. So therefore, in a given civil society the subjection of the individual persons to the public power or the political principality is natural, as agreeable to right natural reason, and necessary for the convenient conservation of human nature. And therefore neither is this subjection repugnant to, the condition of man, nor does it amount either to a wrong against God, for although the political prince is a king, legislator and lord in his own degree, yet he is such in a far different and inferior manner to God. For of man these things are said only by a certain participation as a minister of God, but to God alone are they suitable in essence and origin. But if the error is understood in the prior sense, it is not opposed to the Catholic assertion proposed by us, because although the Jewish people had been exempted by the peculiar privilege of God so that they could not lawfully be subject to heathen princes, nevertheless in the state of the Jews itself a lawful political prince could be found, just as in fact it was in their time, and likewise in other realms and provinces of the nations there could be the same sort of principality, and in each supreme prince there could be a like power over the peoples subject to him. But yet even in that sense the opinion did not have a solid foundation; but there is not time to expound this and also to examine whether the Jews justly and legally, or through injustice and tyranny, were subjects of the Romans and forced to pay tribute to the emperor, for questions of this nature have no reference to the present purpose.

Chapter 2. Whether political principality is immediately from God or divine institution.

Summary. 1. King James is of the opinion that political principality is immediately from God. 2. What things are required for some power to be conceded immediately by God. 3. Supreme civil power is immediately conferred by God on a perfect society only. The first part of the assertion is proved. 4. Second proof. 5. Proof of the second part. 6. Objection. 7. How democracy is said to be by right of nature. 8. No political principality is immediately from God. 9. Confirmation from the Fathers. 10. The conclusion is proved by reason. 11. The same conclusion is shown by examples. 12. Objection. 13. Human will can in two ways intervene in the conferring of power that flows from God. First way. 14. Second way.

1. The question treated in the preceding chapter was made clear because of what I now propose, for in it there is no contention between us and the King of England; but it had necessarily to be put first so that the latter could be understood. In this the most serene king thinks not only in a new and singular manner but also keenly inveighs against Cardinal Bellarmine (Preface, p. 140) on the ground that he asserted that “authority was not immediately granted to kings by God in the same way as it was to Pontiffs.” He himself, then, asserts that the king has his power not from the people but directly from God; and he tries to urge his own opinion by certain arguments and examples, whose efficacy we will weigh in the next chapter.

2. But although this controversy does not pertain directly to the dogmas of the faith (for nothing defined can be shown in it from divine Scripture or the tradition of the Fathers), nonetheless it must be diligently explained and treated. First, because it can be the occasion of error in other dogmas. Next too because the aforesaid opinion of the king, as it is asserted and intended by him, is novel and singular, and it seems to have been invented both to exaggerate the temporal power and to weaken the spiritual. Then lastly, because we think that the opinion of the most illustrious Bellarmine is ancient, accepted, true, and necessary. In order that we may show this, it is needful first to make clear what must exist for any power to be directly from God, or (which is the same) that God is the direct cause and author of any power. For, in the first place, it is required that God be the proximate cause, conferring such power by His own will. For it is not enough that God, as the first and universal cause, bestow the power; for although even in this way God may be said in some way directly to effect it, or to give whatever depends on him as on a first cause, whether by reason of proximate virtue or as the immediate subject, as distinguished by philosophers; yet this method of direct effectuation is insufficient in the present case. Because there is no power which is not in this manner from God as from the first cause and to that extent directly; and thus even when power is given directly by men, a king, or a Pontiff, it is given also by God as the first cause flowing into that effect and into the act of the created will through which it is given. But indeed such power is not said to be directly from God, but only secondarily; for proximately it is granted by man and depends on him. So power is then said to be absolutely given directly by God when God alone through His own will is the proximate cause and per se giver of such power, and in this manner we are speaking in the present case; otherwise the discussion would be frivolous and to no purpose.

Nay further, it is necessary to distinguish two manners by which God can and is wont directly, that is, by His own authority and will, to confer any power. One manner is by granting the power as necessarily connected, by the nature of the thing, with some nature of a thing which God Himself creates, as can be easily seen in the physical faculties; for God in creating the soul gives to it directly intellect and will, because, although power of this type naturally flow from the soul itself yet, because God alone directly creates the soul, He is said also directly to confer the powers that follow it as a logical consequence. Therefore the same obtains, preserving proportion, in the moral power, for the power of the father over the son is moral and is conferred directly by God Himself as the author of nature, not as a peculiar gift and wholly distinct from nature, but as necessarily consequent on it, the foundation of generation being supposed; just as on the contrary the subjection of the son to the father is natural, but as a necessary consequence on such a rational nature as thus produced. In another way power is granted by God per se (so to speak) and by peculiar gift, not as necessarily connected with the creation of something, but as voluntarily added by God to some nature or person. Of this type we can provide examples quasi physical and moral; for the proximate power of performing miracles is quasi physical, and yet God directly confers it on whom He wills, not as a duty, but in consequence of the plan of His own will. The power also of jurisdiction, for example, granted to Peter was moral, yet God conferred it directly and immediately and per se.

Moreover the reason for the distinction is not other than that the powers themselves can be of different characteristics or orders, and God is able to work both in a conatural and in a preternatural or supernatural manner.

Therefore, when the king adds that God directly gives to kings the temporal principality and power, we must see whether that assertion can, from the aforesaid tests, be in any way true. But first must be made plain the subject to whom God is said to give this directly, and for what and what sort of government he may be considered to be giving it. For this power can be considered either according as it exists, or can exist, in the whole political body of the commonwealth, or of the civil community, or according as it exists, or can exist, in these or those members of the said community.

Again, the same power can be considered either absolutely and abstractly or as determined to a certain type of political government. For (as is the common moral doctrine of philosophers) the government of the human republic can be of three kinds: a monarchy of one supreme prince who makes one individual person, an aristocracy of one supreme council or tribunal formed from several best men, and a democracy through the votes of the whole people; these three types are the simple ones, but out of them others can be formed, which make use either of two of them, or of all, which are wont to be called mixed governments. Therefore a political principality can be considered of itself and absolutely, as a certain supreme power of civil rule of the republic, abstracting from this or that type of rule, as well simple as mixed, or as determined after some type of rule among those that we have enumerated. From these proposals and distinctions it can be absolutely decided, without any ambiguity and by evident reason, how a principality may be directly from God, and that yet it can be entrusted to supreme kings and senates that are not directly commended by God but by men.

3. For, first, the supreme civil power viewed in itself, is indeed given directly by God to men gathered into a perfect political community, not in truth by consequence of any peculiar and quasi positive institution, or by gift altogether distinct from the production of such nature; but through natural consequence by the force of the first creation of it, and thus, by the force of such gift, this power is not in one person, nor in a peculiar congregation of many, but in the whole perfect people or body of the community. This explanation with respect to all its parts is common not only to the theologians but to the jurists to whom I shall at once refer. Now I show by reasoning the individual parts. The first and second part, indeed, because this political power is natural, for, even without any intervening supernatural revelation or faith, this power is, by the dictate of natural reason, acknowledged as being wholly necessary for the conservation and equity of it; a sign, then, is that it is in such community as a property consequent on nature or creation and the natural institution of it. For if, in addition to this, a special grant of God were necessary and a concession not connected with nature, it would not be possible to agree about it by natural reason alone, but there would be need that it be manifested to men through revelation, so that they might be sure about it, which, however, is false, as is plain from what has been said.

4. But that at least in this way it must necessarily be said that this power is immediately from God is easily concluded from the same principles, because things that are a consequence of nature are given immediately by the proper and immediate author of the same nature, as I have declared; but this power is a certain property consequent on the nature of man as congregated into one political body, as also has been shown; therefore it is immediately granted by God as he is author and provider of such nature. This can be proved, next, because this power is from God, as has been proved in the preceding chapter, and with respect to such community no medium interposes (so to say) between God and it, by which it may be granted. For by the very fact that men are congregated into the body of one city or republic without the intervention of any created will, such power results in that community with so great necessity that it could not be impeded by human will; to this extent it is a sign that it is immediately of God, with only the intervention of that natural effect or consequence of nature, and with the dictate of natural reason showing, rather than producing, the power of the same. Nor did Cardinal Bellarmine ever deny the immediate emanation of this power from God, as declared in this manner, but rather supposed it, because he posited no medium between the people and God, but between the king and God he wanted the people to be the medium through which the king got such power; which is very different, as will now be made clear.

5. Hence too it is evident (as we were saying in the last part of the assertion) that this power, viewed absolutely, since it is from the Author of nature as by a natural consequence, is not in one person, nor in a special group, whether of the best men or of any other group whatsoever of the people, because from the nature of the matter this power is only in the community so far as it is necessary for its conservation, and so far as it can be shown through the prescription of natural reason; but natural reason only shows it to be necessary in the whole community, and not in one person, nor in a senate; therefore according as it is directly from God, it is known to be only in the community as a whole, and not in any part of it. This I understand concerning a part of the community not only designated individually or materially (so to speak) but also conceived formally, whether indeterminately or vaguely; that is, it is not directly in one certain person, for example, Adam, Jacob, or Philip, nor even from the nature of the matter does it require to be in one single person; and it is the same proportionally of the senate, whether it is viewed materially, as consisting of such persons, or formally, as congregated from such and so many persons. And the reason is plain, because, from the power of natural reason, no reason can be thought out why this power should be limited to one person or to a certain number of persons within the whole community more than to another; therefore by force of natural concession it is directly only in the community. Finally the thing is plain by force of natural reason alone that political principality is not limited to monarchy, or to aristocracy, simple or mixed, because there is no reason that is convincing that a fixed type of government is necessary. This is confirmed by experience itself; for that is why the various provinces and nations select also different kinds of government, and none of these works against natural reason or against the immediate institution of God. Wherefore it is a sign that political power has not been directly granted by God to one person, prince, king, or emperor, otherwise that monarchy would have been directly constituted by God; nor has it been so granted to a single, or any particular senate, or to a particular congregation of a few princes, otherwise that aristocracy would have been directly instituted by God; and the same argument will be possible about any kind whatsoever of mixed government.

6. You will say: if this reasoning were effective, it would also prove that God had not directly given to the whole community this political power, because otherwise democracy would be directly in consequence of divine institution, just as we were inferring about monarchy and aristocracy. But this is no less false and absurd in democracy than in the other kinds of government, not only because, just as natural reason does not determine monarchy or aristocracy as necessary, so neither democracy; nay much less so, because it is the most imperfect of all, as Aristotle testifies, and as is evident in itself. But also because, if any institution were divine, it could not be changed by men. Response is made by denying the first concession, for rather, from the fact that power has not been given by God instituting monarchy or aristocracy, it is necessarily concluded that it has been given to the whole community, because there is no other human subject left, so to speak, to whom it could have been given. But as to the second point, namely, that hence it follows that democracy is of divine institution, we answer, that if this is to be understood of positive institution, the consequence must be denied; but if it is understood of a quasi natural institution it can be and ought to be admitted without any inconvenience. For a difference is to be very much noted between these types of political government, for monarchy and aristocracy could not have been introduced without positive institution, divine or human, because human reason taken alone does not determine any one of the said kinds as necessary, as I have said; hence since in human nature, viewed in itself apart from faith or divine revelation, positive institution has no place, about these types it is necessarily concluded that they are not directly of God. But democracy could be without positive institution, by purely natural institution or emanation, with only the negation of new or positive institution, because natural reason itself dictates that the supreme political power naturally follows from a perfect human community and, by force of the same reason, pertains to the community as a whole, unless through a new institution it is transferred to another, because, by force of reason, neither does another determination have place nor is a more immutable one demanded.

7. Therefore this power, as far as it is given directly by God to the community, according to the manner of speaking of the jurists, can be said to be of natural law negatively, not positively, or rather of concessive not of absolutely prescriptive natural law. Because, doubtless, the natural law indeed grants through itself and directly this power to the community, yet does not absolutely prescribe that it always remain in it, nor that through it this power be directly exercised, but only as long as the same community does not otherwise decree, or also as long as no change has lawfully been made by someone having the power. An example comes from the freedom of man, which is opposed to slavery, for it is of natural law, because by the force of the natural law alone man is born free, nor can he without some lawful title be reduced to slavery; but the law of nature does not prescribe that every man always remain free, or (what is the same) it does not absolutely prohibit man being put into slavery, but only that it not be done either without the free consent of the individual, or without lawful title and power. Thus therefore the perfect civil community by the law of nature is free and is subject to no person except itself but it as a whole has power over itself, which if it were not changed would be a democracy, and nonetheless either by its own decision, or by another having the power and just title, it can be deprived of such power and can be transferred to another person or senate.

8. From these considerations finally it is concluded that no king or monarch has or has had (according to ordinary law) directly from God or from divine institution a political principality, but by the medium of human will and institution. This is the honored axiom of theology, not for derision, as the king proposed, but in truth, because rightly understood it is most true and especially necessary for understanding the purposes and limits of civil power. Moreover it is not novel, or invented by Cardinal Bellarmine, as seems to be attributed to him by the aforesaid; for much earlier Cardinal Cajetan taught this in Apologia or Tract.2 on the Authority of the Pope p. 2, ch.10; and Castr. Bk.1 on the Penal Law, ch.1; and Driedo, bk.1, on the Liberty of Christ, ch.19; also Vitoria, in Relectio on Civil Power, n.8 and following; and it is taken from the same author, in Relectiones 2 on Ecclesiastical Power, Conclusion 3, and ad 1. Soto, bk.4, on Justice q.2, a.1, in the discourse of conclusion 1, and more broadly in q. 4, art.1; which Luis Molina followed, Tract.2, on Justice, disput.21. Also St. Thomas insinuates it in Ia IIae, q.9 a.3, and q. 97, a.3, and more clearly in IIa IIae, q.10. And not only from the theologians, but also from the jurists the teaching has been commonly handed down, in bk.3 ff. de Const. Princip., and in bk.2 ff. De Origin. Iuris, and among the moderns by Navarro in ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis, n.3, especially nos. 41, 85, 94, and no. 112ff. to 121, and no.147; Covarruvias, in Practicis Quaestionibus ch.1, no.6, who also refer to others.

9. Besides this truth can be taken from the holy Fathers, first, because they assert that man was created by God free and free-born, and only received directly from God the power of ruling over the brute beasts and inferior things; but the dominion of men over men was introduced by human will through sin or some adversity. This Ambrose hands down on Colossians 3, at the end; and more broadly Augustine, 19, The City of God, ch.15, and bk. Quaestion. in Gen. q.153, and Gregory bk.21, Moralia, ch.10, elsewhere ch.11, and in Pastorali, p.2, ch.6. For what they say about the liberty of each man, and the slavery opposed to it, is by the same reasoning true of a mixed or fictitious person of a single community or human city. For, according as it is directly ruled by God with the law of nature, it is free and sui iuris. This liberty does not exclude, but rather includes, the power of ruling itself, and of giving commands to its own members, but it excludes subjection to another man, as far as it is by force of natural law alone, because God has given directly such power to no one among men until through human institution or election it be transferred to someone. Secondly, this is particularly confirmed by the opinion of Augustine, bk.3, Confessions, ch.8, where he says: "It is a general pact of human society to obey its own kings." For by these words he signifies that the regal principality, and the obedience owed to it, has its basis in a pact of human society, and therefore it is not from the direct institution of God, for a human pact is contracted by human will.

And perhaps this pact is signified by the name of 'regal law' in bk.1, de Constitut. Princip., where Ulpian says that for this reason the pleasure of the prince has the force of law, "because by the regal law, which is made of its power, the people transferred to him and into his hands all its own sovereignty and power." These words Emperor Justinian approved and transcribed in § Sed et quod principi, Institut. De Iure natur. gent. et civili, for that law is termed regal, not because it was passed by some king, but because it was passed about the power of the king, as is said in the same bk.1, where it is also signified that it was constituted by the people who created and instituted the dignity of the king by transferring to him its own power, as there also the glosses and the doctors expound. But that law could not have been made by way of mere precept, since through it the people abdicated from the supreme power of making law; therefore it should be understood as constituted through the medium of a pact by which the people transferred power to the prince under the duty and obligation of taking care of the republic and of administering justice, and the prince accepted both the condition and the power; by which pact the regal law, or the law about regal power, remained firm and stable; not therefore directly from God, but from the people do kings have this power. Whence is said also in bk.1, § 'Novissime' ff. de Orig. iuris, 'because the senate was not able to rule all the provinces honestly, after a prince had been set up, the right was given to him that what he had determined should be valid.'

10. But the reasoning of the assertion is easily collected from what has been said; for that power is said to be in someone directly from God which comes to him, either through the sole will of God, or by force of natural reason alone, or by some divine institution; but this power of which we are treating was given by none of these methods to kings by God, speaking according to the ordinary law, because neither through the special will of God was it directly given (for such will of God neither has been revealed nor made known to men), nor also does the natural law alone dictate by itself that this power should be in kings, as has been shown; lastly, the institution, or determination, or transfer of this power was not made directly by God to the kings, as is plain from experience itself. Again, because in other respects such institution would be immutable, and all change made in it by man would be iniquitous; nay, all cities, realms, or republics should keep to the same institution, because there is no greater reason for one than the other, nor does one get to a greater degree such institution from divine revelation than another. Therefore this institution is human institution, because it has been made by men; therefore by men directly the power was given to kings, whose dignity was created by this institution. But God is said mediately to give this power to the kings, first, because He granted it directly to the people, which transferred it to the kings;

secondly, because God consented and cooperated also in this transfer proximately made by the people as a first and universal cause; then lastly, because He approves it and desires it to be preserved. Also, just as human law does indeed oblige directly from the will of the human prince who makes it, yet it indirectly also binds by force of the will of God who wills that lawful princes be obeyed, following that verse of Peter, “Submit yourselves, etc., for so is the will of God.”

11. Finally it can be made plain by the example of human dominion over inferior things. For absolutely speaking, all things over which men have dominion have been given to them by God, yet not in the same manner. For God did not immediately give (in the ordinary way of speaking) to any man property in and peculiar dominion over anything, but He immediately made everything common, and private dominion was introduced partly by the law of nations, partly by civil law; and nonetheless these private dominions are indirectly also from God, not only because they draw their origin from a first grant of God, but also because through his own general providence he is in accord with these things; and also finally because he desires that these things be preserved after they have been constituted. And hence Augustine said, Tract 6, on John, at the end, “Whence does each possess what he possesses? Is it not by human law? For by divine law the earth is the Lord’s and the fullness thereof; yet by human law one says: ‘This villa is mine, this house is mine, this slave is mine.’” And below he concludes: “Human rights themselves God distributed to mankind through the emperors and secular kings.” Thus therefore, keeping proportion, it is God who distributed the political kingdoms and principalities but he did it through men, or the consent of peoples, or through some similar human institution.

12. But someone will perhaps say that by this discourse it is only proved that the power of a king is not given by God to any person without the intervention of human will and action, yet it is not sufficient to prove that it is not given directly from God, for even the Apostolic dignity was granted to Matthias indirectly by the action of the other Apostles, and nonetheless it was granted to him directly by God; and likewise the Pontiff is elected by the cardinals, and yet he receives his power directly from God. Similarly he who inherits when come to majority, receives this right by generation from his immediate parent, and nonetheless he is thought directly to have those goods from the first institution of majority, because it is by force of the will of him alone, even if the nearest parent be very unwilling, that he attains majority. Thus therefore, although temporal kings by succession attain the regal dignity, they receive it directly from God by force of the first institution.

13. But this objection does not weaken but rather strengthens the discussion made; first, because the examples are not similar; next, also because we did not assert that any kind whatever of will or action of man that is interposed suffices for making the grant of power not to be directly from God, but it was said only of a particular change and transfer made through a new human institution. Therefore in two ways human action or wish can intervene in the transfer of power that has its origin from God himself; first, by merely designating or constituting the person who is to succeed to the dignity instituted by God in altogether the same way in which it was instituted and without authority or power of changing or diminishing it. And this method with respect to the pontifical dignity was preserved in the Old Law according to carnal succession; but in the New Law it is done through a lawful election by which the person is designated. Therefore of this method of succession it is true that nothing stands in the way of conferring the power directly from God, and the examples adduced prove only this. And the reason is that the power is conferred by force of the first institution and of the will of God, of which the sign is that it is conferred with the completeness and immutability with which it was instituted, and because the succession also has its origin in the same power from the same institution; for that is why in the Old Law through carnal generation men succeeded to the priesthood, because by God Himself it was so instituted; but now the designation of the person is done by another and more spiritual method, because ecclesiastical tradition teaches that so it was instituted by Christ, who committed the method of election, or designation, of the person to be defined by his Vicar.

14. In another way, then, can the transfer of power be made by man, through a new grant or institution besides the designation of a person, and then even if such power has a foundation in some prior divine institution made to another, nevertheless that transfer, which is made afterwards, absolutely is by human law, and not by divine, and directly from man, and not from God. An example is in slavery, for if a man sells himself into slavery to another, that slavery is absolutely by human law and the power which the master has over the slave was granted directly from the slave himself through the natural power and liberty which he himself had from the author of nature. Thus therefore it is at present concerning the subjection of the whole human community to one prince, for it proceeds directly from the will of the community, and therefore it is directly from man, and from the human law, although it draws its origin from the natural power which each community received from its author over it self. And the reason is clear, because in these and the like cases neither is the designation of the person sufficient, nor is it separable from the grant or contract, or quasi human contract, that it have effect over conferring the power, because natural reason alone does not introduce the transfer of power from one man to another through the sole designation of the person without the consent and efficacy of the will of him by whom the power is to be transferred or conferred. Therefore a transfer of power cannot be understood which would be made directly by God, through the means of generation, election, or similar human designation, unless where the succession is of positive divine institution; but regal power gets its origin not from positive divine institution, but from natural reason, through the medium of free human will; and therefore necessarily it is from man directly conferring it and not merely designating the person.

And hence also it arises (which is a clear indication of this truth) that this regal power is not equal in all kings, nor with the same rights as to duration, perpetuity, or succession, and the like. For in some cases the power is absolutely that of monarchy, but in others with a mixture of aristocracy, or with dependence on a senate, even as to decisive votes, and sometimes only in certain cases, other times in all the more important matters; or sometimes in many cases, sometimes in fewer. Again, to some kings power was given not only to the person, but also to his progeny (so to speak), that is, they would be able to transfer the dignity to their sons and grandsons, but in other cases it is granted only for the person, and without carnal succession, so that if a king dies another is elected, as is the case in the kingdom of Poland, and as is done in the Roman Empire itself; nay, it even would be possible for a king to be chosen for a certain period, if thus it had been started in the beginning, because by nature it is not repugnant to the thing. Therefore it is a manifest sign that it is a direct human institution and therefore it can have all this variety which is not repugnant to reason, and which may fall under human choice.

And hence finally it happens that this regal power or domination can be received in various ways, which it is here necessary to note, so that the resolution related may be more fully understood. For the first method of conferring this power on a prince in the primeval institution is by the voluntary consent of the people. Moreover this consent can be understood in various ways; one is that little by little and in a successive manner it may be given, according as the people is gradually increasing. As, for example, in the family of Adam, or Abraham, or other similar family in the beginning, they obeyed Adam as parent, or paterfamilias, and afterwards, as the people grew, that subjection could be continued, and the consent extended to obeying him even as a king, when that community began to be perfect. Also perhaps many realms (and in particular the first kingdom of the city of Rome) thus began. And in this way (if one would rightly consider) regal power and perfect community can begin at the same time. But there can be another method when the community, already perfect, voluntarily elects a king to whom it transfers its power, which is a method especially suitable per se and agreeable to reason. But after this transfer is once made it is firm and perpetual; then there is no further necessity for a new election or a new consent of the people; for that consent is sufficient which was granted in the inception of the kingdom, so that from the force of that consent the same regal power and dignity may be transferred by succession. Also in this manner in kingdoms by succession kings can also be said to have the power directly from the people, not through a new consent, but in consequence of the force of the ancient one; for the sons have the same realm from their parents rather by virtue of the first institution than by the will of the parents, for, even if the father does not desire it, the firstborn succeeds to the kingdom, and therefore the father considers himself only as applying or constituting the person to whom the same power by force of the same first contract may be transferred.

But besides this voluntary method, sometimes provinces or free peoples are wont involuntarily to be subjected to kings through war; moreover this turns out to be done both lawfully and unlawfully. When therefore a war had a just title, then the people is really deprived of the power that it had, and the prince who prevailed against it acquired the real right and dominion over such a kingdom, because on the supposition that the war was just, that is a just penalty. So captives in a just war are deprived of the liberty conceded to them by nature, and they are indeed made slaves as a just punishment. And therefore I have said above that the regal power is founded on contract, or a kind of contract; for the just penalty for sin has the place of a contract so far as the effect of transferring the powers and dominions, and therefore it is to be equably observed. But oftener it happens that some kingdom is seized through an unjust war, by which method usually the more famous realms of the world have been enlarged, and at the same time in the beginning a kingdom is not acquired, nor is true power, since the title of justice is lacking; but with the passage of time it comes about that the people freely consent, or by their successors the kingdom is commanded in good faith, and at that time the tyranny will cease, and the true dominion and regal power begin. And thus always this power will be obtained directly by some human title or human will.

Summary. 1. First foundation of the king taken from inconvenience. 2. By refutation of the king the illustrious Bellarmine is vindicated. When a people can rise up against the king and exempt itself from his power. 3. The people cannot restrain power once it has been transferred to the king, nor abrogate his just laws. 4. Second foundation of the king. Solution. 5. It is more probable that Saul received his power from the people. 6. Matthias received his apostleship directly from God. 7. The examples which King James adduces do not prove that political principality is immediately from God. 8. Third objection. 9. Solution.

1. There seem to be two foundations in particular of King James to make him think that kings have their power not from the people but directly from God. He puts the first forward by way of contradicting Bellarmine and inferring certain inconveniences. The first is that the contrary opinion is the “foundation of sedition most eagerly seized upon by the factious and rebellious.” For if a prince had his power from the people, “the people would be able to rise up against the prince and would be able to lay claim to freedom for themselves whenever it seemed good to them, relying, of course, on the same right and power that they had transferred to the king; especially since Bellarmine says that never do the people transfer to the king their power in such a way that they do not retain that power for themselves potentially, so that in certain cases they can actually retake it.” Also in the same manner the king would be able to infer that his subjects have the undiminished right to restrict the power of the prince, both to abrogate his laws and to do other like things, which belong to the superior power. For if the king has his power from the people, he always depends upon them; therefore the power of the people is superior; therefore it is able to effect all the things which we have inferred. But these things are absurd, for they offer the occasion for seditions, and they weaken the power of the princes, so that they cannot preserve the severity or the integrity of justice.

We answer that none of these inconveniences follow from the solution or opinion proposed. For we especially deny that from it the occasion of rebellions or seditions against lawful princes is given. For after the people has transferred its power to a king it is not lawfully able, relying on its own power, by its own will, whenever it wishes, to lay claim to freedom for itself. For if it granted its own power to a king, which he accepted, by this very fact the king acquired dominion; therefore although the king received this dominion from the people through grant or contract, it will not therefore be permitted for the people to take away that possession of the king, nor to take again its own liberty; just as in an individual person who has renounced his own liberty and has sold or given himself into slavery cannot afterward by his own will remove himself from slavery. It is the same therefore for a fictitious person or a community after it has fully subjected itself to some prince. Again, after a people has transferred its own power to a king, it has now deprived itself of it; therefore relying on its own power it cannot lawfully rise up against its king, because it is relying on a power that it does not have, and thus it will be not a just use of power but a usurpation of it.

2. But as to what Bellarmine said from Navarro, that a people never so transfers its own power to a king but that it retains it potentially, so that it can use it on certain occasions, it is not opposed nor does it offer to peoples a foundation for reclaiming liberty for itself at its pleasure. Because Bellarmine did not say absolutely that a people retains the power potentially “for whatever acts it pleases, and whenever it wants to exercise them,” but with great limitation and circumspection he said “in certain cases.” These cases must be understood either according to the conditions of the prior contract, or according to the exigencies of natural justice, for just pacts and conventions must be kept. And so if a people transferred its power to a king, reserving it to itself for certain grave cases or businesses, in these cases lawfully it can use it and keep its own right. But there must be sufficient agreement about such a right either by ancient and definite instruments or by immemorial custom. Also by the same reasoning if the king turns his just power into a tyranny by abusing that power in manifest destruction of the city, the people will be able to use their natural power to defend themselves, for of this never did they deprive themselves. But outside of these and the like cases never will a people, relying on its own power, be permitted lawfully to revolt from a lawful king, and so all foundation or occasion for sedition ceases.

3. And so by the same reasoning it is not lawful for a people once subjected to restrict the power of their king more than it was restricted in the first transfer or agreement, because it is not permitted by that law of justice which teaches that lawful pacts must be observed, and that an absolute grant, once validly made, cannot be recalled, either wholly, or in part, and especially when it was burdensome. Nay a people cannot, using its own power, abrogate the just laws of the prince, but only when relying on the tacit or expressed consent of the same prince, as St. Thomas formerly taught, and as we have elsewhere rather fully set forth, De Legibus bk.7. Therefore it absolutely is not true that a king depends on his people in the matter of his own power, although he has received it from that people, because he can be dependent in becoming, as they say, and afterwards not dependent in keeping, if he fully and absolutely accepted it. Therefore after a king has been constituted, he has the supreme power in all those matters for which he received the power, even if he has received it from the people, because the law of justice requires this, as we have shown.

4. In the second place the king brings in the examples of Saul and David who not from the people, as Bellarmine contends, but from God directly got their principality. This in particular about Saul he strongly asserts, because he was elected by lot with the divine approval which, he says, is a certain proof that his power was received from God directly. This he argues from the example of the selection of Matthias, about whom we know that he received the Apostolic dignity directly from God, because he was elected by lot to it, Acts 1. We answer about the examples of Saul and David that in both cases it can be disputed whether these two kings obtained power directly from God, or from the people; for neither is clearly gathered from the Holy Scripture. For though it is well known from the same Scripture that the person of each was designated as king by divine approval, will, and revelation, yet it does not follow that God directly granted them the power; for these are two different matters, and from the one the other is not rightly inferred. For just as God sometimes granted to men the faculty of designating a person to whom He Himself will directly give power, so conversely God could reserve to Himself the power of designating a person to whom the people would directly grant the power.

And so in the matter of these two kings Cardinal Bellarmine very probably conjectures that it happened so from the words of Deuteronomy 17: "When thou art come unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me, thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother." In these words two things are put as distinct, namely to choose him who will be the future king and to make him king; the former God reserved to Himself, but the second He granted or left to the people, as is plain from these words: "Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose," and from Chapter 28 of the same book: "The Lord shall bring thee and thy king, whom thou shalt set over thee, to a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, etc." But to set up a king does not only signify to ask for a king, as afterwards that people asked in I Samuel 8:5, but it signifies to make a king. Both because it is thus explained in what was said in Deuteronomy 17: "thou mayest not set up a stranger over thee"; and also because in this passage the people is ordered to set up as king him whom the Lord had selected; but the petition for a king could not be for a particular person selected by God, for it preceded such choice; therefore that constituting of a king was nothing but the creation of a king and a direct conferring of the regal dignity and power; therefore the election of the person, which God had reserved for himself, was nothing other than the designation of the person. Therefore in that passage it is supposed that the people from the nature of the matter had the power of setting up a king; for God did not peculiarly there grant it to that people, but he granted it as common to other nations, and he permitted his people to use it, or he predicted that they would at some time use it, as was fulfilled in I Samuel 8, and following. And though the power also of designating the person would naturally be suitable to any people, nevertheless as a peculiar favor to that people, in order that a more suitable person might always be designated, God reserved to himself the power of electing the person.

5. Therefore from this passage the best conjecture is that it was thus observed in the creation of the first king of that people, who was Saul, which also can be inferred from the story of his election. For in I Kings 10, after the lot had fallen on Saul, Samuel said to the people: "see ye him whom the Lord hath chosen,” as if seeking and awaiting the consent of the people, and then the people shouted, saying, “God save the king.” But afterwards, after the king had been set up, it is added that Samuel wrote the manner of the kingdom, etc. Nor is it of importance that earlier in this chapter, prior to the lots being cast, it is said that Samuel anointed Saul: “Is it not that the Lord bath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?” because (as Bellarmine says, and as is probable) that was not the transfer of the power or the handing over of the kingdom, but it was a certain promise and prediction, according to the custom of the prophet, of a future happening, and, as it were, a certain preparation of the mind of Saul for the future dignity. Nay, rather, because, after the choice of God and the acclamation of the people, yet many objected, it is added in chapter 11 that Samuel again gathered the people into Gilgal to renew the kingdom, and it is added “all the people went to Gilgal and there they made Saul king before the Lord.” With these words it is not signified that there was a new choice of kingdom, but rather a confirmation of the former one, so that it might remain more strong among the people and that the minds of all the subjects might be more acquiescent, and all division and dissension be removed, as correctly Abulensis said in that passage, q. 12 and 13, and Josephus confirms it in Antiquities bk.6, ch., and he adds that there, with the multitude looking on, again Samuel anointed Saul with the sacred oil, to which, however, the Holy Scripture does not refer; but it can be understood from this that a similar anointing has not always at the same time done with the handing over of a kingdom, but it could also have been a sign of a transfer already made or to be made in the future.

Thence in the same book of I Samuel 16, in a like way secretly David was anointed by Samuel along with the promise of the kingdom, which thereafter for many years Saul peacefully possessed; this is a clear proof that through this anointing David was not made king, but was only designated as the successor of the realm. And therefore afterwards, in bk.2, ch.2, again he was anointed by the tribe of Judah, to be “King over the house of Judah,” and there also it is reported that David said, “Although your master Saul is dead, yet the house of Judah have anointed me king over them,” signifying that the promise of the Lord through the consent of the people was fulfilled. And therefore he did not begin to reign over the other tribes until (as chapter 5 says) “all the elders of Israel came to the king in Hebron; and king David made a league with them in Hebron before the Lord: and they anointed David king over Israel.”

6. Therefore this opinion is probable, against which the argument of the king about the lots has too little weight, for choice through lots directed by the special providence of God in itself only proves that the designation of the person was directly made by God himself. Nor thence did it come about that Matthias, who was selected by lot, did not receive directly from God the Apostolic power and dignity. Because although from the method alone of selection by lots this is not sufficiently gathered, from the quality and excellence of such dignity and power it is understood. For the Apostolic dignity was supernatural and directly instituted by Christ, and therefore he alone could directly grant it. Whence although the apostles could, without lots, have chosen Matthias alone (which they could have done if they had recognized for a certainty that he was the more worthy, as the Fathers rather frequently insinuate), nonetheless from Christ Himself directly he would have received the dignity and power; therefore not from the lots, but from the quality of the power, it must be gathered whether it is conferred directly by God.

7. According to this exposition, then, by those places and examples the common opinion is the rather confirmed that has been handed down. But because that exposition is not de fide, nor wholly necessary, let us concede to the king as probable that Saul and David received their power directly from God, for each one will easily be able, if he wishes, to accommodate the words of the Scriptures to this sense. And of David Soto plainly affirms this, bk.4, De Iustitia q2, a.1; and Navarro of both, in the said chapter ‘Novit.’ n.3, 33, and 147; and the same is thought by Abulensis, as above cited. Nonetheless this not only does not oppose the solution given but rather therefrom can it be more effectively confirmed. First, because the special examples have too little value for inferring a general rule; rather they are wont to be exceptions to the rule, and therefore from them the argument is customarily taken, which the jurists call from the special case, to infer the rule to the contrary. Secondly, because in the same citations it is plainly supposed that there is in a free people the power to set up a king over itself, nay of both selecting and of designating the person to whom it gives the right to the realm, which plainly the testimony of the Scriptures proves, as we have set forth above. And therefore God peculiarly reserved to himself the election of the person to be constituted over the people as king, because, aside from the revelation and command of God, this was wholly placed in the hands of the people for decision. Therefore from that a general rule for all kingdoms cannot be inferred, that is, that it pertained to God directly to designate or select the person placed on the throne of the realm, either in the beginning of such realm, or in its subsequent history (otherwise the king of England should show when God by peculiar revelation or singular sign selected either him or someone of his progenitors as king of England); nor even can it be inferred that God ordinarily gives or has given a principality to temporal kings, even if perhaps in the beginning of the kingdom of Israel, on account of the special care that he had assumed over it, once and again he did so. This finally can be gathered also from another prohibition made for that people, in the words of Deuteronomy 17: “thou mayest not set a stranger over thee”; for that prohibition without doubt was not natural but positive. For it is well known that other peoples and nations could create kings from any province or nation, and among the Roman emperors themselves it was thus observed without any injustice or violation of the natural law. Therefore that prohibition was natural and positive; therefore it supposed power in that people of creating a king for itself from any family, unless divinely prohibited, and consequently it is concluded that, before that prohibition in the people of Israel, but in other peoples, to whom that prohibition did not pertain, there was this free power, and through it kings had their beginning.

8. Thirdly, we can urge in favor of the king and of his opinion passages in the Scriptures and saints by which we have also proved that kings are ministers of God and have their power from him; for in those passages to God alone is attributed the grant of that power; therefore they should be understood as God granting directly, because this is the purer and more simple interpretation; for whatever is added to it is said to be beside the Scripture. Again, the minister of anyone, by the ordinary and better method, is customarily set up directly by him whose minister he is. Lastly we say by this reasoning that the Pontiff has his power directly from God, because Christ Himself conferred it, and from the force of that first grant it is transferred to others, though it may be transferred by the ministry and election of men; therefore by this reasoning the regal power will be directly from God.

9. But to these matters first we answer that the regal power itself is directly from God as the Author of nature, as we have said. But because it is not through special revelation or grant but through a certain natural process, which natural process is plain, therefore it is only granted immediately by God to that subject in whom by the force of natural reason alone it is found; but this subject is the people itself, and not any individual of it, as I have shown. But because the people transfers this same power to the king, therefore the regal power is said to have been granted by God; and, further, because the election itself of a king is not accomplished without divine cooperation, nor without his peculiar providence. This is excellently set forth by Chrysostom, homily 23 on Romans, where treating of these words, “For there is no power but of God,” he says, “What do you say? Therefore every prince has been set up by God? This (he says) I do not say, for my present discussion is not of just any prince at all, but about the matter itself, that is, of the power itself.” Therefore he subjoins: “For that there be principalities, that these men indeed rule and those are subjects, and that all matters are not conducted simply or heedlessly, I say there is need of divine wisdom. Therefore he does not say, ‘for there is no prince but of God,’ but he is speaking of the thing, saying ‘For there is no power but of God’” Theophylact there teaches the same. But it is not necessary that all these matters be so distinctly set forth in Scripture. For it is evident that various effects in almost the same words are attributed to God, and from the subject material the manner should be gathered according to right reason as to what way they are said to be by God. For also God is often said to grant kingdoms by special permission, though they are taken by injustice and sedition, as the king of England himself seems to think about Jeroboam, and in other cases it is much more certain, as Augustine noted, City of God, bk.5, ch.21; and Origen, hom.5, on Judges. But as kings are termed ministers of God, it is enough that they hold their power from him, though through the agency of the people, because that way is the most conatural and best which can be thought out within the latitude of natural reason.

But for the comparison or equalization which is made in this matter between the Pontiff and kings, I answer that the reasoning is far different. For in the first place the Pontifical monarchy was instituted for the Church Universal directly by God himself and ordered under such conditions that it cannot be changed. But the method of temporal rule was not defined nor ordered by God, but this was left to the disposition of men. Secondly, the spiritual power never was in the community of the whole Church, because Christ conferred it not on the body, but on its Head, or his Vicar, and therefore the Church cannot concur in the election of the Pontiff as giving the power but as designating the person. But the civil power from the nature of the thing is in the community itself, and through it was transferred to this or that prince by the will of the community itself, granting it (so to speak) as its own possession to another. Whence also it comes about that the supreme spiritual jurisdiction of the Pontiff has so been conferred by divine law that it cannot be limited, not diminished and not increased, even by the universal consent of the Church, nay not even by the will of the Pontiff. For as long as he retains the dignity he is unable to lessen or change it in himself. But the regal power, or that of any supreme temporal tribunal, could have been in the beginning made greater or less, and it will be able to be changed in passage of time or diminished, according as it will be expedient for the common good by him who will have the power for this purpose.

Chapter 4: Whether the civil power among Christians, which Christians are held to obey, is legitimate.

Summary. 1. Error of the ancient heretics. First foundation of this error. 2. Second foundation. 3. Rejection of the aforesaid heresy from Scriptures and the Fathers. 4. Rejection of the same heresy by a reason taken from St. Thomas. 5. The force of St. Thomas' reason is made plain. It is not licit for the faithful again to create voluntarily for themselves an infidel king. 6. A pagan king seizing a Christian city in a just war also secures true dominion over it. When subjection to a prince tends to the detriment of the faith the faithful can exempt themselves from it. 7. When matrimony between infidels can be dissolved because of the conversion of one of them to the faith. 8. Conclusion: it is de fide certain that there are true kings and princes among Christians. 9. Evasion. It is rejected. 10. The assertion is proved by reason. 11. Response to a tacit evasion. 12. In what Christian liberty consists. 13. The first foundation of the first error is solved. 14. The place in Matt. 17 is expounded. 15. The second foundation is solved.

1. Although in this question there is no controversy between us and our adversaries, but because many of then (as I hear, and as the King of England in his preface often teaches) censure the Roman Pontiff for his doctrine, alleging that it overturns the laws and the dominions belonging to princes, I have thought that we must set forth what the Catholic faith lays down on this matter, or what the saner teachings of the doctors maintain, so that by this way also an approach may more clearly and suitably be made to the chief controversy about the primacy of the Pope. So there are two ways it has been thought and affirmed that Christian kings do not have the supreme civil power to make laws, to punish crimes, and to declare political right. One of these was that of those who say that in the church of Christ such power was not possible, nor was there any lawful use of it, because Christians cannot be subjects of any temporal dominion. The other is that of those who, although they say that there is temporal power in the church, yet deny that there is supreme power in the temporal king but only in the Pope, from whom the power of kings is derived through tolerance or grant. About this second point we shall speak in the next chapter, but because it supports the first we shall briefly explain it here; also because the new sectarians do not in this matter think rightly.

So then many of the ancient heretics, as if following or imitating the error of the Galileans related in chapter 1, said that Christians were not subject to temporal princes, especially heathen ones. Some said this only of perfect Christians, and above all spiritual ones, as the Beguards, some about all the just, some about all Christians, which errors I think it superfluous here to recount more fully. From this came the chatter of the Anabaptists, and of others like them, that for Christians political principality is not lawful, especially over Christians. But different foundations can be thought out for these errors. A first, and one particular to heathen princes, is that it is unworthy and dangerous for an infidel prince to have dominion over the faithful; for therefore Paul advises in 2 Corinthians 6: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." And he explains the reason in various ways, saying: "for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? Or what communion hath light with darkness? Or what concord hath Christ with Belial? Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols?" Therefore, since the political primacy is of God, the concession of it should not be understood as against due order and with peril to the Faith, for those things that are of God are orderly in the highest degree; therefore by the very fact that one is baptized in Christ and receives his faith one is made immune from subjection to heathen princes. And this can be confirmed from the words of Matthew Chapter 17 where, when Christ had asked Peter: "of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers?" and Peter had answered, "of strangers", the Lord concluded: "Then are the children free", at least from tributes, and consequently from power, for these two are correlatives. Moreover, by the word 'children [sons]' Christ comprehended all his brothers, and therefore all the faithful, "because all are sons of that kingdom under which are all earthly kingdoms," says St. Augustine, bk.1, Evangelicarum Quaestionum, q.23. Or there is another title by which these share in the same liberty, because all belong in a special and excellent manner to the family of Christ, who is a natural son; and when the son is said to be free, his family is included with him, as Lyra said on that passage, whom others imitate, and as Jerome thought saying: "He bore for us the cross and paid tribute; we for his honor do not pay tribute, and as sons of the king are immune from taxes." These words cannot be restricted, as some wish, only to the priests and the clergy; for he joined the two equally together "he bore for us the cross, and he paid tribute." But he underwent the cross for all simply, as well lay as cleric; therefore for all he paid the tribute; therefore he freed all from paying tribute to temporal kings; therefore he exempted them both from their domination and from their jurisdiction, because the one liberty accompanies the other.

2. The second and more general foundation of this error is that Christians are free even from the power of Christian princes, because Christian liberty demands this, which liberty Luther and the other sectaries of this time understand and greatly exaggerate in this sense, twisting to this sense the various Scriptures which we abundantly satisfied in De Legibus bk.1, chs. 18 & 19, bk.3, ch.31, and therefore these we now omit. But from this principle, or Christian liberty so understood, it is rightly inferred that even in Christian princes there is no civil or political power over the faithful, because if these are not held to obey, princes do not have the power to command, because the two are correlatives, and if one is taken away it is necessary that the other be taken away. Hence they introduce also the testimonies of the New Testament in which they say it is prohibited to Christians to dominate and to be subject. For about domination it is said in Luke 22: "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them, etc., but ye shall not be so," or, as Matthew ch.20 says: "But it shall not be so among you," where Chrysostom, homilies 56, said that Christ wished to establish this distinction between gentiles and Christians. Moreover on subjection Paul says, 1 Corinthians 7: "be ye not the servants of men," and he indicates the reason, setting forth first, "Ye are bought with a price," as if he would say that it is unworthy that those redeemed by Christ be subject to earthly powers.

3. But this opinion is without doubt wholly heretical. For in the first place the apostles taught that the faithful, already converted to Christ, should obey the kings and powers, not only to avoid punishment, neither because they were at that time unable to resist, nor only on account of avoiding offense, but also "for conscience' sake and because they are ministers," as from Peter and Paul we have proved in chapter 1. Now these apostles were speaking at the time when emperors and kings, and their prefects or potentates, were infidels and idolaters; therefore we have from their teaching that Christians are subject to princes, even heathen ones, and consequently true kings who are infidels have power over Christians living in their territories. Secondly, thus the ancient fathers understood those passages and taught them, as Chrysostom, Ambrose, Origen, Ephiphanius and others brought forward in chapter 1, and expressly Justin, Second Apology to the pagan emperor Antoninus Pius, a little from the beginning, where he avowedly frees the Christians from this calumny saying: "But the tributes and the census we in the first place try everywhere to pay to those who have been set up by you, as we have been by God instructed." And he brings forward the words of Christ, Matthew 22: "Render therefore unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's"; and he concludes: "Hence we adore God alone, but we gladly serve you in other matters, and we profess you to be kings and princes of men, and we ask that you be found to have, along with regal power, a good and sound mind." In these words he professes in the name of all Christians that the infidels are true kings and princes of the Christians, as they are men, and that they can have power over them, even if they should not have a sound mind. The same was thought by Ignatius, epistle 10 to the people of Smyrna, and Optatus, bk.3, Against Parmenian, where he expressly says, "even if such a man were emperor who lived as a pagan." Lastly we can bring in for this the words of Ambrose, bk.4, on Luke 5, at the end, where, considering the words of Matthew 17, he says, "Indeed it is a great and spiritual lesson by which Christian men are taught that they are subject to the higher powers, lest anyone think that the constitution of the earthly king should be undone." There also he alludes to the words of Paul in Romans 13. Hence manifestly he speaks of a legitimate king, even though he be not a Christian, for Paul spoke in that way, and Christ was speaking about Caesar, a pagan emperor, and in the same sense speak the Fathers to whom we will at once refer.

5. But the reason for this truth St. Thomas touches upon, Ila Ilae, q.10, a.10, because he says: "dominion or preference of rank was introduced from human law, but the distinction between believers and unbelievers is from the divine law; but the divine law, which is from grace, does not take away the human law, which is from natural reason.” And therefore the distinction between believers and unbelievers, considered with respect to themselves, does not remove the dominion and preference of unbelievers over believers. This reasoning is very good and can be explained in the following manner. For when the subjects of any pagan king are converted to the faith, they are not exempted by that act, or by force of divine law, from the temporal jurisdiction of their own lawful prince, because they cannot by their own power deprive another of his dominion and right; nor even is it granted to them to do it by the authority of God, because this has neither been revealed to them nor does natural reason dictate it; nay, even the contrary is taught by Scripture and right reason too. Both because, if a divine grant does not intervene, it would, properly speaking, be against justice, and also because it would give rise to offense on the part of infidels and a certain disgrace of the Christian religion, the propagation of which would be very greatly impeded in this manner. The confirmation and explanation are from the example of marriage among unbelievers, which is not dissolved by the act itself of conversion, for example, of the wife to the faith, but still the wife remains subject to her infidel husband because he retains his power over her, as St. Paul testifies in 1 Corinthians 7, as fully explained by St. Augustine, bk.1, De Adulteriis Coniugis, ch.18. But the reason, which St. Thomas touched upon, is because marriage among infidels stands on the right of nature, but the profession of faith does not of itself change the right of nature, or the human agreement founded upon it. This reasoning also Innocent indicated in ch. ‘Gaudemus’ on divorces. Therefore by this reasoning lawful civil power is not lost on account of the conversion of subjects to the faith.

5. But it must be strongly noted concerning the teaching of St. Thomas in the passage cited that the reasoning holds only when the dominion and power of the heathen prince existed prior to the faith of the subjects, in which also are seen most to proceed the testimonies of Peter, Paul, and the tradition of the Fathers. Therefore St. Thomas adds that, if the discussion be of instituting or granting power anew to infidels over the faithful, this in no way is to be permitted. “For this,” he says, “would cause offense and peril to the faith,” for the subjects, unless they be of great virtue, easily follow the rule and the religion of the prince. “And likewise,” he says, “infidels despise the faith if they know the defects of the faithful.” But this doctrine must be understood when a new subjection of the faithful to an infidel prince depends on consent and desire of the faithful; for it is in this case that effectively proceed the reasons of St. Thomas and the testimony of Paul which he adduces, 1 Corinthians 6: “Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust (that is, the infidels, says St. Thomas), and not before the saints (that is, the faithful)?” as a little later the apostle himself declares saying; “But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers.” For if even in private cases among the faithful the infidels must not be voluntarily chosen as judges, certainly much less can any Christian people place an infidel prince over themselves; and therefore, as St. Thomas says, in no way does the Church allow this.

6. But if indeed it should happen that a faithful people involuntarily is again subjected to an infidel prince by a just title, then the assertion advanced and the reason made would proceed. So that, for example, if a pagan king in just war should get possession of a Christian state, then he would acquire a true dominion, for this also has been derived from the law of nations, which the faith does not do away with. Nor does the Church, speaking of itself, stand in the way when the infidel prince is heathen and is not subject to the Church itself, as to what we are now saying. And it would be the same if it happened that an infidel king by the lawful right of succession should obtain a Christian people formerly subject to a Christian prince, because then also the faith of the subjects does not impede the acquisition of the dominion, nor does it depend on the will of the people, but necessarily it comes from some prior and just institution. But these things must be understood for themselves, that is, by forestalling offenses and perils of the faithful, which can also follow in consequence of the subjection of the faithful to the ancient infidel princes, and therefore in both cases, if such inconveniences would probably be feared, and they could not be avoided unless either by not bearing, or not accepting such a prince, this should and must be done, because the right and power for doing this is not lacking in the Church. And by this reason St. Thomas said generally in the place cited that the Church could justly order infidels to be deprived of dominion and preferment over the faithful, who are made into sons of God, though for the purpose of avoiding scandal the Church does not utilize this power concerning infidel princes otherwise not subject to it.

Hence we should further consider that some infidels are subject to the Church only temporarily, as are the Jews residing in the lands subject to Christian princes, and with these infidels we do not deal because they are not supreme princes, of whom we are now especially treating. Yet about these it is certain that the Church or Christian princes can govern them in temporal affairs, and very especially in those that concern the liberty and security of the faithful, so far as they judge it expedient for the good of the faith, which belongs to another consideration. But some infidels are subject to the church spiritually, though in other respects they are supreme temporal princes, such as baptized heretics, who are in name Christian, yet in fact they are infidels, because they lack the true faith, but they are subject to the Church by reason of the character of baptism. And about these the solution stated is true, not only on account of avoiding danger to the faithful, but also on account of the direct power which the Church has for punishing heretics, even though they be kings, as we shall below see. But some infidels are in no way subject to the Church, neither in temporal nor in spiritual matters, neither in law nor in fact. And in these cases the teaching of St. Thomas only proceeds of the indirect power through which the Church can free and defend its faithful subjects from moral dangers and the chances of losing the faith. For of itself the Church does not have jurisdiction over these infidel kings, according to St. Paul, I Corinthians 5: "About those that are without, they are naught to us," and just as it is not possible to compel them to the faith, so neither, on account of the crime of infidelity, to punish them; wherefore neither under this title is it possible to deprive them of their dominion and jurisdiction which they have had over Christians. This then can the Church do only under the head of spiritual government and necessary provision for the subject faithful, which, however, it could do under this head, I most truly think, because he who grants the power of governing has as a result given whatever is required for its suitable use, as must be shown more fully in what follows.

7. In the present case the best argument can be taken from the teaching received and approved by the Church, and which has been taken from Paul, I Corinthians 7, where he says that the wife previously infidel who has converted to the faith, if the other neither wants to be converted nor to cohabit without injury to the Creator, can dismiss him and dissolve the marriage; therefore by the same or a greater reason power is given to the Church to free the faithful from the yoke of infidels of any sort, when by such subjection the faith is imperiled; for here the reasoning of Paul equally urges, saying: "A brother or sister is not subject to service in such cases." Nay, rather can a distinction in this be noted, for because the bond of matrimony is indissoluble by its own nature, and exists between two determinate persons to such a degree that it cannot, with that title, be dissolved, it is necessary that there be clarity in particular about the peril to the faithful spouse; but the regal power falls on the multitude of men and of itself is not so immutable, and therefore the peril in which the faithful live, who are subjects, morally speaking, of infidel princes, is sufficiently general and common for the Church to be able to free all of them from such subjection, even though about the peril to individuals the fact is not in particular clear, because the moral laws, which apply universally, consider those things which happen for the most part, even if they chance not to hold in the particular case. Yet nonetheless the Church rarely uses this power, and lawfully so, even though it leave its own faithful in some peril, because either it does not have the strength to execute its authority with effect and success, or because it fears as a probability greater offenses. Nevertheless also at that time individual subjects lawfully will be able to flee or use other means to evade the danger, if there is moral certainty about it; first because they are more held to take counsel for their own souls than the right of another, and second because then from such a prince they suffer injustice and violence, and therefore they are not held to obey.

8. From these things it is further certain and de fide that there are true kings and princes in the Church of Christ who have true political or civil power over their own subjects, even Christians and the faithful. This assertion in these terms ‘faithful and Christian princes’ is not expressed in the whole New Testament, perhaps because at the time it was written there were not yet temporal kings converted to the faith, and therefore the occasion did not arise for speaking of them. Yet the adduced testimonies sufficiently prove this assertion, both by analogy, or certainly by greater reason, and because the words of the apostles are wholly limitless and universal. For Peter says: “Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord’s sake: whether it be to the king, as supreme.” And later: “Honor the king.” And then he instructs servants to be subject to their masters, “Not only to the good, but also to the froward”; therefore he understands the same with greater force about all the faithful subject to princes, whether good or bad; but they cannot be called good princes unless they be faithful. Lastly the admonishment of Paul, Titus 3: “Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers,” which he more fully hands on in Romans 13, was not given by him only for the time of the primitive Church, but that it might remain perpetually therein; therefore even now it has place in respect of Christian princes. Also the same can be confirmed by the testimonies of the Old Testament, by which it is clear that faithful princes had political power over faithful subjects, whose power they were bound to obey, as of Moses, Joshua, and the other judges up to Samuel; it is afterwards collected about Saul, David, and their successors from Deuteronomy 1 and 17, and from Judges and Kings, and 2 Chronicles 19, where also mention is made of the inferior judges and magistrates; and therefore much more must this subjection and subordination be observed in the Law of Grace, because it does not regard the ceremonials of the Old Law and does not, generally speaking, pertain to the judicial elements of that Law, but to the moral law of natural right, whether immediately or by the medium of some human right; and these rights continue in the Law of Grace and obligate more perfectly.

9. But perhaps someone will say that this foundation rightly draws its conclusion from the hypothesis that in the Christian Church there are true temporal kings and princes who have true dominion and jurisdiction over Christians; for, with this assumption, the natural law of justice and obedience evidently obligates the subjects to obey. But the adversaries who defend the opposing error deny this starting point, saying that it is repugnant to the teaching of Christ and to Christian liberty or to the perfection of the Law of Grace. But against this the supposition can be proved from the perpetual tradition of the Church, from the time when the emperors and kings began to be converted to the Christian Faith; for they were always held to be true kings and princes, and not less, nay more perfect and excellent, than they were before. This is clear from the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, and others, especially about Constantine, Theodosius, and the like. Again this is often professed by General Councils, as is clear from the First of Nicea, at which Constantine was present, and from others. Besides, the Supreme Pontiffs, writing to Christian kings and princes, recognized them as true princes and temporal rulers, as is apparent from the many epistles of St. Leo and St. Gregory, and from others to whom we will refer in the following chapter. Now we only note the words of Pope Symmachus, Apology to the Emperor Anastasius, in which he says: “We receive the human powers in their place until they raise their wills against God.” The Twelfth Council of Toledo, ch.1, under excommunication, declared Eringius to be true king of Spain; and the Council of Meaux, ch.15 & 16, lays a curse on those who presume to contradict the regal power and speaks of Christian kings, and says of them that they have their power from God, according to the opinion of the Apostle, which therefore the Council also understands of Christian kings.

And the apostolic testimonies were understood in the same way by Chrysostom, Ambrose, and other Fathers, and very well did Augustine say in his book, On certain propositions on the Epistle to the Romans, prop.72, concerning the words: ‘Let every soul be subject to the higher powers,’ “very correctly does he admonish that no one, from the fact that he has been made a Christian called by the Lord to freedom, be raised into haughtiness and think that in the journey of this life he need not keep his order, so as to think that he need not be subject to the higher powers to whom the government has been handed over for the period of temporal existence.” And later: “If anyone therefore think, since he is a Christian, he need not pay taxes or tribute, or need not render honor due to those powers that look after these matters, he is in great error.” There Augustine speaks of his own time, where there were already Christian princes in the Church; and thus he applies the words of Paul to all princes who for the time are reigning. These words of Augustine were also borrowed by Anselm about Paul, and by Primasius more briefly. And again Augustine, bk.3, Against Crescon. ch.51, declares how necessary is the office of king even among Christians, and in how much better and healthy a way it is exercised by good, that is, pious and faithful kings, than by evil and infidel ones.

Besides, the honorific titles by which the ancient Fathers wrote to the faithful princes confirm this, as Cyril of Alexandria in his book, On the Right Faith to Theodosius, where he first calls him a most Christian king, and then says to him: “You are the founts of the highest dignities, and above all eminence, and you are the head and origin of human happiness.” And later: “Of your so pious and very famous empire the greatest bulwark is our Lord Jesus Christ; for through him kings reign, etc.” And later he promises that he will show “that glorious piety toward God is the unalterable basis for regal honors.” Like things can be seen in Ambrose, in his epistle to the Augustus Gratian, which he prefaced to his books on the Faith, where he even calls him “most Christian prince, and most Christian of princes.” Likewise in his sermons on the death of Theodosius and Valentinian, and in various epistles to Christian emperors of his own time. Also Gregory Nazianzen recognized the same thing, Oration 17, whose very fine words I shall refer to below in a more convenient place.

I add besides the more ancient testimony of Martial, Bishop of Limoges, who lived near the time of the Apostles, and in his epistle 2 to the Tolossi, ch.8 he tells of having converted to the faith a certain prince of Gaul, whom he calls king, and he strongly praises his person, and adds: “Whom you ought to obey, because he has been constituted a prince for you by God, etc.” Also a passage in Tertullian can be noted, book on Idolatry, ch.15 where he says first that those things are to be rendered to Caesar which are Caesar’s, and to God which are God’s, just as Christ taught. Thereafter he subjoins: “So then, as regards the honors of kings and emperors, we have sufficiently prescribed that we should in all obedience, in accordance with the teaching of the Apostle, be subject to magistrates and powers. But within the limits of discipline, as far as we are separated from idolatry.” Here, although he speaks of the time of the pagan emperors, yet he understands his teaching to be general. Therefore in ch.17 he adds that Christians at that time could accept from emperors the dignity and administration of civil power, provided they exercise it without any sinking into idolatry. Therefore finally Prosper rightly has written in his book, Epigrammaton ch.34: “Whatever the order of the world well demands, and whatever thing proposed does not violate pious faith, is to be granted; no power ought to be despised by the gentle and the saints; it is right to serve kings and lords; so that it may benefit the servants of Christ for true honor that they have loved the good and borne the evil.”

10. One can easily be persuaded by reason of this truth, because the Christian Faith or baptism does not render one incapable of regal dignity, or of principality, or of political power; therefore if anyone had it before the faith, he does not lose it because of baptism or faith, if he be converted to it; or if someone already a Christian is appointed to it by lawful election or by another just title, truly he acquires it, and he is constituted a true king, or prince, or magistrate; and so faithful and Christian subjects are also bound to obey him. The inferences are indeed evident per se and from what was said. But the proof of the antecedent is either that the incapacity would be from the particular institution of Christ, or from the nature of the thing, or from some natural repugnance; for no other foundation can be thought of; but each of these is wholly false and irrational.

11. About the first it is clear, both because nowhere do we read that Christ prohibited to the faithful regal principality, as will easily be shown below in satisfying the foundations of the contrary opinion; but also because about Christ and the time of grace it has the rather been predicted that the kings of the earth would believe on Christ and adore him, Psalms 71: “The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts and all the kings of the earth shall fall down before him, etc.” Hence in Psalms 2 it is first said that the kings of the earth have set themselves against Christ, and afterwards it is subjoined: “Be wise now therefore, O ye kings, be instructed ye who judge the earth. Serve the Lord with fear, etc.” Also Isaiah 49: “And kings shall be thy nursing fathers and they shall bow down to thee with their faces toward the earth, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord, for they shall not be ashamed that wait for me.” And ch.60: “And the gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising, etc.” Nor can it be said or thought that kings coming into the faith of Christ by this fact lost their realms and ceased to be kings, because as the Church sings, “He who gives heavenly kingdoms does not snatch away mortal things.” Nor would another providence have been pleasing nor convenient, for if kings, when converted to Christ, at once by that fact were deprived of realms justly possessed, few certainly would have been so contemptuous of their realms as to want to become Christians. Therefore it is not credible that Christ, who calls to Himself men of all orders and wisely and pleasingly disposes of means suitable for their conversion, had placed so great an impediment to the conversion of temporal princes, or left such an instruction in his Church.

Especially because neither did such an institution pertain to the splendor of the Church, nor to good temporal government, nor to spiritual perfection. The first is plain because it much more honors the faith of Christ and the Church that emperors, kings, and princes of the earth be subjected to Christ and his Vicar, and this without doubt is what is commended in the above stated promises. The second is also plain, for the reason that was set forth above, about the necessity of political principality for the preservation of human society, has no less place in the Church of Christ than outside it, because Christians also need a political community in which peace and justice are protected, and for this purpose Christians also need civil direction and restraint, as has in itself been noted. Therefore, since Christ neither willed his Church to be badly governed in temporal affairs, nor decreed either that he would miraculously rule it, it is not due that a quasi conatural governance be taken away from it, nor also, as a result, that the political principality be removed from it. Lastly the third part is proved because political principality is not against the essential perfection of the Church, which consists in true and living faith working through charity. For, since principality is consonant with justice and natural reason, it cannot be contrary to charity. Nor is it even contrary to the perfection of the counsels, for there is no concern here that the lack of temporal dominion or jurisdiction be constituted under necessity, but only that under the counsel it be left to free will, following that saying: "If thou wilt be perfect, etc." And so evangelical perfection and the efficacy of the grace of Christ are shown rather in this, that many emperors and kings voluntarily abdicated their empires and realms.

12. From these considerations the other member rests sufficiently proved, to wit, that Christians are not, from the nature of the thing or by reason of any other natural repugnance, incapable of political principality. First, because it has been shown rather from the nature of the thing that this governance is necessary for Christians, for whom it is much better to be governed by Christian princes than by non-Christian, as was also shown by the by and is sufficiently known of itself; therefore rather from the nature of the thing is it necessary that Christians be capable of temporal kingdoms and magistracies. Second, also because if there were any repugnance, it would be either to Christian freedom, or to the faith. But Christian freedom does not consist in exemption from just human laws, nor in immunity from just restraint or punishment of wrongs when they are committed against peace and justice; but it consists in exemption either from the laws of Moses, or from the fear of servitude, or (which is the same) it consists in free service as a consequence of love and charity, to which human government is not repugnant, but rather, if it is present, aids it; but if it be absent its lack is supplied through coercion. Also the aforesaid power, or the subjection corresponding with it, is not at all repugnant to the faith, because each is in conformity with natural reason, which is not adverse to the faith. Certainly Paul sufficiently confirms this in the epistle to Philemon, where he manifestly supposes, on account of the faith that Philemon had and that Onesimus his servant had embraced, that neither was the right of dominion taken away from the former, nor was the latter exempted from this service; therefore the same must a fortiori be said of political jurisdiction and the subjection corresponding to it.

13. As to the first foundation, then, of the contrary error, we reply that those words of Paul, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers" are understood literally of infidels as infidels, that is, do not take part with infidels in the proper activities which they perform as infidels. And this sense all the reasons of Paul prove. But from this opinion it is only concluded that the faithful should not obey infidel princes if they prescribe anything against the faith or true religion. And in this way was that passage there understood by Ambrose, Theodoret, St. Thomas, and St. Augustine, book Against the Donatists after the collation, chs.6 & 21. Jerome too, bk.1 Against Jovinian and epistle 11 to Ageruchias, understood by 'yoke' matrimony, thinking that there it is prohibited to a Christian woman to contract it with a pagan. But without doubt there the Apostle does not speak specially of the bond of matrimony, because neither is mention made of this, nor does there occur in the whole context an occasion for specially treating of this. It is certainly probable, as Chrysostom says there in hom. 6, that Paul advises the faithful in general to avoid too much intercourse and familiarity with infidels, especially on account of the danger that they be corrupted by them in faith or morals. In this sense Paul did not hand down a new positive precept, but explains a natural one, by which each is bound to shun danger, lest he be lost in it. And in this way too the Christian republic is bound to shun an infidel prince and not to accept him, if the matter depends on its own consent; or even to repel him if from his rule the peril of moral destruction would be feared; yet this ought to be done, not by private authority, but by public, when in other respects the prince has a lawful right to the realm. And thus the required order is preserved, and the danger is avoided.

14. As to Matthew 17, since it must be more broadly considered when speaking about ecclesiastical immunity, now I briefly say that under the name of sons is not there comprehended all the faithful, nor even all the just, because Christ literally speaks of natural sons, as is plain from the context and from the explanations of all. But as to Augustine, St. Thomas answers, IIa IIae, q.104, a.6, ad.1, that he spoke in a spiritual sense and in this way the sons of the kingdom are free from the slavery of sin and from the tribute which they have to pay by reason of it. This is not agreed to by Cajetan there, and so he explains that under the head of sons of the kingdom, to which earthly realms are subordinate, Augustine meant not all the just as sons but those who are in authority, as are bishops, and other ecclesiastics. But even these are not natural sons, and therefore under the name and idea of sons (if we stand only on the proper signification of the words) they are not comprehended. And therefore Jansen thinks that Augustine spoke of Christ only, even if he should think in the plural of sons, because Christ the Lord is speaking generally of natural sons. Nor even are all Christians comprehended under that freedom on account of another title, that they are the family of Christ, as Paul sufficiently explains, Romans 13, because that union with Christ in the same family, that is, the Church, is very broad and general, and of another order, that is, the spiritual order, which does not remove corporal servitude or subjection, and consequently does not remove the order of justice which is born from it. Whether, indeed, by reason of that title immunity is extended to all ecclesiastics by force of the words of Christ we will see later, and we will expound the words of Jerome which seem to touch on it.

15. To the second foundation we now answer that true Christian freedom does not exclude honorable subjection to lawful temporal princes, not only Christian ones but also infidel ones, as is sufficiently made plain from the teachings of the Apostles, and more fully in the aforesaid book De Legibus. Finally, as to the words of Christ the Lord we reply that by these words Christ did not intend to remove a just principality from among Christians, but only to teach them not to imitate the ambition and tyranny of pagan princes. And therefore it was not about kings simply but with a limitation that he said: “the princes of the gentiles exercise dominion over them,” where also the word ‘dominion’ indicates too great desire and too ambitious a way of governing, as Peter, first letter, ch.5, said, “Neither as being lords over the clergy.” Also thus did Chrysostom explain, homily 56 on Matthew, and in another brief narration on Matthew, ch.20. And from the occasion on which the Master spoke to repress the ambitions of his disciples and the strife as to the primacy, and from the words that He subjoined: “But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister,” it is very plain that Christ did not exclude order and degrees of greater and lesser, but wanted to moderate the desire of his Apostles.

But as to Paul, we answer that when he says, “Be ye not servants of men,” he does not speak of civil subjection, nay, not even of penal or rigorous servitude, for neither is repugnant to, nor derogates from the worth of, the redemption of Christ, for in the same place a little before he had said, “Art thou called being a servant? Care not for it.” Rather he adds that it is possible for servitude to be preferred to freedom, at least on account of humility, as St. Thomas expounded along with Ambrose and Gregory. Therefore, when he says, “Be ye not servants of men,” he means in the matter of the servitude in which a man is preferred to Christ, by serving a man in things which are opposed to the service of God. And because this would be contrary to affection for the redemption of Christ, therefore he premised a very good reason, saying, “Ye are bought with a price.” Therefore to serve men in this way should be foreign to those redeemed by Christ, but to be subject to lawful princes in things which are not repugnant to God is not unworthy, but rather, according to the words of the same Redeemer: “Render therefore to Caesar the things which be Caesar’s and unto God the things which be God’s.”

Chapter 5: Whether Christian kings have supreme power in civil or temporal things, and by what right.

Summary. 1. What supreme power is. 2. There is a double subjection, direct and indirect, and what each is. 3. The sense of the question is made clear. 4. First opinion for the negative. 5. First foundation. 6. The true opinion is established. 7. An emperor does not have supreme temporal power over the Church. 8. The assertion is proved from the authority of the Supreme Pontiffs. 9. The same conclusion. 10. Supreme civil power does not belong to the Supreme Pontiff by human right. 11. The same is proved of divine right. 12. Objection. It is solved. 13. Objection. First response. 14. Second solution. The response is rejected. 15. The foundations of the contrary opinion are solved.

1. Any power, then, is said to be supreme when it recognizes no superior; for that word, supreme, denotes a negation of a superior whom the other, who is said to have supreme power, may be bound to obey. Moreover it is understood to be about a superior on earth, or a human superior, for with God no comparison is made; for what human prince, unless he be an atheist or mad, would presume even to attempt to withdraw himself from under the divine power? Therefore there is excluded through that negation subjection to a supreme mortal man. But that negation can be taken in various ways, and therefore, so that the title of the question may be understood and so that it may be distinguished from the other questions that are here possible, it is necessary to make plain the manner and sense of that negation. For, first, it is possible to deny utterly all subjection to a superior man, as well in spiritual matters as in the civil. Secondly, it is possible to deny subjection in the same temporal and civil matter. And although in the prior question a very great disagreement exists between us and the king of England, for he wishes to be under no one even in spiritual matters, which we believe to be against Christian faith and obedience, nonetheless we do not now treat that question, because we have not yet spoken about the spiritual power, without the understanding of which the solution of this can in no way be understood; and therefore I relegate it to the last part of this book, and at present we call that temporal power supreme which in the same order or matter has not been subjected to another.

2. Next, in the present case, a double subjection is accustomed to be distinguished, i.e., the direct and indirect. That is called direct which is within the end and boundaries of the same power; indirect which is only born in consequence of direction to a higher end, and pertains to a superior and more excellent power. For civil power proper is ordered of itself only directly to the convenient state and temporal felicity of the human republic for the time of the present life, and therefore also the power itself is called temporal. Therefore the civil power is then called in its own order supreme when, in the same order and with respect to its own purpose, an ultimate resolution is made to it in its own sphere, or in the whole community which is under it, such that on such a supreme prince depend all the inferior magistrates who have power in such community or in a part of it, but the highest prince himself is subordinated to no superior in the order to the same purpose of civil government. But because temporal or civil happiness must be referred to spiritual and eternal happiness, therefore it can come about that the matter itself of civil power must be directed in another way and governed in order to spiritual good, which civil reason alone would seem to demand. And then, though the temporal prince and his power in actions does not directly depend on another power of the same order and that looks only to the same end, nevertheless it is possible that it be necessary for him to be directed, aided, or corrected in his own field by superior power that governs men in order to the more excellent and eternal end; and then that dependency is termed indirect, because that superior power sometimes concerns itself with temporal matters, not of itself or on its own account, but in an indirect way, and on account of another.

3. Hence it comes about that this negation of subjection in temporal matters, which the prerogative of supreme princes is believed to include, must be further subdivided into two senses. For it is possible to deny even all subjection, as well direct as indirect, and thus another twofold question is raised. The first is, whether the power of a Christian king is supreme in the first sense, that is, neither directly nor indirectly recognizing a superior in civil or temporal matters; the second is whether it is supreme at least in the second sense, that is, recognizing no direct superior in temporal matters. On these questions there is such great diversity, that the first pertains to dogmas of faith, and on that nearly the point of the whole controversy turns between us and the king of England; but the latter neither is a matter of faith nor in it is there any disagreement between us. Yet nevertheless the present question must not be taken in the prior sense, nor about indirect subjection, or rather exemption; because (if it be attentively considered) it pertains to the question of spiritual power, because that indirect subjection can be only with respect to spiritual power, or (which is the same), if any power can be thought of to which the supreme temporal power may indirectly be subjected, it can only be the spiritual power, as we shall see in discussing it, and therefore we must also put this question back to that place. The title, therefore, of the present question must be only understood about the supreme power, which in the same order does not directly recognize a superior. For although, as I have said, on this point there is no controversy between us and the king, because he often complains about Catholics, that we deny the jurisdiction of Christian princes and the obedience owed to them, therefore this question I thought should not be passed by at this time, so that it may be made manifest from the solution of it that the regal power over all those matters which are consonant with the natural law is preserved in good order according to Catholic doctrine.

4. It is therefore the opinion of certain Catholics, especially of the jurists, that in the Church of Christ not only is there spiritual governance but also a temporal monarchy, and therefore in the Catholic church there is only one supreme temporal prince, having as such and directly supreme civil power over the Church universal, and that he is the Supreme Pontiff by the institution of Christ. Thence they collect as a result that no republic, or no king or emperor, has supreme power in temporal matters, because there cannot be two supreme heads in the same order; therefore if the Supreme Pontiff has supreme temporal power directly and through himself, necessarily in all the other temporal princes there is no supreme power, because there will be none that does not recognize a superior in temporal affairs. Nay some even add that all rights to realms and dominions were conferred on Peter as the Vicar of Christ, and thus the Roman Pontiff succeeds to this right, and therefore the supreme civil power potentially (as they say) is only in the Pontiff, although through other kings he administers it by means of tacit or express grant. So say those who are outstanding among ancient interpreters of pontifical right, the Gloss, Innocent, Hostiensis, John Andreas, Panormitanus, Felinus, and Decius in ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis, and in ch. 'Causam quae' 2, and in ch. 'Per venerabilem', Who are legitimate sons, and ch. 'Solitae,' De Maiorit. et obediē., and in ch. 'Super his,' De Voto, and others in ch. 'Quoniam.' dist.10, and in ch. 'Cum ad verum,' 96. dist., and among interpreters of the law of Caesar, Bartol. Oldrad., Paulus de Castro, and others to whom Navarro and Covarruvias, to be quoted below, refer. To these are added St. Anthony, 3 p. tit.22, c.5, § 13 and 17, Alvarus Pelagius, and Augustine of Ancona, along with many others referred to by the aforesaid.

5. Their foundation is first in the many decrees of the Pontiffs, who seem to affirm this, which matters we shall refer to below when we shall explain their mind. Second we will show this power in its use and various effects. Of this character are the transferring of the Empire from the Greeks to the Germans, and the institution of a method of electing the emperor and confirming him, and occasionally, to depose him, which are all acts of the temporal power. But if the emperor is not supreme much less are other kings. Therefore sometimes kings have been deposed by Pontiffs. Third, so as to adduce the Scriptures as well to prove this, they suppose that Christ had not only direct spiritual power but also temporal. First, because He said: "All power is given to me in heaven and in earth"; also, because He was the natural Son of God. Hence they infer that both powers were equally entrusted to his Vicar, both because he himself made no distinction but said absolutely to Peter: "Feed my sheep," under which word 'feeding' is no less included civil government than spiritual; for of David it is said, 2 Samuel 5: "the Lord said to thee, Thou shalt feed my people Israel." Second also for the good government of the Church and its unity and peace it was expedient. Thence a fourth natural reason is added, that in one body there should be only one supreme head, from whom proceed all acts of life, whether serving the body or the spirit, as from a primary source; but the Church is a single mystical body, as has already been shown above; therefore it requires one supreme governor in both orders, nay, both powers in one person; because if they are divided among different persons endless disputes and dissensions will arise, which can hardly be composed with human diligence and reason, as experience itself shows.

6. Nevertheless it must be said that Christian kings have supreme civil power in their own order and recognize no other directly superior within the same temporal or civil order, upon whom in the acts of their power they per se depend. Hence it comes about that there is not given in the Church one supreme temporal prince of the whole Church, or of all the kings of it, but there are as many as there are supreme kingdoms or republics. This is the more received and approved opinion among Catholics, to whom forthwith we shall refer. But the proof of the first part depends on the latter; for if there is no one temporal head, the result necessarily is that there are many supreme kings, as has been set forth by us; indeed at this time we do not intend to consider in particular whether this or that king is supreme, nor to compare these princes themselves with each other, for that would be very foreign to the present purpose.

7. And for the same reason we do not now treat this question, whether the Emperor is the superior in jurisdiction in all provinces and realms of Christians and consequently the supreme monarch in the Church universal. Because, although it could pertain to the latter part of the assertion, yet it pertains almost not at all to explaining the dogmas of the faith, and therefore we briefly suppose that the Emperor does not have this dominion or supreme temporal jurisdiction over the whole Church (whatever Bartolus and some other jurists should think), because either he never has had it, or, although he has possessed it, for the greater part he has lost it. But that he never had it is the most probable, because neither in a supernatural or extraordinary manner did he have it from Christ the Lord or from the Roman Pontiff, as will be made clear a fortiori from things to be said; nor did he acquire it by any human law, because never, either through election or through just war, did one emperor subject to himself the whole world or the whole Church. For though we admit that the ancient Christian emperors were lawful princes over their whole domain, yet it does not thence come about that they were supreme princes of all Christians, because outside their territory many peoples could have been Christians. For, as Prosper correctly said, bk.2 De Vocat. gent. ch.6, "Christian grace was not content to have the same boundaries as Rome, and it subjected many peoples to the scepter of the cross whom Rome itself did not conquer with its arms." Thence also is that which Pope Leo, in serm. I Apostolorum de Roma, said: "So that you might govern more widely by divine than by earthly domination." Add that this very Roman Empire was divided into Eastern and Western, and then that the Western Empire (which alone remained among the Christians after the Eastern had been seized by the pagans), though so far as dignity is concerned it endures in one person, was, as to jurisdiction, divided among many princes and kings. Of these, though some are subjects of the emperor, more are thought to be lawfully exempt by the right of prescription, adding at the same time the consent of the peoples, or title of just war. And thus we now suppose that, besides the Emperor, there are several temporal kings wholly free from his jurisdiction, as are the kings of Spain, France and England.

Therefore, it is only left to prove the assertion about the Supreme Pontiff; for if he does not as his own have dominion of supreme temporal jurisdiction over all the kingdoms of the Church, no other can be imagined who might have such primacy, and therefore there will be several supreme temporal kings. That therefore the Pontiff does not have such temporal power in the Church universal was held among the theologians especially by Maior, in [Sentences] 4, dist.24, q.3, Cajetan, tom.1, opusc. tract.2, c.3, and 2.2, q.43, a.8, Vitoria in Relectionibus, Soto, bk.4, De Iust. ch.2, and Bellarmine, bk.5, De Sum. Pontiff., ch.1ff., who refers to several others. Also among the jurists, Covarruvias, in Regul. 'Peccatum', 2 p. § 9, no.7, and Navarre, in ch. 'Novit.' notab. 3 very fully, and, by referring to several others, in no. 41, and Petrus Bertrand. tract. De Orig. iurisdict. q.3. Also (which is the main point) the Pontiffs themselves in many places simply recognize this truth.

8. Therefore by their rights in the first place is the assertion proved. For Pope Nicholas writes to Archbishop Albinus as follows: "The Holy Church of God has no sword, except a spiritual one". Now by the word 'sword' is accustomed to be signified in canon law the temporal power; therefore this should especially be understood about both the direct power and the jurisdiction that the Church has through itself and, so to speak, on its own intrinsic account. For in its own territory, by having obtained another title, the Church, or an ecclesiastical prelate, can have a temporal sword, as the Roman Pontiff has it in his own particular domain. Besides, the same Nicholas, in his letter to the emperor Michael, said the following: "Neither did the Emperor seize the rights of the pontificate, nor did the Pontiffs usurp the name of emperor, since Christ thus separated in their appropriate activities and distinct dignities the duties of each power, etc." The same is handed on to us by Pope Gelasius when in epistle 10 he writes to Emperor Anastasius: "There are two by whom chiefly the World is led, the sacred authority of the Pontiffs and the regal power"; and Pope Gregory, bk.2, indict.11. epistle 61, elsewhere ch.100, to emperor Maurice, says: "For this purpose power over all men has been granted to the piety of my lords, so that the terrestrial kingdom may serve the celestial kingdom"; and Pope John, in his letter to emperor Justinian, which is included in 1. Inter clericos, ch. 'De Sacra Trinitate,' recognized his supreme principality and regal power.

Besides, Innocent III, ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis openly thinks that the king of the French has supreme temporal jurisdiction, which the Pope did not want to disturb or diminish; and therefore he says therein: "For we do not intend to judge about the fiefdom, to whose judgment it pertains," clearly signifying that it does not pertain to himself, at least directly, as the Gloss and Innocent correctly remarked. This he more fully explains when he adds: "Unless, perchance, by common right through a special privilege or by custom it has been taken away." For by this exception he declares that by divine law it has not been taken away from the regal right. The same is besides expressly said by Innocent in ch. 'Per venerabilem,' 'Who are legitimate sons,' about the king of the Franks, that he does not recognize a superior in temporal matters. And of the Apostolic See he says: "In the patrimony of Blessed Peter it can freely (that is directly and absolutely) make disposition, wherein it exercises both the authority of the Supreme Pontiff and executes the power of a supreme prince (at least a temporal prince)," plainly thinking that in the other realms it cannot thus freely dispose about temporal matters. The same in ch. 'Solitae,' De Maiorat. et obedienc., he confesses that the Emperor "in temporal matters takes precedence in his own dominion"; and of the regal power he says that "in carnal matters it is preeminent," and in ch. 'Causam,' 2, 'Who are lawful sons,' Alexander III expressly says that it pertains to the king, not to the Church, to judge of temporal possessions, and he speaks in particular of the king of England. It is therefore sufficiently clear that the Roman Pontiffs themselves never arrogated to themselves power of this type, which will be more fully evident from the subsequent discourse.

9. Second, this truth is chiefly proved because no just title can be assigned that direct dominion in temporal jurisdiction over all the realms of the Church befits the Supreme Pontiff; therefore he does not have it, for neither could it be obtained without a just title. The assumption is proved, because either that title would be of positive divine right, or of human right; for it is manifest, from what has been above stated, that it cannot be directly from natural right. For it has been proved that from direct natural right only the perfected human community, and one politically united into the body of a single republic, has the supreme temporal jurisdiction over itself. But the congregation of the Church, although it be one spiritual or mystic body of Christ, and in this category would have unity of faith, baptism, and head, yet it is not united in the manner of one political congregation, but it contains in itself varied kingdoms and republics, which in the political class have no unity among themselves; therefore by force of natural right there is not immediately in the whole community of the Church one supreme temporal and universal jurisdiction over the whole Church, but there are as many supreme temporal jurisdictions as there are political communities which are not members of one realm or civil republic.

10. And therefore by no lesser evidence is it concluded that such power is not in any ecclesiastical prince by any human title, by the medium of which that natural power was transferred to him; because this title is either the election or consent of the people, and this has no place in the present case, as is manifest of itself; for never have all Christian peoples by their own will and consent submitted themselves to one man as to a supreme temporal prince. Or the title is from a just war, and of this also it is clear that it does not have place in any ecclesiastical prince. Or the title is from a lawful succession, and here also it cannot be, precisely by insisting on human right, because it supposes a lawful title and dominion in a predecessor, and thus, by ascending, one must necessarily stop at someone who received by another prior human title such dominion without succession; and this cannot be except by consent of the people or by war, which either was just from the beginning, or by the tacit consent of the subjects was made just through legitimate time; but none of these has any basis in the case of any Pontiff, whatever time or former age may be thought of. Or, lastly, this title is from some grant made by man, and about this there exists almost the same reasoning as of the title of succession. The reason is that no one can give except what he has; but no temporal prince, even a temporal one, has ever had supreme direct temporal jurisdiction over all Christian provinces and realms, as I have touched on above; therefore there is no one who could have made such a grant to the Church or to the Pontiff.

All these things rightly confirm those canonical laws which hand down that the Roman Pontiff has the lawful right and the temporal dominion over the Roman realm or patrimony (as they call it) of St. Peter, effected through the donation of the Emperor Constantine, as is plain from ch. 'Constantine,' 1 & 2, dist. 96, and from ch. 'Fundamenta,' de elect. in 6, and ch. 'Futuram,' 12, q. 1. For from these sources it is plainly collected that by the title of donation alone does he have direct temporal jurisdiction over the kingdom and the cities which are in the patrimony of St. Peter, under which patrimony we include all the temporal possessions which the Roman Pontiff now possesses, whether the donation of the entire patrimony was made by Constantine, or was begun by him and was increased by other kings and princes.

11. It remains to speak about the title of positive divine right which could only have been begun through the gift of Christ the Lord, and persist through lawful succession; but by Christ the Lord no such grant was made, and consequently no lawful succession could exist in such temporal jurisdiction; therefore neither by this title does jurisdiction of this type belong to the Pontiff. But that Christ did not give this jurisdiction to the church is proved especially because if he had given it to anyone, it would have been especially to Peter, as now I suppose from what must be stated below concerning the primacy of the Roman Pontiff. But that it was granted to Peter is not sufficiently gathered from Matthew 16 where, before the words, “whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth,” and “whatsoever thou shalt loose,” Christ put first the promise, “I give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of Heaven”; therefore Christ did not promise to Peter the keys of the earthly kingdom, and therefore he did not promise him temporal dominion, or direct temporal jurisdiction, but spiritual power. Therefore what Christ added, “whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth,” or “whatsoever thou shalt loose,” must without doubt be understood in accordance with the power which under the name of the keys he had promised. And similarly the words, “Feed my sheep,” must be understood in accordance with the same power, for there Christ fulfilled the promise made before. But in no other place did Christ indicate that he was granting temporal dominion or a direct proper kingdom to Peter, or to his Church, and also ecclesiastical tradition does not show it but rather the opposite, as has been seen; therefore by no supernatural way can there be clarity for us about such temporal and direct jurisdiction of the Pontiff; therefore it cannot with foundation be attributed to him, since he could not have it except supernaturally.

Next the best conjecture is that Christ did not assume for himself in his humanity an earthly or temporal realm with direct dominion and jurisdiction, such as is in the Emperor or other human princes; therefore He did not bestow it on his Vicar on earth. We suppose the antecedent from things which we have said in 1 tom., 3.p., disp.48, sect.2, about the kingdom of Christ, and it is briefly now shown from these things, which Scripture says about the poverty of Christ the Lord, as that verse in 2 Corinthians 8: “For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich.” Hence John XXII, in Extravagant. ‘Cum inter nonnullos,’ de verbor. Signific, teaching that Christ, notwithstanding His poverty, had dominion over a certain few and usual things, manifestly supposes that he did not take dominion over realms, or over other things the property in which makes men rich. And this the Lord himself signified when in Matthew 8 and Luke 9 he said, “the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.” Also about temporal jurisdiction he likewise signified Luke 12, when to someone asking, “Speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me,” he replied: “Man, who made me a judge or divider over you?” as if he would say that he did not assume that judgment, nor had come into the world to exercise temporal jurisdiction, as rightly Ambrose, Theophylact, and Euthymius remarked.

Also this too the Lord himself confirmed, John 18, saying, “My kingdom is not of this world,” that is, it is not temporal and earthly, as is the kingdom of Caesar, as Cyril there expounds, bk.12 on John, ch.10 and following; and Chrysostom, Homily 82 on John, and very well Augustine, tract. 115, saying: “Hear, all ye earthly kingdoms, I do not stand in the way of your domination in this world, my kingdom is not of this world.” Therefore all the Fathers teach that Christ assumed a spiritual kingdom, which does not exclude true poverty. And therefore in Zechariah 9 it is predicted that the Savior will come, who would be a king and a poor man, which was declared fulfilled in Christ, Matthew 21 and John 12; and in Psalms 2 of Christ it is said: “Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Sion,” and at once is added: “I will declare the decree,” to signify that the kingdom is spiritual, not earthly. Hence Augustine in the place cited said that the mountain upon which Christ was set is not of this world, “because the believers in Christ, who are his kingdom, are not of this world”; moreover Hilary said that Jerusalem is not earthly but celestial. Also in this manner it was predicted by the angel about Christ: “The Lord shall give unto him the throne of his father David,” and at once he adds, “And he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end,” because it was not to be temporal but spiritual, as was remarked by Epiphanius Haeres. 29, and Jerome, Jeremiah 22 and Zechariah 6. But the reason is because a temporal kingdom was not necessary for Christ for his own honor or majesty, and for our example and redemption it was more expedient that he not assume it.

12. And so hence is easily proved the prior inference, that Christ did not confer on his Vicar power which he himself did not assume. You will say, although Christ may not have had a temporal kingdom, transitory and imperfect, yet he had also in his humanity, on account of the grace of union, a certain more excellent dominion, by which he could make use of all things whatsoever, or of temporal kingdoms, by his will, and consequently through this also he was able to give to his Vicar temporal kingdoms and direct temporal jurisdiction. We answer that it is not denied that he was able to do this, just as he was able to assume them for himself, but we gather that he did not make the grant, since he did not assume it, because he left on earth only a Vicar of that kingdom which he himself had in fact assumed, which kingdom is spiritual, as we have shown, and indeed it is perfectly consummated in glory, but in this world it is begun in the Church militant. Again because Christ had perfect spiritual power without direct temporal jurisdiction, therefore he could also communicate to his Vicar perfect or sufficient spiritual jurisdiction without the other direct temporal jurisdiction. And lastly because just as it was expedient that Christ himself not assume temporal jurisdiction, so also it was fitting that he not communicate it to his Vicar, lest he either perturb the kings of the earth, or seem to mix spiritual matters with secular.

Hence we can argue finally with reason, that temporal dominion with direct civil jurisdiction over the church universal was not necessary for the spiritual government of the Church, as is manifest in itself, nor even was it useful for the same end, nay rather it could have been a great detriment; therefore it is not very likely that it was granted by Christ. The minor is proved first because temporal government is far different from spiritual, and it involves men in secular matters, which are very greatly adverse to spiritual matters, on which account Paul said, 2 Timothy 2: “No one that wars for God entangleth himself with the affairs of this World.” Therefore it is not credible that Christ the Lord joined these two supreme and universal powers in one Supreme Pontiff of the Church, since it is morally impossible that one man can be equal to both weights of universal government.

13. You will say: By this reason it would be proved that the Supreme Pontiff or other Bishops cannot and ought not to be at the same time temporal princes. The answer in the first place is that it is true that Christ the Lord did not institute this, nor lay it down, nor did he grant to any of his ministers or pastors temporal principality. Also the discourse made proves this, and what we have said about the kingdom of Christ confirms it, that he assumed no temporal principality or secular judgment over the whole world or any part of it, whence also to no Bishop nor to his Vicar did he communicate it; what therefore he said about himself, “Who made me a judge over you?” applies to each Bishop. This is also shown by other testimonies and by the long discourse of Bernard, bk.1 De Considerat. ad Eugenium ch.6, and bk.2, ch.6. I add that nonetheless Christ did not prohibit the Pope, or a bishop, from being able at the same time to be a temporal lord, because neither can such a prohibition be shown, as has above been touched upon, and from things yet to be said it will be further established; nor even does it follow from the reasoning set forth, because it is not in itself evil that the same person be an ecclesiastical pastor and a temporal prince. Nay rather, though a too ample and universal temporal care would not rightly comport with a spiritual solicitude, yet a certain limited temporal principality can not only be permitted, but is also expedient for preserving the splendor and prestige of the Church, and for necessary expenses and other like honorable purposes, as is rightly stated in ch. 'Fundamenta,' De Elect in 6. And therefore Christ the Lord did not prohibit it, but he left it at the disposition of man, regulated by right reason, and in accordance with the needs of the times.

14. But an answer to the objection offered could be given in another way, that these things only prove that the exercise of both universal jurisdictions ought not to be entrusted at the same time to the same person, yet nonetheless it was possible that each jurisdiction be granted by way of habit to the Pontiff, and that it be granted under the law and condition that he exercise the spiritual himself but the temporal ordinarily through others. But this too is easily attacked, not only because even that jurisdiction by way of habit is also not shown by any title or probable means, as has been proved, but also because it is either not pertinent, or very odious. For either he who has it is never himself to use it, and thus it will be otiose and useless, because never will anyone be able to use it through others unless first he use it himself, at least by delegating it, or entrusting it as ordinary. But if it be said that it was given for this use, I further ask whether the Pontiff, for example, by entrusting this jurisdiction, wholly abdicates it and utterly relinquishes all responsibility for it, or whether, indeed, he entrusts it under the conditions that he always remain superior in temporal affairs, and with the power of recalling the commission, or at least of limiting it, or even of correcting it under his discretion or emending the things performed under it. If this jurisdiction is thought of by way of habit in the former manner, it is without fruit and otiose. For what does it matter that the Pontiff have this power by way of habit if by necessity he has to grant it to others, through whom he is to exercise it, and now, after he has given it, he is unable to exercise the part of the superior in that order? Nay, rather it follows that he does not even now have it, and is only imagined to have sometime had it, so that an emanation of that power to the secular princes may be attributed to the Pontiff, which is considered very productive of envy and too odious, and otherwise is also profitless and baseless.

But if this power is thought of by way of habit in the latter manner, so that it could proceed to act whenever it pleased or ought to, thus the hate and envy is increased, because now the temporal princes will not be supreme kings, and false will be the song of Sedulius, received by the Church and very celebrated: "He does not seize mortal things who grants celestial;" and the Pope will be able at will to take away or change temporal kingdoms, and even to vindicate to himself, at least validly, judgments on temporal matters and dispensations and the like; for although perhaps he would not do well on account of the perturbation of order, yet the thing done would hold, because it would be from the supreme jurisdiction on which the inferior depends. But this is not only odious and, not without cause, can perturb the minds of kings; but it is also incredible of itself, because it is against the universal peace of the Church and against the universal and perpetual use of it. Therefore even the jurists, who say that the Supreme Pontiff has the supreme temporal jurisdiction, do not admit this. Nay in many acts of temporal jurisdiction they absolutely deny that the Pontiff can do them outside his own temporal dominion, even validly, as is commonly handed down by the doctors, ch. 'Per venerabilem,' 'Who are lawful sons.' And lastly, if in this way the Pontiff had temporal jurisdiction over the whole Church, he should be no less solicitous for the good temporal government of all the kingdoms of the Church than for the spiritual government of all the episcopates. For, preserving proportion, the obligation and the reason is the same; and so proceeds the reasoning made, that this double universal solicitude morally exceeds human strength and capacity, and it is against all reason and use.

15. Of the foundations of the contrary opinion the first and second only proceed about indirect power. And to be sure many of the authors referred to for that opinion speak only of that same superior power, as we shall set forth at the end of this book. But the third foundation proceeds from a false principle, because Christ the Lord did not assume temporal dominions, as has been said. In like manner the fourth foundation is defective, because the Church is not one temporal republic as it is one spiritual republic, and therefore it does not need one supreme direct temporal power, but one spiritual power which extends to temporal things, as we shall see below.

Chapter 6: Whether there is in the Church of Christ a spiritual power of external and quasi political jurisdiction distinct from the temporal.

Summary: 1. There is an ecclesiastical power of order and one of jurisdiction. 2. Again, ecclesiastical jurisdiction is double. Sense of the question. 3. The heresy of Marsilius of Padua and the foundation for the Anglican Schism. 4. The foundation of this sort of heresy. 5. First assertion de fide. Proof from Scripture. 6. Evasion of the king of England and his reasons. 7. The evasion of the king is rejected. 8. Satisfaction made to the first proof of the king. 9. The king's second proof is dissolved. 10. The Holy Spirit cannot properly be called the Vicar of Christ. 11. Christ the Lord conferred true spiritual jurisdiction on Peter. 12. Distinction between the spiritual and temporal power. 13. The foundations of the errors referred to at the beginning of this chapter are solved.

1. Hitherto we have said of temporal power that it is clear no Christian prince can by right accuse the Catholic Church or Catholic Doctrine of arbitrarily snatching due power away from him; now we must speak about spiritual power so that we may also show what schismatic kings in this genus unduly usurp, and in what things, against divine right, they refuse to obey and be subject to ecclesiastical power. But because ecclesiastical power is manifold, therefore in the title we restrict the question to the power of spiritual and external jurisdiction. For a double ecclesiastical power is wont to be distinguished, namely of order and of jurisdiction; for to these two members are reduced the others that are wont to be enumerated, as Navarrus rightly notes. Therefore, we do not here treat of the power of order for it does not pertain to the present controversy, because it is not a power of a superior over subordinates but is a certain moral faculty ordered to the religious cult of God, whether by the offering of sacrifice, or by the administration and dispensing of sacraments which are established for the sanctification of the faithful, or finally by certain other ceremonies which ought to be done agreeably and in orderly manner for the adornment of the sacrifice or of the sacraments. Hence even the Protestants do not seem altogether to deny this power, although they interpret it in a way that they confess it rather in name than in reality. But this should be examined in a tractate on the Sacraments.

2. Again, the power of jurisdiction is distinguished into the jurisdiction of the internal forum of penance and of the external forum of the Church. The first is what proximately establishes priests as superiors and judges in a certain divine and secret forum which is carried out in the sacrament of penance. And although on this matter too there is great contention by the heretics of this time against the Catholic Church, we pass it over here because neither does King James touch on it nor does it have regard to exterior ecclesiastical governance. Therefore, having omitted these powers, our talk is about the power of external jurisdiction given for governing the Church insofar as the Church is a certain spiritual republic and mystical body of Christ, which we call spiritual so as to distinguish it from the temporal. Hence, according to our intention, to ask whether there is this jurisdiction and to ask whether it is distinct from the temporal is the same thing.

3. In this question, then, there was the heresy of Marsilius of Padua who almost 500 years ago said, among other heresies, that Christ had given no jurisdiction to his Church or to bishops or to the Roman Pontiff either over laymen or over clerics, either for prescribing or obligating or for compelling or punishing; but that he had only given to priests a power of ministering the sacraments and preaching the word of God, and had left them in everything else subject to the disposition and jurisdiction of temporal princes. Thus do several authors refer to this error but Albert Pigghi does it more distinctly than the rest, book 5 De Ecclesiast. Hierarch. And it seems that on this error Henry VIII, king of England, based himself for raising schism against the Roman Church. For, so that he might deny obedience to the Pontiff, he also as a result denied that he had a superior on earth in either temporal or spiritual matters; and so he asserted that in his kingdom he had all the supreme power which could respectively be in the Church. And he seems to have thought the same about any temporal Christian king whatever, because he could not find a greater reason or title for such a power in himself than in other supreme kings; and King James plainly and often affirms it or supposes it in his Preface to Christian Princes.

From this fact it is manifestly proved that they do not recognize in the Church any power of jurisdiction beside that which is in temporal kings or which flows from them, because they can claim no other title for usurping it. Hence, just as we said above that royal power had flowed from the people to the kings, so English histories report that King Henry arrogated this power to himself from the consent of the kingdom in Parliament, and the same in a similar session was declared for Edward his immediate successor, and afterward it was renewed for Elizabeth. Therefore here is a sign that they think about this power not otherwise than about a political one. The same is also shown by King James, since he professes to have it by hereditary right and title of carnal succession. Nor was Calvin stranger to this error or Luther, for although Calvin did not approve of the primacy of Henry he is nevertheless compelled on another principle to deny a spiritual power of this sort. For he along with Luther and others make Christians equal in the priesthood and take wholly away the distinction of clergy from lay people, and thus posit no special power in the Church for governing it, beside that which is in the political magistrate or which exists by the nature of the thing in some community for preserving right order.

4. The bases for this error are diverse. For those last referred to could have a basis in that they believed that there is no true and proper sacrifice in the Church, and consequently no true and proper priesthood, but only a spiritual and metaphorical one which is common to all Christians, about which it is said 1 Peter 2.5: "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." And later, 2.9: "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood." But Marsilius, though he did not deny the priesthood and did distinguish cleric or priests from the people, yet he denied there was an hierarchical order in the clergy, and said that all priests were equal to bishops and bishops to the Pope; hence he inferred that they did not have subjection or preferment among themselves or with respect to the people, but he said that all were subject to the political magistrate. And he adduced that verse of Luke 22.25-26: "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them...but ye shall not be so." He thought that by these words all dominion or jurisdiction was prohibited to clerics. And he induced other testimonies of Scripture which take clerics away from secular cares, as is that one: "No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life," 2 Timothy 2.4, and: "If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church," 1 Corinthians 6.4. But about the kings of England it is not clear to me on what other basis they rest for support unless, by twisting the Scriptures to other senses, they deny that a spiritual power has been founded on them and exaggerate what the Scriptures prescribe to all Christians, that they be subject to princes and temporal magistrates. Hence in this respect they make the Church of Christ equivalent to a synagogue or a faithful republic which could exist in the law of nature, wherein they think there was no other governing power beside that which was given to kings in the Old Law or that, under another state, could exist by the nature of the thing in such a community ordered to the cult and religion of the true God, and that was transferred from the people to the princes or (which is exactly the same) by consent of the people to the first born, as if it were one and the same connatural power.

5. Nevertheless the Catholic truth is that in the Church there has been given a spiritual power of true and proper jurisdiction by which the Christian people could be conveniently governed in order to the salvation of the soul. This assertion is de fide certain, as Catholics teach by common consent and as is proved first in very open testimonies of Scripture. Chief are these two: “Whatever you bind...” Matthew 16, and “Feed my sheep,” Matthew 21, which will be expressly dealt with below. Similar also is that verse of Matthew 18.17: “If he neglect to hear the Church let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican,” and it adds, v.18: “Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.” For to bind and to loose are manifestly acts of jurisdiction, and there is there not merely talk of jurisdiction in the internal forum, or in the secrecy of penance, as is per se evident, nor of temporal jurisdiction. For excommunication, about which the talk is there, is an ecclesiastical censure, which even King James himself sometimes calls spiritual in his preface. There are also the express words of Paul, 2 Corinthians 13.10: “Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.” Now the power was a spiritual one, for there was no temporal or royal power in Paul. Again, there pertains to the same power what the same Apostle says, Acts 20.28: “Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops, to feed [alt. rule] the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood,” where he openly says that power has been given by God to bishops for ruling the Church; but ruling and government are the same thing. Hence, unless great force comes into being through words, the Apostle is speaking of the power of jurisdiction; but, in order to signify that this ruling is spiritual, he adds about the Church “which he hath purchased with his own blood,” for Christ did not acquire with his blood a temporal kingdom but a spiritual.

Hence this truth can be confirmed by a very good reason along with testimonies of Scripture at the same time. For we have from the Scriptures that an eternal kingdom was promised by the Father to Christ the God man according to that verse of Psalms 131.11: “Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne.” And the Angel added, Luke 1.32-33: “The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.” But this reign of Christ was promised not only in heaven but also to be handed over and begun on earth, as is clear from Daniel 7.13: “I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven.” And below, v.14: “And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.” But that the son of man is Christ, who is often called son of man in the Gospel, everyone understands, and that his kingdom is to be begun on earth after the other empires and is to last for ever, is openly predicted both in that place and also in Daniel and the verse of Ezekiel is in accord, 37.22: “And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall no more be two nations.” These words are clearly understood of Christ and his Church, as is clear from the whole context up to the end of the chapter. But this reign of Christ is not corporal or temporal but spiritual and eternal, as we said in chapter 4, and as is collected from the words of the same Ezekiel, v.23: “But I will save them out of all their dwellingplaces, wherein they have sinned, etc.” and from Jeremiah 23.5-6: “Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his name whereby he shall be called, the Lord our Righteousness.” And this very thing is confirmed by the other testimonies of Scripture and the Fathers adduced in the cited chapter 4.

From this we further conclude that this reign of Christ is nothing but his Church in which he himself spiritually reigns. As Gregory said, bk.1, on the last words in 1 Kings. And Augustine in tractat. 15, on John: “What is his kingdom save those who believe in him? To whom he says, you are not of this world.” And later: “Hence he does not say, my kingdom is not in this world, but, it is not of this world; nor does he say, it is not here, but, it is not from here. For it is here unto the end of the age.” Therefore as it is a spiritual kingdom, so it should be ruled by a spiritual power. But this perpetual kingdom is not only in heaven but also on earth, as long as the world will last, as I referred to from Augustine, and as I also showed in the first book when treating of the Church; therefore too the spiritual power for ruling it has been so conceded by Christ to the Church that it should endure perpetually in it, because the kingdom could not be preserved without a governing power proportioned to it. Hence rightly did Epiphanius say, Haeres. 29: “The throne of David and the royal seat is the priesthood in the Holy Church, which royal dignity along with a pontificate together conjoined to it has been lavished by Christ on his Holy Church, because the throne of David that is not to fail through eternity has been transferred to him.” And later: “The royal dignity has been transferred from the carnal house of Judah and Israel, but the throne sits firmly in the Holy Church of God through eternity.”

6. Now to this reason King James tacitly responds in Preface pp.5,7, in these words: “Nor, if earthly kingdoms ought to be ruled by earthly monarchs, does it thereby follow that the Church should be governed by an earthly monarch.” But as to why it does not follow he indicates two reasons. The first is: “Because neither is there any individual director or monarch of the whole globe or of all kingdoms.” The second is: “Because Christ is monarch of his Church, and he who fulfills the vicariate of Christ is the Holy Spirit whom he promised he would send;” and here he adds the verse: “The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them...but ye shall not be so.” But in these words the king touches on another question about monarchy, to be treated of below, which is diverse from the present one. For now we are only treating of the supreme spiritual power necessary for ruling the kingdom of Christ, which is the Church, and we say that this must be in the Church itself as it dwells on the earth, whether it be in one person or in several or in a congregation composed of them, which we will see afterward. But the words of the king tend toward the result that there is no power necessary in this kingdom of Christ which is to bear the vicariate of Christ, as is most clear from the latter reason which he adduces about the office of the Holy Spirit, and therefore here they cannot be passed over.

7. Therefore about the first equivalence of the spiritual kingdom of the Church with an earthly kingdom, if the comparison is done with proportion, it is no less necessary that there be in the Church some supreme earthly governor, that is, a visible and mortal man, than in an earthly kingdom. Because the universal Church of Christ is no less one Church, or one kingdom in its order, than is any temporal kingdom in its order. And although the Church as to its end and its chief means is a spiritual kingdom, nevertheless as to the persons who make it up it is also an earthly one, and the actions in which it must be ruled, or directed, or corrected, are also earthly, that is, external and visible; and by the mediation of these are to preserved its peace, unity, religion, and all the rest which are necessary for the convenient governing of this body; therefore no less in this kingdom is a supreme power necessary which, in a human and perceptible manner, is to direct and govern its members and their actions in order to eternal salvation. And therefore rightly did Boniface II, Epist.

1, and Gregory, bk.4, Epistolar, ch. 96, elsewhere epistle 52, indict. 3, say when speaking about the Church: "For this purpose the provision of divine providence has established that the diverse grades and orders are distinct, so that one interweaving of concord might come to be from the diversity, and so that the administration of the individual offices might be rightly carried out. For neither could a universal whole subsist by other reason if this sort of large order of difference was not preserving it." But because in this diversity and order of grades it is not possible that there be process to infinity nor that there be division among them, therefore it is necessary that it be united or terminated in some supreme head. Hence Gregory subjoins: "Then will each office be fulfilled in a wholesome way when there is one in first place to whom recourse can be had." But just as this is certainly true in each spiritual or ecclesiastical congregation, and in each bisopric or particular church, or province, so by much greater reason is it necessary in the universal Church. And hence Pope Anastasius said in his Apology against the emperor Anastasius: "If all power is from God, then that power is more so which is set above divine things;" which power we now call the spiritual power. Therefore the inference, which the king condemns, is very good, that if the earthly kingdom should be ruled by an earthly monarch, then it was necessary that the Church too have its monarch or supreme governor on earth.

8. Now the first reason of the king does not only fail to defeat this but rather gives proof of it, if another diversity between the Church and the whole globe as regard earthly kingdoms is considered. For in the entire globe of the earth there is not one republic only, or one temporal kingdom, but several and various which do not compose among themselves a single political body; and therefore there ought not to be for the whole universe one monarch, nor (speaking more generally) one commander, nor one supreme political or human tribunal. Nay there could not morally or humanly be one. But by contrast the Church of Christ is one perfect, mystical body and one (so to say) simple kingdom diffused throughout the whole globe, as was said in the first book dealing with the Catholic Church. And for that reason one supreme power was necessary which would be over the whole of it. Wherefore, if we suppose that the governance of the Church is a monarchy, as will be shown below, a comparison of it with the temporal kingdom is not to be made with the whole globe but with the individual kingdoms of the globe: just as each temporal kingdom is ruled by one earthly monarch, earthly, I say, as to person, power, matter, and proximate end, so the whole kingdom of the Church should be ruled by one monarch, earthly indeed as to person but heavenly as to power, matter, and proximate and principal end. For by this reason Christ's Church Militant, although it could be said to be an earthly kingdom because it consists of mortal men living on earth, nevertheless it is in Scripture often called the kingdom of heaven, and Christ said of it: "My kingdom is not from here." Augustine notes there that he did not say, "it is not here," because in truth it is in this world, but, "it is not from here," because, although it is in the world, it is not of the world but has come from heaven, and for that reason such a kingdom needs a governor earthly and heavenly at the same time.

9. As to the second reason, we concede indeed that Christ the Lord is the first monarch of his Church. And for that reason, as long as he lived on earth and conversed with his apostles, he governed it per se himself as supreme King and Pontiff of it, and he chose apostles, consecrated priests and bishops and sent them to preach, and joined disciples to them, and provided other necessities as opportune for that time and state of the Church. But because now he is absent from the Church Militant as to his visible presence, therefore he cannot as before discharge per se and proximately the office of pastor of the Church, and for that reason, to stand in for his visible presence, he made provision of a Vicar or commander to whom he committed the governance of his Church. This fact, indeed, the king of England does not deny, but (which is remarkable) says that this Vicar is the Holy Spirit, because Christ promised that he would leave not Peter, he says, for directing and teaching the apostles but the Holy Spirit. But this is said not properly or not truly or not relevant to the thing and cause we are treating of. I know, indeed, that Tertullian sometimes called the Holy Spirit the Vicar of Christ, bk. De Praescript. Haereticorum, chs. 13, 28, but with an improper and metaphorical locution only, because Christ said John 14.16: “And he will give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever.” And later, v.25-26: “These things have I spoken unto you being yet present with you. But the comforter, which is the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to remembrance, whatever I have said unto you.” In these words Christ promised the Holy Spirit who confers on the faithful internal virtue, illumination, and remembrance by his grace.

10. But this operation cannot be attributed to the Holy Spirit as to the Vicar of another, if the propriety of the word is kept to. Because a Vicar properly is the minister of some other who is principal author and whose office he carries and whose power committed to him he uses; but the Spirit teaches within and inspires as principal and proximate cause of grace and internal virtue, in the way Paul said, 1 Corinthians 3.7: “So then neither is he who planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.” The Holy Spirit, therefore, cannot with propriety of speech be called the Vicar of Christ. But Tertullian spoke thus in a broad and improper sense, because the Holy Spirit had been sent to console the apostles in the place of Christ, and to teach and explain many thing which, from the brevity and opportunity of time, Christ himself could not or ought not to have passed on. Hence he said: “And I will pray the Father, and he will give you another comforter,” as if he were to say, you had a comforter in me, and although I am departing you will not lack for it, for the Father will given another who will console you in place of me. And in the same sense (as Euthymius indicates) he said of the Holy Spirit: “whom the Father will send in my name,” that is, that he may perfect what I have begun by bringing to remembrance and declaring to you what I have taught and by adding things that you could not bear now and by giving testimony about me. Therefore by this reason the Holy Spirit could be said in a certain way to bear the office of Christ, or to fulfill it, not by vicarious or ministerial virtue, which belongs to an inferior, but as principal cause perfecting what Christ could not finish off during the brief time of his life. Hence whoever succeeds another in office in this way, or perfects what the other began and could not perfect, can be said to supply his office vicariously, even if he is not properly his vicar and does not operate through an inferior and participated power dependent on another.

But if the king of England understood that the Holy Spirit fulfilled the office of Christ only in this way, he thinks unjustly that that operation of the Holy Spirit suffices for an external governance of the Church accommodated to men, because that virtue and operation of the Holy Spirit is invisible and purely spiritual and internal; but men need also an external and visible ruler. Next, if that invisible inflowing of the Holy Spirit were sufficient for the visible Church, not only the Holy Spirit but also Christ himself, absent and now invisible to us, could be said to be the Vicar for himself as present and visible, because he also promised about himself, Matthew 28.20: “and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,” namely by invisible protection and help, as I explained above. Besides, if Christ, because he is principal monarch of the Church, did not confer on it a visible ruler who should govern it in his place, why does the king of England in his Preface p.134, call himself and other kings Vicars of God? For in his opinion, whereby he believes himself head of the Church in his kingdom even in spiritual things, it is necessary that when he calls himself Vicar of God he understand it not only as regard the temporal kingdom but also as regard the British Church; therefore he is in conflict with himself when he says that Christ left no Vicar of himself beside the Holy Spirit.

11. Lastly it is false that Christ did not promise a Peter who was to direct and teach others; for he not only promised but even gave, for by promising him the keys he promised him both the key of governance and the key of wisdom. Again, when he said to him, Luke 22.32: "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not," he immediately added: "and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." And finally when he said to him, John 21.16: "Feed my sheep," he manifestly comprehended both doctrine and governance or direction, as we will see below. And beyond these, in many other places Christ indicated that there would be in the Church a spiritual command, and some minister or ministers to bear his office as proper and visible vicars. So do the Fathers understand that verse of Luke 10.16: "He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me," Ambrose on that place, and Hilary can.27 on Matthew. Chrysostom collects the same, bk.2 De Sacerdotibus, from Luke 12. For when Christ, in the parable of the householder who wishes to be waited for and obeyed with much vigilance and care by his subjects, had explained how the Lord was to be served, Peter asked him, v.41: "Lord, speakest thou this parable unto us, or even unto all?" And the Lord answered, v.42: "Who then is that faithful and wise steward?" indicating that the apostles had been specially called, so that they might be as chief servants to whom the care of others was entrusted, and that Peter chiefly, who was to be set up over the whole family of Christ, was obligated not only to common vigilance but also to special fidelity and prudence. This care and obligation Peter calls to mind when he says, I Peter 5.2: "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly according to God." And the words of Paul agree, I Corinthians 4.1-2: "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful, etc." and in 3.5 he had said: "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed," that is his Vicars, and ruling the Church in his place, and in Romans 13 he called a temporal prince or judge a minister of God.

For the fact that the apostolic ministry was also with power and jurisdiction for passing judgment the same Paul sufficiently declares at the end of the said chapter 4, saying, v.21: "What will ye? Shall I come unto with a rod?" and 5.3: "For I verily, as absent in the body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved, etc." And expressly Hebrews 13.17: "Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves, etc." And I Timothy 5.17: "Let the priests that rule well be counted worthy of double honor." And Titus 1.7: "For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God, etc." and 2.15: "These things speak, and exhort, and rebuke with all authority." Finally the places of Paul have regard to this where he describes the unity of the body of the Church and the various members of it, as Romans 12, where he says, among other things, v.8: "he that ruleth, with diligence." And 2 Corinthians 12 and Ephesians 4.11-12, where he puts: "some apostles; and some prophets; and some evangelists; and some pastors; and teachers; ... for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." This mode of government he says is to endure "to the end of the age," that is, to the end of the world, as was explained above (Matt. 28.20).

12. From this it is manifestly clear that this spiritual power is altogether distinct from the temporal. First, indeed, and principally in end; for the temporal power is ordered to preserving the peace and moral decency of the republic, according to the verse of Paul, I Timothy 2.2: "that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." But the ecclesiastical power is ordered to attaining eternal salvation, according to the verse of Paul, Ephesians 4.12: "For the perfecting of the saints, etc." and that of Hebrews 13.17: "Obey them that have the rule over you...for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account.” Another difference is in origin, because the temporal power draws its origin from God the author of nature by the medium of natural reason; and considered per se in this way it is of natural right; but insofar as it is in a king, or a senate, it is of human right; but the ecclesiastical power is of divine positive right, and by special promise and concession of Christ: “I will give unto thee the keys.” “Feed my sheep.” “As the Father hath sent me, so I send you.” For just as the end toward which this power is ordered, and the acts and means which subserve it, are above nature and human strength, so also the power itself must have an origin above the right of nature or human right. And for that reason, finally, these powers differ as material and spiritual, natural and supernatural, earthly and heavenly. And thus is this distinction explained by Pope Gelasius on the bond of anathema, and Pope Nicholas I in his letter to the emperor Michael, saying toward the end: “The Mediator of God and men, Jesus Christ, did thus distinguish the offices of each power in proper acts and different dignities, wishing them to be borne upward on the proper medicine of humility, not plunged down again with human pride into hell, so that Christian emperors need Pontiffs for eternal life, and Pontiffs use imperial laws only for the course of temporal affairs, since spiritual action is distant from the incursions of the body.” Gregory VIII touches on the same differences, bk.4, Epistolar., ep.2, to Hedimanus, and confirms them from Pope Anastasius in his letter to the emperor Anastasius, from Gregory in his Pastoral. Symmachus teaches the same in his Apology against the same emperor Anastasius, saying: “Let us compare the honor of the emperor with the honor of the Pontiff, between whom the distance is as great as that the former bears the care of human things and the latter of divine.” And later: “You administer human things, he dispenses to you divine things.” Symmachus says the same in the Roman Synod, and it is referred to at large in ch. ‘Bene quidem’, 96 distin., and we will refer to many other places in the two following chapters.

13. Nor are there obstacles to this Catholic doctrine in the foundations of the other errors, that are based in other heresies, which we cannot refute expressly in this place. In the basis of the first error, therefore, it is heretical to say that there is in the Church no true and proper sacrifice, or no true and proper priesthood. And it is similarly heretical to say that all the faithful are equal in the priesthood, which things have all been disputed and proved by us elsewhere. Marsilius of Padua also erred in the faith when he supposed that all clerics or priests or bishops are equal by divine right. For as to the power of order from the institution of Christ, a bishop surpasses a priest, and a priest a deacon, etc., as was shown at large in the tractate about the sacrament of order. But in power of jurisdiction there is from the apostles a most certain difference, which can easily be collected from the testimonies adduced, and will be shown at large in what follows as regard Peter and his successors. Besides, as to what he said, that Christ prohibited Pontiffs to rule temporally, in the first place it is altogether false and erroneous, as we will show in chapter 8. Next, as to that which we are now dealing with, it is of no importance; because even if it be admitted, all that can be inferred from it is that Pontiffs and bishops do not as such, through the power that they have, rule temporally but spiritually, which we altogether contend for when we say that their power is not temporal but spiritual.

And this is what is at most proved by that testimony: “The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them...but ye shall not be so” (which also the king of England has not omitted), for even in that sense Christ did not prohibit his apostles to rule, but only to rule as the kings of the Gentiles do, that is, temporally; but it was necessary that at least those rule spiritually who have supreme power in that order. Unless we wish to say that even the Supreme Pontiff does not so properly rule in a spiritual way as rule vicariously, because he is not set over the Church as supreme king but as Vicar of the Supreme King. But the truth is that the Lord has not prohibited ruling, but governing by dominating over people, preferring oneself to them by exalting oneself, and by treating subjects inhumanly, as Gregory said in Pastoral. 2 pars., ch.6, when he expounds the words of Christ through those of Ecclesiasticus 32, “They established him leader,” otherwise “they placed you as ruler, do not exalt yourself, be among them as one of them;” and those of 1 Peter 5.3: “Neither as being lords over God’s heritage [alt. clerics], but being ensamples to the flock;” and those of Paul 2 Corinthians 1.24: “Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy.” And Gregory has similar things in Moralia 36. ch. 19, elsewhere 22, Registri bk.1, and Bernard, bk.2 De Considerat., at the beginning. And so through these things a response is also made to the foundations which on this point the king of England touched on; but to the others which he objects against the primacy of the Pontiff, and against the true sense of the Scriptures by which he proves it, we must speak of them in what follows.

Chapter 7: That the power of ruling the Church in spiritual or ecclesiastical matters does not exist in temporal kings or princes is proved by authority.

Summary: 1. What the disposition is of the spiritual and temporal power in their order to their subject. Error of the Anglican sect about the subject of spiritual power. 2. First conclusion: to temporal kings, as such kings, no spiritual power belongs. 3. The assertion is proved from the Supreme Pontiffs. 4. The same assertion is confirmed from the emperors.

1. Besides the differences between the spiritual and temporal power delivered in the preceding chapter, there occurs another which, because its origin is also the chief basis for the Anglican schism, we have reserved to be examined in this chapter, although the conclusion is manifest from the principles laid down in the preceding chapter. Now the distinction consists in this, that the temporal and spiritual power do not per se have regard to the same persons, whom they ought to fit, but rather are separable in subject, which plainly supposes a distinction between them and points to it. But it is possible to err about this distinction in two ways that are extreme contraries. First, by asserting that these powers are not only distinct but also so repugnant that for them to be conjoined in the same person is contrary to divine right. And thus Marsilius of Padua seems to have erred, although he either confounds the spiritual power with the temporal, or denies that they can come together, not in any subject at the same time but only in priests. However, this error understood in this sense has no basis, and it will briefly be refuted in the following chapter since, for the present purpose, it has little relevance. The other way of erring, then, is proper to the Anglican sect, whose principle and basis is that the spiritual power is not separated from the temporal but is annexed to the scepter of the king. This is what Henry VIII wanted, whom his successors Edward and Elizabeth followed, and Sander reports it at large in his first three books about the Anglican schism, where he also describes various laws passed by the said princes for increase of this power in the kingdom.

Finally King James persists in this error, as is clear enough from his deeds, and as he often professes in his Preface, especially p.5 of the Preface, saying: “For I do not believe myself to be in any part inferior to the Pontiff.” And in the same sense he says on p.2 about temporal kings, “whom God has placed on his throne in the highest grade of dignity as his vicars and legates for exercising judgment.” And again p.10 to kings: “Whom God has commanded to be his chief vicars on earth for administering justice.” And in the same sense he says, p.14, that the controversy which he has with his Catholic subjects has its motive from nowhere else “than from the ambitious tyranny of Pontiffs which they have unjustly usurped to themselves over the temporal rights of kings against the authority of the Scriptures, against the mind of the Councils and of the ancient Fathers.” And finally he concludes in the same place that he has devoted his whole Apology to asserting this authority of kings (namely in this sense). But the basis for this error seems only to be that he does not recognize a distinction between spiritual and temporal power, and because he denies the primacy of Peter and his successors, about which we will speak in the following chapters.

2. But the Catholic truth is that temporal kings, as they are such or by reason of their supreme jurisdiction in the political principality, have no spiritual power over the Church. This assertion can be proved by the authority of Scripture in two ways. First, because in the New Testament this power is promised and given by Christ to those persons who were not temporal kings. Second, because it is not found given to temporal kings; and from both heads, taken both singly and together, the conclusion is rightly drawn that it does not exist in temporal kings, because it cannot exist except in those to whom it was given by Christ and in their legitimate successors. The first part is sufficiently proved by the testimonies adduced in the preceding chapter, by which it is clear that Christ singularly promised and gave this power to Peter. Next it is also shown from elsewhere, that he gave it to the apostles, John 20, to whom and to their successors he promised it under the name of the Church, Matthew 18. Other testimonies also show that Paul often used this power, and that it is found in the bishops and overseers of the Church, and that it is exercised by them; but none of them was a king or administered temporal jurisdiction. From here also a very efficacious argument can be taken, for before there were temporal kings in the Church there were pastors in the Church with true spiritual jurisdiction for ruling the Church, as is manifestly collected from the use of the same power and from the testimonies mentioned; therefore this power does not of itself depend on the royal power, nor is it from the force of it conjoined with it; for at that time temporal kings did not have it, nor had they received it from those who were legitimately using it.

And hence is it also openly proved from the Scriptures (which we also touched on in the previous chapter) that this power is of a different origin than the temporal; for the temporal power, as it is found in a king or some similar person, comes either proximately or by succession or some other human title from the multitude of the people, who conferred their authority on the prince; but the former power did not have that origin. For in the primitive Church the apostles had it, not from the Christian people, but from Christ; and they communicated it by their authority to other bishops, and independently of the people, as is clear from Paul Titus 1.5: "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain priests in every city, as I had appointed thee." And 1 Timothy 4.14: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee." And in chapter 5 he showed that it was with Episcopal jurisdiction, v.19: "Against a priest receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses, etc." Since therefore it is clear from the preceding chapters that all royal power has emanated proximately from the people, the consequence certainly is that there is by force of royal power no spiritual jurisdiction or power in a king.

Finally, a second proof from the negative authority, as they say, of Scripture is in the present case efficacious on the same principle and basis. For, as St. Thomas rightly said, Ia, q.101, a.1: "in things which are above nature belief is on authority alone;" and "things which come from the sole will of God above all that is due to the creature cannot be known to us save insofar as they are divinely revealed;" but the spiritual power of the Church is a gift above nature, and it depends on divine will and institution, both as it is and as it is in such and such a person, or by such and such a mode or succession. But there is no divine revelation or authority to show that Christ gave this power to temporal kings; therefore, as St. Thomas said above, "where authority is lacking we ought to follow the condition of nature." This condition of nature in the present case indeed is that a temporal king only has that power which men led by natural reason could confer on him, and thence that he has a naked and precise temporal power. But the fact that divine authority does not provide testimony for a greater power in kings is manifest. For in the first place the adversaries do not allow of a word of God outside the Scriptures, and even were they to allow of it, there is no sacred or apostolic tradition which points to such power in kings but rather to the contrary, as will be clear from the discourse of this chapter and of the whole present book. But we will prove it sufficiently from Scripture by demanding testimony where Christ conferred this power on kings, which without doubt cannot be shown, neither in the Old nor in the New Testament. For the testimonies which are wont to adduced, in which we are commanded to obey kings, are frivolous, since they contain nothing about a new power conceded to kings by Christ, but only advise us of a natural obligation whereby we are held to obey kings when they give command in things which pertain to their jurisdiction, as we will declare at large below when replying to objections. But here can be weighed the fact that Paul, wherever he describes the ecclesiastical hierarchy and distinguishes its bases, structure, ministries, and governments, does indeed number apostles, prophets, pastors, and doctors, but makes no mention of kings and emperors; not because they were not to be in the Church in the future, but because as regard what regards the hierarchical order of the Church they do not constitute a proper grade, but are reckoned along with the lay populace and not among those who are placed for the edifying of the body of Christ in spiritual things to the perfecting of the saints; but they are only deemed to be among those who are to be edified and perfected. Finally can be expounded what Christ the Lord, when questioned whether it was lawful to give tribute to Caesar, accurately responded: "Give to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's," indicating certainly that to Caesar, that is the emperor or king, only that was to be rendered which was owed by force of the power of king or Caesar. Therefore Christ, as Salmeron gravely noted, just as he did not take away the royal power, so neither did he increase it, nor did he commit to it the particular right of feeding his sheep. Chrysostom also adds, hom. 71 on Matthew, "When you hear that to Caesar are to be rendered the things that are his, do not doubt that those things only are said which do not offend piety and religion. For what opposes faith and virtue is the tribute and tax, not of Caesar, but of the devil." More clearly Ambrose says in epist. 14, elsewhere 33, to his sister Marcellina: "It is alleged that all things are licit to the emperor, that the universe is his. I reply, do not load yourself, emperor, so as to think that in things which are divine you have any imperial right; do not extol yourself, but if you wish to rule divinely, be subject to God, as it is written: What are God's to God, what are Caesar's to Caesar. To the emperor belong palaces, to the priest the Church; the right of the public walls, not of the sacred walls, has been committed to you."

3. Third, this assertion is proved by the testimonies of the Pontiffs and of canon right, which though they seem to be given in their own cause do also have in them the greatest authority, both because of the key of wisdom which they have for teaching the Church, as we made known in book 1, and also because they show the certain and unchanged tradition of the Church. For not only the moderns but also the most ancient Pontiffs, saints, and martyrs have provided testimony for this truth. And first we could adduce all those things that they wrote about the primacy of the Roman Church; but these are to be mentioned later, and so now we only adduce those writings in which they compare both powers between themselves or in which they demand obedience also from emperors and kings, which they could not do if in temporal kings there was supreme spiritual power. Of this sort is that of Pope Anastasius II to the emperor Anastasius: "But for love of your empire and for the beatitude which the kingdom might acquire, we preach, for our apostolic office, that, as is fitting and as the Holy Spirit dictates, obedience be given to our admonishments." And later: "Let not your piety spurn me when I rather often suggest these things, having before your eyes the Lord's words in the Gospel: He who hears you hears me, and he who spurns you spurns me; but he who spurns me spurns him who sent me." And Pope Gelasius, epist. 10, to the same Anastasius teaches very constantly that the same power befits himself and not the emperor, where he has these words among others: “August Emperor, there are two things by which this world here is principally ruled, the sacred authority of Pontiffs and the royal power, etc.” And Pope Symmachus says to the same emperor: “If you are a Christian prince, you ought to hear in patience the voice of any apostolic superior.” And later: “Let us compare the honor of the emperor with the honor of the Pontiff, etc.” And later: “If all power is from God, that power is more so which is set over divine things; defer to God in us and we will defer to God in you.” Here he openly denies that the spiritual power is in the emperor but in the Pontiff; and afterwards he adds: “All Catholic princes, either when they have taken up the government of the empire, or when they have acknowledged new superiors set up in the Apostolic See, have immediately written to it to make known that they are its partners.” Symmachus wrote this 1100 years ago and we see it preserved up to our times.

Beside, this is confirmed by the definition of the same Pope Symmachus in the 3rd Roman Council: “It is not licit for laymen, even religious, or for the powerful in any city, to decree anything in any way about ecclesiastical faculties, the care of disposing which has indisputably been committed by God to clerics alone.” Also many things to confirm this truth are brought together by Gratian, 96 distinct. And in particular it is largely confirmed by Pope Nicholas in his letter to the emperor Michael, but among many other things he says: “Now that we have come to the truth (that is the truth of the Gospel), neither has the emperor seized upon the rights of the pontificate, nor has the Pontiff usurped the imperial name, since the same mediator of God and man, the man Christ Jesus, to proper acts and distinct dignities has thus divided the offices of each power, so that both may Christian emperors have need of Pontiffs for eternal life and Pontiffs may use imperial laws for the course of merely temporal things.” The same is largely handed down by Gregory VII in his letter to Herimann, bishop of Metz, bk.4, ep.1, and in another to the same, bk.8, ep.21, where by words and deeds from other emperors he confirms the same truth. Again, Innocent III, ch. ‘Solitae,’ says that the emperor in temporal matters and the Pontiff in spiritual matters has the preeminence. And Boniface VIII, in extravag. unic., ‘De Maiorit. et obedien.,’ says that in the Church there is both a spiritual sword to be wielded by the hand of the priest, and a temporal sword to be used by the hand of laymen for the Church and at the behest and sufferance of the priest. Which is tacitly confirmed by Clement V, in extravag., ‘Meruit,’ de privileg., although he declares, by the Extravagant of Boniface, that the king or kingdom of Gaul is not more subject to the Apostolic See than it was before. Finally, this is confirmed by what Gratian, distin.63, ch.1, reports from Pope Adrian: “So that lay princes or potentates not intervene in ecclesiastical elections, because in ecclesiastical things they have no power.” It is also contained in the 4th Council of Constantinople, elsewhere synod 8, ch.22, where also ch.12 not only denies to temporal princes power of creating bishops, but also says that he is to be deposed who has been installed by their tyranny. Again, in synod 7, ch.3, is declared void the election of a bishop made by a temporal prince, referred to by Gratian on the cited distin.63, ch. ‘Omnis.’ Thus too did Innocent III say in ch. ‘Ecclesiae,’ De Constitut.: “Over churches or ecclesiastical persons no faculty to laymen has been afforded; on them rests necessity to obey, not authority to command.” Similar things are contained in ch. ‘Tua,’ 1, De Decimis. These are taken from the 4th Council under Symmachus III. And many other canon rights can be adduced wherein the exemption of ecclesiastical causes from the power of laymen is prescribed; for in them the supposition is made that in temporal magistrates there is no spiritual power; but we reserve all those things for the book on ecclesiastical immunity (book 4).

To these testimonies can be adjoined the opinions of other Fathers, who although they were not Pontiffs, were yet bishops, archbishops, and patriarchs, or holy doctors of the Church, and in the first centuries of the Church. Among these stands out Chrysostom, homil. 4 & 5 De verbis Isaiae, who says among many other things: "Although the royal throne seems a thing to be admired, yet to it is allotted the administration of earthly affairs, nor beyond this power does it have any additional authority." And hom. 88 on Matthew, he says to a deacon: "You have greater power than he (that is, than a secular prince)," namely in ecclesiastical administration. Many things the same in bk. 3 De Sacerdotio. And Cyril of Jerusalem: "Surely," he says, "the Church has the lamb and the lion feeding together, as we see up to the present day that worldly princes are ruled and instructed by ecclesiastics?" Where he alludes to Isaiah 11.6: "The wolf shall also dwell [alt. feed] with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together," where under the word 'feed' he includes the two of 'ruled' and 'instructed'. Cyril of Alexandria too in epist.31 to John, and the synod of Antioch, and it is referred to in the synod of Ephesus, vol.5, ch.9, at the end, where he admonishes the bishops to listen to those who wish to accuse others of heresy lest there be tumult in outside tribunals, and he adds: "But it is much better and more just for ecclesiastical questions to be moved and formed in churches, and not among others outside to whom indeed the treatment of these sorts of causes is not at all fit."

Celebrated too is the opinion of Gregory Nazianzen, *orat.*17, to citizens struck with grave terror, where after he has given speech to his subjects, subjoins: "But what of you, princes and prefects? For to you now our speech turns." And later: "Will you bear me speaking freely in equitable spirit? For you also the law of Christ subjects to my command and throne; for we too bear command, I will also add a more excellent and more perfect command, unless however it is equity for the spirit to submit its fasces to the flesh, and for things heavenly to cede to things earthly." In which words I weigh especially the words "the law of Christ subjects." From which things it is clear according to the opinion of Nazianzen that this institution and distinction of powers is divine and of the law of Christ. Many like things too can be taken from the same, *orat.*1, which is an apology for his absence, and from *orat.*27, near the end. Very well too is Damascene, *orat.*1, De Imaginibus, near the end: "For neither," he says, "is it mark of pious kings to overturn ecclesiastical statutes." And later: "To make statutes and give decree about such things does not pertain to kings, etc." And *orat.*2, a little from the beginning: "Of kings," he says, "it is not the part to prescribe laws to the Church," which he confirms with the testimonies of Paul, 2 Corinthians 12 and Hebrews 13 above treated of. In Theodoret too, bk.4, Histor., ch.16, stands out the opinion of the priest Eulogius, who when he was warned by the prefect of the heretical emperor Valens: "Be in communion with the emperor," says Theodoret, "he ironically but very elegantly replied: Did he receive with the empire also the dignity of priest?" And when the prefect, perceiving the irony, was provoked to anger, he himself again responded that he had a Pastor whose will he followed. The same deed is narrated by Suidas at the entry 'Leontius of Tripoli Bishop of Lydia.' For when Constantius was presiding at a meeting of bishops and was giving many prescriptions, with others assenting, he himself kept quiet; and when he was asked by the emperor why he was silent replied: "I marvel how it happens that, deputed to other cares, you treat of different ones; you who preside over the military and the republic prescribe things to bishops which pertain only to bishops."

Ambrose in addition in the letter above mentioned to his sister Marcellina expressly denies that the emperor has in things which are divine any imperial right. And the same he largely and constantly teaches in orat. or address 1, against Auxentius, where among other things he says: "You also yourself do know that I am wont to defer to emperors, not to yield, and to offer myself freely, but without fear, to the punishments that are being prepared." And later: "I replied what was proper to a priest; what is proper to the emperor let the emperor do." And later about the Arians, who were seeking a church from the emperor, he said: "You see how much worse the Arians are than Jews: they asked whether he thought tribute should be paid to Caesar, these wish the right of the Church to be given to the emperor.” And later: “A good emperor is within the Church, not above the Church; for a good emperor seeks help of the Church not to check it. These things, as we humbly say, so we constantly expound.” Also in the acts of the Council of Aquileia when the heretic Palladius, fleeing the condemnation of the bishops, appealed to the laymen present, Ambrose thus responded: “Priests should judge laymen, not laymen priests.” And later: “And if he is detected in many impieties, we yet blush that it be seen that he who claims the priesthood to himself is condemned by laymen. And for this, since also in this very thing he is to be condemned who waits upon sentence of laymen, since priests should more judge of laymen, I pronounce him unworthy of the priesthood.”

Very well is this truth confirmed by Athanasius when he first refers to and commends the words of Hosius to Constantius in his epistle to those leading a solitary life: “Desist, I beg, and remember you are mortal: fear the day of judgment, keep yourself pure for that day, do not involve yourself in matters ecclesiastical; nor give command to us in this sphere, but rather learn them from us. To you God committed the empire, to us he has entrusted the things of the Church; and just as he who carps at your empire with evil eye contradicts the divine ordinance, so do you also take heed lest what things are of the Church you draw to yourself and become guilty of a great crime. Give (it is written) what things are Caesar’s to Caesar, and what things are God’s to God. Neither therefore is it holy for us on earth to hold empire, nor do you hold the power of censers and things sacred, Emperor.” And later thus of his own opinion Athanasius writes: “If this is the court of bishops, what in common with it has the emperor? But if on the contrary these things are established by the threats of Caesar, what need is there of men with the title of bishops? When from the founding of the age was it heard of? When did the court of the Church receive its authority from the emperor?” But he calls them bishops by title whom Constantius had created by his own authority, who as to title, so he says later, were bishops, but not in truth, which in marvelous way fits Anglican bishops. Finally, Augustine, ep. 48, 162, rebukes the Donatists, because in an ecclesiastical cause they had dared to appeal from the court of bishops to the emperor Constantine. “Neither has a Christian emperor,” he says, “dared so to take up their tumultuous and deceptive quarrels that he has judged of the court of bishops who sat at Rome.” And later: “How much he detested them in this thing you have heard.” And since Constantine, at last overcome by the importunity of the heretics, gave sentence, Augustine tacitly excuses him, saying: “He himself yielded to them so as to judge after the bishops of the cause, being about to seek afterward pardon from the holy prelates, while they however had not what more they might say.” And what Optatus Milevitanus relates about the same cause agrees, bk.1, contra Parmen., near the end: “Donatus,” he says, “believed there should be appeal from the bishops,” to which appeal the emperor Constantine thus responded: “O mad boldness of fury, they have interposed an appeal the way it is wont to be done in the causes of Gentiles.”

4. To these we can add the confessions or testimonies of the very emperors themselves. For the emperor Justinian in Authent. ‘Quomodo oportet episcopos, etc.’ says: “Greatest indeed of all are the gifts of God conferred by his supreme clemency, the priesthood and the empire: the former indeed ministering in things divine, but the latter presiding over things human or giving to them diligence, each proceeding from one and the same principle, they adorn human life.” The emperor Justinian therefore understood that the emperor did not have spiritual power in things divine. And the same was the opinion of Constantine the Great who refused judgment among the bishops at the Council of Nicea, recognizing that it did not in fact pertain to him, saying: “God has made you bishops, and to us you are judges given by God, and it is not agreeable that a man should judge Gods, but he alone of whom it is written: God stood in the synagogue of the Gods, and in the midst did he judge between the Gods.” The report is from Ruffinus, bk.1, Histor. Additae ad Eusebium, ch.2. Pope Adrian too in his letter to the emperor Michael, where also he refers to Theodosius in his letter to the synod of Ephesus writing: "It is not licit that he who is not of the order of the most holy bishops should be involved in ecclesiastical dealings." Sozomen also reports, bk.6, Histor., ch.7, that when certain bishops sent a legate to the emperor Valentinian, seeking power for convening in a Council for things of the faith, he himself replied: "To himself, who was one of the number of laymen, it was not licit to interpose himself in affairs of that kind;" which is also reported by Nicephorus, bk.11, ch.40. And of the same Valentinian Sozomen reports, bk.6, Histor., ch.21: "he was much affected toward God, to such extent that he would not intervene either to command anything to priests, or to initiate anything in the institutes of the Church which seemed to him better or worse; for although he was best emperor, to be sure, and well suited to handling things, yet he considered these matters far to exceed his judgment." And in the tripartite history, bk.7, ch.8, it is reported of the same Valentinian that when at Milan, after the death of the heretic Auxentius, he desired a Catholic bishop to be ordained, he said to the bishops: "You clearly know, being experts in the divine words, what sort of man should be Pontiff." And later: "Set up therefore such a one in the pontifical see to whom we too, who govern the empire, may sincerely submit our head, and whose admonishments, when we as men offend, we may necessarily receive as the medicines of one who cures." And when the bishops were asking that he himself decide as being pious and wise, he responded: "Such a choice rests on you." There is extant beside among the letters of Innocent I a certain letter of Honorius Augustus to Arcadius, wherein, writing of the cause of Chrysostom, he says: "Since, if anything be handled about cause of religion among prelates, the court ought to be Episcopal, for to them has regard the interpretation of divine things, to us the obedience of religion." And later: "By these things, finally, is it taught what the divine majesty about them has judged, etc." Lastly among the acts of the 8th General Synod a speech of the emperor Basil is reported by Surius, wherein very piously and faithfully he says to laymen: "What to say about you I have nothing further than that it is in no way licit for you to speak about ecclesiastical causes. For to investigate and question these things belongs to patriarchs, Pontiffs, and priests, who have been allotted the office of governance, who have the power of sanctifying, binding, and loosing, who have received the ecclesiastical and heavenly keys, not to us, who must be shepherded, etc," which words he continues largely and wisely and piously.

Chapter 8: The same truth is confirmed by reasons.

Summary: 1. First reason. 2. Second reason. Evasion of the Protestants. It is rejected. 3. Another evasion is excluded, and it is shown that the supreme head of the Church ought to be one. 4. Objection. Solution. Instance. Response. 5. A certain evasion is refuted. 6. Third reason. 7. Response of the heretics. 8. The same response is refuted most from the principles of the Protestants. 9. The same response is impugned by its disadvantages. First. 10. Second. 11. Evasion. It is rejected. 12. An evasion of this sort is repugnant to King James himself.

1. Now that the Catholic truth has been given sufficient basis in authority, it can by reason from the same principles easily be proved. Because the power of ruling can in no man be found without just title, from which principle we proved above that in the Pontiff there is no direct supreme temporal power; therefore from the same is the conviction plain that in a temporal king there is no power for spiritual governance. Hence, those who gladly hear the first must admit the second, unless they wish to speak as their will please without reason. Because much less is there found a just title for spiritual power in a temporal prince than of temporal power in a spiritual pastor. Now the assumed principle is in brief proved, because either the title is of natural right or of positive divine or human right; but all these are easily excluded by what has been said. For of natural right it cannot be, both because the power itself is not natural, as has already been proved, and also because no power of dominion or rule over others is in a particular person immediately of natural right but in the community; but this spiritual power is not in the human community as flowing from it naturally; nor insofar as it is in a particular person can it be proximately founded in the will of the same community, as conferring or transferring such power to another, because it is of by far a higher order; therefore it cannot be in a king of natural right. And by the same reason is conviction given that it is not of a human right which may in sole natural right be founded or take therefrom its origin, of which sort is the right of nations or civil right, because if natural right itself does not reach to such power, much less do the inferior rights which are founded on it.

But about divine right the thing is manifest from what has been said, that such right is to be proved by divine authority; but there is no authority, not divine merely but not a provable human one either, which shows that such right has been given to kings. Nay, although sometimes there can be persuasion given by reason that something is of divine right, it has to be collected sufficiently from revealed principles or at any rate it has to be shown, on the supposition of the institution of the Church, to be more in agreement with divine providence. But none of these in the present case has entrance, because there is no revealed principle from which such spiritual power may with likelihood be proved in kings, nay rather all revealed principles are repugnant to that dogma, as has been shown. And lastly all reason of convenient providence and ecclesiastical discipline shows that this heavenly power ought not to have been given to temporal kings, both because they are in temporal cares and secular business most involved, and also because they cannot be at leisure for sacred letters and divine science, which doctrine however is most necessary in ecclesiastical pastors. For which cause Paul said in his first letter to Timothy 4.13: "Give attendance to doctrine." There also he indicates another reason, that since this power is conferred for a spiritual end and for the salvation of souls, there is required in him on whom it is conferred the state of spiritual and perfect life, so that he can no less in word and example than in power be of service to his subjects. But temporal kings, speaking morally and by force of status, do not have this kind of life nor profess it, and therefore for this office they are not apt. Finally for this cause in the Church of Christ priesthood is not per se conjoint with kingdom; for kings have not been adopted so as to be constituted for men in things which relate to God; therefore by the same reason neither are they fit for spiritual governance. And hence consequently is excluded all title founded on canon right; both because canon right is derived from divine positive right, and also because the reasons stated proceed about it no less; and finally because it has been shown that canon right is to such presumption of kings altogether repugnant. And this discourse will become more evident in the following chapter, wherein how light the bases are which the king adduces for this right will be shown.

2. Another reason we can form in this way: that if spiritual power were in temporal kings there would in the Church be as many supreme spiritual princes as there are supreme temporal princes, which is both absurd and to the principles of the faith much repugnant. The consequence is manifest. First, because if the power of ruling the Church in spiritual things is intrinsically conjoint with the royal power, it is not then reduced to a higher principle below God nor is it on any mortal power dependent. Second, because there is not greater reason why one king should be subject in spiritual things to a second than the reverse. But perhaps the Protestant Anglicans not only concede this but also chiefly intend it. Nor do they deem it any inconvenience, because they do not admit several heads in spiritual things of the whole Church Universal, but of the several particular churches which are in diverse kingdoms as parts of the Church Universal, and so in similar way they can have several particular heads. But how absurd this is and monstrous in the Church of Christ Militant in this world he will easily understand who has considered from the Scriptures that the Church of Christ is one mystical body most perfectly instituted. For such a body requires one supreme power, which has efficacy over all its members, whether that power be in one true person or in one congregation (which we will see later), because without such a power there could not be a due union and conformity among the members of such a body.

3. They will say perhaps that it is enough that all the particular churches are in Christ the one head united. But against this is that the Church Militant, as it exists in the world, is one spiritual kingdom and mystical body perfectly one in its kind; therefore it requires even in this world one supreme tribunal, under which it may be governed, otherwise it could not be said to have unity, to the extent it is active in this world. Which is made plain from a similarity; for several kingdoms, which are warring under diverse kings and emperors, are not one kingdom or empire, because they do not have one supreme governance on earth, although they are all united in one King, God, who is also Supreme Temporal King of all kings. Hence from that opinion it openly follows that the several churches, which are in the world, do not more constitute a universal Church which is properly one, than several temporal kingdoms are one temporal republic, or one empire or one kingdom. And there is further declaration from another example accommodated thereto; for if in diverse provinces there are active two armies of the king of Spain, under two leaders supreme and in no way subordinated one to the other, they cannot be said to be one army, even if they are united in the same king remotely and from him receive the influx of an alternative reason. So must it therefore be said of diverse kingdoms, to the extent they are distinct churches, if they were warring under supreme ecclesiastical heads.

Added to this, finally, is that the unity of the Church without unity of faith and sacraments cannot be preserved; but this unity of faith in diverse kingdoms and provinces could not be preserved without a great miracle, if the parts of the Church and their heads on earth were altogether diverse among themselves and without subordination to some supreme power which all on earth are held to obey. For this is sufficiently shown by experience, for it is hence that have arisen all the schisms and divisions of churches. And the reason is clear, because if two temporal kings are supreme in spiritual things, and one should choose in his kingdom such and such a mode of religion and the other another, and one takes one faith by his judgment from Scripture, the other a contrary one, how could they be reduced to unity? And hence finally it is concluded that it cannot morally happen that two supreme churches, that is, churches not recognizing in spiritual things a superior on earth, be united even in Christ, because they are not united in Christ except by the true faith, and consequently by one and the same faith, because the true faith is not but one; but such churches could not in one faith be preserved, as has been shown; therefore neither could they retain unity in Christ.

4. You will say that the discourse proceeds in the same way about bishops or apostles, even if in them there is said to be supreme spiritual power. I reply that it is also true that they must be reduced to one supreme head, so that the unity of the Church can be preserved. But as for what this head is like we will see below; for by force of the stated discourse it only follows that there be one head, whether it be one bishop or one congregation of bishops. You will instance that the like can be said by Anglicans, that although the temporal king is also in his kingdom supreme in spiritual things, when comparison is made with any other individual person, nevertheless there could from all the Christian kings a council or meeting be convened, wherein there would be a spiritual power superior to the kings singly, by whose authority the unity of the Church could be preserved. To which response the king of England seems not foreign, for he seems to recognize the authority of a legitimate council, since indeed he reposes faith in the first four Councils, and complains that they are not now in use, and contends that the power for convening them belongs to kings and not to the Pontiff.

However this evasion not only fails to settle the thing but rather complicates it further. For in the first place if before the convoking of that council or meeting no king has superior power in spiritual things, who will have power to convene it? For if some oppose, no one will be able to compel them. But if also bishops are to be convoked, no king will be able to compel or to call bishops authentically not subject to him to convene; the thing will therefore be morally impossible and by the Author of the Church insufficiently supplied. Just as in political affairs, if for the disposition of things that are necessary for the good governance of the whole universe there were need to convene in assembly all kings and princes supreme in temporal things, certainly such a convocation would be impossible and foreign to every prudent providence. Next who would be president in such a meeting? For none would wish to yield to another, since he would be equally supreme, and especially if the business to be dealt with was matters of the faith; for if they differed in these things from each other, each would think he should believe rather his own mind than the opinions of others. Especially so if the rule of the king of England is true, whereby each proposes to all the kings his own knowledge for foundation of his faith.

Besides that, once this monstrous meeting or council is admitted, if it were above individual kings, no temporal king would now be supreme in spiritual things, in the way the king of England stubbornly contends. And therefore I deem that his mind is not to admit the power of any council as supreme but only to serve for some prudent consultation and more public examination of things. For that is why it is of councils themselves he constantly speaks, but he approves what he wishes and rejects what he does not wish, setting himself up as judge of them. Nay, in a certain place of his Preface, he discriminates by his own judgment among those to be convoked to a General Council, if one were now to be convened.

5. Finally, if kings supreme in temporal things have in their kingdoms also spiritual power supreme with respect to other kings, there is left no basis for asserting that a congregation of such kings has in the Church power over all of it and over all its princes. Because this does not follow from the sole nature of the thing nor can it be asserted. Just as in temporal affairs, although a congregation of kings might occur, it would not have supreme jurisdiction over them singly, unless each on his own accord were to renounce his right by first changing the governance and constituting from many monarchs one aristocracy; but that it be voluntary and by thought is rather a thing fictive than subsistent in reality. The same therefore will occur in the case of spiritual power if it be conjoint with the temporal from the nature of the thing. But if someone imagines that Christ, by his particular institution, wanted individual kings to be subject in spiritual matters to a congregation of themselves, he should point out some trace of this institution. And all the more especially so because everything we have said against the power of individual kings proceeds equally against any multitude or congregation of them. Fictitious therefore and plainly monstrous is this supreme spiritual power of temporal princes in whatever way it is imagined or thought up.

6. A third reason we can finally construct from the disadvantages; for in the first place from such a position it follows that Christian kings can, if they wish, exercise by themselves all the proper actions of priests and bishops, as are the offering of sacrifice to God or (if they do not admit this) ministering the sacraments, binding by excommunication and censures, or absolving therefrom or from sins, and other things which pertain to the public cult of God. But these are unheard of in the Church of Christ; nay, even in the Jews' synagogue it is said to the king, 2 Chronicles, 26.18: "It pertaineth not unto thee, Uzziah, to burn incense unto the Lord;" and because he ceased not he was struck with leprosy. Which, that it has no less place in a Christian king, is rightly taught by Chrysostom, hom.5, De verbis Isai. And besides if a temporal king, by the very fact that he is a king, can of himself legitimately carry out these actions, it will be licit also for a woman to perform the same, for she is capable of royal power and has along with it, according to the opinion of the Protestants, the same supreme spiritual power. But Paul, 1 Corinthians 14, does not permit women even to speak in the Church, much less to perform sacred actions, but orders them to be silent and subject.

7. But the adversaries could, by distinguishing among actions which require the power of order or merely of jurisdiction, reply that a king can perform of himself every act of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and that for this he has supreme power, and it is enough for having the primacy in spiritual things, even though other actions, which require the power of order, he is not able of himself to perform. But this in the first place is alien from the institution of Christ, for he wished the Church to be ruled by them whom he wished to be principal ministers of the word of God and of the sacraments, namely by bishops, in whom the power of order exists par excellence. Next it is sufficiently absurd that the supreme governor of the Church not be able to perform the chief acts ordered both to the divine cult and to the sanctification of the faithful. For in a civil republic the inferior magistrates can, in order to the purpose of their power, effect nothing which the king or emperor cannot discharge with higher power for the same purpose; therefore much more in the Christian republic, since the ecclesiastical power, whether of order or of jurisdiction, is ordered to a spiritual end and the sanctification of souls; those two powers ought so to be ordered among themselves and instituted that in the supreme prince of the Church they be joined together with all perfection and excellence, and therefore that nothing be done by inferiors which could not, to the extent it is by the force of the power, be perfected by the superior or the chief.

8. We can also convince the Protestants from their own principles. For among them the power of order is nothing but a deputing of ministers made by the king or temporal magistrate. For if perhaps in England (as they report) other ceremonies are used in constituting ministries, they are not reputed necessary, nor instituted by Christ, but have been on account of some exterior decoration thought out or preserved. Therefore without them the king could institute ministers for the same actions; therefore much more could he of himself perform all those actions. And again, queen Elizabeth by force of the same dignity could do the same, and by the same reason could she constitute women as ministers of her Church. For who would believe that a woman could be head of the Church and not a minister of it? But far from the Church of Christ be so absurd a government and hierarchy.

9. Nay rather if supreme spiritual jurisdiction follows temporal and does not in any way demand the power of order, certainly it could be even in a heathen king over the whole Church under his sway, because he has as perfect a power of jurisdiction as a Christian king, and from Scripture it cannot more be proved that for use of such jurisdiction baptism is necessary than that the episcopate or the clerical order is. And there is further declaration of this; for in the Roman Church Constantine, for example, before he was converted to the faith, had supreme temporal power: either therefore he already had spiritual power as well and thus the inferred inconvenience is admitted, than which nothing is more absurd; or if Constantine did not have it certainly it was with Sylvester; therefore even after the baptism of Constantine Sylvester retained the same power and not Constantine. For who effected the transmutation or translation of the power from Sylvester to Constantine? Or by what word of God was it done that Constantine by baptism alone is from a sheep made a pastor, and passes from a spiritual son over into supreme parent and governor? Certainly these things are incredible and absurd. But if Constantine when baptized retained only the temporal power, certainly the same power alone did he transmit to his successors, and the same power has been divided among other kings and princes who now exist. Or if any other kings were afterward made Christians, not thence drawing their origin, the same can be proportionately applied to them. And in a similar way, if after the baptism of Constantine Sylvester continued in his pontificate with the same spiritual power, the same has come to his successors up to this day. And the same proportionately about England and any Christian king whatever.

10. Another absurdity also we can infer. For if with supreme temporal power is conjoined a similar spiritual power, why is there not in any inferior temporal magistrate or prince, even if he recognize a superior, a similar conjunction of each power, with due proportion and subordination to the superior? For there is the same reason, nor by force of natural right can any discrimination be established. And Scripture does not more give spiritual power to supreme princes than to inferior. But where Scripture speaks of the obedience due to temporal princes, it speaks generally both of kings and of other magistrates. For thus the verse of Paul is understood, Romans 13.1: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers," as Peter more expounds, 1 Peter 2.13-14: "whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him." But if this absurdity be conceded, the whole ecclesiastical hierarchy as concerns the rule of external governance must be overturned. For where a temporal king is believed to be supreme governor in spiritual things, by that very fact from there the supreme Pontiff is excluded; therefore if a royal prefect of one city also has there spiritual command, the bishop will consequently have to be excluded from spiritual governance, because there cannot be two heads of the same order; or a fortiori all other prefects or ecclesiastical governors will be excluded, and so, whether the king of England wills it or no, we will fall into the anarchy of the Puritans as far as ecclesiastical governance is concerned.

11. It could be replied that there is not the same reason about a supreme king and about inferior magistrates, because the king has of himself and as if by necessity both powers conjoined; but the inferiors have their power from the king; and therefore the king could by his own will divide those power and communicate the temporal to the civil prefect and the spiritual to the bishop. But in the first place all this does not transcend human will and institution, which the king could even by his own judgment change just as he established it; therefore he could overturn the whole ecclesiastical hierarchy as concerns the governance of the Church. Next the king is not speaking in agreement with his opinion if he concedes this; for he now admits that the spiritual and temporal powers are distinct, and separable in subject, and by his will separate; why then will they not be separable or even separate in the head of each order, or by what title can he show that he possesses both powers?

12. For another reason too this cannot stand with the words of the king; for he himself in his Preface, p.54, reprehends Bellarmine for the fact that in bk.4 De Pontifice ch.25, he denied that bishops have immediately from God received their power; he himself thinks therefore that bishops have their jurisdiction immediately from God. How then can he now say that he gives them jurisdiction and that it is placed in his will not to confer it on them but on his temporal magistrates? Unless perhaps he makes himself superior also by divine right. Next, the king of England confesses in the same place that he dissents from the Puritans about Episcopal jurisdiction; but the Puritans affirm that ecclesiastical jurisdiction is conferred by the temporal magistrate; therefore if the king says that he confers jurisdiction on bishops he does not differ from the Puritans on the point of Episcopal jurisdiction, whatever he may think about the difference in dignity of order. Therefore, so that the government of the Church may through bishops and not through temporal magistrates be firm and stable, this institution is divine and the jurisdiction even of bishops descends from Christ – either through the mediation of the Pope, as Bellarmine thinks with more probability, or immediately, as others even Catholics think with probability. For the matter does not concern the present cause. For in whatever way it be by Christ's positive institution, it cannot be from a temporal king, nor can it depend per se on him, and consequently the royal power cannot be directly and per se over the Episcopal power, and hence neither can it be supreme within the ambit of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. This repugnance in his words and opinions the king, led on perhaps by a spirit of contradicting Bellarmine, has not considered, thought it is yet clear enough, as we will again declare in the following chapter.

Chapter 9: Solution to some objections against the truth proved in the previous chapters. Summary: 1. Triple question about the power of ruling the Church. 2. First objection. 3. In the law of nature there was no power of a supernatural order. Nor any spiritual jurisdiction. 4. Objection. 5. Second objection. 6. Third objection from the New Testament. 7. Solution to the two first testimonies. 8. From the third testimony, in 1 Timothy 2, nothing against the truth established can be collected. 9. The testimony of Matthew 22 concludes to the opposite. The testimonies also of John 18 and Luke 12 and 22 confirm the doctrine handed down. 10. Fourth objection. 11. Solution. Augustine is wrongly cited for the contrary error. 12. Response to the words of Isidore. 13. Fifth objection from the Fathers. 14. Solution. The true sense of the Fathers is shown. 15. Genuine exposition of the Council of Arles.

1. Many are the things by which the king of England tries to persuade that by a just title he assumes to himself spiritual power and the name of supreme head and spiritual governor in his kingdom, and all that he adduces are objections against the truth we have proved; which, although they be not difficult, so as to give satisfaction to them all, we cannot pass over. But because several of them are taken from the deeds of kings and emperors and do not pertain to the present point, in order that the individual objections may, located in their places, be clearly perceived, three questions must here to distinguished. One, which we are now treating of, is whether the spiritual power is joined in the prince necessarily with temporal power. The second, on the supposition that these powers are in diverse persons, is whether one is superior to the other and which it is; on this point we will speak from chapter 21. The third is the general question about the exemption of clerics from the temporal power, even in civil and criminal causes and in tributes, which without doubt is far different from the other two, and must be treated from other principles in the next book. Therefore if there are examples of deeds of Catholic princes which can in any way against ecclesiastical jurisdiction be objected, they chiefly pertain to the third question about the immunity of clerics, as we will see there, and a few we will also touch on in the second question. On the present point however, there will scarcely, I believe, be found, before Henry VIII, an example of a Christian prince, even in name alone, albeit a heretic, who attempted by force of his proper and innate power to usurp an act of spiritual jurisdiction, much less to assume to himself supreme jurisdiction and the primacy of spiritual power. And therefore, having omitted these examples, we will briefly consider the other titles whereby the king tries to establish his right or in appearance to defend it.

2. The first is that by right of nature these two powers are conjoined, the royal and the sacerdotal; therefore this right of nature remains intact in the law of grace, because grace does not destroy nature, nor was the law of Christ given to take away the law of nature, but to perfect it. The proof of the assumption is that before the law of Christ and Moses only natural right was observed, for that is why it is called the time of natural law. But at that time the same people were kings and priests, as is clear of Melchizedek, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and generally from the accepted rule that then the first born and heirs of the kingdom were at the same time priests, as is taken from Jerome, epistle 26 to Evagrius, and Rupert, bk.1 On Genesis ch.12. Hence Paul, Hebrews 12, calls Esau profane for the fact he sold his birthright, which was sacred by reason of the priesthood.

This title I do not find expressly proposed by the king, but for completeness of doctrine and because the king, by alleging in his favor certain testimonies of the New Testament, seems to suppose it, I think it should not be omitted, although in truth it is frivolous. For in the first place, having admitted the ancient custom, which seems to have been in vigor not only among the faithful but also among the Gentiles, we deny that it was by natural right, that is, a precept of natural law, although by the mediation of human reason and will it took its origin from general principles of natural right. Because although sacrifice is in some way by natural right, and consequently priesthood too, yet that it be instituted in such and such a way, and be attributed to these or those persons, is not prescribed by the right of nature but needs to be defined by some positive right. And in this way, before the Law of Moses, by the right of nations or by the morals of peoples was the conjoining of the chief sacerdotal dignity with that of the king introduced. Which custom, as it was changed in the Old Law, could also be changed in the New Law. Nay, that it was so changed, and that this pertains to the perfection of the law of grace, is taught by Pope Nicholas to the emperor Nicholas, saying: "These things were before the coming of Christ, that certain were in figure kings and priests at the same time, which that holy Melchizedek was sacred history makes plain." And later: "But when truth was reached, that the same man be king and pontiff no emperor or Pontiff has any longer laid hold of."

3. Next, if the discussion is about the priest as to power of order the difference is manifest; for in the law of nature there was no proper and supernatural power of order, but there was only the ministry of sacrificing and of interceding for the people, to which anyone could be deputed, either of his own accord or by consent of the people, because God had at that time prescribed nothing in particular about priesthood or sacrifice; and thus Pope Anacletus, epistle 2, denies that Melchizedek and Abraham or other men of that time had obtained sacrifice "by sacerdotal authority," namely by special institution of God. But in the Old Law, as God determined the sacrifices, so also did he the priesthood or the pontificate, without intervention of the people or their consent. Which also Christ instituted in a higher and more excellent way in the New Law. But if the discussion is about priesthood as to power of jurisdiction, the objection is supposing in the first place either something false or very uncertain, namely that the priest or pontiff in the law of nature had spiritual jurisdiction, which is either false or uncertain. Because such power had neither been specially given by God in that state, as is evident of itself, nor could it belong to men by natural right, because human governing power did not transcend the human order, and was principally instituted for ordering men to each other, such that, although it could have care over the divine cult, always in its manner and determination it respects the common good of the human republic, as St. Thomas says in a similar case, Ia IIae, q.99, a.3. Wherefore a comparison between the law of nature and of grace is not rightly made, because in the law of nature the governing power was sufficiently comprehended under the temporal, for it could make the like disposition about things pertaining to the cult of God, insofar as it was expedient to the common good of the human republic; but it is otherwise in the law of grace, which is the divine law, which principally orders men to God and refers the good of the very republic to the friendship of men with God. And therefore the priestly power in this law is spiritual and of a higher order, and it could not be by men themselves, nor by their community, but had to flow from Christ himself, as it did in fact flow, as was shown above.

4. You will say that this is true of men considered only as they are men; for thus it is manifest that in them there cannot be power except natural; but it is otherwise of Christian men as they are Christians and as they compose a city, not merely political, but also Christian. For just as such a community is founded on faith and supernatural religion, so it has therefrom a power of a higher order, connatural to grace itself, for disposing those things that have regard to the divine cult in a way agreeable to true faith and the friendship of God; therefore such must ecclesiastical power be judged to be and, as a result, it could by the whole community be conferred on its temporal king. I reply that the antecedent could have had place if Christ the Lord had not instituted his Church and its governance in a special and far more excellent way than could from the sole nature of the thing be in a community of men, even as they are Christians. But now Christ has with his special institution gone before, so to say, and elevated the spiritual governance of the Church. First, by instituting it in the manner of one mystical body diffused through the whole globe, in which unity of faith and concord in a substantial rite of religion ordered to the cult of God and to the sanctification of men could be preserved; but this without supreme spiritual power could not be done, as I showed above. But universal power over the whole world could not proceed from men themselves, dispersed everywhere too; it therefore had to be from Christ. Again, Christ instituted a certain Church to be in faith the pillar of truth and in morals always holy; and therefore such spiritual power did he give it that through this power it could to both ends be rightly and without substantial defect directed; therefore such power ought necessarily to be more than human. Finally, from the sole nature of the thing, even if the men of the Church be looked on as they are Christians, it would not be necessary for them to be ruled by bishops or other similar pastors on whom a special care of souls is incumbent; but now the Church ought necessarily to be ruled by bishops and priests whose institution and distinction descends without doubt from divine right; therefore the governing power of the Church of Christ in spiritual matters is not from the Christian people even illumined by faith, but is from Christ himself, either immediately or through participation by him to whom Christ himself immediately communicated it.

5. A second objection is taken from some places of the Old Testament, in which is signified that the pontiffs of the Old Law were inferior and subject to the kings. But this objection I now omit, because, as to what regards the present place, it is manifest from the Old Law that the pontifical dignity and royal power were in diverse persons, which is now alone what we are treating of. But about the comparison of these powers we must speak below, and there we will the better see whether it was necessary to have, or to have had, the same condition or relation of inferior and superior in both laws, the Old namely and the New.

6. There is therefore a third objection taken from testimonies of the New Testament, in which it is prescribed to all Christians that they obey temporal kings, which testimonies were mentioned above and are collected by the king in his Apology p.129, namely Romans 13, 1 Peter 2, where he also adds that of 1 Timothy 2, where Paul prescribes prayers to be said for all, but chiefly for kings and for all who are in authority, and that of Matthew 22: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, etc." and that of John 18: "My kingdom is not of this world," and that of Luke 12: "Who made me a judge over you?" and that of Luke 22: "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them, etc."

7. But none of these testimonies make for the cause, and some of them can give proof against the king's intention. For, in the first place, in none of them is the talk in particular of spiritual power, nor is it insinuated in them that it has been conceded to temporal kings, or that obedience must be given to them when in the matter of such power they give commands. When, therefore, Paul says, Romans 13.1: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers," he is speaking generally of all superiors, as is clear from the tenor of his words. Hence the words can rightly be understood with a suitable division, namely that each one in that in which he is superior is to be obeyed by those who are subject to him. For thus also he says later, v.7: "Render therefore to all their dues; tribute to whom tribute is due, honor to whom honor, etc.” The general distribution, therefore, is to be accommodated to the individuals according to the measure of the power; but what this is in individual Powers is not there explained. But let us grant that there Paul is speaking in particular of temporal power, about which he says a little later, v.4: “For he beareth not the sword in vain.” What else can be collected from that place thus understood except that temporal princes are to be obeyed in that which they justly and rightly prescribe? But who denies this? Or can it be thence collected that even in spiritual and ecclesiastical things they are to be obeyed? Certainly Paul was speaking not only about Christian princes but also at that time especially about heathen kings, to whom as to temporal lords Christians were also held to be obedient; nor for that reason let any prudent man say that they were then the heads of the churches in their kingdoms. All things therefore which there Paul and Peter say in their letters are to be referred to the same sense; for either the words are to be understood respectively, that to each is to be rendered his right or his due obedience according to the grade of his power; or, if the words are understood definitively of temporal lords, they are also internal to their forum, and the matter is to be understood as the reason itself of justice demands; for the apostles are not there founding a new right but are prescribing observance of natural right itself. For they warn slaves in the same way to be subject to masters, and women to be subject to husbands, etc.

8. But as to the third testimony we confess that Paul implores that prayers be made for all men, and then in particular he adds, 1 Timothy 2.2: “for kings and for all that are in authority; that we may live a quiet and peaceable life.” But how does this pertain to the spiritual primacy of a temporal king? Does he, because he puts kings in the first, therefore say that they are the heads of churches in spiritual things? Vain certainly is the interpretation, and Chrysostom gives a far other reason there in homily 6, namely: “for that reason did he add ‘for kings’, because then kings were not worshipping God, and for many years afterwards they persisted in the infidelity which they had received by sequence of succession.” And later: “But since he sees as a consequence that Christians would grow tepid in this regard and would not admit warnings of that kind if for a Gentile and at the time of the sacraments they had to offer prayers, see what following on he added, so that from consideration of the gain they might more easily and more gladly receive the admonition. ‘That we may live a quiet and peaceable life,’ he says.” Therefore, in the mind of Chrysostom, he did not for this reason designate kings because they were the spiritual heads of churches (which most especially they could not then be, since they were Gentiles), but rather lest the faithful should for this reason think that they should not be publicly prayed for. Nor did Paul say, “chiefly for kings,” for that word ‘chiefly’ the king adds of himself, but he spoke simply, as if he were to say that under ‘all’ heathen kings too were comprehended; for although they were Gentiles, they were to be prayed for so that they might be converted to the faith. And this Paul the more signified in the reason which he subjoined, v.3-4: “For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.” And lastly, even if Paul had added that word ‘chiefly’ it would make no difference, for because the conversion of kings both was more difficult and is more necessary to the common good of the Church, therefore could it also be specially and chiefly recommended.

9. But as to the words of Christ, Matthew 22.21: “Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's", it has already been shown above from the mind of Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Athanasius, that the opposite is rather proved, namely that "unto Caesar", that is to the temporal king, are to be rendered "the things which are Caesar's", that is, the things that belong to the temporal power, which precise response has the force of exclusion, as Theophylact indicated when he said: "But Jesus by this fact, that the coin was stamped with the image of Caesar, is persuading them that due to Caesar are the things that are his, that is, which have his image, for the king is to be obeyed in corporal and external things but God in internal and spiritual ones," namely when God prescribes either immediately or through his pastors, according to the word of Paul, Hebrews 13.17: "Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves." Also, about the other words of Christ, John 18.36: "My kingdom is not of this world," we say that it too proves the contrary, as is from the words without difficulty collected. For three things from the doctrine of Augustine and other Fathers we have noted from those words, namely that Christ has a kingdom, even in this world, although not of this world; hence deservedly do we collect that the kings of this world, by the fact that they are such, do not have power in the kingdom of Christ, insofar as it is of a higher origin; and by equal consequence we collect that this kingdom of Christ is not lacking in its governors who, although they be not kings of this world, that is temporal kings, are spiritual pastors and a royal priesthood. And there is the same reason about the words of Christ, Luke 12.14: "Who made me a judge or divider over you?" For they prove that temporal causes do not per se pertain to the kingdom of Christ, or to his Vicar, hence rather is it to be inferred from the contrary, or from exchange of proportion, that spiritual causes do not pertain to the temporal king. Finally we say the same of the last words, Luke 22.25: "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them." For Christ did not add, 'But you are not to govern,' or 'you are not to command or to correct subjects,' but rather he supposes that they were in the future to be rulers or pastors, and therefore he added, v.26: "But ye shall not be so," as if presupposing a governance, and distinguishing it from the temporal kingdom, and demanding a different manner in it, which Peter made plain in many words in his first letter, ch.5, as was noted earlier.

10. A fourth objection can be taken from the name of Vicar of God, which the king of England attributes to any temporal king whatever. And lest the mode of speaking seem new, Edward king of England used it before James, as I find reported in his laws ch.19, and yet he is placed among the number of the saints. And we can confirm the same from the authority of Augustine, bk. Quaestionum Veteris et Novi Testamenti, p.2, q.91, where he says of a king: "He is adored on earth as a vicar of God." Eleutherius too in a certain letter to Lucius king of Britain is said thus to have written: "You recently by divine mercy received in the kingdom of Britain the law and faith of Christ, you have in your kingdom both pages, from them by the grace of God, by the council of your kingdom, take the law, for you are in your kingdom the Vicar of God." Therefore beside this vicar there is no need for another who is to be immediately under God, and therefore in the king is the whole power vicarial of the divine power, whether it is spiritual or temporal. We can also expand this objection from Isidore, bk.3 Sententiar. or De Summo Bono, ch.49, saying: "God gave to princes the prelacy for the governance of peoples;" but prelacy is a name for spiritual power, for he is not called prelate except who is superior in spiritual things.

11. I respond briefly that the consequence is of no moment, whatever may be thought of the mode of speaking assumed in the antecedent, about which there is no need for contention, although the things alleged for it are apocryphal. For the book Quaestionum Veteris et Novi Testamenti, by the judgment of all doctors, is not Augustine's, because it is not his style and the doctrine in many places is not Augustinian. Although that opinion, well explained, may be true, namely that the king is adored, that is cultivated and venerated because of his dignity, in which he in some way represents God, whose vicariate he bears. The letter too which is cited from Eleutherius is spurious, because there is found neither among the pontifical letters, nor in the volumes of the Councils, nor among Catholic authors any mention of it, but it was made up by some heretic, as Sander noted, bk.5, De Clave David, ch.6. And the words themselves, which are referred to from it, sufficiently show the fact, for it is a paraphrase proper to the Novati and altogether alien to the Roman Pontiffs.

12. But we do not deny that a king can in a good and sound sense be called Vicar of God; for Paul, Romans 13, calls kings ministers of God, which is almost the same. Hence Ambrose there says that the prince "bears the vicariate of God," and for that reason subjection to him is to be preserved. But to bear the vicariate is the same as to be vicar. But it is not rightly inferred from this that kings are vicars of God in spiritual things; for God is principal King both in the temporal kingdom and in the spiritual kingdom of the Church, and in each he has placed his vicars, kings in the temporal, bishops and especially the Supreme Pontiff in the spiritual. Hence from the fact that the king is vicar in one kingdom it is not well inferred that he is so in both. For Gentile kings too, of whom Paul was also speaking, are ministers of God and hence vicars, not however in spiritual things but in temporal ones only. The same therefore is to be said of Christian kings, although they could also be with particular title vicars of God, for defending the Church and protecting prelates, so that they can in peace and with fruit minister spiritual things. And it is in this sense that Saint Edward spoke. But Isidore in a certain large sense called the prefecture, or any power of ruling, a prelacy, as also in the preceding ch.49 he placed under the title of 'Prelates' kings and all powers of the age whatever, not only the faithful but also infidels. Hence it is clear that he is not speaking of prelates in that rigorous sense in which the term now in common usage is taken for an ecclesiastical leader, but as it is derived generally from the verb 'prefer' and can signify any superior or primary governor.

13. Fifth can be objected certain testimonies of the Fathers who are wont to attribute primacy to the king or emperor. But of these some pertain to the comparison of each jurisdiction, which, as I said, will be dealt with below. But others are proper to this place, because in them the Fathers seem to attribute proper acts of spiritual power to kings. For such acts are teaching the truth, dispelling errors, and the like, and yet Epiphanius says, Haeres. 40, that kings were given so that they might dispose and administer all things well from God. "And to the good ordering of the earth," he says, "where slaughters and battles and ignorance as well as good doctrine..." signifying that all these fall under the care of the king. And thus also Alcuin in the preface to his books De Trinitate to Charlemagne says that wisdom was given to him "so that he might rule and teach his subjects with pious solicitude." And below he says that it pertains to him "to decree justice, to prescribe counsel, to admonish sanctity, so that each may return home happy with the precept of perpetual salvation." And later he adds: "That a prince of a Christian people must know and preach all things that are pleasing to God is very evident. For neither does it more fit anyone either to know things better or more than the Emperor, by which doctrine he must be of advantage to all subjects, etc.” Nay rather, the Council of Arles under the same Charlemagne, last chapter after all the decrees, subjoins: “These we have decreed must be presented to the emperor, asking his clemency that if anything here is lacking it may be supplied by his prudence; if anything contrary to what reason maintains, it may be emended by his judgment; if anything reasonably reproachable, it may be perfected by his aid, divine clemency assisting.” Here too could be added objections from acts of convening General Councils, or of presiding in them, or again creating or deposing Pontiffs; for these acts and the like are proper to ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and yet that emperors rather often exercised them is contended by the king of England in his Preface.

14. To the first part I reply that the Fathers never attribute to kings proper acts of spiritual jurisdiction, but sometimes by way of exhortation or praise or honor they excite them to perform certain acts which can without jurisdiction be performed, or to see to it that other acts in the Church are done fruitfully by the pastors by whom the acts can legitimately be performed. One of these acts could be to have care that ignorance be removed from the Church, that good and sound doctrine be preserved and increased, of which Epiphanius speaks. And it has place even in a political republic within its limits, as is evident of itself, and thus does it pertain to the king by force of his proper power. But with respect to the Church, and as regard the doctrine of the faith, it can pertain to the king, not indeed by publicly preaching it of himself, nor by giving authority to preach, but by providing help to Catholic prelates and preachers, and by founding studies of sacred letters, and by coercing through his power the spreaders of evil doctrine. And this was the sense declared by the Fathers of the Council of Tours under Charlemagne at the beginning; for after they commended the piety and wisdom of the emperor, they subjoin: “Intent therefore on these things he gave to the pious and religious priests of God, who hold the government of the Church in the kingdom conferred on him by divine bounty, admonishments with very wholesome exhortations that they devote effort and in deeds excel, whereby they may rule themselves by acting well and by instructing in words and examples those subject to them.” And Alcuin above quoted indicates the same, saying: “There is much occasion for all the faithful to glory in your piety, while the solicitude of your clemency has a priestly vigor, as is fitting, in preaching the word of God.”

But the rest of what we referred to are words of praise and honor, for even a Christian emperor can be learned and well instructed in sacred doctrine, and he can in private, in accord with the occurrent occasion, teach the truth. Also in a similar way do the words of the Fathers of the Council of Arles have this tendency, that they seek protection and help from the emperor for the execution of their decrees, as is clear from the final clause of their words; but the rest are words of modesty and urbanity from which no judgment, either of subjection in spiritual things on the part of the Council or of spiritual power in the emperor, can be taken. Also, to the other part of the objection, we say in one word that those acts do not properly belong to the imperial power, but it can or sometimes could exercise in them some cooperation or preparatory disposition or condition which does not require spiritual power, as we will declare more at large in what follows.

Chapter 10: Whether Christ the Lord conferred the supreme spiritual power of the Church on Peter.

Summary: 1. The Roman Pontiff has this power. 2. Conclusion de fide. Proof from the promise of Christ. 3. The aforesaid promise was made to Peter in his own person. 4. The same truth is confirmed from the Supreme Pontiffs. 5. It is shown again from the Fathers. 6. Peter, Matthew 16, was designated the foundation of the Church. Proof from the Fathers. 7. Proof again from reason. 8. Christ conferred on Peter through the keys supreme spiritual power. 9. Confirmation from John 21. Rejection of a certain interpretation of heretics. 10. What the word 'feed' signifies in Scripture. 11. The power of Peter extends to the whole Church. 12. The exposition given of the words of Christ is confirmed from the Fathers. 13. The same truth is shown from the titles of Peter. 14. Reason for the institution of the Primacy of Peter. 15. Ecclesiastical governance ought to be monarchical.

1. Before we compare the spiritual power with the temporal, on which the present controversy chiefly depends, it is necessary to inquire whether this power is in the Roman Pontiff, with whom the whole quarrel and contention of the king of England deals. But because the Roman Pontiff does not have this power except by legitimate succession, and succession hangs on an origin and institution which could only have been done by Christ; therefore we must first look into this institution, on which point two questions can be distinguished, one abstract, so to say, or general, whether Christ has in his universal Church left a monarchical governance in some person who bears his vicariate; the second question is concrete or particular, whether to such person, namely Peter, Christ has committed his vicariate and power over all the faithful. We will however treat these at the same time because, as far as concerns faith and authority, we cannot better show the institution than from the singular deed of Christ; and the reason for the institution from its general cause we will afterwards investigate.

Nor is it necessary to delay over reviewing the errors which there have been on this matter and which now by Lutherans and Calvinists and the rest of the Protestants are pertinaciously defended, because they are both very well known and we are now treating only of the Anglican sect, whose head and defender of the same, the king of England, often contends in his Preface that Christ did not give to Peter a greater power than to the other apostles; and on pp.22 and 24 and especially 58 he tries to twist into other senses the words of Scripture. But his bases we will hereafter expound. Now first the Catholic truth must be made firm. And since very many Catholics and most learned men have most diligently labored to confirm this truth, it will not be worth the labor to transcribe everything they have said and to collect it in this place; but some few things, which will seem to our judgment more select and efficacious, we will borrow from them and, using what brevity and perspicuity we can, propound them.

2. We say therefore that Christ the Lord by instituting his Church Militant, before he left it as to his visible bodily presence, commended it to Peter as to his Vicar and Supreme Pastor, and thereby conferred on him supreme spiritual power for governing it. The conclusion is certain de fide, which we will prove chiefly by that twin testimony with which not only Bellarmine, whom in this the king of England has dared to reprehend, but all the Pontiffs and Fathers confirmed the same truth. The first is that verse of Matthew 16 where, after in response to Christ asking, v.13: "Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?" Peter had said, v.16: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," Christ said to him, v.17-19: “Blessed art thou, Simon bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.” This was the promise of Christ, who cannot deceive in promises, and therefore it cannot be doubted but that he fulfilled it, because he then promised it. But let us see to whom he promised and what he promised; for if these two be fully and faithfully understood, this testimony alone is sufficient for confirming the assertion.

3. First then it is evident from the tenor of the words that the promise was made to Peter in his own person, for it is marked by so many circumstances that there can about it be no doubt. For first the Evangelist relates that Simon Peter made a confession of the divinity of Christ. Nor do I think it lacking in mystery that the Evangelist joined both names ‘Simon Peter’. For Peter was first called Simon, as is clear in John 1, and here it is added on, both for taking away all ambiguity, because another apostle too was called Simon, and for the mystery which Christ at once declared. Next the Evangelist adds that Christ spoke to this same man. And that this might be the more witnessed Christ again with the same name addresses him, saying: “Blessed art thou, Simon;” and because he was reserving the name Peter for explaining the mystery, lest the name of Simon seem ambiguous, he added another circumstance proper to that person, saying: “Bar-jona,” that is, son of Jona or John, just as he had said the same, John 1.42: “Thou art Simon the son of Jona.” But Christ in the said place named Simon at the same time when praising him, so that thence too it could be understood of what sort the promise was and to whom it was made: for it was remunerative and was to be made to him who had merited praise in the confession. Just as Hilary there in canon 26 said: “And a worthy reward plainly did the confession of Peter obtain, because he had seen the Son of God in man;” and Jerome in the same place: “to the Apostle’s testimony about himself he rendered return. Peter had said: ‘Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God;’ the true confession received reward: ‘Blessed art thou, Simon bar-jona.’” Christ, therefore, wishing not only with praise to reward Peter but also with marvelous promise, subjoins: “And I say also unto thee, etc.” where rightly Jerome remarks: “Because you have said to me, ‘Thou art the Christ, etc.,’ I too say to you, not with a word null and of no effect, but I say to you, because my having said is a having done.” That word ‘unto thee’, therefore, designates the same person of Simon, to that person therefore are the words of Christ directed, to him therefore is the promise made. Maximus, homil.1, In Natali Petri et Pauli, and Prosper, bk.2, De Vocat. Genes., ch.28.

But in the words of Christ I consider that some are only affirmative by way of the indicative, ‘Thou art Peter,’ others contain prediction and promise, namely, ‘Upon this rock I will build my Church...and I will give unto thee, etc.’ The first affirmation therefore could have also the tenor of giving more expression to the person about whom the future prediction was and to whom the promise was made. Christ therefore wished to call to mind that this Simon was he to whom he said long before, John 1.42: “Thou art Simon son of Jona; thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation A rock.” And at the same time, as I think, Christ wished to indicate for what cause he imposed on Simon the name of Peter, namely because of the very firm and unmovable faith which he was going to receive, the first and signal confession of which he then made, and therefore he deserved to hear: 'Thou art Peter.' Hence rightly Ambrose, serm.6 De Variis Actionib., said: "Although he was called Simon, for his devotion he was called Peter." Nay, he adds, because Christ is the rock, "to faithful Simon he communicated his own name." Which also Chrysostom touched on, homil.10, on Mark. Most well however does Cyril, bk.2, on John, ch.12, note that Christ foresaw the future faith of Peter and therefore he said to him, "'thou shalt be called Cephas,' that is, Peter, suitably signifying by this name that on him as on a rock and most firm stone he was going to build his Church." Next Chrysostom adds, homil. on Psalms 50, in the first part a little after the beginning, "therefore was he called Peter by Christ, because he was endowed with rock-like faith." Where also twice he calls him the 'base of the faith', and homil.9, De Poenit., "When I say Peter, I name a firm rock not himself, an immovable foundation stone," signifying that Christ had given the name Peter to Simon because of the immovability, not which he had in himself or from himself, but which he was going to receive in the faith, and therefore elsewhere he calls him "a firm and solid rock of faith." Which all are elegantly embraced by Pope Leo, serm. De Transfigur., ch.1, saying of Peter: "And so greatly pleasing was he in this sublimity of faith that, endued with the happiness of blessing, he would receive the sacred firmness of an inviolable rock, founded on which the Church would prevail over the gates of hell and the laws of death."

Hence further is clearly understood what Christ designated when he said, 'and upon this rock I will build my Church.' For without doubt he designated the same Peter, as frequently the ancient and most grave Fathers have understood, and as is openly plain from the context. For that is why Christ first said to him, 'Thou art Peter,' so as at once to say to the same that on him would he build the Church, and that for this office he had made him by his grace a rock. Next it is shown that those words along with the ones that follow contain a remunerative promise; therefore it is made to the same man who is blessed because of a good confession and who deserved the name of Peter; therefore he designated the same by the word 'this rock'. Which fact will become more evident if it is considered that Christ did not use the word Petrus (Peter) or Petra (rock) as if of different genders. Hence if the words of Christ had been reported in this way by the Evangelist, 'Thou art Petra and upon this petra I will build my Church', no one would doubt that these words 'thou' and 'this' were designating the same petra, and for that reason the same person; but Christ spoke in the way that Matthew also in Hebrew or Syriac wrote it; for in those languages the feminine and masculine of Petrus and petra are not distinguished, and so the Syriac has the same word in both places. But the Greek and Latin translator accommodated the masculine name to the person of Petrus, because he was a man, but the foundation of the building they named with the feminine noun petra, because so is it in these languages with propriety called.

Besides, by the term 'this' a present singular thing is wont to be designated; but there no other thing was signified by the name rock, and on which the name rock might properly and without metaphor be imposed, except the person of Peter; therefore it was he without doubt whom Christ designated when he said, 'Upon this rock.' For so as to take away all occasion of error, nay also of doubt, he premised, 'Thou art Peter,' as if placing him before his eyes whom he wished to designate. Besides, when Christ immediately subjoined, 'And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' who will doubt that by the word 'thee' he had designated Peter and that to him he spoke, since he directed his speech to him from the beginning and spoke with the same tenor always to the same person? Therefore also when he said, ‘and upon this rock,’ he spoke of the same person. Finally because it is not credible that in so clear and continuous a context Christ is speaking now to Peter, next is designating something else by the demonstrative ‘this’, and immediately returns to Peter. For thus the whole sentence and promise would be uncertain and ambiguous, and the care taken to determine with so many modes and circumstances the person to whom the promise was made would have been superfluous.

4. And such was how this place, on the part of the person to whom the promise was made, was understood in the first place by the Roman Pontiffs who touched on this place, especially Clement, epistle 1 to James, and Anacletus, epistles 2 and 3, Leo above, sermons 2 and 3 In Die Assumptionis Suae, and epistle 89, whose other words we will refer to in what follows; and many things we have adduced from Gregory, bk.1, ch.6, and several are collected by Gratian in his Decretum dist.12, 21, and 22, and we will refer to many places in what follows where the Pontiffs founded their primacy not in human but in divine right, because of succession from Peter, to whom the Lord spoke with promise in this testimony.

5. And in the same way were these words understood by all the holy bishops and most ancient doctors of the Church. Cyprian, epistle 55 to Cornelius, says that on Peter the Church is founded; and he speaks in the same way in epistles 69, 71, and 73, and in other places which we noted above in book 1, chapters 5 and 6. Again Hilary, canon. 16 on Matthew, where the above cited words, “A worthy reward plainly did the confession of Peter obtain,” he subjoins: “O in the announcement of a new name, happy the foundation of the Church, etc.” He has the same in bk.6 De Trinit., and Psalms 131. But Ambrose bk.4 De Fide, ch.3, “You have,” he says, “in the Gospel what he said to Peter: ‘I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not,’ but to the same man when he says earlier, ‘Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,’ he replied, ‘Thou art Peter, and upon this rock, etc.’”, and he subjoins words very much to be noted: “Therefore to whom he gave the kingdom by his proper authority, could he not make firm his faith? Whom, when he says ‘rock’, he pointed to as the firm support of the Church.” The same he says most well on Psalms 40, near the end, “He is Peter to whom he said, ‘Thou art Peter, and upon this rock, etc.’” and he adds, “Where Peter, there the Church.” Again at large in sermon 9 above cited and sermon In Cathedram. S. Petri, and sermon 11 De Sanctis. Largely too does Augustine, sermon 29 De Sanctis, which is the fifth of Saints Peter and Paul: “Alone among the apostles he merited to hear, ‘Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church.’ Worthy, indeed, who was the stone of foundation for building the peoples in the house of God, the pillar of support, the key of the kingdom,” and many similar things are contained in sermon 16, which is De Cathedra Petri, and sermon 49, De Verb. Dom., ch.3, and bk.2, De Baptismo, ch.1, referring to these words of Cyprian, “Peter, whom first the Lord chose, and upon whom he built his Church,” he adds: “Behold the place Cyprian calls to memory, which we too have taught in the Holy Scriptures, that the apostle Peter, in whom the primacy of the apostles is preeminent with so excellent grace, is by a later apostle, Paul, corrected, etc.”

Most well too does Pacianus say, epistle 3 to Sympronianus, near the middle: “As Matthew himself reports, to Peter did Christ speak, to one man, for the reason that he might found unity from one,” and immediately he refers to the words, ‘upon this rock I will build my Church.’ Also I referred above to Cyril of Alexandria and to Chrysostom, to whom could be added Cyril of Jerusalem, Cateches. 18, saying: “The Savior has ordained our holy Christian Church, about which he said to Peter: ‘Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church.’” And Nazianzen, orat. 26, says: “You see how from among Christ’s disciples, great to be sure all of them and excelling and worthy of election, this one is called rock and receives the foundations of the Church on his faith.” Again Basil, on ch.2 of Isaiah, when he had said that the Church was built on the prophets and apostles, adds further: “Of whom one was Peter; upon which rock he had promised that he would build his Church;” and bk.2 Contra Eunomium, near the beginning, he says of Peter: “Who since he was superior in faith, took up the building committed to him of the Church;” and homil. 29, which is De Poenitentia: “Peter denied the third time, and he was placed in the foundation;” and later: “Peter had already said before and had been pronounced blessed. He had said, ‘Thou art the Son of the high God,’ and he had heard in turn that he was the rock, being so praised by the Lord; for although he was the rock, he was not the rock as Christ. He was the rock as Peter. For Christ truly is the immovable rock, but Peter is because of the rock. For Christ lavished his titles of dignity on others; but he lavished them not as being emptied of them but as having them still. He is the Light. You are the light of world, he says. He is the Priest, and he makes priests. He is the Lamb, and he says: ‘Behold I send you forth as sheep among wolves.’ He is the Rock, and he makes a rock. What things are his, he lavishes on his servants.” Similarly Epiphanius in Anchorato, not far from the beginning, speaking of Peter under the name of the Prince of Apostles, subjoins: “But the Lord himself established him first of the apostles, a firm rock, upon which is built the Church of God, etc.”

To these Fathers are added others in expounding Matthew. Theophylact and Euthymius follow Chrysostom, but Jerome especially follows him in saying: “On Simon who believed in the rock Christ is bestowed the name Peter, and according to the metaphor of the rock it is rightly said: ‘I will build my Church on thee.’” The literal sense surely could not be more truly or clearly explained. Hence in other places he often says that the Church of Christ has been founded on Peter. In his Dialog. 1 Contra Pelagianos, a little from the beginning, and in his epistles 54 and 57, and bk.1 Contra Jovinian., he first says calls Peter the rock of Christ, but later, answering a tacit objection and declaring the reason, he says: “Upon Peter is the Church founded, although the very thing is in another place made upon the other apostles, and all together receive the keys of heaven, and equally on them is the fortitude of the Church made firm; yet for this reason is one among the twelve chosen, so that, with a head established, occasion of schism may be taken away.” Where it is to be attentively considered that among the apostles he establishes a certain equality and nevertheless a head too. For equality is in the apostolate, in certitude of doctrine, on which the fortitude of the Church is made firm, and in the universal power of the keys: but the one head, which is put in place for taking away schisms, indicates the authority and jurisdiction of Peter over the other apostles too, and the perpetuity of his power without which a perpetual concord opposed to schisms could not exist in the Church.

A similar opinion is held by Pope Leo, epistle 89, ch.1, saying: “The sacrament of this office the Lord wished in such way to pertain to the office of all the apostles that he might in the most blessed Peter, the summit of all the apostles, principally locate it, so that from him, as from a certain head, his gifts might be diffused as it were through the whole body, so that he who dared to depart from the firmness of Peter might understand himself to be divorced from the divine mystery. For he wanted this Peter, assumed as consort of undivided unity, to be named that which he himself was when he said: 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church,' so that the edifice of the eternal temple, by the marvelous gift of the grace of God, might consist in the firmness of Peter." Lastly it is frequent among the other Fathers that they call Peter for this reason the foundation of the Catholic Church, the rock of the Church, the first Pontiff of the Church. As can be seen in Isidore, bk.2, De Offic. Ecclesiastic. ch.5, and De Vita et Morib. Sanctor. ch.69, and in other places, which we indicated in book 1, chapter 6. And Peter Chrysologus, serm.107, Laurentius Justinianus, De Obed. ch.12. Tertullian, before he had fallen into heresy, often spoke in the same ways about Peter, as in De Praescript. ch.22, and De Monogamia, ch.8. From which opinion even when he had become a heretic he did not depart, although he corrupted it in a certain way, De Pudicitia, ch.25, as we will more commodiously notice in chapter 17.

6. No one can therefore doubt that to Peter was that promise made; it remains now to explain what was promised to him. For there seems to be in the words a double promise, one about the foundation of the Church, another about the power of binding and loosing: but I reckon that the same is first explained through a metaphor and afterwards by words more proper. When therefore Christ said that he would found his Church on Peter, he promised Peter that he would make the foundation itself of the Church so firm and immovable that it could both sustain the whole mass of the Church and never, with so much firmness, fall or collapse. Hence Ambrose in the cited book 4, De Fide, ch.3, when he says in the words above mentioned, "to whom he gave the kingdom by his proper authority," signifies that Christ there promised to Peter the kingdom of the Church, and because this kingdom is both established by faith and needs to be perpetual, therefore Ambrose adds that Christ could also make the faith of Peter firm and establish him as the firm support of the Church, indicating that all this was in those words promised to Peter. Which thing he also declared, serm.2 among various sermons, which is De Cathedra Petri, where he says it was promised to Peter that "like an immovable stone he would hold together the frame and mass of the whole Christian world." And fairly similar things are contained in Augustine, the said sermon 16, De Sanctis. But Jerome in the said book 1, Contra Jovinian, thinks that there Peter was promised that he would be the head of the apostles. But Cyprian along with Augustine in the said book 2, De Baptism., ch.1, think that the primacy of the Church was there promised to Peter. Chrysostom too, homil.15, on Matthew, says Peter was promised he would be the pastor of the Church. And all these reduce to the same.

7. Finally the reason for the metaphor is that some singular dependence of the Church on Peter is through that metaphor signified, which cannot consist in other thing than that to Peter was to be given a singular power for instructing and ruling the Church in faith and morals, on which power both the edification and the conservation of the Church would perpetually rest. As when a ship is said to be founded on some person, it is at once understood by the metaphor that it rests on him as on a governor or captain; and thus also is a kingdom said to be founded in the king, and conversely the king is said to be the foundation of the kingdom. Wherefore, although the metaphor of foundation or rock could also have other uses and significations, yet when accommodated to this place and these circumstances it can have no other accommodation than this one; and for that reason the Fathers and the Church have so understood it.

8. But in order to explain the thing more openly, Christ added another metaphor and an explanation of it, when he said: "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." For by the name of key is wont to be signified the power of a king or of ruling, as is clear in Isaiah 22.22: "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder," that is, the principality or the pontificate or the power, about which he had a little before said, v.21: "And I will commit thy government into his hand." Christ, therefore, when promising the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter, promised nothing other than the power of ruling the Church, which on earth is a spiritual kingdom tending to the attainment of the kingdom of heaven, and for that reason it is to be governed by a certain heavenly power. Which power through sufficiently proper words is immediately explained by Christ, saying: "And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, etc." For with these words he expressly promised Peter a singular power of binding and loosing; which power is not other than the power of passing laws, or laying censures, or imposing similar burdens, or taking them away, as is clear both from the common use of such words and from the similar words of Matthew 18.18: "Whatsoever ye shall bind, etc." And from other words in John 20.23: "Whose soever sins ye remit, etc." Therefore the keys signify nothing other by the metaphor than the spiritual power for ruling the Church of Christ in order to the attainment of the kingdom of heaven. From this place, therefore, the primacy of Peter is manifestly proved, although heretics by various objections and evasions try to obscure it, to which we shall respond in the next chapter, lest we should omit confirmation of the established truth.

9. Everything, therefore, which we have said about the aforesaid promise of Christ, is from other words of Christ in John 21 very greatly confirmed, and from both places taken together and compared with each other the evidence of the truth is made very clear. For what Christ had promised, he fulfilled to Peter when he was about to ascend, saying to Peter once and again: "Feed my lambs," and a third time: "Feed my sheep." By these words he committed the care and government of the whole Church to him and constituted him his Vicar; and then plainly the keys of the kingdom of heaven and the power of binding and loosing did he bestow on him in a proper and special way; and thus on his shoulders as on a firm foundation and immovable stone he placed the edifice of the Church. Of all which can persuasion be easily made if the whole deed of Christ and his words are considered with a pure intention and mind. For in advance of creating Peter Supreme Pontiff Christ thrice asked him: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" and "Lovest thou me?" and "Lovest thou me?" Through which he first wished to signify that of something great and excellent and very greatly dear to himself he wanted to make commendation to Peter, namely his Church, which he himself very greatly loved, for which he gave himself up and left Mother and Father, as Paul showed, Ephesians 5. Next, after the love of Peter for him had been made manifest, Christ said to him: "Feed my sheep." By which words the heretics contend that no power was given to Peter but only a precept for preaching the word of God, which is the food of souls. But the exposition is vain and ridiculous, for about the mission of preaching Christ had already said, John 20.21: "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you," and he was going on to say later on his departure, Matthew 28.19: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations." Why, for the sole office of preaching, was there need to act in so singular a way with Peter and preface so great a weight of words and questions?

10. Next, the word ‘feed’ in the way in which it is employed by Christ does not only signify the act (so to say) of ministering food, but also the office and care of procuring all things that pertain to feeding sheep and ruling them and protecting them and preserving them in life. Next, it comprehends everything that belongs to the pastoral office. For it was the same to say to Peter, ‘Feed,’ as to say, ‘I leave you shepherd of my sheep.’ But a good shepherd, as Christ himself said, John 10.2-4, “entereth in by the door, and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out, and he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him, for they know his voice.” And later, v.11: “The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep;” and as he there indicates, he is not conducting himself as an hireling who, since he is not a shepherd, sees the wolf coming and leaves the sheep and flees. Therefore, from the opinion of Christ, it pertains to the office of the pastor who enters through the door, that is, through Christ himself, as he himself explains, or (which is the same thing) who is by him constituted over his flock, not only to minister food but also to guard, and to rule, and all the other things that pastoral care requires. So it was not only preaching of the word but the whole care of his flock which Christ commended to Peter. And without doubt this is the most usual signification of the word employed in the metaphor, not only as to the common way of speaking but also in sacred Scripture, as is clear from 1 Peter 5.2: “Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly according to God.” Where ‘feed’ without doubt signifies not only preaching, for by speaking alone constraint is not wont to be done; but it signifies rule or government, which is sometimes wont to be too violent, and so he subjoins, v.3: “Neither as being lords over the clergy.” Similarly the word ‘taking the oversight’ manifestly shows that Peter spoke of the prudence and solicitude of a pastor in ruling and guarding the sheep, and not of mere preaching of the word. Thus too 2 Kings [Samuel] 5.2: “Thou shalt feed my people Israel;” in explanation of which is added: “Thou shalt be a captain over Israel;” and 7.7: “Spake I a word with any of the tribes of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people Israel?” Which is immediately declared through the words, v.8: “I took thee from the sheepcote, from following the sheep, to be ruler over my people Israel.” And of Christ Isaiah said, 40.11: “He shall feed his flock like a shepherd;” and infinite like things are in the prophets. Therefore this very thing did Christ signify to Peter when he committed to him the feeding of his sheep.

11. And next, when he put sheep indefinitely, he comprehended without doubt all of them indiscriminately, because in similar locutions indefinite speech is equivalent to universal speech, and because there is no greater reason to interpret such words about these sheep than about those sheep. Nay, because there lambs and sheep are by name distinguished, Euthymius reckons that what is signified is not only the imperfect but the perfect too are subject to the care of Peter. But Bernard, bk.2 De Considerat. ad Eugenium, expounds that not only the common people but also the prelates and bishops up to the apostles themselves as well were commended and made subject to Peter. Hence he thus speaks, ch.8: “Not only of the sheep but of the pastors too you are of all of them the one Pastor. Whence do I prove it, you ask? From the word of Christ. For to whom, I do not say among bishops but among apostles too, were the sheep in this way absolutely and indiscriminately committed? ‘If you love me, Peter, feed my sheep.’ Which sheep? The peoples of that and of that city or region or definite kingdom. ‘My sheep,’ he said.

To whom is it not plain that he did not designate some but assigned all? None is excepted where none is distinguished. And perhaps there was present the rest of the fellow disciples when, committing to one, he commended unity to all in one flock and one pastor, according to the verse, 'One is my dove, my fair one, my perfect.' Where unity, there perfection." In which words Bernard excellently confirmed and enriched the aforesaid sense.

12. Nor is this interpretation novel or recent, for in the same way did the ancient Fathers understand the cited words of Christ. For Pope Leo, serm. 3 on his appointment, said in the same sentence: "From the whole world one Peter is chosen, who over the calling of all the Gentiles and over all the apostles and all the fathers of the Church is set in charge, although there be in the people of God many priests and many pastors yet properly does Peter rule whom Christ too principally rules." Chrysostom, homil.87, on John, says: "Why, finally, omitting the others, does he address only Peter about these things? He was the mouth of the apostles and prince and head of the band itself – for which cause also Paul went up to see him beside the others; and at the same, so that Christ might show him that now trust was to be had in him, for he was as it were forgetting his denial, he committed to him the care of this brothers." And later: "Thrice however he asks, and often prescribes the same thing, so that he might show how much he valued the care of his sheep and that this would be the greatest argument of his love." Cyril again, bk.11 John, ch.64, says: "In individual confessions, the words a little varied, he heard that he was to have the care of his rational sheep." And similarly Augustine, tract.123: "Nor does he hear aught so many times from Peter than that he loved him, nor does he so many times aught commend to Peter than that he feed his sheep." But what it is to feed the sheep of Christ he declares in a few words at the end of the same tractate saying: "they should strive as far as blood for the truth to whom he committed the feeding and ruling of the sheep." And serm.62, De Verbis Domini, explaining the same words 'feed my sheep' he says: "Let to us the care pertain, to you the obedience, to us the pastoral vigilance, to you the humility of the flock, etc." where to the word 'feed' he opposes the word 'obey'. He understood therefore that the pastoral care did not consist only in teaching but also in ruling and prescribing and that this was committed to Peter over the whole Church. Just as he also says, serm.49, De Verbis Domini: "The Lord says to Peter, the one individual on whom he forms his Church: Peter, do you love me? He responds: I love you. Feed my sheep."

And again Ambrose, serm.48, De Tempore in Feriam 3rd Hebdomadae Sanctae, treating of the same place, says: "He who before his tears was a sinner is after his tears assumed as pastor; and he received others to rule who before did not rule himself." And in the said sermon 1 De Sanctis, or De Cathedra Petri, said: "As a good Pastor he received the flock to guard, so that he who had been infirm for himself might become the firm support for everyone." Where he alludes to both testimonies and joins one to the other. And he explains Galations 1, that by the word 'feed' the care of the churches was delegated to Peter, saying of Paul: "It was worthy for him to desire to see Peter who was first among the apostles, to whom Christ had delegated the care of the churches." Next, bk.10, on Luke 24 toward the end, he says: "The Lord was not doubting; he was asking, not so as to learn, but so as to teach whom, having to ascend into heaven, he was leaving to us as Vicar of his love; for thus you have 'Simon son of Jonas lovest thou me?' 'Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee'; Jesus says to him, 'Feed my lambs.'" And later:

“Now not lambs, as at the first, nor sheplings as in the second, but sheep he bids him to feed, that the more perfect may be governed by him who is more perfect.” And bk.5, De Fide, in the preface he largely explains the same place in the same sense, saying that Peter was that prudent and faithful servant whom the Lord had set up over his family. Almost the same is contained in the book De Dignitate Sacerdotali, ch.2. But most well does Cyprian connect both testimonies, book De Unit. Eccles., near the beginning, when he says: “The Lord speaks to Peter, ‘I say unto thee, that thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my Church...’ And again to the same after his resurrection he says, ‘Feed my sheep.’ On that one individual he builds his Church, and to him he entrusts his sheep for feeding, and although on all the apostles after his resurrection he bestows equal power, and says, ‘As the Father hath sent me...’, and ‘Whose sins ye remit...’, yet to manifest unity he established one chair, and the origin, beginning from one, of that same unity he did by his authority dispose.” And later: “The primacy was given to Peter, so that one Church of Christ and one chair might be shown.” And later: “Who leaves the chair of Peter, on whom the Church is founded, has he confidence that he is in the Church?”

13. Lastly this truth is confirmed by the various epithets that the Fathers are wont to bestow on Peter for explaining that office and power which he received from Christ in the cited places. For thus is he called ‘head of the apostles’ by Jerome, bk.1 Contra Jovinian., and by Optatus, bks.2 & 7, Contra Parmen. Cyril of Alexandria too, bk.12, on John, ch.54, calls him ‘head and prince’, and bk.13, Thesaur., ch.2, ‘summit of the apostles.’ He is also said to be constituted as ‘pastor of pastors’ by Eusebius Emisenus in serm. De S. Joann. Evangelista, and he gives a reason, because “he rules subjects and prelates. Of all therefore is he pastor, because besides lambs and sheep there is nothing in the Church.” Hence Isidore, De Vita et Morte Sanctorum, ch.69, calls Peter ‘pastor of the human flock’. Again, Origen, bk.5 on Romans 6, near the end, says: “Since to Peter the sum of things about feeding the sheep is delivered, and since on him as on ground is the Church founded, the confession of no virtue is required of him save love.” Again Peter is called the Vicar of Christ in the Council of Nicea, can.39; of which canon we will say many things below. And Anselm on Matthew 16 calls him principal Vicar; because all the other bishops too, who receive the power of binding and loosing, are in their way Vicars of Christ, but Peter is the principal. Whom for the same reason he there calls prince of the apostles, which title is frequent among the other Fathers. And thus also do they frequently say that he received the primacy of the Church, as in the case of Ambrose on 2 Corinthians 12 and Galations 2; and most well Bede from the cited words ‘feed my sheep’ in homil. De Vigilia Apostolor. Petri et Pauli. And the same is intended by Chrysostom, hom.80 Ad Populum, when he says: “to him throughout the whole globe of the earth has been delivered the presidency of the Church, or care for the globe of the earth has to him been entrusted,” as he says, hom.87 on John. Or “of the whole Church he has taken up the government,” as Damascene says, orat. De Transfiguratione, where to Peter he speaks thus about the Church: “This Church Christ has himself purchased with his own blood, but to you as to a most faithful steward he has handed it over in trust.” And below: “He made you the keeper of the keys for the heavenly kingdom.” And later he says that Christ wanted Peter to be present at his transfiguration “as the chief who had taken up the government of the whole Church.” Hence Ephrem says in serm. De Transfiguratur. that as the one Moses was prince of the Hebrews, so Peter was constituted prince of the Church of Christians. And many things can be seen in Gregory, hom.21 In Evangel., and bk.3, Epistolar., epist.39, elsewhere epist.67, and bk. 1, epist.24.

14. Finally if we wish to give some reason for this divine counsel, it is necessary to separate the institution of the governance from the choice of the person. For we can give for the choice of the person no proper cause besides the divine good pleasure. For although God had disposed Peter with that faith and love which rendered him worthy for taking up such ministry, as from the words of Matthew and John above treated is manifest; yet the faith of Peter was not the first reason for his election, but the will of God, for because he chose them, therefore did he call him, so that by cooperating with his call he might most worthily become Vicar of Christ. But of the institution of the primacy the proper reason was what Cyprian, Pope Leo, and other Fathers have touched on, the unity of the Church and the best governance for it, because if in the Church there had not been one head to which the diverse members of the Church might have recourse, it would easily be broken by diverse schisms, as Anselm too above rightly said.

15. But so that its governance might be best it was necessary that this head be one monarch, for monarchy is the best form of governance of all, as from the Fathers, the theologians, the philosophers, and the historians is learnedly shown by Cardinal Bellarmine, bk.1, De Romano Pontifice, ch.2 and following. But if in other human communities and kingdoms this is true, much more certainly was it necessary in the governance of the whole Church; because since the ecclesiastical republic is the most ample, and has been instituted for the whole world, it could not conveniently be by one supreme power governed if such power did not in one man reside. For if it were in a congregation of many, there would not be in the world a power apt for ruling except when such persons were gathered into one council. How then could it supply aid for difficulties that arise when such a congregation is wanting, or by whom could it be with efficacy compelled if there was in the Church no head to which this sort of general providence and care of the Church might perpetually belong? This reason certainly gives conviction that the primacy of Peter was morally necessary; and the same reason gives conviction that that primacy was not for the person of Peter alone but perpetual, as is made convincing by these words too, 'the gates of hell shall not prevail against it,' as was largely proved in book 1 and will in the following be amply confirmed.

Chapter 11: Satisfaction is made to objections against the doctrine of the previous chapter.

Summary: 1. No one can accuse the primacy of Peter of novelty. Peter cannot be said to be prince of the apostles except by reason of supreme majesty. 2. Objection of the king from Scripture against the proof of the primacy of Peter. 3. Solution to the objection. Catholics prove immediately from Scripture only the primacy of Peter in spiritual things. 4. When a Pontiff might take kingdoms away from temporal princes. 5. Second objection. 6. Response. The words of John 21: "Feed my sheep" are said to Peter alone. 7. First exposition of the words of Matthew 16: "And upon this rock, etc." Second exposition. Even the authors of the aforesaid expositions establish Peter as foundation of the Church. How the foundation of the Church on Peter and on faith agree. 8. The exposition of Augustine is expounded and explained. 9. The power of binding and loosing was in Peter perpetual and independent, but in the others by dependence on him. 10. Certain places of Augustine are expounded. 11. The exposition of the words of Augustine is also proved from the words of Christ. 12. The instance posed by the King in his Preface, p.58. It is refuted. 13. An inferior prelate could add in his censure that he is doing it by power received from the Pontiff; but to add that he is doing it in virtue of the Pope is not appropriate. 14. A final objection taken from various indications. Four indications of this sort. 15. Peter has obtained first place as head in all congresses. To the first indication. 16. To the second. 17. To the third. 18. To the fourth.

1. Against the primacy of Peter understood in the sense declared by us in the previous chapter some things are touched on in passing and as if incidentally by King James, which it is necessary to satisfy. For he says on p.60 of his Preface, “It is indeed true that Peter, by reason of both age and time when he was called by Christ, was one of the principal apostles, a prince in the order of those twelve whom Christ first chose, and one of the three whom for the sake of preserving the order he placed above the rest.” And on p.59 the doctrine, which we have shown to be Catholic, he does not fear to call “recent and novel.” Which is for me an effective argument that the Protestants either have not read the holy Fathers or have basely deceived their king. For from what has been said it is clearer than light that the doctrine handed down about the primacy of Peter began with the Church itself and is founded on the words of Christ understood in the way that the most ancient Fathers have expounded: none therefore, who does not wish on purpose to deceive or be deceived (which is not to be believed of the most serene king), can call this doctrine recent or novel. He spoke then out of deception or ignorance about the truth, not however an ignorance probable or that could excuse him of grave lapse and guilt, since he could easily dispel the ignorance and error, if he wished. Besides there is the fact that if he confesses Peter was a prince of the twelve apostles, what, I ask, is that which he adds, “prince in the order” or “for the sake of preserving the order”? Or what is that order, or in what excellence or dignity of person is it founded? For every order, so that it may justly and prudently be constituted among certain persons, requires in them some foundation of excellence or excess or inequality which might, to the constituting of the order, be proportioned and accommodated.

If Peter, therefore, has no dignity or power greater than the other apostles nor jurisdiction over them, according to what order is he called prince of them? For superiority in age or priority of vocation are with God of little moment, with whom, as there is no acceptance of persons, so there is no difference of ages: nay, in his sight often the last are first and the first last. Especially so because it is not clear that Peter was older than the other apostles, or was called before all of them, since at least Andrew preceded him, as is taken about his vocation from John 1, and about his age the probable opinion of Epiphanius, Haeres. 51. Also neither can that order be founded in grades of sanctity, for this judgment is reserved to God; nor has it hitherto been revealed to us who among the apostles was in true sanctity greater with God than the rest. Nor again is it enough that Christ behaved as family with him and that in some acts he seems to have preferred him to certain others; for by this reason even John could be said to be prince in order; nay, James too, for he was one of the three whom in certain activities Christ wished to have as particular associates. Besides, because the sole special display by Christ of favor or love was not sufficient foundation for any order among the apostles that was going to remain after Christ’s departure. Add that the king always speaks of political order in the Church’s hierarchy, to which that past favor or benevolence has little reference, nor will any prudent man repute Paul to be lesser in order because he was not of those three or because he did not as family adhere to Christ while alive in mortal body.

Lastly in the way indeed that Peter is deemed prince among the apostles it was not from man but from Christ, and so he had by divine right that principality; therefore if he was prince in the order, it must be that such order was created and instituted by Christ himself. But we do not read that Christ instituted in his Church any dignities which, on account of political order alone, may claim for themselves a special honor or the first sees in seating or speaking, but we only read, 1 Corinthians 12, that Christ placed in the Church first apostles, second prophets, third doctors, other pastors and doctors, and lastly distributed other graces or ministries: but in all these Peter cannot be said to be prince among the apostles by reason of order. So that we then may assert what is true, the thought of such political order in the Church of Christ as something instituted by himself is recent and novel; for the order among Peter and the other apostles was founded in superior power for ruling and governing both them and the universal Church in perpetuity. And this Christ taught us and we read it in the ancient Fathers, but the rest are human inventions or novelties.

2. But in the first place the king inveighs against the double proof of the primacy of Peter from those places: "Thou art Peter," and "Feed my sheep." And first indeed, as if mocking Bellarmine, he says, p.22: "Nor does the last chapter of my disputation make attack with other machines than with those words of Christ, 'Feed my sheep,' 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven.'" But later on p.24 he says: "Thus does he make up a new and no doubt egregious sense for those words of Christ, 'Feed my sheep etc.,' as if they signified, 'Take away, proscribe, depose Christian princes and kings.' With these too, 'Whatsoever thou shalt loose, etc.'" And lastly on p.128 he goes so far as to call "shameless and impudent" the "violence which on the sense of those places the Cardinal brings to bear, that from them he should erect the supreme power of the Pontiff in temporal matters over kings and princes." But in these words no reason or testimony is stated in objection, but only are propounded the abuses and calumnies of the Protestants on which the king rests his faith, and for that reason we might easily pass them over; but lest anyone, through confusion and ignorance of the truth, should be moved by them, there is need to distinguish the false from the true and to explain the whole matter.

3. Bellarmine, therefore, and all of us who are together in this cause, do not from those places prove proximately and immediately the primacy of Peter in civil or temporal things, but in ecclesiastical or spiritual things. But whether this spiritual power is extended to temporal things is another question to be treated of, and to be decided, by both authority of ecclesiastical tradition and force of reason, from the prior foundation of the supreme spiritual power proved by the aforesaid testimonies. But the king so reports the proof of Bellarmine as if by those testimonies he wished to prove the Pontiff to be absolute temporal lord of all kingdoms and able by his choice to give them or take them away, which is very far from his true mind. Hence, in his response, he modestly and prudently asks: "Where, I ask, in my book did you see so impolitic and shameless an exposition?" It was not he, therefore, who affixed the sense to the words of Christ which nowhere appears in his books; but he who deceived you, O king, affixed that sense without any appearance of verisimilitude. The sense, therefore, which Bellarmine affixed to those testimonies is the same with that whereby we have proved the primacy of Peter in spiritual things, which is truly a sense outstanding indeed and not new, but proved by the common consent of the ancient Fathers.

4. But from this sense by inference and necessary connection rightly could Bellarmine demonstrate by the same testimonies the power of Peter for deposing kings, not indeed all of them at his decision, “such that he could give and take away kingdoms at pleasure,” as the king says on p.23, but heretical and incorrigible ones, either for their worthy punishment or for the necessary defense of his sheep, and therefore not by absolute dominion or direct power (as they say), but by indirect. Let not then the king of England say that the words “feed my sheep” are so expounded by us as to mean “take away, proscribe, depose Christian princes,” for this no Catholic has said. But if he wishes what is true sincerely testified, we say, among the many other things that are contained in those words and in the power given through them, that also this is, “take away, proscribe, depose heretical kings” who do not wish to be corrected, and who are in things pertaining to the Catholic faith pernicious. But this sense imposes no violence on the words of Christ and is by necessary consequence elicited from them; nor is it new but proved by the perpetual tradition of the Church, nor is therefrom a direct power of Peter in temporal matters but only an indirect one collected, which we showed cannot from the supreme spiritual power be separated.

5. But the king continues by objecting to the exposition of those places as they are introduced for proving the singular spiritual power of Peter. And first he seems to argue from the authority even of Catholic doctors, who have in various ways interpreted those places, whence addressing Bellarmine, p.58, he says: “But neither is he ignorant what reason the ancients introduce as to why to Saint Peter Christ entrusted his sheep to feed.” Next he himself seems to approve the exposition of those who say that both places, namely “I will give unto thee the keys” and “feed my sheep,” were said indeed to Peter but pertained to all the apostles, whose persons Peter was himself bearing. Which he confirms hence, that elsewhere the power of the keys was conceded in the plural number, Matthew 18.18: “Whatsoever ye (plural) shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye (plural) shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.” From which words he wishes to collect that the power of the keys was not less conferred on the other apostles than on Peter and that he therefore did not have the primacy. Nay, many are they among the Protestants who not only on the apostles but on the whole Church wish the power of the keys to have been conferred, because in the place cited from Matthew Christ had said, 18.17: “Tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican;” and immediately, as if giving the reason, he subjoins: “Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven.” Here then is a sign that Christ spoke to the apostles or disciples insofar as they were representing the Church or contained it virtually.

6. But because this objection involves both testimonies and there is not altogether the same reason in each of them, they must be spoken about in turn. And in the first place, about the words “feed my sheep,” I do not find among the ancient Fathers dissenting opinions or expositions, neither about the person to whom individually “feed” is said, nor about the signification of the verb ‘feed’, nor about the persons comprehended under the name of sheep and lambs. For although in expounding these two last terms there be some variety, whether the two terms ‘lambs’ and ‘sheep’ signify the same or diverse persons, yet in truth there is no discrepancy that might have importance for the present cause. For all Catholics agree that the whole flock of Christ and all the sheep were committed to Peter, whether under the individual terms of ‘lambs’ and ‘sheep’ they were all signified or whether under both at the same time because of diverse properties. And hence it necessarily follows that the words pertained to Peter alone, and that they were said to him not as bearing the person of others but most properly and specifically because of the individual office committed to him. Which from the common consent of the Fathers in the preceding chapter is sufficiently proved, and can from the context itself be sufficiently proved. Both because Christ by asking Peter: "Lovest thou me more than these?" sufficiently distinguished him from the others so that he was only dealing with him in his proper person, not as representative of the rest but as distinct from them. And also because under the name of 'sheep' he comprehended the other apostles, as was above proved: therefore the verb 'feed' was necessarily said to Peter as to a sole individual or as to a pastor who had under a certain reason been uniquely constituted; because the individual apostles could not at the same time be pastors of the same universes; neither was any of them made pastor of Peter in the way that Peter was constituted as pastor of all the rest.

Nor did any of the ancient Fathers, as I said, understand the words as to 'this rock' in some other way. For although some Fathers say that what Christ then said to Peter was also said to the rest of the apostles and pastors of the Church, they understand it to be said to Peter as in exemplary fashion and that it fits the others according to fitting proportion. For although Peter alone be constituted universal pastor of the Church, there is no exclusion of particular pastors to whom singly, not all, but some of the sheep might be committed, according to that verse of 1 Peter 5.2: "Feed the flock of God which is among you," where the phrase 'which is among you' determines a particular flock, and of Acts 20.28: "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Spirit hath made you rulers." Just as therefore other pastors are assumed to a part of the care along with Peter, so ought they to understand that to him was it said: "Lovest thou me? Feed my sheep." Not because Christ, when he pronounced almost the like words, was speaking formally to all particular pastors or to Peter in the person of all; but because the virtue and reason of the words of Christ have with proportion place in all pastors. For they could not rightly be disposed for feeding the flock of Christ unless they loved Christ himself. And in this sense Augustine in his book De Agone Christiano, said: "When it is said to Peter, it is said to all: Lovest thou me? Feed my sheep."

7. I come to the other place, Matthew 16, wherein there is some greater variety of expositions, especially as to the words: "And upon this rock;" for sometimes the Fathers give exposition that the demonstrative 'this' designates the faith of Christ, God and man, on which they say the Church is founded, as Chrysostom there indicates, hom.55, and Hilary. And frequently others are wont to say that the faith is the foundation of the Church. But others give as exposition that Christ, by saying "upon this rock", designated himself, because as is said 1 Corinthians 3.11: "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ," about whom it is said, 10.4: "And that rock was Christ." Which exposition is contained in Augustine, tract.27 and 124 on John, and serm. De Verbis Domini. However none of the Fathers who have expounded this place in other ways denied that Peter was in a special way the rock and foundation of the Church, as was above shown about Hilary and Chrysostom, and the same holds of Ambrose and others who are wont to be alleged for the former exposition. For in the same places they say both things, namely that Peter and that the faith of Christ or his confession are the foundation of the Church. For both under diverse reasons are true, that Peter as Vicar of Christ, holding his place in his absence, is the foundation of the Church and that he after Christ in his own way supports it. But the faith is said to be the foundation as the reason of the founding (to so say), for because of his singular faith Peter was made the foundation of the Church and, by his faith, is constituted a firm rock accommodated to founding the Church. In this sense, therefore, the said Fathers spoke, and Chrysostom, homil.2 on Psalm 50, said: "Because of the strength of his confession is he called Peter, the Lord saying: Thou art Peter and upon this rock, etc." But if the speech is not about the faith of Peter specifically but about faith in general, that too is said to be the foundation of the Church, because it is the first reason and as it were the form of the Church constituting and uniting its members. And in this way are those words sometimes wont, by accommodation and in mystical sense, to be applied to the whole Church and to the individual faithful, as Origen did, tract.4 on Matthew; who yet does not deny that in a proper and literal sense Peter alone is there signified by Christ with the name 'rock' and is promised as foundation of the Church, as from the same is clear in homil.5 on Exodus.

8. But the other opinion of Augustine, that Christ is the rock, it is, considered in itself as to doctrine, most true but, as to the sense of the words of Christ, it can be difficult to accommodate. For nothing truer can be said than that Christ is the corner stone and rock on which principally the Church is founded; nay that Christ alone is per se and by his virtue the foundation of the Church. But that in the cited place of Matthew Christ spoke about himself or that by saying, "upon this rock" he signified himself, cannot in truth be accommodated to the literal and proper sense of the words, as is manifest from what was said in the previous chapter. Hence either the exposition of Augustine is not delivered by him as literal but as mystical, or it must be reduced to the preceding exposition. For he speaks of Christ as he is object of the faith which Peter confessed, and thus in this way is Christ by "this rock" said to be indicated, faith in whom no doubt is as if the reason for which Peter has been made the foundation of the Church. But that Augustine did thus speak about Christ can be taken from his words. For bk.1 Retractionum ch.21, he speaks in this way: "Afterwards I thus expounded what was said by the Lord, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock, ...' so that 'upon this' might be understood as him whom Peter confessed when he said, 'Thou art the Christ, etc.'" Add that Augustine proposes this sense not as certain but as probable and that he was moved to it by the diversity of the terms 'Peter' and 'rock' which diversity in reality was nothing, as I already said. Finally Augustine does not exclude the other sense and much less does he doubt the truth of the opinion that Peter was also the rock on which the Church is founded; for he often teaches it in the places mentioned in the previous chapter; and in the said ch.21 of 1 Retractionum he says that that sense is chanted by the mouth of many in the verses of the most blessed Ambrose: "At the sound of this [the cockcrow] the rock itself of the Church washed away its guilt."

9. Next as to what the king objects about the words, "whatsoever thou shalt bind," because elsewhere it is said in the plural, "whatsoever ye shall bind," it contains no difficulty; for it is certain that Peter and the apostles received the power of binding and loosing; but that difference of words shows that the power was to Peter promised in other wise than it was to all the apostles. For to Peter was it promised as ordinary and universal and always to remain in the Church, but to the other apostles it was given, or only as it were delegated, for their persons; or if it be considered as it was going to remain in the bishops their successors, it was given as dependent on Peter and through Peter, as Pope

Leo, Anselm, and the other Fathers above mentioned have noted. And from the circumstances of each place the fact is manifestly collected, as from the things said in the previous chapter is sufficiently clear. As in John 20 Christ had said generally to Peter and the others, “As the Father hath sent me even so send I you,” and nevertheless in ch.21 he specially said to Peter, “Feed my sheep,” namely as supreme pastor over everyone even the apostles themselves.

10. Nor are there obstacles to this truth in the several testimonies of Augustine, which are wont to be objected here, that he said that Peter when receiving the keys signified the Church; for he understood that Peter signified the Church because it was as prince of the Church that he received the power of the keys, not for his person only but as the keys were to endure perpetually in the Church of Christ and in his successors and other Pontiffs and his helpers the bishops. And so Augustine said tract.50 on John: “If to Peter alone (that is, for his person alone) this was said, the Church does not do this,” because, to be sure, its power would have died with Peter. Hence because even now the Church binds and looses he infers: therefore “Peter when receiving the keys certainly signified the holy Church.” Which inference would have been nothing if he had understood that Peter represented the Church as standing in the place of it, because that neither necessarily follows nor is true. Since neither did the Church commit this representation or delegation to Peter nor did Christ do it by his power, since he did not signify it by his words. Therefore Augustine understood that Peter then represented the Church by reason of his primacy and his see, for thus what is given to the head on account of the body is deemed to be given to the Church in its head, just as what is given to a king for ruling is reputed to be given to the kingdom. And thus did the same Augustine say, tract.124 on John, that Peter because of his primacy bore the person of the Church. Which he very openly explains when he says: “The Church, which is founded on Christ, received the keys of the kingdom of heaven in Peter.”

11. Next, this was also the way of speaking of Christ, Matthew 18: “Tell it unto the Church,” that is, to the pastors of the Church, as everyone expounds and as the thing itself proclaims; for the sin of a brother could not be denounced to the whole company of the Church, but pastors are in the name of the Church signified because the Church is in the bishop as in its head. In a like way, therefore, is Peter in the cited places said to have represented the Church. And in this way too is left solved what was objected from the same place of Matthew, because what Christ subjoined: “but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican,” he understood in the like way of the pastors of the Church; to the same therefore or by reason of them did he say: “Whatsoever ye shall bind,” and here he spoke in the plural because sins were not to be denounced only to the supreme Pastor but also to the rest, and therefore, as we said, that statement was made without prejudice to Peter’s individual power. “For if he wanted the rest of the princes to have anything common along with Peter, never did he except through Peter give what he did not deny to the others,” as Pope Leo excellently says, serm.3 Assumptionis Suae.

12. But yet against this response the king further urges these words: “But if it were not so (that is, if not all the apostles or if Peter not in the name of them all received the keys from Christ equally), how, I ask, could Paul (1 Corinthians 5) be to the Church of the Corinthians the author with his spirit of that incestuous man’s excommunication? Surely it was necessary to say ‘with the spirit of Peter’. How could all the apostles make use of their censures in the name of Christ and not anywhere make mention of his Vicar?" But this conjecture is of little moment. For in the first place although to Peter individually were the keys given, nevertheless on Paul too and the other apostles Christ immediately conferred the power of binding and loosing; and therefore rightly could they pass censures in the name and virtue of Christ, whose proximate ministers they were, without making mention of Peter. Next, even if they had received power immediately from Peter (as now bishops do, according to the more probable opinion), it was not necessary, in passing sentence of excommunication, to make mention of the Vicar of Christ, just as neither do Catholic bishops now, although they recognize the Roman Bishop as the Vicar of Christ, when they pass sentence of excommunication, say in the name or by the virtue of the Pope, but either they simply use their ordinary power or they can also say in the virtue of Christ or through the power by Christ conceded to them. And the reason is that although Peter is as the universal Pastor of the Church, he is yet not the principal Author and Lord but his Vicar. Hence even Peter himself when passing censure could say in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that is, by his office and authority. Therefore the same could be done by the inferior prelates, because they have authority, albeit through the mediation of Peter as dispenser, principally from Christ and operate in virtue of him. Just as when a viceroy of some kingdom or province has often received from the king authority for establishing governors and magistrates in cities and yet they all in their public pronouncements and especially when they make use of the sword profess that they are doing it by authority of the king and not of the viceroy.

13. Nor yet do I deny that a minister or legate of the Pontiff could say when excommunicating that he does it by power received from the Pontiff. For they would speak truth and without injury to Christ, because by those words the effect is not attributed to the Pontiff as principal cause simply but only as in the class of a minister or a Vicar communicating his jurisdiction. But it would perhaps be otherwise if it were said in the name or virtue of Peter or of the Pope, because these words seem to signify the authority of the principal Lord, as Saint Thomas thinks on 1 Corinthians 5. And therefore such a mode of speaking is not in use. But another mode, namely 'by authority conceded to me by the Pope' or something similar is wont sometimes to be used by ecclesiastical judges, especially those who are delegates. Yet I say that even that way of speaking is not necessary nor used by ordinary pastors, as bishops are, who after having received power use their right in the manner of proximate cause. But in the apostles, as I said, a greater reason comes into play, because not from Peter but immediately from Christ did they have authority. Hence it is clear that deservedly did Paul say "and with my spirit;" nor did he have to say, nay he could not say, "and with the spirit of Peter;" both because of the reason given, that Paul did not have power from Peter since he was an apostle not by men nor through men but through Jesus Christ, as he himself says, Galations 1; and also because there the phrase 'and with my spirit' does not signify the virtue or power of operating but a necessary condition for judging, namely sufficient knowledge of the cause, as is plain from the words, 1 Corinthians 5.3: "For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed," for in the same sense he subjoins, v.4: "when ye are gathered together and my spirit," that is, my knowledge and spiritual presence. But this condition could not be attributed to Peter, nay not properly to Christ either, because it is a proper and personal condition requisite on the part of the minister, and in addition to this is required the authority of the principal Lord, and therefore Paul added, v.4: “with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ.”

14. Finally the king brings as objection certain indications directly against the primacy of Peter. One is “because in all the congresses of the apostles we read that Peter sat among them as one out of many,” as in the Council of which mention is made in Acts 15. Where also, for the sending of the messengers, it is only said, v.22: “Then pleased it the apostles and priests with the whole Church to send chosen men.” “But,” says the king, “about the head of the Church pure silence. Thus in their letters mention is made of apostles, elders, and brothers, but about Peter not a word.” The second indication is that Paul, 1 Corinthians 1, reprehends those who say “I am of Cephas” equally with those who say “I am of Paul, and I of Apollos,” when however, if Cephas was head of the Church, they who were not standing by him ought the rather to be condemned as defectors from the faith and only the followers of Peter should be held to be faithful. The third indication is that Paul, in Galatians 2, dealt then with Peter in so little kindly a way that he did not only put himself on an equality with him but even made himself superior. As fourth indication, although it is put by way of derision, he adds that Paul, Galatians 1, when he says he went up to Jerusalem “to see Peter and deal with him about certain things,” did not add that “he also went there for holy kissings of his feet.”

15. But these and the like things are not worthy to be proposed against the authority of the whole Church and the sufficiently express words of Christ, yet satisfaction must be made to them lest we seem to omit something. To the first in the first place we say that what is assumed is false, for in Acts 1 a certain congress of Apostles is reported and yet not only is Peter placed as head in the first place but he even himself, as head, addresses the whole band, and makes decree about creating a twelfth apostle in place of Judas, which decree the others followed. Where rightly does Chrysostom say, homil.3: “How fervent he is, how he acknowledges the flock entrusted by Christ, how in this choir he is prince.” Therefore, with Chrysostom as witness, whom others follow, in that congress Peter is put forward as superior to the rest and as bearing universal care. Which thing is also noted by Pope Leo IX, epist. to Michael, ch.16, saying that there Peter made use of his authority. Hence it is not without cause that almost always when the apostles are numbered Peter is put in the first place as leader and prince of the rest, which, that it was not done by chance nor because of another excellence or prerogative, Bellarmine learnedly shows in bk.1 De Summo Pontifice, ch.18. Therefore also in the Council of Jerusalem he is first to speak and pronounces his opinion with great authority, which, that it also pertained to his primacy and (so to say) to his presidency in the Council, many have noted. Hence it was not necessary that afterwards, in decreeing the mission of the legates or in the form of the decree, any special mention of Peter be made, both because mention had already been sufficiently made of Peter and his opinion, and also because it was not specially in the name of Peter but in the name of the whole Council that the letter and definition were written. There can be added too that in authority and in the spirit of not erring in the faith the apostles then had a certain equality, and therefore in this respect all had been placed in the first order.

16. To the second indication we reply that it pertains not at all to the present cause; for as Chrysostom notes, orat.3 on 1 Corinthians, that among the Corinthians “the schisms were not on the ground of disagreement in faith but on the ground of division of opinion in human contention.” Which the same Paul sufficiently explained, both by sweetly and gently imploring them to be, v.10, “perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment,” and also by explaining what the contentions were, because they were glorying about private masters or baptizers and were being named from them, saying, v.12, “I am of Paul, I of Apollos, I of Cephas.” But Paul but his own and Peter’s and Apollos’ name, not because in fact the divisions and contentions were under these names, but putting them there in the place of those who were the heads of the factions, either so that he should not, by naming them, exacerbate things further, or so that he might the more exaggerate the thing; for if under the names of the prince-apostles it was not licit to make contentions and divisions, much less under the names of others. Since, therefore, the contentions were only that each was glorying about his own master of minister, as if it was better by him to be baptized or taught, it was not necessary either to condemn those who were not named from Cephas or to praise those who gloried of his baptism, but only to commend those who said: “I am of Christ.” Because neither those who said “I am of Paul or Apollos” were dissenting from Peter, the visible head, in faith but only in a special affection or admiration for their baptism or master; nor were those who said they were of Peter in this to be tolerated; because although Peter was visible head, yet he was not as the supreme prince but as vicar of the prince, who is Christ alone, from whom alone are Christians to be named. Nor even by private affections for Peter and Paul was Christ or the name of Christians to be divided, because neither is baptism better by the fact that it is given by a better minister nor are the like contentions to be moved in the Church.

17. About the third indication, taken from the deed of Paul resisting Peter, many things could be said if they had not recently been said by us in bk 9 De Legibus, and therefore I say briefly that the ancient heretics too took thence an argument against the dignity or rather against the doctrine of Peter. To whom in one word Tertullian responds, De Prasecrip. Haeret., when he says: “Besides if Peter was reprehended, the fault was in his behavior not in his preaching.” Therefore it is false that Paul either dealt with Peter in an unkindly way or that he made himself equal, much less that he made himself superior. For come. If the king of England were to do something carelessly or to the scandal of his subjects, and some one of his family or his council were to warn him that he was not acting rightly, or that he was unjust, or was of some little offense to others, would he therefore be making himself superior to the king or not recognizing him as king? Not at all, otherwise it will never be licit for a subordinate fraternally to correct his prelate, or to resist him with due reverence, so that public scandal might be taken away; which is something that cannot be said. Therefore from that deed of Paul cannot be collected that he placed himself before Peter in power or prelacy, for although he was inferior he could use that office of charity. And so was that place understood by Augustine, ep.19, and St. Thomas, IIa IIae, q.33, a.4, ad2.

18. To the fourth, about the journey of Paul to see Peter, Galatians 1, certainly Jerome did not doubt there to say that he went up “with the desire to give honor to the first apostle;” and Ambrose: “It was worthy that he should desire to see Peter, who was first among the apostles, to whom the Savior had delegated the care of the churches.” And other Fathers too often speak thus. And although we confess that from the sole act of Paul the prelacy of Peter cannot be necessarily collected, yet on the supposition of other testimonies commending the dignity of Peter, a great indication can therefrom be taken that Paul recognized Peter as his head and universal pastor of the Church, and therefore as soon as he conveniently could, he went up to Jerusalem to visit him and to give him due honor. Nor is it to be doubted but that Paul for his humility would desire to kiss the feet of Peter, but neither the modesty nor submission of Peter would have permitted it; nor finally was it necessary for Paul in that place to report the mode of honor and reverence which he showed to Peter. But about the custom of venerating the Pontiff through kissing his feet, which the king of England here tacitly wishes to disparage, here is not the place to speak; let him who wishes read Joseph Stephanus in his opusculum De Adorat. Pedum, in vol.3 of his tractates.

Chapter 12: Whether the primacy of Peter perpetually and by succession persists in the Church.

Summary: 1. Error of heretics. 2. Conclusion de fide. The primacy of Peter did not with his life become extinct. Proof from Matthew ch.16. 3. Proof from John ch.21. 4. Evasion. It is rejected. 5. Proof also by reason. 6. Objection. It is dissolved and turned back. 7. The Roman Bishops did not in all privileges succeed Peter in the primacy.

1. There are not lacking at this time heretics who not only deny that Peter or the Roman Pontiff is Pastor of the whole Church, or Vicar of Christ, but also say that even if by hypothesis Peter had that prerogative it became extinct with him, so that in this way they may the more easily deny that it perseveres in the Roman Pontiff. So as, therefore, to overturn this error from its foundations and reach by the same steps the truth aimed at, we will first show in this chapter that Peter, not by extraordinary right or by individual or so to say life privilege, but by ordinary right and reason was created over the Church enduring perpetually into the future Vicar of Christ; afterwards, however, in the following chapter we will turn our step to the Roman Pontiff

2. At the beginning, therefore, we state that the primacy of Peter was not conferred on him alone for his person but that it was instituted in him so that it might endure perpetually in the Church. This can easily be proved from what has been said in the two preceding chapters. For, by this reason, after Christ said to Peter: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church," he immediately adds: "and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," promising the Church's perpetual duration founded on Peter as on a rock most firm and to endure perpetually, as was above in book 1 proved at large, and is confirmed by the other promise of Christ, Luke 22.32: "I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not." And by this reason Augustine said, as we explained in the preceding chapter, that Peter represented the Church when the keys were given to him, because not for his person alone but for his see, so that it might endure perpetually in the Church and rule it and in its way sustain it, were they given to him. Hence as from those words, "Thou art Peter, etc." Ambrose inferred, on Psalms 40, so we can infer, "where the Church, there Peter;" and as long as the Church endures so long does Peter endure, which also Ambrose signified subjoining: "Where the Church, there no death but eternal life," and that is why he added: "And the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Rightly indeed did he say, "where the Church, there no death," because although individuals from the Church die, the Church does not die, and although Peter is deceased, the see of Peter is not deceased.

3. Besides, the other words of Christ, "Feed my sheep," if his intention and the reason of the institution are prudently considered, no less effectively prove the said truth.

For in the first place the reason from the Fathers above adduced, that Christ, by indefinitely commending his sheep to Peter, is understood to have committed all the sheep to his care, proceeds equally of sheep at all times and in all places, because as there were going to be sheep of Christ in diverse places so in diverse times, and the sheep would need some supreme Pastor at every time as also in every place. Next, when Christ said, "Feed my sheep," it is certain that he did not speak only about the sheep that were then already gathered into his fold; for they were few, but Christ was providing for a future Church to be gathered from all nations. Therefore it was not only his present but also his future sheep that he commended to Peter; and since he did not affix a limitation of times, he committed the sheep of all times to Peter, just as we have said about place or as could be said about number. Someone will say that from this is rightly proved that to Peter were commended also future sheep while he himself lived but not future sheep afterwards. For how could he feed sheep in the future after him? The reply is that that is incredible, because otherwise Christ would not have sufficiently provided for his sheep, when however he had no less care for the sheep in the future after the death of Peter than while still alive. Hence rightly does Chrysostom say, homil.55 on Matthew, "Here openly he foretold that there would be a great multitude of those who were and are to believe, and he makes him think higher things and constitutes him Pastor of the Church," namely of the Church composed of all who were and are to believe. Nor is it difficult to explain how Peter after his death could feed the sheep of Christ left in this world. Both because from here we understand that not only to Peter in his person but to the See of Peter, or to Peter as containing in himself as if in seed and foundation all his successors, had Christ commended his sheep. And also because, for this cause, to the pastoral office of Peter it pertained to provide the way in which there would be succession to him so that the sheep of Christ would not be left without Peter as pastor, even if the person of Peter was deceased, and thus until today Peter feeds the sheep of Christ through his successors.

And this is confirmed very well by those words of Christ, John 10.16: "And other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring...and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." For from these we collect that in the Church of Christ there was always so to be one Pastor as one fold, and hence that the Pastor given and instituted by Christ was to endure until the whole flock of Christ should be gathered. Christ also signified in those words that one Pastor was necessary in his Church because of unity of fold; but this unity of fold was to be preserved for all time, because in all time there is one Church; therefore also the one Pastor constituted by Christ was given for all time, not in the same person, but on the same throne, just as the Church is one not in the same persons but in succession of the same people. Hence Augustine says, De Pastorib. ch.13: "Here I find all good pastors in one pastor. For in truth good pastors are not lacking, but they are in one. They are many who are divided. Here one is foretold, because unity is commended. For truly not for this reason are pastors [plural] not now spoken of, that the Lord did not find to whom he might commend his sheep: but for this reason then he commended, that he found Peter. Nay rather in Peter himself he commended unity. The apostles were many and to one it is said: Feed my sheep."

4. But perhaps adversaries will say that that the one Pastor is Christ, for at once Augustine adds: "All good pastors are in one and are one; they feed, Christ feeds." The reply is that Christ indeed is principal Pastor in whom all other pastors together also with Peter labor and are united; yet nevertheless even on earth there needs to be one Pastor, Christ's Vicar, in whom the inferior pastors are proximately united and labor. Because as the Church Militant is visible, so God has placed in it visible pastors and doctors, with whom the people should be united; and in order for the pastors themselves to be united among themselves also one visible Pastor is necessary to hold the place of Christ in his absence. Hence Augustine subjoins: "For also Peter himself, to whom he commended his sheep, he wished to make, as if a second to a second, one with himself, so that in this way he commended him his sheep, so that he might be the head, might carry the figure of the body, that is, of the Church, and that they as bride and bridegroom might be two in one flesh." And serm.24, De Sanctis, ch.2, in the same sense he said: "In the one Peter was figured the unity of all pastors."

But much clearer and fuller is what Cyprian says in his book De Unit. Eccles., near the beginning: "So as to manifest unity he established one chair, and by his authority he disposed for the same unity an origin beginning from one." Where manifestly he distinguishes the institution and disposition of one chair, instituted for conserving the unity of the Church, by Christ himself the institutor of it. And similarly he designates, besides Christ, one other Pastor, so that from him it might draw its origin, not so that with him it might finish. Hence he subjoins: "The beginning advances from unity. The primacy is given to Peter so that one Church of Christ and one Chair might be pointed to," thinking that that chair would endure as long as the Church endures. And this very thing in many other places is signified by the same Cyprian, especially epist.40: "God is one, and Christ is one, and one is the Church, and one is the chair founded by the voice of the Lord on Peter." And epist.55 where he has that celebrated statement, that: "from this arise heresies and schisms, because obedience is not given to the priest of God, and because the one who in the Church in place of Christ is priest for time and judge for time is not thought on." And almost the like is contained in epist.69 to Florentius; and in epist.73 to Iuvaianus he says: "To Peter first, on whom the Lord built the Church and whence he established the origin of unity, he displayed and gave that power, so that that might be loosed in heaven which he had himself loosed on earth." Which place Augustine acknowledges in bk.3 De Baptismo, ch.17, when he says: "That to Peter as in figure of unity the Lord gave power is manifest, because that unity is also said to be one perfect dove." Therefore by reason of that institution it is manifest that it was not only a special favor or grace that was given to the person of Peter, but a disposition of governance that was to last perpetually in the Church.

5. Thence also is taken a moral reason founded on the best government of the Church. For Christ the Lord is supreme King, whom God gave as head over the whole Church, as is said in Ephesians 1, that is, over the triumphant and militant Church, which is one and the one body of Christ, as if constituted from those two parts, as is said in the same place and in Colossians 1. Those two Churches, therefore, are as two partial kingdoms of the one integral kingdom of Christ, and for that reason to him as to its proper king the government of each kingdom pertains. But it could not without a huge and extraordinary miracle happen that Christ should be at once visibly present in each part of this kingdom, and besides the heavenly place, after the resurrection, was by reason of status due to him; and for the faith of believers it was not expedient that Christ should remain visibly among them, as he himself said, John 16.7: "It is expedient for you that I go away;" and for that reason he now rules the celestial kingdom immediately through himself. Therefore since he could not in the same visible way govern this militant part of his kingdom, to his wisdom it pertained to provide therein a mode of governance suited to men. Therefore as this kingdom was going to last as long as the world will last, so the mode of its governance could not be other than that which Christ instituted; and conversely the institution of its governance was so made that it should no less last than the kingdom itself, otherwise it would be imperfect and insufficient. But that institution was of monarchy in Peter, as we have seen; therefore not only for Peter was it made but also for his successors. Which fact is more or less declared in these words by Cyprian, epist.27: "Our Lord, when disposing the rationale of his Church, speaks in the Gospel and says to Peter: 'I say unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church.'" And later: "From here through the interchange of times and successions runs the ordination of bishops and the rationale of the Church, so that the Church might be established on bishops, and every act of the Church might through the same commanders be governed." Where he signifies that not only the succession of the Roman Pontificate but also of all the other bishops is derived from that primary and as it were root institution, which also in his book De Unit. Ecclesiast. he pursues more at large.

Next, that not only to Peter but also to his successors was given power and pastoral care, and thus that his primacy was perpetual, is openly declared by Pope Leo, serm.2, De Assumpt. Sua, when he says: "Even if to many pastors he delegated care of his sheep, yet he himself did not abandon the guarding of his chosen flock. For whose principal and eternal protection we have also received the defense of the apostolic strength, which indeed does not fail of its work; and the firmness of the foundation, on which is constructed the height of the whole Church, does not grow weary under any mass of the temple resting on it. For the solidity of that faith, which is praised in the Prince of the apostles, is perpetual; and as that remains which Peter believed in Christ, so does that remain which Christ in Peter established." And later: "There remains therefore the disposition of the truth..." and the rest of what he pursues. And in a like way Chrysostom, bk.2 De Sacerdot., when treating of the place in John 21, says among other things: "For what cause did Christ shed his blood? Certainly to acquire those sheep whose care he committed both to Peter and to Peter's successors." And he adds: "Rightly therefore and worthily did Christ thus speak, Matthew 24.45: 'Who then is a faithful and wise servant whom the Lord hath made ruler over his household?'" And later he says openly that the successors of Peter now do that "which when Peter was doing, Christ wished him to be endued with authority and to excel by far the rest also of the apostles." Likewise St. Augustine, in his book De Utilitate Credendi ch.16, declares this perpetuity through the successions of bishops from the Apostolic See, and in bk.11 Contra Faustum ch.2, says: "You see in this matter what strength the authority of the Catholic Church has, which, from the most well founded sees themselves of the apostles up to the present day, is made firm by the series and agreement of the bishops in succession to them." And in like way is this truth declared by Optatus, Pacianus, and others whom we will refer to more agreeably in the next chapter.

6. But the heretics can object that because the other apostles only for their own persons received the apostolic appointment or dignity, therefore after their death they did not have successors in that dignity; therefore neither did Peter in his apostolate have a successor, because although he was first among the apostles and had among them received some principality or power for purpose of preserving order and concord, yet no greater reason for succession is found in him than in the others. The reply is that the contrary can by that argument be proved; for in the apostles two things can be considered to have been conferred on them by Christ the Lord, namely, the power of order and the apostolic dignity. The former was nothing other in them beyond ordination, or Episcopal consecration, which pertains to the foundations of the Church, and therefore with them it was not made extinct but in it they have the bishops as successors, as is supposed by Cyprian in his book De Unit. Ecclesiae and in the other epistles cited, by Augustine, Enarrat. in Psalm.44, and by Jerome, epist.85 to Evagrius. And therefore must it about this power be understood, as he says there, that all bishops are equal. But the latter, that is, the apostolic dignity, included many privileges, namely power immediately delegated by Christ for preaching throughout the universal globe with an authority and a special power conceded by Christ himself, according to the verse, John 20.21: “As the Father hath sent me even so send I you.” Again it included many graces and prerogatives accommodated to such an office, as were abundance of the Spirit with confirmation in grace and in faith, along with a certain fullness of knowledge, such that in matters of the faith they could neither deceive nor be deceived, whether by teaching or writing; and again that besides the gift of tongues, which they had for teaching, they had also the direction of the Spirit for canonical writing. Therefore in this dignity it is true that the apostles did not have successors, for it was an extraordinary dignity and requisite only for beginning the dissemination of the Gospel and planting the Church; but it was not necessary for its ordinary governance.

7. Hence on this part too, as regard many of the said prerogatives, there was no succession to Peter. But besides these two parts, something singular was bestowed on Peter, namely the right of supreme Pastor and of Christ’s Vicar in his Church, considered simply and absolutely with respect to any place and any time. And in this Peter is not to be compared with the rest of the apostles, else he would have received nothing singular; and therefore, on this part, the inference is of no moment, and rather (as I said) is it licit to infer the opposite, from the singular concession and by reason of the office. But in the rest of the apostles the Episcopal authority can in a special way be considered as to jurisdiction, insofar as they received the ordinary governance and see of some church, as James the brother of the Lord was constituted bishop of Jerusalem; which however about the others is not certain, although it could have happened by the same reason. As regard this Episcopal authority, therefore, because it is ordinary in the Church, there was also succession to the apostles, as Simeon succeeded to James. And so, in this respect, a comparison can in some way be admitted, but the reason is far different, both because this ordinary Episcopal dignity was not to any apostle beside Peter given by divine right but by the mediation of Peter, as Eusebius reports about James, bk.2 Histor., ch.1, and as is likely about John when he was staying at Ephesus, from Irenaeus, bk.3, ch.3, at the end, so as to omit what the histories say about Andrew, Barnabas, and others. Where, then, the apostles as proper bishops were ruling particular churches, that jurisdiction was contained within certain limits and was conceded to them only within those limits, but the jurisdiction of Peter, which he received immediately from Christ, was universal for the whole Church; and thus it was also proper to him to have in this dignity a successor.

Chapter 13: It is shown from Scripture that it is necessary to believe that the Roman Bishop is the true successor of Peter and that Peter’s power is in him preserved.

Summary: 1. First assertion. 2. First reason for the conclusion. 3. Second reason. 4.

Third reason. 5. Second assertion de fide. 6. The Vicar of Christ should be visible and in a definite see. 7. Proof of the conclusion. 8. In the Roman See alone could Peter have had a successor to his primacy. 9. An evasion of certain heretics is refuted. 10. Another evasion of heretics. 11. It is refuted. The successor to Peter in the Roman episcopate has also necessarily succeeded to the primacy.

1. We take as supposition what has been sufficiently proved in the preceding, that in the Church always some successor to Peter in his universal governance was required; but now we add that he could at each time be only one supreme bishop and one person. Because it has been shown that the ecclesiastical republic and its spiritual governance ought always to be so preserved as it was by Christ established; but it is by Christ's institution a monarchy; therefore it ought to be preserved by succession; therefore there could be only one successor of Peter at the same time or at any time, although there must be multiplication by succession at diverse times. A fuller explanation is that, if several bishops succeeded to Peter at the same time, in three ways could it be understood.

2. In the first way each of them might succeed only to part of the pastoral office, as if by dividing the primacy among themselves, such that the whole would indeed be in all of them at once, but not in each singly nor in all collectively, but divided by parts among the individuals. And this way is what some of the Protestants are reported to have asserted, alleging the remark of Cyprian, De Unit. Eccles.: "The episcopacy is one, whereof a part is by individuals held in solidarity." But this is nothing other than to deny true succession to the primacy of Peter; for, by the very fact that the primacy was divided among many in that way, none of them would be universal Pastor of the Church but only of the part of it which touched them; therefore none of them would be true and (so to say) adequate successor of Peter; for none would be simply supreme for the others to acknowledge, which is what Peter had. And as a result none would be fundamental rock of the Church, and to none of them would pertain the words of Christ "Feed my sheep" insofar as by those words all the sheep were commended to one Pastor. Next, in none of them would the unity of the Church be maintained, but rather the Church would be split among the many of them, just as the West and the East were divided into diverse empires; which, how much it is repugnant to the unity of the Church, was shown above. Nor is the sense of the words of Cyprian that which the Protestants imagine, since the very same Cyprian, both in the same book and in other places already often mentioned, very greatly commends the one chair and the one Bishop of the Catholic Church, without whom its unity could not subsist. Therefore the sense is that the episcopacy of the Church is one but under it there are particular bishops who are called to a part of the care, not as supreme Pastors in their dioceses but under one who is supreme. Which sense is sufficiently declared by Cyprian when he adds: "The Church too is one, which is extended into a broader multitude by increase of fertility." And after various examples, taken from the many roots and branches and rivers that have unity in their origin, he concludes about the unity of Church in this way: "But there is one head and one origin and one mother rich in results of fertility," which mother he elsewhere designates in particular, as we will soon see.

3. In the second way the succession of several at the same time in the primacy of Peter could be thought of, not as divided but as collective, and by way of one tribunal or congregation. And this way is how they could have been thinking who, notwithstanding the primacy of Peter, said that a General Council was above the Pope. Although they would perhaps be compelled to say that even at the time of Peter the Council of the apostles or bishops was above Peter, because the same proportion should be kept; nor is there greater reason about one time than about another; nay, nor could the doctrine otherwise stand, as I will immediately show. But to think in this way about Peter and his primacy is not only not founded in the Gospel but is even repugnant to the words of Christ, as is clear from all the things we have said about the primacy of Peter. For Christ commended his sheep simply to Peter, whether each individual singly or the whole flock of them together, and the power over it he bestowed on Peter, and for that reason he established him as foundation of the body of the Church. But to the sheep themselves, whether divided or to the whole flock at the same time, not only was no power over Peter given but no power at all is even said to have been immediately conferred on them by Christ. But about this elsewhere, for now we have sufficiently proved that to Peter simply was given power over the whole Church, not for his person only but that it might succeed him. On this supposition, therefore, we say that a successor in the power which Peter had could only be one person and not a congregation of several, otherwise Christ's institution would have been changed from monarchy to aristocracy, which could not be without the authority of the same Christ, which has not been revealed either by Scripture or tradition. And besides it would not be succession but would be a new creation, or the institution of a second governance, whose origin it would be necessary to show; for Peter's primacy has, by force of the first institution, persevered through succession alone, as has been shown. Next, abstracting from the question about comparing the Pope and a Council, it is certain that Peter had primacy in the whole Church as long as a council was not actually gathered together, whose gathering together would depend on the will of Peter since he himself alone would be superior in the whole Church; therefore the successor too of Peter in this power ought to be one person, bearing one episcopacy, whatever might thence follow about the comparison of it with a Council, which matter is for our present purpose of no importance.

4. Finally in the third way it could be thought that Peter has together and at the same time several successors, having both divided and in solidarity a complete primacy and a universal pastoral care. And this way has not even by any heretic been asserted or thought out. For in the first place it involves a repugnancy because, if several are first, none of them is first positively, that is as superior over all, but at most negatively, that is as not having another above him; but each alternative is repugnant. Because from the first member it follows that none of them has succeeded Peter in the primacy, because Peter was positively superior to all and pastor simply of all Christ's sheep apart from himself, which thing none of them would have. From the second member, however, the unity of the Church is both destroyed and its body is given a monstrous shape, as having at the same time two equal heads, which could have neither peace nor concord between them. And for that reason even nature as a whole abhors this multitude of powers, as the Philosopher also said at the end of the Metaphysics, and in a better way Cyprian De Idolor. Vanit. and Athanasius Contra Idola. Hence the very brute animals too are wont to follow one leader, as Jerome says at large in epistle 4. Next, if the other apostles did not have with Peter a similar equality how could it be imagined that any bishop afterwards was equal in jurisdiction to the successor of Peter? Or what institution or necessity could be imagined for several at the same time in a succession, full and in solidarity, of one power? It is certain, therefore, that the successor of Peter could only be one person or one bishop. After he has been legitimately created, as Cyprian rightly said, epistle 52:

“Whoever now wishes to be the bishop must be thrust outside; nor may he have the Episcopal ordination who does not hold the unity of the Church. Whoever that man may be, though he boast much of himself and make most claim for himself, he is profane, he is alien, he is outside. And since there could not be a second one after the first, whoever is made after the one, who ought to be only one, he is not now second but nothing.” Let it therefore be settled that in the one Episcopal see, or in the one series of bishops, this succession ought to be established.

5. We therefore hence conclude that only the Roman Bishop is the true successor of Peter and that the power given to Peter for feeding the sheep of Christ persists in him. This assertion is certain and ought to be held by Catholic Faith; for although expressly and in exact terms it is not read in sacred Scripture, it is in the principles therein revealed virtually contained, because it is by the Church sufficiently declared, nay by a certain evidence and experience of things it is clear. The declaration in the first place, for we have it from the Scriptures, is that to Peter was given the primacy of the Church as something that was going to endure in it perpetually, as has sufficiently been proved. But this endurance, since it was not going to be in one and the same person, was necessarily going to be by succession of several persons in the same dignity, and this is contained sufficiently in Scripture, not by any addition but by legitimate interpretation of the same Scripture. But in which see or bishopric this succession and the series of persons succeeding to this dignity was to be left is not related by Scripture, because the canonical history of the New Testament does not reach up to the death of Peter. And therefore, to make clear with certainty for the Church that it was fulfilled in such and such a see and that up to the present day is fulfilled the institution that Christ made and that is revealed in Scripture, it is enough that the application (so to say) of that institution and dignity to such and such a bishopric be proposed very sufficiently to the same Church through evident and continuous tradition and a usage very well known.

6. For just as we showed in the first book from the reason, institution, and end of the Church of Christ that it was necessary for it to be visible individually and with particularity, so that from the institution and office of the Vicar of Christ it was necessary for it to be visible to the Church in a particular and determinate see and succession. For what would it profit the Church to believe confusedly that there was on earth some bishop or some bishopric with the power and office of the Vicar of Christ, if it did not know in particular and with certainty believe which was such bishopric? Or how could the sheep follow their pastor, or have recourse to him, or hear and recognize his voice, if they did not believe in particular that such bishop was sitting in such see or bishopric? Just as therefore the Church visible is not by human only but also by divine faith believed to be the true Church, because the sensible signs by which it is seen are not the reason for believing but propose as evidently credible that it is the true Church which God revealed would always exist in the world; so must it be believed not by human faith only but also by divine that the Roman Pontiff is the visible head of this Church in the place of Christ, because the signs by which we point out this head make it evidently credible that he is the one whom Christ, by force of his institution, established as his Vicar. In this way, then, we say that the posited assertion is de fide and that it is in Scripture, with the tradition of the Church adjoined, sufficiently contained.

7. It remains for us to adduce the signs and testimonies of this evident credibility. And the first and as it were the fundamental one is that St. Peter sat in the Roman bishopric in the last period of his life and there died; for hence the consequence is made that his successors continued in the same see. So as better to understand the antecedent, we can distinguish three times or states in Peter after the ascension of Christ. In the first he presided over the universal Church of Christ without determination to a proper and special care of any particular bishopric, namely for five or six years before he fixed his see at Antioch, as is clear from Eusebius in his History and from other ancient histories. In the second Peter sat for seven years at Antioch, from the last year of Tiberius. When these were finished, in the second or, as some wish, the third year of Claudius, and the year 44 or 45 of the advent of Christ, he founded the Roman Church and transferred his see to it, and there he sat until the death which in the same city of Rome he suffered through martyrdom.

8. Hence it results, therefore, that succession to the chair of Peter could not have happened in the church of Jerusalem or of Antioch. Because in the first he never sat, but in it he made James sit first of all, to whom Simeon succeeded, as we said, and it is noted in the histories. But in the second he did not remain but sat there only for a time and consequently, while still living, he had there a successor whom he himself by his authority established, whether Evodius or Ignatius, about which Turrianus can be consulted in Constitutiones Clementis bk.7, ch.46, and Baronius De Martyrolog., for the first day of February. Now Evodius succeeded Peter in the particular bishopric of Antioch but not in his primacy or universal episcopacy. For the see of Antioch was assumed to himself by Peter not from Christ immediately, or by divine right, but by his own choice and by human right, and therefore he could easily relinquish it and hand it to another. But the Pontifical dignity he had immediately from Christ and by divine right, and therefore as long as he lived he did not relinquish it nor, as I judge, could he have relinquished it, because he had from the immediate choice and conferring and precept of Christ himself the universal Church committed to him. It remains therefore that in the Roman see Peter had a successor to his pontificate; both because in no other could there be trace or reason for this succession, even if it be the see of Alexandria, because Peter never sat there, or of Constantinople which, while Peter was alive, had not been founded; and also because Peter should have a successor at his death, therefore he had him in the bishopric where he died, namely the Roman.

9. There are nevertheless not wanting heretics who, in order to escape the force of this argument, deny that Peter sat at Rome or that he died there. But I think it superfluous to put together against them a longer disputation, both because neither does the king of England insinuate this idea nor, as I think, do the Protestant Anglicans persist in this opinion, although perhaps sometimes they held it, and also because the evasion has no trace of truth nor any proof, to which it is necessary to respond. But that Peter was at Rome from somewhere else his own words indicate in his first letter, 5.13: "The Church that is at Babylon...saluteth you;" for that there by the name of Babylon Rome is signified is the interpretation of all Catholic interpreters and doctors, whom modern authors there collect, and so it is not necessary to refer to them; for also later, when treating of Antichrist, we will touch somewhat on this point. And lastly, that in the same Rome Peter exercised his Pontificate up to his death and that there he died is handed down by the common consent of all the ancient Fathers, both Greek and Latin, whom Sander refers to at large, bk. 6 De Visibili Monarchia ch.10, and Bellarmine, bk.2 De Romano Pontifice, from the beginning over several chapters. Sufficient now for us is the authority of Jerome, bk.2 De Scriptoribus Ecclesiast., and on Galatians 2, and of Eusebius in his History, whose words Jerome has pretty much borrowed, and with them agree other writers, both Latin and Greek, in addition to the testimonies of the Pontiffs themselves, the successors of Peter, which we will immediately relate.

Finally some Catholics add that, although we were to allow to the heretics that Peter was not at Rome, nevertheless the Roman Pontiff could have been the successor of Peter; for Peter could, while being or sitting elsewhere, delegate at Rome or elsewhere a successor to himself. Which indeed is for the confusion of heretics said truly and by supererogation, but it proceeds only about possibility or power. But to make the thing clear as to fact, it matters much that Peter was bishop of Rome up to his death. For if Peter had had his see elsewhere up to this death, in order for the bishop of Rome to succeed him in his pontifical see, it would be necessary to show the institution from a particular ordering of Peter, which in truth does not exist, because not elsewhere but in the Roman see and city he died. Which, once posited, there was no need for a new institution or will of Peter, for from the nature of the thing, on the supposition of prior divine institution, he who succeeded Peter in the see of Rome also followed him in his primacy, and so by succession it descended to the rest of the Roman Pontiffs.

10. But the adversaries could in another way escape, even if they are compelled unwillingly to admit that Peter was bishop of Rome up to his death, namely that from this it only follows that the successor of Peter was bishop of Rome, but that it is not rightly thence collected that the same successor was bishop and pastor also over the whole Catholic Church. Because these two dignities or episcopacies are distinct and separable; for he could be Pontiff of the universal Church although not be the bishop of any particular diocese, as we saw in Peter at the beginning of his pontificate. Besides, that universal dignity could first be joined with a particular bishopric and afterwards be separated from it, as we saw was done in the see of Antioch, where Peter had a successor in the bishopric of Antioch who did not succeed to the papacy; therefore the same could have happened on the death of Peter also in the bishopric of Rome; because in Peter himself too the conjunction of such bishopric with the primacy was not of divine right but of human, namely from the will of Peter, and so it could easily have ceased with his death. Nay, by the very fact that the successor of Peter is elected only by the Roman and not by the universal Church, it seems to follow that he has succeeded to a particular and not to a universal episcopacy.

11. We reply that it is no less certain that the first successor of Peter, and consequently the rest, succeeded in the episcopacy of the Catholic Church than in the episcopacy of Rome. Our proof of this is that always one person alone succeeded to Peter, as is clear from the histories and the Fathers, whom we will refer to in the next chapter; therefore either that person had together with the bishopric of Rome the primacy of the Church, which is what we intend, or the primacy has been left without succession and has perished; but this last is impossible because it is contrary to divine right and to the promise of Christ; therefore the first is altogether certain. Wherefore, from the fact that Peter located his see at Rome and conjoined his pontifical dignity to that bishopric (whether that conjunction was by divine institution, through a special precept and revelation, as some wish, or was by the human will of Peter, although divinely inspired), by the very fact that it was not changed while Peter was alive and has remained fixed, for that reason he who takes the place of Peter in the bishopric has necessarily succeeded him in both dignities. And however it may be about the other question, which is disputed by theologians, whether the Supreme Pontiff can separate the primacy from the Roman See and locate it either in another bishopric or leave it separated from every particular bishopric, I reckon it certain that, until some Supreme Pontiff has done that, the universal Church, when the papacy is vacant, cannot do it, because an inferior power cannot change what by a superior has been established; and because, just as to Peter alone was given the primacy for himself and for his successors, so to him alone or to the Supreme Pontiff does the concern belong to determine the pontifical see and to prescribe the mode of its election or succession. Thus therefore, since Peter located his see at Rome and conferred on it all his primacy and his power, and since he did not change that institution while alive, the Church, left by the death of Peter without a head, could not afterwards change the institution, and therefore the successor of Peter in the bishopric of Rome is of necessity at the same time successor to the primacy.

Nor is it an obstacle that the election of his successor was made by the clergy of Rome and not by the universal Church; for, as I said, to determine the mode of succession pertained not to the body of the Church but to Peter himself; and therefore as Peter wished to locate his pontificate firmly in the See of Rome, so also did he establish the election of his successor to be made by the Roman clergy. Or certainly Peter himself designated Clement his successor, as Clement himself writes, 1 Epist. to James the brother of the Lord, and bk.7 Constitution., ch.45, although (as the more probable opinion has it), he himself yielded it first to Linus and Cletus and afterwards Clement succeeded them. And thus all of them succeeded to the pontificate as to the bishopric of Rome at the same time, and succession in the same way has descended to all the Roman Bishops following.

Summary: 1. Proof from Irenaeus. 2. From Augustine and Optatus of Milevis. 3. From Epiphanius and Tertullian. 4. From Jerome and Cyprian.

1. Since, for confirming every dogma of the faith, ecclesiastical tradition has great force, it ought certainly to have the greatest in the present article which consists as it were in a certain fact and course of things and a continuous succession. And therefore we have thought it necessary to confirm this truth with every kind of testimony. And first we will use the testimonies of the ancient Fathers, who not only affirm that the Roman bishops have succeeded Peter in the pontificate, but also count this succession among the chief foundations and signs of the true and Catholic Church, as was often insinuated in book 1 and as we will now briefly review. For first thus does Irenaeus speak, bk.3, ch.3: "Since it is extremely long to enumerate the successions of all the churches, by indicating that of the greatest and most ancient Church, the one known to all, founded and constituted by the most glorious apostles Peter and Paul at Rome, etc." And later: "The blessed apostles, therefore, founding and setting up the Church, handed over the episcopacy of administering the Church to Linus." And afterwards he enumerates the successors up to Eleutherius. And in those words I note simply that he says they "handed over the episcopacy of administering the Church,” and without restriction to the Roman Church, because the one could not be separated from the other, and therefore about the Roman Church he said first: “With this Church, because of its more potent principality, every church must agree, that is, those who everywhere are the faithful, in which Church there has always been preserved, by those who everywhere are the faithful, the tradition which comes from the apostles.”

2. Second Augustine Contra Epist. Fundamenti, ch.4, places among the sure indications of the Catholic Church this one: “From the See itself of Peter the apostle, to whom the Lord after his resurrection commended the feeding of his sheep, the succession of priests up to the present episcopacy.” And in the psalm against the party of Donatus: “Count the priests if you will from the See itself of Peter. And in that order of fathers see who succeeded to whom. It is the rock which the proud gates of hell will not overcome.” Where he very clearly shows that the succession was in the very pontifical dignity which is signified by the rock. And thus in bk.2 Contra Litter. Petilian, ch.51, he says that the see of the Roman Church and the see in which Anastasius was then sitting were the same; and finally, epistle 165, he numbers the successions of all the Pontiffs from Peter up to Anastasius. In like manner Optatus, bk.2, Contra Parmenian., says: “One must see who sat prior in the see and when.” And later: “You cannot deny that you know that in the city of Rome the Episcopal chair was conferred on Peter first, whereon Peter the head of all the apostles sat, so that in this one chair unity might by all be preserved.” Where he clearly speaks of an Episcopal chair above the whole Church. Hence he adds later: “Therefore on the undivided chair, which is first among the dowries (namely of the Catholic Church), first sat Peter, to whom Linus succeeded, etc.” up to Siricius.

3. The same succession is accurately reported by Epiphanius, Haeres. 27, near the end, and after it he subjoins: “And lest anyone wonder that we review the individual instances so exactly, for clarity is by these always shown,” thinking that, for clarity of true and Catholic doctrine, succession of this sort and knowledge of it is necessary, because, as he himself said of Peter in Ancorato near the beginning: “This is the firm rock on which the Church is built, and the gates of hell, which are heresies and heresiarchs, shall not prevail against it. For in him in every way is the faith made firm, because he received the keys of heaven, and looses on earth and binds in heaven.” Which rock and power he traces down by succession to his own times, so as to show that in it the faith was made firm, against which heresies do not prevail. The same series of Pontiffs is described in verses by Tertullian, bk.5 Contra Marcionem, the last chapter, where, speaking of the disciples of the apostles who “succeeded throughout the globe,” he subjoins: “Among whom Linus, the chosen great one, approved by the people, placed on this chair whereon he had himself sat, Peter bade first to sit in very great Rome, etc.” which he continues up to Thelesphorus, of whose time he says: “the Church of Rome stood firm, flourishing in piety, set up by Peter, whose successor he also was. For now in ninth place Higinus has received the chair.” And afterwards he reviews Pius and Anicetus. And in his book Preascript., ch.30, he makes mention of Eleutherius who sat after Anicetus, nay also after Soterus. For thus he speaks: “It is evident that he (Marcion) had first believed Catholic doctrine in the Roman Church, until (supply, he was banished) under the episcopacy of blessed Eleutherius;” and ch.36: “You have Rome, whence authority for us too is ready to hand. A Church happy in its state, on which the apostles poured out their whole doctrine with their blood,” where I understand by ‘whole doctrine’ even the firmness and incorruption of the same doctrine.

4. Lastly St. Jerome too briefly mentions in his book De Scriptoribus Ecclesiast. this succession in Clement. Often too Cyprian, when dealing with the election and ordination of Cornelius, especially epist.45 to Cornelius, where first he calls the Roman Church “root and mother of the Catholic Church,” but afterwards he says: “Now the truth equally with the dignity of your episcopacy is established in most open light and with most manifest and most firm approbation. So that you (as he had first said) and your communion, that is, the unity equally with the charity of the Catholic Church, may be firmly approved and held by all our colleagues,” where he clearly teaches that the Roman Bishop, properly elected, is so the successor of Peter that on him the universal Church is founded and united, just as it was founded and united on Peter. Hence speaking of the same Cornelius, epist.53 to Antonianus, says: “Cornelius has been made bishop, when no one before him was made, when the place of Fabian, that is the place of Peter and the platform of the priestly chair, was vacant.” And indeed these Fathers speak more expressly of the very succession of the Pontiffs in the see and dignity of Peter; but there are very many others who acknowledge the dignity itself in the Roman Bishop and make much of it, whom we will in chapter 17 below make reference to.

Chapter 15: That the Roman Pontiff is in dignity, power, and primacy of the Church the successor of Peter is proved by the authority of the Pontiffs themselves.

Summary: 1. Various ways in which the Pontiffs build up their dignity. 2. Later Pontiffs too have with equal constancy guarded their primacy.

1. Although this kind of proof may not move Protestants, as I will say below, yet I do not judge it should be omitted, both because in truth it is a most grave and for Catholics a most useful one and embraces in itself many kinds of arguments; and also because King James in his Preface p.60, when he said that Peter was first and prince of the apostles in age, in vocation, or in sum in order, not in power, he subjoins: “Nor did the Bishop of the Roman See claim anything further to himself in the three hundred years following Christ.” In order, therefore, to prove that this testimony has through error and deception been given by the king, I will run not only through three hundred but also six hundred or more years of Christ and show evidently that the Roman Pontiffs, from the beginning of the nascent Church, claimed the primacy of the Church for Peter and for themselves, not only as to political order but much more as to the authority and power of a superior.

But so that the force of the testimonies and words may be perceived, it must be noted that there are various ways in which the Pontiffs build up their dignity. One is in expressly declaring the excellence of power in Peter and calling themselves Peter’s successors and applying to themselves words said about Peter. Another is by assuming titles of dignity which cannot be in accord with them save by reason of such primacy. Another is by attributing or reserving to themselves acts of supreme jurisdiction and spiritual power over the whole Church. For since it cannot be judged that they wanted unjustly to usurp jurisdiction, they are supposing that succession in this supreme dignity is in that See preserved. The last way, finally, is by expressly fighting for this truth and disputing against the errors of those who oppose it. From these ways of speaking and proving, and from the various acts of supreme power which the Roman Pontiffs always exercised, various kinds of arguments for confirming the truth can be adopted. But in order that the perpetual tradition of the Church may be more evidently laid open, it has seemed more commodious to propose, preserving the order of times, what individual Pontiffs have in every century taught about their primacy.

First, then, Pope Anacletus [Pope #3, after Peter and Linus], epistle 1, says that the Apostolic See is that on which Christ has founded his Church and therefore the greater causes pertain to it; epistle 2 he says: "We hold the reins of government of the Church," and epistle 3 he expressly confirms and declares this truth, saying that the Roman and Apostolic Church has from the Savior himself obtained primacy and eminence of power over all churches.

Second, Evaristus [#5], epistle 1, calls "the Roman Bishop the head, to whom in doubtful matters recourse must be had." Alexander I [#6], epistle 1, calls him "apex and head."

Third, Sixtus I [#7], epistle 1, calls him "head of all churches."

Fourth, Anicetus [#11], his sole letter, says that "to himself pertains all judgments of bishops."

Fifth, Eleutherius [#13] has the same in his epistle, ch.2.

Sixth, Victor [#14], epistle 1 to Theophilus, says that: "to do the contrary is nothing other than to transgress the boundaries of the apostles and their successors and to violate their decrees."

Seventh, Zephyrinus [#15], epistle 1, from the place in Matthew 16, where he calls the Roman Church the head of the whole Church, and that it pertains to it by apostolic authority to instruct the rest, and at the end: "For I am mindful that I preside over the Church under his name whose confession is glorified by the Lord Jesus Christ and whose faith always destroys all errors."

Eighth, the same supposition is made by Anterus [#19] to the bishops established in the province of Baetica and Toledo, replying to their consultation about the exchange of bishops, and first he takes the occasion to say that Peter whom he calls "our holy master and prince of the apostles" was transferred from Antioch to Rome for utility's sake. And declaring that the same could be done in other bishoprics by apostolic authority, he subjoins: "These things, as you have requested them, though they are not unknown to you, we command to be observed." And at the end: "Therefore, brothers, stand and hold the traditions of the apostles and of the Apostolic See."

Ninth, Fabian [#20], in epistle 1, shows at once his pontifical authority both in the title, "to all co-ministers everywhere in the Catholic Church," and in the introduction, "we are admonished by the divine precepts and the Apostolic Institutions that for the state of all the churches we keep watch with tireless love. Hence, it follows, you must know the things that in the Roman Church are done in the sacred rite of the Church, so that, following her examples, you may be found true sons of her who is called your mother." Where certainly he supposes that appellation to have been already everywhere made public and accepted. The same is also in the same way collected from epistle 2, to all the bishops of the East, and from epistle 3, to Hilary, where he says of himself that he has: "On this account by divine grace been advanced to the sacerdotal summit and established on a certain watchtower of the priests of God, to prohibit what is illicit and to teach what is to be followed." And next he prescribes the order to be observed in ecclesiastical courts. "With preservation in them all," he says, "of the Apostolic Authority," to wit of the Roman Church.

Tenth, Cornelius [#21] in his epistle to Cyprian, which is 46 among Cyprian's letters, relates that certain people, deceived by ignorance, made schism against him; but that afterwards, when they had realized the truth, they came to their senses in the following words, which he affirms are their own: "We know that Cornelius has been chosen Bishop of the most holy Catholic Church by the Almighty God and by Christ our Lord." And later: "Our mind was always in the Catholic Church, for neither are we ignorant that there is one God, that there is one Christ the Lord, whom we confess, one Holy Spirit, that there ought to be one Bishop in the Catholic Church." Which confession he himself so approves that he says: "Were we not moved by their profession?" And later: "These letters we judge you should send to the rest of the churches."

Eleventh, Lucius [#22] in his epistle to the West begins thus: "The letters of your love, which you have sent to the See of the blessed apostle Peter for reason of your business, we have gladly received." And afterwards he replies as if universal pastor and makes disposition of many things.

Twelfth, Sixtus II [#24], in his first epistle, first says that he "presides over the Church in the name of him whose confession is praised by Christ and whose faith never deceives anyone but destroys all heresies." But later he adds that it is licit for bishops to appeal to the Apostolic See, "to whose disposition all the more important ecclesiastical causes and the courts of the bishops have, by the ancient authority of the apostles, of their successors, and of the canons, been reserved; since bishops are held blameworthy who have done otherwise toward their brothers than it has pleased the Pope of the same See to be done."

Thirteenth, the like is contained in epistle 2 of Dionysius [#25] to bishop Severus: "From the beginning we have from blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, received trust so great that we have the authority, by the help of the Lord, to come to the aid of the Universal Church." And afterwards he prescribes a division of parishes to be carried out and the norm given by him to be made known to all. "So that this precept," he says, "might not be special but general."

Fourteenth, Felix [#26] in his first epistle, confirms that "the greater causes of the whole Church are reserved to himself."

Fifteenth, Marcellus [#30] in his first epistle to the bishops of the province of Antioch thus begins: "Carrying the care of all the churches, according to the apostle." Which thing he pursues at large by confirming everything said above, and he adds that "no synod can be legitimately made without the authority of the Roman See." And these things may be enough for confuting the assertion of the king, for Marcellus lived up to the year of Christ 310; but for the greater evidence of the truth, we must at least run through the other three centuries following.

Sixteenth, Eusebius [#31] thus begins his third epistle: "Blessed be the Lord our God, who by his mercy has dedicated his Roman Church to the priesthood of the blessed apostle Peter, and has conceded, by exchange of love, to show us the way that concerns us, because of the universal care which is ours on account of the privilege of the same Church."

Seventeenth, Melchiades [or Miltiades, #32] in his epistle to the bishops of Spain, when saying that it pertains to himself to pass judgment on bishops, adds: "For these the Lord has reserved for his own judgment, and this privilege he has committed to blessed

Peter alone, the bearer of the keys and his vicar. Which prerogative has justly grown in his See, to be inherited and possessed by future times, since among the apostles too there was a certain discrimination of power.”

Eighteenth, from Sylvester [#33] we can adduce the final canon of the Roman Synod established under him, which runs thus: “No one will judge the first See, since all sees desire justice to be moderated by the first See. Nor by Augustus, nor by any cleric, nor by kings, nor by the people will the judge be judged.” And it was subscribed to by 284 bishops with some priests and deacons, and even by Augustus Constantine himself.

Nineteenth, Marcus [#34] in his epistle to Athanasius and the bishops of Egypt, says: “This is the holy and apostolic mother of all churches, the Church of Christ,” which he also says is immaculate in the Faith, because the promise made to Peter is fulfilled in the Roman Pontiffs.

Twentieth, Julius I [#35] in his epistle to the East calls the Roman See the first, and says that to it pertains the rights of convoking synods, of judging bishops, and of reserving the greater causes to itself, “because it is set above all, not only by the decrees of the canons and the holy Fathers, but by the voice of the Lord our Savior.” Which he also repeats in his rescript against the East on behalf of Athanasius.

Twenty first, Liberius [#36] in his rescript to Athanasius says at the beginning that he has received in Peter authority over the universal Church.

Twenty second, Felix II [Antipope to Liberius] in his rescript to Athanasius and the Egyptians understands the words of Christ in Matthew 16 about the Roman See.

Twenty third, Damasus [#37] in epistle 2 to the bishops of Africa, first says: “We, who over the house of the Lord, that is, the universal Catholic Church, have received the Episcopal ministry.” Next he subjoins: “You know that the Apostolic See has been constituted the firm and immovable foundation fixed by God, and the most glorious title of his priests, that is, of all bishops, and the summit of the churches.” And he subjoins at once the words of Christ. And among the epistles of this Pontiff there is extant one to him from Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, requesting from him the statutes and decrees in the Roman See from Peter up to Damasus himself, “in accordance,” he says, “with the authority of the Apostolic See.” When sending which, Damasus says in epistle 5: “We desire you to keep them, and we command that they be preached and made public to others, so that they may by all with due reverence be kept inviolate.”

Twenty fourth, Siricius [#38] in epistle 1 to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, says: “We carry the burdens of all; nay the blessed apostle Peter carries them in us.” And in his third epistle to all the orthodox: “Necessity commands us to speak, who have the care of all the churches.”

Twenty fifth, Anastasius [#39] writes thus to all the Germans and the bishops of the region of Burgundy: “Your love requires from the authority of the Apostolic See a response to your consultations.” And afterwards he replies in this form of words: “We command by Apostolic Authority.”

Twenty sixth, Innocent I [#40] in various ways of speaking and in many letters teaches this truth, and exercises by precept and decree the universal power which is founded in the Gospel; but to relate all of them would here be prolix. And so it will be enough to point to the places, namely epistle 1 to Victricius II, to Exuperius, to Innocent, and more or less through all the subsequent ones, but specially to be noted is epistle 17 to the emperor Arcadius, wherein with these words he excommunicates him: “I, the least and a sinner, to whom is entrusted the throne of the great apostle Peter, separate and reject you and her from the reception of the immaculate mysteries of Christ our God, etc.” which he there pursues, using his power of binding and loosing over all bishops and patriarchs. To be noted too is epistle 27 to the bishops of Macedonia; for when Innocent had received letters from them, he says: “In those letters I have seen many things set down which induce astonishment in our mind.” And later, explaining them, he says: “When I had had them very often repeated, I observed that the Apostolic See (to which, as to the head of the churches, the report sent was hastening), whose sentence was thought still to be doubtful, was suffering infliction of injury.” Also in epistle 29 to Decentius he shows at large the same thing; and best in epistles 31 and 32 to the Councils of Carthage and Milevis.

Twenty seventh, Zosimus [#41], in epistle 1 to bishop Hesychius, says: “We marvel that the statutes of the Apostolic See have not been conveyed to your love.” And later: “If you think that anything has been lacking in your authority, we supply it.” And later: “Whoever, setting aside the authority of the Fathers and the Apostolic See, has neglected this, let him know that he is to be by us more strictly punished.”

Twenty eighth, Boniface I [#42] in epistle 2 to the bishops of Gaul, thus concludes about the courts of bishops in grave causes: “By our authority must they be confirmed.” And epistle 3 to bishop Hilary he thus writes: “Fortified by the right of a Metropolitan and supported on our precepts, approach, etc.”

Twenty ninth, Celestine I [#43] in epistle 1 to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne and Narbonne, says: “On the watchtower are we established by God.” And later: “Our spiritual care is not wanting about places far off but extends itself everywhere that the name of God is preached.” And in epistle 4 to the church of Constantinople, speaking about Athanasius, he says: “He has found the peace of communion in this See, whence help is always supplied to Catholics.” And epistle 5 to Nestorius he says that to himself pertains the care of the Faith and of all the churches; and the same is openly collected from the rest of his letters.

Thirtieth, from Pope Leo [#45] many things were adduced in earlier chapters, for in almost all his epistles he shows himself pastor of the Universal Church, as in epistle 4, at the beginning, he makes it express in his words, saying: “We are urged on by the divine precepts and the apostolic admonitions that we should be vigilant for the state of all the churches with tireless love.” Also to be noted is epistle 47, to the synod of Chalcedon, wherein, after he had said that it was the will of the emperor that a Council be convened, he adds: “the right and honor of the most blessed apostle Peter being preserved;” and later he says that through his vicars he himself presides over the universal synod. And epistle 53, wherein he rebukes Anatolius, the patriarch of Constantinople, on the ground he had wanted to be preferred to the church of Alexandria and Antioch, a fact he repeats in his two following epistles, and in the latter, which is addressed to the Augusta Pulcheria, he speaks thus: “The agreements of the bishops and of the holy canons established in the synod of Nicea, being repugnant to the rules, we, with the piety of your faith united to us, dismiss as void and, by the authority of the blessed apostle Peter, we annul them by an altogether general definition.” Also very good is epistle 84 to Anastasius the bishop of Thessalonica, to whom, as he himself says, he had delegated his functions, he says: “so that, made imitator of our meekness, you may assist in the care which we principally owe by divine institution to all the churches.” And in epistle 89 to the bishops of the province of Vienne he makes express declaration of the divine institution of ecclesiastical monarchy in Peter and his successors, the Roman Bishops. Which institution he proves from the custom, among other things, of consulting the same See, of appealing to it, and from the fact that judgments have been overturned or confirmed by it, which “dignity divinely given,” he says he guards, “not seeking his own but the things that be of Christ.” The same is very well treated of in the sermons on his assumption [of the papacy], especially the third.

Thirty first, the same is professed by Pope Hilary [#46], epistle 3 to bishop Ascanius, and at the beginning of the Roman Council convened under him.

Thirty second, the same supposition is made by Simplicius [#47], epistle 1 to Zeno the bishop of Seville, to whom he commits the functions of the Apostolic See, and in epistle 3 to the emperor Zeno, whom he calls son and stirs him up to preserve the Faith, saying later: “For this norm persists in his successors (that is of Pope Leo), and it is the same with apostolic doctrine, on which the Lord enjoined the care of the whole flock, etc.” And in epistle 5 to Acatius there are contained these words worthy of note: “Because, since the doctrine of our predecessors of holy memory is extant, against which it is impious to dispute, he who seems to be rightly wise does not need to be instructed with new assertions.” And epistle 9 to Augustus Zeno, he says: “Sustaining the care of all the churches, etc.” Which he also shows in epistle 13 to the same, where he also dispenses him from one of the canons of the Council of Nicea.

Thirty third, a great defender besides of this dignity was Gelasius I [#49], epistle 2 to the bishops of Dardania, and 6 to the bishops of Lucania, chs. 11 and 27, and most of all in epistle 10 to the emperor Anastasius, where he confirms this truth at large, and declares how much over the emperor, whom he calls son, the Pontiff excels. And in epistle 11 to the Dardanians he testifies that the Apostolic See confirms all synods and that no bishop can escape from his judgment, etc. Many like things are contained in his Admonition to Faustus, and in his volume De Vinculo Anathematis and most of all in his decree De Apocryphis Scripturis, at the beginning.

Thirty fourth, Anastasius II [#50], in his epistle to the emperor Anastasius, warns him to obey his mandates, because the See of Peter by divine ordination holds the principality over the universal Church.

Thirty fifth, the same is shown at large by Symmachus [#51] in his Apologet. against the same Augustus Anastasius, from whom we took many things in earlier chapters.

Thirty sixth, Hormisdas [#52], in epistle 1 to Augustus Anastasius, having been now in some manner corrected, he praises him saying: “May you think of the orthodox concord of the Church in reverence of the blessed apostle Peter, preserving especially the divine precepts.” And later: “Having directed to us your holy declarations, your piety has deigned to make mention of the holy Council, about which matter we will then be able to make a most full reply when you will have wished to give us evident knowledge of the reason for its convening.” In these words he sufficiently shows that a decree about convening a council pertains to himself and after the cause is known, about which many letters between the same Pontiff and emperor can be viewed. And the like is contained in the same Pontiff’s epistle 22 to the emperor Justin, along with many following ones.

Thirty seventh, Boniface II [#55] in his epistle to Eulalius bishop of Alexandria, at the beginning, shows the same dignity and confidence in the power of Peter.

Thirty eighth, the same is very well shown in epistle 2 of John II [#56] to the emperor Justinian.

Thirty ninth, Pope Vigilius [#59], epistle 1 ch.7, says thus: "To no one, whether he thinks lightly or is fully wise, is it doubtful that the Roman Church is the form and foundation of the churches, etc." The same is taken from epistle 2 of the same to Augustus Justinian, whom he calls son. The same from epistle 4 to bishop Aurelian, and in the fragment of the letter of Theodorus bishop of Caesarea, and of others, and from epistle 7 to the whole people of God.

Fortieth, Pelagius I [#60], in epistle 1 to Vigilius, at the end, after confuting a certain error, he adds: "May your love take care that it become known to all the churches, etc." and he subjoins the reason: "For I am mindful that I preside over the Church in the name of him whose confession is glorified by the Lord Jesus Christ, and whose faith destroys all heresies." Also epistle 3 is very good and much to be noted for what we will say in what follows, and epistle 5, that in matters of doubt about universal synods recourse must be had to the Apostolic See.

Forty first, John III [#61] in his epistle to the bishops of Germany and Gaul says that he is admonishing them by his apostolic letters, following in the footsteps of his predecessors; and again toward the end he says: "With the warning command of the Lord's voice, whereby Peter is imbued by the threefold repetition of the mystical sanction, that he who loves Christ feed Christ's sheep diligently and with great care, since through love of the Holy See itself, over which we by the abundance of divine grace take first place, by its love we are exhorted, etc."

Forty second, Pelagius II [#63], epistle 2 against John the bishop of Constantinople, who was ambitious for the primacy, he says: "With thorough rejection of the audacity which has been assumed against the Apostolic See and against the voice itself of the Lord Savior, let the empty hearts of the erring cease from disputing against the precepts of the Lord, etc." which he pursues at large, teaching that the Roman See, by the institution of the Lord, is the head of all churches, and that thereto pertains the convening of Councils, and that what does not rest for support on its authority cannot be legitimate.

Forty third, finally Gregory the Great [#64], who presided over the Church up to the year of our Lord 610 [actually 590-604AD], exercised the same pontifical authority by his acts and confirmed it by his words, as is clear from his letters, wherefrom some things we will briefly touch on. For, speaking generally, in almost all of them he gives outstanding demonstration of the care of a universal pastor; and especially is to be noted epistle 24, bk.1, which is to all the patriarchs of the world, in which he stresses the burden imposed on him, and honors five General Councils and as it were confirms them again; and in epistle 71 he says: "The greater is the reverence exhibited by the rest of the churches to the Apostolic See the more it becomes it to be solicitous for their protection," and in bk.3, indict.11, epistle 7, ch.46, he professes and exercises power over all bishops, and for ending all difficult causes. But later in bk.3, epistle 32, elsewhere indict.13, ch.76, he severely rebukes the exaltation of John of Constantinople, and threatens coercion unless he return to his senses, and takes the occasion to say: "It is clear to all who know the Gospel that by the Lord's voice the care and principality of the whole Church is committed [to me]." Which he also repeats, bk.7 epistle 69, where he also says that without the consent and authority of the Apostolic See no Council has any force. And in the same book, epistle 64, dealing with the same bishop of Constantinople, he says: "The Byzantine primate was accused of a certain crime and the most pious emperor wished him, in accord with the canonical statutes, to be judged by us." And later about the same primate he says: "But as to his saying that he is subject to the Apostolic See if any fault is found in bishops, I know not which bishop is subject to him." And bk.6, indict.15, ch.37, elsewhere ch.201, to Eulogius bishop of Alexandria, he refers to the epistle of that patriarch, in which he recognizes the chair of Peter in the Roman See, and adds: "Who is there who does not know that the holy Church is founded on the firmness of the prince of the apostles? etc." In book 4, epistle 51, elsewhere ch.95, he sends the pallium to a certain bishop. The same from epistle 54, and often he confirms bishops, and sometimes deposes them, or excommunicates them. And bk.7, epistle 125, he says: "What has once been sanctioned by the authority of the Apostolic See lacks nothing of firmness, etc." Innumerable like things will be found in those epistles.

Especially to be noted, however, is a remarkable place of the same Pontiff, on the fifth penitential psalm, about the words: "Those who praised me swore against me." For there, as if describing the schisms of his time, he says: "The madness of error has most in our times worked the poison of its malice; and the peace of the whole Church has it disturbed with its schismatic infestation. For it has stirred up against the Church of God not only an innumerable multitude of people, but even, if it be holy to say it, the royal power. For no reason allows that he be numbered among kings who destroys rather than rules his empire, and who can have as many colleagues of his perversity as he has made alien to the company of Christ; who, seduced by the greed of most base gain, takes the spouse of Christ captive, desires to abduct her, and by rash daring fights to make empty the sacrament of the Lord's passion. The Church indeed, which, redeemed by the price of his blood, our Savior wished to be free, this Church he tries, overstepping the rights of the royal power, to make his handmaid. How much better would it be for him to acknowledge her his mistress and, by the example of religious princes, display to her the obedience of devotion and not stretch out the pride of his dominance against God, from whom he has received the dominion of his power? For Himself it is who says: 'By me kings reign.' But, blinded by the darkness of his immense greed, and ungrateful, as is clear, to divine beneficence, and puffed up against God, he has the boundaries set by our fathers transgressed, contemning the divine fear, and is against Catholic truth carried by the fury of his tyranny. But so far has he stretched out the temerity of his madness that he claims to himself the head of all the churches, the Church of Rome, and usurps over the mistress of the nations the rights of earthly power. Which he altogether has forbidden to be done who committed it specifically to the blessed apostle Peter, saying: 'To thee will I give my Church.' Let the mouth of those who speak iniquity be stopped, and let every rank of heretics fall silent, because falsehood has no strength which by the voice of truth itself is found to be destroyed."

2. Just as during these first six centuries the Roman Pontiffs gave of their primacy testimony and very manifest signs, so further in all the later centuries their successors most constantly taught it, and have for this truth, necessary to preserving the unity of the Faith and the Church, fought very mightily. But I do not judge it opportune to pursue their individual opinions one by one, both because Protestants do not about particularly later Pontiffs deny this fact, and also because all the rights and canonical decrees, which are contained in the Decree and the Decretals, are full of testimonies of this sort. But certain more striking places, which to the present controversy seem more adapted, I have thought it necessary briefly to point out. Therefore to be looked at are the epistles of Honorius I [#70] to Edwin king of the English and bishop Honorius; for from these it is clear that both the king and the bishops of England had from the Apostolic See requested or received spiritual rights. For there the Pontiff, at the petition of the king, sends two palliums to two Metropolitans, and concedes to each that they could, by the authority of the Pope, propose on their death a successor for themselves. Also can be viewed the epistle of Leo II [#80] to the bishops of Spain about reception of the sixth synod; of which mention is made in the fourteenth Council of Toledo and which is reported in its totality from an ancient and authentic codex by Garcia Loaisa in his collection Conciliorum Hispaniae. For in it Leo calls the Roman Church and the Apostolic See the holy Church mother of all, and of himself he says: "Although we are not his equal, we yet fulfill the function of the prince of the apostles." And likewise Benedict II [#81], in his epistle to the same Council reported in the same place, says: "Although we are not the equal of blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, we fill his place for the ministry by divine help committed to us." Also is to be consulted the epistle of Agatho [#79] to the emperor Constantine, which is contained in the sixth Synod, act.4, where he shows that the places from the Gospel above treated pertain to the Roman Church, and insists most of all on the fact that in the Faith it has never erred nor can err.

Also is much to be noted the epistle of Adrian I [#96] to the emperors Constantine and Irene, which is contained in the seventh Synod. For in the first part of it he exhorts the emperor "to persistence in the faith of Peter and of the Roman Church, and to the honoring of the most holy Roman Church, of the prince of the apostles, just as was done by earlier pious emperors, who from their whole heart loved his vicar." But in the second part, which is omitted by the Greeks, though it is preserved in the Vatican Library, and was added by Anastasius, he says about this See: "Carrying out the primacy in the whole world, it has been constituted the head of all the churches, etc." and he rebukes the patriarch of Constantinople because he dared to assume the name of Universal Bishop, since he could not ever have the name, even in second rank, without the authority of the Roman Pontiff. And he adds words deserving of note: "But if he be styled above his superior, the holy Roman Church, which is head of all the churches, certain it is that he shows himself a rebel and heretic against the holy synods. Because if he is universal he is acknowledged to have the primacy even over our See, which shows itself ridiculous to all the Christian faithful, because primacy and power in the whole world has by the Redeemer of the world been given to the blessed apostle Peter, and through the same apostle the Roman Church holds, to this present day, the principality, the power, and the authority."

Besides, Nicholas I [#106] often in his epistles professes this truth, especially epistle 6 to Phocius, and in the 7th, his response; copiously and efficaciously, however, he confirms the same in epistle 8 to the emperor Michael, which is the first to him, and in the second to the same, and in epistle 10 to the bishops subject to the see of Constantinople, and in epistles 18, 20, 30, and more or less in the rest. Many like things are also contained in the epistles of John VIII [#108], which, although they be not contained in the volumes of the Councils, have been very recently published in volume 3 of the pontifical letters, but especially can be noted, in epistle 73 to Count Lambert, these words: "The Apostolic See, which the Almighty God has deigned to found on the rock of his name, has not only by the kings and princes of the earth but also by the august emperors, lords on their thrones over the whole earth, been honored as head of all the churches of God; and they have by worthy announcements praised its Pontiffs as Vicars, that is, of blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and they have studied to entreat them by their prayers and supplications; and may they to the end of the age, while the name and memory of Peter last, not cease to make supplication.” Again in epistle 84, to Louis, son of the emperor Charles, whom in the place of his father he established as his close adviser.

Next, Leo IX [#153], in his Apologia contra Michaellem et Leonem, ch.9, places among the heresies of the Eastern bishops the presumption of taking up the name of Universal Bishop, which, he says, was offered to the Roman Bishop by the synod of Chalcedon, and although it could to him, after Christ, most suitably belong, from modesty and humility he did not accept it; and in ch.10 he decrees that on the Apostolic See no one among mortals can pass judgment. “The most blessed and Apostolic Pontiff Sylvester [#33] divinely decreeing along with his spiritual son Constantine, the most religious Augustus, the universal synod of Nicea approving and subscribing, etc.” Also can be viewed his epistle to Peter bishop of Antioch, and his epistle to the emperor Constantine Monachus. Again Gregory VII [#158], in his books of epistles, has many things in confirmation of this truth; but especially can be viewed, in book 1, epistle 63 to the king of Aragon, and 74 to Alphonse and Sancho, kings of Spain, where he praises their fidelity to the Apostolic See and commends their agreement with it, and, in book 3, epistle 10 to king Henry, where in the very salutation he says: “To king Henry salutation and Apostolic benediction, provided however he has obeyed, as befits a Christian king, the Apostolic See, etc.” And thereafter the whole letter is in confirmation of the Roman Primacy; and afterwards he excommunicates Siegfried archbishop of Moguntina and others because of schism from the Roman Church. And lastly he also excommunicates the king himself, and “absolves all Christians from the bond of the oath which they have made to him, or will make, and forbids anyone to serve him.” But in book 4, epistle 12 to the bishops and princes of the Teutonic kingdom he reports how the same king, humbled in penance, “has requested the pardon of absolution,” receiving from him an oath of safety. And in the same book, the last epistle to the king and princes of Spain, he professes the same universal care, as can there be seen more at large. Also Innocent III [#177] wrote outstandingly of the primacy of the Roman Church in sermon 2, De Consecratione Pontificis, and in various epistolic decretals, as well in book 1 as in book 2, he often repeats the same. And lastly in almost all the bulls, constitutions, and extravagants the same supreme power always has been and is exercised by modern Pontiffs. On this point, therefore, the perpetual tradition and agreement of the same Pontiffs is evident.

Chapter 16: Response is made to the Protestants who mock the argument taken from the tradition of the Pontiffs, and it is confirmed by the authority of the Councils.

Summary: 1. First mode of evasion. 2. Another evasion is refuted. 3. From four General Councils the tradition of the Pontiffs is fortified. 4. From other synods the same tradition is confirmed.

1. However, in one or other of two ways the adversaries of the Roman Church are wont to respond to the adduced testimonies of the Pontiffs. The first is that it is not agreed that the aforesaid decretal epistles are legitimate; nay they reprehend many things in them on account of which they condemn their authority. Nevertheless this response is to be rejected, not only among Catholics, but also among all learned and prudent men, as frivolous and incredible, as has been shown at large by our Francisco Torres in the books he produced in defense of those epistles, wherein he responds to all the calumnies of them of Magdeburg. But we say in brief that, to begin with, the antiquity of the epistles is so great that there can be no fear they were fabricated for refuting modern errors. Besides, about the epistles of Leo I no one has hitherto had doubts; and yet he himself in epistle 2, ch.5, gives commandment to keep all the established decretals, as well of Innocent of blessed memory as of all his predecessors. And more clearly Pope Gelasius, who lived 1100 years ago, in the decree about the books that are authentic, which Gratian also refers to, dist.15, ch.3, speaks thus: "The decretal epistles, which the most blessed Popes at diverse times have given from the city of Rome for the consultation of diverse Fathers, are to be venerably received." And the same, after almost 350 years, is confirmed by Nicholas I, in epistle 42 to the bishops of Gaul, a great part of which is inserted by Gratian in the Decree, dist.19, ch.1. Again St. Jerome, in epistle 11 to Geruchias, testifies that he had sometimes helped Damasus in responding to consultations from the East and the West. It cannot, therefore, be doubted that it was a custom of the Roman Pontiffs to govern the Church through these letters; neither then is it likely that they have all perished or that there are others save those that have been received and preserved in the Roman Church.

In addition to this, many of these epistles are inserted and connected with the epistles of other Fathers, which cannot be called into doubt without great impudence and temerity, as is clear from the epistles of Cornelius with the epistles of Cyprian, of Innocent with the writings of Chrysostom and Augustine. Again from the letter of the Pontiff Marcus with the epistle of Athanasius to the same, and again from the epistle of Liberius. Again from many others of the epistles of Jerome and Augustine. Again from the epistle of Theodoret to Leo with his response. Some too are received among the other works of the same Pontiffs, as among the works of Gregory, Leo, etc. Nor is there greater reason for doubting those than the rest of their works. Again many are reported by the gravest historiographers, as I will prove in the following chapter. There are besides extant very ancient exemplars of the several epistles in the Vatican Library, from which the epistles have been very recently edited and corrected with the greatest fidelity and care. Next, although about one or another epistle, or a part of it, some reason for doubt or suspicion might arise, nevertheless, as for what concerns the present cause, we have so great a cloud of witnesses placed over us (to use the words of Paul), and so great an agreement of opinions and actions of supreme jurisdiction, that no one, unless he were very stubborn and impudent, could doubt but that here was the sense and the consensus of all the Roman Pontiffs, the universal Church again agreeing and consenting.

2. But then another response occurs from those who say that in this business the testimony of the Pontiffs is not to be listened to, because no one is a legitimate witness in his own cause. Yet this response too cannot be listened to by a Catholic man. First, because in truth the Roman Pontiffs are in this business not so much witnesses in their own cause as in the cause of Christ and the universal cause of the whole Church. Next, because they are not so much witnesses as judges in like causes; for to them it pertains to declare the dogmas of the Faith, and to propound these to the Church, as was seen above; but this article pertains to the dogmas of the Faith, as the same Pontiffs decree with the same certitude, and as has been proved above from the divine Scripture. Hence, whether they be called judges or witnesses, they are to be believed to have taught the truth, not led by their own, but by the divine, spirit. Besides, although their testimony be looked on as human, it is of the greatest authority and makes the thing evidently credible; for it is not credible that in this point they erred through ignorance, because some of them were the wisest, while others were disciples of the apostles and conversed with them on familiar terms, especially Clement and Anacletus, who Ignatius testifies were Peter's deacons, in epistle 5 to the Trallians; but through others, in company with Linus, Cletus, and the like, this tradition has come down to their successors. They were also very holy men, so that for that reason it can scarcely be believed they wanted, from ambition or arrogance, to usurp for themselves a power that had not been given. Many of them too sealed their faith with their blood. Since, therefore, they taught this article among the dogmas of the Faith, they bequeathed it confirmed, not only by their word, but also by their life and death. Finally, since the king of England professes that he does not dare resist the ancient Fathers of the first centuries, if he wishes to speak consistently, he should, in the presence of so many Fathers, keep silent and not dare to contradict them. But so that we may more fully persuade him, we will add four General Councils, which he himself venerates, that marvelously agree with the said Pontiffs.

3. The 1st Council of Nicea [325AD], then, bk.3, in the canons taken from Pope Julius I, epistle 1, in canon 1, thus speaks: "Councils ought not to be celebrated apart from the sentence of the Roman Bishop." And in canon 2: "Bishops may, in the graver causes, freely appeal to the Apostolic See and flee to it as to a mother, etc." And in canon 3: "While the Pontiff of the Apostolic See is re-judging the cause of a bishop, let no other be ordained in his place;" and a reason is given, "because without consulting the Roman Pontiff it is not permitted to define such causes absolutely," since it was said to Peter by the Lord: "Whatsoever thou shalt bind, etc." And in the 80 canons translated from the Greek and Arabic, in canon 39, it is said thus: "The patriarch presides over all those who are under his power in the way that he who holds the See of Rome is head and prince of all patriarchs, seeing that he is first, like Peter, to whom has been given power over all Christian princes, and over all their peoples, as he who is Vicar of Christ our Lord over every people and over the universal Christian Church; and whoever contradicts this is excommunicated by the Synod." About which canon must be seen what is noted in volume 1 of the Councils. And with it agrees the Council of Sardica [343AD], in canons 4 and 7, which are about the causes of bishops being brought to a close by the Roman Pontiff.

Next, in the 1st Council of Constantinople [381AD], canon 3, otherwise 5, it is said: "Let the bishop of Constantinople have the primacy after the Roman Bishop." In this canon one thing is supposed and another established. Indeed, it is supposed that the Supreme Pontiff has the primacy in the Church, and this is what now concerns us; for the General Council supposed what it held for certain and indubitable. Nor can the king of England imagine that the Council speaks of primacy only by reason of political order, as regard some external splendor or honor; for it speaks of primacy in the way in which it was borne by the Roman Pontiffs themselves, namely by jurisdiction and power; and in canon 2, immediately preceding, it is clear that the Council speaks of primacy in rule and government of the Church. But the other part of that canon was not received for a long time, as is clear from Pope Leo, epistle 53, elsewhere 51, to Anatolius, ch.2, and from the two following, to Augustus Marcianus and Augusta Pulcheria. And from Gregory, bk.6 of his epistles, epistles 31 and 37, and from Nicholas I and Leo IX in the places above cited. But this too commends the primacy of the Roman Church, since that is why the statute did not either then or for a long time have force, because the Roman Church did not approve it; but when the Roman Church gave consent, it began to have effect, as is clear from Innocent III with the Lateran Council [1215AD], ch. 'Antiqua', about privileges.

Further, the 1st Council of Ephesus [431AD], in its epistle to Pope Celestine, which is contained in volume 4 of that synod, ch.17, addresses him as supreme pastor and judge of the faith in this way: "With all admiration we embrace Your Holiness' zeal for piety, your care – most welcome and pleasing to the Savior – for the sincerity of the faith of us all; for it is settled as a habit for you, so outstanding as you are, that you be known to all, and that you establish your devotion as the solid foundation of the churches." Where certainly the talk is not only of the person of Celestine but of the habit of the See itself, hence it subjoins: "But because necessity required that all things which came to pass in this holy synod be declared to Your Holiness, we could not fail to write with these letters in detail to Your Holiness, etc." In these words too they show their dependence on the Roman Pontiff. Hence, in volume 2 of the same Council, ch.15, when the whole Council, after hearing the letters of Celestine, had, in the absence of his legates, acclaimed them and followed his instruction, and when the legates afterwards had arrived and had understood what had been done, one among them, Philip, said: "We give thanks to this holy and reverend synod because, when the letters were read to you of the most holy and most blessed Pope Celestine, you, by your voices, by your pious announcements, showed yourselves to your holy head to be the Church's holy members; for your blessedness is not ignorant that the head of the whole Faith and of all the rest of the apostles is blessed Peter." Which is again more largely repeated by the same Philip, saying that no one doubts that Peter was constituted Vicar of Christ by Christ himself, and that through his successors he lives on always, and that his successor and holy vicar is the Roman Pontiff. These speeches the holy synod did not detest, but rather agreed with the apostolic legates, and in great conformity subscribed with them to the same Faith. And in ch.17 of the epistle of the synod they report to the emperors among other things that Celestine had sent letters to Cyril, so that he, assuming his functions in this regard, might perfect the things defined at Rome, and that afterwards he had sent the priest Philip, who, it says, "bears here the person of the most holy Celestine." And many other the like evident signs of the pontifical primacy are read in that Council.

Nor have we found fewer things in the Council of Chalcedon [451AD], whereat also the legates of Pope Leo presided in his place over the Council, among whom Paschasius, Actor. 1, at the beginning, thus speaks: "Of the most blessed and apostolic sir, the Pope of the City of Rome, which is the head of all churches, we hold in our hands the precepts, whereby his Apostleship has deigned to prescribe that Dioscorus, archbishop of the Alexandrians, may not sit in the Council but may be brought in to be heard," and the whole Council obeyed Leo as its head. And in Actor. 2, when the epistles of Leo had been read, all the Council Fathers said: "So we believe; so Peter through Leo has spoken." And in Actor. 3, Leo is often called "Universal Patriarch, and Universal Archbishop;” and, near the middle, bishop Julian said to the Pope’s legates: “Your holiness now holds the primacy of the most holy Leo.” And later: “We beg your holiness, who hold the place of the most holy Pope Leo, to pronounce against him (that is, against Dioscorus) your sentence, etc.” all which things were partly done in the name of the whole Council and partly the Council was agreeing with the legates. In addition, Surius reports, at the end of act 15, the following sentences of the same Council: “We do homage, according to the Scriptures and the definition of the canons, that the most holy Bishop of Old Rome is the first and greatest of bishops.” Again other things: “If any bishop is proclaimed infamous, let him have free sentence of appealing to the most blessed Bishop of Old Rome, because we have Peter as rock of refuge, and he alone has in the place of God the right, with free power, to discriminate the infamy of an accused bishop, according to the keys given to him by the Lord.” Again: “Let all other things defined by him be held as from the Vicar of the Apostolic Throne.” But these sentences are not now found in the Council of Chalcedon, but Surius cites them from St. Thomas in his work Contra Errores Graecorum, in whom I find the second and third, in ch.32, § Ostenditur etiam quod Petrus; but I do not find there the third, but in § Ostenditur etiam quod praedictus, he speaks thus: “It is read in the Council of Chalcedon that the whole synod exclaimed to Pope Leo: ‘May the most holy Apostolic and Universal Patriarch live for many years.’”

But beside these there are express testimonies of the same Council, act 16, in the epistle to Leo, in which are reported the things done in the Council, where from the verse of Matthew 18.20: “For where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them,” they first infer: “how much concerning the priests, who preferred knowledge of its confession to their fatherland and their labor, the Council could show of peculiar affection toward those in whom you indeed were presiding, as the head in its members, over those who possessed your [priestly] order.” And later, referring to the crimes of Eutyches, it says: “And those indeed who understood the things which concern a pastor he cut off, but those who proved to be wolves he set up over the sheep, and after all these things he extended his madness over and against him to whom the guarding of the vineyard was by the Savior committed, that is, also against Your Apostolic Holiness. And he had planned excommunication against you who hasten to unite the body of the Church.” And later they seek confirmation of the things decreed by them, and especially about the preeminence of the patriarch of Constantinople. And although the Pontiff did not approve this, as we said above, yet in that very petition the synod professes the primacy of the Pontiff; and thus do they expound the decree above referred to of the second synod: “Which prescribes,” they say, “that after your most holy and Apostolic See does the see of Constantinople have honor, which is second in order, you being confident that, as about you shines the Apostolic ray, you spread it as far as the church of Constantinople by governing in the accustomed way, and you more often extend it, etc.”

4. In the same way can the same tradition be confirmed by many things which are contained in the 5th general synod in the 2nd Council of Constantinople [553AD], confirmed by Pope Vigilius. Again from the 6th synod, acts 17 and 18, and from the 7th synod convened under Pope Adrian, which proceeded in all things under his obedience and according to his instruction, as is collected from act 7 at the end. Also in the 8th synod there is extant canon 21, wherein primacy is attributed to the Roman Church, which it calls the See of Peter, prince of the apostles. And, to omit the other things which, if they were legitimate, always proceeded under obedience to the Roman See, this truth was specially taught by the Lateran Council [1215AD] under Innocent III, chs.5 and 6, and it was more expressly defined by the Council of Florence [1439AD] in the letters of union, the Greeks agreeing with the Latins, in these words: “We define that the holy Apostolic See and the Roman Pontiff possesses the primacy over the whole world, and that the Roman Pontiff himself is the successor of blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and true Vicar of Christ, and head of the whole Church and father and doctor of all Christians, and that to him in blessed Peter was given by Jesus Christ our Lord full power for feeding and governing the Universal Church, etc.” Finally the Council of Trent, [1545AD] from its beginning and in the whole of its progress, recognizes the authority of the Pontiff, and at the end requests his confirmation, and specially in session 6, ch.1, ‘De Reformat.’, it calls him Vicar of God on earth, possessing the authority of the Supreme See.

Also from the provincial Councils could many things be collected that for the sake of brevity we pass over; yet can be looked at the Roman Council under Sylvester [314-335AD], and the 3rd and 4th Roman Councils under Symmachus [498-514AD], and the 4th Council of Orléans [541AD] ch.1, and the Councils of Carthage and of Milevis [401-403AD] in their epistle to Pope Innocent, which are numbers 90 and 92 among the epistles of Augustine, in which the authority of the Roman Church for full condemnation of heresy is required. Which is also confirmed by the other bishops together with the same Augustine in epistle 95 to the same Innocent, which epistles are also made mention of by the same Augustine in epistle 96, saying: “Reports from the two Councils of Carthage and Milevis have been send to the See of the apostles; also to Pope Innocent of blessed memory we have written, besides reports of the Councils, familiar letters... To everything that noble gentleman wrote back in the same way, as was pious and befitting the Commander of the Apostolic See.” And in agreement with these is the African Council under Boniface [525AD], ch.35.

But besides these can be noticed the 2nd Council of Tours [567AD], in whose ch.21 these words deserving note are contained: “Which priest would against the decrees which have proceeded from the Apostolic See presume to act?” And almost similar words are contained in the 1st Council of Braga [561AD], ch.18, where all the bishops said it was fitting that everything be celebrated among them in like-minded service, and they add: “Especially since we also have with us concerning certain definite causes an instruction from the Apostolic See, which to its questions, of the former Profuturus Prudentius of venerable memory, it received from the very chair of the most blessed Peter.” And Lucretius, bishop of Braga, added: “Rightly has your paternity remembered the authority of the Apostolic See, etc.” And at once, chs.22 and 23, they decree that in the order of mass and baptism they are to follow the aforesaid instruction of the Roman See. Hence the 1st Council of Toledo [400AD], in its assertion of faith, in the last anathema says: “If anyone do in saving baptism anything against the See of St. Peter, let him be anathema.” But most of all our proposition is confirmed by the words of the sufficiently ancient 3rd Council of Toledo [589AD], canon 1: “Let the constitutions of all the Councils remain in their vigor, and the synodal epistles at the same time of the holy Roman Prelates.” For in these words is sufficiently clear how much the authority was, not only of the Roman Church, but also of its decretal epistles, about which a like decree is contained in the 14th Council of Toledo [684AD], ch.11.

Summary: 1. Authorities from the Greek Fathers confirming the same tradition. From Ignatius and Irenaeus. 2. From Athanasius. 3 From Gregory Nazianzen. 4. From Cyril of Jerusalem. 5. The same primacy is collected from the custom of referring the graver causes to the Supreme Pontiff. 6. From Theodoret. 7. From the historians Socrates and Sozomen. 8. Authorities of the Latin Fathers. Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose. 9. Jerome. 10. Augustine. 11. Prosper. 12. Isidore, Bede. 13. Anselm and Benard.

1. Although to confirm faith about the primacy of the Roman Pontiff enough and more than enough is the authority of the Pontiffs and the Councils, nevertheless the authority of the holy Fathers is not to be omitted, of whom some we adduced above who have provided express testimony to the succession of the Roman Pontiff in the see of Peter; but now others must be introduced who testify about the excellence of the chair itself and of its dignity, by whom the agreement of tradition will more evidently stand firm, and also by whose authority the king of England, who seems to give some deference to the Fathers, will perhaps the more be moved. But one must hold before one's eyes that the same modes of arguing can be taken from the doctors which we noted in the Pontiffs, namely from the words and the titles by which they honor the Roman Pontiffs, from the acts of supreme spiritual jurisdiction which they attribute to them, and from the more notable opinions wherewith they profess their primacy. First then we will begin from the Greeks, who in the present cause can be adjudged less suspect.

First therefore Ignatius, in epist.15, to the Romans, salutes the Roman Church in the most honorific way and says about it: "Which sits first in place over the Roman realm." Again Polycarp, when "he came to Rome, to Anicetus in the city ruling the Church" so that he might consult about a question of Easter (as testified by Jerome De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis on Polycarp and Irenaeus, bk.3, ch.3), seems sufficiently to have recognized the Roman Pontiff as pastor and master of the Faith. But clearer and more copious is Irenaeus, bk.3, ch.3, calling the Roman Church the greatest and most ancient, and saying it was founded by the apostles Peter and Paul. And he subjoins: "With this Church, because of its more potent principality, every church must agree, that is, those who everywhere are the faithful, etc."

2. Next St. Athanasius in his epistle to Marcus the Bishop of the Romans salutes him thus: "To the holy and reverend lord of the apostolic height, Marcus, the father of the holy Roman and Apostolic See and of the universal Church, Athanasius and all the bishops of Egypt send greeting." And later, adding his petition, he says: "We wish that from your authority of the holy See of the Church, which is the mother of all churches, etc." And later: "We are yours, and obedient to you we both are and always wish to be together with all those committed to us." And in his epistle to Felix II, which is contained in the acts of the same Felix in vol.1 of the Councils, he himself along with the other bishops of Egypt implores the aid of the Apostolic See in these words: "We place before your holy apostolate that you deign to carry the care for us in the accustomed way." And later: "Because always our ancestors and we have drawn help from your holy Apostolic See, and we acknowledge that you bear the aforesaid apostolic care for us, and we ask the Supreme See, according to the decrees of the canons, that we receive help from there from where our predecessors received ordinations and dogmas and supports. We also have to that See recourse as to a mother.” And later: “Which thing (namely giving definition about the Faith) we in no way presume to do against your will, the canons commanding that we ought not to decree anything about the greater causes without the Roman Pontiff.” And later: “Because of that, you and your predecessors, namely the apostolic leaders, were constituted by him at the summit’s peak and were commanded to have the care of all the churches.” And later: “To whom all judgment of bishops is committed.” And later about this primacy he expounds Matthew 16 (“Thou art Peter and upon this rock, etc.”), and confirms it all by the authority of the Council of Nicea. With him agrees Basil, in epistle 52, which is addressed to the same Athanasius, saying: “It has seemed agreeable to me that the Bishop of Rome be written to so that he may consider what things are being here done.”

3. Also Gregory Nazianzen, orat. 23 in praise of Hero, records how Peter, the successor of Athanasius at Alexandria, when expelled from his see by Lucius the Arian, fled to the Roman Pontiff, “as by tacit accusation,” he says, “he provoked tears in all so that they might in his eyes and face focus on the magnitude of his calamity and so that he might obtain help, and we know in what way he obtained it.” In which words Nazianzen together with Peter of Alexandria acknowledged the authority of the Pontiff for also judging the causes of the East. Which thing is also from the same Nazianzen collected in orat. 53, which is the second to Cledonius, where he records how Vitalius, the follower of Apollinaris, had fraudulently made gift of a certain book about the Faith, secretly professing heresy, but Damasus, the fraud being known, expelled him from the company of the Church; and finally he destroyed the book with anathema. In the same way the pontifical power is testified to by Chrysostom in his epistles to Innocent I, seeking from him help against those who had unjustly deposed him, both by declaring the deposition invalid and by punishing the evil doers, for whom however he piously intercedes that, if they come to their senses, they should not be excommunicated, by this very fact recognizing the power of the Pontiff.

4. In like manner Cyril in his epistle to Celestine (which is among the epistles of Cyril and is contained in the Council of Ephesus, vol.1, ch.29), in the cause of Nestorius, referred the whole thing to him as to the head, and subjoins: “But although things are thus, we have yet not dared to desert his communion before we indicate these very things to your piety, etc.” To whom Celestine responded (epistle 12 among the epistles of Cyril in the said vol.1, ch.16): “Using the acknowledged authority of our See and our office and place with power, you will, not without the greatest care, execute that sentence, namely that unless within an interval of 10 days, to be counted from the day of this our numbering, he anathematize in formally stated words his wicked doctrine, etc.” And later: “Let your holiness at once provide for that church, but let him understand by all means that he has been separated from our body.” Which letter Cyril obeyed, as is clear from his epistle to Nestorius (epistle 10 in the said vol.1, ch.14), which is about the excommunication, saying: “Which unless you perform according to the time stated in the letters of the most holy and most reverend Celestine, Bishop of the Romans, may you know with certainty that there will thereafter be for you no social intercourse with the bishops and priests of God, no speech, no place lastly among them.” And the like things are contained in the following letter to the clergy and people of Constantinople. In addition St. Thomas reports in his work Contra Errores Graecorum, ch.32, §Habetur, the same Cyril saying in his book Thesaurus: “As Christ received from the Father the fullest authority, so to Peter and his successors he committed it most fully.” Again: “To none other than to Peter did he give the fullness that was his own, but to him alone.” Where the word ‘alone’ does not exclude successors but the other apostles, for a little later he says that to Peter he gave power and the Church. And later the same St. Thomas says: “It is also shown that to be subject to the Roman Pontiff is of the necessity of salvation; for Cyril says in the book Thesaurus: ‘Therefore, brothers, if we imitate Christ so that we his sheep may hear his voice, remaining in the Church of Peter, etc.’” Nor must there be doubt about these testimonies even if now they are not found in Thesaurus, both because of the authority of St. Thomas and also because we know that several books of Thesaurus have perished.

5. Next from the ecclesiastical histories also written by the Greeks it is clear that the most ancient practice of the Church was that in the graver causes there should from the whole Church, even the Eastern, be recourse made to the see of Peter, for seeking either a declaration of faith or a condemnation of some heresy or the gathering or confirmation of a synod, or for seeking judgment by way of appeal or of just defense, from which it is established manifestly that the supreme power of the Roman Bishop was acknowledged and believed by all the Greeks from the beginning of the Church. But of this practice, besides the testimonies adduced, the best argument is taken from the history of Eusebius, bk.7, ch.24 [ch.30 §§18-19], where he says about Paul of Samosata: “When he had lost the bishopric together with the orthodox faith and did not wish to exit from the house of the bishop that was proper to that church, the emperor Aurelian, when asked for his opinion about it, decreed in a most holy way what was to be done. For he prescribed that the house of the church be awarded to them to whom the Christian bishops of Italy and of the city of Rome should by letters prescribe it to be awarded.” For so great was the public fame of the Roman primacy among the Greek Christians that it was not hid even from the gentiles; and therefore the emperor, though an infidel, pronounced that opinion in a most holy way, as Eusebius says approving that opinion and consequently the primacy too, because it was in conformity with the Faith, though it had been proffered by an infidel.

6. The same tradition is taken from Theodoret, bk.2 Hist., ch.22, where he says about the Lesser Council of Rimini: “It should not have the force of precedent, especially since the formula was composed without the consent of the Roman Bishop, whose opinion was to be waited for before all others, etc.” and in bk.5, ch.10, he relates that Damasus, after the rise of the sect of Apollinaris, deposed both him and his disciple Timotheus and signified the fact by letters to those in the East, which letters he there refers too and they begin: “That your love, most honorable sons, bestows due reverence on the Apostolic See is to you surely also a very great honor. For although in the Holy Church, wherein the holy apostle sat when teaching us by what manner the reins of government, which we have taken up, were to be managed, there is to us rendered the first place, yet we confess ourselves far inferior to that degree of dignity.” And later the same Pontiff signifies that the Eastern Catholics have had recourse to him, saying: “Why is it that you again require of me the deposition of Timotheus, who has even here by the decision of the Apostolic See, when Peter the bishop of Alexandria was present, been deposed together with his master Apollinaris?” All which things are approved by Theodoret. Nay, he himself too, when he had come under suspicion in the Faith, took refuge by letter with Pope Leo, saying: “To your Apostolic See we hasten, so that we may receive from you a cure for the ulcers of the churches, for to you it belongs to be first in all things. For by many things which make you superior is your See adorned. For other cities are adorned by size or beauty, etc., but to yours an overflowing abundance of goods has been given by Him who is the giver of all things and who presides over the whole earth.” And the rest, which he pursues at large.

7. This tradition, next, is agreed with by Socrates, Histor. bk.2, ch.5 [ch.9], where he indicates that the Council of Antioch was illegitimate because it did not have the authority of Julius the Roman Pontiff. “Since,” he says, “the ecclesiastical canon bids that decrees of the Church are not to be sanctioned without the sentence of the Roman Bishop.” And reporting, in ch.11 [bk.4, ch.36], that Athanasius and several other Eastern bishops, when ejected from their sees, came to Rome so as to inform Julius the Roman Bishop of their status, he says: “Since the Roman Church was in possession of privilege beyond the rest,” and bk.4, ch.3, reporting similar things of Peter of Alexandria, he adds about him: “When he had returned with letters from Damasus the Roman Bishop, the people, trusting in them, expelled Lucius and introduced Peter into his place.” And Sozomen, bk.3 Histor., ch.8, relating the flight of Athanasius and others to Julius the Roman Bishop, adds: “Whose accusations once the Roman Bishop had understood, he received them into communion. And since, because of the dignity of the See, the care of all concerned him, he restored to each individually their sees, and wrote to the Eastern bishops and faulted them... And he gave mandate that certain, in the name of them of all, should appear on an appointed day.” And in ch.9 he refers to other letters of the same Julius wherein, besides other things, this was contained: “that there was a law with regard to the dignity of the priest which pronounced those acts to be void which were established against the sentence of the Roman Bishop.” He also adds, ch.10 (which is something to be noted), that when by these letters no advance was made against the rebellious bishops of the East, he demanded help from the emperor Constans as from the secular arm, and in this way at length he compelled the Eastern bishops to come to Rome, and in bk.6, ch.22, when a controversy had arisen about the dignity of the Holy Spirit, he said: “The Roman Bishop, when he had been informed about it, wrote letters to the bishops of the East that, together with the bishops and priests of the West they should believe the Trinity to be consubstantial and equal in glory. By which deed, the individual matters having once been judged by the Roman Church, they quieted down, and thus the controversy seemed to have an end.” And this is sufficient about the Greek Fathers.

8. From the Latins much has in the earlier chapters and in book 1 been adduced which does not here need to be repeated but to be briefly insinuated and to some extent enlarged. First therefore Tertullian, De Preascrip., ch.36: “You have Rome whence authority is to hand.” And in De Pudicitia, ch.1, he calls the Roman Bishop “greatest Pontiff and Bishop of bishops;” where Pamelius points to many places of the same author which I omit because this author, when he fell away from the Roman Church, did not think rightly of its primacy although he was not altogether ignorant of it. A great and faithful assertor of this truth, then, was Cyprian who in his epistles very often requires for the unity of the Church one supreme head and says it is in the Roman Church, as can be seen in epistles 40, 45, 52, 55, 76, whose words we have often referred to. Again Ambrose in his oration on his brother Satyrus, and on 1 Timothy 3, and his book of epistles in number 7 to Pope Siricius with other bishops he says thus: “We have acknowledged the watchful letters of Your Holiness, a Good Shepherd, who faithfully keep the door committed to you and guard with pious care the flock of Christ, worthy to be he whom the sheep of the Lord hear and follow.” And epistle 4 to the emperors Gratian etc., treating of shunning the Arians, he says: “How can it be that him whom we see included in their society we do not judge to be also an assertor of perfidy? What too if he had been absent? Yet your clemency is to be implored lest it permit the head of the whole Roman world, the Roman Church, and the sacrosanct Faith of the apostles to be troubled; for from there to all flow the rights of venerable communion, etc.” And epistle 9 to Theophylact of Alexandria: “We think the matter should be referred to our holy brother, the priest of the Roman Church, since we presume that your judgments will be those that cannot displease him.” And later: “So that we also, having received the catalog of your statutes, may, when we know that that has been done which the Roman Church without doubt will approve, happily gain profit from the examination.” With these words, written to an Eastern bishop, Ambrose sufficiently bears witness to the Roman Church’s custom of governing the East too.

9. To the same practice and power Jerome is witness, epistle 11 to Ageruchias, saying (as I related above) that he had himself sometimes helped Damasus in replying to the synodal constitutions of the East and the West. And epistle 16 to Principia, he refers to what has been touched on above about Athanasius and Peter of Alexandria who, escaping the persecution of the Arian heresy, “fled to Rome as to the safest haven of their communion.” Also in epistle 8 to Demetriades, near the end, he calls the Roman See “the Apostolic Chair” thinking the same about its primacy as about the primacy of Peter, his opinion on which we related above. Again more copiously in epistle 57 to Damasus, whose words were already adduced above, where he also teaches that that see had Peter’s privilege of not erring in the faith. Which thing he also thinks in his Apologia bk.2, or bk.3 of his Apologia Contra Rufinum, where he has these words: “But let it be known that the Roman faith praised by the apostolic voice does not accept tricks of this sort, even if an angel should announce otherwise than has once been preached.” And later: “And yet I marvel how Italy might have approved what Rome has condemned, its bishops have taken up what the Apostolic See has condemned,” tacitly denying that it could have happened or that he himself believes it.

10. From Augustine too having recourse to the Roman Pontiff as to the Vicar of Christ, we have said much above, from the same Augustine’s epistles 90, 92, and 95. With these the same Augustine is in accord bk.2 Retract., ch.50, saying that: “the Pelagian heresy has by the bishops of the Roman Church, Innocent and Zosimus, with the cooperation of the letters of the African Councils, been condemned.” And in epistle 157, at the beginning, he openly professes that he is subject to the Roman Pontiff when he says: “When I was present near Caesarea, they came to the place where the ecclesiastical necessity enjoined on us by venerable Pope Zosimus, bishop of the Apostolic See, had drawn us.” And later, having related the words of the same Zosimus to prove the necessity of baptism for the remission of sins, he subjoins: “In these words of the Apostolic See the ancient and established Catholic Faith is so certain and clear that it is impious for any Christian to doubt it.” And epistle 102 about the Roman Church he says: “In which the principality of the apostolic chair has always flourished;” and there too he relates that in the cause of the Donatists the judgment of the Apostolic See was waited for. And he repeats the same bk.1 Contra Epist. Parmen., ch.5, and epistle 165, where he says that to recognize the Catholic Church one should most look at the succession in the see of Peter, thinking that it was the rock on which the Church was founded. Which he expressly declared in the psalm against the party of Donatus, vol.7, saying: "Count the priests if you will from the See itself of Peter. It is the rock which the proud gates of hell will not overcome."

Besides on the same basis he says, bk.1 Contra Iulianum, ch.4: "I think that the part of the world should be sufficient for you wherein the Lord wished the first of his apostles to be crowned with a most glorious martyrdom. Had you wished to hear the blessed Innocent who presides over that Church, you would now have removed your dangerous youth from the Pelagian snares. For what could that holy man reply to the African Councils save what the Apostolic See and the Roman Church along with the rest anciently and persistently holds?" Which place is much to be taken notice of for in it plainly does Augustine teach that the definition of the Pontiff makes the Faith certain even without a General Council. Hence in bk.2 De Peccato Originali, ch.7, he refers also to Celestine, the colleague of Pelagius, that "he did not dare resist the letters of the blessed Pope Innocent;" nay that he promised to condemn everything which that See condemned. Lastly, bk.1 Ad Bonifacium, at the beginning, he says among other things: "May you not disdain, who do not think high things though you preside at a greater height, to be friend of the humble and to repay the love they have paid." And below: "Since it is common to all of us who perform the office of bishop, although you yourself preside on that higher eminence of the pastoral watchtower, I do what I can in accord with the small part of my duty, etc."

11. In agreement with Augustine is Prosper against Collator, ch.10, where, holding the definitions of Innocent and Zosimus against Pelagius to be infallible, he infers as it were an absurdity against Collator: "According to your judgment Pope Innocent, most worthy of Peter's See, has erred." And later: "The sacrosanct See of blessed Peter, which speaks to the whole world by the voice of Pope Zosimus, has erred." And ch.41 he again says: "Innocent of blessed memory has struck the head of the wicked error with the apostolic sword." And later: "To the decrees of the African Councils Pope Zosimus of blessed memory has adjoined the strength of his sentence, and for the cutting off of the impious he has armed with the sword of Peter the right hands of all the commanders." Where he also adds Boniface, of whom he says: "He used against the enemies of God's grace not only the apostolic but also the royal edicts." And of Celestine he adds: "The statutes of his predecessors and the synodal decrees he judged had to be inviolably observed." And about the same he subjoins: "Nor did he with a more sluggish care liberate the Britons from the same sickness, etc." And later he says that the same care had made Scotland Christian. And in the book De Ingratis, ch.2, he speaks thus: "Rome, the See of Peter, which is made the world's head in pastoral care, holds by religion what it could not gain possession of by arms."

Similarly too in bk.2, De Vocatione Gentium, in imitation of Leo, he says: "Rome by the principality of the apostolic priest has been made greater in the fortress of religion than on the throne of power." In this way too Fulgentius spoke, bk. De Incarnat. et Gratia, ch.11: "The Roman Church, lit up by the words of Peter and Paul as if by resplendent rays and adorned by their bodies, is the summit of the world." Also from Optatus of Milevis, Contra Parmenian., many things have been referred to, but especially bk.2: "You cannot," he says, "deny that you know that in the city of Rome the Episcopal chair was conferred on Peter first, whereon Peter the head of all the apostles sat, so that in this one chair unity might by all be preserved, so that now he might be schismatic and sinner who against this one chair should set up a second.”

12. Likewise Isidore in his epistle to Eugenius bishop of Toledo, after explaining the power given to Peter in the way passed on by us above, subjoins: “Whose dignity of power, although transfused to all bishops of churches, yet more specially in the Roman Prelate, as by a certain singular privilege, eternally remains higher than in the other members.” And in the preface to his collection of canons, which is contained in the first volume of Councils, he says that he had collected, along with the Councils, the decrees and synodal letters of the Pontiffs, “because in them, for the summit of the Apostolic See, the authority is not less than the Councils.” And at the end, he says: “The authority for convening Councils has been committed by a peculiar power to the Apostolic See, nor do we read that any Synod was valid that was not convened or supported by his authority; these things are testified by canon authority, strengthened by ecclesiastical history, confirmed by the holy Fathers.” It is also confirmed by Bede in his homily on Saint Benedict of England, vol.7, about whom he says: “He hastened to make pilgrimage to the doors of the blessed apostles so that, because the faith was still rude among the race of the English and the institution of churches was beginning to flower, he might receive there a more perfect form of living where the topmost head of the Church is eminent among the high apostles.” And bk.2 Histor. Anglor., ch.1, he says of Gregory: “When first in all the world he was holding the pontificate and was presiding over churches long since converted to the faith of truth, he made our race, enslaved until then to idols, the Church of Christ, etc.” And bk.3, ch.25, he reports that the king of England and others already at that time believed that the keys given to Peter remained in the Roman Church. And in bk.4, ch.1, and often in that history, he shows how great always was the providence of the Pontiff for the English, and the obedience of them to him.

13. Next all the later Fathers too have most constantly taught the same truth, among whom we will number only two, Anselm and Bernard, who have spoken most gravely about the pontifical dignity. For Anselm, in De Incarnatione Verbi, thus begins: “To the Lord and Father of the Universal Church in pilgrimage on earth, to the Supreme Pontiff Urban, brother Anselm.” And later: “Since divine providence has chosen Your Holiness, to whom he commits the guarding of Christian life and faith and the ruling of the Church, to no other is reference more rightly made if anything contrary to Catholic faith arises in the Church, so that by Your authority it may be corrected; nor, if anything is said in response to error, is it to any other more safely shown, so that it may by Your prudence be examined.” And in his preface to Romans he says that that letter is put in first place, although it was not written first, because Rome was both at that time head of the whole world and still today the Roman Church possesses the principality of all churches.

But St. Bernard much more copiously teaches this very thing in epistle 25 to Gaufrid, where he says among other things: “Of Germany, of France, of England, of Scotland, of the Spains, and of Jerusalem the kings, along with the whole clergy and the peoples, support and adhere to the Lord Innocent, as children to their father, as members to their head, anxious to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.” Again epistle 131 almost the same argument to the Milanese, and epistle 183 to Conrad king of the Romans, he says: “I have read ‘Let every soul be subject to the higher powers.’ Which sentence I desire and in every way admonish you to keep in showing reverence to the Vicar of the Supreme and Apostolic See and blessed Peter, just as you wish it to be kept to you by the whole empire.” And of the sublimity of that See he speaks in outstanding way in epistle 137 to Eugenius, and more at large in bk.3 De Considerat. to the same, ch.8, several words from which were related above and therefore we pass them by. Here too can be added the testimonies and examples of temporal kings and emperors, but some of these were touched on above, and we will adduce more in what follows when comparing the spiritual power with the temporal. Now let the notable words of the emperor Constantine suffice in ch. In Memoriam, dist.19, where he thus speaks: “Let us honor the holy Roman and Apostolic See so that she, who is to us the mother of the sacerdotal dignity, should be the mistress of ecclesiastical reason; wherefore humility with meekness is to be preserved so that, although scarcely to be borne be the yoke imposed by the Holy See, we may yet bear and sustain it with pious devotion.” But there is no need here to demand special reason in addition to authority. For those reasons are sufficient that were adduced about the perfect governance of the Church and about the necessity of one head in one body for the conservation of its unity and faith. For that this head be constituted in such See, although it have many moral congruences that have been insinuated by the Fathers and can easily be thought of, the proper reason is the will of Christ and Peter, which by the adduced testimonies is made sufficiently known to us.

Chapter 18: Satisfaction is made to two objections against the primacy of the Pontiff taken from Scripture and the Councils.

Summary: 1. Against the spiritual power of the Pontiff many things are objected by King James. 2. First Objection. Confirmation. 3 Solution to the objection. 4. The confirmation is dissolved. 5. Instance. Response. From the Scriptures is collected not the primacy of kings but of the Pontiff. 6. Second objection. Confirmation. 7. Solution to the objection. 8. A certain instance is refuted. 9 Response to the confirmation. 10. From the Council of Sessa the primacy of the Pontiff is also confirmed. Marcellinus was not deposed by the Council. 11. An example about an heretical Pope is met. An heretical Pope is deposed by God himself, not by men. Before deposition of a Pontiff a declaratory sentence of crime must first be given.

1. Against the dignity and primacy of the Roman Pontiff the King of England makes many objections scattered through his book besides those that we related above against the primacy of Peter, many of which touch on the comparison between the Pontiff and temporal kings, and we will, after the said comparison has been made, examine them better in what follows. There we must also speak about the power of the Pontiff over kings in temporal matters. Now we will respond only to the things that seem to be objected absolutely to the supreme spiritual power of the Pontiff. Now these things seem, both in the Preface and in the Apology of the king, to be reduced to three heads, excepting those that are taken from the acts of kings or emperors, about which, as I said, we will see later.

2. The first head is that this dogma has no or a weak foundation in the word of God, as he says in the Apology p.118 and in the Preface pp.22, 28, 60 and very many other places. We can in his objections also weigh the confirmation that Paul, when describing in Ephesians 4 the ecclesiastical ministries and order of the Church, makes no mention of the Vicar of Christ, although however that place seems most apt for proposing it if it belonged to the hierarchy of the Church. Hence the king, on the said p.60, marvels greatly and says he does not know “by what arts the Roman Pontiffs have been made Vicars of Christ; nay rather Gods on earth, marked with a triple crown, that is, kings of heaven and of earth and of inferiors, judges of the whole world, and themselves to be judged by no one, heads of the faith, etc.,” which he pursues, concluding: “By what arts, I say, they have ascended to so great a height, I for my part know not.”

3. However by this very fact the king, if he wished to be wise, might understand that this was not done by human art but in virtue of the word in Matthew 16.18: “Upon this rock I will build my Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it,” as the ancient Fathers in holy and Catholic way understood. For by that art did Pope Sylvester so subject to himself the emperor Constantine that the emperor did not blush to confess him Vicar of Christ, successor of Peter, and worthy of greater honor than himself; by the same art did the other holy Pontiffs preserve the same dignity and power and defend it against the gates of hell. For in fact those arts were not other than the word of God, freely preached with great virtue of spirit, and sometimes confirmed by divine virtues and illustrations, as the times offered opportunity according to the disposition of divine providence. The king errs, therefore, and contradicts the word of God when he says that the primacy of the Pope has a weak foundation in the word of God. For both in the written word of God is the perpetual primacy of Peter and its endurance always into the future through succession sufficiently contained, and through the unwritten word of the same Christ has the sense of the written word been with certainty handed down. Besides it has also been evidently declared that the succession of Peter has persisted in the Roman See. Nor can the king or his Protestant doctors escape the force of this word except by both denying the truth of the unwritten word and interpreting the written word by their own sure knowledge and private spirit. But that both of these are foreign to Catholic truth, nay that they are the foundation of all heresies and schisms, was sufficiently demonstrated in book 1.

4. To the confirmation added by us from the place in Ephesians 4 we can reply from the doctrine of Augustine in bk. De Fide et Operibus ch.9, where, treating of the place in Acts 8 about the eunuch whom Philip baptized, although he said nothing more than, v.37, “I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God,” hence some argued that it was not necessary to teach catechumens anything else for them to be baptized, Augustine himself however replies: “Scripture kept silent and allowed the rest to be understood that Philip did with the eunuch when he baptized him.” Thus, therefore, we say that, although Paul kept silent in that place about the one Vicar of Christ, the pastor of the whole Church, he left it to be understood in the rest of what he describes.

5. Now this reply could be turned against us, for earlier we used this place to prove that kings do not have spiritual power over the Church, because Paul made no mention of them either in this place or in other similar places; which inference can be evaded in exactly the same way. I reply from the words of the same Augustine in the place cited: “In the fact indeed that he says (that is, Luke), v.38: ‘Philip baptized him,’ he wished to be understood that all things were fulfilled; which, although they were passed over in silence in the Scriptures for the sake of brevity, yet we know by the sequence of tradition that they were fulfilled: in the same way too by the fact that it is written, v.35, that Philip preached the Lord to the eunuch, one must in no way doubt that in the catechism those things were said that pertain to the life and morals of one who believes in the Lord Jesus Christ.” So, therefore, in the present case we say that Paul, under that description of the Church, comprehended everything that either from tradition or from other places of Scripture perspicuously pertains to the order and hierarchy of the Church. But it is sufficiently handed on to us, both within Scripture and without it, that the visible Church is one sheepfold under one visible Pastor who bears the vicariate of Christ; this Pastor, therefore, was explained by Paul under the general name of pastors, because he did not assume there the province of explaining in particular all the grades and ministries of ecclesiastical order. For which there is also the argument that when he was treating of the same argument in 1 Corinthians 12 he omitted evangelists, whom he places under prophets, and puts there virtues and other things which he omitted in the place in Ephesians, and in neither place did he put priests and deacons, although it is manifest from other places of Scripture that they pertain to ecclesiastical hierarchy. But, as for kings, no Scripture or tradition teaches that in the ecclesiastical hierarchy they have a special place or function in ecclesiastical governance or ministry, and therefore, when they are passed over in silence in those principal places, they are altogether excluded; especially because neither under a specific nor a general form of words are they included.

6. The second objection is indicated by the king in these few words in his Preface p.60: “Thus sometimes were they (namely the Roman Bishops) subject to General Councils, as in fact recently the Council of Constance inaugurated a fourth Pontiff after three abdicated.” Which objection can be confirmed because Pontiffs are in other cases deposed or otherwise judged by the Church through the mediation of Councils. For that it can so be done was defined by the said Council of Constance and confirmed by the Council of Basel, and both attempted to carry it out. Pope Marcellinus too was once deposed by the Council of Sessa; and that he can be deposed in a case of heresy is handed down in ch. ‘Si Papa’ distinct.40, and is commonly received by all Catholics.

I reply in the first place that this objection pertains rather to the question about the comparison between a Pope and a General Council than to the question about the primacy of the Pontiff. For the Fathers who were present at the Councils of Constance and Basel, and Gersonius and other doctors who thought that a General Council was above the Pontiff, nevertheless believed with sure faith that the Roman Bishop was supreme and universal Pastor of the Church, above all bishops and patriarchs, having spiritual jurisdiction over them and over all the faithful of whatever condition they be, even if they are kings or emperors, and against this the objection made does not proceed, as is evident of itself; and that fact suffices for our purpose, whatever may be thought about the other question raised. But because we believe it altogether true that no jurisdiction was immediately conferred on a General Council by Christ, and that therefore, while a legitimate and undoubted Pontiff lives, the jurisdiction of a General Council depends on him and accordingly is subject to him (which must be treated of elsewhere), therefore satisfaction to the said objections must be briefly made.

7. To the principal objection, then, we reply that at the time of the Council of Constance there were three pretender Pontiffs in the Church, named Gregory XIII, Benedict XIII, and John XXIII. But since it is certain, and was proved above, that there cannot be several true Pontiffs in the Church, the consequence is that they were not all Pontiffs. Hence also it could be that none of them was certain Pontiff, and to that extent not Pontiff, because none of them was yet received by the common consent of the Church nor was believed to be legitimately elected. Now, in such a case, a General Council, although without a head, has the right to make enquiry about the true and legitimate Pontiff and, if it find that none of the pretenders is legitimate and certain Pontiff, to depose them all, or rather to declare that none of them is true Pontiff, and accordingly to see about a true Pontiff for the Church. And this at most is what the Council of Constance did by deposing the three Pontiffs and electing Martin V. Now from the fact that this was done nothing can be collected against the dignity or power of the Pontiff, because since doubtful Pontiffs are not true Pontiffs, the power of a Council over them takes nothing away from true Pontiffs; for, when a true Pontiff has been afterwards elected by such a Council, there will be in him full pontifical power, superior to the Council itself, because he has power not from it but from Christ. But because someone can say that it is sufficiently certain that John XXIII was Pontiff, we can add that, however it may be, he himself at length voluntarily renounced the Papacy, as is clear from the histories, and likewise Gregory XII yielded. But Benedict XII, otherwise Petrus de Luna, although he never wished to yield, nevertheless died a little after the election of Martin, and a certain Clement, who was appointed in his place, made renunciation a little afterwards, and Martin V was recognized and received as sole and true Pontiff by the Universal Church.

8. But if someone gives as instance that the subsequent Council of Basel passed sentence against Eugene IV, the sole and undoubted Pontiff, and created Amadeus, called Felix, in his place, the response is that the Council herein erred, which is not to be wondered at because it was now not proceeding legitimately nor under obedience to the Apostolic See. Hence too it erred in approving the assertion, handed on in the Council of Constance, that a General Council is above the Pope. Whence consequently it judged that a Council, once legitimately gathered, could not be dissolved without its own consent by the Pontiff, nay could compel the Pontiff himself to be present at the Council. Which foundation, however, is altogether false, and therein could the Council of Constance err, because it was neither convoked by a true and certain Pontiff nor had him present per se or through legates. Hence it was legitimately convened only for removing the schism, not for defining dogmas of faith. It exceeded, therefore, the limits of its power and so could err, and consequently the following Council of Basel herein erred too because, as I said, it was not then proceeding legitimately. And thus the aforesaid assertion was afterwards condemned by the Pontiffs and by the Lateran Council under Leo X. Also Eugene IV deemed both the sentence and the assertion of the Council of Basel to be nothing, as is reported in the same Council session 38. And the same opinion as Eugene was held by the Universal Church, which, notwithstanding the sentence, took both Eugene and his successor Nicholas V for true Pontiffs, repudiating the antipope Felix, who afterwards yielded to Eugene, and thus the pontifical dignity always remained complete.

9. The old example, however, about the deposition of Marcellinus is not objected by the king, who does not admit the acts of that Council and accuses it of contradiction, because in it is often said that “the Pontiff is judged by no one,” and yet Marcellinus left it after being judged, for a sentence of anathema was passed against him, to which all the bishops subscribed, for Marcellinus could not also excommunicate himself. Neither are there lacking some too among Catholic writers who doubt the history of Marcellinus, as one can see in Baronius vol.2 for the year 302 n.95 and following, and for the year 303 n.89 and following. However, Baronius himself advises that an ancient history commonly received in the Church should not be called into doubt. Especially since Pope Nicholas in his epistle to the emperor Michael reports it as true, and uses it to confirm the authority of the Apostolic See.

10. One must note, therefore, that the sin of Marcellinus was a kind of infidelity and therefore it pertained to the Council to inquire about it, both because of public scandal in the matter of faith and because of the safety of the Church. Because, however, his guilt was only against confession of faith and not heresy, therefore did the assembled bishops often say: "Judge yourself by your own mouth, for the first See is judged by no one." From which words the supreme authority of the Pontiff is confirmed. Now Marcellinus himself seems to have pronounced sentence against himself when he said: "I have sinned before you all, and I cannot be in the order of priests." By which words it has seemed to some that he renounced the pontificate, and that the bishops accepted the renunciation, and that therefore it is said about them: "They subscribed to his condemnation and condemned him," not by the force of a jurisdiction that they had over him while he was Pontiff, but by consenting to him and accepting his renunciation. And thus no one judged him while he was Pontiff but, as is at once subjoined, "he was condemned by his own mouth." But after he ceased to be Pontiff, he could also be bound by censures by the Council, as is evident of itself. Or perhaps he did not withdraw from the papacy, as is more probable, because this is not there expressly said, nor do the cited words bear renunciation before them but penance; nor does Damasus, nor Platina, or the Roman Breviary report it, but they signify rather that he was Pontiff, even at the time when he suffered martyrdom, and Baronius clearly testifies to it for the year of Christ 304. But, on this supposition, it must consequently be said that not properly in the ecclesiastical forum was he condemned or punished or bound by censure, but voluntarily for the example of others and to avenge his sin he separated himself and, as it were, suspended himself or abstained from his office. Which judgment the Council approved, and passed as it were a declaratory sentence of his crime, Marcellinus himself nodding approval, and in this sense it is said that the Council condemned Marcellinus. And thus there is in the words of the Council no contradiction.

11. To the final part of the objection about an heretical Pope we reply, in the first place, that it is not certain whether a Pope, even as a private person, can fall stubbornly into heresy. Hence, if the opinion is true that denies a Pope can be a heretic, the objection ceases. But because the canons and the Councils seem to suppose the contrary, as is clear from ch. 'Si Papa' dist.40, and from the Roman Council under Adrian, and from the 8th Synod, it must be conceded, once the case is admitted, that a Pope can then be judged and deprived of his dignity. But how it may be done without prejudice to his dignity is variously explained by the doctors; but it is not necessary in the present case to report and examine the individual opinions. I therefore say briefly that an heretical Pope is not deposed by men but by God himself, although not without the ministry of the Church or of a Council passing a declaratory sentence of crime against him. For just as a Pope is elected by men and yet he receives the dignity not from men but immediately from Christ, so too, although he may be declared a heretic by the sentence of men, nevertheless not by human right but by divine does he stand at once deprived of the dignity. But whether for such privation or deposition such a sentence is necessary, or whether the sin itself of heresy suffices, at any rate when it is external and notorious from the fact itself, is disputed by the doctors. But it seems to me more consonant to reason and to right governance that a declaratory sentence of the crime is necessary, given by a Council possessed of authority, so that everything may be done in orderly fashion and the dangers of schism removed.

Chapter 19: Certain places in Gregory, which the king brings in as objections, are explained, and the true titles of the Roman Bishop are defended.

Summary: 1. The testimonies of Gregory are reviewed. 2. The legitimate explanation of the testimonies of Gregory is given, and the argument of the king is turned back against him. 3. Double acceptation of the name 'Universal Bishop'. The name of 'Universal Bishop' is suitable for the Pontiff if it does not exclude the other particular bishops. 4. Why Gregory avoided this name.

1. The third principal objection is taken from Gregory [sc. Pope Gregory the Great] in the various epistles wherein he reprehends John of Constantinople because he called himself, and wished to be named, Universal Bishop or Patriarch; and the more to confound him he adds: "None of my predecessors ever consented to use so profane a term," bk.4 indict.3 ch.80, otherwise epist.39 to Anastasius of Antioch, where he also says: "For as your reverend holiness knows, the holy Synod of Chalcedon offered to me, Pontiff of the Apostolic See, which I serve by the disposition of God, this name of universality, but none of my predecessors, etc." And like things are contained in epist.32 to Maurice, 33 & 34 to Constantia, and 38 to the same John, and 36 to Anianus, and bk.7 epist.69 to Eusebius of Thessalonica. And he adds in bk.6 epist.30 to Maurice, otherwise ch.194: "I confidently say that whoever calls himself, or desires to be called, universal priest is in his exaltation a forerunner of antichrist, because he puts himself by his pride ahead of the rest." Another reason too given by Gregory is that, if one Patriarch be said to be universal, "the name of patriarchs is taken away from the rest. And therefore," he says, "none of the Roman Pontiffs assumed this term of singularity, or consented to use it, lest, while something is given private to one, all the bishops should be deprived of due honor." Which reason proceeds equally of the Supreme Pontiff. Hence the same Gregory, bk.7 indict.1 epist.30 says to Eulogius of Alexandria, who, when writing to him, had called him Universal Pope: "But I ask that your most sweet holiness not do more for me, because what is offered beyond the requirement of reason to another is taken from you." And later: "For if your holiness says that I am universal Pope, you deny that you are what you affirm me to be universal." Where he signifies that one being Universal Bishop is repugnant to others being true bishops. And this opinion was handed on before Gregory by Pelagius II against the same John in epist.1 to the illegitimate Council of Constantinople. And it is, before these Pontiffs, read in the 3rd Council of Carthage ch.26 and in the African Council at the time of Boniface, the canon which contains: "The Bishop of the First See may not be called Prince of priests or Supreme Priest or anything of the sort, but only Bishop of the First See."

This argument is greatly urged by the king of England in his Apology pp.16 & 107, and from the mentioned testimonies of Gregory he thinks to cut the sinews of many, or certainly of all, of the things we have adduced for the primacy of the Roman Pontiff. He also most contradicts Bellarmine on the ground that he used in favor of the primacy of the Roman Pontiff another testimony of Gregory in which he calls the Apostolic See "head of the faith," bk.11 epist.42. For, says the king: "he who repudiates the name of Universal Bishop, will he in equanimity have tolerated to be called head of the faith?" And therefore he himself expounds it of a head or governor in general, whether he be

Pope or king, within his dominions or borders. And because he saw that this exposition was forced, as indeed it is, he begs permission that, if it be rejected, he may be able to say that “Gregory spoke either with little caution or excessively.” But, with the same permission of the king, he himself commits both, because without any reason or foundation he applies that free censure to the words, not only of Gregory, but also of all the ancient Fathers. Nay, we can add that it redounds even onto the words of Christ; for he is no less the foundation of the Church than head of the faith; now Christ said about Peter, that is, about the see of Peter as I proved above, that he was the foundation of the Church; Christ was excessive, then, or spoke incautiously if Gregory was excessive or spoke incautiously by calling the Apostolic See the head of the faith.

For Gregory was speaking not of himself alone but of his See. For thus does he say: “Now we give admonishment that the reverence of the Apostolic See not be disturbed by any one’s presumption, for the state of the members is then intact if the head of faith is struck by no injury, and the authority of the canons stays unharmed and unstained.” For, from this train of words, it is clear that the same Apostolic See, to which he advises reverence to be given, he afterwards calls “head of the faith, which the members must strike with no injury, so that their state may remain intact.” Which I understand particularly of the state of faith, because those who disturb everything against the reverence due to the Apostolic See cannot persevere in the true and integral faith. And for that reason, perhaps, he changed his way of speaking, and what he had first called “the Apostolic See” he afterwards called “Head of the Faith,” so as to indicate that there is threat of great danger in contemning the obedience and reverence due to the Apostolic See, for transition is easily made to the danger of losing the faith. And the confirmation is that Christ was certainly not excessive nor did he speak incautiously when he said to Peter, Luke 22.32: “and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren;” but this function, together with the privilege, v.32: “I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not,” was conferred not only on the person but also on the see of Peter, as we showed in book 1; therefore there is no excess, nor incautious speaking, if the Pontiff, who is set in place as a living rule of faith for strengthening the brethren, is called head of the faith. Hence the Fathers of the Council of Chalcedon, in their epistle to Pope Leo, call him “firmness of faith” when they say: “May your firmness fulfill for your sons what is fitting.”

Much more so by the fact that it can rightly be understood that he is called head of the faith because he is the head of all the faithful, the abstract put for the concrete, to denote that there is no true faith except in the members of this head, or that faith itself is what conjoins the members with the head. Hence it happens that both the head and the members may be called ‘of the faith’ because they coalesce through faith in the one body, which is the Church. And in this way, to be head of the faith is nothing else than to be head of the Church, on which head, in its kind, the faith of the Church depends. Wherefore it is ridiculous to adapt those words to temporal kings, or to interpret that head only about a political governor and only for passing laws for the sake of external order, since Gregory openly speaks of the head of the whole Church, and in matters spiritual; for it is also for this cause that he calls him head of the faith. And although it be true that at the beginning of the epistle Gregory had treated of conceding to the bishop of Palermo the use of the pallium, which use pertains to a certain ecclesiastical ceremony, afterwards, taking occasion therefrom, he admonished him to observe, and make to be observed, ecclesiastical discipline about reverence for the Apostolic See, and about the unharmed and unstained authority of the canons, and the integrity of morals; all which things pertain to ecclesiastical and spiritual governance. Therefore Gregory was speaking about the head of this governance when he called the Apostolic See the head of the faith.

2. By turning back, then, the king's argument, the legitimate sense of others can in this place easily be erected. For if Gregory called his See the head of the faith, because firmness of faith, and care and solicitude for preserving and propagating it and also, as a result, the honest morals that depend on it, were committed to that See, when he refused the name of "Universal Bishop" he was not denying the supreme pastoral care of his See, but he wished to avoid the invidiousness of the word and the appearance of exaltation and ambition. And not only from that place, but also from innumerable others, nay from the same ones where he treats of the name 'universal', there is manifestly collected that Gregory acknowledged in himself and in his See the care of supreme and universal Pastor. For in the same epist.32 to Maurice he says: "It is matter of proof for all who know the Gospel that by the voice of the Lord the care of the whole Church was committed to the holy apostle Peter, prince of all the apostles." And later: "The care of the whole Church and the principality is committed to him, yet he is not called Universal Apostle." Behold where he acknowledges the principality but refuses the name. And in epist.36 & 38 he at the same time contemns the name and uses universal power by dissolving and condemning an illegitimate Council convened without the authority of his own See, and by threatening censures against John if he does not return to his right mind. Nay, in bk.7 epist.64, he blames the same John for the same name, although John himself did not deny that he was subject to the Apostolic See, as the same Gregory relates, who also adds that he knows of no bishop who is not subject to the same See; therefore, by refusing the word 'universal' he did not intend to deny universal jurisdiction to his own See. Hence also in epist.69, when about to treat of the same cause, he thus begins: "We are constrained by the care of the governance we have taken up to extend watchfully the solicitude of our office, etc." And later he shows the same cause when he says that "things done in a Council without the authority and consent of the Apostolic See have no force;" and at the end he passes a general censure against those who violate his precepts; that I may pass over the other places above cited wherein Gregory both commends and exercises the primacy of the Roman Church.

3. Why then did Gregory forbid and repudiate the name 'Universal Bishop' as profane? The response comes with Cardinal Bellarmine, bk.2 De Clericis last chapter at the end, that the name 'Universal Bishop' can be used in two ways. First for signifying one bishop who is proper and proximate pastor of the whole Universal Church and of all particular churches and dioceses, in the way, that is, in which the bishop of Coimbra, for instance, is unique bishop of his whole diocese, wherein he can have a vicar, or several vicars, but not another bishop. To imagine in this way, then, a Universal Bishop of the whole Church is contrary to divine right, and therefore that term of 'Universal Bishop', taken with this signification, is profane and sacrilegious. But in another way can he be said to be 'Universal Bishop' who has, by way of universal cause, jurisdiction over the whole Church; but he does not exclude particular bishops who are both true bishops and, as proximate causes, possess ordinary jurisdiction under the Supreme Pontiff. And taken in this way the term is in itself indeed not profane, because it signifies a thing true and very sacred and necessary for the Church; however, as taken by the Patriarch of Constantinople it was profane and full of presumption and pride, because by it he was attributing to himself what he did not have. And for the contrary reason, when attributed in that sense to the Roman Pontiff, it is not profane but signifies the truth, and therefore in the Council of Chalcedon it is attributed to Pope Leo, as Pope Gregory often testifies in the said epistles. And in the same sense were equivalent names attributed by the Councils and the Fathers to the Roman Bishop, as to be “head of the Universal Church,” in the Council of Chalcedon act.16; “to have care of the Universal Church,” Leo epist.82, Eusebius epist.3, Dionysius epist.2; “Rector of the house of God,” Ambrose on 1 Timothy 3; finally “Bishop of the Universal Church,” as he is often called in the pontifical epistles above mentioned, and in the Council of Chalcedon act.3, and in many other epistles of bishops or princes writing to the Roman Pontiffs, which are reported in the acts of Councils and among the pontifical epistles; and especially those can be looked at that are read in the Council of Chalcedon act.3.

4. Yet nevertheless Gregory repudiated the name of ‘Universal Bishop’, both because of excess of humility – for in this could the king of England say better that Gregory was excessive, not by ambition, but for example of humility; and also so that he might more effectively curb the pride of the bishop of Constantinople; and finally because, on account of the ambiguity of the name, it could offend the other bishops, and this reason is the one Gregory more often uses and, because this danger is not found in the use of other words, he for that reason did not detest the others. And through these things response is also made to Pope Pelagius, for he was moved by the same reason that Gregory was, as is manifest from his words in the said epist.1, and at the same time in the same epistle he calls the Roman Bishop the head of all the churches.

Now about the name of Supreme Pontiff there was never any doubt, as the emperor Justinian testifies in his Authentic about the Roman Church collat.1, where he says: “As the origin of laws was obtained by the elder Rome, so there is no one who doubts that in Rome too is the summit of the Pontificate;” nay the Council of Chalcedon says to Leo in its epistle to him: “Your Highness;” and Gregory bk.1 Dialogi ch.4, relating the history of Equitius, says: “Equitius began to give great thanks to the almighty God, asserting that he had visited him through the Supreme Pontiff,” since the messenger sent to him by the Pontiff said: “that his father, the Apostolic Pontiff, wished to see him.” Jerome indeed in his Preface to the Gospels calls Damasus “the supreme priest,” which is the same thing. Therefore the canon of the Councils of Carthage and of Africa are not understood of the Roman Pontiff but of the African primate, as is rightly expounded by the Gloss in ch.3 distinct.99. For no provincial or national Council could establish how the Pope was to be called; nay, perhaps it was to prevent injury being done to the Pope that the Fathers of those Councils forbade their own primate to be called Supreme Pontiff.

Chapter 20: Response is made to the other objections taken from the deeds and conjectures of the emperors.

Summary: 1. The fourth objection of the king and the first in this chapter. 2. It is proved that the primacy of the Pontiff could not be from the emperors. 3. To Phocas. The objection is met. Phocas only protected the primacy of the Pontiff. 4. To the elder Justin. To the younger Constantine. 5. To Constantine the Great. 6. To the Council of Nicea. 7. Another objection from conjectures. 8. It is solved. Several of the Pontiffs make very perfectly satisfied the governance of the Church. 9. The accusations of heretics are refuted. 10. The primacy of the Pontiff does not display injury to Christ but his singular providence toward the Church.

1. The fourth objection is insinuated by the king in his Preface p.60 where he makes mention of Phocas, saying that up to the times of Phocas the Roman Pontiffs obeyed the emperors. Hence he indicates what other Protestants are wont to assert, that Phocas established that the Roman Pontiff should have the primacy among others. They seem to be favored by other historians, for Bede De Temporibus on Phocas says thus: "He established, at the request of Pope Boniface, that the See of the Roman and Apostolic Church was the head of all the churches, because the church of Constantinople was writing that it was first of them all." And almost in the same way is it narrated by Paul the Deacon in bk.4 De Gestis Longobardorum ch.11, and Antonius Sabelicus Aeneade 8 bk.6, and Pomponius Laetus in Compendium Hist. Romar. on Phocas, and many others report the history in the same way. And on account merely of those words Protestants wish to prove that in that year (which was 607 as Genebrardus along with others wishes, or 606 as Baronius wishes) the Roman Pontiff began to have the primacy over the Universal Church, especially over the East. Although neither is it here consistent with itself, for the Magdeburgians Centur. 6 said that the Roman Pontiff was made Patriarch by the emperor Justin in the year 520, unless perhaps the latter are talking about the Patriarch of the West but the former about the Primacy which was extended also to the Eastern Church.

Others said that the Roman Church had the primacy from Constantine IV, because Platina on Benedict II says that "Constantine, moved by the sanctity of Benedict, sent ratifying sanction to him so that he, whom the clergy, people, and the army of Rome had chosen as Pontiff, the same should at once be believed by all to be the true Vicar of Christ, without waiting for any authority from the Prince of Constantinople or the Exarch of Italy, as was accustomed before to happen." Others refer this dignity of the Roman Bishop to Constantine I, because in the edict of Constantine in the second to last chapter dist.96 it is thus said: "The emperor Constantine, on the fourth day of his baptism, conferred on the Pontiff of the Roman Church the privilege that in the whole Roman world priests should hold him as head just as judges so hold the king." And afterwards the words of the privilege are set down at large, which are also reported in vol.1 Conciliar. and are approved by Gelasius along with the Council of seventy bishops. And almost the same words are used by Leo IX against Michael ch.10. And hence others said that the privilege was given to the Roman Church by the Council of Nicea; for Leo IX above says that the Pontiff is judged by no one, "the most blessed and apostolic Pontiff Sylvester so decreeing, and the Augustus Constantine, his spiritual son, giving approval along with the whole Synod of Nicea." Similar locutions are found in the 4th Council under Symmachus, and in the other Councils mentioned above. Others finally refer this institution indeed to the times of the apostles; they say however that the apostolic institution is not divine, because the ancient Pontiffs sometimes say that Peter, with the consent of the other apostles, was established as their prince. About which and other errors Torquemada can be looked at, bk.2 De Eccles. ch.39ff., and Bellarmine bk.2 De Pontif. ch.17

2. However all these things have neither foundation nor any likelihood, because the primacy of the Roman Church is older than all the Christian emperors, as was proved above from the most ancient tradition. Besides the fact that we also proved that temporal kings have no spiritual power or jurisdiction by which they might be able to make disposition of ecclesiastical things. But ecclesiastical primacy is spiritual and supernatural, as we proved; how then could the emperors establish it or confer it? Next we proved that this dignity is from the institution of Christ, and that by force thereof it endures through continual succession and always passes by the same divine right to the Roman Pontiff, on the supposition of the determination made to such See by Peter; therefore it is vain to seek for the institution of this dignity from the emperors. Nay, rather, it had its beginning neither from the Councils or the Fathers nor from the apostles, but from the Lord himself, as Anacletus and other pontiffs above referred to testify, and as we proved from the Gospel as understood by the Fathers. Hence, wherever something is found written by one of the Fathers or Catholic writers that the Roman See has the primacy from some Council or from the Fathers, the sense is that it had it from them, not as establishing or donating such dignity, but as declaring and defending or preserving it. For thus the Council of Nicea declared that the Roman Bishop has the primacy over everyone and adds that “he also always had it.” But best is Nicholas I in his epistle to the emperor Michael when he said: “The privileges are given to this Holy See by Christ; they are not given by Synods but celebrated and honored by them.” The emperor Justinian in Authentica De Ecclesiast. title ch.1 spoke thus: “We ratify, according to the definition of the Synods, that the most holy Pope of Old Rome is the first of all priests.”

3. What the king of England says, therefore, that before Phocas the Roman Pontiffs obeyed the emperors, has regard to the chapters following, where we will deal with the comparison of each power and show that to be false. But as to what he insinuates and what other Protestants more clearly contend, that Phocas conferred something of power or jurisdiction on the Roman Pontiff, it is false and has been introduced by ignorance or (which is more likely) by the malevolence of Protestants. For one must recollect from what was said in the preceding point that there was between Gregory and John of Constantinople a controversy over the term ‘universal’, which was not so much about the thing or the power itself (for John himself, as we saw, admitted that he was subject to Gregory) as about the title, which, because of the offense to others, the pride, and the danger of passing over into schism, greatly displeased the Roman Pontiffs. When therefore Pelagius and Gregory, neither by their warnings nor by the intervention of the emperors, could bring John of Constantinople to their own opinion and to a saner mind, and when Cyriacus, John’s successor, persisted in the same madness, Boniface III who, after Sabinianus, Pontiff for only one year, succeeded to Gregory, prevailed on Phocas to compel Cyriacus not to use that title, by declaring that it could only be applied to the Roman Church, as was rightly declared by Platina on Boniface III, by Blondus bk.9 decad.1, Genebrardus in Chronicum for the year 607, and Baronius in Annales for the year 606. And it is per se evident that much before Phocas, in the Council of Nicea and in other Councils, the primacy of the Apostolic See was made plain, and in the Council of Chalcedon in particular the Roman Pontiff was declared Universal Bishop, although the modesty and moderation of the Pontiffs refused to accept that name. Baronius also notes that Cyriacus did not deny subjection and obedience to the Roman Pontiff, because immediately after his election he at once sent his responsals together with the synodal letter to Pope Gregory, as is got from the same Gregory in bk.6 epist.31. From which also it is clear that Gregory never complained about usurpation of jurisdiction but about the ambitious title, injurious to other bishops and especially to the Roman See. Therefore Phocas by his authority defended the Roman See and suppressed the pride of Cyriacus, but he conferred nothing new on Benedict [?Boniface].

4. Now about Justin I find no history held in authority that reports that the elder Justin conferred anything of power on the Roman Bishop, not only for the year 520, but not even for the whole time of his reign. For although he often wrote with great faith and reverence to Pope Hormisdas and sent gifts to the Roman Church, he never conferred special privileges on that See; whence therefore could the heretics have taken that error or the suspicion of it? Especially because from the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and from the many others adduced above, it has been evidently shown that the primacy of the Roman See was very well known in the whole world before Justin. And in the same way is easily refuted what was said about Constantine IV, for he was emperor more than two hundred years after Justin; but the primacy of the Roman Church was older than Justin, and therefore could not have been from him; therefore much less could it have been erected by a later Constantine. Nor do the words of Platina indicate this, but only that the emperor Constantine ended the custom whereby the consent of the emperor or of the exarch was wont to be expected for completion of creating the Pontiff; but about the power of the Supreme Pontiff Constantine said nothing, nay from his words is openly collected that he thought a Pontiff duly elected was at once Vicar of Christ.

5. The same response has place for Constantine the Great, for before his conversion the Roman Pontiff exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the Universal Church, not only in the West but also in the East, as was sufficiently shown above. Nothing pertaining to this power, then, did Constantine confer on the Roman Church, but what he found he approved and believed; nay, even by his own obedience and subjection he recognized it, and in reverence and honor of so great dignity he conceded temporal goods also to the Roman Church, so that he might procure greater honor and splendor for it. Which can be made certain from the words of the same edict; for at the beginning he confesses that through the apostles Peter and Paul God worked marvels in his favor. "With the intervention," he says, "of Sylvester, our Father and Universal Pope." And later he thus speaks: "How much power the same our Savior conferred on his blessed apostle Peter in heaven and on earth was most clearly declared to us by the same venerable Father." And later he subjoins: "We have judged that, just as on earth St. Peter seems to be established Vicar of the Son of God, even the Pontiffs too, who are successors of the prince of the apostles himself, should possess a fuller power of principality than the extent of the earthly empire seems to have." But he interposes these words: "[power] conceded by us and by our command," which is to be understood of concession by consent and recognition, not by proper donation, lest these words should conflict with the preceding ones, in which he confessed that Peter was Vicar of Christ and the Roman Pontiff his successor; and therefore he sets that power before the imperial, but an emperor could not give a power greater than the imperial. Or the understanding also is that he conceded to the See of Peter splendor and temporal principality in honor of the spiritual, so that it might thus be in greater honor than the empire itself. Which is signified by the following words, in which much to be noted is that he calls the empire "earthly power and earthly throne," but the pontificate he calls "sacrosanct and most holy See of blessed Peter, etc."

6. To the final part, about the Council of Nicea and other Councils, the response is also evident from what has been said and from the words of Leo III cited in the same place; for first he says that the Pontiff is judged by no one, “St. Sylvester by divine authority making decree,” that is, not establishing it by himself but declaring a divine right; for this is strictly indicated by the words and demanded by the matter, for he himself could not exempt himself by his own authority; he declared, therefore, that he was exempt by divine authority. And Leo adds: “The August Constantine and the Synod of Nicea giving approval and subscribing,” that is, by defining, declaring, and promulgating that such was the divine privilege of the Apostolic See. Nevertheless Leo also adds that Constantine conferred this privilege, which must necessarily be understood according to what was said above, namely that he conferred it by approving it and by establishing that it should be observed. And thus too did John II say in his epistle to the emperor Justinian: “You preserve reverence for the Roman See and you subject everything to it, and you draw everything to its unity, to whose author, that is, to the first of the apostles, the command by the voice of the Lord was given: ‘Feed my sheep,’ which is declared to be truly head of all churches by the rules of the Fathers and by the statutes of the princes, and is evidenced by the affections of your most reverend piety.” In which words is rightly embraced what Christ or what the Fathers and the princes conferred on this dignity; for from Christ is the institution and the conferring of power together with the precept of feeding; from the Fathers is the declaration and the definition; but to the emperors properly belong recognition and defense. Next, the same should be said proportionally of the apostles with respect to Peter; for the other apostles did not confer power on Peter, as is clear from the Gospel, but very gladly accepted it given by Christ.

7. Besides these objections, Protestants are wont to make others taken from reasons or conjectures, as that one man could not suitably govern the Church diffused through the whole world. Hence, to prove this, they are wont to exaggerate, or even to invent, the defects or vices that are noted in some Pontiffs; and the king of England does not omit to make accusation of certain things that he affirms are committed in the elections of Pontiffs. Finally, others add the usual, and in many things their common, objection that great injury is done to Christ if besides him another head of the whole Church is established.

8. But these things are of little moment, for if this governance of the Church were merely human and was to be carried out only by human strength, or moral prudence or only natural judgment, not unrightly would it be judged to exceed the capacity of one man; nay rather we admit that even the ordinary helps of grace are not sufficient for it if God did not offer far greater and special ones. But since Christ the Lord promised to his Vicar both the singular presence of his own providence and the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and since he prayed specifically for his faith, although to govern spiritually the whole universe be a burden difficult for human weakness, yet it is not impossible, nor is it so morally difficult that many Pontiffs both sustained it for the most part excellently and fulfilled it perfectly and with holiness. Most of all so because although one man is Supreme Pontiff, yet he does not govern on his own everywhere and immediately, but by divine institution he summons other bishops too and pastors to a part of the solicitude, and as much as is expedient communicates to them a part of his jurisdiction, and reserves to himself the greater and graver matters and all the recourse necessary for preserving unity and concord. And in this way the governance of one is not only made possible but was even necessary for preserving the unity of the Church, as we showed; nay it would also be in its way easy if it were not disturbed by errors and schisms.

9. To the accusations against the persons of the Pontiffs made by their enemies we can, in the first place, say with Augustine epist.165: "In that order of bishops which leads from Peter himself up to Anastasius (let us say up to Paul V) who now sits on the same chair, although some traitor may in those times have insinuated himself, nothing was prejudicial to the Church or to innocent Christians, to whom the Lord, foreseeing the proposed evils, says, Matthew 23.3: 'Whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works; for they say, and do not;' so that the hope of the faithful might be sure, which is placed not in man but in the Lord." Next we can add that the same Augustine replied to the Donatists, bk. De Unico Baptismo contra Petilianum ch.16: "What need is there for us to rebut the accusations leveled by him against the bishops of the Roman Church, whom he has pursued with incredible calumnies? For although they may be accused of crimes, are they also convicted of them? Or are they shown to be convicted by any firm instruments? etc." which he elegantly pursues. Yet we do not deny that some sins and scandals are related in the histories about some Pontiffs, but these are both few in comparison with the multitude of so many illustrious and holy Pontiffs, and it ought to be no wonder that in so great a multitude a few bad ones are found, since among the twelve apostles one was a traitor. Hence, just as he did not defile the apostolic dignity, so neither did any corrupt Pontiff taint the Apostolic See, because none of them was a heretic, at least one who publicly taught heresy, and an evil life does not diminish the sanctity of the See. And what we say about the persons of the Pontiffs, should be understood as said about their election. For what the king of England murmurs against we are ignorant of its having happened in our age; and although perhaps sometimes it was committed, it is wrongly noted and blamed as if it was frequent or constant; and therefore rightly did Bellarmine respond: "It is a custom with adversaries to transfer to all a sin that has at any time been committed by one." And finally, although in such election men sometimes as men offended, it does not thereby necessary happen that the election is not by the Holy Spirit, who knows how to use the evil well, even for electing a worthy person; and although sometimes, because of his hidden judgments, he permits there to be error in the election of the person, nevertheless, for the good and firm institution of the Church, the Holy Spirit is present to confer his power on the one duly elected, whoever he is, and thus the sins of men do not prevent the election being in one way or another by the Holy Spirit.

10. Finally, to the last part, we deny that it works to the injury of Christ that he has one Vicar on earth who is, in his own way, the visible head of the militant and visible Church, because this head is a ministerial one, but Christ himself is alone always the principal head. Just as also we were saying about the rock, or as Christ too in Scripture is called "Pastor of our souls [alt. Shepherd of your souls]," 1 Peter 2.25, which does not prevent it being said of other men: "The Holy Spirit hath made you bishops, to feed the Church of God [alt. overseers, to feed the Church of God]," Acts 20.28. For although Christ is the highest and principal "Prince of pastors [alt. chief shepherd]," as is said 1 Peter 5.4, nevertheless the others too are pastors as ministers of that Prince; nay, they are even sometimes called princes, according to that verse, Psalms 44 [45].16: "Whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth," yet all are under that supreme Prince. Thus therefore is the Pope too pastor and bishop and prince of pastors and bishops, that is, of mortal ones or ones ministering under the immortal and absolute Prince. In the same way also there is a ministerial and mortal head under the principal and immortal one. And therefore this not only does not derogate from the dignity of Christ but even commends his charity and his power and his singular providence toward his Church.

Chapter 21: Whether the persons of princes or temporal kings are subject to the spiritual power of the Supreme Pontiff.

Summary: 1. Spiritual and temporal power are compared among themselves in a double way. 2. Various questions which arise from the subordination of one power to the other. 3. The error of Protestants about the subjection of kings to the Pontiffs. Basis for this error. 4. Assertion de fide. Temporal kings are in spiritual matters subject to the Pontiff. 5. The conclusion is proved from the Council of Nicea and from the Fathers. 6. It is proved again from the deeds of the emperors. 7. Several kings of England have embraced this assertion. 8. The same subjection of kings is established by the deeds of the English. 9. Other doings of theirs are related that confirm the present institution. 10. The same subjection of kings is proved also by efficacious reason.

1. Although at present we have to deal principally with the subordination and comparison of the spiritual and temporal power, since for perfect knowledge of them this fact is what remains principally to be declared; nevertheless, we take our beginning from the persons themselves, in which such powers are present, because the foundation of the aforesaid subordination most thereon depends. But to make this plain, I advert to the fact that the aforesaid powers, the spiritual and temporal, can be compared either in nobility and excellence or in subordination and subjection one to the other; for these two are so diverse that they can be separated in the way that in the case of physical powers one can be more excellent than another (as seeing than hearing) even if one is not subjected or subordinated to the other in its action. We are not now, therefore, comparing these powers in their absolute perfection and excellence; for, when explaining the distinction of the spiritual power from the temporal, we sufficiently showed that the former was more excellent than the latter, which thing I also expressly taught in my work De Legibus, and, on the supposition of a distinction between both powers, it can scarcely admit of doubt. Because the spiritual power is a certain higher participation in the divine power, having more perfect effects, a higher end, a more noble origin, and a certain being of diviner and more excellent order, as is shown also by the various ways in which the Fathers speak, whom I noted in the places cited.

2. We are, then, comparing these powers in their subordination and dependence one on the other, which can either be conceived formally (so to say) between the powers themselves, or only between the persons in which such powers exist. For it can be inquired whether one of these powers can apply the other to its acts or restrain it from them; or whether the person who has one power may, as to the acts pertaining to it, be subjected to the person having the other, wherein one can also ask whether this subjection is reciprocal or only on one or other part. All which things, to touch on the point of difficulty, we propose are in need of being dealt with about the persons in whom these powers are in a supreme grade of excellence to be found, as are the emperor and the Supreme Pontiff. Three questions, then, result. The first is whether the Supreme Pontiff has the persons of temporal kings and princes spiritually subject to himself. The second is whether the Pontiff has subject to himself, not only the person of the king, but also his temporal power, however supreme, such that he can, by giving command, direct, demand, supply, or impede his acts. The third is consequent on these, whether the Pontiff by reason of his spiritual power is able, not only to direct Christian princes by giving command, but also to compel them by punishment, even up to privation of their kingdom, if there be need, which is almost the point and hinge of the whole controversy, and therefore it needs to be the more accurately treated of. And three similar questions can be moved on the converse side, namely whether a king or emperor has the person of the Pope or other bishops subject to himself in temporal and civil matters. Again, whether a king by his temporal power can dominate over the spiritual by inciting or restraining it in order to his own government. Third, whether a king can prescribe to a Pontiff with coercive power, even up to deposing him. But of these latter questions the first pertains to the dispute about the exemption of clerics from the civil power, to which we will devote the whole of the next book, and there it will be copiously treated of; but here we will only touch on something about the person of the Pontiff as far as will be necessary for solving certain objections. The second question, however, contains, on supposition of a resolution of the former questions, no difficulty, and for that reason will be solved along with them by way of consequence. But the third question is connected with the preceding ones and it too, insofar as it can concern the Pontiff, as he is Pontiff, will be solved by the by in what follows, but insofar as it is about the Pontiff as he is a man or a citizen, it will be solved in the following book along with the first question.

3. In this chapter, then, the first question proposed is to be treated of, wherein the opinion of Protestants is that a temporal king and in general a prince supreme in temporal things is subject to no man in spiritual things, and thence that neither does the power of a king depend on the will of any man. Which error has from Marsilius of Padua taken its origin, and to it Henry VIII, king of England, greatly adhered, whom now the most serene James imitates, as is shown not only by his deeds but by his words too, which he has placed in various places of his Preface. For in this sense he says, on page 2, about temporal kings: "Whom God has placed on his throne at the highest level of dignity, as his vicars and legates for exercising judgment." And more clearly on page 5: "For neither do I believe myself inferior to the Pontiff in any respect." And again on page 10 to kings: "Whom God has commanded to be his chief vicars on earth for the administration of justice." And in the same sense he says, on page 14, that the controversy which he has with his Catholic subjects, has been moved from nowhere else "than from the ambitious tyranny of Pontiffs which they, against the authority of the Scriptures, against the mind of the Councils and the ancient Fathers, have over the temporal rights of kings unjustly usurped." And finally he concludes in the same place that to assertion of this authority of kings (in this sense, that is) his whole apology is devoted. In which places, although sometimes he speaks about subjection in temporal things, yet he understands it about direct as well as indirect subjection, for so as to exclude both of them kings he even denies spiritual subjection; and for that reason he arrogates spiritual power as well to himself, and on this foundation his whole scheme rests.

As I was writing these things, a book of the most illustrious Cardinal Bellarmine came into my hands, wherein he replies to William Barclay, who has in a certain novel way denied the power of the Pontiff in temporal affairs. For Barclay professed that the Pontiff has supreme power in spiritual things, even over kings and emperors, and nevertheless he denied the subordination of the temporal power to the spiritual, and consequently he also denied that a Pontiff can in the temporal things that pertain to the right or dominion of a king introduce any change, or make disposition in them of anything. And although, in the aforesaid book, many foundations for it are referred to, yet do I find none serious or taken from authority or urgent reason, and, of whatever sort they are, they are so fully and learnedly satisfied by the Cardinal that there is no necessity to add anything. The sum, then, of everything is that Christian kings have supreme power in temporal matters; but it is repugnant for power to be supreme and subject to another, whether directly or indirectly. But to prove each of these he collects from the Scriptures the common testimonies, whereby obedience to temporal princes is commended, and he joins thereto that the power of the Pontiff as regards temporal things has no foundation in Scripture, or in the use or tradition of the Church. He also accumulates many things in which he confounds this question of the spiritual power of the Pontiff with the question of the exemption of clerics, although however, as I have often said, they are distinct and to be defined by far different principles; and so everything which pertains to exemption we have remitted to the book following, but we will make satisfaction to the rest in the next chapter.

4. For a beginning, then, against the king of England we lay it down that, as Barclay admits, the Roman Pontiff is the spiritual father and supreme pastor of temporal kings, however supreme they may be in their own order; and hence, in those things that have regard to the soul and spiritual governance, kings are subject to the Roman Pontiff. This assertion is a direct response to the first question proposed, and it is to be held de fide catholica. And it does not need new proof, for it follows evidently from the principles handed down in the preceding chapters. For we showed that the Pope is the Pastor of the all the sheep of Christ; but Christian kings are to be counted among the sheep of Christ, otherwise they will be outside the fold and outside the Catholic Church; therefore their Pastor too is the Pope; therefore, conversely, they lie under the spiritual power itself of the Pontiff; for these two things are correlative and inseparable. Wherefore the Scriptures, the testimonies of the Pontiffs, of the Councils, and of the Fathers, which prove that the Supreme Pontiff succeeds to Peter in the universal power of ruling the Church, prove too that kings are subject to the same power of the Pontiff, at least in spiritual things; for power given over the whole flock or the whole body extends to the individual sheep or the individual parts. And the reason whereby that power embraces under itself all the baptized, of whatever condition, is the same as that whereby it comprehends kings too and emperors, because by no right are they exempt, and because royal dignity is not in conflict with Christian subjection, otherwise it would also be in conflict with the Christian faith and profession, since the faith itself of Christ requires this obedience from those who worship him.

5. To these general reasons and testimonies can be added special words, in the first place from the Council of Nicea, canon 39, among the 80 translated from the Arabic, where it says: "He himself is first like Peter, to whom was given power over all Christian princes and over all their peoples, as he who is Vicar of our Lord Jesus Christ over all peoples and the universal Christian Church." Hence Pope Symmachus [498-514AD], in his Apologia to the emperor Anastasius, speaks to him thus: "You, if you are a Christian prince, should listen to the voice of any apostolic chief whatever." And Pope Anastasius II [496-98AD], in his epistle to the emperor Anastasius, requires from him obedience in the things whereof he admonishes him. And Gelasius [492-96AD] to the same:

“Although you preside over the human race in the dignity of earthly affairs, yet to the chiefs of divine ones you submit your neck in devotion.” And later: “Learn that you ought to be subjected in the order of religion, etc.” From the testimonies adduced above too, by which we showed the primacy of the Roman See, many things expressly declare that among the sheep committed to Peter even kings and the emperor are numbered. Nazianzen especially, in his oration to the people when they were struck with fear, says: “Raise up a voice more free; know that you are sheep of my flock.” And Chrysostom, homil. 83: “If he who is crowned with the diadem approach unworthily, restrain him; you have greater power than he.” And Ambrose, in his book De Dignitat. Sacerdot., ch.2, says that: “The necks of kings are submitted under the feet of priests.”

6. Next, very manifest is this truth in the deeds, examples, and testimonies of Christian emperors and kings; for in the first place it has been handed down about Philip I, a Christian emperor of memory, that he obeyed Pope Fabian [236-50AD] when he commanded him not to come to communion before bewailing his sins seated among the public penitents, as Eusebius relates bk.6 History, ch.25, elsewhere ch.27 [actually ch.34], and Nicephorus, bk.5, ch.25. Of Constantine too a history is known that in a Council he said that he needed to be judged by the bishops, not that he would judge them, in Ruffinus bk.1, ch.2. With sufficient piety too the emperor Justin, in bk.4, ch. ‘De Summ. Trinit. et Fide Catholica’ says: “We, rendering homage to the Apostolic See and to Your Holiness, which is a thing that always has been and is our wish, honoring Your Holiness as befits a Father, we hasten to bring all things that pertain to the state of the churches to the notice of Your Holiness, since we have always great zeal to defend the unity of Your Apostolic See and the state of the holy churches.” And other things that he pursues, whereby he sufficiently shows he was spiritually subject to the Apostolic See, as is rightly understood and lauded by Pope John [523-26AD] in his rescript, which is related in the same law § Inter Claras, where he says among other things: “You keep reverence for the Roman See, and subject all things to it, and lead them to its unity, etc.” which we referred to above.

The words are much to be noted too of the emperor Charlemagne: “In memory of the blessed Peter let us honor the holy Roman and Apostolic See so that she, who is to us the mother of the sacerdotal dignity, should be the mistress of ecclesiastical reason; wherefore humility with meekness is to be preserved so that, although scarcely to be borne be the yoke imposed by the Holy See, we may yet bear and sustain it with pious devotion.” Which words from the chapters of Charles are reported by Gratian in ch.3, dist.19; and Nauclerus, vol.2, ‘generat.’ 28, says that it is one of 23 chapters of laws which Charles sent to his subjects. And it was received by the Fathers in the Council of Tribur, canon 30. Hence also Pope Symmachus said in the 6th Roman synod: “It is not licit for the emperor or for anyone who guards piety to do anything that may be an obstacle to the apostolic rules.” And it is reported by Gratian in ch.2, dist.10, where similar words from Popes Callistus, Marcellinus, and Adrian are related. Nay, the same Pope Adrian [772-95AD] in the last of his chapters says: “By a general decree we establish that he be an execrable curse and guilty always before God as a sinner against the Catholic Faith who among kings or potentates confides or permits any censure in the decrees of the successive Roman Pontiffs to be in any respect violated,” as is found in Gratian in ch. ‘Generali’ 25, q.1.

There can besides to these be added several signs of reverence and obedience given to the Apostolic See by emperors and kings in all places and times. For, to begin with, almost all call him “spiritual Father” and add “most blessed,” “most holy,” or something equivalent, as one may see in many epistles of diverse emperors to Popes Leo, Hormisdas, Anastasius, and others; and specially can be noted the words of Ladislaus king of Hungary in his oration to Nicholas V [1447-55AD], where he calls him “Very Great Pontiff,” “only prince of Christians,” and “king of kings,” and “a god on earth,” as is found in Cocleus, bk.11, Historiae Husitarum. Next, they often confess and recognize the chair of Peter in the Roman Pontiff and his universal jurisdiction over the whole Church, as is clear from Constantine and others cited above, and from Valentinian in his epistle to Theodosius, in Acts 1 of the Council of Chalcedon, and in another of the same to Leo [440-61AD] where he says that Leo “has the principality of the priest, presiding over the faith, and that a council is by him to be convened as author,” and from other epistles which can there be seen. Again from Justinian in his laws and his Authentica cited above, and from the letters to Boniface II [530-32AD], which are reported among the acts of Boniface, vol.2, where first he understands of the Apostolic See the verse: “Thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my Church,” and subjoins: “These words spoken are proved by the effects of things, because in the Apostolic See the Catholic religion has always been beyond stain preserved.” And later: “We anathematize all who against the holy Roman and Apostolic Church with pride raise their necks, we who follow in all things the Apostolic See and preach all that it has established.”

And Frederick I, in his epistle to the Greek emperor Emmanuel, first says that the Roman Church has by God been ordained sole mother, lady, and mistress of all churches. Hence he infers: “To the Supreme Pontiff, whom as to name we call holy, may you exhibit due obedience and honor.” A letter also is cited of Leo, king of the Armenians, to Innocent III [1198-1216AD] whom he calls “Lord and Father in Christ and Universal Pope and Pastor, whom God wished to preside over his Church.” And he subjoins: “Informed by the grace of your light, we, to recall the whole kingdom committed by God to us and all the Armenians to the unity of the holy Roman Church, by inspiration of the divine mercy, long and desire.” Like things were written by Michael Palaeologus to Gregory X up to the year 1274. And many things the Greek emperor Andronicus wrote in a letter which is extant in the Palatine Library, where he says the Roman Church has the supreme and absolute primacy over the universal Catholic Church handed to it by the Lord, etc.

In addition, Charles king of France, in a letter to Adrian II [867-72AD], thus writes: “To the most holy Father Adrian, Supreme and Universal Pontiff, Charles by the grace of God king and your spiritual son, etc.” And Hugo king of France to Pope John XV [985-96AD] says among other things: “This with complete affection we say, that you may understand and know that we and ours turn away from refusing your judgments.” And Louis too king of Gaul in an epistle to Pius II [1458-64AD] first salutes him in these words: “To our most blessed Father, Pope Pius II, filial obedience;” and then he subjoins: “You the Vicar of the Living God we honor with such veneration that your holy admonitions, especially in matters ecclesiastical, we wish to listen to as to the voice of the Pastor and to obey them with prompt mind; that you are the Pastor of the Lord’s flock we profess and know and we follow you when you command, etc.” Thus St. Louis king of France, among the documents written before his death to his son Philip, says: “Be devoted and obedient to your mother the Roman Church, and to its Pontiff show yourself compliant as to a spiritual father.” Thus in addition Sigismund king of Poland, in his epistle to the Lateran Council under Leo X [1513-21AD], which is contained in its Acts 7, offers his obedience to the Supreme Pontiff, and adds “according to the custom of my ancestors.”

And in the same Council, session 2 at the beginning, there is contained a mandate from the Catholic King Ferdinand, in which among many other illustrious testimonies of his faith he puts this: “We profess ourselves a son most devoted to the holy Roman Church, our mother, and for her honor and state most ready to lay down life.” And later he adds that he is sending a legate so that he may be present at the Council, “and there,” says the king, “to offer due obedience to the aforesaid most blessed Lord our Pope as often as may be opportune, etc.” And almost the like words from Charles V are contained in the Edict of Worms. Nor is it necessary to refer to more testimonies of the kings of the Spains, because the thing is very well known, and because King Alphonsus in his Laws, first part, tit.5, bk.2, 3, 4, and 5, not only expressly professes but even eruditely declares the dignity and power of the Pontiff, saying that for this reason he is in a special way “Vicar of Christ and successor of Peter,” and that therefore is he called “Apostolic” by antonomasia, and is even named “Pope” because “Father of fathers, and head of the bishops and other prelates. And therefore,” he says, “all Christians of the whole world, when they approach him, kiss his feet.” He next adds at the end of law 4: “He who denies that the Pontiff has this power or is the head of the Church is not only excommunicate but a heretic as well.” And in bk.5 he says generally and without exception that all Christians are held to obey the Pontiff in spiritual matters, and other the like things.

7. I come to the kings of England who, from the beginning of its call to the Faith up to Henry VIII, recognized the Roman Pontiff as supreme Pastor of the Church. For the first king of Britain, Lucius, as soon as he took up the Faith, sent an epistle to Eleutherius [175-89AD] “beseeching,” as Bede says, “to be made by his mandate a Christian, and soon he obtained the effect of his pious petition.” By which deed and example he openly showed that he recognized the Pontiff as his Pastor, for how could he make petition of so necessary a sacrament from someone other than his Pastor? Again he professed that the Pontiff has the keys of the whole Church, and that to him it principally pertains to receive through the door of baptism kings and princes within the Church. Otherwise why did he not rather from some British bishop (if perhaps someone was there as successor from the preaching and ordination of Joseph [sc. of Arimathea]), or at any rate from some neighboring bishop, make petition for baptism? For, as we take from Irenaeus bk.1, ch.8, already at that time in Germany, Gaul, and Spain, which are provinces nearer the island of Britain than Rome, churches had been founded and bishops created, so why did he send messengers to none of them but to the Roman Bishop only? Not, certainly, for any other reason than that he believed him alone to have universal jurisdiction and superior power over the Church. Also we related above from Bede, bk.3, ch.25, that the king of Osuvi, when he heard that to Peter principally were given the keys of the kingdom of heaven and came to believe that his successor was the Roman Pontiff, said: “I say to you, that here is the doorkeeper, whom I will not contradict but, to the extent I know and am able, I desire to obey his statutes in everything.” “As the king was saying these things,” says Bede, “those sitting by gave their support and hastened to what they knew to be better to transfer themselves.” And many other things about the recourse of the kings of England to the Apostolic See in matters and business ecclesiastical are reported by Bede.

Again Pope John X [914-28AD] admonished King Edward as one of his sheep, as Polydore relates, bk.6. And there is a very good epistle of King Edward to Nicholas II [1058-61AD] which he thus inscribes: "To the Supreme Father of the Universal Church Nicholas, Edward by the grace of God king of the English due subjection and obedience," Baronius for the year 1060, note 9. And afterwards in an epistle he makes confession and petitions him to ratify what the Pope's predecessor had, under the name of obedience and penance for a certain vow, enjoined on him, and to confirm certain privileges; and afterwards he says that he is increasing and confirming the donations and customs of monies which St. Peter has in England, and that he is sending the monies collected along with royal gifts, etc. Almost the like epistles are found of one of two Edwards, king of England, to Boniface VIII [1294-1303AD], and of the other to Clement VI [1342-52AD]. And there are also, Baronius for the year 1190, very good words of King Richard II to Clement III [1187-91AD]: "A juster success is to the deeds of princes allotted when from the Apostolic See they receive strength and favor and are by the conversation of the holy Roman Church directed. For that reason we have thought it worthy to transmit to the knowledge of Your Blessedness what things between us and Lord Tancred, the illustrious king of Sicily, were recently in a public and necessary compact celebrated." And later: "We strenuously ask Your Holiness and the holy Roman Church that the holy Apostolic See receive on our behalf a pledge of faith; and so that it may confidently do so, by the testimony of the present letters to you do we concede free power more severely to compel us and our heirs and our land, if against the aforesaid peace we will have come, etc."

In addition, Kenulph king of the Mercians in England wrote an epistle to the Pontiff John III [561-74AD] in which he first gives thanks to God, because "when He thought that the most glorious Pastor of his flock Adrian needed to be perpetually rewarded above the skies, yet by pious providence he had raised over his sheep him (that is, Leo) who has knowledge to lead the Lord's flock to the fold of a higher life." And later: "Wherefore I consider it opportune the ear of obedience to your holy commands humbly to incline." And afterwards, having humbly asked for blessing, he subjoins: "This blessing all who before me were kings of the Mercians merited to secure from your predecessors; this I myself humbly beg, and from you, most holy one, I desire to obtain it, insofar as, in the first place, you may receive me a son by lot of adoption to yourself, as I choose you a father to me and embrace you always with all the strength of obedience." Baronius for the year 169. Also is reported by Peter of Blois a certain letter of the queen of England, which is number 144 for him, in which against the tyranny of a certain Christian prince she implores the aid of Pope Celestine [422-32AD], saying: "Whom God has constituted above the nations and kingdoms in all plenitude of power." And later: "Nor can you ignore those things without the note of crime and infamy, since you are Vicar of the Crucified, successor of Peter, god also of Pharoah." And after she has reported that the tyrant held the keys in derision, she concludes: "Although you do not wish to prosecute the injury to you, yet you may not ignore the disgrace to Peter, the injury to Christ."

8. In addition there can in this place be adduced, as sign of this spiritual subjection, the custom of the kings of England, which Edward above kept in mind, of sending tribute to the Roman Church in reverence to St. Peter, which custom took from King Ina its beginning, on the evidence of Polydore bk.1, and was conserved and increased by his successors, as is pursued in bk.5 and other places. And afterwards it was, by a law passed by William the Conqueror of England, confirmed, and is among his laws called the tenth, and has, as inscription, concerning Peter's Pence. And in this way it was, up to the times of Henry VIII, paid to the Roman Church. Hence is it very well collected by Sander, the cited work, bk.5, ch.6, that it is not likely the kings of England, who in honor of the saint made their kingdom subject of tribute to the Roman See, denied to the same See the spiritual government of the same kingdom. And this evidence can be richly added to by the things that Azor gathers together in part 2 of his Institut., bk.4, ch.35.

9. Finally it can be confirmed from the ancient use and practice of the ancient Catholic kings of England, who always petitioned from the Pontiffs, both dispensations in vows or ecclesiastical laws, and confirmations of bishops, and also the accustomed pallium to be given to archbishops, and would often send the archbishops themselves for receiving the pallium finally to Rome, but sometimes the kings would petition from the Pontiffs that it be given to them in their absence. At times too bishops and kings, in controversies which they had among themselves, would appeal to the Pontiff, about which and many like things can be seen Neubrigensis, bk.1 Rerum Anglicanarum, and Malmezburiensis, bk.1, De Gestis Pontificum, and bk.1, Histor. Novel. And Peter of Blois epistle 136 with many others, and Matthew of Paris in Historia Regum Angliae, Baronius for the years 1100, 1117, 1174, and as many times as the history of the kings of England crops up. Other things too are collected in summary by Sander in Clavi David, bk.5, ch.6. Which here it is not necessary to repeat, since (as we noted above) even Henry VIII himself, king of England, bequeathed, before he fell into schism, a great writing in defense of the Roman See and its authority, in his Assertio Sacramentorum Contra Lutherum, artic.2. Where among other things he says: "I will not be so unjust to the Pontiff as to dispute with anxiety and solicitude about his right, as if the thing were held in doubt." And that was why he petitioned for a dispensation from the Pope, because at that time he acknowledged himself subject to the spiritual power of the Pontiff, according to the faith and tradition which, not only from this predecessors, but from the universal Christian world he had received; to which tradition he also in his book bears witness.

10. Finally this truth manifestly follows from a certain principle proved in chapter 6 of this book; for we proved that a temporal king has by force of his royal dignity no spiritual power or jurisdiction. Which principle is not less true of English kings than of others, as is evident of itself; for that is why King James strives to persuade all kings of the opposite, because he sees that the cause and reason are the same. From this principle, therefore, we thus conclude: temporal kings do not have spiritual power over the Church; therefore it is necessary that in spiritual things they be subject to the ecclesiastical power. The proof of the consequence is that there are in the Church only sheep and pastors, or sheepfold and pastor; but he who does not have spiritual power is not a pastor; therefore it is necessary that he be a sheep, otherwise he will not be in the fold or a member of the Church. And indeed, it is against all reason and right order that in the Church there should be some who can spiritually neither rule nor be ruled, otherwise neither is the Pope completely and perfectly Christ's Vicar, nor would things be done in order, nor could the Church be preserved in unity and peace, nor finally could there be sufficient provision for the safety of all the faithful.

Hence this reason not only proves that the temporal king is subject to the Pontiff in spiritual things, but also that by ordinary right each king is subject to his bishop, unless he be exempted by the Pontiff and be received immediately under his protection and jurisdiction. That which the king of England takes badly and reprehends in Bellarmine is however manifest, if the due order of ecclesiastical hierarchy be considered. For kings are counted among the sheep having no spiritual jurisdiction; therefore by the force of this status, and with attention only to natural or divine right, they do not have a greater exemption from the jurisdiction of bishops than do other layfolk dwelling in the same diocese. And this is proved by the example of Ambrose and the like and by what Chrysostom said, “you have greater power than him,” and some other things which we related above. But it is more clearly handed down by Clement III [1187-91AD] in ch. ‘Omnes Principes,’ De Maiorit. et Obedientia, where it is noted by the Gloss and by Panormitanus and other doctors, and in ch. ‘Solitae’, under the same title. But from this ordinary right kings are wont to be exempted by the privilege of the Pontiffs, but in no way from obedience to the Pontiff himself can they be exempted, and for that reason they are to him chiefly said to be spiritually subject.

Chapter 22: Christian kings are subject to the power of the Pontiff not only as to their persons but also as to their royal power, that is, not only as men but also as Christian kings.

Summary: 1. First conclusion. 2. This assertion is common among Catholics. 3. Proof of the conclusion. 4. It is shown from the part of kings themselves that directive force over them exists in the Pontiff. 5. Convincing proof of the same from an efficacious dilemma. 6. By examples the same dependence of kings on the Pontiff is shown. 7. The matter of civil and canon law. 8. Civil laws making disposition about ecclesiastical matters are by right itself invalid. 9. When a Pontiff can intervene in secular judgments. 10. For defense of the Faith kings can be compelled by the Pontiff.

1. To the assertion proved in the preceding chapter a second is to be subsumed, which follows from the preceding one, and which responds to the question posed second at the beginning of the previous chapter, namely, that the Supreme Pontiff by force of his spiritual power or jurisdiction is superior to temporal kings and princes, so that he may direct them in their use of temporal power in order to a spiritual end, by reason of which he can prescribe such use, or prohibit it, or demand it, or impede it, insofar as will for the spiritual good of the Church be agreeable. For by directive power we do not understand merely the power of advising, or admonishing, or asking, for these are not proper to a superior power; but we understand a proper power of binding or of moving with moral efficacy, which others are wont to call coercive power; but this term more pertains to punishments, about which we will speak in the next chapter, but here we are talking of the jurisdiction for binding in conscience.

2. The assertion thus explained, then, is accepted by the common consent of Catholics, whom we in part alleged in chapter 4 of this book. For those authors who teach absolutely that the Pope has supreme power, even temporal, over the whole world make this their principal intention, and perhaps either all or most of them have spoken in this sense alone. For although sometimes they speak indistinctly and without sufficient declaration or even speak improperly (because the power of the Pope is not temporal but spiritual, which contains temporal things under it, and concerns itself with them indirectly, that is, on account of spiritual things), yet they often declare this sense and touch on the distinction either expressly or virtually. For they affirm that the Pope can do some things indirectly but deny that he can do them directly. As passing judgment on a feudal compact, as the Glossa said in ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis, at the word 'Iudicare', which is followed by Innocent, and by Panormitanus, no. 17 and following; nay, if he is read attentively from no. 11, in no other way did he understand that the Pontiff has supreme temporal power. Likewise the Gloss said in rule 'Possessor.' 2, De Regulis Iur. in bk. 6, that the Pope can indirectly rescind a civil law in view of avoiding sin, but not that he can do so directly and per se, that is, when a reason ceases to hold pertaining to the salvation of the soul, where, although it does not formally use these terms 'directly' or 'indirectly', it does, however, in fact and by description declare the same sense.

There is a similar example in the Gloss, ch. 'Per Venerabilem,' Qui Filii sint legitimi, at the phrase 'Habeat potestatem', and it concerns legitimacy with a view to temporal things, which legitimacy the Pope cannot give directly, though he could indirectly. On which example can be seen Covarrubias, on bk. 4. Decretal., p2, ch. 8, §8, no. 13 and following, and Molina, bk. 3, 'De Primogen.', ch. 2, no. 10, and following, and several others, whom they refer to. But the rest of the doctors, especially the theologians cited in chapter 4 above, denying that the Pontiff has absolute dominion over all kingdoms or direct temporal power over all kings, by unanimous consent teach this truth about the directive power of the Pontiff over kings and princes and over their jurisdiction and governance. They refer for this truth to many other doctors, and Bellarmine to many more at the beginning of his reply to Barclay, some of whom we will note in the following assertion.

3. The first and chief foundation we take from those Scriptures in which a universal care of souls is committed to the Pontiff. For full and perfect power for carrying this care was given to Peter, and so also to his successors, the Roman Bishops, because he who succeeds in office succeeds also in power; therefore such power was given for everything which was necessary for this governance; therefore in that spiritual power is included a directive force over any temporal power whatever that exists in kings or supreme princes. The assumption is manifest both from the words of the Lord, "Whatsoever thou shalt bind," and "Whatsoever thou shalt loose," and "Feed my sheep," and because to Christ's wise providence this pertained. Thence too is the first consequence easily shown, because not only is Christ true God, whose works are perfect, but also any prudent governor, who commits his functions to someone as vicar, or makes delegation of his power, gives as a result power for everything that to the end or effect of such commission or delegation is required, as prudent natural reason and rights both civil and canon prescribe, bk. 1, ch. 1ff., De Iurisdict. Omnium Iudic.: "To whom jurisdiction is given to him those things too seem to be conceded without which such jurisdiction could not be realized." And ch. 'Praeterea', De Offic. Deleg.: "From the fact that to someone a cause is committed, he receives fullness of power over all that is acknowledged to have regard to that cause.

4. It remains for us to prove the inference subsumed, namely that in this indirect spiritual power a force directive of temporal things is included. For this is what adversaries most deny, and they demand from us an express testimony of Scripture in which such inclusion is taught. But we easily reply that an express testimony of Scripture is not needed in everything, and that it is enough if it is collected from what has been written by a clear and necessary reason, or by the tradition and interpretation of the Fathers. We say, therefore, that it is contained in Scripture as the particular in the universal, or as one of the necessary means is included in the end or in the power of directing to the end that belongs to such spiritual power. But this can be explained in a double way, namely either on the part of the temporal prince himself or on the part of his subjects. For, as I said, temporal kings are spiritually subject to Peter and to his successors; but the spiritual power given to Peter is universal, for directing all the acts of subjects by which eternal life can be lost or gained, as is proved by the indefinite word 'Feed' and by the universal power of binding and loosing; but one of these acts in a Christian prince is the due use of his governing power, for if he not use it justly he will be condemned; therefore, to the spiritual pastor of such a prince the faculty pertains of directing him in the use of his temporal power, if he deviate anywhere from right reason or from the Faith in justice or charity. Thus, therefore, that power extends indirectly to temporal things, for the use itself of temporal power, insofar as it can harm or benefit the soul, is contained under spiritual things as the particular under the universal, and as a necessary means under the end to which spiritual power is ordained. And this reason is very well implied by Pope Gelasius to the emperor Anastasius, where he distinguishes two powers, the spiritual and temporal, and adds: "Wherein the weight of priests is so much the greater the more they are also for kings themselves among men to give account in divine examination." Wherefore those words of Paul, Hebrews 13.17: "Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves," comprehend kings no less than the rest, because the words too are universal; and the reason added by Paul: "for they watch for your souls as they that must give account," proceeds also about kings, as I said from Gelasius; rightly, then, can we say that in those words this power of those ruling over the Church is contained.

In another way too, and a no less effective one, is this inclusion shown on the part of the subjects of a Christian temporal king, because if he should himself prescribe iniquity or permit his subjects beyond what is expedient illicit use of temporal acts or goods, it will lead to great spiritual loss for his subjects; but the Pontiff is bound to have spiritual care for the whole Christian people subject to temporal kings; therefore in this office is included the power of turning away from a Christian people all spiritual disadvantages which can from the abuse of temporal power redound to them; therefore by this title too it is necessary that the power of the spiritual prince extend indirectly to temporal things, so that he may so dispose temporal things that they do not harm spiritual ones. And this reason too is implied by Gelasius above if he be read as the other reading has it: "the more they are for very kingdoms too among men to give account." And both are also signified by Pope Nicholas to Michael, saying: "Christian emperors are for eternal life in need of the Pontiffs."

5. There is a further declaration of this reason. For both the temporal and spiritual power, insofar as they exist in the Church, ought so to have been conferred and possessed that they work to the benefit of the common good and salvation of the Christian people; therefore it is necessary that these powers observe a certain order among themselves, otherwise peace and unity could not in the Church be kept; for often temporal advantages are repugnant to spiritual ones, and therefore either there will be a just war between each power, or one must yield to the other so that all may be rightly ordered. Therefore either the spiritual power will be under the temporal, or conversely. The first can according to right reason neither be said nor thought, because all temporal things should be ordered to the spiritual end; therefore it must on the contrary be said that the temporal power is subject to the spiritual, so that it not turn it from its end. For the powers are subordinated in the same way as the ends also are. And hence rightly did St. Thomas say, Ila Ilae, q.40, a.2, ad3, that wars are subordinate to the power of the Pope, because a power, virtue, or art that has respect to a superior end has inferior faculties subject to it in order to the same end. And q.60, a.6, ad 3, he speaks thus: "The temporal power is subject to the spiritual as the body to the soul, and therefore judgment is not usurped if a spiritual commander introduces himself into temporal affairs." And in Sentences 2, dist.44, in expounding the text ad 4, says that: "the secular power is under the temporal in those things that pertain to the salvation of the soul, and therefore in those things the spiritual power is more to be obeyed than the temporal, although in those that pertain to the civil good the temporal power is more to be obeyed." In which words too the above distinction is plainly indicated. But he adds a limitation, saying: "Unless perhaps to the spiritual power be also joined secular power, as in the Pope, who holds the summit of each power." Which could be understood of the one directly and of the other indirectly, according to the earlier words. But because these later words contain an exception from the former, he seems rather to be speaking in them of both powers direct, and consequently to be speaking of the Pontiff as he is at the same time Pontiff and temporal king. Next, that he has the summit of each power because in each order he has supreme power, although it is not equally universal; as even Innocent III said, in the cited chapter 'Per Venerabilem.'

And in this way are to be understood other things which the same St. Thomas delivers about the same power in bk.1 De Regimine Princip., ch.14, and bk.3, chs.10, 11, 12, and 13, if however it be his work. In which places he uses various examples and likenesses to declare this truth, and with many histories and deeds of the Supreme Pontiffs he confirms the same. The same is very well and fully enough treated by Alexander of Hales, p.2, q.118, membr.3, a.1, and p.3, q.40, membr.5, penultimate question, and p.4, q.10 membr.5, after a.2, in the tractate De Officio Missae, p.2, a.2; by Hugh of St. Victor, bk.2, De Sacram., p.2, ch.4; by Torquemada, in Summa De Eccles., bk.2, ch.113; by Ubald, vol.1, in Doct. Fid. Antiq., bk.2, ch.76; by Cajetan in Apolog. pro Roman. Pontif., ch.13; Henry, Quodlib., 6, q.23, where he says that "the Apostolic Priest is related to kings as the civic master-builder to the other artisans in the city;" by Bellarmine, De Summo Pontif., bk.5, chs.6, 7, and 8; by Albert Pighi, bk.5, De Ecclesiast. Hierarchia, chs.14 and 15; by Sander, De Visib. Eccles. Monarch., especially ch.4; by Vitoria, in his double lecture De Potestate Eccles., and his second De Potestate Civili, and in his lecture De Indis, p.2, n.29; by Driedo, De Libert. Christian., bk.2, ch.2; by de Soto, in Sentences 4, d.25, q.2, a.5, and bk.4 De Iustit., q.5, a.4; by Navarrus, in ch. 'Novit.' De Iudic. Notab. 3, num.19, and following; by Almain, De Potestate Ecclesiast., ch.8; by Molina, with reference to many others, vol.1 De Iustit., disput.29; and the jurists agree, whom we will below refer to.

6. This dependence and subordination are in addition made plain by very good examples. The first is about lord and servant; for a lord has a particular power over a servant, which without doubt the Pope does not have over another's servant; hence it is rightly said that he does not have the direct power of a lord over him, and yet it is certain that any temporal lord whatever is subject to the power of the Pontiff, as far as due use of his lordship is concerned, so that it not be contrary to the spiritual salvation of either lord or servant; and in this sense is the Pontiff rightly said to have superior indirect power over another's servant. And in a like way paternal power belongs directly to the proper parent and not to the spiritual Pastor, and yet that power, although given by nature, is subject to the spiritual power, to be ruled and directed by it, and so spiritual power can be said to be indirectly extended to the government of Christian sons. By parity of reasoning, therefore, the temporal power of the king is by the spiritual power of the Pontiff to be governed and directed. And the examples can be applied to the temporal prince himself, so that from them an argument a fortiori can be taken. For a king does not indeed have formal, so to say, or direct paternal power over the son of any of his vassals, nor proper lordship over the servant of any of his subjects, and yet he has eminent or indirect power for directing his vassal in the use of the paternal power which he has over his son; therefore much more does the Vicar of Christ have a like power over Christian kings in order to the spiritual good of the whole Christian people.

Besides, this power is displayed by its use. For it can be manifold but to two modes in particular it can be reduced, which can be distinguished in accord with the two powers of a temporal prince. For there is in the prince a power of jurisdiction, which is properly called civil and moral, of which chiefly are we treating. But so that this power can be feared and preserved, it has to have conjoint with it another power, not of right but of fact, so to say, which is physical and can be called executive or military. According to these two powers of a temporal prince we distinguish two modes of this spiritual governance or direction. The first pertains to acts of civil jurisdiction, such as is the emending or correcting of civil laws when these are not consonant with good morals. For then the Pontiff can emend them, either by passing contrary ones or by commanding secular princes to rescind or correct them. Which is the common doctrine of theologians, along with St. Thomas, Ia IIae, q.96, a.5. The same is copiously delivered by the jurists: Bartholus, in 1 'Privilegia', Corp. de Sacros. Eccles., last question; Alexander, in 1. 'Captatorias', Corp. de Testam. Milit.; Antoninus and Imola, in ch. 'At Si Clerici', De Iudiciis; John Andreas, Calderino, and Abbas, in ch.1 'De Novi Oper. Nunciat.'; Felinus in ch. 'Ecclesia', De Constitut., n.41; Covarrubias, in Epit. 4, Decret., p.2, ch.8, §9, n.6 and following; Antonio Gomez, in 1 and 10 Tauri., nos.37 and 38; Fortunato Garcia, in Tractat. de Ult. Fin. Utriusque Iur., no.51, who refers to others. And this is very frequent in canon right and approved by common sense and the custom of the Church, and therefore it is not licit for a Catholic man to have doubt about the pontifical power.

7. But it is to be noted that the proximate matter of civil law is sometimes per se and directly distinct altogether from canon law, as when it is purely temporal and in no way sacred, nor is of itself ordered to a spiritual end, as is, for example, defining the price of merchandise, disposing the order of civil courts, and so on; but sometimes it communicates in some way with the matter of canon law by reason of a thing drawn under both laws, as laws about matrimony, funerals, pious bequests, and the like. When therefore civil laws are of this latter class they can not only directly but also indirectly be emended by the spiritual power and nullified, because the matter is either directly spiritual or is of mixed forum, and therefore the spiritual power can deal directly with it, and for that reason all civil laws that are concerned with such matters, if they be contrary to canon right, are corrected by it, because they are overcome by a more excellent power. And in this way civil laws that make disposition about matrimony are taken away by canon laws if they are repugnant to them; and those alone are in force that assist canon laws, in the way permitted by them. As, for example, civil laws used to permit matrimony among blood relatives of the second degree, over which the canon laws prevail by nullifying them.

To this order pertain canon laws that make disposition about promissory oaths, so that they may altogether be kept, the civil law notwithstanding, and that prescribe to lay courts that they make them to be kept. In addition, to this too have regard canons establishing against civil laws that pious bequests with only two witnesses are valid. For pious causes fall directly under the spiritual power. Again civil laws that in many cases prohibit and punish second marriages are set aside by the canons, as is plain from the titles about second marriages, and so about other things. But, on the other hand, when the matter of civil laws is purely temporal, then they can only be corrected by the Pontiffs indirectly, when they either favor sins or give occasion to them. As are laws that allow excuses in bad faith, which are abolished by the canons, as is clear. And the same holds of laws that permit usury, concubinage, etc. Or also when they are less consonant with natural equity, as are laws denying sustenance to bastard sons, which are tempered by the canons. And, with the same proportions preserved, if any civil law were judged agreeable to the spiritual good of the kingdom and kings were negligent in passing it, the Pontiff could by his authority pass it, as Pius V did when giving form to the constitution of a census; which matter is sufficiently temporal, but the form seemed agreeable for avoiding the dangers of usury, and so the same reason for indirect power intervened.

8. To which can be added another way of nullifying civil laws by force of ecclesiastical power, namely when they make disposition in purely canon matter, as are those that are in particular passed about clerics and ecclesiastical affairs, and other similar ones that derogate from ecclesiastical liberty. But these laws are void by the right itself of nature, and they are by the canons rather declared to be than made void, because they are concerned with matter that is alien and outside the sphere of temporal jurisdiction; they can however be said to be in their root, as it were, nullified by virtue of spiritual power when the matter has been by spiritual power made canon and has been reserved to the ecclesiastical forum. For this too can be done by virtue of spiritual jurisdiction, when the matter concerns the divine cult or religion, as was said in the matter of De Legibus more at large. And of these sorts of laws there exist obvious examples in canon right under the titles De Immunitate Ecclesiarum and under the title De Constitut., and several are adduced from them by the Gloss in the Extravagant ‘Quia in futurum’ of John XXII, under the term ‘Tormenta’. But, outside common right, a very good case is taken from an epistle of Louis the king of Gaul to Pius II, wherein among other things he speaks thus: “As you have enjoined, the pragmatic sanction hostile to your See we have from our kingdom and from our dauphin at Vienne, and from all our sway, by these presents driven out, overthrown, and taken it away by its roots.

9. And what has been said about laws can be proportionately understood about courts and sentences; for the Pope cannot directly usurp secular courts, but in a cause necessary for the spiritual good, he can either nullify an unjust sentence or reserve some temporal cause to himself; especially when there is strife among those who do not recognize a superior in temporal matters and it is judged conformable to the common good of the Church. And thus Innocent III said in ch. ‘Per Venerabilem’, Qui filii sint legitimi, that over the patrimony of Peter he himself exercises full power, “but in other areas,” he says, “after there has been inspection of definite causes, occasionally we exercise temporal jurisdiction.” And almost the same as to opinion was said by Bernard, bk.1 De Consideratione, for in ch.6 he says that temporal courts do not pertain to Pontiffs, but he adds in ch.7: “But it is one thing incidentally to make excursus into them, when indeed there is urgent cause, but another to dwell on them as if they were important.” The reason is that it concerns the office of the Pontiff to prevent public sins, and to take away the moral occasions of them, especially those that are being brought in with some force or authority; therefore, if civil laws or secular judgments favor sins and provide occasion for them, they can by the Pontiff be either declared void or even made void, as Vitoria rightly said, lecture 1 De Potest. Eccles., q.3, § ‘Utrum potestas spiritualis sit supra, etc.’ no.13. Also in a similar way it concerns the Pontiff to promote faith, religion, and piety, and therefore he can in their favor lay down some statute and prescribe that it be kept, notwithstanding any civil law whatever.

Another use of spiritual power can be in directing the temporal, to the extent it has the power and strength of executing or administering. And this use can be twofold, one is curbing the abuse of the power, the other is in moving it to necessary use and, if there be need, commanding it in help of the Faith or defense of the Christian religion. For both uses, then, there resides power in the Pontiff. And about the former indeed the thing is per se evident, because as Innocent III said in ch. ‘Novit.’, De Iudiciis, to curb sins is proper to the spiritual power, and it is especially obliged to do so when the sins are publicly harmful and contrary to the common good; but such is the abuse of royal power to inflict harm and to make unjust war; therefore, without doubt a king is in this thing subject to the Pontiff, who can thus prohibit him from such use of his power.

10. But that in the second way too the Pontiff can command kings is proved because Christian princes, whether by their duty, or by a certain legal justice whereby a member of the republic is obliged to come to its aid, or by Christian charity, they are bound to defend the Church and bring aid to it. Therefore, when necessity or cause demand, the Pontiff can, as spiritual pastor both of the Universal Church and of princes themselves, move them to use of their power, by stirring them up and obliging them by command. The assumption is evident from the terms, because all Christians are members of the one body of the Church, but members, as Paul says, 1 Corinthians 12, ought for each other and especially for the good of the whole body be solicitous, each according to his power and dignity; therefore when the power of a prince is necessary, this solicitude and care is most incumbent on him. Hence Pope Leo, epistle 75 to the emperor Leo, says: “You ought unhesitatingly to face the fact that royal power has been not only for the governance of the world but also most of all for the protection of the Church conferred on you.” And Gregory, bk.2, indict.11, epistle 61, or ch.100: “For this purpose has power been given to the piety of emperors, so that those who desire good may be helped and so that the earthly kingdom may serve the heavenly kingdom.” And best Augustine, epistle 50, treating the verse of Psalms 2.10-11: “Be wise now therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth. Serve the Lord with fear,” says: “In one way he serves because he is a man, in another way because he is also a king. Because he is a man he serves by living faithfully; because he is a king he serves by sanctioning with due vigor laws that prescribe justice and that prohibit the contrary.” Hence the Council of Paris under Louis and Lothar, bk.2, ch.2, says: “The king ought first to be a defender of the Church, of the servants of God, etc.” And therefore the same emperors, Louis and Lothar, wrote to Pope Eugene: “Truly do we acknowledge ourselves indebted, according to the quality of our strength and the capacity of our intellect, to provide, in all causes that pertain to the divine cult, support and help to those to whom the governance of the churches and the care of the Lord's sheep has been committed." And the Catholic emperor Charles V, in the Edict of Worms, said: "To the honor of Almighty God and to the reverence of the Roman Pontiff and of the holy Apostolic See, we, according to the duty required of the imperial dignity, with both zeal and eagerness, in the custom of our forefathers, and also with our inborn strength, are ready, for the defense of the Catholic Faith and for the honor, guard, and protection of the holy Roman and Universal Church, to expose all our force and powers, our empire, kingdoms, dominion, life at last and our very soul."

But from these things the inference above made is easily proved. For if a king or a prince in providing this help to the Church should be negligent, without doubt can the Pontiff excite and move him by giving command. First from the principle above proved, that the Pope is not only pastor of the king as a man but also as a king, because in each office he ought to conduct himself rightly, so that he can be saved and please God; therefore the Pontiff can attend to and give him command to fulfill in this regard the obligation of a king. Next, although the necessity of the Church be not so urgent that there arise from the law itself of charity as it were a natural obligation, the Pontiff, when a sufficient cause intervenes, may impose it, because it would be a just precept; for in order to the spiritual end it would be consonant with reason, and hence it would be imposed by legitimate power. Because, although the Pontiff be head and superior in spiritual things, he has the power of imposing those precepts that in order to the spiritual end and the good of the Church are just and prudent.

And by this reason did Pope Boniface, in Extravagant Unam Sanctam, De Maior. et Obed., tacitly giving his approval to the opinion of Bernard, 1.4 De Consider., ch.3, say that in the See of Peter there was not only the spiritual sword but the temporal too. "But this one is for the Church and that one by the Church to be wielded; that one is in the hand of the priest, this one in the hand of kings and soldiers, but at the will and with the forbearance of the priest, because it is necessary that sword be under sword." Which he proves at large by showing that the due institution of the Church demands this order, and he concludes: "That to the Roman Pontiff every human creature is subject we define and pronounce to be altogether necessary for salvation." And in the same way Pope Nicholas II, speaking of the Roman Church, says: "It he alone founded who committed to the blessed key-bearer of eternal life the rights of the earthly as at the same time of the heavenly kingdom," namely by exercising the heavenly per se but the earthly by using its power, exciting it efficaciously, if there be need, by command. And in the same way the same Pontiff, in an epistle to the bishops of Gaul, enjoins on them and their defenders, "that with the spiritual as at the same time with the temporal sword they pursue certain wicked persons until the goods of the Church are recovered." Which with the appropriate division is to be accepted, for the bishops with the spiritual sword, but the defenders, that is the patrons or the princes, with the material sword are commanded to defend the Church.

Many like things can be taken from the Decretum, dist.96, chapter 'Si Imperator', where Pope John says: "from the ordination of God all secular powers ought to be subject to the Church;" and Gelasius, ch. 'Duo Sunt', writing to the emperor Anastasius, says among other things: "You know that you depend on their judgment and not that they are reduced to your will, etc." The same in ch. 'Quamvis', dist.22, Innocent I, in ch. 'Quoties', 24, q.1. Like things are had from Gregory VII, in ch. 'Quis dubitet', and from Innocent III, in ch. 'Solitae', De Maiorit. et Obed., where he says that the pontifical power is compared to the imperial as the soul to the body, or as the sun to the moon. The same in ch. 'Per Venerabilem', Qui filii sint legitimi, said in this sense: "in other areas too, after there has been inspection of definite causes, we occasionally exercise temporal jurisdiction," that is, not directly as in the proper patrimony of the Church, but indirectly, when a reason of the spiritual end demands it. Which is confirmed from Deuteronomy 17.8: "And if there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, etc." and from 1 Corinthians 6.2: "Know ye not that we shall judge angels? How much more things that pertain to this life?" Thus finally is to be received what Bernard said above and epistle 256 to Eugene: "Both swords are now to be exercised: by whom, then, if not by you? Each belongs to Peter, the one at his will, the other in his hand, as often as it need to be drawn." For the phrase 'at his will' needs to be expounded, for it is to be understood of just and prudent will, as by the other phrase 'as often as it need to be drawn' makes sufficiently plain. But this will supposes power which, for a certain eminent reason, is called the material sword, insofar as it can by it be efficaciously moved. There is, therefore, in the Pontiff as to this part too a directive power over temporal princes. And thus is sufficiently declared and proved the posited assertion, which will in the following chapter be more fully confirmed.

Chapter 23: It is shown that the Supreme Pontiff can use coercive power against kings, even up to deposing them from their kingdom if there be cause.

Summary: 1. Target of the controversy with the king of England. 2. Power for coercing unjust kings certainly exists in the Supreme Pontiff. 3. The same is proved from the Scriptures. 4. By the rod in Scripture coercive power is signified. 5. The evasions of adversaries are rejected. 6. The power of binding includes coercive power. 7. It is shown that Pontiffs can punish temporal kings even with temporal penalties. 8. The same is collected from the deed of St. Peter the Apostle. 9. The usage of the Pontiffs confirms the same truth. 10. The same is proved by reason. 11. Confirmation. 12. The power of punishing with temporal penalties is necessary for the Church. A tacit evasion is excluded. 13. Kings are not more exempt from the coercive power of the Pontiff than are others. 14. Although the Pontiff cannot punish a heathen king, yet he can free the subject faithful from his dominion.

1. Here, as I said, is the hinge and chief target of the present controversy. For indeed king James, who denies the Pontiff's jurisdiction over the Universal Church and especially over kings, has cared little about the directive power. But, on the other hand, he is anxiously afraid of the Pontiff's coercive power, that power especially which extends itself to despoiling of the kingdom, because, persisting in his error, he does not believe his scepter is secure if such power is believed by his subjects to exist in the Pontiff. So that he can, then, persist freely in his blindness, he wishes to deprive the Church of all remedy against heretical princes. Which before him was also the fabrication of Marsilius of Padua and of other enemies of the Church. But the contrary is taught by all the Catholic doctors whom I above mentioned, and Bellarmine in his cited new work notes them more at large, and it is not less certain than the other things that have been said. Nay, if these be carefully weighed, refutation of the said error and defense of the Catholic truth proved by usage, authority, and reason will not be difficult.

2. For first, that in the Pontiff there is power for coercing temporal kings who are unjust and incorrigible and especially schismatics and stubborn heretics follows evidently from what has been said. Because directive force without coercive is ineffective, witness the Philosopher Ethics 10, last chapter. Therefore if the Pontiff has directive power over temporal princes he has coercive power too, if they refuse to obey his just direction by law or precept. The consequence is proved because things that are from God are ordered and instituted in the best way; therefore if God gave the directive power to the Pontiff, he gave the coercive, since the institution would otherwise have been made imperfect and ineffective. Hence, by the contrary reason, theologians teach that the Church does not have power of prescribing acts merely internal, because it cannot pass judgment on them and consequently cannot impose on them a penalty, which pertains to the coercive power, as St. Thomas says, Ia IIae, q.91, a.4, and q.100, a.9. Therefore, conversely, since the Pontiff can by effective command direct the temporal power in its acts, he can also compel and punish princes not complying with him in things which he justly prescribes.

3. And this reason was without doubt enough; but because adversaries demand Scriptures, from these too we can confirm this truth in no obscure way. For Paul 2 Corinthians 10.4 first speaks thus: "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds." And later he subjoins, v.6: "And having in a readiness to avenge all disobedience." And later, v.8: "For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed." Now in these words the Apostle openly teaches that he had from God power of avenging and punishing all disobedience of any of the faithful whatever, as far as was necessary for the edification and good of the Church; but the power of avenging or punishing is coercive, as is evident per se. Hence Chrysostom in homily 22 on that place speaks thus: "For this purpose have we received power, that we might edify: But if anyone should struggle and strive and be so disposed that he cannot be cured by any reason, then finally we use also another faculty, striking him down and laying him low." Theophylact too expounds it thus: "We have in a readiness penalty and vengeance." And later: "Especially indeed for edification have I received it (namely power), but if anyone is incurable, we will use demolition." And later: "If I wanted to boast, because God has given me somewhat more, so that I should have power for conferring benefits first of all, and, when I am compelled, for punishing, I will not be ashamed, that is, I will not be shown arrogant or a liar." And in this way do Theodoret and other Greeks give exposition to the letter, and Anselm among the Latins, and Cajetan on that place, and St. Augustine in epistle 50, when he uses this testimony for proving that the Church can compel heretics with penalties to bring them to their senses.

4. The same power of avenging is, in fact, signified by Paul with the name of the rod, 1 Corinthians 4.21: "What will ye? Shall I come unto you with a rod?" according to the phrase of Scripture, Psalms 22.9: "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron," and similar places, and Psalms 22 [23].4: "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me," the way Jerome expounds Zechariah 1. And he thinks the same about the aforesaid words of Paul, Galatians 6. More clearly did Augustine thus expound them, bk.3, Contra Epistolam Parmen., ch.1, saying: "Now here it appears that he speaks of vengeance, which to signify he names rod." And Ambrose, epistle 18 to his sister Marcellina: "Whom the rod expelled from the heavenly sacraments, him meekness has restored." And bk.1, De Poenit., ch.12: “What it is to come with a rod is taught by the attack on fornication, the accusation of incest, the rebuke of the tumor, the condemnation finally of the thing.” The same opinion is maintained by Gregory, bk.1, epist.4, and Tertullian, bk. De Pudicit., ch.4, to pass over the expositors on the same place.

5. Nor do I see what can be said in response to these places, unless perhaps either that Paul was speaking to the common people of the Church subject to him not about kings, who are superiors; or that he was speaking about a power especially conceded to him, from which it is not licit to argue to the ordinary governance of the Church. But each is futile. For why do the words of Paul not comprehend disobedient and stubborn Christian kings? Not, surely, because there were then in the Church no temporal kings? But perhaps then too there were in the Church no English; so will his words not comprehend all them either? Or is it perhaps because kings are higher in power and temporal dignity? But this does not prevent them being subject to the yoke of Christ and ecclesiastical power, as we have shown; therefore if that power is coercive over bad Christians, as Paul is witness, it is also punitive over Christian kings; or if the king of England glories that he is exempt, let him either confess that he is not a Christian or let him show the divine privilege and the exemption made in the word of God, otherwise he by right loses the cause, albeit he in fact resist. But although the power of Paul, as far as it regards his person and apostolic dignity, be extinguished with him, it does not follow that it does not in the Church perpetually remain; because that same power was more perfectly in Peter by ordinary right and so as to have succession to him, because it was necessary for the office of feeding and for the agreeable governance of the Church, as was shown in earlier chapters.

6. And it is confirmed finally from the power of binding and loosing singularly given to Peter; for the power of binding includes also the power of coercing and punishing. And if adversaries deny this fact, they must show the exception, for Christ spoke in universal terms, saying: “Whatsoever thou shalt bind.” Add that Christ himself so interpreted that power, Matthew 18. For when he said: “If he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican,” he subjoins: “Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven.” As if he were to say, if he obey not the Church when it binds, let him be to thee as an heathen, because there will not be lacking in the Church power for binding so effective that what it shall bind will in heaven too be judged to be bound. And so, although Calvin and his followers twist this place, as they do others, the Church has from it always understood that there is in its pastors the power of coercing, at least by censure of excommunication, which is spiritual penalty. Which, that at the time of the apostles it was used in the Church, is sufficiently shown by Paul, 1 Corinthians 5; and that it has in this way been kept by perpetual tradition is testified by all the rights, all the Councils, all the decrees of the Pontiffs, all the writings of the holy Fathers, and finally by all the histories, such that it is superfluous to bring them forward. But that this sort of coercion is especially necessary against heretics is sufficiently show by Paul, Titus 3.10, saying: “A man that is an heretic after the first and second admonition reject.” And by that verse of 2 John 10: “Neither bid him god speed.”

Only I will not omit that which is of most importance for the cause, namely that it is a thing very much known for true that this censure has often been used by the Pontiffs against emperors and kings. For Innocent I excommunicated Arcadius and Eudoxus because of crimes committed against St. Chrysostom, as is clear from the last of his epistles, and from Nicephorus, bk.13, ch.34; and the same is related by Gregory VII bk.8, Registri, ch.21. Gregory II bound with a synodal anathema the emperor Leo and his followers in the overthrowing of images, as is reported from Zonaras and others by Baronius for the year 726, no.24. And the same was afterwards confirmed by Gregory III, as Platina reports. Also Gregory VII, after often admonishing the emperor Henry IV, excommunicated him in a Roman Synod, as is contained in bk.3 of his epistles, epistle 15. And that the same sentence was by the succeeding Pontiffs and the Councils confirmed is eruditely confirmed by Bellarmine against Barclay, ch.9. And the same Gregory VII in another Roman Council bound emperors, kings, and other temporal princes who usurped the investiture of bishops or of other ecclesiastical dignities with the bond of excommunication ipso facto, as is contained in bk.7 of his epistles, after epistle 14. And the same put an interdict on Poland because of the king's very great offense committed in the killing of St. Stanislaus, as is in the writing of Baronius, for the year 1079, n.40. In addition, Alexander III excommunicated the emperor Frederick I, as Platina reports of Alexander III, where he also places on record many other things which show this supreme power in the Pontiff. Afterwards, Innocent III "branded emperor Otho the fifth with an anathema," as Platina says in his life. Gregory IX excommunicated Frederick II, as is had from ch. 'Ad Apostolicae', De Sentent. et Re Iud., in 6. Finally John XXII excommunicated Louis of Bavaria, the intrusive emperor, as Albert Pighi reports at large in his book De Visib. Monarch., ch.14. In addition this power in the Church is supposed by the Lateran Council under Innocent II, 1, ch.3, when it bids that by ecclesiastical censure, if it be necessary, secular powers, whatever duties they fulfill, be compelled publicly to swear an oath for the defense of the Faith, etc. Which form of passing a censure, which is to comprehend kings and emperors, is very frequent and was not recently usurped but is sufficiently ancient, since in a certain privilege conceded by Gregory I to the monastery of St. Medardus it is found, as is read after his letters. And to that place of Gregory the other Gregory VII refers and takes the same argument from it, bk.8, Registri., epistle to Herimetus.

Basil the emperor also confesses the same power in the Pontiff over emperors in the 8th Synod, act.6, saying: "Pope Nicholas together with the Church of the Romans has pronounced an anathema against those who resist a decree and sentence of this sort. But we, once knowing this and fearing the judgment of the promulgated anathema, thought it necessary to comply with the judgment of the Roman Church." The same was recognized by Philip I king of Gaul, who was excommunicated by Urban II and was afterwards brought to his senses by Paschal and sent to Rome for release from it, as can be seen in Baronius for the years 1100 and 1101. The same was acknowledged by Louis king of Gaul, when he wrote to Alexander III earnestly requesting him to use his power against the king of England for the death of St. Thomas of Canterbury. And Henry himself king of England did not dare resist, and humbly undertook the penance imposed by the Pontiff, as Platina reports. A like example is reported by Peter of Blois in epistle 145 about Eleanor queen of England, who in her own defense and for her son who was unjustly held in prison by the king of Gaul requested the Supreme Pontiff's help and his use of the spiritual sword against the king. Lastly the same power was acknowledge in the Pontiff by the king of England who delivered the king of Gaul to Innocent III to be rebuked and, if he refused to listen to him, to be excommunicated, as we collect from ch. 'Novit.', De Iudiciis, where the Pontiff has the words: "It is not our intention to judge of feudal compact." And later: "But to make decree about sin, of which without doubt the censure pertains to us, which censure we can and should exercise over anyone." Hence about the same Innocent III Matthew of Paris reports that, in the year 1204, he excommunicated John king of England and debarred him from his kingdom.

For this reason even Marsilius of Padua himself, as they report, did not dare to deny that the Pontiff can coerce princes and kings, especially heretical ones, by ecclesiastical censures of excommunication or also of interdict, but he did deny that he can proceed further against them, Azor, p.2, Inst., bk.4, ch.19. And king James in defense of his oath of fidelity does not seem so sharply to resist the power of excommunicating than of temporally punishing, and so he defends the oath most with this title, that by it he is not compelling subjects to abjure the Pope's power for excommunicating a king but only for depriving him of his royal power and dominion. For he reckons, as he says in his Preface p.12: "The right of deposing kings has been sought out for the Pontiff by no legitimate title. And this unjust usurpation (as he calls it) and secular violence of the Pontiffs far and greatly exceeds excommunication, which is a spiritual censure." From which words it is sufficiently clear that he is not so averse to spiritual censure than to temporal coercion.

7. It remains therefore for us to proceed further against him and against Marsilius and others, and to show that the same power of the Pontiff can to coercion of kings by temporal penalty and to privations of kingdoms, when necessity requires, be extended. Which thing can by almost the same discourse from the same places of Scripture be satisfactorily done. For Christ the Lord gave to Peter and his successors power for correcting all Christians, even kings, and consequently, if they are disobedient or incorrigible, for coercing and punishing them; but he did not limit this power to ecclesiastical censures; therefore neither could it by us or by any prince of the Church be limited, but it pertains to the Roman Pontiff himself to decree and to determine fitting penalty according to occasion or necessity as it occurs. The first proposition we have already sufficiently proved, but the second we can show from the words of Christ often adduced and rightly weighed. For the word of Christ: "Feed my sheep," is indefinite, hence insofar as in the word 'feed' is included also the power of coercing, which is necessary in any pastor, such power is not delimited to censures but is left as to mode of penalty or coercion for determination by prudence or the equity of justice. For any pastor has power for coercing the sheep, not according to a determinate mode, but as it will be fitting or expedient for the sheep.

Next this we also collect from the other words of Christ: "Whatsoever thou shalt bind," for these too are general and indefinite. But if anyone says that in Matthew 18 they were declared and delimited to the tie of censure, we reply that it is declared there that in the general power of binding is included the chain of excommunication, not however that the power is limited to imposing that penalty alone. Both because no such limitation is from the context collected, and also because although there is mention only of excommunication made, nevertheless other censures fall under that power, as interdict, suspension, and again other ecclesiastical penalties. Nay, even the chain of precept and law is included under that power; and, from the force of such words, that power, as it is directive, is not delimited to this way of directing by means of personal precept or of settled law that obliges in this or that way, but it embraces indefinitely every appropriate directing. The same therefore holds of coercion. And so from this place by Innocent IV along with the Council of Lyons was this power collected in ch. 'Ad Apostolicae', De Sent. et Re Iud., in 6.

8. Besides, that this power is adumbrated in Peter's deed, at whose rebuke Ananias and his wife died, is indicated by Bede, bk.3, On Luke, ch.40, when he says that at the words of the apostle Peter Ananias and his wife fell, because it was expedient in the New Testament too that sometimes, though rarely, such vengeance happen, for the correction of others. And in bk.3 De Mirabilib. Sacrae Script., last chapter, it is said in the name of Augustine, that it was done "so that it might be shown how great the apostolic authority was and how great the sin had been, and so that the rest might by the example be chastened." More clearly Gregory, bk.1, epistle 24, when treating of the office of Pastor, and of the kindness and severity and also zeal for justice that it requires, adduces Peter as example, saying; "For hence it is that Peter holding, by the authority of God, the principality of the holy Church, refused to be venerated immoderately by the well acting Cornelius and, when he discovers the guilt of Ananias and Sapphira, soon shows how much his power above the rest had grown. For with a word he struck down their life, which he seized with scrutinizing spirit, and again recalled that he was supreme in the Church against sins." And thus although that deed was extraordinary and done by special prompting and virtue of the Holy Spirit, nevertheless as Gregory says later: "The zeal for vengeance opened up the force of the power."

And the same is shown by Paul 1 Corinthians 5.5 when he not only excommunicated the fornicator but even delivered him "unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord;" for the fact he says "for the destruction of the flesh" clearly indicates that he was punished beyond spiritual censure also by bodily vexation, and compelled to do penance that his spirit might be saved. And thus is the place expounded by Chrysostom in orat. 15, when he says that he was delivered to the demon for the destruction of the flesh, as Job was, although not for the same cause, so that "he might," he says, "scourge him with an evil sore or some other sickness." Theophylact: "that he might vex him with disease and make him waste away." Anselm too, although he adds another explanation, persists more in this one. For at the end of ch.24, explaining the act of the "rod", that is of the apostolic power for coercion, says: "By excommunicating some, by harshly reproving others, by bodily scourging others (as befits a father)." And afterwards, ch.5, says that the destruction of the flesh signified "strong affliction of the flesh done by the devil." And he reports that the Apostle had power "that anyone he excommunicated was at once seized and plagued by the devil for as long and as much as the Apostle wished." Which mode of plaguing required a singular quasi executive or imperative virtue over the demon, which is commonly not given to others; but nevertheless it supposes a jurisdiction of coercing not only by excommunication but also in other ways. And the same exposition is signified by Pacian, in Paraenesis De Poenit., when from that place he collects that sometimes penalty and affliction of body is necessary; and similarly Ambrose, bk.1, De Poenit., ch.12, insofar as he compares that destruction of the flesh with the afflictions of Job, as Chrysostom did. Therefore, according to this exposition of the Fathers we get from that place ecclesiastical correction and vengeance standing not in spiritual censure alone but also sometimes in affliction of the body, and therefore the pastors of the Church can use temporal penalty in order to a spiritual good.

9. Secondly, we can show this truth by the authority and practice of the Church. For among those Pontiffs, who we said excommunicated emperors and kings, Gregory II made Rome with the whole of Italy withdraw from the empire of Leo, as Baronius reports from Theophanes for the year 730, nn.3 & 4. And the same is attributed to Gregory III by Sigbert in his Chronicle for the year 731, saying: "he refuted the emperor Leo of error, and took the Roman people and the taxes of the West away from him." But Gregory VII deprived Henry IV of the empire and of the kingdom, as is clear from the sentence above cited, whose words are these: "Blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, incline, I beseech, your ears to us." And later: "Supported then by this confidence, for the honor and defense of the Church on the part of Almighty God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, I by Thy power and authority deny to king Henry, son of the emperor Henry, who has with unheard audacity risen up against Thy Church, the government of the whole kingdom of the Teutons and of Italy, and I absolve all Christians from the bond of the oath which they have taken or will take upon themselves, and I forbid anyone to serve him as king." In like manner Innocent III deprived Otho, whom he excommunicated, "of the titles of empire," says Platina. Again Innocent IV, in the Council of Lyons, deprived the emperor Frederick II, already excommunicated by Gregory IX, of the empire, not only releasing his subjects from the oath of fidelity but also "by apostolic authority firmly prohibiting anyone from in any other respect obeying or attending him as emperor or king;" and binding with censure of ipso facto excommunication those who thereafter afforded him as emperor or king advice or help or favor. Finally Clement VI thrust Louis of Bavaria, who had unjustly obtained the empire and was already excommunicated by his predecessors, out of the empire and had someone else, namely Charles IV, elected legitimate emperor.

But besides these things, which have regard to the empire, Pope Zacharias in a similar case in the kingdom of Gaul transferred the title of the kingdom from king Childeric to Pippin, as is found in Gregory VII, bk.8, Registri, epist.11, ch. 'Alius', 15, q.9, and Baronius for the year 751 at the beginning, and for the year 841, n.3. Where also is reported that a change was made in the kingdom of Gaul at the time of the emperor Lothar and of his brothers Louis and Charles who, supported on the authority of the bishops, divided the kingdom between themselves and deprived Lothar of it on account of his crimes. Also Boniface VIII declared Philip the Fair king of Gaul deprived of his kingdom, and on that occasion promulgated his Extravagant 'Unam Sanctam', De Maiorit. et Obedient., as Aemilius reports in his life of the same Philip. Again Gregory VII, when he laid an interdict on Poland because of the killing of Stanislaus, deprived king Bonislaus of the kingdom, as Cromer testifies, bk.4 of Rerum Poloniae. But we have a striking example in England itself in king John, who, when he was committing great crimes against religion, priests, and other innocents, and was often warned by Innocent III, so that, as disobedient and stubborn, he refused to come to his senses but rather became daily worse, was by the same Innocent, after much consultation with the fathers (as Polydore says), deposed from the royal dignity, and the peoples subject to him were absolved from their oath, and Christian princes, being informed of the fact, were admonished to pursue John as an enemy of the Church. Terrified by this sentence and struck with fear of imminent peril, John at last swore that he would abide by the decision of the Pontiff and handed the diadem taken from his head to Pandulph the Pontiff's legate, never in the future to receive it, either he or his heirs, except from the Roman Pontiff. So Polydore, bk.15.

Now all these and the like things were done not rashly or in a corner but some of them very frequently in Councils and sometimes in a General one, as in that of Lyons. And they were done in the sight of the whole Christian world, by which they were approved and entrusted to execution; therefore it is incredible that they were acts of usurped and not of true power. Add that the Lateran Council under Innocent III, ch.3, supposes the same power, when it says: "If a temporal lord, after being warned by the Church, neglect to purge his land of heretical deformity, let him be excommunicated by the metropolitan. And if neglect to make satisfaction within a year, let it be made known to the Supreme Pontiff so that thence he may himself declare the vassals released from fidelity to him and expose his land to occupation by Catholics, etc." From all which things an argument of the following sort is concluded: The Universal Church cannot err in things that pertain to faith and morals, but the Universal Church agreed to deeds of this kind and approved them as consonant with divine and natural right, and it likewise approves canon laws imposing penalties of this kind on temporal princes because of the gravest crimes; therefore it is as certain that the Pontiff can coerce or punish temporal princes with these types of penalties as it is certain that the Church cannot err in faith and morals.

10. Third, this truth is made plain by reason; for this power was necessary by a double title in the supreme head and pastor of the Church, namely both because of emperors or kings themselves and any temporal princes whatever, and because of the peoples subject to them. By the first title was this power necessary so that the Pontiff could either correct and emend a rebellious prince or even punish him as he deserves, for both pertain to the Pontiff: but if often happens that censures alone are not sufficient for these effects, as daily experience sufficiently shows. Therefore it must necessarily be said that Christ conferred this power on his Vicar, since he no less established him Pastor of Christian princes than of the rest of the Christian people. Wherefore, as far as concerns the first title, when either solely or principally the question is one of emending a prince who has sinned, Pontiffs are especially wont to use the censure, because it is the proper medicinal penalty of which Christ speaks Matthew 18. But if it happen that princes are corrected by censure and emended, the Church is not wont to proceed against them to rigorous vengeance by grave and public penalties; it can, however, and is wont to enjoin some penalties, both for repairing losses, if any have perhaps been by them inflicted, and also so that they may give as well to God as to the Universal Church some satisfaction. For to repair losses and compensate for injuries inflicted is not so much a penalty as a certain restitution and payment of a debt, even though compulsion for doing it require superior power. But besides this compensation due by commutative justice, reason of the common good and of legal justice requires that some penalty be applied to avenge the offense for the satisfaction to the Church and for example and fear to others. But when, notwithstanding the censure, a king is defiant and incorrigible in his offense, then graver penalties ought to be applied, and of this sort are almost all the cases above enumerated, as St. Thomas noted, bk.3 De Regimine Principum, ch.10.

11. And this part can be confirmed because, with respect to the other faithful or baptized Christians, the Church has power not only for coercing them through censure for emendation of the offense, but also for avenging the offenses through other temporal or bodily penalties in manner suitable to the ecclesiastical judge and pastor; therefore legitimate bishops of the Church have the same power, and especially the Supreme Pontiff, over temporal princes even supreme ones. The assumption is manifest from the perpetual use of the Church; for the canons are wont to impose pecuniary penalties sometimes up to the confiscation of goods. Sometimes even they impose corporal penalties short of danger of life and limb, as is the penalty of flogging, sometimes even as far as condemnation to the galleys; and when the penalty of blood is necessary, although ecclesiastical judges are not wont to impose it because of the decency of their status, they can commit the culprit to the secular judge, bidding him to punish him according to the equity of the laws. All which things can be most of all considered in the crime of heresy. For heretics are not only excommunicated by the Church and afflicted with other spiritual penalties, but are also deprived of all their temporal goods, not only by the laws of the emperors but also by virtue of the canons. And lastly if he is either stubborn or relapses, by the laws of the emperors he is punished with death, but by the canons he is released to the decision of the secular judge, so as to receive retribution for the quality of his deed, according to the ch. 'Ad Abolendam', De Haeret., with the like.

12. Now that these penalties are most just the use of the Church satisfactorily proves, and Augustine very well defends it, epistles 48 and 50, and bk.3 Contra Epist. Parmeniani, ch.2. But that this power is necessary in the Church of Christ as it was by him established is proved by reason; because if the subjects of the Church cannot by penalties of this sort be coerced, they would easily come to despise spiritual ones and do very great harm to themselves and to others. For as is said Proverbs 29.15: "A child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame." Hence the Christian thing would not be agreeably instituted, nor would it be sufficiently provided for, if it did not have power for compelling rebels who refuse to obey its censures. Nor will it suffice to say it is enough that there is in Christian temporal princes this power, both because princes too can themselves commit offense and need correction, as I will say even now. And also because avenging misdeeds pertains per se only to civil magistrates insofar these are contrary to the peace of the republic and human justice; but to coerce them as they are contrary to religion and the salvation of the soul looks per se to the spiritual power, and therefore to it should most pertain a faculty of using temporal penalties for such correction, either by inflicting them itself or by employing the service of the secular arm, so that everything may be done decently, in order, and effectively.

13. It remains that we prove the first inference, namely that if over the rest of the faithful of inferior order the Church has this power, it has also received it besides, in Peter especially and his successors, over supreme temporal princes. The consequence is proved, then, from the principle posited above, that these princes are as well the sheep of Peter as all the rest; and temporal dignity or power does not render them immune or exempt from such power or penalty, because neither from Christ's words nor from any other principle or reason can such liberty, or rather license for sinning, be collected. Nay rather is this power much more necessary in the Church for coercing princes of this sort than their subjects. First indeed, because they themselves are freer and so fall more easily and, once fallen, are with more difficulty corrected. Next because the sins of princes, especially those against faith and religion, are more pernicious, for they easily draw along subjects to imitate them, whether by example or by benefits and promises or even by threats and terrors. For which reason rightly did the Sage of Ecclesiasticus 10.2-3 say: "A foolish king will be the ruin of his people. For as the governor of a city is so also will be the inhabitants thereof." Which even the philosophers, led by reason and experience, taught, as Cicero from Plato, bk.1 letters. Hence the same Cicero, bk.3 De Legibus, rightly also said: “Vicious princes do not only conceive vices for themselves but also pour them out on the city.” Because, lastly: “Princes offend more gravely than the rest, and therefore they should by their pastors also be more gravely punished,” as Gregory said about pastors themselves in Pastoral, p.3, ch.5, and it is referred to by Pope Nicholas against Lothar king of Gaul in his epistle to the same, and it is referred to in ch. ‘Praecipue’, 11, q.3.

14. And hence finally can easily be shown another title of this power over kings, namely for the defense of their subjects; for it not only regards the pastor to correct erring sheep, or to recall them to the fold, but also to ward off wolves, and to defend them against enemies, lest they be dragged from the fold and perish; but an unjust king, especially a schismatic or a heretic, puts his subjects in great danger of perdition, as is made known from what has just been said, and therefore Claudian said: “To the example of the king the whole world is conformed; the fickle crowd always changes with its prince.” Therefore it regards the office of the Pontiff to defend the subjects of an heretical or perverse prince and to liberate them from that evident danger; therefore Christ, who did and instituted all things well and best, conferred on Peter this power and comprehended it under the word ‘feed’ and under the power of binding and loosing. Therefore by it can Peter both deprive such a prince of his dominion and constrain him so that he not harm his subjects, and release them from their oath of fidelity or declare them released, because that condition is always understood to be included in such an oath.

Which title was by St. Thomas and approved theologians seen to be so grave and efficacious that it alone per se suffices for depriving an infidel king of his dominion and power over the faithful, even though the first reason of vengeance and just punishment is inoperative. For according to the doctrine of Paul, “about those who are without” the Church does not judge. Hence the same theologians collect that the Pontiff cannot punish a heathen non-baptized king on account of infidelity or other sins. And yet if he have subject faithful, the Pontiff can snatch them from his subjection because of the moral and evident danger of destruction, as St. Thomas teaches, IIa IIae, q.10, a.10. And it is collected from Paul 1 Corinthians 6, for he rebukes the faithful because they were going to court before infidel judges, and he supposes that the Church can create judges, who may even in temporal things judge among the faithful, lest they be compelled to go to infidels; and to give proof of this he says, v.3: “Know ye not that we shall judge angels? How much more things that pertain to this life?” Which words are alleged by Gregory, bk.7, epistle 21, and he infers from them: “To him then to whom the opening and closing of heaven is given it is not licit to judge of the earth? God forbid.” Hence too a faithful spouse can be separated from an infidel spouse, if she cannot live with him without injury to the Creator, according to the doctrine of Paul, 1 Corinthians 7. And by the same root baptized children are freed from the power and association of infidel fathers, lest they be again involved in their errors, as is said in the 4th Council of Toledo, ch.59. Therefore by like or greater reason is a king who is Christian or subject to the Church by reason of baptism deprived of his power and dominion over his vassals; therefore the title is per se sufficient for the Pontiff to be able to punish those princes and by right to deprive them of their kingdoms, and for this purpose to use the sword of other princes, so that thus sword may be under sword, so that they may be mutually aided in fighting for and defending the Church.

I could in this place expound, confirm, and defend other titles whereby the Roman Pontiff can from just causes make disposition of temporal things, as he did in transferring the empire, and in instituting the manner of election of the emperor, and in administering it, when it is vacant, and in other cases too pronouncing justice in temporal causes. But neither the brevity of this sort of work permits us to pursue all of them, nor are they necessary for our intention and plan, and therefore to other authors who have very learnedly disputed on these things I remit the reader.

Chapter 24. Objections to the doctrine of the previous chapters taken from Scripture are met.

Summary. 1. First objection. 2. Response is made to the testimonies of the New Testament. 3. To the testimonies of the Old Testament. 4. The prerogatives adduced by King James are weighed. The name of sons of God does not befit all kings. 5. Priests more frequently than kings are said to be anointed in Scripture. 6. This praise is especially attributed to the kings of Israel. 7. Priests are much more excellently called ministers of God than kings. 8. David was not called an angel, but he was made equal to one in a certain property. 9. Kings are nowhere called angels, but priests very much so. 10. A certain evasion is attacked. 11. From the fact that kings are called lamps no spiritual power is attributed to them. 12. Kings are nurses of the Church in temporal things, the Pontiff in spiritual ones. 13. The conclusion is drawn that the prerogatives introduced by the king bring nothing against the supreme power of the Pontiff. Solution.

1. So as more to confirm the Catholic doctrine that we have displayed in the three preceding chapters we have thought it necessary, at the end of this book, to make satisfaction to some objections whereby the power of the Pontiff over temporal princes is wont to be attacked by adversaries. And since Cardinal Bellarmine does this copiously in his last work against Barclay, therefore I shall propose only those objections which are insinuated by the king of England, or which contain some difficulty, or whose resolution might contribute something useful for greater manifestation of the truth. But I note (as I also warned above) that in these objections the cause of the primacy and power of the Pontiff over the laity is often confused with the cause of the exemption of clerics from the jurisdiction and power of the laity; which controversies, as they are distinct, so they are by us separated in our dispute (as they are by other Catholic authors); and therefore everything that pertains to exemption we reserve for the following book, and we will there make specific satisfaction to the objections pertaining to that matter. But because the exemption of the person of the Supreme Pontiff himself is conjoined with his divine dignity and with natural right, therefore we cannot pass over some of the things that are wont to be objected to the immunity of the Pontiff and to his supreme exemption from all human judgment. And although the superior power of the Pontiff over kings and princes, both in temporal and in spiritual matters, has been made plain by us in distinct assertions, as if in their parts or grades, yet, because the king speaks in indistinct manner against the primacy, therefore will we put forward his objections in more or less the same way, but in responding we will declare distinctly what is directly attacked by each, and thus we will more clearly and easily defend the individual things we have said.

The first objection, then, is taken from Scripture and has two parts, one we can in scholastic manner call positive, the other negative. The first is indicated by the king in his Preface p.14, when he says in general that the authority and power which the Pontiffs have usurped for themselves over the temporal rights of kings is nothing other than an ambitious tyranny against the authority of the Scriptures; and about the same he says on p.22 that the power unjustly usurped by the Pontiffs conflicts with the Scriptures. But which these Scriptures are he does not say in those places but refers to his Apology, which he says is wholly devoted to asserting the authority of kings. In the Apology, however, I only find on p. 25 and 129 some testimonies of Scripture wherein obedience to secular princes, even for conscience' sake, is commended, and they are indeed the epistle to the Romans ch.13 along with others, which were treated by us sufficiently at the beginning of this book. To these he there adds many from the Old Testament which I note are of a double order. For there are certain of them in which obedience even to unjust and infidel princes is permitted, or praised, or prescribed, or in some other way confirmed, as is that of Joshua 1.17: "According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee;" and that of Jeremiah 27.12: "Bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and serve him and his people, and live." Again he adds the one of Exodus 5, that the children of Israel requested permission to depart from Pharaoh, and the one of 1 Ezra 1, that they obtained similar permission from Cyrus, king of the Persians. And in this order should be numbered the other testimonies of Scripture which he afterwards brings together, in which the dignity of kings is declared with various titles of honor in the Old Testament, for kings are called 'sons of the most high God', 'Anointed of God', 'made according to the hear of God', 'lights of Israel', 'nurses of the Church'. In another order he puts certain deeds of the kings of Israel, which we will speak of in the following chapters.

2. However, the aforesaid testimonies neither contribute anything to the present cause nor, considered in themselves, contain any difficulty or controversy besides one, which furnishes occasion for a certain specific question; but that question is of a sort that the truth handed down does not depend on the resolution of it which, by running through them one by one, I will briefly make clear. For, to begin with, the places of the New Testament do indeed prove that there is in kings a true civil jurisdiction drawing its origin from God himself, and that therefore a king is in a proper way to be honored, and obedience is to be given to him, not only from fear of punishment but also from conscience; all of which we taught at the beginning of this book to be true according to the doctrine of the faith. But from them it can by no likelihood be inferred that kings have no superior by whom they are to be ruled in spiritual things, and consequently also in temporal things in their order to spiritual things; and therefore I said that those testimonies do not in any way pertain to the present cause. Nay rather, it is not even sufficiently proved from those places that the power of temporal kings is so supreme in its own order that they should recognize no direct superior in temporal things; for this, as I said, does not strictly have regard to the faith, although it be a thing most true by far and more consonant with Scripture, as we also showed in our discussion.

3. Nor do the former testimonies of the Old Testament prove anything more; for we only obtain from them that obedience is to be given to the king, or the prince, or the governor of the community, namely in his own forum when he prescribes a valid precept. For this and nothing else did the children of Israel offer to Joshua, when they said: "According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee; only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses." But the words of Jeremiah, if they be understood about the absolute will of God whereby he decreed to give the children of Israel under the true dominion and power of the king of Babylon, prove at most that temporal kings must be obeyed, just as was said about the other testimonies. But if they be understood only of the permissive will whereby God had decreed to permit it for the punishment of the sins of the Jewish people, so that the king subjugated that people to himself by his own power and by fact rather than by right, thus the words contribute nothing to the cause, because the discussion in that place is not about a true king but about a tyrant to whom the Israelites were admonished to submit their necks, not so much for conscience' sake as for avoiding greater evils, as the words subjoined indicate, vv.12-13: "Serve him and his people, and live. Why will ye die, thou and thy people, by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence? Etc." And it also helps that the said words are from the prophet before the people were reduced to servitude to Nebuchadnezzar, and so he was rather inducing them not to resist his dominion and power, and consequently to serve him at least in fact, even though they were not bound by right to do so. And the reason is the same about the other places, whether Pharaoh or Cyrus were true kings of the people of the Jews or not, or (which is the same thing) whether the people of Israel were bound by right to ask for permission to depart, or whether merely in fact, because of the power of their princes, they did not dare to depart without their permission and will.

4. Much less indeed is urged by those testimonies wherein various titles of veneration and honor are attributed to kings, because some of them are common to others who are not kings, while some do not befit all kings but were prerogatives of certain persons. Which is clear from a brief run through of them one by one. For, in the first place, that the title of 'sons of God' is attributed to a temporal king is collected by the king of England only from the words which God says about Solomon, 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 7.14: "I will be his father, and he will be my son." But these words, as they are there said, are certainly not common to all kings but contain a particular promise made to Solomon, as is clear both from the preceding words, v.13: "He shall build an house for my name, and I will stablish the throne of his kingdom for ever," and from the words subjoined, vv.14-15: "If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men; but my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it away from Saul, whom I put away before thee, etc." From which words it is openly clear that the words "I will be his father" do not fit Saul, although he was a temporal king chosen by God, made king immediately and without succession by God's authorship; that excellence, therefore, is not common to all kings, but a singular favor promised to Solomon.

Nay, there are some who think that the words in their propriety neither fit Solomon himself nor are literally said of him but of Christ alone signified through Solomon, because Paul alleges them of Christ in Hebrews 1, and because in Christ alone are they fulfilled, which God immediately promised, 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 7.16: "And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee; thy throne shall be established for ever." But although it be true that the words do in a certain singular way fit Christ and are said of him in a historical or at least mystical sense, nevertheless we cannot deny that they are literally said of Solomon, for that is openly collected from the context and from 3 Kings [1 Kings] 1 and from 1 Chronicles 22 & 28. Now they are said of him not because of the mere dignity or power of a temporal king, otherwise they would have been said of all kings and would fit Saul, which has been shown to be false; but because of the singular providence, governance, and protection under which God had determined to assume Solomon, or because he had decreed never to deprive him of the kingdom, even if he were to sin, but that he would chastise him, as God himself sufficiently declared in his words. Or, certainly, because he had determined to make him holy and just, and the name of ‘sons of God’ is more proper to the just than to kings. For kings, if they are impious, are not sons of God. And therefore if the words are understood of adoptive sonship to God, they have a condition attached, “if he be constant to do my commandments and my judgments,” as is expressly added in 1 Chronicles 28.7, and later David is reported to have said to Solomon, v.9: “If thou seek him he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off for ever.” Now in this way could it be said in the name of God to any just man: “I will be his father, and he shall be my son.” What prerogative, then, of temporal kings can be collected from those words?

The second title for kings, which the king makes much of, is that they are sometimes called Gods, and he mentions the verse of Psalms 81 [82].6: “I have said, Ye are gods.” But whence does the king show that those words are said specifically of temporal kings? Certainly he cannot show it, since it is false. For Christ in John 10 expounded the words differently when he said, v.35: “If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came.” For the word of God was not made to kings alone, but more to prophets, or even to all the faithful, and especially the just. Hence Augustine on that place in Tractat. 48 understands Christ’s exposition about all men who through the word of God become by participation sons of God, and especially about the faithful Jews who then believed in God. Besides, the beginning of the psalm itself, namely v.1: “God standeth in the congregation of the Gods [alt. the mighty], etc.” can scarcely be adapted to kings, but best to the faithful and to prophets, or also to priests; but most of all to judges and their congregation, for it is added, vv.1-2: “he judgeth among the gods. How long will ye judge unjustly?” as is noted by Euthymius and others. Just as also in Exodus 22 judges are called Gods there, vv.8-9: “...shall come before the gods [alt. judges],” that is, to the judges, and later, v.28: “Thou shalt not revile the gods,” although Chrysostom understands this of priests, Psalms 137 [138] at the beginning, when he says that Scripture is accustomed to call a priest an angel and a God. And again many understand of priests and of judges the words of Psalms 49 [50].1: “The God of Gods [alt. the mighty God], even the Lord, hath spoken,” and that verse of Psalms 46 [47].9: “The strong Gods of the earth are greatly exalted [alt. the shields of the earth belong unto God, he is greatly exalted].” Which words can indeed comprehend kings, though not them only, but all the great and powerful ones of the earth, who are said to be Gods, not because they are, but because they wish to dominate in such a way as if they were Gods, or (if the appellation be taken in a good sense) because they in a special way participate in the power and preferment of God. In which way indeed can priests much more than kings be called Gods by participation.

5. The third note of kings is that they are called ‘anointed’, 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 24. But this appellation is much more frequently attributed to priests, because by anointing are they consecrated, as is evident from Exodus 29, Leviticus 4 & 8. Hence when it is said Psalms 104 [105].15: “Touch not my christs [alt. mine anointed],” not only kings but priests too are included. And therefore perhaps (which is a thing to be noted) in 2 Maccabees 1 both are conjoined when it is said of Aristobulus, v.10: “who is of the family of the christ priests,” either to distinguish him from christ kings or from their priests, who were not christs, as they existed among the gentiles or in the law of nature. Next, external anointing of itself confers no power nor indicates any dignity, except the one it is imposed to signify. If therefore the king speaks of a christ or of someone anointed by this external anointing, whence does he prove to us that the anointing of kings signified their power over the Pontiff or over ecclesiastical matters, and not rather that by the anointing of the Pontiff himself is signified his primacy and excellence over kings? No reason can assuredly be given. But the truth is that from the force of anointing alone neither of them is signified or can be proved but has to be collected from other principles. But if the king is talking, not about mere external anointing, but about an invisible and interior one, since that happens through the internal grace of the Holy Spirit, not only can kings in this way be said to be Anointed but all the just and in a way all the faithful, and about them too can be understood the words cited: “Touch not my christs.” Neither can even all kings be called christs in this way, and it is clear that David, when in the place mentioned he spoke of Saul, did not call him a christ in this sense.

6. The fourth prerogative is that “he sits on the throne of God,” from 2 Chronicles 9 there at v.8: “Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighted in thee to set thee on his throne.” But, to begin with, in those words “the throne of God” signifies nothing other than the governance of the people of Israel, or the seat of the kingdom in that people. For as that people is in a special way said to be the people of God, because he chose it specially and sanctified it and undertook a particular care for it, according to that verse of Exodus 19.5-6: “ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people...and a kingdom of priests and an holy nation;” so the kingdom of it is said to be the throne of God, and more frequently is it called the throne of David and the throne of Israel, 3 Kings [1 Kings]1 & 2, and often elsewhere. Hence just as God said to Samuel 1 Kings [1 Samuel]8.7: “they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them,” so the throne of that kingdom could also be called the throne of God, because the kings of that kingdom were both made by God and were in some way put in place of God in the governance and care of the kingdom. That praise, therefore, thus understood is not common to all kings but is proper to the kings of Israel, nor does it signify in them another excellence or power but only the civil power for that particular people, given in a special way and election by God. Next, although all kings can be said to sit in the throne of God, because they are ministers of God and have their power from him, what is got therefrom except the temporal power of kings supreme at most in its own order? For in this signification there is not only one throne of God given but many, because as Nazianzen said: “A bishop too has his throne, on which he is put to rule the Church of God,” on Acts 20. There exists, therefore, a spiritual throne and there can be throne under throne, either in the same order, as a bishop is under the Pontiff, and a king sometimes in his own way under the emperor, or in a diverse one; and in this way the temporal throne is under the spiritual, because although both are of God or from God, yet “the things that be of God are ordered.”

7. A fifth excellence of kings is posited, that they are the servants of God, and so are they called in 2 Chronicles 6. But this can be attributed to kings in two ways. First, by the very fact that they are kings, because they are the ministers of God whom in their office they chiefly serve or should serve; and in this way indeed the prerogative fits all kings; but it fits more and in a more noble way priests and Pontiffs, because they minister to God in things of greater moment and of more excellent order, and by him are they more immediately established in their office; and for that reason Paul thus begins his epistle to the Romans: “Paul a servant of Jesus Christ,” and his epistle to the Philippians, “Paul and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ,” and to Titus: “Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ,” and in the same way speak Peter and James and Jude at the beginning of their epistles, and John his Apocalypse 1. But in Acts 4 & 17 the preachers of the Gospel are called servants of God; nay they are also called “stewards of the mysteries of God,” in 1 Corinthians 4.1, nay helpers too and ministers in 1 Corinthians 3. But in another way the appellation of servant of God is said by reason of obedience to God, and of observance of his precepts, according to that verse of Romans 6.18: “Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness.” In which sense without doubt Solomon called his father a servant of God in the said place of Chronicles, and in this sense neither are all kings servants of God but only the pious and those obedient to God, nor kings alone but all those made free from sin are servants of God, as is manifest from the said words of Paul and from the very frequent use of Scripture. Therefore this appellation denotes no particular excellence in kings.

8. Sixth the king ponders that the name of angel is sometimes attributed to kings, and he adduces only the place of 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 14.20, where a certain woman said to David: “My lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God,” who also said above, v.17: “as an angel of God, so is my lord the king to discern good and evil.” And we can add a like place from 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 29.9 where Achish said to David: “I know that thou are good in my sight, as an angel of God.” However these things were said not to all kings but only to David, and not because of his royal dignity, which in the place mentioned later he had not yet obtained, but because of certain special reasons found in him; namely because of his wisdom, his meekness of spirit, and his honesty of morals; therefore the person of that king, not the royal power, is therein commended. Add that in those places David is not called an angel but is in a certain property compared to an angel, which is a very different thing, as is per se evident.

9. Nor is that comparison to be taken according to equality but according to a certain imitation or even analogous proportion. For thus the particular “as” is frequently taken in Scripture, as in John 17.11: “that they may they be one, as we are”, and Matthew 5.48: “Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father is perfect.” And very similar is the place of Acts 6.15 where it is said of Stephen: “they saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.” By which words neither is Stephen called an angel nor is any excellence of power indicated, but only a marvelous beauty or brightness or splendor of light which then appeared in his face. For that phrase is a Hebrew one, whereby the excellence of some virtue or beauty is exaggerated after the likeness of an angelic one, as is common. Thus, therefore, in the said place, that woman wished to praise the wisdom of David, not to call him an angel. Hence, if we are to speak truly and strictly, there is no place in Scripture in which the name of angel is attributed either to all kings or to any temporal king, although however it is written about a priest, Malachi 2.7: “For the priest’s lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth; for he is the angel [alt. messenger] of the Lord of hosts;” where Cyril of Alexandria said: “Because he perspicuously proclaims the will of God and contains the hortatory law of speech;” and Jerome says: “The priest of God is called an angel, because he is a follower of God and of men and proclaims his will to the people.” Therefore from the appellation of angel much more is the priestly dignity commended than the royal. For although a priest be said by metaphor or analogy to be an angel, yet the proportion is founded on the office itself or on the priestly dignity, not on any property found in the person of any priest, as was explained of the person of king David.

The same paralogism is committed when from that which is said of David by Samuel, 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 13.14: "The Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart," the inference is drawn that kings are said to be 'made according to the heart of God.' Which is an open fallacy, both because David is not there said to be made according to the heart of God when he is made king, but he is said to be found to be a man according to the heart of God and therefore was he assumed by God to be the leader of his people; therefore, royal power did not make him to be according to the heart of God but the grace which God first conferred on him, so that when he was already made to be according to his heart God should also make him king. Therefore an inference to some excellence of kingly power is not thence rightly drawn, but there is only shown the equity of God's election and the singular election of grace in respect of the person of David. Hence God conferred no less a royal dignity and power on Saul, although however he did not find him to be according to his heart. For God said, Acts 13.22: "I have found David the son of Jesse, a man after mine own heart."

10. But if someone says that a king can, because of likeness and participation of power, be said to be made according to the heart of God, and that thus it fits all kings, we reply, to begin with, that this is not the sense of that place, as has been proved, nay neither can a place be found in Scripture on which it might be founded. Next we add that, although it be freely conceded, nothing further is proved by it than that a king participates in a certain special way in the power of God, or that the institution of kingship is pleasing to God and draws its origin from his providence. But how does this relate to the comparison with priestly dignity or pontifical power? For this is much more according to the heart of God, because it both pleases him more and draws its origin in a higher way from him. Nay, if we speak of the people of Israel, the pontifical dignity was for a special reason more according to the heart of God than the royal, for God invented and established the former from his sole good pleasure and wisdom, but the latter he conceded as if compelled to the request of the people, as is taken from 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 8. And for much greater reason can the Pontificate among the Christian people be said to be according to the heart of God, because it is both more divine and of a higher order and was conceded by God to his Church by a greater providence and good pleasure.

11. Nor is the argument much dissimilar which is taken from the eighth title of the king, taken from 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 21.17, where David is by his subjects called "the lamp [alt. light] of Israel." For those words too (as Abulensis there thought) can be understood as specially said of the person of David, on whom the eyes of the whole people were intent as on a lamp because of his singular virtue and fortitude, and therefore they were very afraid lest he be quenched, that is killed, because they hoped for great benefits from God through him. But let us grant that he was called lamp because of the eminence of the royal dignity, and that the name befits, under the same metaphor, all kings, what can thence be collected against the pontifical eminence? For Christ said to the apostles, and consequently also to their successors, Matthew 5.14, "Ye are the light of the world," which is something greater than to be a lamp, and hence, if we persist in the metaphor, indicates a greater dignity.

The final title the king takes from Isaiah 49, where Isaiah predicted about the Church that has been assembled from the gentiles, v.23: “Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers,” and he tacitly understands kings to be called nursing fathers because of the eminence of power which kings were going to have in the Church of Christ and in ecclesiastical things. But, first, Jerome explains the place there about the apostles and apostolic men, but the sense seems to be mystical one. We admit, then, that the discussion there is literally about the kings of the gentiles converted to the faith of Christ, but we say that not their power but their piety is there extolled. Such as it was in Constantine, in Charlemagne, and was also and now is in our Catholic kings who, with all their strength, apply themselves to helping the faithful and to guarding and spreading the true Church of Christ. This is also signified by Augustine De Unit.

Ecclesiae ch.7, when he said that Isaiah predicted that the kings of the earth, who first persecuted the Church, were afterwards going to be its helpers. In addition St. Cyril of Alexandria adds in his book 4 on Isaiah, and does so very well, that the prophecy was fulfilled, because “one may see that those who have believed in Christ are endowed, because of the piety of their lords, with honor and are thought worthy of all mercy, so much so that their lords seem to be none other than their nurses.” Add that the very metaphorical name of ‘nurse’ signifies or indicates nothing else than the care of feeding and promoting offspring, according to that verse of Paul 1 Thessalonians 2.7: “But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children.”

12. Hence not only kings but also apostles and Pontiffs can be called nurses of the Church, as Jerome wished and as Paul indicated, but in a far different way; for kings are (so to say) per se nurses in temporal things, but apostles in spiritual things, according to that verse of Paul 1 Corinthians 3.1-2: “Even as unto babes in Christ, I have fed you with milk.” And thus Pontiffs per se nourish the Church as it is the Church, but kings as it is a civil and political assembly. But because that which is spiritual presupposes that which is animal, therefore the Church is much helped in spiritual things by good civil governance and by temporal benefits, and therefore are good and pious kings called nurses of the Church. For that name is more a mark of kindness and condescension than of power and majesty. Under which metaphor it is also attributed to God in Hosea 2 and in other places. And this sense of the words of Isaiah is declared by the words that follow where he at once subjoins about the same kings, 49.23: “they shall bow down to thee with their face toward the earth,” that is, to the Church, or Christ in the Church, as the Fathers expound. For because Christ is the head of the Church, says Jerome, rightly is Christ adored in the body, and especially in his Vicar. Rightly therefore do we understand that that prophecy is literally fulfilled in emperors and kings kissing the feet of the Pontiff, their face toward the earth, which many have done in presence before him, others showed by letters their ready spirit, and especially Edward, king of England, in his epistle to Clement VI. With which accords another prophecy of the same prophet, 60.14: “The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee...and shall bow themselves down at the soles of they feet.”

13. It is therefore manifestly clear that from these sorts of notes of royal dignity nothing else can be collected than that to kings honor and obedience are due within their domain and in matter that is subject to them, which there is no one who denies; but it is not licit thence to infer anything that derogates from pontifical dignity. For all the titles befit the priest in a more excellent way and especially the Supreme Pontiff, as has been declared by the by. And besides, priests and apostles are said to be the foundations of the Church, the salt of the earth, the light of the world, the ministers of Christ, the stewards of the mysteries of God, the helpers of God, the parents or begetters of the sons of God, Galatians 4, 1 Corinthians 4; mediators between God and men, ambassadors of Christ and of God, 2 Corinthians 5 and Ephesians 6; key-bearers of the heavenly kingdom and accordingly possessed of the royal throne, not an earthly one, but an heavenly, as Chrysostom said, Homilia 5 ‘De Verb. Isaiae’. Lastly they are called pastors by Christ and by the apostles, namely of rational sheep, that is, leaders and rulers of the flock of Christ, as Ambrose said bk.2 on Luke and bk.1 De Dignit. Sacerdotal. ch.2. And the king of England could have attributed this name as well to a king, because it is said to David, 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 5.2: “Thou shalt feed my people Israel;” and hence he might take up a more apparent argument against us, because we collect the power of Peter from the word ‘feed’. But to this too we will easily reply that the word ‘feed’, since it is metaphorical, can signify diverse things, and has to be understood according to the subject matter and other places of Scripture and the interpretation of the Fathers. But in these ways it is manifest that, when said of David, it signified civil and temporal governing, as is in the same place, and in chapter 7, immediately explained, when it is said: “and thou shalt be a captain over Israel, etc.” But what was said of Peter signifies a higher and spiritual government, through the power of binding and loosing and the keys of the kingdom of heaven, to which temporal kings must be subject if they wish to attain the heavenly kingdom.

Chapter 25. Satisfaction is made to the other objection taken from the deeds of kings narrated in the Old Testament.

Summary. 1. Various actions of kings are brought in as objections. Response to them individually. Kings are bound by the right of nature to take away idols. 2. Jehosaphat brought the people back to God through the priests. 3. Why Jehosaphat sent princes along with priests. 4. Jehosaphat only designated priests who had from God the power of judgment. 5. The fourth action adduced by King James is solved. 6. Another action is added by the king. 7. It belongs to kings in their own way to take away abuses. 8. David did not touch the ark of God. 9. The king brings in as objections the deeds of Solomon in 1 Chronicles ch.28 and 2 Chronicles ch.6. These deeds display no spiritual power. 10. How the dedication of the temple could have been done by Solomon. 11. Two other deeds of the same order. A deed from 2 Chronicles ch.34 is of no importance for the cause.

1. For foundation of this objection the king tries to show from Scripture that kings among the people of the Jews “managed everything” that in some way pertains to ecclesiastical governance. Because, since it should not be believed that they usurped a jurisdiction not given by God (since kings both just and holy exercised those actions), it is rightly inferred that they did everything by royal power. Hence further it is also established that kings can do the same now in the Church of Christ, because neither did the ancient kings have any other power besides royal, nor is there now less power in kings than there was then.

To prove this foundation, therefore, he induces, to begin with, a place from 2 Chronicles 19 where three things are reported about King Jehosaphat. First, vv.3-4, “he took away the groves, he went out through the people and brought them back unto the Lord God of their fathers.” Again, that in Jerusalem, v.8, “he established the Levites and the priests and the princes of the families of Israel to judge judgment and the cause of the Lord for the inhabitants thereof.” But from these nothing else can be collected than that they took away the groves or the idols, which was also done by other kings of Israel, Asa 3 Kings [1 Kings] 15, and Hezekiah 4 Kings [2 Kings] 18. This, I say, pertains also to secular kings from their office. For to worship idols is contrary to natural reason, and contrary to the common good of the human city or republic. Hence also, in the absence of faith, the kings of the gentiles would be bound to this very thing, if they wished properly to use the natural light of reason; and by greater reason are faithful kings bound to this, whether in the Old Law or now in the Law of Grace. That action, therefore, is not proper to spiritual or ecclesiastical power but is common to each or belongs to each forum, as they say, because it conduces to the end of each. But, particularly as to the exercise of it, there is wont to be need of the power of kings, as was in fact the case among the people of Israel because of their hardness; and therefore are the kings greatly praised who destroyed idols; but because they introduced idols, or were negligent in abolishing them, they are greatly blamed and marked. From that action, therefore, nothing is collected, as will immediately be more declared of another similar case.

To this kind of action also has reference the fact that many of the kings of the Jewish people are blamed, for the fact they did not take away the high places. For whether those “high places” were certain idols placed on high mountains or hills for worship, or whether they were certain altars erected on various mountains or places outside the temple or the place of the tabernacle for also sacrificing to the true God, almost always the term is in Scripture taken in a bad sense, and it signifies a place in which sacrifice was made in an undue and superstitious way. Because either sacrifice was made to an idol or, if it was made to the true God, it was not according to his will, that is, not in the place deputed by him, that is, in the temple when already built or before in the place of the tabernacle. About which can be seen Abulensis on 3 Kings 3 q.3. In the way, then, that kings can and should overturn idols, the kings of Israel were also bound to taken away the “high places”, not as Pontiffs, but as executors and assistants of the Pontiffs. And for that reason the contrary negligence in them is especially blamed, because they were able more effectively to destroy them than the Pontiffs were by their teachings and precepts, and in addition because the history there was composed about kings in particular.

2. Almost the same thing can be considered in the second action. For when it is there said that Jehosaphat “went out again through the people...and brought them back unto God,” one must understand that he did it not of himself but through certain messengers or ministers, as is there commonly noted by interpreters. For the word ‘again’ indicates that he had before gone out on another occasion; but no other going out of Jehosaphat to his people is read of besides the one that is read in 2 Chronicles 17, namely vv.7-8: “in the third year of his reign he sent of his princes...to teach in the cities of Judah, and with them he sent Levites...and priests;” this very thing, then, he is said to have done again in ch.19, namely, that he sent them to go round all the cities to teach and instruct the people in the law of the Lord. But this action, although per se and by office it pertains to the Pontiffs and to the priests, yet it belongs in their own way also to kings to furnish their own mode of providence for it. For thus now too Catholic kings are said to send preachers to the nations subject to them, because they are sent at their will and request and under the protection of the same and at their expense. In this way, therefore, could Jehosaphat, by the providence of a faithful king who has zeal for God, go out by means of preachers and doctors to instruct the people, observing however the necessary mode and order according to the rite of that time. And therefore he is said to have sent priests and Levites, to whom that office per se pertained.

3. But that he also sent certain “of his princes” is not an obstacle, even if we admit that those princes were not of the tribe of Levi but were mere laymen, since they are distinguished from the Levites. This is, I say, no obstacle because either those laymen could be sent, not to teach, but to guard the Levites and priests and to restrain by their office the rebels and idolaters that there were then, and also, in case of need, to compel them to hear the word of God. Or certainly, although they too taught, there is no impropriety, because, although it does not pertain to laymen either to resolve doubts of the law or to define doctrine of the faith (for this was committed to priests, Deuteronomy 17), yet they could be learned and instructed in the law and in faith, so that they could instruct and exhort others; for this is neither evil from the nature of the thing nor is it found forbidden in the Old Law, especially since they did it by the consent of the priests. Just as in Acts 13, when Paul and Barnabas had entered a certain synagogue, the princes of the synagogue sent to them saying, v. 15: “Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on,” although however Paul was not of the tribe of Levi, and therefore he was reputed by the Jews to be a mere layman. And we have a like example about Christ in Luke 4. Thus the action of Jehosaphat, therefore, when rightly understood, did not pertain to proper ecclesiastical government but to royal protection and to defense and propagation of the faith, which office is also by canon right commended to Christian kings.

The third action was to establish judges. And there too Levites, priests, and princes are enumerated. Where also two like things need to be explained, namely how it pertained to the king to establish Levites and priests in that office, and how he could associate lay princes along with them. But each will easily be understood if the other words that are added later are considered, namely, v. 11, “Amariah the chief priest is over you in all matters of the Lord; and Zebadiah, the son of Ishmael, the ruler of the house of Judah, for all the king’s matters.” Where the office of the king and the office of the Pontiff are openly distinguished, and the latter is said to preside over the things that have regard to God, but the king or his vicar over those that have regard to men. Thus therefore, when priests, Levites, and princes are said to be established to do judgment, a double judgment is comprehended under that term, as Cajetan rightly noted on that place, namely a secular judgment and, as it were, an ecclesiastical one, or one that pertains to sacred things. And in this way is the second question easily answered; for it is not necessary to associate the judgments or the persons but to understand them with an appropriate partition, for to secular princes ought the secular judgment to be committed, but to Levites the ecclesiastical. And thus should it plainly be understood, since the Pontiff ought to have charge over the one judgment but the royal governor over the other, when and as it might be necessary.

4. Also for almost the same reason, although the king be said to have established both judges, there is no need to understand it in the same way about all of them, for of himself he established lay judges, both choosing them by his own virtue and giving them power, but not so the Levites and priests, but only by attaching and designating them to such office; for they had the power of exercising it from divine institution, whether immediately or through the Supreme Pontiff. Which is made plain from the other words: “Amariah the chief priest is over you in all matters of the Lord; and Zebadiah in other matters;” which, although they seem to be said in the same way, did, however, in respect of the Pontiff, not effect power, so to say, or confer it, but declared what pertained to the Pontiff by his own right, as is clear from Deuteronomy 17. But, power in respect of the civil governor flowed from the king, because it was especially established on the king’s behalf. Thus, therefore, although it be in one word said that he established these judges and those, nevertheless it must be understood about each with a distribution that is appropriate and in accord with law and due order. Princes, therefore, he made judges per se and by his own force, but Levites only in the manner of a per accidens cause by as it were attaching and nominating the persons, not however by creating them without the consent of the Pontiff. And in this way this action is of almost the same reason as the preceding, and does not pertain to proper jurisdiction of ecclesiastical governance, but only to a certain care and pious zeal of a faithful king, as was explained in the case of the others.

5. The king next adds another reason, which we can number in fourth place, namely, “to purge corruption and take away abuses.” But for proof of this he only adduces the place of 2 Kings, or as he puts it, 2 Samuel 5.6, where no mention is made of purging corruption or taking away abuses; but all that is reported is that, when David went up to Jerusalem to the Jebusites to attack the city, it was said to him by the inhabitants of the city: “Thou shalt not come in hither except thou take away the blind and the lame who say David will not come in hither [alt. thinking, David cannot come in hither].” But these words cannot in any way be applied to the reformation of morals or the taking away of abuses, because neither is the matter dealt with there, nor can it be thought that the Jebusites wanted to consult David on this matter under that metaphorical locution, as it were. Hence, although the words are obscure, and are therefore variously expounded by interpreters (as one may see in the Gloss, Theodoret, Abulensis, Carthusianus, Cajetan, and others on that place), nevertheless all agree that in those words the taking away of the blind and lame was only proposed to David as a necessary means for capturing the city. Either by those words other enemies of David among the Jebusites are signified, who rose up against him saying: ‘David will not come in hither,’ and they are called ‘blind’ because of the error of their mind, and ‘lame’ because they did not walk rightly with David. Or in fact the lame in body and the blind were placed on the walls of the city to defend it in mockery and derision of David (as seems more probable and more agreeable to the sense according to the Vulgate edition), but in neither sense is there anything of importance for the present cause, because the purging of corruption is not there dealt with. For although there is immediately subjoined that David proposed a reward to those who took away the blind and lame who hate the soul of David, and hence the proverb arose: “the blind and lame will not enter the temple,” the inference cannot thence plausibly be drawn that David, by taking away the blind and lame, wished to signify that the taking away of abuses and the purging of corruption pertained to himself; for what is this conclusion or connection or conjecture? Assuredly it can be nothing but pure divination.

6. To this action indeed pertains also the other that the king puts later, when he says of kings that: “they establish public reformers, having summoned and gathered for that end priests and laity promiscuously;” for the taking away of abuses and the purging of corruptions has particular regard to public reform. But for proof of those reforms he only adduces the place already dealt with from 2 Chronicles 17, whence all that is obtained is that Jehosaphat ordained or procured a certain reform by sending princes, priests, and Levites to reform the people by teaching and instructing them in the law of the Lord. But why laymen were sent along with Levites has already been made plain; nor is any gathering there read of that was made up promiscuously of laymen and Levites. Therefore just as we said that the sending was not an act of jurisdiction, so must we say it of this reform.

7. Wherefore (however it may be with proofs) we readily concede that it pertains to kings, within their own order and in the way appropriate for them, to take away abuses and purge their realm of corruptions. For, to begin with, if the corruptions and vices are against natural justice or just civil laws, or are against the peace of the republic, it directly pertains to the king to re-purge his subjects of such vices. But if the vices are in matter of religion or faith, after he has established through the same faith or through the Pontiffs (to whom it pertains to explain the will of God) that they are abuses and corruptions, it also pertains to the king to take away abuses of that sort, either by using punishment and coercion against his subjects, or also by carefully procuring that the ecclesiastical pastors apply their efforts to it at the same time, or finally by taking away with his strong arm the occasions for corrupt customs, just as we said a little above about the destruction of idols. For that was assuredly in that people a chief part of the reform of morals and the purging of corruptions. Although, therefore, it be expressly said in the Old Testament that kings took away abuses and purged corruptions, it can and should be understood in the aforesaid way and without any usurpation of ecclesiastical primacy. Just as now too Catholic and pious kings take away abuses and corruptions from their domains; nay, inferior princes too in their territories and private heads of families in their own home can in their own way and according to their own capacity expel corruptions from their home, and use all the providence, whether political or domestic, that can be exercised by them in respect of their subjects and that can be of service to that end.

To this head too has regard the example which the king adduces from 4 Kings [2 Kings] 18 about the bronze serpent broken up by Hezekiah. For (as I said in book 2 chapter 12) although that serpent was made by command of God and had a good signification, because of which it had at the beginning a good use, nevertheless afterwards it began to be for the Hebrews an occasion for scandal and ruin because of the ignorance of the people, and their blindness of mind, and their hardness of heart caused by corrupt custom. And therefore rightly could the king, by breaking up the serpent, take from the people the occasion for their ruin. For although it was made by God’s precept, God had not for that reason commanded it to be preserved; but it was kept in memory of the divine kindness by the prudent and pious decision of the preceding princes of that people; but after it began to be worshipped and adored in an irreligious way, it ought to have been broken up according to the law that command: “Break the statues, and cut down the groves.” And because this law was spoken not only to the priests but also to the kings, therefore Jehosaphat could break up the serpent, not by exercising priestly jurisdiction but by fulfilling the law.

8. In the fifth place we put the other actions reviewed by the king, which contribute to the cause much less than the preceding ones; such indeed is “to take the ark of God to an appointed place,” 1 Chronicles 13. For David, about whom the discussion is there, did not carry the ark nor did he touch it; for it was first licit only to Levites, and second only to priests, Numbers 4, 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 6, but not to David, although he was king. And therefore only for the sake of divine honor did he accompany the ark, which was licit not only for the king but to anyone among the people, as is said a little later in the same place, 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 6, that David and the whole house of Israel brought up the ark. And the like is contained in 3 Kings [1 Kings] 8. But it is added that King David danced before the ark. But what of it? Was that action proper to priests or to kings? Certainly it could seem to be more proper to men of an inferior condition. Hence a little later in the same place David was despised and blamed by Michal, not because he had performed an action of great dignity, but because he had been made, v.20. “as one of the vain fellows,” but he himself with great devotion and gratitude toward God replied, v.22: “I will play and be yet more vile than thus, and will be base in mine own sight.” David, therefore, did not deem that action to have been of priestly dignity, much less of pontifical, or above it, but to have been of great humility and reverence toward God, and Scripture portrayed the person of David to indicate this, but added, v.5: “David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord.”

9. Of the same order are certain deeds of Solomon, from which also a royal argument is taken, namely, “to build the temple, to dedicate it when built, and to honor it when consecrated by his presence.” But all these things kings do today even now, nay also other lesser pious and powerful men, and they are not for that reason reckoned to be exercising a work of ecclesiastical power, much less of primacy. For to build a temple is of itself just an act of religion that requires on the part of the builder, beside a pious will, only the means for the necessary expense, but on the part of God is required acceptance of it by himself or by his Vicars. But on that occasion God had shown his will sufficiently by a special revelation, and therefore on the part of Solomon only royal power and magnificence along with a pious and faithful will could have been wanting; therefore nothing else is rightly collected from that deed.

10. But dedicating a temple can signify two things. One is to consecrate it by some proper religious action; the other is to offer or give it to God by one’s own will externally manifested. In the first way, to dedicate temples pertains to priests or Pontiffs. Now in the dedication of that temple this action does not seem to have been other than either, on the part of men, offerings of sacrifices, which pertain to priests alone, as I will now explain, or, on the part of God, his presence or descent under the appearance of a cloud that filled the temple, to signify that the dedication pleased God, and therefore, as is said in 3 Kings [1 Kings] 8.11: “the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord;” which action was not of man but of divine honoring, to which King Solomon gave testimony saying, v.12: “The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness.” In this sense, therefore, King Solomon cannot be said to have dedicated the temple, nor is it so read about Solomon, nor does the king of England attribute this to him, since he only says that by his presence he honored the work of consecration. But in the second way it is rightly said that Solomon dedicated the temple. But thence no argument is taken; for anyone can offer a thing or his house for the divine cult. As it is said in Exodus 35.29: “every man and woman, whose heart made them willing to bring for all manner of work, which the Lord had commanded to be made by the hand of Moses.” And it is at once added: “The children of Israel brought a willing offering unto the Lord.” Thus therefore, in the said place of 3 Kings [1 Kings] 8.63 is it said: “The king and all the children of Israel dedicated the house of the Lord.” Next, as for what is added, that the king honored the work of consecration with his presence, it is clear that it was common to the whole people, and thus it makes nothing to the purpose.

But, to distinguish the mode of his presence, the actions that were performed in the dedication must be distinguished. The first was to bring the ark, the tabernacle, and the vessels of the sanctuary into the temple, and of this it is said, v.4: “those did the priests and the Levites bring up,” and it is added, v.5: “And king Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel, that were assembled unto him, were with him before the ark,” where the king is conjoined with the multitude and is distinguished from the priestly order. The second action was the offering of the sacrifices, and this was done without doubt by the priests as by the proper ministers; but it seems to be attributed both to the king and the people when it is said of them, v.5: “and they were sacrificing sheep and oxen, that could not be told nor numbered,” but they are understood to have been immolated by the priests, as is frequent in Scripture and also in the common way of speaking. And thus it is also said there, v.63: “Solomon offered a sacrifice of peace offering,” and again, v.64: “the king hallowed the middle of the court that was before the house of the Lord, for there he offered burnt offerings and meat offerings,” namely, through the priests, wherein no power above them is shown but rather an inferior status and condition. Hence now too kings, just as also other laymen, make offering through the priest. The third action was of praying, and this was also common to the whole people. Another action finally was to render an account to the people about the building and dedication of the temple, which indeed Solomon performed with royal authority and as the singular patron (and so to say) of the temple, yet he usurped nothing that was pontifical, nor did he show himself superior to the Pontiff. Therefore the whole of that deed pertains in no way at all to the cause about ecclesiastical and royal power or their comparison.

11. Next, for proving the same power of the king, two other deeds of almost the same order are brought forward, which have no greater force than the preceding ones. One is that “they had the book of the law, that was plucked out of the darkness, to the people,” from 4 Kings [2 Kings] 22. However it is reported in that place indeed that Hilkiyah the Pontiff said to Shaphan the scribe, v.8: “I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord,” and it is added that he gave it to Shaphan, who also read it and afterwards said to the king that Hilkiyah had given him a book, which Shaphan also read before the king. But that the king had the book recited to the people is not said in that chapter, but only that the king, greatly moved by the reading of the book, sent the priests to consult God about the thing. But in chapter 23 it is added that the priests reported something to the king that a certain prophetess had said, and it is added, vv.1-2: “The king sent, and they gathered unto him all the elders of Judah and of Jerusalem. And the king went up into the house of the Lord, and all the men of Judah and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem with him, and the priests, and the prophets, and all the people, both small and great; and he read in their ears all the words of the book of the covenant,” where Abulensis expounds ‘he read’, that is, he had it read; for he thinks that Shaphan the scribe read the book, which is not foreign to the use of that locution, as the king himself rightly proves from another similar use in chapter 22. Yet, nevertheless, from 2 Chronicles 34 it is collected rather that the king himself read the book of himself, for there it is expressly said, v.30: “he read in their ears all the words of the book.” But in this history what is there, I ask, that shows in the king a pontifical power or primacy? That he gathered the people, or read the book? Neither certainly. For to gather the people is not of itself a spiritual or ecclesiastical action, but indifferent, which could be done by royal authority for various ends. But that it should now be done for a spiritual end does not come from the spiritual power of the king but from his holy zeal and intention, for a faithful king aided by divine grace and faith can often use his royal and civil power for the spiritual good of his people, because, although he acts proximately in matter civil or indifferent, he can refer it to the said end. But to read the book was more a work of honoring, of humility, and of devotion than of power. And although he himself did not read but had it recited, he showed no greater authority, because it was the same to do it himself or to do it through Shaphan his scribe and minister, and because, although the book was sacred, the action of reading it is common to priests and laity.

Another deed is that kings “sometimes renewed the covenant between God and the people.” And the citation in the margin of the royal Apology is the place in Nehemiah or 2 Ezra 9 at the end. But in that place it is not said that the king renewed the covenant between God and the people, nor could it be said, because at that time there were no longer kings in Israel. Since, therefore, it was said at the beginning of the chapter, v.1: “The children of Israel were assembled with fasting and with sack-clothes;” and since later was added, vv.4-5: “Then stood up upon the stairs, of the Levites, Jeshua, and certain others...and said, Stand up and bless the Lord, etc.,” the conclusion is made at the end of the chapter, v.38: “We make a sure covenant, and write it; and our princes, Levites, and priests, seal unto it.” From which context it is very clear that the whole people, either of their own accord or moved by the words of the Levites, renewed the covenant, and therefore the princes in the name of the whole people along with the Levites and priests sealed unto the covenant. But if someone perhaps ponders that ‘princes’ (who it is likely were laymen) are put in the first place, he may notice that the Levites too are put before the priests, and hence he may conjecture that the later place in that order seems to be the more worthy, as often happens. Also mentioned in the same margin is the second book of Kings (for us the fourth) chapter 8 verse 4, but I find nothing in the whole chapter. Now we cannot deny that in chapter 23, treated of above, after the reading of the book of the covenant, there is added, v.3: “And the king stood by a pillar, and made a covenant before the Lord.” And a little later is added: “And all the people stood to the covenant.” But in this deed too nothing else shines forth than the piety and the holy zeal of the prince. For the renewal or making of the covenant was nothing other than a certain renewing of fidelity to God, or a sort of new promise of obedience to his law; but this any man can do, or any people, whether of their own accord or provoked by the example or word of another. In this way, then, did the aforesaid king do it, and in doing it he went before others, so that he might provoke them by his example and word. Hence rightly Cajetan there notes: “See how much good a good prince may be cause of.”

From all these examples and testimonies, then, no spiritual jurisdiction or special power in things pertaining to God is shown to have existed in the kings at the time of the Old Law. But it is very well shown that a good and faithful king should be a defender of divine faith and of true religion, and that he will diligently see to it that all errors and superstitions against doctrine true and approved by the Church either should have no entrance or, where it may have been found, should be expelled. This fidelity, then, toward God was shown by the aforesaid good kings and was, in the New Law, observed with the greatest piety by Constantine, Charlemagne, Charles V, and other Catholic kings, although they did not acknowledge themselves parents of the Church, or prelates, or superior to prelates, but sons, and subjects, and protectors.

Chapter 26. Satisfaction is made to the argument taken from the comparison of the king and the Pontiff.

Summary. Objection of the king from the deed of Solomon. 2. The deed of Solomon indicates in him no spiritual power. 3. Even in the Old Testament the Pontiff was superior to the king. King Uzziah was punished because he tried to undertake the office of the priests. 4. The preeminence of the Pontiff is shown by reason of his greater dignity. 5. From the deed of Solomon it is not sufficiently collected even that his civil power was above the Pontiff. 6. An argument taken from the old Pontificate over to the new is nothing in the present cause. 7. Instance of heretics. Response. 8. The argument of the adversaries is turned back against them.

1. After the rest of the deeds of the kings of Israel, the king of England introduces a deed of Solomon, “who took authority from Abiathar so that he was not a priest of the Lord,” as he himself relates; and hence he collects that the king was superior to the Pontiff, so that he thence concludes that the same is to be observed in the Church of Christ. This argument is founded on the place of 3 Kings [1 Kings] 2 where Solomon commanded the Pontiff Abiathar to go as it were into exile, saying, v.26: “Get thee to Anathoth, unto thine own fields; for thou art worthy of death; but I will not at this time put thee to death, because thou bearest the ark of the Lord God etc.” And later the conclusion is drawn, v.27: “So Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord.” Now Solomon is never reprehended in Scripture for this deed; nay in ch.3 is added, v.3: “And Solomon loved the Lord, walking in the statutes of David his father; only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places.” Which exception, of whatever sort it was (which is not now important), shows that up to that time Solomon kept the other precepts and consequently did not sin in that deed. Rather, some commend the clemency of Solomon in that deed because, although Abiathar was worthy of the penalty of death, Solomon allowed him his life because of the office of priest which he had exercised and because he had been partaker in the labors of his father, and he commuted the punishment to the milder one of exile and dismissal. But for that same punishment to have been justly inflicted it is necessary that Solomon had jurisdiction and superior power over the Pontiff; therefore the king was then superior to the Pontiff. Which Abulensis qq.28 & 31 admits on this place among others who were guided by this argument, and it was the opinion of St. Bonaventure in his tractate De Ecclesiast. Hierarch. p.2 sect.1 at the end, and on Sentences 4 distinct.24, in his exposition of the literal sense, which is also handed on by St. Thomas, if the little work 20 is his, bk.1 De Regimine ch.14 at the end, whom also many other grave authors have followed. From this fact, then, the king of England infers that the king is also superior to the Pontiff in the New Law, and hence that he has the primacy in his own realm.

2. This objection indeed is founded on a thing very dubious, namely whether in the Old Law the Pontiff was exempt from the jurisdiction of the king as to offenses and the judgment and punishment of them, which here we do not wish to dispute, because we do not think that a truth of the faith, which is what we are teaching, depends on that controverted question among Catholics. Especially because, as I have often said, the question of the exemption of clerics from the jurisdiction of laymen in temporal affairs is altogether diverse from the question of primacy and power in spiritual affairs. Now, from that deed can at most be collected that the Pontiff in the Old Law was not exempt from the royal jurisdiction as to secular or civil or criminal tribunals. But one may not thence infer that King Solomon had any jurisdiction in spiritual affairs or in things pertaining to God, because that cause was a temporal one. For the crime which Abiathar is supposed to have committed was one of treason because of his conspiracy with Adonijah against Solomon. Again, the punishment of exile was temporal. But dismissal from the pontifical office either followed from the prior punishment of exile or was only a certain separation from the use of that office; which could then more easily be done, because two people then carried out that office, namely Zadok and Abiathar, and thus Abiathar could for a just cause be removed so that Zadok alone bore the pontificate. And perhaps, just as the sacrifices of that time were carnal and the ceremonies are called by Paul, Hebrews 9.1, “ordinances of divine service and a worldly sanctuary;” thus that pontificate was not so spiritual that someone could not be deprived of it for the crime of treason by the same majesty he offended, if jurisdiction was not lacking to it. For if it could deprive him of life, as those words indicate, “for thou art worthy of death,” what wonder that it could deprive him of the pontificate?

3. But I add further that, even with this concession or permission, it does not follow that the pontificate at that time was not simply superior to the king in dignity and power. The proof is that, to begin with, those functions were altogether distinct and per se and directly uncombined. For we are supposing about the king that he had supreme power in temporal things, which is simply true about direct power, whether it extended to priests and the Pontiff or not, from which question we are now abstracting, as I said. Next, to the Pontiff was committed power and administration of spiritual things, or of things that pertained to God and to the doctrine of the faith and to declaration of law, as is clear from Deuteronomy 17.8-12: “If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment...etc.” up to “And the man that will do presumptuously and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the Lord thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die etc.” And therefore in 2 Chronicles 19 he is said to preside in things that are referred to God. In these things, then, the king could not introduce himself, as is sufficiently proved from the deed of King Uzziah, who, when he tried to exercise the ministry of the priest by burning incense on the altar of incense, was struck with leprosy until the day of his death, as is related in 2 Chronicles 26. Which deed is expounded at large by Chrysostom Homilia 4 ‘De Verbis Isaiae’ etc., who addresses the king: “Stay within your limits; the limits of the king are one thing, the limits of the priest another.”

Now that among those two dignities the pontifical was simply greater is subjoined in express words by Chrysostom when he says: “This kingdom” namely the sacerdotal “is greater than that,” that is, the temporal. “For a king is not made plain from the things that are seen here; nor should his value be estimated by the gemstones that are affixed to him, nor from the gold with which he is clothed. He indeed has been allotted the things on earth to administer; but the right of the priest comes down from above.” Which he pursues at large later. And although he is often and in many matters speaking of the priesthood of the New Law, yet he also speaks of the Old, hence he later infers: “This principate is greater, wherefore the king submits his head to the hand of the priest, and everywhere in the Old Scripture priests anoint kings." Hence again Chrysostom on Psalms 113 [115] when expounding the words, vv.9-10: "O Israel, trust thou in the Lord; he is their help and their shield; O house of Aaron, trust in the Lord; he is their help and their shield," he thence collects the excellence of the priesthood, when he says: "He divided speech between Israel and the priestly class, because a private man is not to be compared with a priest, but the latter far surpasses him." Therefore he thinks that it was for the sake of greater honor that the priestly class was divided from the rest of the people of the children of Israel, under which people kings are manifestly comprehended. And many collect the same excellence from the fact that in Leviticus 4 a nobler victim is commanded to be offered for the Pontiff than for the King, for that it was an indication of his more excellent dignity is noted by Philo, bk. De Victimis, and he is followed by Theodoret, Procopius, and others. And other indications of this excellence are wont to be taken from Exodus 19, Numbers 27 & 35.

4. The reason indeed for the greater dignity can be taken from the matter of each office; for the pontificate, even the legal one, was proximately ordered to God and did not touch upon men except in their order to God; the kingship on the contrary, however, deals wholly with men, and as far as concerns itself, or by the force of its object, it does not touch upon God except as is expedient for the good of men and of the republic. Hence the matter of the pontificate is of a higher order and was even then in some way spiritual. And next, just as the virtue of religion is higher than the virtue of justice, so the pontificate, which the functions of religion regard, is of more worth than the kingship, whose function it is to deal with justice. For in the Old Law too did this reason hold place. And by almost the same proportion his excess not only in dignity but also in power can be shown. For that the Pontiff then also had his own power, not only for administering, but also for giving command and passing judgment in controversies about the law and about doctrine, cannot be denied from the places cited in Deuteronomy 17 and 2 Chronicles 19. But the fact that his power was supreme in its own order is proved by the words of Deuteronomy 17: "And the man that will do presumptuously..." And from the same words can be collected that they also include the king because they are universal; therefore the king too was subject to this power of the Pontiff, and was bound to stand by the Pontiff's definitions and decrees and to obey his precepts in his own area; therefore, in this respect, the Pontiff was superior to the king. But if perhaps the Pontiff was subject to the king as to temporal or civil crimes, and therefore in diverse respects and on diverse foundations they had a mutual relation of inferior and superior to each other, nevertheless, because of excess in matter and end, the power of the Pontiff can be called simply greater and superior.

5. I add in addition that from Solomon's deed (as far as it is of present concern) is not sufficiently collected that the king had jurisdiction over the Pontiff in a temporal or criminal cause (however it be with whether it can be proved from some other source). The proof is, first, that many think that Solomon in his capacity as prophet and not as king deposed Abiathar, as Theodoret says on that place q.9 and Procopius on the same, and several of the moderns. And they base themselves on the subject words: "So Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord; that he might fulfill the word of the Lord, which he spake concerning the house of Eli in Shiloh." For Abiathar was of the seed of Eli to whom God said through Samuel, 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 2, that it would sometime come about that the pontificate would be taken from his family because of the sins of his sons; which words were perhaps fulfilled in Abiathar. Now Solomon, understanding that fact by the prophetic spirit and moved by divine instinct, committed to execution what God had threatened. But if this be so, nothing can be collected from that place about the ordinary power or jurisdiction of kings over Pontiffs, because this was extraordinary. And this response can easily be sustained but with difficulty proved; because the words “that he might fulfill etc.” are frequently said even if God’s threats are fulfilled through evil ministers and deaths or unjust acts of violence. Because those words do not give a reason that may move a man to action but one that moves God to allow, or they signify the sequence of one thing after another, not a cause. Just as it is said about the soldiers who crucified Christ that they divided his garments “that it might be fulfilled etc.,” Matthew 27.35. Yet nevertheless the response is probable which we will by the authority of Innocent III confirm in the following book and which is defended by Cardinal Bellarmine both from other places of Scripture and from consideration of the Hebrew word, in ch.15 against Barclay.

But others do not hesitate to say that Solomon acted unjustly in that deed, by usurping a power he did not have. But I dare not affirm it because of the words of Scripture that I mentioned in chapter 3, and because in the ancient Fathers and expositors I do not find that deed numbered among Solomon’s sins or charged to his guilt. Wherefore if he had neither jurisdiction nor a special instinct or revelation, I would rather excuse him by saying he banished or separated Abiathar, who had conspired against him, not in punishment of him but as consulting his own defense and the preservation of peace and of the kingdom. For if Abiathar had conspired against him and was conjoined with Adonijah in friendship, Solomon could rightly be afraid that, after the death of Adonijah, Abiathar, who was in the office of Pontiff and in Jerusalem, might work something to his ruin. Therefore such circumstances could then occur that the king might prudently and without sin coerce the Pontiff in that way, even if he had no jurisdiction over him.

6. But I add lastly that even if we grant (which we are not now conceding) that the Pontiff in the Old Law was not exempt from the coercive power of the king, no argument is thence taken for the time of the Law of Grace. For the power of kings in the Law of Grace is not in itself greater than it was in the Old Law, for in both it is of a merely civil or natural order and origin, although in the Old Law it was conferred in a more special way by God. But the pontifical dignity and power is far greater and of a higher order, as is sufficiently clear from what has been hitherto said and as was said in our tractate De Legibus. And therefore no argument can be made from the old Pontiff to the Vicar of Christ in things that pertain to subjection and imperfection. For to the Mosaic Pontiff were not given the keys of the kingdom of heaven nor the power of binding and loosing, whose action on earth is held ratified in heaven, which were given to the Supreme Pontiff, the Vicar of Christ, along with a far greater supreme government of the Church than the old Pontiff had for ruling the Synagogue, to whom it is nowhere said: “feed my sheep,” as was said to Peter. Therefore subjection to a temporal prince is far more in conflict with the pontificate of the New Law than it was in conflict with it in the Old Law, and accordingly from deeds of the Old Law no argument to the New Law can be drawn. Besides, the pontificate of that law pertained to its ceremonies, which have already wholly ceased, and a new institution has been made, according to which supreme power and exemption has been given to the Vicar of Christ.

7. But adversaries urge against us a demand to display this institution from Scripture, and they use against us the second mode of arguing from the Scriptures which we above called negative, namely that nowhere is it found written down in the New Testament that the Roman Pontiff has primacy or power over kings, especially one that extends in any way to temporal things. But, if what we have so far said is weighed, we will not only reply easily to this argument but we also turn it plainly against the king of England. For first, about what concerns power and primacy over kings, it is already clear from what was said above, where we proved how this power is collected from Scripture and the words of Christ; nor is it necessary that the conclusion be express in Scripture, but it is enough and more than enough that it be made clear and firm by tradition and definition of the Church. But as to what pertains to exemption, besides what is manifestly collected from that superior power itself, it will in the next book also be proved from the words of Christ and the like tradition of the Church.

8. To the negative argument, therefore, we deny that the power of the Roman Pontiff over kings is not proved from Scripture. But we turn back the argument in this way: the primacy of the king of England is not proved from Scripture and according to his faith nothing is to be believed which is not contained in Scripture; therefore he is in conflict with himself by asserting it and by compelling his subjects to believe it. The proof of the major is that it is not made clear from the Old Testament, because all the testimonies brought forward do not prove it even about the state of the Old Law, as we have seen; and were they to prove it about that period of time, they would effect nothing for the state of the New Law, as was also shown. Nor can it even be proved from the New Testament; for all the testimonies adduced by the king are of no moment, as we have shown. Hence his chaplain (as I find related) admitted that the foundation of that primacy must be looked for in the Old Testament, and no trace or example of it is found in the New. And the same argument can be made against the exemption of the king of England from the coercive jurisdiction of the Pontiff, for the foundation for that, if there could be any, would certainly have to be looked for in the Old Testament; now it has none in the New but is rather in conflict with the general words of Christ, “whatever you bind” and “feed my sheep.”

Chapter 27. Satisfaction is made to other objections taken from the Councils.

Summary. 1. First objection. 2. Solution. 3. Second objection from certain provincial Councils. It is solved. 4. As regard the Council of Tours. As regard the Council of Chalons. 5. As regard the Council of Mainz. 6. As regard the Council of Reims. 7. Solution.

1. The king of England adds further in his Preface p.22: “The aforesaid power over kings usurped by the Pontiffs is in conflict with the Councils and the Fathers;” and he says he has demonstrated it in his Apology. Indeed in the Apology itself on p.29 he introduces, to begin with, the Council of Arles that met in the time of Charlemagne, which thus concludes at the end of its chapters: “These things which we perceived to be worthy of emendation we have noted with the greatest brevity possible, and we have decreed them to be presented to the Lord Emperor, requesting his clemency so that if anything here is deficient his providence might supply it; if anything is contrary to reason his judgment might emend it; if anything is arranged reasonably his help, with the aid of divine clemency, might perfect it.” From which words the king of England wishes to collect that the Fathers of that Council recognized the emperor as judge and superior over them and over their decrees.

2. Yet they themselves thought nothing of the kind nor reckoned that the emperor thought it. For in the prologue of the same Council they thus speak of the emperor: “He arranges with watchful urgency the strengthening of the state of the Church of God.” And later: “Beseeching and imploring all the priests of God to instruct with pious preaching the churches which he has undertaken to rule, etc.” And at the end of the aforesaid words they do not ask that their decrees be confirmed by the emperor but that they be perfected by his help, that is, committed to execution. Therefore they recognize that the governance of churches is entrusted, not to the emperor, but to themselves; indeed they indicate two offices of the emperor in these sorts of things, namely to exhort and to assist the pastors of the Church in their governance; which, as I have often said, does not pertain to jurisdiction but to piety and human power or authority. There is also to be noted in those words that there is in them no talk about things of faith but about decrees pertaining to moral practice, as is clear from the words, “things which we perceived to be worthy of emendation we have noted with the greatest brevity possible.” So because there were in them many decrees that concern laymen together with clerics, as is clear from chs. 4, 5, 12, 13, 15, 22, 23, they therefore acted prudently by presenting them to the emperor so that, aided by his authority, they might be able more easily to commit them to execution. But the remaining words are words of urbanity, modesty, and humility, as is clear from the use of the like words; and so it is vain to collect from them a proper subjection or jurisdiction.

3. Secondly the king objects, “six General Councils altogether handed themselves over to Charlemagne.” Now he names the Councils of Frankfurt, Arles, Tours, Chalons, Mainz, and Reims. But, to begin with, I do not see why he calls these Councils general since almost all were provincial, and some were at most national; next I find nothing in the said Councils on account of which they may be said to have “altogether handed themselves over to Charlemagne.” And, in the first place, the Council of Frankfurt was without doubt not general; for, as is clear from the title of the letter of the same Council to the prelates of Spain, only the bishops of Germany, Gaul, and Aquitaine were present at it, and no mention is made of legates of the Apostolic See or of confirmation by it. But about Charlemagne is only said, in the title of the book of the sacred syllabus, that the Council was held in the presence of the most clement prince Charles. And there Charles is placed, not as author, but as exhorter and defender, nor as part of the Council but as an honorific witness. And although at the beginning of the book of the sacred syllabus Charles proposes to the Council the necessity of extirpating a certain error, yet afterwards it is only the Council which teaches the truth in the discussion of the book, whose author is said to have been Paulinus, and he at the end of the book thus speaks: “But we, lords and most dear brothers, following the sound doctrine of faith of the Fathers who preceded us, rejecting altogether all the ravings of frivolous men, let us with our heart have belief unto justice and with our mouth make confession unto salvation, etc.” But afterwards it prays only for Charlemagne “that God may protect him and defend him, etc.” and later it prays him to do battle for the love of Christ against visible enemies. Nor do I find there any word whereby the Council “altogether handed themselves over to Charles.” The king of England would have acted more satisfactorily if in the acts of the Council he had considered that the same Charles, in his epistle to Elipandus and the other Spanish priests, calls himself, not father or primate of the Church, but son and defender of the holy Church of God. Again he could have noticed that the Fathers of the Council, when they pronounced their sentence at the end of the book, at once added: "With reservation in everything to the privilege of right of the Supreme Pontiff, our Lord and Father Adrian, most blessed Pope of the first See." Again he might note what they say later, "and of blessed Peter, the first Pastor of the Church." And again he can note that only the synod of the bishops wrote the doctrine of the faith to Elipandus and others; but later Charles wrote as protector and defender of the synod.

4. About the Council of Arles we have already spoken [chapter 9]. Now in the Council of Tours nothing else is found except that in its preface they praise Charlemagne and affirm that they have met at that place on his most salutary exhortations, but at the end they conclude in these words: "These things we have aired in our meeting; but as to how next our most pious Prince will be pleased to manage them, we his faithful servants are with cheerful heart ready for his command and will." For what else were religious and prudent and modest bishops going to say to a pious emperor who was, with holy zeal, attending only to those things that pertained to the good of the Church, not as governor of the Church, but as son and defender? Now in the Council of Chalons there are contained at the beginning words similar to those treated of above from the Council of Arles, and so there is no need to make the same repetition. For in that Council only morals were dealt with, and among its decrees are found also some things that are common to the laity, as chs. 18, 21, and especially 43; where, for that purpose, the opinion of the emperor is waited on for applying a remedy to certain public and common vices. Nor do I find any word in that Council whereby it altogether handed itself over to the emperor. But there is in ch. 66 only a decree that all should pray unceasingly for the king, which is a far different thing. Rather an addition is made there that the Council said that the warnings of the Scriptures and the decrees of the canons needed to be examined with careful search and carried out with like observance, wherein is commended, after the Scriptures, not the imperial but the ecclesiastical authority. Nay, rather the subjection of the Council to the emperor, which the king of England makes much of, is repugnant to chapters 28 & 37 of the same Council. For in the former is said that, concerning the degrees of consanguinity that prohibit or nullify marriages, the ecclesiastical canons are to be consulted, not the king. While in the latter is said that the canons of the Councils are to be read and understood by the priests, because priests should live and teach by them.

5. Almost the same judgment holds of the Council of Mainz, for although in the preface of the Council the Fathers treat the emperor with the same honor and refer all things to him as with the preceding Councils, nevertheless they make sufficient distinction there between the powers, and to the laity they commit controversies about mundane laws "and justicial matters of the multitude" (as they say), and bestow proper honor on each person and state, "according," they say, "to the word of blessed Peter (1 Peter 2.17), the first Pastor of the Church." Hence they add later: "In addition it also seemed fitting to us that priests be honored with the legitimate and undisturbed right of the Church of God; of whom the Lord says (Luke 10.16): 'He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me; and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me.' And the Apostle says to the Hebrews 13.17: 'Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls as they that must give account.”” But later in ch.6, when they were making certain dispositions about sons disinherited by their parents, they add, since they seemed to be touching on civil matters: “As far as pertains to us or to our power;” and to the emperor they say: “But anything perhaps that is anywhere found to be outside our office, we dare to urge your clemency to correct it.” There they make open disposition in spiritual and pious causes by their own power; but where secular help is necessary they request it from the emperor. And thus in ch.7 about the causes of the poor they say: “Let this be altogether corrected by your command.” And in ch.8 they speak very well about each power.

6. Finally, in the Council of Reims honorific mention of the emperor is indeed made at the beginning, but nothing is attributed to him which seems to concede him any jurisdiction in the Council. Rather, when it is said at the beginning (which was said also in the four prior Councils) that “the meeting was convened by the most pious Caesar, Lord Charles, in the manner of the former emperors,” there is an addition made as it were in clarification of that manner: “on the order of Ulfarius, archbishop of the same holy See;” a fact we will explain a little later in the case of the General Councils as well. For these five, about which we have spoken, were without doubt only provincial Councils, and therefore the proper convoking of them, along too with power of jurisdiction, belonged to the archbishop, but it is attributed to the emperor as to one petitioning for it and cooperating with it through his temporal support.

Third, the king brings in as objection the first four General Councils. “Nay,” he says, “the other four too, thus commonly called, subjected themselves in everything to the prudence and piety of the emperor. So much so that the Council of Ephesus inculcates with sufficient clarity that they came together summoned by the wise word, the will, sanction, and mandate of the emperor.” He introduces in addition words of the same Council in its epistle to the Augustuses, where the Fathers say that “they all take flight together as suppliants to the dominion of his piety, so that what they have carried out against Nestorius and those who agree with him might have the emperor’s strength.”

7. However, the king hides in the first four Councils all the things that show the primacy and power of the Roman Bishop over the emperors and over the General Councils, and he only snatches on one word or another that commends in its degree the imperial dignity, and that is readily understood from other places. And since the king adduces nothing in particular about the Council of Nicea, and since we mentioned many things above, there is no need to add anything here, especially since it is well known how much the emperor Constantine deferred in that Council to the bishops and to their power.

From the 1st Council of Constantinople too the king notes nothing, although however he should not ignore what the Fathers of that Council wrote to Pope Damasus, namely: “By the mandate of the letters which were sent last year by your reverence after the Council of Aquilea to the emperor Theodosius, we prepared ourselves to make the journey as far as Constantinople, and we carried the consent of the bishops along with us about celebrating this Council;” Theodoret bk.5 Hist. ch.9. Behold how the emperors concur in convening Councils, namely by asking and requesting from the Pontiff a mandate for convoking them or, when they have obtained it, by procuring its execution, or by giving commands in virtue of it.

From the Council of Ephesus too might the king note the words of the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian which they put in their epistle to the Council. For when they sent Count Candidianus to the Council so that he might be as it were the protector of the Council and the guardian of the peace, they subjoin: "But by the law and on the condition that he have no common share in questions and controversies that concern dogmas of the faith; for it is impious for him who is not inscribed in the catalogue of the most holy bishops to involve himself in ecclesiastical business and consultation." These words are contained in vol.1 of that Council ch.32. And in ch.29 there is contained an epistle of Cyril to Pope Celestine, where he asks that, in the cause of faith that was then being dealt with against Nestorius, he might clearly expound by letters his judgment to Macedonia and the bishops of the entire East. And from vol.2 it is clear, especially from ch.13 on, that nothing in that synod was done without the authority of the Pontiff. Besides, in the acts preparatory to the Council of Chalcedon there is contained an epistle of the Augustuses Valentinian and Marcian to Pope Leo, to whom they thus speak: "We thought it right at the beginning with sacred letters to address Your Holiness, who posses the principate in the episcopacy of the divine faith, inviting and asking Your Holiness to pray to the eternal divinity for the stability and status of our empire, so that we may obtain that intention and desire, insofar as, once the impious error has been taken away by the celebration of a synod on your authority, there might be the greatest peace among all the bishops of the Catholic Faith." In which words I put very great weight on the words "on your authority;" for by them, along with the preceding ones, is very well explained what the emperor or what the Pontiff confers in convoking a Council, namely that the emperor confers intercession and the Pontiff authority. And the same words suffice to explain the words of the Council of Ephesus about the convoking of it by the emperor. Indeed the things that the Fathers of the same Council (see vol.4 of the same Council ch.14) wrote to Theodosius after the Council's definition, begging that the things done and defined thereat might receive his strength, have the same sense as explained above, namely that the Fathers asked them to protect and defend the faith by their authority. Hence later in another epistle to the Augustuses, ch.16, they exhort them to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors, so that, they say, "just as each of them obeyed the synods of the holy Fathers celebrated at the time of their rule, and fortified the sanctions of the Fathers with their laws, and showed by their decrees with what observance they deferred to them; so you also, etc." Where they clearly teach that it belongs to an emperor to obey and observe the decrees of General Councils, but then to fortify them with his laws and to provide for them to be carried out. On which point can also be read the 3rd Roman Synod under Symmachus, where not only the Fathers but also king Theodoric attribute to the Pontiff the power of convening Councils, although he often use it at the request of emperors and kings.

Chapter 28. Satisfaction is made to the testimonies of the Fathers that the king objects. Summary. 1. A first testimony from Augustine. Nothing favors the king. 2. A second from Tertullian. Which however only commends the supreme power of kings in temporal affairs. 3. A third from Justin. 4. A fourth from Ambrose. The true mind of Ambrose. 5 A fifth from Optatus. Its true sense. 6. A sixth from Gregory. 7. Response of Baronius for the year 593 nn.14ff., and of Bellarmine in response to the king of England. 8. Other testimonies of the Fathers commending the imperial dignity, and the explication of them. 9. In the testimony of Cyril, already related in the previous paragraph, the same holy Doctor insinuates that there is another dignity superior to the regal.

1. The king objects further in his Apology p.26 certain opinions of the Fathers. The first is from Augustine on Psalm 124 [125], where he says that Julian, although he was unjust, an infidel, and an idolater, nevertheless was true temporal lord, and Christians were obliged to obey him. But who denies this? For it was expressly proved by us above that infidels too can be true kings and lords, and that they are to be obeyed in things just and licit. Which we also say is true of an heretical and schismatic king, as long as he is not deposed or deprived of his kingdom by the Church. And thus did Augustine speak. But if the king says that he cannot be deposed, he has to prove it from somewhere else; for Augustine certainly does not say it; and in other places he generally teaches that it is just for heretics to be compelled to the faith by tortures and punishments. But if the king takes an argument therefrom that that most impious apostate [sc. Julian] was not deposed by the Church, we reply that the argument is of no moment, for the Church did not omit to do it because it could not rightly do it, but because it was vain to attempt it, because the Church could not then carry it out.

2. The second testimony is from Tertullian, bk. Ad Scapulam ch.2: "A Christian is enemy to no one, much less to the emperor; and since he knows him to have been established by his God, he must both love him, and revere him, and honor him, and wish him safety along with the whole Roman Empire as long as the age lasts, for so long will it last. Therefore, in the way that is licit for us and as it is expedient for him, we honor the emperor, as a man second to God and consequent to whatever is from God, and less only to God. This he himself too wishes. For thus is he greater than all when he is less only to God." But we too used this testimony and another from Tertullian above to prove the supreme power of temporal kings; and nothing else can with any foundation be collected from those words. For that he calls the emperor "a man second to God" he said for this reason, that in the order of temporal governance the emperor or supreme king is immediately under God, and he recognizes no other superior in that order. And in the same sense must be taken that he calls him "less only to God", namely in his own empire, obedience, and purely civil and temporal governance. For it is otherwise manifest that one temporal king or emperor can be greater than another in power and domain, even if one is not subject to the other. And by greater reason is the Pontiff greater than the emperor, because he exceeds him not only in dignity and domain but is also superior to him in another more excellent order, and in order to a higher end. And in this way there is place for the limitation which Tertullian applies in the same words: "in the way that is licit for us and as it is expedient for him we honor the emperor," namely in the things that are subject to his power and that are not repugnant to God and his faith. For when the emperor goes to excess in these and offends, he is no longer using legitimate power and, if he be a Christian, he has as such a superior by whom he may be corrected.

3. Nor is more proved by the words that in the third place he adduces from Justin Apolog. 2 Pro Christianis, which we also treated of above, and they prove nothing other than that the emperor and king, as long as he is king, is true lord whom one must obey in things that are subject to him. But no one will doubt that a king can either renounce his kingship or lose it, and also then his lordship and power, and that consequently also the obligation to obey him ceases.

4. Fourth, he adduces the words of Ambrose, Orat. contra Auxentium de Basilic. non Tradend. at the beginning: "I will be able to grieve, I will be able to weep, I will be able to groan; against arms, soldiers, the Goths too my tears are arms. Such are fortifications of the priest. In other wise I neither may nor can resist.” By which words the king of England seems to want to conclude that Pontiffs cannot resist the unjust attempts of schismatic kings with power, but only with word, with exhortation, and with prayer. But the mind of Ambrose was far different, which he sufficiently showed when he resisted Theodosius not only with prayer but also with command and spiritual power. Ambrose’s opinion, then, was that it was not the office of the priest to take up sensible and material arms against a tyrant emperor or rebel, and to resist him with camps of soldiers. And nevertheless he does not deny that the Church has power whereby to resist him; but because this is often ineffective against the incorrigible and contemptuous, therefore, he says, the last refuge of a priest lies in tears and prayers to God. Now the king of England could have more carefully weighed the words that Ambrose put at the end of his oration: “What is more honorable than that an emperor should be called a son of the Church? Which, when it is said, is said without sin, is said with grace. For a good emperor is within the Church, not above the Church.” Therefore, he will be able as a son to be corrected by a father, and as an inferior by a superior, because if he is not superior assuredly he must be inferior; for two heads cannot be equal without schism. And there is a like place, to be expounded in the same way, in Chrysostom De Verbis Isaiae hom.4: “For a priest’s job is only to rebuke, and to give frank warning; not to take up arms, not to hold the shield, not to brandish the lance, not to draw the bow, not to shoot the darts, but only to rebuke and to give frank warning.” For under the word ‘rebuke’ must be understood to be included whatever pertains to ecclesiastical correction, and then also is in place what the same Chrysostom put as preface: “Where the priest is contemned, and the dignity of the priest trodden under foot, nothing else besides could the priest have done, (he addresses God:) ‘I have furnished what belonged to my office; I can do nothing more; come to the aid of the priest, because he is trodden under foot, etc.’” Now he is treating of Azariah, who resisted Uzziah as much as he could, and it must be proportionally understood of the Pontiff of the New Law.

5. In the fifth place the king adduces the words of Optatus, bk.3 Contra Parmen.: “Above the emperor there is only God, who made the emperor.” But these words are to be expounded in the same way as the like ones of Tertullian, namely that the emperor is in his order supreme under God, which does not exclude a subordination he has as a Christian to a spiritual power. And that this was Optatus’ intention is sufficiently manifest from the other places of his mentioned above, and from the occasion he then had for guarding the imperial dignity. For he was acting there against Donatus, who was despising the laws of the emperors, and he says: “What has the emperor to do with a Church” that, as he says, “had its mind against the precepts of the Apostle Paul?” About which precepts he says later that they are to be kept “even if the emperor lives as a gentile.” The thing he says, then, that only God is greater than the emperor, he understands also of a gentile emperor, about whom he could not be thinking that he had primacy or spiritual power over the Church; he was speaking, therefore, of the emperor only as to temporal power.

6. Sixth, he inflicts greater violence on the words of Gregory in bk.2 epist.51 indict.2, otherwise ch.100, which is to the emperor Maurice about the law he had passed that soldiers were not to be received into the monastery, which was unjust and contrary to the supernatural end; and yet he did not dare to revoke it by that indirect power which we attribute to him; he did not therefore recognize that power in himself. Hence, after

Gregory had addressed the emperor in words of submission and humility, calling himself “his Lord, and servant of his piety,” then, showing the injustice of the law, he says among other things: “But I, who spoke these things to my lords, what am I but dust and ashes? But yet because I consider this constitution to tend against the Lord God, I cannot be silent before lords.” And nevertheless at the end of the epistle he thus concludes: “I indeed, subject to command, have had the same law transmitted through the several parts of the earth; and because the law is itself not at all in concord with the Almighty God, behold I have by a page of my suggestion made announcement to the most serene lords. On each side, then, I have done what I owed, who have both to the emperor shown obedience and on God’s behalf not kept silent about what I thought.”

7. We reply that it has been sufficiently shown above what St. Gregory thought about the power of the emperors over the Church, since on the fifth penitential Psalm, otherwise 101 [102], about the words, v.8: “Mine enemies reproach me all the day,” he has against the emperor Maurice left written: “So greatly does he extend the temerity of his madness that the head of the churches, the Roman Church, he makes claim of for himself and usurps the right of earthly power over the mistress of the nations.” And later on another verse, v.25: “Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth,” he numbers the same Maurice among the persecutors of the Church, saying: “What is Nero? What Diocletian? What lastly this fellow, who at this time persecutes the Church?” From this place, therefore, a rather different understanding is rightly collected by Cardinals Baronius and Bellarmine. For since the emperor, though a Catholic and otherwise a benefactor of the Church, was abusing his power, prudently did Gregory behave toward him by writing submissively, and gently exhorting and instructing him, so that he might more easily lead him to emend or revoke the law. So not for this reason did he not immediately use his power, that he did not have it, but because he did not then expect fruit if he used rigor. And therefore to insinuate this and to guard the dignity of his office, he says at the beginning of the same epistle: “But I, unworthy servant of your piety, do not speak as Bishop in this suggestion, nor as servant by right of the republic, but by private right.” And nevertheless he did not at that time disregard necessary providence toward the Church; for the law, which he says at the end of the epistle he has had sent to various parts of the world, he did not send without due correction and moderation, as is clear from the epistle of the same to the bishops of the diverse regions, which is contained in bk.7 indict.1 epist.11. Where, after he has said: “The law which the emperor has given etc. I have endeavored to send to your firmness etc.” he adds: “Exhorting this most of all, that unless their life be strictly examined, they are not to be received, but after sufficient proof and examination” he says they are to be received. In which he manifestly used the authority he had over the civil laws in order to the good of the soul and for moderating law to a spiritual end.

8. Lastly we can add certain other locutions of the Fathers which seem to favor too much the civil power or dignity. Ignatius in his epist. to the Smyrnaeans says: “One must also honor the king, for neither is anyone more excellent than the king or anyone like him in all created things.” But it is understood of excellence and likeness in power, namely in its own order, as we have said. Hence in the same place he also says about a bishop that he is to be honored “as prince of priests, bearing the image of God and of Christ.” And later: “Nor is anything in the Church greater than the bishop who has been consecrated to God for the salvation of the whole world.” Which is also to be understood relatively and with proportion. Cyril of Alexandria too, bk. De Recta in Deum Fide ad Theodosium, speaks thus at the beginning: “From God, whose height is greatest, to you, most famous kings, the height of human fame rising up with incomparable excellence over all others, has been given an outstanding and honorable lot. For you are the founts of the greatest dignities, and above all eminence, and the principle and origin of human happiness. And whatever lies below the thrones of kingship is governed by the most clement commands of your majesty so that it may lead a legitimate and admirable life; and they who do not bear the yoke fall easy victim to your strength.”

9. Now these above said words easily receive understanding and are written with so much moderation and prudence that they not only do they per se betray at once their true sense but also give sufficient indication of another power more excellent and more than human. For that is why Cyril said that the height of human highness has been given to kings, because the priestly and pontifical height is more than human. Hence after he has said that the emperor is the fount of the greatest dignities and above all eminence, he at once adds “the principle and origin of human happiness.” For all those things are to be understood of earthly and temporal dignities that are ordered to human, that is, natural or civil happiness. Which is further declared by the words: “whatever lies below the thrones of kingship is governed by the most clement commands of your majesty so that it may lead a legitimate and admirable life.” For Cyril knew that there were many things that did not lie below the thrones of kingship, which it was not then necessary more clearly to explain; because his determination then was not to hand on ecclesiastical doctrine but only to render the emperor kindly toward hearing the true faith about Christ.

Finally can be noted the words of Pope Symmachus in Apologet. adversus Anastasium Imperatorem, where he compares the Pontiff with the emperor in the honor due to them and says: “Not to say superior, the honor is certainly equal.” However, from his preceding words the sense and modesty of the Pontiff are clear. For he had said: “Let us compare the honor of the emperor with the honor of the Pontiff, between whom the distance is as great as that the former carries the care of human things, the latter of divine.” From which principle he could indeed have expressly concluded that the honor due to the Pontiff is greater, but he did not wish to out of modesty. Now he calls the honor equal, not simply, but according to proportion, insofar as each of them is supreme in his own order. But afterwards in the discussion of the Apology he eloquently affirms and proves that he has superior authority for coercing an emperor, if he is a heretic or communes with heretics condemned by the Church.

Chapter 29. Satisfaction is made to objections taken from the novelty of the thing and from the deeds of emperors and kings.

Summary. 1. The king charges the primacy of the Pontiff with novelty. 2. How ancient the primacy of the Pontiff is. 3. Philip was the first Catholic emperor, and the Pontiff used his power against him. 4. The argument of the king taken from the vote of the emperor in choosing the Pontiff. 5. By what right emperors sometimes cast a vote in the election of Pontiffs. 6. A privilege conceded by one can be revoked by another who is equal. 7. The second objection of the king taken from the acts of emperors over Pontiffs. Otho did not depose the Pontiff John. 8. Of the Pontiffs mentioned, not all were legitimate. 9. The third objection from the deeds of kings. Response. 10. The king St. Louis. 11. Louis XI. 12. The error of Gerson about the power of a Council over the Pontiff.

1. The king of England complains further that this power over Christian princes “was usurped through ambition and abuse,” as he says in his Preface p.22. But to prove this he also contends that its use is new. For thus in his Preface p.24 he says that “new and absurd is” the sense of those words of Christ, “Feed my sheep,” and “Whatever you bind,” by which a power of that sort is collected. And on p.60, when he had said that Peter was prince of the apostles whom Christ chose only by a certain order, he subjoins: “Nor did the Bishop of the Roman See arrogate anything more to himself in the three hundred years after Christ.” Next, to prove this newness, he says generally in the same place that the Roman Bishops were up to the times of Phocas subject to the emperors. But how foreign this is to the truth has been sufficiently shown above. But previously, on p.28 and following, he had reviewed some of the deeds of emperors and kings that can be brought to bear to show the aforesaid novelty of usurped jurisdiction and the ancient subjection of the Roman Pontiffs, and we must therefore speak about them here.

2. But first, as to refuting the general complaint about novelty, sufficient indeed might be the things we adduced to prove this power from ancient usage and tradition. However we add briefly that, if the discussion is about the power itself, it is as old as is the ancient institution of ecclesiastical monarchy set up by Christ himself in words sufficiently express. For that this is the legitimate sense of those words and that it is not new but very ancient, nay that it has also been perpetual in the Catholic Church, has been sufficiently demonstrated. But that in the institution and power is included this power for coercing Christian princes who are heretics, schismatics, or disobedient to the Church, pernicious, and incorrigible, has been shown by evident reasons and testimonies. Since to these the king of England has nothing to say in reply, he feigns that Catholics assert that “the Pontiff can take and bestow kingdoms at will,” as he says in his Preface p.23, nay can even “lead kings to death at pleasure,” as he adds on p.24. Where he also adds that the words of Christ, “Feed my sheep,” are so expounded by us “as if they signified this: take away, proscribe, depose Christian princes and kings.”

But (as I again already said above) these are frivolous evasions and vain monsters invented by Protestants so that they might both impose on the king and excite hatred against Catholics and against the truth itself. For can it be that, because the king of England has power to coerce his subjects by just punishments when they offend against his laws, therefore it must be said that he can at will kill his subjects or deprive them of their goods? Certainly neither would his subjects want to hear this nor would he himself permit so great a tyranny to be attributed to himself. Why then does he invent in Christ’s Vicar what he would be ashamed to hear about himself? A true novelty, then, is found in this inventing of tyrannical power by Protestants, but the antiquity of legitimate pontifical power for the just coercion of princes, even up to privation of kingdoms if the cause deserve it and they themselves are rebels, has, on the basis of the words of Christ, been evidently shown by Catholic doctors; nor does anything remain to be said about the power itself.

3. But if the discussion is about the use, we can distinguish between the use of directive and of coercive power, and about each we readily confess that they did not exist in the Church toward Christian emperors or kings in the three hundred years after Christ, not because they could not exist, but because their matter did not exist; for there were no Christian princes or emperors at that time. What wonder, then, if the Pontiffs could not govern them by their precepts and laws, nor compel them by their power, since Paul said, 1 Corinthians 5.12: “For what have I to do to judge them that are without?” At that time they could only preach the faith to them; but as long as the emperors did not voluntarily receive it and did not profess it through baptism they could not more effectively be directed or ruled. However, I except from this time that brief period when Philip was Christian emperor; for the Pontiff Fabian used his power against him, to the extent just occasion permitted, as we reported above from Eusebius. So that, by this example, it may appear that neither solid nor simply true is the absolute saying of the king that “neither did the Roman Bishops arrogate more to themselves in the three hundred years after Christ,” since, to the extent the occasion of that time permitted, Fabian legitimately used it. Add that also at that time the Church used its spiritual power even in temporal matter, as far as was expedient for its own good, taking no account of the civil laws, but correcting or limiting them for a spiritual end. The best example is in the law made by a certain African Council, ch. ‘Displicet’ §Repetis q.4 as Cyril relates in epist.66, that a cleric may not be named as guardian in a will, although the civil laws lay down that no one can be exempted from guardianship, etc. ‘De Excusat. Tutor.’ over several laws.

Besides, after those times, the Pontiffs always used this power over Christian princes, first indeed by directing them with warnings and precepts and, when they had to, by emending their laws, as we saw about Gregory in the preceding chapter and as we reported above about others. But afterwards also by coercion, as far as necessity required and the reason of the times permitted. For use of this coercive power is not per se necessary but when necessity compels. And would that there had never been necessity for its use, that is, that there had never been things that required its exercise! Therefore, as long as such crimes were not found in Christian princes, such a use could not have existed in the Church without prejudice of power. On the contrary, indeed, it was not necessary, as soon as Christian emperors began to be apostate or rebels against the Church, that the Church or the Pontiffs should have used all their power against them; because they could have feared from such use not fruit but harm to the Church. Hence Augustine, replying to a similar argument of Donatus epist.204, says to the same: “You repeat, as I hear, that in the Gospel it is written that seventy disciples left the Lord and were allowed the choice of their evil and impious departure, and that to the remaining twelve who stayed the response was made, Will ye also depart? And do you not notice that the Church was first then sprouting with new seed and that not yet had in it been fulfilled the prophecy: ‘And all the kings of the earth will adore him, all the nations serve him’? Which indeed the more it is fulfilled the greater the power does the Church use, so that it not only invites but also compels to good.” The same thing happened, then, in the first times, for instance, of Julian or of others, who by power and tyranny persecuted the Church in the manner of gentiles. And nevertheless the use of this power was not lacking in those times when it could with fruit be used, as is openly shown from the censure of Ambrose against Theodosius and of Innocent against Arcadius; and thus also afterwards, in the succession of times according as occasions occurred, this power was made use of, as we saw.

4. But the king of England opposes with contrary facts, showing the contrary right of the imperial power over the Pontiffs. “For the assent of the emperor,” he says, “in a long course of years intervened in the choosing of Pontiffs, etc.” Which he pursues at length, and from them he tries to take an argument for a more excellent imperial power.

But because I have dealt with the election of Pontiffs more at length in the material proper to Pontiffs, now I briefly admit that the practice was for some time kept that the election of the Pontiff was confirmed by the consent of the emperor, as is clear from Platina on Pope Firmian and from other histories, and openly from Gregory bk.7 indict.1 epist.1 at the end, where he affirms in these words that he was made Pontiff by the will of the emperor: "Behold the most serene Lord emperor commanded that the monkey be made a lion. And indeed by his provision he can be called a lion, but he cannot become a lion. Hence it must be that all my guilt and negligence he should depute not to me but to his piety, who committed to the weak the mystery of strength." But we then add that on many occasions Pontiffs were made without the consent of emperors or kings, namely both before the conversion of the emperors to the Christian faith for three hundred and more years, and after the conversion of Constantine for another two hundred years until the August Justinian, from whose time the emperors began to take up that right, as is common in the histories. Hence we collect that the emperors did not receive this power by divine right, because otherwise without their suffrage the election of a Pontiff could never have been validly done. Neither did they have it by force of the empire, both because otherwise they would have arrogated it to themselves from the beginning, and chiefly because the empire is earthly and human, but the dignity of the Pontiff is in its manner divine and heavenly.

5. They exercised that power, then, either as usurped or as conceded by the Pontiffs themselves. And indeed in the first way they exercised it by force and by power from Justinian up to Constantine IV. And this force and tyranny is deplored by Gregory on the fifth penitential Psalm, where he also relates the violence, avarice, and simony of the emperors in extorting money for their confirmation; which custom endured up to Pope Agatho, as is taken from ch. 'Agatho' d.63. Wherefore the argument is vain that the king takes from this custom, because no right can be obtained by extreme force and injury. But in the second way some say that the emperors Charlemagne and Otho used this power by virtue of the privileges that Adrian I and Leo VIII conceded to them, as Gratian reports in ch. 'Hadrianus' 2 etc. In Synodo d.63. However those chapters from Gratian are taken from false histories, and the privilege was invented by schismatics, as Cardinal Bellarmine shows fully in his response to the king, and Cardinal Baronius more fully for the year 774 n.10, and for the year 94 n.22, where he takes, among other reasons, an argument from the fact that no history relates that Charles or his successors used such a privilege. And so the royal argument is altogether overthrown.

6. And although I consider this opinion of the cardinals to be altogether true, lest however anyone think that the solution of the argument depends on repudiating the history, which now there is not leisure to examine, we judge it needing to be added (which even Bellarmine did not omit) that even if the history were true and the privilege true, and even if there be sufficient agreement about the legitimate use of it, nothing is thence inferred against the eminence of the pontifical power; nay in this it is enhanced, because it is so great that even the election of the Pontiffs depends on its institution and determination, and that it was able by privilege to communicate to the emperors some part either of the election or of the confirmation of a future Pontiff. Which, although some Pontiff had conceded it, some successor of his too could have revoked it. For the Supreme Pontiff always remains superior to the emperor, and a privilege freely conceded by a superior can be revoked by the same or by an equal successor; especially if such privilege is of little use to the Universal Church, such as it doubtless was, or pernicious rather. But that the emperor, notwithstanding such a privilege, always remains inferior to the Pontiff is manifest, because by such a privilege no spiritual jurisdiction was given to the emperor. For the right of nominating, choosing, or confirming is not jurisdiction but a certain authority that (of whatever sort it is) is concerned with choosing the person to be Pontiff but not with the Pontiff once chosen, over whom not even the Pontiff himself can concede or delegate any jurisdiction or power. Neither too was the emperor, because of such a privilege, exempt from the jurisdiction of the Pontiff, because it is even repugnant for a Pontiff to concede a like privilege in diminution of the dignity and care that flowed down to him from Christ. Nor is such exemption necessary for the effect of such a privilege for, before the Pontiff is chosen, exemption has no place, but after he has been chosen even those who chose him are subjected to him, as is clear in the case of the cardinals and the other electors. But in the course and change of time the privilege was taken away, and a better form of election was instituted, about which, by God's gift, we will speak elsewhere.

7. The king continues and objects, secondly, that "everywhere there occur examples of emperors who abrogated from the Roman Pontiffs their power." And he uses the examples of the emperor Otho who deposed John XII, and of the emperor Henry III who deposed Benedict IX, Gregory VI and Sylvester III. But, in the first place, even if these examples were true, they would effect nothing against the truth. Because from facts that are not proved to be just and licit no right is shown. Next, we say that they are in part not true, in part not faithfully narrated. For Otho did not depose John. For either he did it by temporal power, and he could not legitimately use this against a Pontiff, not only because by force of the pontificate he was exempt, as I will show in the next book, but also because the Pontiff was then a king and supreme in temporal matters, just as he is now; or Otho did it by spiritual power, and this too cannot be said, because he did not have it, as we showed, nor do we read that he usurped it or that Otho labored under the error of making himself head of the Church. Nay, we read as much in him as in other Catholic emperors that they never treated of the causes of abdication of Pontiffs by their own arm or power, but by the authority of a certain synod, whose gathering together they were seeing to.

8. Hence Platina in his life of John XII, although he first says that Otho, by persuasion of the clergy, created Leo VIII in the place of John who had fled away, nevertheless he at once made the thing clear by saying that since the Romans were insistent with the emperor that, when John had been taken away, he should create another Pontiff, he replied that the election pertained to the people and the clergy, and that in this way the clergy had chosen Leo but that Otho had received him. Nay he even indicates that John was not deposed because of his morals alone but because "he had seized the pontificate by the power of his father Alberic;" for in those words he seems to indicate that he was not rightly elected but was intruded by violence and power. And this is what Onufrius thinks in his additions to Platina, when he thinks that Leo VIII was rightly elected while John was alive. But because it is perhaps truer that neither was John rightly deposed nor Leo validly elected, one must add that Otho was excessive in a zeal not according to knowledge [Romans 10.2], and that the synod was private and illegitimate, and that it could have erred in judging that a Pontiff could be deposed because of crimes other than heresy; or perhaps it did it more because of the violence of the emperor and human fear than because it thought it could legitimately be done. See Baronius for the year 964 n.15. But as to what concerns the three Pontiffs, it is in the first place false that they were all true Pontiffs, for about Sylvester it is certain that he was intruded and schismatic. But about the others there is also some doubt, although it is more probably believed that they were legitimate Pontiffs. Next Sylvester was ejected not by Henry but by Benedict IX, the legitimate Pope. Again he himself was afterwards not deposed by Henry, but of his own free will (or on the persuasion of a certain holy abbot as some report, or so that he might live more freely) he took money and renounced the papacy. And in this way was Gregory VI ultimately introduced; whom alone did Henry afterwards take care to depose, where there could be the same error which many say happened in the case of John XII although they say he also voluntarily yielded. See Baronius for the year 1044.

9. Third the king makes a transition after emperors to kings, and first he says in general that kings rejected with no less constancy this temporal right of the Pontiff over themselves; next he relates certain deeds of some of the kings of Gaul and England, from which he wishes to conclude that the Pontiff has over kings no right by divine institution, and that he could not have it acquired by prescription either, since the prescription would be interrupted by similar facts. But I have not deemed it necessary in examining the truth of the histories to delay over facts of this sort, because although they all be admitted as they are related, they conduce not at all toward concluding what is intended. First from the general reason that the deeds of temporal kings are of little value for showing divine right; both because it is not their office per se to know it or teach, but that of the prelates of the Church and especially of Supreme Pontiffs; and also because, to be sure, kings often pass beyond the rights of royal power supported by their power and seduced either by ambition to dominate or by desire for most base gain. Second, and more especially, because all the words and deeds that are reported pertain to other causes or matters; and from them not only can it not be inferred that the Roman Pontiff does not in spiritual things have a supreme power that may extend itself to the direction and correction of kings even in temporal matter, but also it cannot be collected either that those kings so thought. Which I will show in a brief discussion by running through one by one the things adduced.

For first he adduces certain foolish words of Philip the Fair, king of the Franks, which, driven by a certain furor of mind or force of anger, he wrote in a certain epistle to Boniface VIII; and to take an argument from these is against reason. But setting aside the insults, what ultimately did that king affirm? “Know that in temporal things we are not subject to anyone.” But what finally follows therefrom? Or who denies it? Certainly he who said that in temporal things he was not subject to anyone has tacitly confessed that in spiritual things he is subject; but to whom more than to the Pontiff? But if he admitted he was subject to him in spiritual things, he assuredly could not deny that, if a king were to abuse temporal things against spiritual things, he could, by reason of the spiritual things, be harried and rebuked, even in temporal things.

10. Next, he alleges St. Louis who “by public sanction prohibited all exactions of the papal curia in his kingdom,” which he alleges from the Arrêts. Since, however, we do not have a supply of them we cannot explain its definite sense, for we believe that nothing was sanctioned by so great and such a king that was not just and religious. But in vol.6 of the Bibliotheca Sanctorum at the end we find a certain pragmatic sanction of the same king printed out, in which we find many things written in favor of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and of free provision of benefices and with observance of the sacred canons; but about the exactions of the Roman curia altogether nothing. But others report the prohibition not absolutely but with a limitation, namely “exactions and very heavy burdens...we in no wise wish to be collected except for reasonable, pious, and most urgent unavoidable necessity.” Therefore, if the holy king sanctioned anything, it was not in a spirit of exaltation or of exemption from obedience to the Pope, but insofar as he reckoned it necessary for the just preservation of his kingdom and to pertain to his temporal jurisdiction. For he was so alien from usurpation of spiritual power that when his legate had, on his private initiative, obtained from the Pope “a bull of provisions” for the cathedral churches, “the king threw it into the fire saying, ‘we do not thank you for these things which you have obtained to the peril of our souls, namely that we should make provision for churches.’” And he did not use it. Thus does Rebuffe report in Concordat. in the preface § ‘Quaedam nobis’ at the word ‘Optamus.’

11. Next the king of England reports at large the deed of Louis XI, king of Gaul, who, when the Pontiff Pius II sought for a certain pragmatic sanction to be revoked, did not assent. But this too does nothing for the cause, for that whole controversy was without schism, for that king was always obedient to the Pope, as was shown above from his letters to Pius II. Nor do I see why King James made mention of Pius II and Louis XI rather than of the subsequent Pontiffs and kings up to Leo X, in whose time the dispute was ended and the pragmatic sanction was removed in the Lateran Council under Leo X, session 11. There the whole history is fully related, and from it is clear that the Pontiffs never used absolute power in that business but proceeded sweetly so that, with concord preserved, the matter might at last be carried out with unity of faith.

12. Next, however, after a large and prolix exaggeration, which the king does not prove, he turns away to a far different question, and mentions the book of Gerson, wherein Gerson did indeed gravely fall by attributing to a General Council coercive power over a Pontiff, even as far as deposition for crimes other than heresy; yet in no way does he attribute spiritual power to kings, nor does he exempt them from subjection and the coercive power of the Pontiffs. Nor did he call into doubt the ecclesiastical monarchy which was instituted by Christ, and he confirms in the same book that it cannot be taken away or transferred to another system of government; so it is superfluous to obscure the truth by these verbal exaggerations and digressions.

Finally King James enumerates the kings of England who either arrogated to themselves the investiture of bishops or violated the liberty of ecclesiastical persons or refused to obey the Pontiff. However these deeds are base and are rather to be kept hidden than brought into the open, and they contribute little to the matter. For the investitures of bishops was at some time conceded or permitted to kings; hence Richard or some other like king of England dared to retain or exercise that power, supported, not by divine right, but by custom perhaps or some pretended privilege. And although he was disobedient and stubborn in resisting the prohibitions of the Pontiffs, namely Gregory VII and his successors, yet he did not arrogate to himself the primacy of the Church, nor did he absolutely deny obedience to the Pontiff, but only erred in a particular deed or practice, or made up by some color a defense of his right. But eventually he returned to his right mind “and restored the investitures to God and to St. Peter,” as William of Malmesbury says in bk.5 Histor.

Likewise we cannot deny that other kings of England were too stubborn in usurping jurisdiction over ecclesiastical persons. But from abuse and tyranny a legitimate power is badly collected; and besides the error or sin pertains to another controversy, as I have often said. Hence the same kings themselves recognized the primacy of the Pontiff and feared his coercive power, as was seen above about Henry II, who was such a violator of ecclesiastical liberty that he gave occasion for the killing of St. Thomas of Canterbury, and nevertheless he bowed his neck to the Pontiff and did public penance. Similarly Edward I as well as Edwards II and III, although they erred in their deeds, did not depart from obedience to the Pontiff, as we saw above from their epistles, where we also reviewed the similar letters of Richard II. Wherefore what King James responds on this point is frivolous: "It is enough that the unjust ownership of my rights, as often as it was permitted, was interrupted." For the pontifical power was not prescribed by human right but conceded by divine right, and therefore no tergiversation of men, no disobedience, no custom of many years can change it or diminish it.

Chapter 30. Satisfaction is made to objections taken from certain reasons.

Summary. 1. First objection. Instance. 2. Solution. 3. Second objection. 4. Solution.

Distinction between baptized and non-baptized kings. 5. Final objection conflated in a threefold way. 6. Solution to the first. 7. Solution to the second. 8. Solution to the third.

1. Although in the book of the king of England I find no new reason whereby he tries to prove his error and his total exemption from the power of the Pope, especially in temporal matters, nevertheless, for the completion of this book, it has seemed necessary briefly to propound and solve certain reasons that are commonly spread about or judged more powerful. The first, then, is wont to be (and seems even to be the king's foundation) that a king is supreme in temporal matters, as is taken from the Scriptures and was also proved above by reason; therefore he cannot at the same time be subject in temporal matters. The proof of the consequence is that he who is subject in some matter has a superior therein; but it is a thing repugnant to be supreme and to have a superior. You will say that it is true of subjection and superiority of the same kind, that is, as each is direct or indirect; but the same thing being supreme in respect of a directly superior power, because it does not have one above it, and yet being subject indirectly to another, is not a thing repugnant. But on the contrary, because, as the jurists say, what is forbidden to be done directly cannot be done in another way, even indirectly, because otherwise the prohibition would be enervated and made useless; therefore similarly in the present case. For in whatever way a king is said to be subject to another (even indirectly) in temporal matters, his excellence too in that order is taken away.

2. But nevertheless the reply is very good and the response to it of no moment, because there is no right that absolutely prohibits a king supreme in temporal matters from being subject to a superior of an order which is higher and exceeds temporal matters. Because either this right is natural, which cannot be the case because this indirect subjection is of a superior order and flows from divine positive right; or it is a human right, and this cannot be contrary to divine right nor prevail against it. Wherefore natural right in this case, as it is the fount and origin of civil principality and of its supreme power, so also it can be said directly to take away or to prohibit subjection to a similar power of the same order; but, with respect to indirect subjection to a power that is of another order and is spiritual, it is disposed negatively as it were; because a civil prince supreme in temporal matters is indeed subject to no one in the same temporal matters, even indirectly, yet it is not repugnant for him to be subject through a right of a higher order. Add that this indirect subjection in temporal matters is intrinsically conjoined with subjection in spiritual matters, especially in respect of a spiritual power supreme in its own order; and there is nothing repugnant, even according to the principles of human right, for a king directly supreme in temporal matters to be made indirectly subject in the same matters, insofar as this subjection is intrinsically conjoined with the spiritual one; for thus do the laws themselves say that what is directly prohibited can be done in another way, when this necessarily follows from something else that has been conceded by the same or by a higher right. Nor for that reason is the excellence of the supreme temporal power taken away, or rendered superfluous or of no moment, both because it always retains the negation of a direct superior in the same order, though the negation of an indirect superior does not belong to the idea of it; and also because this manner of negation or of supreme power suffices for all moral effects that are necessary and sufficient for correct political governing.

3. Against this, however, a second reason can be objected, that an infidel non-baptized king is so supreme in temporal matters that he does not in them recognize any superior either direct or indirect; therefore Christian princes too are supreme in the same way; therefore they are subject to no one in temporal matters even indirectly, and according not to the Pontiff either. The proof of the consequence is both that faithful princes are not of a worse condition than infidel ones, and also that they are not by baptism deprived of other temporal goods, therefore not of their kingdoms either, nor of their temporal prerogatives, according to the saying: "He who gives heavenly kingdoms does not snatch away mortal ones." And finally because otherwise this would be a great impediment to the conversion of infidel kings to faith and baptism, if by it they were to be deprived of their supreme liberty, whether directly or indirectly. And thus all the arguments by which above we proved this point about direct subjection in temporal matters seem to urge it too about indirect subjection.

4. We reply that this equivalence between faithful and infidel kings is not to be accepted with all equality, because a non-baptized king is not directly subject to the spiritual power of the Church; and so it is no wonder that his spiritual power is not subordinate to spiritual jurisdiction and does not depend on it, even indirectly, as to directive or coercive force. But a baptized king is directly subject to the spiritual power, as we saw, and so as a result even his temporal power remains subordinate to the spiritual power, at least indirectly in order to its end. Wherefore temporal power in both kings is indeed the same, or equal, nor is it properly or intrinsically diminished (so to say) in a Christian king; but only by reason of being subject does he possess a new rule, whether a proximate and internal one, which is faith and infused prudence, or an external one, which is a spiritual pastor and law, or the power thereof, insofar as he is ordered to a spiritual end.

And in this way the other objections cease, which only prove that an intrinsic diminution in that power cannot happen by reason of the faith; but they do not prove that the aforesaid subordination is not added, for this follows intrinsically from the faith. And it is not an imperfection but rather an excellence of that power, and therefore it does not add a burden or an impediment to the conversion of kings beyond the intrinsic difficulty that the faith itself and ecclesiastical obedience bring along with them. See Bellarmine Contra Barclaium ch.3 n.3. But this burden, whatever it be, is contained intrinsically in the profession of Christian faith, wherein is included a tacit agreement and promise of obedience to the pastors of the Church, and to the giving up of everything for Christ, if there be need, according to the verse, Luke 14.26: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother...yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." And consequently there follows also an obligation to persevere in the faith and to defend it by reason of one's state; and finally it thence also arises that any Christian at all is subject to correction and deserved punishment if he offends against this sort of obligation. This obligation, therefore, and profession are common to Christian princes, and therefore they are, with due proportion, subject to the same power.

Indeed I add lastly that even pagan kings, according to the capacity of their state, are subordinate to the spiritual ecclesiastical power, and that, conversely, the power of the Church can at least indirectly exercise the act of a superior over them. For if they have Christian subjects, it can liberate them from their dominion, either when they try to turn them from the faith, as Durandus defines on 2 Sentences dist.44 q.3, or simply and absolutely by reason of the danger, as St. Thomas wishes, Summa Theologiae IIa IIae q.10 a.10. Which latter is more probable, because in things that pertain to good morals a moral danger must be guarded against before the event is expected; and therefore the power is extended also to avoiding the danger, although in the use thereof scandal must be prudently guarded against, as we said above. But if pagan kings have no Christian subjects, the Church does not ordinarily have power over them, even by reason of their subjects, except in the case where they are impeding the preaching of the Gospel or are compelling their subjects not to accept it. Hence it seems to be that the power is formally (so to say) the same, or under the same title and respect, although the use of it about different persons can be rarer or more frequent, greater or lesser, according to their various conditions and states. Some difference, however, intervenes, because the power of the Pontiff over Christian princes is a proper jurisdiction, which, although it be spiritual, is extended indirectly to temporal things. But as regard pagan princes it is not by way of jurisdiction over the princes themselves but over their Christian subjects, for the protection of whom it can ward off infidels or confine them in their office; and therefore whatever it does about them is by way of defense of the faithful, not by way of vengeance or punishment of the infidels. Next we can add that, just as royal power receives some subjection by its being united to the faith, so also it participates a certain greater fullness and excellence, and thus that burden, whatever it be, is compensated with this benefit. For a Christian king, led by the rules of the faith, can make many prescriptions, by directing them to defense of the faith, or to the honor of the Christian religion, or to some other spiritual good, which as led by pure reason he could not prescribe; and likewise he punishes many offenses that he would not punish by the force of natural reason alone, as for example heresy or other like thing.

5. Finally, certain reasons are added of lesser moment. One is: the Pontiff has a sufficiently large solicitude for spiritual cares, therefore he should not involve himself in temporal ones; for if Paul prohibited this to all who fight for God, much more does it seem to be prohibited to the supreme Pastor, who ought to be an example to others and is occupied in greater spiritual cares. A second reason is: because there is in the Pontiff, speaking per se and by the force of his pontificate, not formally found a royal dignity, therefore royal power cannot be subordinate to him. The proof of the consequence is that one power cannot be subordinate and subject to another unless the same power that is in the subordinate is found in him to whom he is said to be subordinate. Another reason is that the Pope cannot dispense in natural right, nor change a divine institution; therefore neither can he take away either the natural obligation to obey the king from his subjects or vassals, or from the king the power that God himself conferred.

6. However these reasons are easily solved. For to the first we reply that it at most proceeds about direct administration of temporal things but not about indirect. Both because the first is distinct and separable from the spiritual power, but the latter is not distinct but per se and intrinsically pertains to the spiritual power; and therefore it cannot be an impediment to it since it is rather an exercise and use of it. And also because the direct administration of temporal things deals with them per se and by institution, and therefore it is necessary that in its principal intention, and hence either almost always or for the most part, it be busied about them; but indirect administration occurs rarely and only by occasion (as we touched on above from Bernard); and hence it can be said neither to be a secular care nor to impede the spiritual. I add next that although the Pontiff does not, by force of his pontificate, have direct temporal governance, neither against his office, nor against the advice of Paul, has it been that he should have received both joined together from somewhere else, because thus was it fitting for the common good of the Church and for the better use of the spiritual power itself. On which point we have spoken at length elsewhere, and one can look at Gennadius bk.4 De Legibus in his exposition for the Council of Florence ch.5 sects.3 & 4.

7. To the second the response is by denying the consequence, for the proposition, which is assumed in its proof, is found, simply speaking, to be false both in the case of physical powers and in artificial ones, and consequently in moral ones too. For the will is subject to the intellect and depends on it, even if the formal power of the will is not found in the intellect. Again the bridle-making art is subordinate to the equestrian art, although the latter does not formally include it; and paternal power is subordinate to royal power, although there is not formally in the king a paternal power about the sons of his subjects. Thus therefore is the royal power subordinate to the pontifical, even if the Pontiff is not formally a temporal emperor. And the reason is that this subordination is founded on the power of a higher order that eminently as it were contains the other. Again, because it arises from the subordination between the ends of each power, which suffices for a power ordered to a lower end to be subordinate to a power that respects a higher end. That proposition, then, that he who has a certain power is not subordinate to another unless to another who has the same or a similar power, is true at most in powers of the same order, where one is a participation of the other, as are delegated and ordinary power or the power of a vicar and of a prelate. But the proposition does not hold when the subordination is founded on the eminence of the superior power and of its end, as has been made plain.

8. To the third we reply that although the Pope may not dispense in natural law, he can nevertheless change its matter; which change once made, the natural right itself ceases; and thus in the present case he can make a subject not to be subject, but, once the subjection is taken away, the reason and natural obligation for obedience ceases. But subjection itself, as also royal power, is not immediately of natural right but of human right, as was shown above, and therefore it can for just cause be taken away by the superior power of the Pontiff. For this reason most of all, that some goods, conferred immediately by nature, as liberty and life, can sometimes be justly taken away by superior human powers, as is sufficiently clear from the licit and honest use itself, because God himself, who conferred those gifts, also gave men public power to take them away for just cause. In this way, therefore, the subordination of temporal kings to the spiritual power is from God himself, who has conferred such power; and therefore it is not against the right of nature but is above it, and is, with preservation of proportion, most consonant with it.

Sum and conclusion of the whole book with an appeal to the king of England.

Since by the inviolable law of the Supreme Legislator, from whom all power in heaven and on earth is derived, it has been decreed that the things that are Caesar's are to be rendered to Caesar and the things that are Gods' to God, thus have we studied to keep this rule in the doctrine of this book, so that no one, if he rightly observe with his eyes, may doubt that to each has by us been given what is his own. For we have shown that the double power by which this world is ruled, the temporal and the spiritual, the royal and the pontifical, has been given by God, and we have proved that each is in its own order supreme. In this way indeed we have pointed out the differences between them, that the royal carries only the care of human and temporal things, but the pontifical, transcending the limits of temporal things and gazing at the ultimate end of spiritual life, applies itself to the ordering of divine and eternal things. Hence we at length concluded that there is as much distance between these powers as the soul is distant from the body, as the eternal from the temporal, as the spiritual from the bodily, as the celestial from the earthly. And accordingly, as it is just that the body be subject to the soul and that temporal things be referred to eternal and be subordinated to them, so it is necessary that in the Church of Christ, wherein everything ought to be established in the right and best order, the royal power be subject to the pontifical, so that it may be directed by it to eternal beatitude, and, if it anywhere turn from that end, may be emended and corrected.

Having kept, then, this just and most fair distribution, we gave to the Pontiff what is his and what the Prince of pastors and leader of the whole flock conferred on him; and to you, most serene king, we did not deny what is yours. It remains, therefore, that you consider yourself to be subject to the same rule and law of Christ, lest, presuming on your power more than you ought, you transgress the limits prescribed to you and usurp what belongs to divine power. Know that you are a sheep of the flock of Christ, not a pastor; do not therefore feed and rule the pastors, and leap over the bounds prescribed by the Supreme Pastor. Listen to Nazianzen *orat.*¹⁷ 'To Citizens Struck with Heavy Fear,' preferring his empire to the earthly empire, and counting among his sheep emperors and kings. To which sheep elsewhere he speaks in this manner: "Sheep, do not feed the pastors, do not rise up above your bounds, for it is enough for you if you are rightly fed. Judges, do not judge or prescribe laws to legislators. For God is not a God of dissension and confusion but of peace and order. Let no one then be a head who is scarcely a hand or a foot or some other more lowly member of the body; but let each abide in that grade in which he was called, even if he be worthy of something more outstanding, being about to have more honor indeed from the fact that he acquiesces in his present grade than if he seeks one that he has not received. Let no one, since he may follow another without danger, seek to go in front with danger; nor let the light of obedience, which sees and preserves both earthly and heavenly things, be quenched.”

What, I ask, most humane king, do you demand and require by the highest right from your subjects as anxiously as due obedience to the prince? You frequently inculcate in your book that judgment of Paul, Romans 13.1: “Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers.” Fulfill therefore the natural law proposed and commended by Christ, Luke 6.31: “And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.” And the obedience which you require from your subjects, give it faithfully to that prudent and faithful steward whom Christ has set over all his goods, and he has so placed him over you that he is to render account for your soul. For what Paul advises and prescribes to all the faithful, Hebrews 13.17: “Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls as they that must give account,” pertains no less to a king, if he be a Christian, than to the rest of the faithful. But if perhaps, most serene king, you do not deign to attend to my words, listen, I ask, to Bernard writing to King Conrad and speaking for me: “I have never wished the dishonor of the king, or the diminution of the kingdom; my soul hates the violent. I have read indeed: ‘Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers’ and [Romans 13.2] ‘whosoever resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God.’ Which judgment, however, I desire and in every way admonish you to keep in showing reverence to the Supreme and Apostolic See and the successor of St. Peter, just as you wish it to be kept toward you by the whole of your empire.” And he adds the following words, which I do not less gladly seize upon: “There are things that I have not thought should be written down; may I when present perhaps more opportunely intimate them.”

extended. 8. Response. Even in criminal matters the prosecutor should follow the forum of the accused. 9. Those who commit wrongs against churches or strike clerics can be convened in the ecclesiastical court. 10. Whether the privilege of the forum may be extended to crimes committed in advance of it. Reason on behalf of the negative side for doubt. 11. Reason for the affirmative side. 12. True resolution. 13. The limitation imposed by certain people is rejected.

Chapter 16: Whether the privilege of the forum includes exemption from civil laws, and of what sort the privilege is.

Summary: 1. Laymen may in no way bind ecclesiastical persons by their laws. 2. Whether the privilege of the forum for clerics includes exemption from civil laws. 3. The force of civil law is double, directive and coercive, and what each is. 4. Several other effects of the civil laws are reduced to this directive and coercive force. 5. Distinction of civil laws on the part of the persons and on the part of the matter. 6. Civil laws passed for laymen alone do not oblige clerics. 7. Civil laws which make disposition in ecclesiastical matter introduce no obligation. 8. Objection. Confirmation of it. 9. Response. And to the confirmation. 10. Civil laws which make disposition about the goods of clerics or churches have no validity. Reason for the first part. 11. Reason for the second part. 12. First opinion. 13. Second opinion. 14. Opinion of the author. 15. Whether clerics are exempt from the directive force of civil laws. 16. Various opinions. 17. Civil laws, even non-noxious ones, do not oblige clerics as regard coercive force. 18. Objection. 19. Solution. 20. Whether civil laws are able to void the contracts of clerics.

Chapter 17. What sort of privilege there is for churches as to their own exemption and that of their goods from burdens and from secular power.

Summary. 1. Various acceptations of 'church'. 2. Which of these acceptations is of service to the present purpose. 3. Various immunities of churches. 4. The goods of churches are twofold: some are specially consecrated, some are not. 5. Things dedicated to the divine cult are exempt from human uses. 6. All goods of churches enjoy the privilege of forum. 7. Reason for this exemption. 8. Ecclesiastical goods are exempt also from the civil laws. 9. They are exempt too from secular courts.

Chapter 18. Whether exemption from secular taxes is proper to churches and their goods, insofar as they are the patrimony of Christ.

Summary. 1. Ecclesiastical goods are some moveable and some immoveable: what each is. 2. What secular taxes are. 3. A twofold secular tax. 4. First conclusion: all ecclesiastical goods are exempt from taxes. 5. Proof by reason. 6. Objection. 7. First response. 8. Ecclesiastical goods are immediately under the lordship of God. 9. Second response.

Chapter 19. Whether exemption from secular taxes is fitting to the Church and to sacred things because of their special sanctity or consecration.

Summary. 1. Temples or churches, because of their consecration, are exempt from taxes of this sort. 2. First conclusion: immunity is due to sacred places also because of consecration. 3. Ecclesiastical goods ordered to the maintenance of ministers are not by reason of any consecration exempt. 4. Whether sacred things, if they are sold by reason of their matter, are subject to taxes. 5. Whether sacred things are, by force of consecration alone, exempt from human dominion. 6. Things of this sort are not exempt from human dominion. 7. A true theft is committed by him who steals the consecrated thing of any private person. 8. Consecrated things, although they are not exempt from human dominion, yet remain exempt from taxes. The matter of a thing once consecrated cannot be again applied to profane uses.

Chapter 20. Whether any good whatever, when it becomes ecclesiastical, is by that very fact exempt from all taxes and civil burdens attaching thereto.

Summary. 1. First opinion to the negative. 2. Triple foundation for this opinion. Double confirmation. 3. Second opinion to the affirmative. 4. Double manner of imposing burdens on immovable things. 5. Goods of the Church are not exempt from taxes already contracted by some agreement. 6. The conclusion is proved by reason. 7. Elaboration of the assertion. 8. Objection. 9. Solution. 10. Goods of the Church are exempt from taxes imposed by force of royal power. 11. By what right ecclesiastical goods are exempt. First opinion. It is rejected. 12. Second opinion, which attributes this exemption to divine and canon right. Foundations for the first part. 13. Whence it can be concluded that they are by divine right exempt. Objection. Response. Why tax but not rent is repugnant to exemption. 14. Foundations for the second part of the second opinion. 15. The said opinion is not proved by the rights adduced above. 16. Other rights from which the said exemption can be concluded. 17. Proof from civil right. 18. Second proof from the same civil right. 19. Frederick exempted goods properly so called of churches from tax. Exposition of Bartolus. 20. This exposition is rejected. 21. Exposition of Baldus. It is rejected. 22. The conclusion is shown by reason. 23. Confirmation. 24. Response to the civil rights adduced at the beginning. Again, response to the reason that a thing is transferred along with its burdens. 25. A question. Response. 26. To the last confirmation.

Chapter 21. Certain objections are met, and explanation is given by the by of how ancient this exemption of ecclesiastical goods is.

Summary. 1. First objection from canon right. 2. Second objection from civil right. 3. Response to these objections. 4. First conclusion: how ancient the privilege of not paying taxes is from the goods of the Church. 5. The Supreme Pontiff can of his own power exempt the goods of the Church from taxes. Proof. 6. Second conclusion: the privilege of exemption for the goods of the Church has not always been observed. Proof. 7. Exemption of the goods of the Church was established before Frederick by the civil laws. 8. Triple response to Ambrose. 9. First response to ch. 'Tributum'. Second response. 10. It is attacked. True response. 11. To ch. 'Sancimus'. Goods that relate to the manor of the Church are exempt from all tax. 12. Response to the civil laws adduced to the contrary.

Chapter 22. Of what sort ecclesiastical exemption is as regard the personal burdens of clerics.

A tacit objection is met. 4. Second proof. 5. Clerics are exempt from mean functions. 6. Confirmation from canon right. 7. It is shown also by divine right. 8. Clerics cannot be deprived of the advantages common to all citizens. 9. Clerics are not made more fearful whenever some burden falls on them from the civil laws. 10. Laws that speak of common matter or in general do not derogate from the immunity of clerics. 11. When clerics are made more fearful by civil laws. 12. Through laws depriving them of things common by natural or civil right, clerics are rendered more fearful for themselves. 13. Laws removing from clerics things common to other citizens are repugnant to ecclesiastical liberty. Evasion. It is refuted. 14. Reason for the conclusion. 15. Double Confirmation.

Chapter 23. Whether the ecclesiastical revenues of clerics are exempt from taxes.

Summary. 1. Twofold goods of clerics. 2. First conclusion. 3. Reason for the conclusion and confirmation. 4. The reason for the conclusion is weighed. 5. Conclusion: the goods of churches and clerics are equal in exemption from royal taxes. 4. Confirmation. 5. Solution to the contrary opinion. He who steals the goods of the Church commits sacrilege. One who seizes the goods of a cleric does not commit sacrilege unless he uses force against him.

Proof first from canon right and second from civil right. 4. Proof also by reason. 5. Assertion of the limitation: 'who continue in the clerical state.' Sacred orders introduce by themselves alone the privilege of exemption, but not so minor orders. 6. A triple condition is required in minor clerics for enjoying this privilege. 7. Objection. 8. Whether remuneration along with minor orders suffices for this privilege. 9. For this same privilege the age of 14 years is not required. 10. A cleric in minor orders, when any of the conditions is lacking, by that very fact loses the privilege. 11. Whether a minor cleric, if he is not serving in any church nor is engaged in study, is exempt from taxes. Affirmative opinion. True opinion. 12. Consideration of a certain law of Spain. 13. Whether clerics, when they have once been deprived of this privilege by defect of conditions, may further enjoy it. First opinion. 14. Opinion of the author. 15. A cleric can sometimes because of crimes lose this privilege. 16. In what ways the punishment of being deprived of this privilege may be imposed on clerics. 17. The privileges of the canon and of the forum of clerics are distinguished in canon right.

What privilege a cleric enjoys who after sacred orders takes a wife. 4. What habit these married clerics should wear to enjoy exemption. 5. Whether clerics enjoy this privilege if they go about with weapons. 6. Bigamous clerics do not enjoy the privilege of exemption. Whether a cleric contracting with a virgin who has already been corrupted by him enjoys this exemption. Whether a cleric who has contracted with two women and has consummated with one of them enjoys exemption. 7. By what sort of bigamy a married cleric is deprived of exemption. 8. A married cleric at leisure in advanced studies at a University does not stay exempt. 9. Whether someone engaged in business enjoys this privilege. 10. Which sort of married clerics are altogether deprived of exemption.

Summary. 1. Doubt. 2. Assertion: ecclesiastical persons without orders enjoy the privilege of exemption. The assertion is proved and the doubt solved. 3. The same assertion is proved from civil right. 4. Proof again by reason. 5. Which non-ordained persons are to be reckoned ecclesiastical. Profession with simple vows suffices for enjoying this privilege. Novices too among religious enjoy the same exemption. 6. Other ecclesiastical states that without a vow introduce this exemption. 7. Those who enjoy the privilege of the canon also enjoy the privilege of forum. 8. A professed religious wearing lay dress retains the exemption. He who abandons religion before profession loses the privilege. 9. Whether the servants of churches or of clerics enjoy this privilege. 10. Resolution to the negative. The conclusion is proved also as to kings. 7. Evasion. It is refuted. 8. No privilege of the Church once conceded can be revoked by the secular power. 9. This privilege of immunity cannot even be limited by the civil power. 10. Objection. Solution. Privileges conceded by kings to ecclesiastical persons have no effect prior to their acceptance by prelates. 11. Four reasons for doubt against this sort of concession are solved. 12. Evasion. It is resolved. 13. Neither can the Supreme Pontiff simply revoke this privilege. 14. This assertion is demonstrated on the part of clerics. An evasion is rejected. 15. The Pontiff cannot abrogate all the rights that concede immunity. Objection. 16. Solution.

Chapter 31. Whether the privilege of clerics can be lost or lessened by renunciation.

It is solved.* 18. The agreement of an inferior prelate with a layman, when done without concession of jurisdiction, is valid. 19. Fifth excuse for violation, privilege. 20. Whether any unrevoked privileges against immunity stand. Reason for doubt. 21. Opinion for the negative. 22. The last excuse for violation is just defense. 23. A twofold condition is absolutely required for this excuse. 24. This defense is almost always exercised through use of jurisdiction by laymen. Two evasions are refuted. 25. A defense of the spiritual power which includes usurpation is not to be admitted. 26. *Whether this defense is licit by canon right. BOOK 4: ON ECCLESIASTICAL IMMUNITY OR THE EXEMPTION OF CLERICS FROM THE JURISDICTION OF TEMPORAL PRINCES

Preface:

The truth of the dogma of ecclesiastical immunity, or of the exemption of clerics from the jurisdiction of temporal princes, we have often assumed in preceding discussions and we promised at the beginning of this work, and in chapter 11 of the previous book, to explain, establish, and defend it in the present book. For we judge it necessary for the completion of this work and for a full response to the complaints and objections of the king of England. Also at the end of his Apology for the oath of fidelity, and in his Preface to Christian princes, drawing out that dogma in amazement (as he himself says) from the books of Bellarmine, he has dared to invent and reprehend not only audacity and temerity in the Cardinal but also novelty in the doctrine itself. And thence he strives greatly to excite and provoke Catholic kings against the Pope because, p.25, “it is in their chief interest that nothing of their legal prerogatives be taken away.” Hence he thus speaks to them, p.27: “If each the most powerful among you deeply and seriously considers that almost a third of your people and your soil is dedicated to the Church, will not your souls, I ask, be struck by the sense of that loss which subtracts from your right so much of men and of estates, because colonies and provinces for the Pope are established everywhere?” And he pursues other matters which we will refer to below; for they contain certain objections which we must answer in the discourse of this book. First, then, we will concern ourselves with explaining, in accord with the true principles of theology and canon right, the Catholic dogma about the true liberty or immunity of the Church and the exemption of clerics, and with establishing it, to our poor ability, by theological evidences and reasons. Next we will bring to the center not only the king’s objections but also weightier ones which may have arisen, and, as I hope, we will so satisfy them that it will be agreed that in this dogma what Chrysostom elsewhere said (Hom. 51 on John) has place: “Nothing is clearer than the truth, nothing simpler, if we do not intend to be malicious.”

Chapter 1: What is meant by the terms ecclesiastical immunity, freedom, and exemption. Summary: 1. Method to be followed in this book. 2. Description of immunity. 3. Immunity is threefold: of places, of persons, of goods. In what the immunity of places consists. 4. What ecclesiastical liberty is. First opinion. 5. Second opinion. 6. The second opinion is preferred. 7. Difference among canons punishing offences against the immunity or liberty of the Church. 8. When the offence is done against the immunity and when against the liberty of the Church. 9. What is meant by ecclesiastical exemption. 10. Whether a privilege specially conceded to some person belongs to the immunity of the Church. 11. Which immunity this work deals with.

1. Since the matter of this book embraces the doctrine not only of the faith but also of morals, we must so treat of it that we both show the truth of the faith of the Catholic Church and are able to be of service for Catholic use and practice. And for that reason we will diligently consider and weigh not only the witness of the sacred page but also laws both canon and civil, for on these the greatest doctrine, especially moral doctrine, depends. In the first place, then, the terms that authorities are accustomed to use when speaking on this matter must be explained, so that in this way the thing itself and the authorities may be able the better to be understood. But these terms are especially those three which we put forth in the title, which we will in this chapter briefly declare.

2. The first term is immunity, which taken generally can be described as being the privilege whereby some thing or person is exempted from some common obligation or burden. I take this description from The Digest, 1 Munus 18 ff. on the signification of words, where duty (munus) is said to signify burden, among other things, to which Paulus I.C. subjoins, "When it is remitted it provides release from military service and duty (munus), whence it is said to be named im-mun-ity." Here the name 'military service' seems posited for sake of example, insofar as duty is something burdensome; but immunity in general is said to be release from a duty undertaken for some burden, which release is given by a certain remission or concession; this lack or taking away of a burden, therefore, when applied to the Church, is said to be immunity ecclesiastical. But what is denoted by this last adjective will be clear what is to be said. Now in this immunity can be considered either the act of remitting, or the special right whereby someone is exempted from a common burden, or the effect of that right, which is the lack of or release from such burden and obligation. Each can be signified by the name of immunity, as can be taken from the title De Immunitate nemini conced. Code bk. 10. Immunity, therefore, as it signifies a right of being released from burdens, is a privilege we say that excuses from a common burden. But we use the name of privilege in a broad sense as can comprehend a natural or divine right especially agreeing with some person by contrast with others (as we will more explain in what follows). But immunity taken for the effect itself of the privilege can be called freedom or excuse from a burden, especially when legitimate and founded on some right. And perhaps in this way can be distinguished the two titles of civil law in the Digest 'De Vacat. et excusat. munerum,' and 'de Iure immunitatis'. But about this elsewhere. At present therefore the immunity which is called ecclesiastical can be taken in both ways, in that it exempts ecclesiastical things or persons from burdens common to other things or persons and is a concession to the decency and reverence of such things or persons.

3. Now this immunity is accustomed to be distinguished in a double or triple way on the part of the subjects or things it is conceded to and to which it as it were adheres. One is the immunity of places or temples or churches, another is the immunity of persons or clerics, a third is immunity of goods, which can be referred to the two prior ones because the goods are either of churches or of clerics and are exempted from burdens and tributes by reason of those. The first immunity, that of sacred places, consists of two things: first of release from profane actions that are repugnant to the sanctity of such places or that pollute them; second of the fact that they are places of refuge and security and protection, both for accused persons who flee to them and for goods which are placed in them. So much is taken from the titles 'De Immunitat. Ecclesiarum,' and from pretty much the whole of Decretals 17 q. 4, and the Gloss has specially noted the fact in the chapter 'Cum devotissima' 12 q. 2 the word 'Pro violata immunitate.' But we have spoken largely about this kind of immunity in our 'De Religione' vol. 2, the whole of book 3, and nothing occurs that needs to be added in this place, mainly because nothing is pertinent to the present dispute. But the other two immunities, of persons and of goods, belong most of all to the present consideration and the king of England touches on each, since he complains that a huge part of persons and estates has been subtracted from his royal right. For that reason we will speak of both.

4. Now, from the declaration of this word it is easily understood what ecclesiastical liberty is; for some think these words to be synonymous, others set up some difference between them. As may be seen in Cajetan's Summa, in the word 'Immunity', where though he first confounds these words, yet at the end, in order to understand the canons, he so distinguishes them that by the name of ecclesiastical liberty he wishes only the immunity of persons in themselves and their goods to be meant, by the name of ecclesiastical immunity only the exemption of places, and therefore he does not deem him who violates the immunity of a temple to be acting against ecclesiastical liberty, nor to incur the censures laid down against violators of ecclesiastical liberty. To confirm this fact Cajetan considers the words of Benedict XII in Extravag. 1 'De Privileg.,' where, referring to reserved cases, he distinctly numbers violators of the immunity of churches and of ecclesiastical liberty; therefore he thinks that by these words diverse privileges of the Church are signified.

5. Nevertheless, that these words signify the same thing is taught by Covarruvubias Decretals ch. 20, bk. 2, at the beginning, and he is followed by Tusco, ver. 'Ecclesiae immunitas,' concl. 8, n. 9. The point can also be urged from the description of immunity, because immunity is only a certain lack of subjection and burden, which lack is also signified by the name of liberty, as liberty too is wont to signify lack of servitude and necessity. Therefore, if there be added the same determination for ecclesiastical liberty and immunity, the same thing will be signified by each word. Hence Covarrubias in the aforementioned Extravag. 1 considers that the same determination is not added but varied when it is said 'immunity of churches and ecclesiastical liberty', for the words 'churches' and 'ecclesiastical' do not signify the same thing, because by the name 'churches' is there signified temples, according to common usage, and thus, in that compound phrase, only the immunity of sacred places is there signified. But when 'ecclesiastical liberty' is mentioned the word 'ecclesiastical' is taken by the Church in a general way, mostly by reason of ecclesiastical status, and hence it there properly signifies the exemption of ecclesiastical persons, both in themselves and in their goods. But this liberty is also rightly called ecclesiastical immunity in the Decretals, chapter Adversus, about the immunity of churches, joined to the chapter Non minus, in the same. Therefore, with this determination of ecclesiastical liberty and immunity in place, the same thing is signified by each word. Hence in the common usage of the Doctors those words are used as synonyms, as may be seen in John Lopez, Tractate on Ecclesiastical Liberty, throughout from the beginning, and especially 1 p. q. 3, and 2 p. q. 11, Rebuffe, Tractate on Immunity and Jerome Albano in another tractate on Immunity and in the rest in the Rubrics On Immunity.

6. For which reason this second opinion is in true force and is rightly approved, with due attention to the use and propriety of words. Nor is Cajetan simply in opposition, for he confesses that those words are often confused; he adds, though, that in the usage of the canons that lay down censures against violators of ecclesiastical immunity or against ecclesiastical liberty that difference is observed, because the former canons punish those who injure sacred places but the latter those who act against the immunity of persons. Even this difference is not constant, for the first part has place in the heading, when there is in the canon talk of ecclesiastical immunity, for then ordinarily by the name of churches is signified temples, as I said, and from that addition the canon is determined to sacred places. But if the canon is making disposition against violators of ecclesiastical immunity, plainly it comprehends everything, unless from the action which it punishes or from other circumstances it is clear that it is specially talking of the immunity of places or of persons. Thus the word is in itself indifferent and comprehends everything, unless it is determined by something else. And the same is true if the canon speaks of the immunity of the Church in the singular, both because the word 'Church' alone of itself generally determines the immunity conceded to the Church, whether in places or in persons, and also because the word is wont especially to signify the congregation of the faithful, unless there is determination by something else, or it is clear from the context, that a material temple is being talked of.

7. But another difference can be considered between the canons that punish those who do something against the immunity or the freedom of the Church. For immunity can be violated in two ways. First, by the mere fact or the mere usurpation of a right; second under the pretext of another right of legitimate power. In the prior way he acts against immunity who burns a church, or infringes or spoils or purloins the goods of the Church; in the second way a judge acts against immunity who drags an accused person from a church. Hence this second way is not wont to be committed except by someone who wields public power, or does so under some color or pretext of it; but the prior way can be committed, when power is lacking, by anyone by force. Now in each of these ways something is done against immunity, but it is only in the prior way that something seems to be committed against liberty. For thus he who lays violent hands on a cleric seems to act against ecclesiastical immunity but he does not seem to act against ecclesiastical liberty; on the other hand, however, a secular judge who usurps judgment against a cleric is properly and, so to say, specifically a violator of ecclesiastical liberty, although there too a violation of immunity is generally included, because the right of immunity cannot be violated without an act contrary to immunity.

8. In a similar way, he who, by private authority, through force and injury alone, drags some person from a church, acts against the immunity only of the church; but he who does it by title of public authority and jurisdiction, or who makes determination that churches are not to have the privilege of safety and asylum for offenders fleeing to them, he violates ecclesiastical liberty also, because he tries to rob the Church not only of the use but also of the right of immunity. And in this way the words of Benedict XII above cited seem best understood. A reason too can be given, that less is required for acting against the immunity than against the liberty of the Church, and hence acting against immunity extends more broadly than acting against liberty; for everyone who infringes liberty detracts also from immunity, but not conversely, for he who denies obedience to the Church in deed only will at most be a schismatic. Further, by this reason too Cardinal Zabarella, Repetit. ch. 'Perpendimus', on Sentence of Excommunication, n. 2, opposit. 7, said that it was more hateful for a cleric to be judged by a layman than to be struck by someone of a private capacity, namely because the former act is against ecclesiastical liberty but the latter seems only to be against immunity. It has a foundation too in the chapter 'Si vero' on Sentence of Excommunication, where the striking of a cleric done by a minister of power, not as a minister but as a private person, and without usurpation of jurisdiction, is not always deemed to incur a censure reserved to the Pope; but a striking done by an official in power, by his capacity indeed as minister of it, is always declared to be reserved, the reason for which seems to be no other than that this latter is a graver and more hateful act, because contrary to the liberty of the Church and not merely, as the former, to immunity. Lastly, this difference seems also in agreement with the propriety of the words, for he properly acts against someone's liberty who wishes to reduce him to servitude and impose on him the burden of servitude; but he who inflicts on someone only an injury in fact, and strikes him as if he were a servant, does not properly act against his liberty.

However, on this point, we cannot indeed deny that these two ways of violating ecclesiastical immunity are distinct, and that an offense is graver in its kind when immunity is disrupted not only in fact but also by pretended right, just as it is far graver to deny the Church the right to tithes than not to pay tithes. But nevertheless this fact does not prevent its being the case that in both ways ecclesiastical liberty is violated as well as immunity, because (as I showed) ecclesiastical immunity and liberty, being determined in the same way, are the same in reality. Further, although it also be true that the name violation of ecclesiastical liberty can easily be applied, as by antonomasia, to signifying the mode of the violation – which mode rests not only on violence but also on a presumed and usurped right, in that by the name of liberty the right itself seems more to be signified, and because authorities seem frequently to signify this violation of immunity to be against ecclesiastical liberty, as in the cited chapter 'Non minus' and as one may see in many censures of the Bull Coenae – nevertheless we cannot affirm that that difference is constant in law, nor that it constitutes as it were a rule that the censure laid down against violators of ecclesiastical liberty does not comprehend all violators of immunity, unless such a limitation be gathered from the words or the matter of the law. For that rule or difference is not sufficiently founded in law, nor in the use of doctors, as is clear from what is collected by John Lopez, tractate 'On Ecclesiastical Liberty' p. 1, ch. 10, and from the others enumerated by William Luvérano in his tractate 'On the Tree of Jurisdictions' in declaration no. 15, and from Rebuffe in 'Concordat', the title on firm and irrevocable agreement, section at the second to last term, 'I ask, which are statutes'

9. Next, there is left explained from these the third term, that of ecclesiastical exemption, for in reality it signifies the same as immunity or liberty, and thus one term is commonly explained or described by another. However, the term exemption seems more one of fact than of right, and so to signify more the effect of the privilege of immunity than the privilege itself. Hence one can not unworthily enquire whether every exemption conceded by privilege to ecclesiastical temples, things, or persons, is deemed to pertain to ecclesiastical immunity or liberty, such that he who violates any exemption of this sort is deemed to act against ecclesiastical immunity or liberty and to incur the censures laid down against usurpers of the liberty of the same. For such privilege can be double: one is general, conceded to all churches insofar as they are churches, or to ecclesiastical persons insofar as they are such, and of this privilege it is certain that it pertains to ecclesiastical immunity, for all agree in this fact, as will be plain from what is to be said. But the other can be exemption by a particular privilege given to such and such a church or dignity or ecclesiastical person by a particular way of considering it.

10. About this exemption there is doubt whether it pertains to ecclesiastical immunity such that a violation of it is a violation of ecclesiastical immunity. For Rebuffe in 'Concordat', the place just cited, openly affirms the fact with many references; Cardinal Tusco follows him, at the term 'Ecclesiastical liberty', conclusion 341 no. 17 ff., where he alleges others; and Roque Curcio seems to think the same, tractate 'On Customs' sect. 5, about the second part of Gloss no. 2, and John Lopez in the mentioned tractate 'On Ecclesiastical Liberty' p. 1, q. 10, case 12 and 16. These doctors could have been influenced either by the fact that ecclesiastical immunity comprehends all privileges conceded to churches or ecclesiastical persons, or by the fact that, in order to act against ecclesiastical liberty, it is enough to act against the liberty of one church. For the statutes against the Church that are private to one republic harm the churches only of that territory, and yet they are against ecclesiastical liberty because in the one church all churches are offended, just as in the striking of one cleric the whole clergy is offended and made more fearful.

Nevertheless it must be said that, according to legal usage and ecclesiastical custom, only that exemption belongs to ecclesiastical immunity and liberty which flows from the general privilege given to the Church, whether for the honor and reverence of temples, or because of the decency and dignity of ecclesiastical status or clerical order. This is the common opinion of legal experts, Decretals ch. 'Noverit' on sentence of excommunication, and on Authent. 'Cassa' ch. on Ecclesiastical Sacrosanctity, as is evidenced by Panormitanus in the said ch. 'Let him know' no. 2 and bk. 1 Councils, 83 no. 1, and Decio on the word Authent. 'Cassa' no. 18, Julio Claro, bk. 5, last section, q. 77, no. 28, Sylvester on the term excommunication 'Excommunication' 10, and Lopus allegat. 3, and others I referred to and followed vol. 5 'De Censuris' disp. 21, sect. 2, nos. 89, 90, where I have given fuller explanation. Cajetan thought the same in his Summa on the term immunity; for he says, as regards punishments of law, that they do not come under immunity, except for exemptions which belong to the Church by general privilege; but as regards guilt there can, for the same reason, be violation of an exemption given by special privilege to a particular church along with violation of the immunity conceded commonly to the Church, although the former guilt is not punished in law in the way that the latter one is. Hence he thinks, and rightly, that the exemption by special privilege of some church is in the thing itself truly a sort of ecclesiastical immunity and liberty. For it is a liberty from a burden, which the term of immunity generally signifies, but it is conceded to a sacred thing, insofar as it is such, and hence is a religious thing, and can in its own way deservedly be called sacred; therefore violation of it is irreligious, sacrilegious, and consequently of the same species with violation of a like immunity conceded to the Church by general privilege. Nevertheless, the laws do not punish these violations of special privileges, nor do they deal with them when they protect ecclesiastical immunity and liberty but with things that concern the Church and the ecclesiastical state in general. That is why we said that in legal usage only exemptions flowing from universal privileges are included under ecclesiastical immunity.

Hence it happens that the determination of immunity, when it is called ecclesiastical, bespeaks a relationship to the Church according to its common nature. For a privilege ought not to be conceded to the universal Church in all its members, for this is not necessary, as is evident, but so as to regard the whole Church on behalf of those members or places which are capable of such immunity. Hence again Cajetan rightly noted that for violation of this immunity it is not necessary that the immunity be violated in the whole Church or all its members, or in places it belongs to, but enough that it be violated in one person or in any place to which it belongs by force of general privilege. And this alone proves the foundation of the contrary opinion; and some of the earlier authors mean nothing else, especially Roque Curcio, and the others he refers to. The fact is manifest from the laws which he himself alleges ch.2 'De Reb. eccles. non alienan.' and ch.2, 'De Foro compet.', where the reason is also given, that an injury inflicted on one person against the general privilege of the community and granted on account of the community, redounds on the whole community, and for that reason the violation of immunity which the laws punish is violation proper. Hence also it is by the by understood that, although it could happen that a violation of a special privilege is, as regards its guilt, of the same kind as violation of immunity of the Church proper, yet, of its kind or by its own mode, a violation of immunity has this peculiar to it, that it is as it were a common injury and redounds by a special title on the community; thus therefore immunity properly means some exemption common to the Church.

11. From these things the conclusion is at last drawn that the treatment at present is only of ecclesiastical immunity or liberty proper, and that, because we have now excluded immunity of places, our discussion is only of the immunity of persons, whether in themselves or in their things. But it is to be added that a double immunity or a double general privilege has been conceded to ecclesiastical persons: one is called privilege of the canon and the other privilege of the forum. The first is the privilege (so to speak) of the security and indemnity of ecclesiastical persons, by which, through the canon 'Si quis suadente' 17 q.4, a caution carrying a special censure is given against striking clerics. About this immunity we have no controversy with the king of England and besides the matter of that canon has been treated by us elsewhere, and therefore there will be no talk in the present about that exemption and immunity. But the privilege of the forum is called that whereby exemption from lay jurisdiction is conceded to clerics, to which there is consequently annexed exemption from taxes, and the whole controversy turns on these matters.

Chapter 2: Whether clerics are by divine right exempt from the power of secular princes in matters spiritual and ecclesiastical.

Summary: 1. An error of heretics. The foundation of the error. 2. Conclusion de fide. 3. The assertion is proved by reason. 4. The conclusion is shown from Scriptures. 5. It is confirmed from the Supreme Pontiffs. 6. From the secular power are also exempt all spiritual causes. 7. Solution to the foundation of the contrary error. 8. Response to the confirmation. 9. Objection. Solution.

1. This point was defined virtually in the principles laid down in the previous book; but we here pass it over; both because the king of England contends that the clergy will in his kingdom be subject to himself in all matters and causes, and he affirms the same respectively about other kings and kingdoms, in common with Marsilius of Padua and others like him; and also because, once this error is rejected, it will be evident with greater clarity and certitude what the proper immunity and exemption of clerics is based on. The foundation, therefore, of the aforesaid error is: either that there is no spiritual power in the Church of Christ but only a civil or temporal one by which all things, both secular and ecclesiastical, are to be governed and all laws to be passed and all judges decided, whatever matter they be about. For all things both ecclesiastical and civil are included under the political order and regime, nor do they otherwise fall under human power, but the whole political order falls under the royal power. Or certainly that the followers of this error, if they recognize a certain spiritual power, wish it, more or less on the basis of the same foundation, to be at its highest level in kings, that the whole order of the Church is only political, that is, on account of the external ecclesiastical polity, which makes one body with the civil polity; and therefore it is necessary that it be wholly subject to the same supreme king. Hence, to confirm this point, they judge that Paul placed everything which concerns human rule without exception under the king, when he says in Romans 13.2: "Whosoever therefore resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God." From these words a certain person inferred that secular princes have authority for passing laws in every matter and obligatory on all persons, in accordance with Proverbs 8.15: "By me kings reign and princes decree justice." The confirmation is that the emperor Theodosius in his Code, and Justinian afterwards in his, gave many laws about spiritual things, as about sacrosanct churches, about bishops, about clerics, etc. And Alfonsus king of Spain has many similar ones in his laws, Partidas p. 1. Therefore "whosoever therefore resisteth him (Paul's witness), resisteth the ordinance of God."

2. Catholic truth nevertheless is that clerics are in causes spiritual and ecclesiastical altogether immune from the jurisdiction of temporal princes. Thus do all Catholic writers teach in the places mentioned below, and they all agree that the immunity of clerics as far as this part is concerned is of divine right; this matter I believe to be as equally certain as to be de fide because it rests on the same principles and foundations. Now these principles are principally three, which were proved in the previous book. One is that there is in the Church a governing spiritual power distinct from the civil power and of a superior order, given to the Church itself by the singular institution and donation of Christ, beyond the right of nature. This principle was proved in ch. 6 of the previous book. Another principle is that this power is not in kings or temporal princes but in the pastors given by Christ to the Church, and especially in the Supreme Pontiff, who is the Roman Bishop, and this principle was proved in the previous book, from ch.10. The third principle is that this spiritual power is not subordinate to the power of kings but rather has that power subject to itself, which was copiously proved and defended in the same book, from ch.20.

3. From these principles, therefore, the conclusion thus follows: spiritual causes are to be established and defined by the spiritual power; but this spiritual power is neither in kings nor subordinate to their power; therefore such causes are outside the forum and power of secular princes both directly and indirectly; therefore ecclesiastical persons with respect to these causes are by force of divine right constituted outside the jurisdiction of princes, and hence by the same divine right they enjoy an exemption and immunity of this kind. The major is evident per se on the supposition of the first principle, because if the spiritual and temporal powers of jurisdiction are distinguished, it is necessary that they deal with distinct matters, and that each claim a matter proportionate to itself and be confined to it; therefore spiritual matter as regard all disposition and rule pertains to the spiritual power and, conversely, spiritual power operates in spiritual matter as in its proper sphere and has it for its proper and adequate object. The minor is proved in the second and third principles. But the first inference is evidently inferred from the premises, because no power operates directly save on its own matter, nor does it extend indirectly save to the matter of a power subordinate to itself; but the civil power has neither of these with respect to spiritual matter, as has been shown; therefore spiritual matter is altogether outside the jurisdiction of temporal princes. Thence finally is evidently concluded the second inference because, in the first place, clerics, insofar as they are clerics, pertain to spiritual matter by virtue of an order which is spiritual and from Christ's institution. Next, persons are allotted a forum by reason of matters or causes, because an act of jurisdiction is proximately concerned with some matter which it prescribes or restricts for a subject person, and therefore, if the matter is outside someone's jurisdiction, the persons also, to whom such matter pertains, will, by such reason, be immune from the same jurisdiction.

4. With this manifest proof in place, therefore, from principles of the faith already proved, this truth is shown from Scripture in no other way than from those places where the rule of the Church is shown to have been committed by Christ to the pastors of the Church, 'Feed my sheep' John 21.16, 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind etc.' Matthew 16.19, 'He who hears you hears me, and he who rejects you, rejects me.' 'If he neglect to hear the Church let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican' Luke, Matthew 18.17. Also from those places where it is shown from the institution of Christ that there is in the Church judicial power and ecclesiastical tribunal, according to that verse, 'What will ye? That I come to you with a rod? etc.' and the verse, 'For I verily, as absent in the body but present in the spirit, have judged already as though I were present, him that hath so done this deed.' And that, 'For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? Do not ye judge them that are within?' 1 Cor. 4.21, 5.3, 12. And that, 'Having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience,' and later, 'For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed.' And again, 'Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me,' 2 Cor. 10.6, 8; 13.10. Again that, 'Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves,' Hebrews 13.17. For in these places his speech is about spiritual power, and it is said to be given for ruling the Church, most of all in spiritual things, and for the spiritual edification of the faithful. And the fact that rule over clerics pertains to this power is sufficiently declared from the words of St. Paul to Timothy, 1 Tim. 5.19, 'Against a priest receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses.' For thus is it sufficiently clear that the causes of clerics, insofar as they are clerics, pertain to the prelates of the Church and to them alone. For although it is not there expressly added that this power is exclusive, the fact is sufficiently gathered from here that the power belongs to a superior order and has not been given to others save to the pastors of the Church, nor has it been subordinated to an inferior power, as I said (§3).

5. In this way, then, has this truth been taken by the holy Pontiffs and Councils from the doctrine of Christ and the Apostles. For thither have regard the words of Pope John, 'If an emperor is Catholic, he is a son and not a lord of the Church.' And later, 'So that he should not ungratefully usurp anything from the benefits of God contrary to the disposition of the heavenly order; for God has wished that the disposition of the things of the Church pertain to priests and not to the princes of the world, etc.' About whom he again says, 'Not by them but by the pontiffs and priests has Almighty God wished the clerics and priests of the Church to be ordered and restricted'. In these words he openly declares that this institution is of divine right; and that word 'restricted' is to be weighed, for thence it is clear that the causes of clerics pertain by divine right to the ecclesiastical forum alone; which must at any rate be understood of ecclesiastical and clerical causes insofar as they are clerics. The same doctrine is approved and confirmed by Popes Gelasius, Nicholas I, and Symmachus in various synodal decrees (as mentioned in the same distinction 69). Pope Felix also, and Nicholas I again, in ch. 'Certum est' and ch. 'Imperium' and ch. 'Quoniam' dist. 10, and Innocent III in ch. 'Ecclesia' De Constit., and in ch. 'Solitae', De Mariorit. et obedien., and in ch. 'Novit.' De Iudiciis, and in the same place ch. 2. The same is got from the Council of Rheims under Eugenius, and from Pope Honorius, in ch. 2 De Iurament. calum.

I know indeed that the king of England along with his Protestants despises the authority of such great Popes, and refuses to have them as judges in his own cause. Yet as I already said in the preceding book, their ignorance or perversity cannot diminish the authority of the Popes, which is founded on the words and promises of Christ. Especially is this so because not only the Roman Pontiffs but also the most ancient fathers agree in the same truth, as has been proved at large in the previous book, ch. 9 ff., from Ambrose, Gregory Nazianzen, and many others, and so I judge it superfluous to refer to their opinions again. But if it be said about all these that they were bishops and priests and speaking in their own cause, certainly the Church has never had other pastors or doctors by whom it might be taught and through whom it might receive the divine and apostolic traditions and be preserved in the purity of the faith and the sound interpretation of the Scriptures. 'For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, until we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ,' as St. Paul says in Ephesians 4.12-13. It is impious, therefore, to think that they have imposed on the Church in this cause or have spoken by human affection, but that they have defended the cause of the Church, which could not be separated from their own, not arrogating to themselves a new power but the power they received from Christ through the apostles and their successors, preserving it and defending it for their posterity to the advantage of the Church.

With the Catholic claim thus confirmed both by infallible authority and by firm reason, there can also be understood from the same proof, first, that this immunity or exemption of clerics is not by way of taking away or diminishing the jurisdiction that was before in princes, but by way of negation, because princes never had such jurisdiction, nor could they show whence they had it. For (as I have often said) Christ the Lord, in founding his new spiritual republic, gave no power to temporal princes (for where or when did he confer it?), but gave it to the pastors of the Church; and that is why temporal princes have no power over ecclesiastical persons or their causes, insofar as they are such; nor are persons of this sort, with respect to such causes, subject to kings, and it is in this way that they are said to be exempt, not because they are removed from their jurisdiction, but because kings themselves never received power over them. The fact is best shown from the time of the primitive church, when temporal princes were infidels, for no one would say that they then had power for judging the ecclesiastical causes of clerics, and yet the Church did not then lack perfect power for governing itself and for passing judgment in cases of this sort and about persons of this sort, which in no way pertained to secular princes. But secular princes, because of their conversion to the faith, did not acquire any new jurisdiction over the Church (for who would have conferred it on them?); therefore they do not have it now. Rightly, therefore, are clerics said to be exempt in these things, not by a removal proper and by a new privilege as it were, but because princes themselves lack, of themselves, such power over clerics as regard such causes.

6. Secondly, I collect from what has been said that although this exemption is especially clear in clerics, because they are both sacred persons and are specially dedicated to the divine cult; and therefore they are principally governed by canon rights and, as a result, ecclesiastical causes have place in them most of all and as it were in their proper subject; nevertheless, the same exemption can be seen in the rest of the faithful insofar as spiritual causes can also pertain to them, because it arises not only from the proper status of an ecclesiastical person but also from the general nature of such causes, as was shown. But all those causes are called spiritual which pertain to the faith, to sacraments, to sacrifice, and universally to the divine cult, and to the salvation of the soul and of its cure and remedy from sins, as we said at large in De Legibus bk. 4, which is about canon rights, and as the doctors treat it in the stated chapter 'Ecclesia' De Constit., and various examples can be seen in Tusco, under the term 'ecclesiastical liberty', ch. 1, and we will add some things about this point below in chs. 15 and 16.

7. Finally, from what has been said a response to the foundation of the contrary error is evident. For the principles on which it is founded are heretical and have been sufficiently refuted above. But the words of Paul, 'whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God', and the words of Wisdom, 'By me kings reign', are very absurdly adduced. For Paul speaks of the power in its own forum, and of its giving commands within its own limits. For when he said, 'Let every soul be subject to the higher powers', he did not understand that every man ought to be subject to any king at all, but to his own king, for neither is a Spaniard bound to obey or to be subject to the king of France; therefore each one is commanded to be subject to his own king; therefore also in this way he is said to resist the ordination of God who resists the power or the superior, and resists one giving commands in ordered fashion or in matter subject to him. Nor Paul did say that one should obey the king in every matter, but spoke simply, just as he also said elsewhere, 'Obey those placed over you'. That is also why it was not necessary to add the limitation or exemption, for in the very nature of obedience is intrinsically included respect for the superior as he is superior and as he legitimately gives commands. In another place too, just as the Wise man said, kings rule through wisdom, so he at once added, 'and law givers decree justice'.

8. As for the confirmation about the laws of Justinian in matter of canon right (§1), I said in the above mentioned book 4 of De Legibus, ch. 11, that they are not true laws but that they can be held to by way of instruction, not by way of right; and therefore, that in those things where they contradict the canons they are of no use was also declared in the Code 1 Privilegia and Authent. 'Cassa', the Code De Sacrosanct. Eccl. The thing was even specifically stated about ecclesiastical causes by the same Justinian, Novel. 38, which is contained in collat. 6, tit. 11, 'ut clerici apud proprios episcopos etc.'

9. But there is one objection remaining against that part where it is said that this immunity is of divine right, for by that fact it would be made immutable and incapable of being lessened or diminished by the Pontiff, which is false. For by the consensus of the doctors the Pontiff can commit ecclesiastical causes and spiritual jurisdiction to laymen; therefore it could be that clerics are subject to kings even in those same causes. I reply that this exemption, as I said, is negatively of divine right, insofar as divine right has not given to kings spiritual power over clerics or churches or ecclesiastical causes. Hence, to this extent, it is absolutely an immutable divine institution, for it could not happen that a king, by force of his regal power, could give judgment about a cleric in causes of this sort. For neither could this honor be given by any dispensation, for it involves a repugnance to natural reason. Hence it is forbidden by divine right that anyone, by sole regal jurisdiction without higher jurisdiction, usurp such judgment; on this, then, no dispensation or limitation falls.

But the same divine right does not thus prohibit spiritual jurisdiction from being committed to laymen; and therefore although the canons prohibit this and it does not regularly happen by usual dispensation, nevertheless by the absolute power of the Pontiff there is no repugnance in its happening, as we said along with common opinion in our books De Censuris et Legibus. Panormus too and Felino and other expositors commonly hand it down in the chapter ‘Ecclesia sanctae Mariae’ De Constitutionibus. But I reckon that this is to be understood of delegated jurisdiction, or in some particular case, for I do not reckon that the ordinary rule of the Church can be committed to kings or laymen, because by divine right it has been established that the Church be governed by bishops, as is clear from Acts 2. For the same reason also I reckon that it cannot happen that clerics in their proper and ecclesiastical matters and causes be by ordinary right subjected to secular princes, even by concession of the Pontiff; for in this way much of the ordinary rule of the Church, rule established by Christ, would be overthrown, and it is not possible to give a just and reasonable cause on account of which it might seem possible validly to be done.

Chapter 3: Whether clerics can be and are exempt from the jurisdiction of princes even in matters and causes temporal.

Summary: 1. The error and doctrine of schismatics on this matter. 2. Confirmation. Evasion. Instance. 3. The true and Catholic opinion about the exemption of clerics. This can happen in three ways. The first way is proved. 4. A reason against this mode of concession is solved. 5. By the exemption of clerics kings are deprived of jurisdiction over them. 6. The second mode of exemption is proved. 7. Objection. Response. 8. The Pontiff can exempt clerics by his direct power over kings. 9. The third mode of exemption is proved. 10. Exemption is an act of voluntary jurisdiction. 11. The exemption of clerics is repugnant neither to justice nor to natural reason. 12. It is intrinsically evil so to exempt someone that he be subjected to no one. 13. Arguments against this mode of exemption are solved. The confirmation of the adversaries. 14. Response to the confirmation. An ecclesiastical judge can impose the penalty of death. 15 Final assertion. The exemption of clerics is ancient and holy. Proof. 16. Conclusion, that exemption has de facto been conceded to clerics.

1. There is on this point a special controversy with these schismatics who, although they do not deny the primacy of the Roman Pontiff as regard spiritual power, nevertheless they attribute the primacy in temporal matters, both civil and criminal, even as regard clerics, to temporal kings, and therefore we propose to investigate the thing first in general, whether there is such an exemption, so that afterward we may declare its origin, properties, and effects in particular. But in the question proposed there are two things insinuated: one is about the power, that is, whether clerics can be exempted from the jurisdiction of kings in matters temporal, the other is whether they are in fact exempt. For the heretical followers of Marsilius of Padua, and Illiricus, and other inventors of new schisms, constantly deny that in the Church an exemption has been made for clerics which supreme temporal princes are required to observe. But in order to find some foundation for this assertion they deny as a result that such an exemption could have been made in the Church without grave lapse and error against divine and natural right. This reason for constructing this error is the one that a certain Paul Servita and other secret writers against ecclesiastical liberty seem to have had, who a few years ago spread about certain libels against the Apostolic See on the occasion, known to all, of the disturbance in Venice, and Barclay seems to be numbered among them, to whom the most illustrious Bellarmine is very recently responding; and these people the king of England praises and imitates.

But to make persuasion of this their foundation they use only those testimonies of Scripture where kings are said to be ministers of God, and their power said to be from God, and therefore obedience to them is prescribed as necessary by right of nature, 'for conscience' sake', Romans 13, Proverbs 8, and similar. From these they establish this principle too as certain, that kings have power and care immediately imposed by God for governing all men under their sway. Finally they infer from this that the exemption of clerics from the king in any kingdom is repugnant to divine and natural law and for that reason impossible. Now this last inference could in this way be deduced by us so as to seem to have a certain shadow of reason; for this exemption could be made either by God or by some man; but neither can be asserted; therefore neither can simply be introduced. The minor as to the first part about God is proved, because, first, God is not contrary to himself; if therefore he has himself prescribed to kings that they should have the care of all men who are born and live under their empire, and has prescribed to all of these that they should obey their kings, it could not happen that he could take power away from kings over subject clerics, or (which is the same) that he could exempt clerics from the power of princes. Also, because this exemption is contrary to natural right, which Paul has taught us; but God cannot dispense from natural right either at all or certainly he does not do it by his ordinary power, especially in the law of grace and by a dispensation so universal.

2. The second part about man is proved first of all by universal reason, because a man can overthrow natural right much less than God. Next I use another dilemma, because, if some man could have made such an exemption, it would be either the Pope, or the emperor, or a king, or any prince at all who was supreme in his territory; for if these cannot, certainly much less can inferiors. But that the Pope could not concede this exemption to clerics is proved because he cannot deprive kings of their power nor detract from royal prerogatives, as the king of England says, for there is the same reason of the whole as of the part. If therefore the Pope cannot deprive any Christian king of his whole jurisdiction neither therefore could he deprive him of any part of it, especially so great and notable a part as would be 'a third part of the men and estates', as the same king complains. There is confirmation also of the fact, because the Pope could not concede this exemption to clerics with respect to a heathen and unbaptized prince, if there were clerics subject to him, as is now the case for example in Japan or China; therefore neither could he do it with respect to Christian princes. The proof of the consequence is that Christian kings are not less supreme in temporal matters than heathen kings; and although we grant that Christian princes are spiritually subject to the Supreme Pontiff (which the king of England and Protestants do not admit), this contributes nothing to enable him to deprive them of their temporal jurisdiction; therefore in this they are on an equality with heathen princes and in no way subject to the Church. Perhaps someone will say, to prove this summarily, that Pontiffs could not have done this against the will of Christian princes but they could have done it with their consent. But in the first place this does not suffice to refute the adversaries, for thence schismatics will infer that the exemption of clerics is not per se settled but depends always on the consent of princes and thus can be revoked on the choice of the same. Next the king of England will say that he is supreme in temporal matters and has never consented but has resisted, not only he but also his predecessors. Finally also it needs still to be seen whether kings themselves could have consented, for to consent is the same as to do; but we will prove that kings could not have conceded this exemption; therefore neither could the Pontiffs have introduced it by the consent of kings.

The proof, then, that a temporal king could not concede the privilege of such exemption to the clerics of his kingdom so as to make them not subject to himself, is taken in the first place from the principle received by experts in jurisprudence, that princes cannot concede a privilege which is directly contrary to the royal dignity, because they cannot diminish it or take anything from it, for it was not made for their utility principally, nor have they received an absolute dominion over it, but so that they might preserve it unimpaired for their successors. For because of this cause also the Supreme Pontiff cannot diminish his own dignity, nor concede a privilege which would take anything from his dignity. Hence Navarrus inferred, ch. 'Novit.', De Iudiciis, coroll. 69 n.166, that no king could concede to his kingdom or his subordinate dominions a privilege such that they should be bound to obey neither him nor his magistrates. He also confirms the point, both because such a privilege would be contrary to the law of nature which dictates that one should obey princes and superiors, and because the republic itself, if it retained in itself the supreme power given to it by God, could not exempt any member of the republic from the law to obey it, because it could not abdicate from that natural power which it has received from nature over its citizens as long as the relation and union of the citizens with the city remains the same, as of the members with the body. Therefore neither could a king do that now, since his power, which preceded him in the republic and was transferred to him, is the same.

Finally we can confirm this by an example taken from the Supreme Pontiff, who cannot exempt any baptized man from his jurisdiction such that he should not be bound to obey him; for it seems the same should be said of a temporal king, that he is compared in temporal rule to his kingdom and to its persons as the Pope in spiritual rule is compared to the Church. Now the reason is common to both cases, that God has committed both to the king and to the Pope the care of their subjects, and has prescribed that they should give them justice and should continue in office by punishing the bad and defending the good; therefore a king could not exempt persons committed to him by God and leave them free, because this would be contrary to divine institution and contrary to the natural obligation of his office. And this is what the king of England and others claim when they say that this exemption is against natural law. Lastly, there is confirmation of this part, together with the preceding one, that such an exemption would not be to the edification but to the detriment of the Church, therefore it could be introduced neither by a king nor by the Pope. The king of England seems to have this reason in mind when he warns princes to consider: "how many thorns and thistles (he says) are left in the middle of your kingdoms when it is claimed that so powerful a party of men is born, educated, and able to enjoy copious booty, that is immune from your power and not subject by any right to your laws and judgments.” Now Paul of Venice tries to show that this inconvenience follows because, since ecclesiastical prelates cannot use the material sword against their subjects by exacting from them the penalty of death, hence it happens that vices and sins increase in the Church. Therefore he concludes that this liberty, which ecclesiastics pretend to, is nothing other than a liberty for sinning.

3. Nevertheless the true and Catholic opinion is that clerics could justly be exempted from the jurisdiction of temporal princes. This assertion, to the extent it must be founded on the authority of the Church, depends on a fact that has not yet been stated; and for that reason we will first show the truth itself by way of possibility and afterwards we will prove its certitude in fact. We say, therefore, that this exemption could justly have been made, there being three modes in argumentation touched on, namely from God, from the Pope too, from the emperor or kings. The first part is indeed so evident that it could be denied by no one without great blindness and impiety; for God is absolute Lord of life and death, as of human liberty; therefore by most justly using his power and right, he can make any man slave or master and subject or superior of another, and similarly he can deprive any man of his proper dominion and power and give it as he may please to another. For that reason Daniel says, 2.20-21: “Blessed be the name of the Lord for ever and ever: for wisdom and might are his: and he changeth the times and the seasons: he removeth kings, and setteth up kings.” Therefore with the same facility he could transfer clerics to be under the power of the Pope, taking away from kings the power which they could have over them and conferring it on the Pope.

4. Nor is the reason, which was made to the contrary, of any moment, because through an exemption or change or transfer of this sort no change has to come about in God himself, for, remaining himself unchanged, he changes empires and the states of human things; and in this way in the Church itself he has wished that there be distinct modes of governance for diverse times, according to the counsel of his will, without any change or contrariety in the same will. For although God bestows a kingdom or other power on someone, he is not compelled to preserve it perpetually, but he can take it away according to the reason of his own providence and give it to another, not because he retracts his former will but because from the beginning he disposed all things under that law and condition and as depending on his own will. Nor, lastly, does any dispensation in natural right intervene in this business, but only a certain change in the matter of it, which can be done not only by God but even by man, as has elsewhere been by me largely treated of, and I will also immediately touch on it.

5. So then two things are here briefly to be distinguished which our adversaries confound, so that they involve the thing in obscurity when, however, it is very clear and manifest to anyone with a little learning. For it is one thing to exempt someone from someone’s obedience by taking from the other jurisdiction, or all right of a superior, with respect to such person, even though he retain power over other persons. But it is another thing, while preserving in a prince or prelate the same jurisdiction over such a person and the same right of giving commands, to remove nevertheless from the subject the obligation to obey. Exemption, therefore, as explained in this latter sense (which we can, in the theological manner, call the composite sense), can most justly be said to be contrary to natural right as regard this indispensable thing, because it involves an open repugnance and contradiction even in the divine will itself. For thus it would happen that God wants at the same time that the superior be able truly to command, and hence effectually to bind the subject, and that the subject nevertheless be able licitly not to obey, and consequently that he be at the same time both subject and not subject, and again that there be a war that is just on both sides, not as founded in ignorance but in the thing itself, which is an intolerable and incredible perplexity. But who ever understood so the exemption of clerics? No one, to be sure, who is of sound mind. The other mode of exemption, therefore, is not only possible but also very easy, nay it exists daily in those powers which are given by men and can be taken away or limited by the same. For thus a king can exempt some noble from the jurisdiction of an inferior magistrate, and the Pope can exempt a religious from the jurisdiction of a bishop. In this way, therefore, God could exempt clerics from the jurisdiction of kings without any dispensation in natural law, because there is no natural law that commands kings to have jurisdiction over clerics, or over all inhabitants of their kingdoms; but rather, since kings are ministers of God and have from him power over what subjects he pleases, the same natural reason dictates that God could diminish that power and exempt from it whichever of the subjects he should please.
